ROSS, Alexander Coffman merchant, b. in Zanesville, Ohio, 31 May, 1812; d. there, 25 Feb., 1883. He became a merchant in his native place, sang in a church choir, and in the presidential canvass of 1840 was a member of a Whig glee-club. A friend having suggested that the tune "Little Pigs" would be a suitable chorus for a political song, Ross set himself to compose the song, and one Sunday during sermon-time produced "Tippecanoe and Tyler Too." This was sung by his glee-club at a mass-meeting in Zanesville, and at once became popular. When he went to New York in September, to buy goods, he sang it at a great meeting in Lafayette hall, the audience took up the chorus, after the meeting it was repeated by crowds in the streets and about the hotels, and thenceforth it was the popular song of the campaign. Geo. Harrison was said to have been sung into the White House. From a boy Mr. Ross was interested in scientific inventions, and he is said to have produced the first daguerreotype ever made in this country. He was one of the most enterprising business men in Zanesville, and accumulated a large property. See "Our Familiar Songs, and Those who Made Them," by Helen K. Jones (New York, 1881).---ROSS, Alexander Milton, Canadian naturalist, b. in Belleville, Ont., 13 Dec., 1832; d. in Montreal, 27 Oct., 1897. He attended school till eleven, when the death of his father compelled his removal. He evinced a great love for natural history. In his boyhood he came to New York city, and after struggling with many adversities became a compositor on the "Evening Post." William Cullen Bryant, its editor, was much interested in him, and remained his friend ever afterward. During this period he became acquainted with Garibaldi, who was then a resident of New York; and in 1854 Ross was instrumental in securing a pension for Garibaldi from the Italian government. In 1851 he began the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. Valentine Mott, in New York, and after four years of unremitting toil, working as a compositor during the day and studying medicine at night, he received his degree of M.D. in 1855. Soon after his graduation he was appointed a surgeon in the forces in Nicaragua, under William Walker. In 1856 he became actively engaged in the anti-slavery struggle in the United States, becoming a personal friend of John Brown. During the civil war he served for a short time as a surgeon in the National armies, but was captured by President Lincoln as confidential correspondent in Canada, where he rendered important services to the U.S. government, receiving the thanks of the president and Sec. Seward. At the close of the war Dr. Ross offered his services to President Juarez of Mexico, and received the appointment of surgeon in the Mexican army. After the overthrow of the empire he returned to Canada and began to collect and classify the fauna and flora of that country, a work that had never before been attempted by a native. He has collected and classified hundreds of species of birds, eggs, mammals, reptiles, and fresh-water fish, 3,400 species of insects, and 2,000 species of Canadian flora. After his return to Canada he became a member of the Col. of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, and was one of the founders of the Society for the diffusion of physiological knowledge in 1881. Dr. Ross had been appointed treasurer and commissioner of agriculture for the province of Ontario, and he had removed from Montreal to Toronto. He was knighted by the emperor of Russia, and the kings of Italy, Greece, and Saxony in 1856, and by the King of Portugal in 1872. He was appointed consul in Canada by the kings of Belgium and Denmark, and received the decoration of the "Académie Française" from the government of France in 1879. He was a member of many scientific societies, and the author of "Recollections of an Abolitionist" (Montreal, 1867); "Birds of Canada" (1872); "Butterflies and Moths of Canada" (1873); "Flora of Canada" (1873); "Forest Trees of Canada" (1874); "Ferns and Wild Flowers of Canada" (1877); "Mammals, Reptiles, and Fresh-water Fishes of Canada" (1878); "Vaccination a Medical Delusion" (1883); and "Medical Practice of the Future" (1887).—ROSS, David, congressman, b. in Maryland about 1757. He was a delegate from that state to the Continental Congress in 1783, and in 1787, voted on the motion to amend the article passed on 29 Aug., 1786, making it read "that the proceedings of congress do not authorize the secretary of the United States for the department of foreign affairs to enter into any stipulation with the minister of his Catholic majesty." He also voted on 31 May, 1787, to order a resolution of thanks to John Adams for his services as minister to England, and on 13 Oct., 1787, voted for Mr. Pierce Butler's motion that it was the desire of congress to entertain the friendship existing between the United States and his "Catholic majesty. There is no record of his death.---ROSS, Edmund Gibson, senator, b. in Ashland, Ohio, 27 Aug., 1856; was educated at an early age to a printer, received a limited education, and in 1874 removed to Wisconsin, where he was employed in the office of the Milwaukee "Sentinel" for four years. He went to Kansas in 1856, was a member of the Kansas constitutional convention in 1859, and served in the legislature until 1865. He was a founder of the Kansas "Record" and the Kansas "Tribune," which was the only Free-state paper in the territory at that time, the others having been destroyed. In 1862 he enlisted in the National army as a private, and in 1865 became major. On his return to Kansas, after the war, he was appointed to succeed James H. Lane in the U. S. senate, and was elected to fill out the term, serving from 23 July, 1866, till 4 March, 1871. He voted against the impeachment of President Johnson, thus offending the Republican party, with which he had always acted, and was charged with having adopted this course from mercenary and corrupt motives. After his term ended he returned to Kansas, united with the Democratic party, and was defeated as their candidate for governor in 1880. In 1882 he removed to New Mexico, where he published a newspaper, and in May, 1883, was appointed by President Cleveland governor of that territory.

ROSS, Frederick Augustus, clergyman, b. in Cohoba, Cumberland co., Va., 25 Dec., 1796; d. in Huntsville, Ala., 13 April, 1883. He was educated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., entered the Presbyterian ministry, emancipated his slaves, and from 1825 till 1831 was pastor of a church in Richmond, Va., where he had been lawyer and editor of a newspaper from 1828 he labored as an evangelist in Kentucky and Ohio. At the division of the Presbyterian general assembly in 1837—8 he adhered to the new school branch, and in 1855 he became pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Huntsville, Ala., holding this charge until 1857 and continuing pastor emeritus until his death. With James Gallaher and David Nelson he edited a monthly publication entitled “The Calvinistic Magazine,” founded in 1826, and he published a book entitled “Slavery as ordained of God” (Philadelphia, 1857).

ROSS, George, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Newcastle, Del., in 1739; d. in Lancaster, Pa., in July, 1759. His father, George (1676—1754), left the Presbyterian ministry for that of the Church of England and came from Scotland to Delaware about 1703. He very soon rose to prominence, becoming one of the pillars of the Episcopal church in the American colonies, and acting as chaplain to several of the proprietary governors of Pennsylvania. The son at the age of eighteen began the study of the law, and on his admission to the bar, in 1731, settled in Lancaster, Pa. He was a member of the Pennsylvania assembly that assembled in 1768—70, and appointed by the convention that assembled, after the dissolution of the proprietary government, to prepare a declaration of rights. Mr. Ross was elected to the 1st general congress at Philadelphia in 1774, and continued to represent his state until June, 1777, when, through failing health, he resigned his seat. On this occasion, the citizens of Lancaster having voted him a piece of plate worth £150, he declined the gift on the ground that “it was the duty of every man, especially of every representative of the people, to contribute by every means within his power to the welfare of his country without expecting pecuniary rewards.” On first entering congress he was appointed by the legislature to report to that body a set of instructions by which his conduct and that of his colleagues were to be guided. He was among the foremost leaders in the provincial legislature in enacting measures for the defence of the community against British aggression, and in 1775 drew up a reply to a message of Gov. Penn that decrepitated any defensive measures on the part of the colonies. He was also the author of the report urging vigi from action for protection of the city of Philadelphia in a state of defence. On 14 April, 1779, he was appointed judge of the court of admiralty for Pennsylvania, which post he filled until his death three months later. Judge Ross possessed a benevolent disposition, which often led him to espouse the cause of the Indians and to save from execution persons that were condemned to death. As a lawyer he was early classed among the first of the profession, and as a judge he was learned and upright, and remarkable for the ease and rapidity with which he despatched business. He was the last man of the Pennsylvania delegation to sign the Declaration of Independence.—His half-brother, Mr. Ross, the son of James and Margaret Ross, in Philadelphia, 8 May, 1776, was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, 27 Aug., 1779, and so rapidly rose in his profession that in 1743 he was the chief rival of Andrew Hamilton before the courts. In 1744 he engaged in the manufacture of pig-iron in Berks county with John Lesher, and he continued his interest in the same until his death. In 1789, with others, he was consulted by the governor and council in relation to a law for recording warrants and surveys, and thus render the title to real estate more secure. In 1790 he took part in the organization of St. Paul’s Episcopal church, and was its first warden. Alexander Graydon says: “Mr. John Ross, who loved ease and made his much better than liberty and strife, declared for neutrality, saying that: ‘let who would be king, he well knew that he should be subject’; and John Adams writes of him in his diary, 25 Sept., 1775, as “a lawyer of great eloquence and heretofore of extensive practice, a great Tory, but now they say beginning to be converted.” He was a friend and correspondent of Benjamin Franklin, and an early member of the American Philosophical Society.

ROSS, George William, Canadian statesman, b. near Nairn, Middlesex co., Ont., 18 Sept., 1841. His family came from Ross-shire, Scotland, in 1833. He was educated at his native place and at the Toronto normal school, and taught from 1857 till 1871, when he was appointed inspector of public schools for the county of Lambton. He was active in the movement for the creation of county model schools, and did much to perfect them when they were established, preparing the syllabus of lectures, and serving for a time as inspector of model schools. He was a member of the central committee of examiners from 1876 till 1886. Mr. Ross was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1872, re-elected by acclamation in 1874, and chosen again in 1878 and 1882, but he was unseated in October, 1883, for bribery by agents during his canvass. He was appointed minister of education for Ontario, 23 Nov., 1883, elected to the legislative assembly of Ontario, 13 Dec., 1883, and re-elected in 1886. Mr. Ross has been for many years active in the temperance and prohibition movements in Canada. He was an honour commissioner at the Colonial and Indian exhibition in London, England, in 1885. He has edited the Strathroy “Age” and the Seaforth “Expositor,” and was also one of the conductors of the “On-

ROSS, Henry Howard, lawyer, b. in Essex, N. J., Sept. 22, 1800; d. there, 14 Sept., 1862. He was graduated at Columbia in 1828, studied law, was admitted to the bar, practised in Essex for fifty years, and was elected to Congress as a Whig, serving from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1857. In 1847-8 he was a county judge, and in 1848 was a presidential elector. He was adjutant on the staff of Gen. John E. Wool at the battle of Plattsburg, 11 Sept., 1814, and was afterward appointed major-general of the state militia. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of A. M. in 1818.

ROSS, James, senator, b. in York county, Pa., 13 July, 1763; d. in Alleghany City, Pa., 27 Nov., 1847. He entered the school of the Rev. Dr. John McMillan and accepted the post of teacher of Latin. In 1782 Mr. Ross became a student at law, was admitted to the bar in 1784, went to Washington, Pa., where he practised until in 1795 he removed to Pittsburgh. In 1789 Mr. Ross was elected to the congress of Pennsylvania members to frame a new constitution for the state. The ability that he displayed in this body gave him a reputation which, with his family name Ross, as a lawyer and lawyer, secured his election to the U. S. senate, in April, 1794, for the unexpired term, ending 3 March, 1797, of Albert Gallatin, who had been thrown out because he had not been for nine years a citizen, as required by the ordinance of 1784. In 1797 he was again elected to succeed himself. To Senator Ross undoubtedly belongs the chief credit of the peaceful ending of the whiskey insurrection. On 17 July, 1794, Gen. Neville, the chief excise officer, was attacked, and his house and other property were destroyed. At a tumultuous meeting of the people at Washington, Pa., a rally of armed men was called, to be held on 1 Aug., at Braddock's Field. Mr. Ross, in a powerful speech, alone opposed the will of an excited populace. He was told that he had that day destroyed all chances of future political preferment, but, nothing daunted, he attended the Braddock's Field meeting and also that of the delegates from western Pennsylvania and Virginia, at Parkinson's Ferry. By his personal appearance and manner a party was formed, which, if not very numerous, included many citizens of note, several of whom had been active on the other side. While he was at Parkinson's Ferry a messenger from the capital brought Senator Ross the information that he had been appointed by Washington the chief of a commission to compose the insurrection. Senator Ross more than prepared the way for his colleagues, and the insurrection was virtually at an end before they joined him. Mr. Ross had been for several years intimate with Gen. Washington, being consulted as counsel, and now, at the president's request, became his attorney in fact for the sole management of his large estates in western Pennsylvania.
there are several entries in the diary of Gen. Washington, during the sitting of the convention to frame the United States constitution, of engagements to dine with Mr. Ross at his country place, the Grange, named after the home of Lafayette.

ROSS, Sir John, British explorer, b. in Balsarock, Scotland, 24 June, 1777; d. in London, England, 30 Aug., 1856. He was the son of a clergyman. The young navy officer was very wounded four times under the batteries of Bilbao, Spain, receiving a pension of £150 per annum. In 1817 he was offered the command of two vessels for an arctic expedition to ascertain the existence of a north-west passage, and on 25 April, 1818, he sailed in the "Isabella," accompanied by Lient. William F. Parry in the "Alexander." He returned to England in November of that year, and was made post-captain on 7 Dec., 1818. In May, 1829, he sailed in the steamer "Victory," equipped by Sir Felix Booth, sheriff of London, and was accompanied by a small tender of sixteen tons, the "Kruzenstern." In September, 1830, he became ice-bound in the Gulf of Bothnia, and he abandoned his ship on 29 May, 1832. In August, 1834, he was raised to the rank of captain, for his services in the "Ereb." In January, 1838, Sir John was engaged on a whaling expedition. He arrived in London in 1833, and was knighted, 24 Dec., 1834, and made companion of the bath. From 1839 till 1845 he was consul at Stockholm, and in 1850 he commanded the "Felix," a vessel of ninety tons, in search of Sir John Franklin, returning in 1851, in which year he became rear-admiral. His publications include: "A Voyage of Discovery made under the Orders of the Admiralty for the Purpose of exploring Baffin's Bay, and inquiring into the probability of a N. W. Passage" (London, 1819); "Observations on 'Voyages of Discovery and Research within the Arctic Regions," by Sir John Barrow (1819; 2d ed., 1846); "Treatise on Navigation by Steam" (1829); "Narrative of a Second Voyage in Search of a Northwest Passage, etc., including the Reports of Capt. James Clarke Ross and the Discovery of the Northern Magnetic Pole" (1835); "Memoirs and Correspondence of Admiral Lord de Saurey" (2 vols., 1838); "Arctic Expedition, with a Summary of the Searching Expeditions for Sir John Franklin" (1850); and a "Narrative of a Second Voyage on the 'Ereb,'" published after the Failure of the Searching Expeditions sent out by the Government and Others for the Rescue of Sir John Franklin" (1857).—His nephew, Sir James Clarke, explorer, b. in London, England, 15 April, 1800; d. in Aylesbury, Buckinghamshire, England, 3 April, 1862, entered the navy in 1812, and accompanied his uncle on his first arctic expedition in 1818. From 1819 till 1827 he was with Capt. Parry in his voyages in search of a northwest passage, and also in his expedition of 1827. He was appointed commander on 8 Nov., 1827, sailed with his uncle in 1829, was absent four years, and discovered what he believed to be the northern magnetic pole. On his return to England he was made post-captain, 28 Oct., 1834, crossed the Atlantic in 1836 to search for missing whaling vessels, and after his return engaged in a magnetic survey of Great Britain and Ireland. In April, 1839, he was appointed to command the "Erebus," and in September of that year, in company with the "Terror," sailed for the Antarctic seas to make magnetic and meteorological observations and investigations. After a successful voyage of four years, in which much valuable information regarding this region was gained, he returned to England in September, 1843. In January, 1848, he was appointed to the "Enterprise" and made an unsuccessful voyage to Baffin Bay in search of Sir John Franklin, going as far as Barrow Strait. In 1841 he was presented with the founder's gold medal of the London geographical society, and he also received a gold medal from the Geographical society of Paris, was knighted in 1844, and received in that year the degree of D. C. L. from Oxford. He was the author of "A Voyage of Discovery and Research in the Southern and Arctic Regions during the Years 1829-33" (2 vols., London, 1847).
ada with his parents in infancy, and was educated at the district school, Brockville. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1839, and soon attained reputation as a practitioner and as a supporter of the Liberals. In 1848 Mr. Ross came a member of the legislative council. He declined an executive office in the government, but in 1851 accepted that of solicitor-general. In 1852 he went to England to superintend the completion of the contracts for the construction of the Grand Trunk railway, and he was afterward president of this road for ten years. On his return to Canada he was attorney-general till the resignation of John Macdonald from the cabinet on April, 1856; and in the beginning of 1858 he was appointed receiver-general in the administration of John A. Macdonald, retaining office until his colleagues were out of power in August of the same year. He resumed office a few days later as president of the executive council in Cartier's administration. At the time of the confederation he became a member of the Dominion senate. He was engaged in journalism at one time, and established a newspaper that advocated his favorite political reforms.

ROSS, Sir John, British soldier, b. at Stone-house, Cumberland, England, 18 March, 1829. He entered the army in 1846 as 2d lieutenant in the rifle brigade. He was present at the battles of the Alma and Inkerman in 1854, as adjutant of the 2d band, and was made a companion of the bath. He commanded, for his services in the Crimea. He served during the Indian mutiny, took part in the action of Cawnpore and the capture of Lucknow, and afterward raised a camel corps, which he successfully commanded in the Central Indian campaign under Sir Hugh Rose. For these services he received a brevet lieutenant-colonelcy and a medal, and was made a companion of the bath. He commanded the Bengal troops in the Perak expedition of 1875–6, and in 1878 was chosen to lead the brigade of Indian troops that was sent to Malta during the Eastern crisis. On his return to India he commanded the Calcutta district brigade, until he was given charge of the reserve division of the Afghan field force, under Sir Frederick Roberts, with which in 1880 he undertook a campaign to Cabul, in command of the Indian brigades. For his services on this occasion he received the Afghan medal and star and was made a knight-commander of the bath, and received the thanks of parliament. In 1881 he was appointed to the command of the Poonah division of the Bombay army, which he relinquished in 1886, when he was promoted lieutenant-general. In the spring of 1888 Sir John was appointed general officer commanding the forces in Canada, and in May of the same year he was sworn in as administrator of the government of Canada, pending the arrival of the newly appointed governor-general. He again became a member of the executive council and speaker of the legislative council, 31 Oct., 1879, and was commissioner of agriculture and public works from July, 1881, till March, 1886. In 1875 the provincial college of physicians and surgeons and a member of the Agricultural council of Quebec, and was elected vice-president of the North Shore railway company in 1875.

ROSS, Lawrence Sullivan, soldier, b. in Bentonport, Iowa, 27 Sept., 1838. He was graduated at Florence Wesleyan university, Florence, Ala., commanded Texas frontier troops under Gen. Samuel Houston, and became colonel of the 6th Texas regiment of cavalry in the Confederate army on 24 May, 1862. He was made brigadier-general 21 Dec., 1863, and led a brigade in Wheeler's cavalry corps of the Army of Tennessee. In 1866 Gen. Ross became governor of Texas.

ROSS, Leonard Fulton, soldier, b. in Fulton county, Ill., 18 July, 1823. He was educated in the common schools and studied at the Eckville, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1845. In 1846 he joined the 4th Illinois volunteers for the Mexican war, became 1st lieutenant, and was commissioned for services at Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo, commanding the body-guard of Gen. James Shields while making a difficult reconnaissance. He also bore important despatches from Metamora to Gen. Zachary Taylor and to Gen. Robert Patterson in Victoria, Mexico. After the war he resumed his practice, and was probate judge for six years. He was chosen in May, 1861, colonel of the 17th Illinois regiment, which he had raised, and served with it in Missouri and Kentucky, bearing himself with great gallantry at Frederic-town, Mo., 21 Oct., 1861, where his horse was shot under him. In 1862 he was in command of Fort Donelson. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 25 April, 1862, after commanding a brigade since the capture of Fort Donelson, Tenn., 16 Feb., 1862. After the evacuation of Corinth, 30 May, 1862, he was promoted to the command of a division and stationed at Bolivar, Tenn. In 1857 he was appointed by President Johnson collector of internal revenue for the 9th district of Illinois. He has been three times a delegate to National Republican conventions, and was twice a defeated candidate for congress. Since 1866 he has given his attention to farming and has been interested in various agricultural societies. He has imported fine stock into this country, and now (1898) has a large farm in Iowa.—His brother, Lewis W., was a representative in congress in 1863–9.
Cockburn, marched to Bladensburg, where he defeated the American army, consisting mostly of undisciplined militia, on August 18, 1814, and burned and sacked Washington. He was killed while leading the advance toward Baltimore, Md.

ROSSEL, Elisabeth Paul Edouard (ro-sel), Chevalier de, French navigator, b. in Sens, 11 Sept., 1765; d. in Paris, 20 Nov., 1829. He entered the marine guards in 1789, served under De Grasse in the West Indies, fought at Yorktown in October, 1781, and afterward with the funder Banneur till the conclusion of peace in 1783. He was attached under D'Entrecasteaux to the station of the Indian ocean in 1785, became lieutenant in 1789, and was flag-captain during the expedition in search of La Pérouse (q. v.) in 1791-95, of which he assumed command in 1794 after the death of the two commanders. After publishing, at the expense of the government, the narrative of D'Entrecasteaux's expedition, he succeeded Fleurien (q. v.) in 1811 as member of the longitude office, and in 1812 Boungainville (q. v.) in the institute. He was brevetted rear-admiral in 1822, and became, on 31 Dec., 1826, keeper of the logs and charts in the navy department, a post which he held up to the time of his death. He was one of the founders of the French geographical society in 1821, and its first president. His works include "Instructions nautiques pour les côtes de la Guyane" (Paris, 1809); "Voyage de D'Entrecasteaux à la recherche de La Pérouse" (2 vols., 1809); "Signaux de jour, de nuit et de brume" (2 vols., 1819-21); and "Instructions pour la description nautique des côtes de la Martinique" (1814). He was also a founder of the French marine library. "Collection des voyages et découvertes des Espagnoles dans l'Amérique du Sud" (10 vols., 1840). His name has been given to a small island in the Pacific ocean south of America.

ROSSER, Leonidas, clergyman, b. in Petersburg, 31 July, 1815; d. in Ashland, Va., 25 Jan., 1892. He was graduated at Wesleyan, and entered the New York conference of the Methodist church. In 1839 he was transferred to the Virginia conference, where he had since been stationed, and was presiding elder of the districts of Fredericksburg in 1832-3, Norfolk in 1833-4, Lynchburg in 1836-8, Richmond in 1865-9, and Randolph Macon in 1877-81. Dr. Rosser was delegate to the general conference of the Southern church in sixty sessions from 1850 till 1866, and during the civil war was general missionary to the Confederate army. In 1858 the degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Emory and Henry college, and during 1858-9 he edited the Richmond "Christian Advocate." His publications include "Baptism, its Nature, Obligation, Mode, Subjects, and Bene- fits" (Richmond, 1843); "Experimental Religion, embracing Justification, Regeneration, Sanctification, and the Witness of the Spirit" (1854); "Class-Meetings" (1855); "Recognition in Heaven" (1856); "Reply to Howell's 'Evils of Infant Baptism'" (1856); and "Open Communion" (1858).

He entered the " (Richmond, 1843); "Experimental Religion, embracing Justification, Regeneration, Sanctification, and the Witness of the Spirit" (1854); "Class-Meetings" (1855); "Recognition in Heaven" (1856); "Reply to Howell's 'Evils of Infant Baptism'" (1856); and "Open Communion" (1858).

ROSSITER, Thomas Prichard, artist, b. in New Haven, Conn., 29 Sept., 1817; d. in Cold Spring, N. Y., 17 May, 1871. He was educated in New Haven, and subsequently began the study of art. There he met his fiancée, Harriet Jocelyn. About 1838 he began to practise his profession in his native city, but in 1840-1 he studied in London and Paris. During the next five years he had the advantage of the chief educators of the art in Rome, sketching and painting during the summers in Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. On his return to the United States he established himself in New York, where he was chiefly engaged on his sculp- tural pictures, "Marian dancing before the Hosts," "Return of the Dove to the Ark," "Jeremiah with a Prophet," "Ascension," "The Idols," and "The Jews in Captivity." In 1858 he went again to Europe, making an extended tour. In December of the same year he opened a studio in Paris, where he remained about three years. During this time he produced "Joan of Arc in Prison," "Venice," "Wise and Foolish Virgins," and many other works. At the Universal exhibition of 1855 he received a gold medal for his "Venice in the 15th Century" (1854), and at the salon of the same year he was awarded a medal of the third class. From 1856 till 1860 he was in New York, after which he removed to Cold Spring, where he resided until his death. He painted a large number of pictures, mostly historical or scriptural subjects, and also numerous portraits. Besides those already mentioned, he also made "The Representative Merchants," "The Home of Washington," "The Washington's First Cabinet," and a series of pictures on the "Life of Christ." He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1850, and an academician in 1849.

ROST, Adolph, jurist, b. in France about 1797; d. in New Orleans, La., 6 Sept., 1898. He was educated at the Lyceé Napoleon and the École polytechnic in Paris. With his fellow-students he served in the defence of Paris when Napoleon retired to Elba, and on the restoration of the empire he applied for a commission, which would have been granted but for the defeat at Waterloo. In 1816 he came to Louisiana and settled at Natchez, Miss., and soon afterward he studied law with Joseph E. Davis. After his admission to the bar he practiced legal principles of his adoption and the facts of the case in hand, his decisions will stand comparison with those rendered by the foremost jurists in the land." On the formation of the provisional Confederate government he was appointed its commissioner to Spain, and remained abroad until after the civil war. He then resumed his practice, and devoted his energies to the restoration of his property which Louisiana has so long possessed. It is said of him that "for clearness of diction and logical perspicacity in the presentation of legal principles, his property is in his eloquence." His patriotism and his principles of the Constitution of the United States will stand comparison with those rendered by the foremost jurists in the land."

ROTHERMEL, Peter Frederick, artist, b. in Necessity, Pa., 18 July, 1817; d. in Grassmere, N.J., 15 Aug., 1894. He was graduated at Harvard in 1837, studied architecture in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and for five years in the École des beaux arts in Paris. While he was in France he had charge of the restoration of the Château de Chenonceau. In 1839 he became senior member of the firm of Rotch and Tilden, in Boston, and since that time he had built various churches and the Memorial Library, Boston. He also was a member of the visiting committee of the Fine Arts of Harvard University, and one of the corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In conjunction with his brother and sisters he founded, as a memorial to his father, who married a daughter of Abbott Lawrence, the Rotch travelling scholarship, which annually sends a student of architecture to Europe for two years' study and travel.

ROTHELM, Charity Rodman, philanthropist, b. in Newport, R.I., 31 Oct., 1766; d. in Kentland, Ohio, 8 Aug., 1854. She was the daughter of a sea-tenant, and married Thomas Rotch, of Nantucket, in 1790. For some time she lived in that town, but in 1801 she settled in Hartford, and in 1811 falling health led her to take up her residence in Kented, Ohio. Her husband died in 1823 and bequeathed to her his personal property to be disposed of as she should decide. She determined to found a school for orphan and destitute children, and a few years after her death the fund that she left reached the sum of $29,000. The interest of this money was subsequently applied to the purchase of a farm of 185 acres near Massillon, Ohio, on which was erected, at a cost of $3,000, a building for educational and dwelling purposes. In this institution boys are thoroughly instructed in the art of husbandry and girls in culinary duties and the making of cleaning-apparel. The course is four years in length.

ROTH, John, clergyman, b. in Sarum, Prussia, 3 Feb., 1726; d. in York, Pa., 22 July, 1791. He was educated in the Roman Catholic church, but in 1748 united with the Moravians. In 1756 he was despatched to Pennsylvania, and three years later he entered the Moravian Indian mission, serving fifteen years in Pennsylvania and Ohio. Returning to Pennsylvania in 1773, he was employed in rural congregations till his death. Roth made a special study of the Unami dialect of the Lenape language, and composed in it an extensive religious work, "Ein Versuch der Geschichte unsern Herrn n. Heylandes Jesu Christi in das Delawarische Ubersetzt der Unami, von der Marter-Woche an bis zur Himmelfahrt unsers Herrn, im Jahr 1770 u. 1772 zu Tschecshequaung an der Susquehanna," which is still in manuscript. —His son, John Lewis (1773-1841), was the first white male child that was born in Ohio.

ROSTAING, Just Antoine Henri Marie Germain, Marquis de French soldier, b. in the chateau of Vauchette, near Montbrison, France, 24 Nov., 1740; d. there in September, 1826. He was first attached to the household of the grand dauphin, and afterward was first page to Louis XV. After serving in Germany as a cavalry officer, he joined the musketeers in 1792, and became colonel of the Auxerrois regiment. He was transferred to the command of the Gâtinois, and ordered to this country under the command of Rochambeau, where he remained from 1790 till 1783. For his bravery in the attack on St. Lucia, and at the siege of Yorktown, he received the cross of St. Louis, and was made a member of the Society of the Cincinnati. After the Peace of Versailles, he was sent to France as a delegate to the constituent assembly, and on 20 March, 1792, he was commissioned lieutenant-general. Shortly afterward he retired to his estates, where he spent his remaining days.

ROTCH, Arthur (rootch), architect, b. in Boston, 13 May, 1809; d. in Beverly, 15 Aug., 1894. He was graduated at Harvard in 1831, studied architecture in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and for five years in the École des beaux arts in Paris. While he was in France he had charge of the restoration of the Château de Chenonceau. In 1839 he became senior member of the firm of Rotch and Tilden, in Boston, and since that time he had built various churches and the Memorial Library, Boston. He also was a member of the visiting committee of the Fine Arts of Harvard University, and one of the corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In conjunction with his brother and sisters he founded, as a memorial to ROTHROCK, Joseph Trumbile, physician, b. in McVeytown, Pa., 9 April, 1839. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1864 and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1868. Dr. Rothrock began practice in Centre county, Pa., but in 1870 removed to Wilkesbarre, making a specialty of diseases of the eye and ear, and in 1876 established the North Mountain school of physical culture in Luzerne county, also during the same year he was appointed by the American philosophical society lector on forestry in the extension of the University, and so has been able to contribute largely toward developing the growing forestry sentiment in Pennsylvania. In 1877 he was called to the chair of botany in the University of Pennsylvania, which he has since held. During the civil war he entered the army as a private in the 31st Pennsylvania regiment, and became a captain in the 90th Pennsylvania cavalry. In 1863-65 he was associated with the exploring party of the Western Union extension telegraph in British Columbia, and in 1873-75 he was botanist and surgeon to the Geographical and geological exploration and survey west of the 100th meridian under Lieut. George M. Wheeler. He is a member of the American philosophical society and of the scientific society of Easton. Besides his reports, he has been the author of various papers in medical journals, and of botanical memoirs.

ROUTOURS, Jean Julien Angot (roo-toor), Baron des, French colonial governor, b. in the castle of Rottours, Orne, 2 June, 1775; d. in Paris, 26 March, 1844. He entered the navy, 11 June, 1791, took part in the expedition of 1793 against Domango, and assisted in the engagement at Cape Fran cois, 21 June, where, although bearing a flag of truce, he was taken prisoner by the negroes, but after re dereasal, and went on an American mer tchant-vessel to Philadelphia, where he was fur nished the means of returning to France. He was promoted commander in 1808, and captain in 1814, and in 1816-19 made a successful campaign in the West Indian waters, for which he was created baron, 25 May, 1819. Afterward he was despatched with a corvette to protect the French fisheries on the coast of Newfoundland, when a difficulty with England threatened to end in war, and was pro moted rear-admiral in 1821. Routours was ap pointed governor-general of Guadeloupe in 1829, ar rival, 25 March, 1830. In 1832 it was clear that the city had been nearly destroyed by the hurricane of 26 July, 1829. He immediately began to rebuild it on a more elaborate plan, and, after inquiring into the wants of the colony, proposed to the king a plan to unify the colonial administration, by which the island was allowed partial self-government through delegates that formed a council-gen eral of this island. To check the return of yellow-fever epidemics, established a ho spital and a camp for the soldiers in Matonba, at the coolest station in the mountains, drained the deadly marshes that surrounded Pointe-a-Pitre, exe cuted great works in that harbor, completed the canal Vatable, and also constructed in Grande Terre several canals which have greatly assisted the colony. One of these has since received the name of Canal des Rottours. He founded the city of Bordeaux-Bourg, erected schools, churches, and bridges, and opened roads. Under his adminis tration Guadeloupe attained a high state of pros perity, and when Routours obtained his recall in May, 1830, regret was felt at his departure. His works include "Memoire sur le mode de procedure criminelle en vigueur a la Guadeloupe," (Paris, 1826).

ROTTERMUND, Baron de, French geologist, b. in France in 1813; d. in Montreux, Switzerland, in 1858. He came to Canada, and was for some time in the service of the crown-lands department as an inspector of mines. He is principally remem bered because of his attacks upon T. Sterry
Hunt, the geologist, in 1850, and for his opposition to the theory of Sir William Logan that there are no coal-mines in Lower Canada. The baron held that coal existed both at Gaspé and Quebec, having discovered particles at the latter place. French geologists to whom these particles principally agreed with him, but finally the correctness of Sir William Logan's opinion was demonstrated. He wrote a report to the mayor of Quebec on combustible minerals to be found in that city.

ROUARIE, Armand Taffin (roo-ah-reem), Mar quis de la, French soldier, b. in the castle of Rou arie, near Rennes, 14 April, 1796; d. in the castle of La Guyomarais, near Lamballe, Brittany, 30 Jan., 1798. He was admitted in 1775 to the body guard of the king, but a duel about an actress caused his dismissal. Chagrin and anger led him to attempt suicide, but his life was saved and he came to the United States, 10 May, 1777, under the assumed name of Count Armand. Congress ac credited his services and gave him the commission of colonel. He afterwards crossed the Red Bank, was with Lafayette in New Jersey, was active in Westchester county, N. Y., and in Con necticut, and served under Gen. Horatio Gates against Cornwallis. He opposed the forces of Sim coe, Emmerick, and Barremore; he captured the last-named near King's Bridge, 8 Nov., 1779, and defeated the others the following year his corps was incorporated with Pulaski's, and he rendered good service at Warren Tavern and in central New Jersey. Toward the beginning of 1781 he was called away to France on account of family mat ters, but he returned in time to participate in the victory of Yorktown, and brought with him a sup ply of clothing and ammunition. He took part in the campaign of 1782 in the south, and was very severe in his denunciation of Gen. Gates on account of the defeat at Camden. On 26 March, 1783, he was made brigadier-general by congress and be came a member of the Society of the Cincinnati. After the conclusion of peace he returned to France, where he lived in private till 1788, when he was selected one of the twelve deputies sent by the city of Paris to participate in the discussion for the preservation of its privileges. The king, being irritated by his inconsiderate zeal, committed him to the Bastille for a few weeks. On his release in 1789 he bitterly denounced the principles of the revolution, and planned to unite the provinces of Brittany, Anjou, and Poitou, and to raise an army to operate with the allies. His plans were ap proved by the Arbitrary Council of 5 Dec., 1791, and he was appointed high royal com missioner in Brittany. On 5 March, 1792, the chiefs of the confederacy met at his castle, and every thing was in readiness for action, when the plot was revealed to the legislative assembly, and troops were sent to secure Rouarie. He eluded them for several weeks by several different plans which brought about a short illness in the castle of Guyomarais. His papers, which he had buried in an iron box six feet below the surface of the soil, were discov red by accident, and their contents caused the ar rest of the whole family of Guyomarais, of which twelve members were sent to the scaffold. A few weeks later the great uprising of Les Chouans was organized in Vendée on the plans that were left by La Rouarie. He was a man of great ability, urbane and polished in manners, and an eloquent and persuasive speaker.

ROULARD, Charles (roo-lar), West Indian poet, b. in the island of St. Martin in 1731; d. in Paris in 1779. He went in his youth to Paris, where he studied philosophy. His first verses attracted the attention of Voltaire, who complimented the young poet. In 1781 he became librarian of the navy department at Paris, which post he held till his death. His works include "Chants du soir det du matin" (1774); "Les quatre saisons" (1775); and "Le cycle de la conquête," an original work in prose and verse which narrates the Spanish conquête in America (1783).

ROUMFORT, Augustus Louis, soldier, b. in Paris, France, 10 Dec., 1796; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 2 Aug., 1878. He came with his father to Philadelphia, Pa., about 1805, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1817, and, after a short service in the marine corps in Washington and Philadelphia, resigned on 18 Aug., 1818. He was then professor of mathematics at Mount Airy college, Germantown, till 1826, and from that time till 1834 superintendent of a military school in that town, where many young men were prepared for West Point. He was reappointed in the army by Gen. Jackson as military store-keeper of ordinance in 1834, and served atFrankford arsenal till 1841.
He was then called to the Democratic party, and he had become an active Democratic politician, and was in the legislature in 1843-4, and harbor-master of Philadelphia in 1845-8. He had been made captain of Pennsylvania militia in 1829, and in 1843 had risen to the rank of brigadier-general, in which capacity he showed much vigor and prudence in suppressing the native American riots in 1844. He was connected with railroads from 1828 till 1860, and from 1863 till 1866 was mayor of Harrisburg, where he won reputation by his success in maintaining order during the crisis of the Confederate invasion. After this he engaged in literary pursuits till his death.

ROUND, William Marshall Fitts, author, b. in Pawtucket, R. I., 26 March, 1834. He was an alumnus, with distinction, of Harvard medical school, but was not graduated, owing to ill health. In 1872 he was appointed U. S. commissioner to the World's fair that was held at Vienna in 1873, where he had charge of the New England department, and on his return he devoted himself to journalism and literature. He gave attention to the subject of prison reform, and in 1883 became the corresponding secretary of the Prison association of New York. In 1885, with Franklin B. Sanborn, Francis Wayland, and others, he reorganized the National prison association of the United States, and was elected its secretary, and in 1888 he was sent as a delegate from the United States to the International penitentiary congress in Rome, Italy.
Mr. Round laid out in 1887-8 the general scheme for the burglary industry, which is conducted by an institution for unruly boys, based upon the principles that have dominated the similar institution at Mettray in France and the Rauhehaus near Hamburg in Germany. His books include "Achsa, a New England Life-Study" (Boston, 1876); "Child
Marion Abroad" (1876); "Torn and Mended" (1877);
"Hal: the History of a Clogdopper" (1878); and
"Round-Trip" (1880).

ROUNDS, Sterling Parker, printer, b. in Berkeley, Va., 27 June, 1828; d. in Omaha, Neb., 17 Dec., 1887. At twelve years of age he removed with his parents to what is now Kenesha, Wis., and soon entered the printing-office of the "Southport American." He became in 1845 foreman in the state printing-office at Madison, afterward was in printing-offices at Milwaukee, Racine, and Buffalo, and migrated to Chicago in 1851. Here he engaged in the printing business, and soon afterward opened a printer's warehouse, which was kept in stock everything that was needed in the trade. In 1856 the business was extended by the addition of the printers' electrotype-foundry, and the first number of "Rounds's Printers' Cabinet," still in existence, was issued. Extending his business still further,
he engaged in the manufacture of printing-presses, the first that were made in the country. Rounds was appointed U. S. printer in 1881; but he removed to Omaha in 1885 and was identified with the "Republican" till his death.

ROUQUETTE, Francois Dominique, poet, b. in New Orleans, La., 2 Jan., 1810; d. there, 10 May, 1890. He studied at the Orleans college, and then followed classical studies at the College de Nantes in France. In 1828 he returned to the United States and studied law with William Rawle in Philadelphia. The active practice of his profession being uncongenial, he returned to France and had since devoted himself to writing. Besides his contributions to "L'Abeille de la Nouvelle Orleans," the "Propagateur Catholique," and other journals, he has published "Les Meseachecinos" (Paris, 1846);
"Chanteurs d'Amerique," "Les Fleurs d'Amerique: Poésies nouvelles" (New Orleans, 1857). He has also written in French and English a historical work on the Choctaw nation.
His brother, Adrien Emmanuel, author, b. in New Orleans, La., 13 Feb., 1813; d. there, 15 July, 1887, was educated at the College de Nantes, and spent ten years thereafter in the capitals of Europe.
He then returned to his country and in 1853 prosecuted law, but became interested in the Choctaw Indians, who were located in the parish of St. Tammany, he devoted his attention to their welfare. Determining to spend his life among them, he settled in their midst, learned their language, and, fixing it in print, taught the Indians to read and write.
As the work progressed he became interested in their relief, and in 1853 presented himself for orders in the Roman Catholic church.
He continued among the Indians, who called him
"Chatah-iona," during the troublesome times of the civil war, when their territory was alternately overridden by the soldiers of both armies. Abbe Rouquette worked in their behalf until the year before his death, when failing health compelled him to return to New Orleans, where he spent his last days. He was carefully for by the Sisters of Charity at the Hôtel Dieu. His scholarly attainments were universally recognized, and his poetry, written in the emotional and sentimental style of Chateaubriand, was commended by Sainte-Beuve and other French critics. His works include "Les Savanes, poésies Américaines" (Paris, 1840), in which "Savoureuse de Kentuck" had appeared; "Le Meurtre d'Eula," "Vie et Poésies d'un Poète" (New Orleans, 1848); "La Thaëbade en Amérique, ou apologie de la vie solitaire et contemplative" (1852); "L'Antoinade, ou la solitude avec Dieu, poème crémonitique" (1869); "Poèmes patritiques" (1880); and "Catherine Teckkwtha" (1873). In 1853 he translated into French the select poems of Estelle Ana Lewis, and also Selected "Writings from South American Countries." His last work was a satire on George W.
Cable's "Grandissimes," entitled "Critical Dialogue between Aabo and Caboo on a New Book, or Grandissime Ascension," edited by E. Jeaunus.

ROUS, John, naval officer, b. probably in Massachusetts; d. in Portsmouth, England, 3
April, 1769. He had command of the expedition from Massachusetts that in 1744 cut out a fleet of French vessels from the harbor of Fishote, Newfoundland, and laid waste all the French posts on that coast. In 1745 he had “The Shirley” in the expedition against Cape Breton, and assisted in the capture of the French frigate “Vigilant” as she was approaching the coast. After the reduction of Louisburg he was sent to England with dispatches, and for his services was commissioned 1745, royal post-captain. He commanded the fleet that conveyed the expedition against the French in the Bay of Fundy, and afterward destroyed their forts and houses on St. John’s river. Two years later he had the frigate “Winchelsea” in the unsuccessful expedition against Louisburg, but was successful in the capture of a French sloop of sixteen guns after a stout resistance. Subsequently he had command of the “Sutherland,” with which he participated in 1738 in the siege of Louisburg, and in 1739 in that of Quebec. Capt. Rous was a member of the colonial council in 1754.

ROUSSEAU, Lovell Harrison, soldier, b. in Lincoln county, Ky., 4 Aug., 1818; d. in New Orleans, La., 7 Jan., 1869. He received but little schooling, and in 1836 his father, Sulphur, a large family in reduced circumstances. On becoming of age he went to Louisville, Ky., and began the study of law. Subsequently he removed to Bloomfield, Ind., where in February, 1841, he was admitted to the bar. In 1844-5 he was elected to the Indiana legislature, of which he became an active member. He raised a company during the Mexican war, and was attached to the 2d Indiana regiment, with which he participated in the battle of Buena Vista. After losing nearly all of his horses he went back to the hacienda, doing good service when the wagon-trains were attacked by the Mexicans. In 1847, four days after his return from Mexico, he was elected to the Indiana senate, and served for two terms. He removed to Louisville, Ky., in 1849, and there followed his profession, being very successful in the management of difficult cases, especially in addressing the jury. At the beginning of the civil war he was earnest in his efforts to restrain Kentucky from joining the Confederacy, and, resigning his seat in the state senate, began the organization of troops for the National army, and was appointed colonel of the 3d Kentucky volunteers in September, 1861. On 1 Oct., 1861, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and attached to Gen. Don Carlos Buell’s army. He took part in the battle of Shiloh, where he led a brigade of Gen. Alexander M. McCook’s division, and participated in the battle of Perryville on 8 Oct., 1862, where for his bravery he was promoted major-general of volunteers. Subsequently he succeeded Gen. Benjamin M. Mitchell in the command of the 5th division of the Army of the Cumberland, serving with great credit in the battle of Stone River, the Tullahoma campaign, the movement at Chattanooga, and the battle of Chickamauga. From November, 1863, till November, 1865, when he resigned, he had command of the districts of Nashville, Tenn., and middle Tennessee, and during this time made a raid into Alabama, destroying the Montgomery and Atlanta lines of railway. In 1864 he held the important post of Fort Rosseeran in the defence of Nashville against Gen. John B. Hood. He was elected to Congress from Kentucky as a Republican from 4 Dec. 1865 to 20 July, 1866, when he resigned after being censured by the house for publicly assaulting Josiah B. Grinnell, of Iowa, in the capitol; but he was re-elected, serving from 3 Dec., 1866, till 3 March, 1867. He served on the committee on military affairs, and was one of the representatives that were selected to attend the funeral of Gen. Winkle Scott in 1866. President Johnson appointed him brigadier-general in the regular army on 28 March, 1867, and he also received at the same time the brevet of major-general in the U. S. army for services during the civil war. He was then sent officially to receive Alaska from the Russian government and to assume control of the territory. Gen. Rousseau was summoned to Washington to testify in the impeachment of President Johnson, and was subsequently assigned to the command of the Department of the Gulf, with headquarters at New Orleans. He succeeded Gen. Philip H. Sheridan in this command and continued there until his death.

ROUSSEL, Gabriel Edmund (rou-sel), French explorer, b. in Dinan in 1717; d. in Sevau in 1791. He accompanied La Condamine (q. v.) to South America, and afterward was sent to explore Brazil and the La Plata provinces, returning in 1779 with valuable collections, which were deposited in the Museum of natural history. At the instance of the Academy of sciences, Louis XVI. gave 2,000 from his privy purse for the publication of Rousel’s works, which include “Voyages d’explorations à travers le Brésil, les Guianes et les contrées arrosées par la rivière de la Plata” (2 vols., Paris, 1781); “Flora Américana, seu plantaum quas in Amazonia crescent” (3 vols., 1784); “Résumé de l’histoire et de la découverte du Brésil” (1785); and “Description générale de l’Amérique du Sud, sa floré et sa faune, ses produits, son état politique et...”

ROUSSELOT DE SURUY, Jacques Philipbert (rou-see-o-lot-de-see-ry), French author, b. in Dijon, 26 June, 1737; d. in Paris, 11 March, 1791. He held for many years an office in the French treasury department, and was afterward royal censor of new publications. His “Mélanges intéressants et curieux” (10 vols., Paris, 1765-5) treat of the natural, civil, and political history of Asia and America; the six last volumes are devoted to the latter country, and contain some interesting information that is scarcely to be found elsewhere, as the author in his official capacity had access to the French archives of state, many of which have been missing since the revolution of 1789. His other works include “Mémoires géographiques, physiques et historiques sur l’Amérique du Sud” (4 vols., 1767), and “Histoire naturelle et politique de la Pensylvanie, et de l’établissement des Quakers dans cette contrée,” in part translated from the German of Kuhl’s and Mitchelberger (3 vols., 1770).

ROUTH, Sir Randolph Isham, Canadian statesman, b. in Poole, England, in 1785; d. in London, 29 Nov., 1858. His father, Richard Routh, was at one time chief justice of Newfoundland. The son was educated at Eton, and served in the British army thirty-seven years. He was present in the peninsula and at Waterloo, and in 1819 was made a commissary-general. Having settled in Canada, he was a member of the executive council and received the honor of knighthood by patent.

ROUX DE ROCHELLE, Jean Baptiste Galarrat (1710-1777), French historian, b. in Louis-le-Saint in 1712; d. in Paris in March, 1789. He was consul at New York in 1822-4, and minister to the United States from 1830 till 1833. His works include "Les Turiages," a poem (Paris, 1816); "La Byzance," a poem (1825); "Les Lettres des Etats-Unis" (1833); "Histoire des Etats-Unis" (2 vols., 1836); and "Exposée de Ferman Cortes," a poetical history of the conquest of Mexico.

ROWAN, John, jurist, b. in Pennsylvania in 1773; d. in Louisville, Ky., 13 July, 1855. He moved with his parents to Kentucky in 1783, and was educated in Bardstown. In 1795 he was admitted to the bar, and in 1799 he became a member of the State constitutional convention. He was chosen secretary of state in 1804, and was elected to congress from Kentucky, serving from 9 Jan., 1807, till 3 March, 1809. During 1819-21 he was judge of the court of appeals, and he attained a high reputation as a lawyer in criminal cases. Subsequently he was elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 5 Dec., 1825, till 3 March, 1831, during which time he made able speeches on the amendment to the judiciary act, and on imprisonment for debt. Later he was appointed commissioner of claims against Mexico under the treaty of 11 April, 1839, and was sent in 1848 as minister to Naples, where he remained until 1850. Judge Rowan was president of the Kentucky historical society in 1839-43, and published in 1839 his speeches in the senate on Henry S. Foote's resolutions against Florida, conducting boat expeditions and participating in operations on shore from November, 1832, till October, 1836. He was commissioned as lieutenant, 8 March, 1837, served in the coast survey in 1838-40, was executive officer of the sloop "Cyan" in the Pacific squadron in 1846-8, and during the Mexican war took part in the capture of Monterey and San Diego, where he landed and hoisted the American flag, 29 July, 1846. On blockade duty in the Gulf of California the "Cyan" captured twenty Mexican vessels and caused the destruction of several gun-boats. Lieut. Rowan commanded the naval brigade under Com. Robert F. Stockton at the victories of San Gabriel and La Mesa, and 9 and 10 Jan., 1847, was slightly wounded in the shoulder, and highly commended for his services. He was also commended for his part in the capture of Vera Cruz, and in 1848 commanded an expedition ten miles into the interior of Mexico, where he routed a large force of Mexicans, who then ceased to attack the U. S. naval garrison. He was onordnance duty in 1850-3 and again in 1858-61, commanded the store-ship "Relief" in 1850-3, and was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855. When the civil war opened, he was in charge of the steam sloop "Pawnee," which he brought to Washington from Philadelphia in February, 1861. Rowan was a resident of Norfolk, Va., where he had married, but, notwithstanding this and his affection to the south, he announced his adhesion to the National government, and was continued in the command of the "Pawnee." At the capture of Alexandria he covered the city with his guns. On 25 May, 1861, he took the "Pawnee" to Aquia creek and participated in the first naval engagement of the war by the attack on the Confederate batteries there. He commanded this vessel in the bombardment and capture of the forts at Hatteras as inlet by the squadron under Commodore Stringham, and fully shared the honor of this success. Rowan then destroyed Fort Ocracoke, twenty miles south of Hatteras.

In January, 1862, he led the vessels inGoldsborough's expedition to the sounds of North Carolina. The "Delaware" was his divisional flagship, and, in the attack on Roanoke island, 8 Feb., 1862, he directed the movements of the vessels. After the forts surrendered, the enemy's flotilla was pursued by Rowan with fourteen improvised gun-boats into Pasquotank river, where he completely destroyed the Confederate vessels and defences. Several expeditions were conducted by Rowan through the sounds of North Carolina. On 12 March, 1862, he and Gen. Burnside co-operated in the expedition to New Bern, N. C., where he compelled the forts to capitulate. He also captured Fort Macon at Beaufort, N. C., 25 April, 1862, and continued to follow up his successes by expeditions until the authority of the government was completely re-established in the waters of North Carolina. Rowan was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, and for his conspicuous gallantry in the expedition to New Bern he was promoted to commodore on the same day. He next commanded the "New Ironsides" off Charleston, and in many months of constant conflict with the enemy increased his reputation. In the spring of 1864 his services in the "New Ironsides" were no longer required, and Rowan was relieved. He received a vote of thanks from congress, and on 25 July, 1866, was promoted to rear-admiral by selection, in recognition of his eminent services. He commanded the Norfolk navy-yard in 1866-7, was commander-in-chief of the Asiatic squadron in 1868-70, and while on this duty was promoted to vice-admiral. He was in command of the naval station at New York in 1872-9, served as president of the board of examiners in 1876-91, was governor of the Naval asylum at Philadelphia in 1881, and became superintendent of the Naval observatory in 1882. Admiral Rowan acted as chairman of the light-house board after January, 1883, at Washington, D. C.

ROWAN, Sir William, British general, b. in the Isle of Man, 18 June, 1789; d. in Bath, England, 26 Sept., 1870. He entered the army as an ensign in a light infantry regiment in 1803, and served with it for twenty-five years in the peninsular war, at Waterloo, and in North America. He was civil and military secretary to Lord Seaton, lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, from 1832 till 1839. He was made a major-general, in 1846, and in 1849 was appointed commander of the British forces in Canada, which post he held till 1855. During part of this time he was administrator of 337
the government of Canada, while the Earl of Elgin was ambassador at England. He was knighted in 1859, and was a field-marshal, and colonel of the 53d foot at the time of his death.

ROWLAND, Henry Augustus, clergyman, b. in Windsor, Conn., 18 Sept., 1834; d. in Boston, 4 Sept., 1859. He was graduated at Yale in 1852, and at Andover theological seminary in 1857. During the three years following he was agent of the American Bible society in New York and Connecticut, and he was ordained in the Presbyterian church on 24 Nov., 1830. He was called to Fawetville, N. C., in 1831, and three years later to the pastorate of the Pearl street church, New York city. In 1843 he accepted charge of the Honesdale, Pa., parish, and from 1855 till his death was pastor of the Park Presbyterian church in Newark, N. J. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Union college in 1853. He published many single sermons, and, besides contributions to the religious press, was the author of "On the Common Maxims of Infidelity" (New York, 1850); "The Path of Life" (1851); "Light in a Dark Alley" (1852); and "The Way of Peace" (1853). See "Memorial of the Life and Services of the Late Henry A. Rowland," by B. R. S. (New York, 1860).—His son, Henry Augustus, physicist, b. in Honesdale, Pa., 27 Nov., 1848, was graduated Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1870 as a civil engineer, and engaged during 1871 in surveying a railroad in western New York. He then taught for a time in Wooster university, but in 1873 returned to the institution as instructor in physics, becoming assistant professor in 1874. Prof. Rowland spent a year abroad studying with Helmholtz in Berlin and in examining physical laboratories in Europe. In 1876 he was invited to accept the chair of physics, with charge of the laboratory, in the newly founded Johns Hopkins university, and he has since held that place. The honorary degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by that university in 1880. He was a member of the electrical congress that met in Paris in 1881, and served on the jury of the electrical exhibition there in that year, and for his services was made a chevalier of the Legion of honor. Prof. Rowland is a permanent member of the international commission for establishing electrical units, is corresponding member of the royal scientific society of Turin, member of the Society of arts, and fellow of the Royal Society; corresponding member of the National Institute of France, and president of the Institute of France. He is a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences, from which in 1884 he received the Rumford medal for his researches in light and heat, and in 1881 he was elected to the National academy of sciences. In 1853 he presided over the section on physics of the American association for the advancement of science at Minneapolis, and delivered a valuable address entitled "A Plea for Pure Science." His original work has been extensive, and includes numerous researches that have been made under his supervision at the Johns Hopkins. While he was in Berlin he showed experimentally that a moving charge of static electricity has the same magnetic effect as a current. He has gained reputation by his large diffraction gratings, which are ruled, by a method of his own, directly on concave mirrors. An image of the spectrum is thus produced without the aid of lenses. The photographs of the solar spectrum that he has succeeded in making with the aid of these gratings supersede all that have ever been done. They were exhibited to the National academy of sciences in 1883. He has also made an extremely accurate determination of the value of the ohm, the absolute unit of electrical resistance. Among his published works are "On Magnetic Permeability" (1876); "On the Magnetic Permeability and Maximum Magnetization of Nickel and Cobalt" (1874); "Studies on Magnetic Distribution" (1875); "On a Magnetic Effect of Electric Connection" (1876); "Research on the Absolute Unit of Electrical Resistance" (1878); "On the Mechanical Equivalent of Heat" (1880); "On Concave Gratings" (1883); "Optical Relative Wave-Lengths at the Lines of the Solar Spectrum" (1886); and the article on "Screws" in the "Encyclopedia Britannica"; also he has published "On the Mechanical Equivalent of Heat" (Baltimore, 1880), and "Photographs of the Normal Solar Spectrum" (seven plates, 1886).

ROWLANDSON, Mary, captive. She was a daughter of John White, and wife of the Rev. Joseph Rowlandson, the first minister of Lancaster, Mass., who died in 1678. On 10 Feb., 1676, during King Philip’s war, the Indians surprised and burned Lancaster, and took her captive. For several days she had no food, and after her child was frozen to death and buried in the forest, she was sold by her Narragansett captor to a Sagamore named Oxeek, for a large sum of money. She was known as an uncomfortable mistress, who treated her with insolence. The Indians with whom she lived remained near the site of Petersham, Worcester co., Mass., until they crossed Connecticut river on hearing that they were pursued. Mrs. Rowlandson then met King Philip, who treated her with much civility. Soon the Indians returned to Worcester county. Timothy Lightsey says: "Mrs. Rowlandson went through almost every suffering but death. She was beaten, kicked, turned out of doors, refused food, insulted in the grossest manner, and at times almost starved. Nothing but experience can enable us to conceive what must be the hunger of a person by whom the discovery of six acorns and two chestnuts was regarded as a rich prize. At times, in order to make her miserable, they announced to her the death of her husband and children." Her captivity lasted nearly three months, and was ended through the agency of a resident of Concord, Mass. She was redeemed for about eighty dollars, which was contributed by several women of Boston. She published her experience in a book entitled the "History of the Captivity andanno of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson among the Indians" (Cambridge and London, 1682; 2d ed., Boston, 1729; new ed., 1723). The 5th edition was edited by Joseph Willard (Lancaster, Mass., 1828).

ROWLEY, Thomas Algeo, soldier, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 5 Oct., 1808; d. there, 14 May, 1890. He was educated in private schools, held several public offices in Pittsburgh, and entered the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant of Pennsylvania volunteers to serve in the war with Mexico. He was afterward promoted to captain, and served in Maryland and District of Columbia regiments. From 1857 till 1860 he was clerk of the courts of Alleghany county, and at the beginning of the civil war he enlisted as captain in the 15th Pennsylvania volunteers, and was appointed major of the regiment. As major he was promoted to the rank of colonel of the 102d Pennsylvania volunteers, he served three years, was made brigadier-general for services at Fredericksberg, Va., on 29 Nov., 1862, and resigned his commission on 29 Dec., 1864. From 1866 till 1870 he was U. S. marshal for the western district of Pennsylvania, and he afterward spent five years in the same capacity in the eastern district.

Brown county, Ohio, he settled in Galena, Ill., where he held various civil offices, and in November, 1861, entered the military service as 1st lieutenant in the 45th Illinois regiment. After the capture of Fort Donelson he was commissioned captain, 26th Illinois. In 1864 he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865. He then returned to Galena, Ill., was elected county judge in 1877, which office he held at his death, and was also engaged in real-estate business. Before his death he was the only surviving member of Gen. Grant's military staff when he commanded the Army of the Tennessee, and he died on the day that closed the official term of Gen. and Mrs. Grant.

ROWSE, Samuel Worchester, b. in Bath, Me., 20 Jan., 1822. He has devoted himself to drawing in black and white, and his works in crayon, chiefly portraits and ideal heads of children, are well known to the public. Many of them have been reproduced by photography and other processes. Among his portraits are those of Ralph Waldo Emerson and Nathaniel Hawthorne.

ROWSON, Susanna, author, b. in Portsmouth, England, in 1762; d. in Boston, Mass., 2 March, 1824. She was the only daughter of Lieut. William Haswell, of the British navy, who, being engaged in the revenue service on the American station, settled in Nantasket, Mass. Miss Haswell's talents attracted the attention of James Otis, who was a frequent guest at the father's house, and who called her his "little scholar." During the early part of the Revolution, Lieut. Haswell's property was confiscated, and he and his family were removed on parole to Hingham in 1775, and in 1777 to Abington. He subsequently sailed in a cartel with his family to England, and, after serving as governess, Miss Haswell married in 1786 William Rowson, a musician. In that year she published a novel, "Victoria" (London), which was dedicated to the Duchess of Devonshire, who introduced her to the Prince of Wales, from whom she procured a pension for her father. Her husband became bankrupt, and in 1792–3 she appeared on the stage with him in Edinburgh. In 1793 they came to this country, appearing for the first time in Annapolis, Md., and subsequently in Philadelphia and Baltimore. In 1796 she played in Boston at the Federal street theatre, appearing in several of her own plays, and closing with her comedy, "Americans in England," in May, 1797. She then opened a school for girls. She retired in 1822. Mrs. Rowson possessed many accomplishments, was active in charities, and was an accomplished teacher. She edited the Boston "Weekly Magazine," and contributed to other periodicals. She wrote numerous popular odes and songs. Her plays include "The Volunteers: a Farce," founded on the whisky insurrection in western Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1793), and "The Slaves of Algiers." Her most popular novel was "Charlotte Temple, or a Tale of Truth" (London, 1790). Montraville, the hero, was in reality the author's kinsman, Col. John Montresor, while serving in the British army. Charlotte Temple was written for his brother, Earl of Derby, to embark with him in 1774 to New York, where he abandoned her. She died in the Old Tree House on Pell and Doyers streets at the age of nineteen years, and was buried in the grave-yard of Trinity church. In addition to the inscription, the slab bore the quarterings of the house of Derby, and in after-years the name of Charlotte Temple was erased therefrom.

Among Mrs. Rowson's publications are "The Inquisitor, or Invisible Rambler" (3 vols., London, 1788; Philadelphia, 1794); "Trials of the Human Heart" (4 vols., Philadelphia, 1795); "Reuben and Rachel, or Tales of Old Times" (2 vols., 1798); and "Miscellaneous Poems" (Boston, 1804). Her sequel to "Charlotte Temple," entitled "Lucy Temple, or the Three Orphans," was published after her death (Boston, 1828). See a memoir by Elias Nason (Albany, 1870). — Her sister-in-law, Charlotte Rowson, b. near London about 1779; d. in 1835, came to this country in 1793 and appeared on the stage in light characters and sang popular songs with much effect. She married William P. Johnston, of Philadelphia, publisher and bookseller; and the first volume of "The Order of Founders," by David Claypoole (p. r.), became an eminent artist.

ROYAL, Joseph, Canadian statesman, b. in Repentigny, Quebec, 7 May, 1837. He was educated at the Jesuit college, Montreal, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1864, and to that of Manitoba in 1871, was counsel in important cases, retired in 1880, and is now the agent for the several companies which furnish fire insurance for Manitoba. He has written much for the French Canadian periodical press for many years, and edited and established various newspapers. He was elected to the legislative assembly of Manitoba in 1870, and was re-elected in 1875 and 1878. In 1870 he was chosen to the Dominion parliament, and he was re-elected in 1872 and 1875. He was elected speaker of the first house of Assembly, and was re-elected in 1877, which post he held till March, 1872, when he was appointed a member of the executive council and provincial secretary, but resigned in July, 1874. He was minister of public works from 3 Dec., 1874, till he was appointed attorney-general in May, 1876, and held the latter office till the resignation of the government, when he became minister of public works in the new administration. He was appointed a member of the executive council of the Northwest territory in 1873, and was the first superintendent of education for Manitoba. He has been a delegate to Ottawa on the subject of obtaining better terms for Manitoba, and also regarding the enlargement of her boundaries. In October, 1875, he aided in securing a re-agreement between the government of Manitoba and the Dominion. Mr. Royal was a commissioner to consolidate the statutes of Manitoba in 1877, and since that year has been 1st vice-chancellor of the University of Manitoba. He received the confederation medal in 1885, and in June, 1888, was appointed lieutenant-governor of the Northwest territory. He is the author of "Le traité de réciprocité" (1880); "Les politiques de Sir Louis H. Lafontaine" (1884); "Considérations sur les nombreux changements constitutionnels de l'Amérique Britannique du Nord, l'annexion" (1866); "Notes par un Nicéphore" (1866); "La colonisation en 1866" (1867); "Le sacrifice et l'égoïsme" (1897); and "Le goût-théorique" (1867).
ROYALL, Anne, editor, b. in Virginia, 11 June, 1769; d. in Washington, D.C., 1 Oct., 1854. She was stolen by the Indians in early life, and remained with them for fifteen years. Afterward she married a Capt. Royall and settled in Alabama, where she learned to read and write. Subsequently she removed to Washington, D.C., where she secured an old Ramage printing-press and a font of lettered type, and with the aid of journeymen printers published on Capitol hill a small weekly sheet called the "Washington Paul Pry," and afterward the "Huntress." John Quincy Adams described her as going about "like a virago-errant in enchanted armor, redeeming herself from the cramps of indigence by the notoriety of her eccentricities and the forced currency they gave to her publications." She was a prominent character during the succeeding administrations, and John W. Forney says: "She was the terror of politicians, and especially of congressmen. I can see her now trumping through the halls of the old capitol, umbrella in hand, seizing upon every passer-by and offering her book for sale. Any public man who refused to buy was certain of a severe philippic in her newspaper. ... She was a woman of great industry in her own way and for a woman, seemed to tire of a vocation which grew more and more unprofitable with better times and milder manners." At last she became so unendurable that she was formally indicted by the grand jury as a common scold, and was tried in the circuit court before Judge William Cranch, and sentenced to be ducked, according to the English law in force in the District of Columbia; but she was released with a fine. Mrs. Royall was the author of: "Sketches of History, Life, and Manners in the United States by a Traveler" (New Haven, 1826); "The Tennessean, a Novel founded on Facts" (1827); "The Black Book, or a Continuation of Travels in the United States" (Washington, 1828); "The Black Book, or Sketches of History, Life, and Manners in the United States" (3 vols., 1829); "A Southern Tour, or a Second Series of the Black Book" (2 vols., 1830); and "Letters from Alabama" (1830).

ROYALL, Isaac, b. in Antigua in 1719; d. in England in October, 1781. He was a wealthy resident of Medford, which he represented for many years in the general court. For twenty-two years he was a member of the Massachusetts legislature. He participated in the French war, and was appointed brigadier-general in 1761, being the first resident of New England to bear that title. During the Revolution he sympathized with Great Britain, and left this country on 16 April, 1775. He was proscribed, and his estate was confiscated in 1778, and it is said that "to carry on his farm after his departure was found to be sometimes difficult, for the honest man's seathe refused to cut Tory grass, and his oxen would not plough Tory ground." Among numerous bequests, he left 2,000 acres of land in Worcester county, Mass., for the endowment of a law professorship in Harvard. This was established in 1815, and is known by his name. The town of 1hats bears Worcester co., Mass., was named for him. One of his daughters married the younger Sir William Pepperrell.

ROYALL, William Bedford, soldier, b. in Virginia, 15 April, 1825; d. in Washington, 13 Dec., 1895. He took part in the Mexican war as lst lieutenant of Missouri mountain volunteers, and did good service at the capture of Puebla de Taos and in the battle of Churubusco. He was brevetted for his services. He returned to civil life in October, 1848. In recognition of his gallantry he received a commission in the regular army, dating from 3 March, 1853, and he participated in an expedition to the headwaters of Conchos river in the following year. In 1855 he won great credit by a brilliant defence of his camp against hostile Comanches. Escaping from Texas in the beginning of the civil war, he was commissioned as captain, 21 March, 1861, and was engaged at Falling Waters, the siege of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Hanover Court-House, where he earned the brevet of major, and Old Church, where he cut through the enemy to escape capture, receiving sabre wounds which disabled him for several years. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, was made a major on 7 Dec., 1863, and during the remaining period of the war was engaged in recruiting service. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted colonel. In 1868 he took the field against the hostile Indians in Kansas, commanding in a combat at Prairie Dog creek. For a part of the time he was the commander of the Republican river expedition of 1869, and was engaged in several affairs with the hostile Indians. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel on 2 Dec., 1873, and in 1876 took part in the Yellowstone expedition, and was engaged at Rosebud creek and in other actions. He was promoted colonel of cavalry on 1 Nov., 1882, and retired from active service Aug. 31, 1889.

ROYCE, Josiah, author, b. in Grass Valley, Nevada co., Cal., 29 Nov., 1855. He was graduated at the University of California in 1875, studied at Leipsic and Göttingen in 1875-6, and in 1876-8 was a fellow of Johns Hopkins university, where he obtained the degree of Ph. D. in 1878. He was instructor in English literature and logic at the University of California in 1879-80, and from 1882 till 1883 instructor in philosophy at Harvard, and since 1885 he has been assistant professor of philosophy there. He is the author of: "A Primer of Logical Analysis, for the Use of Composition Students" (San Francisco, 1881); "The Religious Aspect of Philosophy: a Critique of the Basis of Conduct and Faith" (Boston, 1883); "California from the Conquest in 1846 to the Second Vigilance Committee: a Study of American Character," in the "American Commonwealth" series (1886); "The Feud of Oakfield Creek: a Novel of California Life" (1887); and "The Spirit of Modern Philosophy."

ROYCE, Stephen, governor of Vermont, b. in Tinnorouth, Vt., 12 Aug., 1877; d. in East Berkshire, Vt., 14 Nov., 1895. He was born in St. Albans, Vt., in 1807, studied law, and was a member of the legislature from Sheldon, Franklin county, in 1815-16, and from St. Albans, Franklin county, in 1822-4. From 1825 till 1827, and from 1829 till 1832, he was judge of the supreme court of Vermont, and he served as chief judge from 1846 till 1852. He was governor of Vermont in 1854-5, the University of Vermont gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1837. — His nephew, Homer Elibhu, jurist, b. in East Berkshire, Vt., 14 June, 1820; d. in St. Albans, Vt., 24 April, 1891. He was admitted to the bar in 1842, and practised in his native town. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1846-7 and 1850, prosecuting attorney for Franklin county in 1848-9, and from 1854 to 1857, and was elected to congress as a Republican, serving from 7 Dec., 1857, till 3 March, 1861. From 1870 till 1882 he was associate judge of the supreme court of Vermont, and since 1882 he had been chief judge. He was a delegate to the National Republican convention of 1888.

ROYE, Edward James, president of Liberia, b. at Newark, N.J., 24 Feb., 1839; d. at 3003, N.E., Liberia, 12 Feb., 1872. He was educated at the high-school in his native town and at Ohio university, Athens, Ohio. Emigrating to Liberia in 1846, he became a wealthy merchant, and was the first Liberian to export African commodities to Europe and the United States in his own vessel. He was elected to the Liberian house of representatives in 1849, was chief justice from 1855 to 1868, and was elected fifth president of Liberia, entering office in 1870. During his service the people voted on a proposition to change the presidential term from two to four years; but it was defeated, and a new president, Joseph J. Roberts, was elected in 1871. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Ruff continued to attain a high position in the government, and he was condemned to imprisonmen. He escaped, and, while endeavoring to swim to a steamer that was bound for Liverpool, he was drowned in the harbor of Monrovia.

ROZE, Pierre Gustave, French naval officer, b. in Nimes in 1812; d. in Paris in 1882. He entered the navy as midshipman in 1826, was promoted post-captain in 1836 and attached to the stations of the West Indies and South America. In January, 1862, he was appointed commodore of the fleet to operate in Mexico, and transported to Vera Cruz the division of Gen. Lorenzo (q. e.). In the following March he was appointed military commander of Vera Cruz and fortified the city, holding off the Mexicans after the retreat of Lorenzo and before the arrival of the French. The division was promoted rear-admiral, 19 July, 1862, and he remained in command of the French navy in Mexico till the withdrawal of Gen. Bazaine, when he was sent to China. He was promoted vice-admiral, 26 May, 1869, and retired in 1877. He published "Résumé des opérations navales pendant la guerre du Mexique" (Paris, 1869).

RUCKER, Daniel Henry, soldier, b. in Demerara, Brit. Guiana, on 3 May, 1812; d. in Auburn, N. Y., on 4 April, 1871. In his youth he removed to Groose Isle, Mich. He entered the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant in the 1st dragoons on 13 Oct., 1837, became 1st lieutenant, 8 Oct., 1844, and captain, 7 Feb., 1847, and served in Michigan, and against the Indians in the west and southwest. He participated in the war with Mexico, and commanded a squadron at Buena Vista, where for gallantry he was brevetted major on 23 Feb., 1847. On 23 Aug., 1849, he was transferred to captain assistant quartermaster. He declined the post of major of the 6th cavalry on 14 May, 1861, became major quartermaster on 3 Aug., 1861, and colonel and aide-de-camp on 28 Sept., 1861. He was appointed brigadier-general, U. S. volunteers, on 23 May, 1863, and on 5 July, 1864, was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for diligent and faithful service during the war. On 13 March, 1865, he received the brevets of major-general, U. S. army, and major-general, U. S. volunteers, for faithful and meritorious service during the war. He was appointed colonel and assistant quartermaster-general on 28 July, 1866, and was brevetted major of the army on 1 Sept., 1866. Since that date he has served as quartermaster-general at various points, and on 13 Feb., 1882, was appointed quartermaster-general of the army. He was retired on 23 Feb., 1882, and now (1888) resides in Washington, D. C.

RUFF, John Churchill, clergyman, b. in Norwich, Conn., 24 May, 1779; d. in Utica, N. Y., 15 Nov., 1854. During his life he was much occupied with public business; he was his address to New York city soon afterward, where he became acquainted with Dr. (afterward Bishop) Hobart, and was baptized and confirmed in the Episcopal church. He studied for the ministry, chiefly under Dr. Hobart's direction, and was ordained deacon, 24 April, 1805, by Bishop Benjamin Moore, and priest, in April, 1806, by the same bishop. For a short time he was occupied in missionary work in South Carolina and the West Indies; but in December, 1805, he took charge of St. John's Church, Elizabeth-town, N. J., and in May, 1806, was instituted as rector. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1822. Severe and exhaustive labor in striving to build up the church in Elizabeth-town resulted in a loss of health and strength, and Dr. Ruff was compelled to resign his charge in 1826. In July of the same year he was appointed pastor in Jersey City, and was the successor of the long-continued oversight of the academies there. His health having improved, he accepted the rectorship of St. Peter's church in Auburn, and held that post for seven years, during which a stone church was erected on the spot where the previous edifice had been burned. Under Bishop Hobart's advice, Dr. Ruff, in 1827, began the publication of "The Gospel Messenger," a religious weekly, representing the doctrines and advocating the principles of the Protestant Episcopal church. He continued to be its editor during the rest of his life. Besides his contributions to church literature in the columns of the "Messenger," Dr. Ruff published a large number of sermons that he preached on special occasions between 1825 and 1837; together with addresses and sermons, "To the People of the Diocese of New York," and "The Minister's Description of London," an address on the life and character of Bishop Hobart (1830), and a "Sermon on the Reopening of St. Peter's Church, Auburn, with a Brief Sketch of the History of the Congregation from its Organization" (1830). Dr. Ruff also edited "The Churchman's Magazine" several years previous to 1812, but the second war with England led to its discontinuance.

RUDOLPH, Michael, soldier, b. in Maryland in 1734; drowned in 1795. With his brother John he joined Maj. Henry Lee at the head of Elk river in 1778, holding the rank of captain in his legion, and served with gallantry in many of the lesser battles and sieges in the south. After the war he settled in Savannah, and was subsequently a collector in Sunbury, Ga., where he cultivated a farm. Entering the army in 1790 as captain of the 1st infantry, he served under Gen. Josiah Harmar in the northwest. He became major of cavalry, 5 March, 1792, and adjutant and inspector of the army in February, 1793. After his resignation on 17 July, 1793, he traded with the West Indies and subsequently embarked for France to enter its military service. Two years later he was drowned.

RUDORF, Cornelis van, South American artist, b. in Demerara in 1769; d. in Haarlem, Holland, in 1813. He studied in Leyden, and afterward obtained an employment in the administration of Dutch Guiana, but resigned a few years later and devoted himself to painting the magnificent scenery of the virgin forest. He wrote "Recreations in the Forest" (1798); "Indian Laborers at the Harvest" (1809); "A Street of Demera-" (1805); "A Woman Fish-Vender" (1804); and "Moonlight in the Forest" (1808).

RUFF, Charles Frederick, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 Oct., 1815; d. there, 1 Oct., 1885. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1838, assigned to the 1st dragoons, served in garrison, and hunted the Cherokee Indians; he resigned on 31 Dec., 1842. Until 1846 he practised law in Liberty, Mo., and on 18 June, 1846, he enlisted for the war with Mexico as lieutenant-colonel of Missouri volunteers, being made captain in a regiment of mounted rifles in the U. S. army on 7 July, 1846. He was brevetted major for gallant and meritorious conduct at the skirmish at San Juan de los Llanos, 1 Aug., 1847, and participated in the battles of Contreras. Molino del Rey (where he was wounded), and Chapultepec, and in the capture of the city of Mexico, after which he served on frontier duty in Washington territory. In 1852-3 he was superintendent of the cavalry recruiting service, and in 1853 commanded the cavalry-school for practice at Jefferson barracks, Mo. He was made major of mounted rifles on 30 Dec., 1855, and was on duty in N. Mexico in the Comanche expedition in 1859, and was the bearer of despatches to the war department in 1860-'61. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d cavalry, 10 June, 1861, was mustering and disbursing officer at Philadelphia, Pa., from 15 April, 1861, till 29 April, 1863, acting inspector-general of the Department of the Susquehanna from 29 June to 30 Sept., 1863, and retired from active service, owing to impaired health, on 30 March, 1864, having mustered into service more than 50,000 volunteers. He was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865, for faithful and meritorious services in recruiting the armies of the United States. From 1868 till 1879 he served as professor of military science in the University at Columbia, N. Y.

RUFFIN, Armand Gustave (rew-fang), French explorer, b. in Landerneau in 1731; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1789. He entered the colonial administration in early life, and held offices in St. Lucia, Martinique, and Santo Domingo. In 1777 he was king's deputy-lieutenant at Cayenne, and in 1786 was in charge of the administration of Dutch Guiana, which had been taken from the English. After the conclusion of peace he set out on a voyage of exploration through the basins of Amazon and Orinoco rivers, and during a sojourn of thirty-two months made a valuable collection of specimens in natural history. Toward the beginning of 1789 he was sent to explore the upper basin of the Mississippi river, but he died in New Orleans of yellow fever a few days after his arrival in that place. His works include "Tableau statistique et économique des Guianes" (Paris, 1783); "Voyage à travers les déserts de l'Amazonie" (1785); "Quinze mois sur les bords de l'Orénoque" (1787); "Choix de plantes et d'insectes peu connus des Guianes et du Brésil" (1788); and "Observations sur les cactées de la Guianas" (1788).

RUFFIN, Edmund (rew-fin), agriculturist, b. in Prince George county, Va., 5 Jan., 1794; d. on his estate of Redmoor, in Amelia county, Va., 15 June, 1865. In 1810-'12 he attended William and Mary college. He served in the legislature, was secretary of the state board of agriculture, agricultural surveyor of South Carolina, for many years was presidant of the Virginia agricultural society, and was the discoverer of the value of man as a fertilizer of poor soil, by the use of which millions of dollars were added to the value of the real estate of eastern Virginia. He was a states-right man and a secessionist, and was a member of the Pulletto guard of South Carolina. At the beginning of the civil war he went to South Carolina, and, by order of Gen. Beauregard, his company was ordered to open fire on Fort Sumter, and as the oldest member he was selected by his comrades to fire the first gun, 12 April, 1861. He shot himself because he was unwilling to live under the U. S. government. Among other agricultural papers he edited the "Farmer's Register" from 1833 till 1842, and also the "American Farmer and Gentleman's Monitor" (Richmond, 1831); "Essay on Agricultural Education" (1833); "Anticipation of the Future to serve as Lessons for the Present Time" (1860); and edited "The Westover Manuscripts, containing the History of the Dividing-Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina; a journey to the Land of Eden, A. D. 1783; and a Progress to the Mines, by William Byrd, of Westover (Petersburg, 1841; 2d ed., 2 vols., Albany, 1866).

RUFFIN, George Lewis, lawyer, b. in Richmond, Va., 16 Dec., 1834; d. in Boston, Mass., 19 Nov., 1886. He was of African descent, but of free parentage and was educated at the public schools in Boston. He became a barrister, and after graduation at Harvard in 1860 practised with success in Boston, served in the legislature as a Republican, and was appointed by Gov. Benjamin F. Butler judge of the municipal court in the Charlestown district in 1883, being the only colored justice that held office in New England.

RUFFIN, Thomas, jurist, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 17 Nov., 1757; d. in Hillsboro, N. C., 15 Jan., 1870. After graduation at Princeton in 1805 he studied law, and removed to Hillsboro, N. C., in 1807. He served in the legislature in 1813-'16, becoming speaker in the latter year, was judge of the supreme court in 1816-'18, and elected again from 1823, and was chief justice of the state supreme court in 1829. He served in Congress in 1856-'8, after which he served as presiding judge of the county court. He was opposed to nullification in 1832 and to secession in 1860, but voted for the ordinance of secession in the convention. He was a delegate to the Peace congress that met in Washington in 1861. The University of North Carolina gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1843.

RUFNER, Henry, educator, b. in Page county, Va., 19 Jan., 1789; d. in Malden, Kanawha co., Va., 17 Dec., 1861. His father removed to the valley of the Great Kanawha, where he bought large tracts of land, and was one of the first to manufacture salt there. The son was graduated at Washington college, Va., in 1814, studied theology, was licensed by the presbytery of Lexington in 1819, and held various pastorates in the vicinity. He was professor at Washington college (now Washington and Lee university) from 1819 till 1837, and its president from 1837 till 1848, when he resigned and retired to his farm. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Princeton in 1838 and that of LL. D., by Washington in 1849. He was the author of "A Discourse on the Duration of Future Punishment" (Richmond, 1823); "Inaugural Address" (Lexington, 1837); "Judith Bensaddi, a Romance" (1840); "The Fathers of the Desert, or an Account of the Origin and Practice of Monks" (2 vols., New York, 1850); and several discourses, among which was an address against slavery, known as the "Butler's Parting Shot" (1847).

RUFZ DE LAVISON, Étienne (rooz), West Indian physician, b. in St. Pierre, Martinique, 14 Jan., 1896. He studied medicine in Paris, was admitted among the pupils of the Hôtel Dieu hospital, and in 1835 obtained his diploma as doctor. In 1830 he was sent by the government to Martinique to practise his profession, and became afterward chief surgeon of the hospital of St. Pierre, and superintendent of the lunatic asylum of the colony. He specially engaged in researches upon the poisons that were used by the negroes and the extinct tribes of Carib Indians, and presented some interesting accounts of the French academy of medicine, which were printed in the annals of that society. After the revolution of 1848 he was president of the state council of the colony in 1848-'52. Returning to Paris in 1856, he was manager of the Zoological garden of accclimation in 1860–5, was elected delegate of Martinique to the colonial committee in 1857–70, and in 1875 became an associate member of the French academy of medecine. His works included “Études historiques et statistiques sur la population de Saint Pierre de la Martinique” (St. Pierre, 1834): “Mémoire sur la maison des aînés de Saint Pierre de la Martinique” (Paris, 1868); and “Enquéte sur le Bothrops lancéole, ou vipère far de lance, le serpent de la Martinique” (1869).

RUGENDAS, Johann Moritz, German artist, born in Berlin, March 1802; d. in Weihlheim, Württemberg, 29 May, 1858. He devoted himself more particularly to illustrating with his pencil the life and scenery of Mexico and South America, where he travelled at various times between 1821 and 1847. The sketches that he made in Brazil were lithographed and published with German text (Paris, 1827–33), and his portfolios of South American sketches and studies were purchased by the government at Munich. His oil-painting, "Columbus taking Possession of the New World" (1855), is in the New Pinakothek, Munich.

RUGER, Thomas Howard, soldier, b. in Lima, Livingston co., N. Y., 2 April, 1833. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1854, assigned to the engineer corps, and worked on the military roads till, in 1861, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 3d Wisconsin regiment, 29 June, 1861, and its colonel on 20 Aug., and commanded it in Maryland and the Shenandoah valley till August, 1862, after which he was in the northern Virginia and Maryland campaigns. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, led a brigade in the Rappahannock campaigns, and commanded a division at Gettysburg. In the summer of 1863 he was in New York city, where he aided in suppressing the draft riots. He then guarded the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad in Tennessee till April, 1864, led a brigade in Sherman’s advance into Georgia till November, 1864, and then, in the campaign of the 23d, took part in the campaign against Gen. John B. Hood’s army in Tennessee, receiving the brevet of major-general of volunteers, 30 Nov., 1864, for services at the battle of Franklin. He then organized a division at Nashville, led it from February to June, 1865, in North Carolina, and then had charge of the department of that state till June, 1866, when he was mustered out. He accepted a colonelcy in the regular army. 28 July, 1866, and on 2 March, 1867, was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for services at Gettysburg. From January till July, 1868, he was provisional governor of Georgia, and from 1871 till 1876 he was superintendent of the U. S. military academy. From the last year till 1868 he was in charge of the department of South, and in 1876 he commanded the troops during the trouble in South Carolina incident to the claims of rival state governments. (See Chamblain, D. H.) He then commanded posts in the south and west, and on 19 March, 1886, was promoted brigadier-general. After temporarily commanding the Department of Missouri he went to Dakota, 1886, in charge of that of Dakota, and later was in command of the Department of the East. He was retired in 1897.

RUGGLES, William Crawford, jurist, b. in Bridgewater, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1824; d. in Syracuse, 14 Jan., 1892. He was educated at Bridgewater academy, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Bridgewater and Syracuse. He was counsel for the defendants in the "canal-ring" prosecutions that were instituted by Gov. Samuel J. Tilden. He was a member of the Democratic national convention in 1872, and was again a delegate from his state. In 1876 he was president of the convention in Albany at which the State bar association was formed. In 1882 he was elected chief judge of the New York court of appeals.

RUGGLES, Benjamin, senator, b. in Windham county, Conn., in 1783; d. in St. Clairsville, Ohio, 2 Sept., 1857. He obtained a classical education by teaching during the winters, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He removed to Marietta, Ohio, and subsequently to St. Clairsville, and in 1810 became president judge of the court of common pleas for the third circuit. In 1815 he was chosen U. S. senator, and he served until 1833, gaining by his habits of industry the name of the "wheel horse of the senate." In 1836 he was chosen a presidential elecor on the Whig ticket.

RUGGLES, Daniel, soldier, b. in Barre, Mass., 31 Jan., 1810; d. in Fredericksburg, 1 June, 1867. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and served on frontier and recruiting duty till the Mexican war, in which, after his promotion as captain, 18 June, 1846, he was serving as major of artillery at Contreras and Churubusco, and that of lieutenant-colonel for Chapultepec. He then served mostly in Texas till his resignation on 7 May, 1861, for two years before which he had been on sick leave of absence. He then joined the Confederate army, was commissioned brigadier-general in the same year, served in New Orleans, and led a division at Shiloh and at Baton Rouge. He became major-general in 1863, and commanded the Department of the Mississippi. He repelled raids on the northern and southern borders of the state in 1863–4, and in 1865 was commissary-general of prisoners. After the war he took charge of his large estate near Palafax, Tex., and also resided at Fredericksburg, Va., where he died.

RUGGLES, John, b. in Westminster, Mass., in 1799; d. in Thomaston, Me., 20 June, 1874. He was graduated at Brown in 1813, studied law, and began to practice in Skowhegan, Me., but removed to Thomaston in 1818. He served in the lower house of the legislature in 1823–31, as its speaker in 1823–9 and 1831, and resigned in the last-named year to become judge of the district court of the state, in place of Samuel E. Smith, who had been chosen governor. He was then chosen U. S. senator as a Democrat in place of Peleg Sprague, who had resigned, and served from 6 Feb., 1833, till 3 March, 1841. He afterward returned to the practice of law.

RUGGLES, Samuel Bulkley, lawyer, b. in New Milford, Conn., 11 April, 1810; d. on Fire island, N. Y., 21 Aug., 1862. In his early age to Poughkeepsie, was graduated at Yale in 1814, studied law in the office of his father, Philo, who was surrogate and district attorney at Poughkeepsie, and was admitted to the bar in 1821. He was elected a member of the assembly of 1838, and, as chairman of the committee on ways and means, presented a "Report upon the Finances and Internal Improvements of the State of New York," which led the state to enter upon a new policy in its commercial development. This report proposed to borrow sums of money sufficient to enlarge the Erie canal within five years, and not, as had been at first decided, to rely upon part of the tolls to pay for the enlargement while waiting twenty years. The enlargement was not made at once, but Mr. Ruggles's views, which were much assailed, were amply vindicated by the event. He was a commissioner to determine the route of the Erie railroad, and a director in 1833-9, a director and promoter of the Bank of commerce in 1839, commissioner of the Croton aqueduct in 1842, delegate from the United States to the International statistical congress at Berlin in 1863 and the Hague in 1869, U. S. commissioner to the Paris ex- position of 1867, and delegate to the International monetary conference that was held there. He laid out Gramercy park, in the city of New York, in 1831, gave it its name, and presented it to the surrounding owners. He practised law in the city of New York from 1826 till the end of his life. He was a member of the Chamber of commerce of the state of New York, and of the General convention of the Protestant Episcopal church. Mr. Ruggles's claim to distinction rests chiefly upon his canal policy, and the steadfast attention that he continued to give to the Erie canal, both as a private citizen during his life and as canal commissioner, in which office he served from 1840 till 1842, and again in the year 1859. Yale gave him the degree of L.I., in 1859. Among his numerous printed papers are "Report upon Finances and Internal Improvements" (1838); "Vindication of Canal Policy" (1849); "Defence of Improvement of Navigable Waters by the General Government" (1852); "Law of Burial" (1858); "Report on State of Canals in 1856" (1859); reports on the Statistical congress at Berlin (1863), the General convention at the Hague (1871); "Report to the Chairman of the Committee on Canals" (1875); and a "Consolidated Table of National Progress in Cheaping Food" (1880).—His cousin, Charles Herman, jurist, b. in Litchfield county, Conn., 10 Feb., 1789; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 16 June, 1865, received a good education, studied law, and began practice in Kingston, N. Y. He was a member of the New York legislature in 1829, and was elected immediately afterward to congress, serving in 1821-3. He then served as a judge of the Dutchess county circuit court, was again in the legislature, and in 1855 became a judge of the court of appeals of the state of New York, but resigned 30 Aug., 1855.—Charles Herman's nephew, George David, soldier, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 11 Sept., 1843, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1865, and assigned to the mounted riflemen. He served on frontier duty, including three Indian expeditions, till the civil war, and in 1862 was acting adjutant-general of the Department of the West, at St. Louis. In July, 1861, he was commissioned a second lieutenant, and in 1863 a first lieutenant, and served as adjutant-general, with the staff rank of captain, and assigned to special duty in the war department in the organization of volunteer forces. He became colonel on the staff on 28 June, 1862, was chief of staff of the Army of Virginia in Gen. John Pope's campaign, and continued to serve as an additional aide-de-camp throughout the war, sometimes with the Army of the Potomac, of which he was adjutant-general from February till June, 1865, and sometimes in Washington. He took part in the battles of Antietam and South Mountain, and the assault and capture of Petersburg. On 9 April, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for services during thirteen months, which resulted in the fall of Richmond and surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia under Gen. Robert E. Lee, and he was also given brevet commissions in the regular army to date from 13 March, including that of brigadier-general. Since the war he had served as adjutant-general of various departments. In 1893 he became adjutant-general of the army and was retired in 1897.

Ruggles, Timothy, lawyer, b. in Rochester, Mass., 20 Oct., 1711; d. in Wilmot, Nova Scotia, 4 Aug., 1793. He was a son of Rev. Timothy Ruggles, of Rochester. He was graduated at Harvard in 1732, and began the practice of law in Rochester, but removed to Sandwich about 1757, and thence to Newburyport. In 1749 he opened a tavern, and personally attended the bar and stable, while continuing to practise his profession. He was one of the best lawyers in the province of Massachusetts, and before his removal to Hardwick the principal antagonist of James Otis, senior, in causes of importance, as at a later period he was the chief opponent of James Otis, junior, in contests in the general court. In 1751 he was commissioned a judge of the court of common pleas of Worcester county, and on 21 Jan., 1762, he became its chief justice. The latter office he held until the Revolution. He was also appointed, 33 Feb., 1762, a special justice of the superior court of the province. Mr. Ruggles was a representative in the general court from Rochester in 1756, from Sandwich for eight years between 1739 and 1752, and from Hardwick fifteen years between 1754 and 1770. He was speaker of the house in 1762 and 1763. In 1765 he was chosen one of the delegates from Massachusetts to the stamp-act congress of that year in New York, and was elected its president, but refused to sign the resolutions presented. He was also a member of the committee of correspondence which went to Great Britain, and was censured for the refusal by the general court of Massachusetts and reprimanded in his place from the speaker's chair. Nine years later he accepted an appointment as mandamus councillor, and took the oath of office, 16 Aug., 1774. Ruggles rendered service in the French war that began in 1754 and ended in 1763. He had the rank of colonel in the expedition of Sir William Johnson against Crown Point in 1755, and in the battle of Lake George, where the French, under Baron Dieskau, met with a signal defeat, he was next in command to Johnson. In 1758-60 he served as brigadier-general under Lord Amherst, and accompanied that general in his expedition against Canada. Recognition of his services in a war that was not conducted by the general court of Massachusetts in January, 1774, of a farm in Princeton. A few years later he was appointed a surveyor-general of the king's forests in the province, and in the northern part of Nova Scotia, Lucius R. Page, who in his "History of Hardwick" (Boston, 1883) has given the best and latest account of Gen. Rugg- lings, has written of Mr. Ruggles as a "noble and prominent citizens of Massachusetts, and indeed of New England, in both military and civil affairs." In the years that immediately preceded the Revolution. Timothy Ruggles had been the leader of the king’s party in the general court; and when the British troops left Boston in 1775 he went with them, but there is no evidence, however, that he took an active part in the war against his countrymen. It has been said of him that “he applauded the spirit which led to the Revolution, but regarded the violent efforts practised to effect the separation of the provinces from the mother country as impolitic and procumbent.” 1827 was a remarkable year. The country’s property was confiscated by the government of Massachusetts, but Great Britain gave him land in Nova Scotia, and after the close of the Revolutionary war he settled there and spent the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits. In his new home, as before in Hardwick, he rendered lasting service to his neighbors by the use of scientific methods in farming and by the introduction of choice breeds of cattle and horses. He was more than six feet in height, careful in his dress, and had an expressive countenance. He was commanding and dignified in appearance and fearless in demeanor. His wit was ready and brilliant, his mind was clear, comprehensive, and penetrating. He was a forcible and convincing public speaker. Though about seventy, he was the same time proficient in the hospitality. As a military officer he was noted for cool bravery and excellence of judgment, as well as for knowledge of the art of warfare. “There were few men in the province,” wrote Joseph Willard, “more justly distinguished than Ruggles, and few who were more severely dealt with in the bitter controversies preceding the Revolution.” “He had been so fortunate,” wrote Christopher C. Baldwin, “as to have embraced the popular sentiments of the time, there is no doubt he would have been ranked among the leading characters of the Revolution.” See an article by Christopher C. Baldwin on Timothy Ruggles in the “Worcester Magazine” (1826), and addresses before the Members of the bar of Worcester county, Mass., by Joseph Willard (1829), Emory Washburn (1866), and Dwight Foster (1878); also Emory Washburn’s “Sketches of the Judicial History of Massachusetts from 1630 to the Revolution in 1775” (Boston, 1849).

RUGGLES, William, educator, b. in Rochester, Mass., 5 Sept., 1797; d. in Washington, D.C., 10 Sept., 1877. He was graduated at Brown in 1819, in 1822 became a tutor in Columbia college, D.C., and afterwards engaged in the study of mathematics and natural philosophy. He remained in this office until his death, completing the term of fifty-five years as teacher in one institution. Prof. Ruggles was a generous contributor to charitable objects, especially those of the Baptist denomination. To Karen theological school, in Barnum, he gave during his life $15,000, and at his death he left a fortune of $20,000. He was graduated from Brown with the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1832.

RULISON, Nelson Somerville, P. E. bishop, b. in Carthage, N.Y., 24 April, 1842; d. in Mannheim, Germany, 1 Sept., 1897. His early education was obtained at the Wesleyan academy, Gouverneur, N.Y. He entered the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, was graduated in 1860, and a licensed deacon in Grace church, Utica, N.Y., 27 May, 1866, by Bishop Coxe, and priest, in the Church of the Annunciation, New York city, 30 Nov., 1866, by Bishop Horatio Potter. The first year of his ministry he served as assistant minister in the Church of the Annunciation, New York city. In 1867 he became rector of Zion church, Morris, N.Y. He was appointed bishop of the diocese of the West Indies July 22, 1892, and consecrated in the cathedral of St. John the Baptist, New York city. He served as bishop of the West Indies diocese until his death, and was president of the General Convention of 1894. He was succeeded by Bishop Sanford of the diocese of South Carolina.

RUMFORD, Benjamin Thompson, scientist, b. in Woburn, Mass., 26 March, 1753; d. in Antwerp, near Paris, France, 21 Aug., 1814. He received a common-school education and excelled in mathematics and mechanics. In 1766 he was apprenticed to John Appleton, a merchant in Salem, and attended a few lectures at Cambridge, but spent most of his time in manufacturing surgical instruments. Subsequently he returned to Boston, and there engaged as a clerk in the dry-goods business. The depressed condition of affairs soon threw him out of employment, and, with his friend Loammi Baldwin, he attended the lectures in experimental philosophy that were delivered by Prof. John Winthrop at Harvard. The experiments were repeated by the two students with improvised apparatus on their return. Prof. Ruggles was a contributor to charitable objects, especially those of the Baptist denomination. To Karen theological school, in Barnum, he gave during his life $15,000, and at his death he left a fortune of $20,000. He was graduated from Brown with the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1832.

war, and superintendent of the police of the electorate, and he was also for a short time chief of the regency that exercised sovereignty during the absence of the elector. He received decorations from Poland, and was elected a member of the Academy of Munich and Mannheim. In 1790 the elector, becoming vicar-general of the empire during the interval between the death of Joseph II, and the coronation of Leopold II, availed himself of the prerogatives of that office to make him a count of the Holy Roman empire, on which occasion he chose as his title the name of Rumford, the town in New Hampshire where he was born, and in which he was engaged with his various reforms in connection with the army he was led to study domestic economy. He investigated the properties and management of heat, and the amount of it that was produced by the combustion of different kinds of fuel, by means of a calorimeter of his own invention. By reconstructing the fire-place he so improved the methods of warming apartments and cooking food that a saving in fuel of about one half was effected. His studies of cookery still rank high. He improved the construction of stoves, cooking-ranges, coal-gates, and chimneys, and showed that the non-conducting power of cloth is due to the air that is inclosed in its fibers. Among the other benefits introduced by him into Bavaria were improved breeds of oxen, which he is said to have introduced. Having retired from the army, he reclame from waste ground in the vicinity of Munich, and changed it into a park, where, after his leaving Bavaria, a monument was erected in his honor. His health failed under the pressure of these undertakings, and he obtained leave of absence in 1795. After visiting Italy he spent some time in England, and while in that country he was elected a member of the Royal Society, and its charitable institutions with a view of remedying their evils and introducing reforms. The war between France and Austria caused his return to Bavaria, where he maintained its neutrality, although the country was overrun with the soldiers of both nations. His health again failing, he was obliged to leave Munich, and he was sent to England. Refusing to enter the United States, because, as he said, he could not become a citizen, he could not be received in that capacity at the English court. But he remained in England as the private agent of Bavaria, and in 1799 was chiefly instrumental in founding the Royal Institution, in which he caused Sir Humphry Davy to be called to the chair of chemistry. About this time he was invited to return to the United States but, although disposed to do so, he finally removed to Paris in 1802, and there married, in 1804, the widow of the great French chemist Lavoisier, his first wife having died on 19 Jan., 1792, after being separated from him sixteen years. The remainder of his life was spent at the villa of his wife's former husband in Auteuil, busily engaged in scientific researches. The investigations upon which his utmost attention were on the nature and effects of heat, with which his name will ever be associated. The work that has been done to demonstrate experimentally the doctrine of the "correlation of forces" was begun by him in a series of experiments that was suggested by the heat evolved in boring cannon. Count Rumford gave $5,000 to the American academy of arts and sciences, and a similar amount to the Royal Society of London to found prizes bearing his name for the most important discoveries in light and heat, and the first award of the latter was made to himself. The greater part of his private collection of philosophical apparatus and specimens, and models of his own invention, were bequeathed to the Royal institution, and he also left to Harvard the funds with which was founded the Rumford professorship of the physical and mathematical sciences as applied to the useful arts, which was established in October, 1816. He published the results of his investigations in pamphlets, and essays in French, English, or German, many of which were issued as "Essays, Political, Economical, and Philosophical," (5 vols., London, 1795; vol. ix., London, 1801). Soon after leaving England, he was re-elected by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, (5 vols., Boston, 1876).—His daughter, Sarah, Countess of Rumford, b. in Concord, N. H., 18 Oct., 1774; d. there, 2 Dec., 1852, is said to have been the first American to inherit and bear the title of countess. She remained in this country after her father went to England, but in January, 1796, she rejoined him in London at his request. In 1797 she was received by the Bavarian elector as countess, and permitted to receive one half her father's pension, with the privilege of residing wherever she chose. Subsequent to the death of her husband, she divided the time between London and her house in Brompton, making protracted visits to Paris of two and three years' duration, and to her residence in Concord. With her father she established the Rolfe and Rumford asylums in Concord, N. H., for the poor and needy, particularly motherless girls. She bequeathed $15,000 to the New Hampshire asylum for the insane, and $22,000 each to the Concord female charitable society, the Boston children's friend society, and the Fathertree and widow's society of Boston.

RUMINAGUI (roo-men-yah-yahe), Peruvian soldier, b. in Quito in the latter half of the 16th century; d. in 1534. He was a son of one of the principal generals of a native prince, and entered the military service of the conqueror, Huayna Capac, and of his son, Atahualpa (q. v.). At the time of the invasion of Pizarro in 1532, Ruminagui was marching with 5,000 men to re-enforce the army that was sent against Cuzco, and advised Atahualpa not to receive the Spaniards in Cuzco, but, seeing that his advice was unheeded, he retired with his army to Quito, thus escaping the defeat of the Peruvians at the battle of Pichincha in 1532. In the Quito conspiracy of 1536, after electing a regency, he summoned to the royal palace the children, brothers, and principal officers of the emperor, and had them all murdered during a banquet that was given in their honor. Then, proclaiming himself independent, he began a reign of terror in Quito. When, in 1533, Sebastian de Benalcazar, at the request of the Quito Indians, marched against Ruminagui, the latter made a heroic resistance for a long time in the mountain-passes that led to the capital. In Ticojos a battle was fought, which resulted in favor of the Indians, but in the night an eruption of the volcano Cotopaxi began, which had been predicted by the priests would be fatal to the empire of Quito, and the Indian army dispersed. Ruminagui was unable to defend his capital, set fire to the palace and the city, and during the confusion escaped to the mountains with the emperor's treasures, but was hotly pursued by the Spaniards, and, as the Indians despised and hated him, they revealed his retreat, and he was killed toward the beginning of 1534.

RUMPLE, Jethro, clergyman, b. in Cabarrus county, N. C., 1827. He worked on a farm, and studied at intervals till he was eighteen years old, when he began to prepare for college, teaching to defray his expenses. He was graduated at Davidson college in 1850, studied in the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., and was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1857. After holding pastorates in Mecklenburg county, he was called in 1860 to Salisbury, N. C., where he has since remained. The University of North Carolina gave him the degree of D.D. in 1882. Dr. Rumph was a member of the council of his church, and published "History of Rowan County, N. C." (Salisbury, N. C., 1881), and "History of the First Fifty Years of Davidson College" (Raleigh, 1888). His "History of Presbyterianism in North Carolina" recently appeared as a serial.

RUMSEY, Benjamin, Congregational, b. about 1759. His grandfather, Charles, emigrated from Wales to this country about 1663, and after living in Charleston, S. C., New York, and Philadelphia, settled in Cecil county, Md. He was the great-grandfather of James Rumsey, noticed below. Benjamin was elected by the Maryland convention, 29 Dec., 1775, one of a committee of five to prepare a draft of instructions for the deputies of the province in congress. In 1776 he was a member of the same committee, to report resolutions for raising, clothing, and victualing the provincial forces. On 25 May he became one of the council of safety, and on 10 Nov. he was chosen by the convention to the Continental congress.

RUMSEY, James, inventor, b. in Bohemia Manor, Cecil co., Md., about 1743; d. in London, England, 28 Dec., 1792. He was a machinist by trade, and early turned his attention to inventing, making various improvements in the mechanism of mills. In 1784 he exhibited to George Washington the model of a boat for steering the current of rivers by the force of the stream acting on settling poles, which he patented in several states; and he obtained in March, 1785, the exclusive right for ten years "to navigate and build boats calculated to work with greater ease and rapidity against rapid rivers" from the assembly at Philadelphia. Subsequently he succeeded in launching a boat on the Potomac, which he propelled by a steam-engine and machinery of his own construction that secured motion by the force of a stream of water thrown out by a pump at the stern. In December, 1787, a larger vessel was successfully handled by a large concourse of people, and he was granted the rights of navigating the streams of New York, Maryland, and Virginia. The Rumsey society, of which Benjamin Franklin was a member, was founded in Philadelphia in 1788 for the purpose of furthering his schemes. He then went to England, where a similar society was organized, and he obtained patents for his inventions in the British, France, and Holland. A boat and machinery were built for him, and a successful trip was made on the Thames in December, 1792, but he died while preparing for another experiment. The legislature of Kentucky presented in 1839 a gold medal to his son—commemorative of his father's services and high agency in giving to the British, France, and Holland. RUMSEY, Julian Sidney, merchant, b. in Batavia, N. Y., 3 April, 1823; d. in Chicago, Ill., 29 April, 1886. He removed to Chicago in 1837, and succeeded that of a brother subsequently became partners. This firm, then known as Newberry and Dole, sent out in September, 1839, the first shipment of grain from Chicago. In 1852 Mr. Dole retired and the firm, which was for a time known as Rumsey Brothers, devoted itself exclusively to the grain commission business. Mr. Rumsey was identified with the history of Chicago for more than a half a century. During that period he was mayor, county treasurer, and president of the board of trade. Of the latter institution he was a charter member, and, through his efforts the present system of grain inspection and grading was adopted. This achievement gave him the title of the "Father of Grain Inspection." Mr. Rumsey always took an interest in national and state affairs, and during his period the war, which preceded the civil war, he did much, as mayor, to arouse the enthusiasm of his fellow-citizens in favor of the preservation of the Union, and at the mass-meeting in Metropolitan hall a few days after the firing on Fort Sumter, he delivered a stirring address. He was a member of the first war finance committee, and of the Republican state committee the same year. During the panic of 1873 he was president of the Corn exchange national bank.

RUNDIT, Charles Godfrey, missionary, b. in Königsberg, Germany, 30 May, 1713; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 17 Aug., 1764. He entered the army of Holstein as a musician, but in 1717 united with the Moravians in Saxony. In 1731 he was sent to Pennsylvania, and became an itinerant missionary among the Indians. While on what seemed an errand of minor importance, he was sailing at Onondaga in 1752 with David Zeisberger when he was adopted into the tribe, receiving the name of Thaneraqueht. He was a member of the first war finance committee, and of the Republican state committee the same year. During the panic of 1873 he was president of the Corn exchange national bank.

RUNKLE, John Daniel, mathematician, b. in Root, Montgomery co., N. Y., 11 Oct., 1822. He worked on his father's farm until he was of age, and then studied and taught until he entered Lehigh College, where he was graduated in 1841. Meanwhile as his ability as a mathematician led in 1849 to his appointment as assistant in the preparation of the "American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac," in which he continued to engage until 1884. He was called to the professorship of mathematics in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and still (1889) holds the chair. He has been an active president in 1868-70, and president in 1870-8. Prof. Runkle has taken great interest in the subject of manual training, and that system was introduced in the Institute of technology largely in consequence of his efforts. He received the honorary degrees of A. M. from Harvard in 1851, Ph. D. from Hamilton in 1860, and L.L. D. from Wesleyan in 1871. In 1859 he founded the "Mathematical Monthly," which he published until 1891, and he had charge of the astronomical department of the "Illustrated Pilgrim's Almanac." Besides many papers, including "The Manual Element in Education" in the "Reports of the Massachusetts Board of Education" for 1876-7 and 1880-1 and "Report on the New Tables for Determining the Values of the Coefficients in the Perturbative Function of Planetary Motion" (Washington, 1856) and "Elements of Plane and Solid Analytic Geometry" (Boston, 1888),—His brother, Cornelius A., lawyer, b. in Montgomery county, N. Y., 9 Dec., 1832; d. in New York city, 19 March, 1888, was graduated at Harvard law-school in 1853, began practice in New York city, and was subsequently made deputy collector and given charge of the law division of the New York custom-house. This rendered him familiar with the legal questions involved in tariff and internal revenue litigation, and resulted in his devoting himself largely to that class of business. Mr. Runkle for about twenty-five years acted as counsel for "The Tribune" association.—Cornelius A.'s wife, Lucia Isabella, author, b. in North Brookfield, Worcester co., Mass., 29 Aug., 1844. Her maiden name was Gilbert, and after receiving her education in Fall River and Worcester, Mass., she removed to New York city. In 1862 she married Mr. Calhoun, and in 1869 Mr. Runkle. For many years she was an editorial writer and contributor to the New York "Tribune," in which she published a brilliant series of articles on "Cooking," treated from an artistic standpoint, which attracted much attention. She has also written frequently for "The Century," "The Knickerbocker," and "The New Review." RUPP, Israel Daniel, author, b. in Cumberland county, Pa., 10 July, 1803; d. in Philadelphia, 31 May, 1878. He was born upon a farm and had few educational advantages, but at the age of twenty he had mastered eight languages, and became a teacher. In 1830 he translated into and from the German a large number of religious works, the principal of which was the "Hüttige Schan-Platz, oder Geschichte der Martyren" (Cincinnati, 1830), which was originally published in German by the Ephrata brethren. About 1827 he began the preparation of the "History of the Germans of Pennsylvania," which was not completed at his death. While gathering materials for this work he collected a large amount of data relating to the migration to and settlement in Pennsylvania. In 1836 his first historical compilation was issued from the press, while other volumes of local history followed in rapid succession. He was an indefatigable worker, an excellent German scholar, with good conversational powers, and in his lifetime collected much historical material. He had the peculiar faculty of obtaining facts in a few words that were later found to be accurate. He was also a prolific writer of numerous periodicals, which are repositories of zeal and industry. He was not a polished writer, and lacked method in his historical arrangement. He translated, wrote, compiled, and prepared for the press about thirty volumes, but the great work of his life, "The History of the Germans of Pennsylvania," remains unpublished. Apart from his translations, Mr. Rupp's historical writings include "History of Lancaster County, Pennsyl- vania" (1836); "History of Lancaster County, Pennsyl- vania" (1844); "History of Religious Denomina- tions of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1844); "History of Berks and Lebanon Counties" (Lancaster, 1844); "History of York County" (1845); "Events in Indian History" (1832); "History of Northampton, Lehigh, Monroe, Carbon, and Schuylkill Counties" (Harrisburg, 1846); "History of Western Pennsylvania" (1846); "History of Dauphin, Cumberland, Franklin, Bedford, Adams, and Perry Counties" (Lancaster, 1848); "History of Somerset, Cambria, and Indiana Counties" (1848); "History of Northumberland, Huntingdon, Millin, Centre, Union, Columbia, Juniata, and Huntingdon Counties" (1848); "History of Thirty Thousand German and other Immigrants to Pennsylvania from 1727 to 1776" (Harrisburg, 1850); "Genealogy of the Descendants of John Jonas Rupp" (1874).

RUSCHENBERGER, William S. W., naval surgeon, b. in Cumberland county, N. J.; 4 Sept., 1807; d. in Philadelphia, 24 March, 1893. After attending school he entered the navy as surgeon's mate, 10 Aug., 1826, was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1830, and was commissioned surgeon, 4 April, 1831. He was fleet surgeon of the East India squadron in 1835-7, attached to the naval rendezvous at Philadelphia in 1840-2, and at the naval hospital in Brooklyn in 1843-7, when he organized the laboratory for supplied the service with unadulterated drugs. He was again fleet surgeon of the East India squadron in 1847-50, of the Pacific squadron in 1854-7, and of the Mediterranean squadron from August, 1860, till July, 1861. During the intervals between cruises he was on duty at Philadelphia. During the civil war he was surgeon of the Boston navy-yard. He was on special duty at the Philadelphia mint in 1859-60, was the first secretary of the medical corps in 1862-9, and was retired on 4 Sept., 1869. He was president of the Academy of natural sciences of Philadelphia in 1870-82, and president of the College of physicians of Philadelphia in 1870-83. He was commissioned medical director on the retired list, 3 March, 1871. Dr. Ruschenberger had published some of the results of his investigations during his cruises, by which he acquired a wide reputation. Among his works are "Three Years in the Pacific" (Philadelphia, 1834; 2 vols., London, 1835); "A Voyage around the World, 1835-7" (Philadelphia, 1838; omitting strictures on the British government; 2 vols., London, 1839); "Elements of Natural History" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1850); A Lexicon of Terms used in Natural History" (1850; "A Note on the Origin, Progress, and Present Condition of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia" (1852); and "Notes and Commentaries during Voyages to Brazil and China, 1845" (Richmond, 1854). He had also published numerous articles on naval rank and organization (1845-50), and contributed papers to medical and scientific journals, and he edited the American edition of Mrs. Somerville's "Physical Geography," with additions and a glossary (1850; new ed., 1858).

RUSH, Benjamin, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Byberry township, Pa., 24 Dec., 1745; d. in Philadelphia, 19 April, 1813. His ancestor, John, who was a captain on Cromwell's army, emigrated to this country in 1683, and left a large number of descendants. Benjamin's father died when the son was six years old. His earliest instruction was that of Rev. Samuel Finley, subsequently president of Princeton, who prepared him for that college. He was graduated in 1760, and subsequently in the medical department of the University of Edinburgh in 1768, after studying under Dr. John Redman, of Philadelphia. He also attended medical lectures in England and in Paris, where he enjoyed the friendship of Benjamin Franklin, who instilled in him the value of paying his debts on time. In August, 1769, he returned to the United States and settled in Philadelphia, where he was elected professor of chemistry in the City medical college. In 1771 he published essays on slavery, temperance, and health, and in 1774 he delivered the annual oration before the Philosophical society on the "Natural History of Medicine among the different Nations of North America." He early engaged in pro-Revolutionary movements, and wrote constantly for the press on colonial rights. He was a member of the provincial conference of Pennsylvania, and chairman of the committee that reported that it had become expedient for congress to declare independence, and surgeon to the Pennsylvania navy from 17 Sept., 1775, to 1 July, 1776. He was then elected to the latter body, and on 4 July, 1776, signed the declaration. He married Julia, a daughter of Richard Stockton, and was appointed surgeon-general of the middle department in April, 1777, and in July became physician-general. Although in constant attendance on the wounded in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, the Brandywine, Germantown, and in the sickness at Valley Forge, he found time to write four long public letters to the people of Pennsylvania, in which he commented severely on the articles of confederation of 1776, and urged a revision on the ground of the dangers of giving legislative powers to a single house. In February, 1778, he resigned his military office on account of wrongs that had been done to the soldiers in regard to the hospital stores, and a coldness between himself and Gen. Washington, but, though he was without means at that time, he required no assistance from the government or the army. Then he returned to Philadelphia, resumed his practice and duties as professor, and for twenty-nine years was surgeon to the Pennsylvania hospital, and port physician to Philadelphia in 1790-2. He was a founder of Dickinson college and the Philadelphia dispensary, and was largely interested in the establishment of public schools, concerning which he published a series of addresses, and in the founding of the College of physicians, of which he was one of the first censors. He was a member of the State convention that ratified the constitution of the United States in 1787, and of that formed a state constitution in the same year, in which he endeavored to procure the incorporation of his views on public schools, and a penal code on which he had previously written essays. After that service he retired from public life. While in occupation of the chair of chemistry in Philadelphia medical college, he was elected to that of the theory and practice of medicine, to which was added the professorship of the institutes and practice of medicine and clinical practice in 1791, and that of the practice of physic in 1797, all of which he held until his death. During the Philadelphia cholera of 1793 he rendered good service, visiting from 100 to 120 patients daily, but his bold and original practice made him enemies, and a paper edited by William Cobbett, called "Peter Porcupine's Gazette," was so violent in its attacks upon him that it was prosecuted, and a jury rendered a verdict of $5,000 damages, which Dr. Rush disputed. He also published during the epidemic convinced him that yellow fever is not contagious, and he was the first to proclaim that the disease is indigenous. From 1799 till his death he was treasurer of the U. S. mint. "His name," says Dr. Thomas Young, "was familiar to the medical world as the Sufyenham of America. His accurate observations and correct dissection of epidemic diseases were entitled him to this distinction, while in the original energy of his reasoning he far exceeded his prototype." He was a member of nearly every medical, literary, and benevolent institution in the country, and of many foreign societies, and for his replies to their queries on the subject of yellow fever received a medal from the king of Prussia in 1803, and gifts from other nations. Benjamin Rush was the son of Benjamin Franklin as president of the Pennsylvania society for the abolition of slavery, was president of the Philadelphia medical society, vice-president and founder of the Philadelphia Bible society, advocating the use of the Scriptures as a textbook in the public schools, an originator of the American philosophical society, of which he was a vice-president in 1799–1800. He taught, more clearly than any other physician of his day, to distinguish diseases and their effects, gave great impulse to the study of medicine in this country, and in Philadelphia the centre of real science in the United States, more than 2,300 students having attended his lectures during his professorship in the Medical college of Philadelphia. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1812. His publications include "Medical Inquiries and Observations" (5 vols., Philadelphia, 1789–98; 3d ed., 4 vols., 1809); "Essays, Literary, Moral, and Philosophical" (1798; 2d ed., 1806); "Sixteen Introductory Lectures" (1811); and "Diseases of the Mind" (1812; 5th ed., 1835). He also edited several medical works.—His son, Richard, statesman, b. in Philadelphia, 29 Aug., 1789; d. there, 30 July, 1859, was graduated at Princeton in 1817, and admitted to the bar of Pennsylvania in 1829, and early in his career won distinction by his defense of William Duane, editor of the "Aurora," on a charge of libeling Gov. Thomas McKean. He became solicitor of the guardians of the poor of Philadelphia in 1810, and attorney-general of Pennsylvania in 1811, comptroller of the U. S. treasury in November of the same year, and in 1814–17 was U. S. attorney-general. He became temporary U. S. secretary of state in 1817, and was then appointed minister to England, where he remained till 1823, negotiating several important treaties, especially that of 1818 with Lord Castlereagh respecting the fisheries, the northwest boundary-line, conflicting claims beyond the Rocky mountains, and the slaves of American citizens that were carried off on British ships, contrary to the treaty of Ghent. He was recalled in 1825 to accept the portfolio of the treasury which had been offered him by President Adams, and in 1828 he was a candidate for the vice-presidency on the ticket with Mr. Adams. In 1829 he negotiated in Holland a loan for the corporations of Washington, Georgetown, D. C., and Alexandria, Va. He was a commissioner to adjust a boundary dispute between Ohio and Michigan in 1835, and in 1836 was appointed commissioner to obtain the legacy of James Smithson (q. v.), which he left to found the Smithsonian institution. The case was then pending in the English chancery court, and in August, 1838, Mr. Rush returned with the amount, $508,315.46. He was minister to France in 1847–49, and in 1848 was the first of the ministers at that court to recognize the new republic, acting in advance of instructions from his government. Mr. Rush began his literary career in 1812, when he was a member of the Madison cabinet, by writing vigorous articles in defense of the second war with England. His relations with John Quincy Adams were intimate, and affected his whole career. He became an anti-Mason in 1810, and wrote a powerful report against the Bank of the United States, and ever afterward co-operated with the Democratic party. He was a member of the American philosophical society. His publications include "Codification of the Laws of the United States" (6 vols., Philadelphia, 1815); "Narrative of a Residence at the Court of London from 1817 till 1825" (London, 1833); a series of works of the same work, "Comprising Incidents, Official and Personal, from 1819 till 1825" (1845; 3d ed., under the title of "The Court of London from 1819 till 1825, with Notes by the Author's Nephew," 1857); "Washington in Domestic Life," which consists of personal letters from Washington to his private secretary, Col. Tobias Lear, and some personal recollections (1857); and a volume of "Occasional Productions, Political, Diplomatic, and Miscellaneous, including a Glance at the Court and Government of Louis Philippe, and the French Revolution of 1848," published by his sons (1860).—Richard's son, Benjamin, b. in Philadelphia, 30 Jan., 1811; d. in Paris, France, 20 June, 1877, was graduated at Princeton in 1829, studied law, and in 1833 was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia. In 1837 he was appointed secretary of legation at London, where he served for a time as chargé d'affaires. He published "An Appeal for the Union" (Philadelphia, 1890) and "Letters on the Rebellion" (1802).—Another son of the first Benjamin, James, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 March, 1786; d. there, 26 May, 1863, was graduated at Princeton in 1803, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1809. He subsequently studied in Edinburgh, and, returning to Philadelphia, practised for several years, but afterward relinquished the active duties of his profession to devote himself to scientific and literary pursuits. He left $1,000,000 to the Philadelphia library company for the erection of the Ridgeway branch of the Philadelphia library. His publications include "Philosophy of the Human Voice" (Philadelphia, 1827); "Hamlet, a Dramatic Prelude in Five Acts" (1834); "Analysis of the Human Intellect" (2 vols., 1865); and "Rhymes of Contrast on Wisdom and Folly" (1868).—His wife, Phoebe Ann, b. in Philadelphia, 1797; d. there, 1857, was a daughter of Jacob Ridgeway. She was highly educated in early life, well versed in the languages and literature of modern Europe, and by her social tact and brilliant conversational powers became one of the most noted American women of her time. Her house in Philadelphia was one of the finest in this country, and her entertainments were on the largest and most luxurious scale.—A brother of the first Benjamin, Jacob, jurist, b. in Byberry township, Pa., in 1746; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Jan., 1820, was graduated at Princeton in 1765, settled in the practice of law in Philadelphia, was a judge of the high court of errors and appeals of Pennsylvania in 1784–1808, president of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia in 1806–20, and at an earlier date was a justice of the supreme court of the state. In the controversy between Joseph Reed and John Dickinson as to the character of Benedict Arnold (q. v.), Judge Rush espoused the latter's cause. Princeton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1804. His publications include "Resolve in Committee Chamber 6 Dec., 1774" (Philadelphia, 1774); "Charges on Moral and Religious Subjects" (1803); "Character of Christ" (1806); and "Christian Baptism" (1819).—His daughter, Rebecca, published "Kelsey," a novel (Philadelphia, 1812).
RUSH, Christopher, A. M. E. Zion bishop, b. in Craven county, N. C., in 1777; d. in New York city, 16 July, 1853. He was a full-blooded African, and born a slave. He went to New York in 1788, and was subsequently freed, and licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1815. He was ordained a superintendent or bishop in 1828. He was largely instrumental in the separation of the colored from the white branch of the Methodist Episcopal church, and his address before Bishop Enoch George finally carried the measure, and he was thus a founder of what is now the African Methodist Episcopal church. At the time the Methodists numbered only 100, but Bishop Rush lived to see it a comparatively large and flourishing organization. He published a history of his denomination.

RUSH, William, sculptor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 July, 1756; d. there, 17 Jan., 1833. In his youth he was apprenticed to Edward Cutbush, a carver, and he first became known as a maker of figure-heads for ships. Especially noticeable among his ship-carvings were the figures "Genius of the United States" and "Nature" for the frigates "United States" and "Constellation," and busts and figures of Voltaire, Rousseau, Benjamin Franklin, William Penn, and others, for various vessels. The figure of the "Indian Trader" for the ship "William Penn" excited great curiosity in London. The carvers sketched it and took casts of the head. Another figure, that of a river-god, carved for the ship "Ganges," won the admiration of the Hindoos, who came in numerous boats to reverence this image. But he did not confine himself to figure-heads, although he never worked in marble, but always in wood or clay. In 1812 he exhibited, at the Pennsylvania academy, figures of "Exhortation," "Praise," and cherubim, and busts of Linnaeus, William Bartram, and Rev. Henry M. Muhlenberg. He executed also statues of "Winter," "Agriculture," a figure of Christ on the cross, which last two were destroyed by fire, several portrait-busts, including Gen. Lafayette (1824), and other works. His best-known statue is that of Washington (1814), which was bought by the city of Philadelphia. Mr. Rush served in the Revolutionary army, and was a member of the councils of his native city for more than a quarter of a century.

RUSK, Jeremiah McEoin, governor of Wisconsin, b. in Morgan county, Ohio, 17 June, 1830; d. in Viroqua, Wis., 21 Nov., 1893. He divided his time between farm-work and winter study till he attained his majority, and in 1853 removed to Wisconsin and engaged in agriculture in Vernon county. He entered the National army in 1862, was commissioned major of the 25th Wisconsin regiment, rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and served with Gen. William T. Sherman from the siege of Vicksburg till the close of the war. In 1866 he was elected bank comptroller of Wisconsin, and held the position till 1870, when he was chosen governor of Wisconsin, having been elected for three successive terms. In 1888 Gen. Rusk was an unsuccessful candidate for the Republican nomination. He was a member of the department of agriculture in President Harrison's administration.

RUSK, Thomas Jefferson, senator, b. in Cumberland, S. C., Aug. 8, 1802; d. in Nacogdoches, Tex., 29 July, 1856. He received an academic education, practised law with success in Georgia, and in the early part of 1835 removed to Texas. He then identified himself with the history of that republic, was a member of the convention that declared its independence in March, 1836, was its first secretary of war, participated in the battle of San Jacinto, and became commander of the army after Gen. Samuel Houston was wounded, continuing to hold that office till the organization of the constitutional convention of 1838; was elected to the state senate, and again chosen secretary of war, but resigned after a few months' service, subsequently commanded several expeditions against the Indians, and was a member of the legislature. He was a justice of the supreme court in 1838-42, president of the convention that consummated the annexation of Texas to the United States in 1845, and upon its admission to the Union, was chosen U. S. senator as a Democrat, serving in 1846-56. He had been re-elected to a third term, but in a fit of insanity, caused by domestic misfortune, he committed suicide. During his senatorial service he was chairman of the committee on the post-office, and was interested to a large extent in the overland mail and the wagon-road to the Pacific.

RUSK, Thomas P., inventor, b. in 1821; d. in Halifax, N. S., 31 Dec., 1863. He invented the pavement that bears his name. It consists of granite blocks, and was laid in Broadway, New York city, but proved impracticable on account of its being too slippery. Subsequently he turned his attention to mechanical projects, and for some time prior to his death was engaged in gold-mining in Nova Scotia.

RUSK, John Denison, physician, b. in Chebacco (now Essex), Mass., 1 Sept., 1801; d. in Pompton, N. J., 1 March, 1881. He was graduated at Yale in 1823, and in the medical department in 1825. After spending a year abroad in hospital practice, he settled in New York city, but in June, 1827, he went with a cargo of supplies to aid the Greeks in their struggle for independence. He remained, superintending the development of a hospital service in Greece, for several years, but the failure of his health compelled his return, and he entered again upon practice in New York city. Dr. Rusk became interested at once in the condition of the poor that were suffering from ophthalmia in the city hospitals, and at his own cost, in March, 1832, made the first attempt for the treatment of the eye and cure of the blind. He was appointed superintendent of the newly chartered New York institution for the blind in the same year, and in this office introduced many methods of teaching, some of which have been permanently useful. He invented the phonic alphabet, which consists of forty-one characters, sufficiently like the Roman letters to be read easily, to which he added twenty-two prefixes and suffixes. This system of writing never was introduced generally, but he simplified mathematical characters, and his printed maps, from raised designs, in which he used wave-lines for water, are still in use. He went abroad for his health, but on his return he engaged in numerous philanthropic and educational efforts as one of the founders of the New York prison association, its corresponding secretary in 1846–54, and subsequently a vice-president, was superintendent of the New York juvenile asylum in 1851–58, and a member of the board of education in 1848–51. He also established in 1850 a house of employment for women, which institution was under the care of his wife and daughter. During his old age he made further improvements in printing for the blind.

RUSSELL, Lord Alexander George, British soldier, b. in England, in 1821. He is a son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, entered the army in 1839, and was promoted captain in 1846, major in 1853, lieutenant-colonel in 1856, colonel in 1891, major-general in 1874, and lieutenant-general in 1877. He was also elected to the governor-general of Canada in 1847, served in the Gulf war in 1832–33 as deputy assistant quartermaster-general to the Ist division, and was present at the battle of Berea, for which he obtained a medal. He took part in the Crimean war, was at the siege of Sebastopol, and for gallant conduct presented with the Crimean medal and clasp, and with Sarulian and Turkish medals and the order of the Medjidie. He was commissioned at Shorncliffe in 1873–74, in the horse artillery, and in southeastern England in 1877–78, served in Canada from 1883 till 1888, and at the latter date was succeeded by Gen. Sir John Ross. His headquarters were at Halifax, Nova Scotia.

RUSSELL, Alexander Jamieson, Canadian engineer, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 20 April, 1807. He settled with his parents in 1822 in Megantic county, Can., where his father was crown-lands agent. The son became deputy provincial surveyor in 1829, entered the commissariat department in 1830, served for two years on the construction of the Rideau canal, and afterward was engaged during eight years in the work of the department at Quebec. He resigned in 1841, and became civil engineer and chief of public works of the six time counties of Lower Canada, where for five years he projected and constructed roads and bridges. In 1846 he was transferred to the crown timber office at Ottawa to settle differences between lumbermen, and to grant licenses to cut timber on Ottawa river and its tributaries. Afterward the collection of the timber revenues and the inspection of the other crown timber agencies in Lower and Upper Canada were added to his duties. He has published a geographical work (Ottawa, 1869).

RUSSELL, Archibald, philanthropist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1811; d. in New York city, 12 April, 1871. His father, James, was for many years president of the Royal society of Edinburgh. The son settled in Edinburgh in philosophy, law, and medicine, and subsequently studied at the University of Bonn, Germany. He settled in New York city in 1836, where he devoted his time and fortune to benevolent and educational enterprises, founding the Five Points mission, of which he was president for eighteen years, and aiding in establishing the Hartford asylum, of which he was a vice-president. He was an active member of the Christian commission during the civil war, gave largely to its support, and was chairman of the famine relief committee. He made his summer home in Uster county, opposite Hyde Park, N. Y., from 1844 until his death, and was connected with the most important internal improvements in that region. He established its present system of common schools, founded the Uster county savings bank, and was its president from its establishment until his death, and built a Presbyterian church at his own cost near his country-seat, Glen-Albion. Mr. Russell married Helen Rutherford, a daughter of Dr. John Watts. He published "Principles of Statistical Inquiry" (New York, 1839), and "Account of 11,000 Schools in New York" (1847).

RUSSELL, Benjamin, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 Sept., 1761; d. there, 4 Jan., 1845. He was apprenticed to Isaiah Thomas, at Worcester, Mass., but before completing his term enlisted in the Revolutionary army, and contributed war news to the "Spy." Thomas's paper. He began the publication of the "Columbia Centinel" about 1784, a semi-weekly journal, which had no equal in its control of public sentiment. He was aided by Stephen Higginson, John Lowell, Fisher Ames, Timothy Pickering, and George Cabot. In 1788 Russell attended the Massachusetts convention for ratifying the Constitution of the United States, and made the first attempt at organizing a Boston newspaper. His enterprise was conspicuous in collecting foreign intelligence, and, in order to obtain the latest news, he visited all the foreign vessels that came into Boston harbor. The "Centinel" kept regular files of the "Monteur," which brought Louis Philippe and Talleyrand frequently to its offices during his tenure of his post in Boston. An atlas, which was the gift of the former, was a constant service to Russell in preparing his summaries of military news from the continent. When congress was holding its first session, Russell wrote to the department of state, and offered to publish gratuitously all the laws and other official documents—the treasury then being almost bankrupt—which offer was accepted. At the end of several years he was called upon for his bill. It was made out, and received. On being informed of this fact, Gen. Washington said: "This must not be. When Mr. Russell offered to publish the laws without pay, we were poor. It was a generous offer. We are now able to pay our debts. This is a debt of honor, and must be discharged." A few days after this Mr. Russell paid the sum of $500, being the full amount of his bill. In 1795–1800 he published a Federalist paper, called the "Gazette," which was a violent enemy of France, Jefferson, and the Republican newspapers, and held its influence under the same management until 1830. Russell retired from the "Centinel" in 1828. He originated the phrase the "era of good feeling" on the occasion of President Monroe's visit to Boston in 1817, when the chiefs of both parties, the Republicans and Federalists, united in the support of the executive. He represented Boston in the general court for twenty-four years, served several terms in the state senate, and was a member of the executive council and of the Constitutional convention of 1829.

RUSSELL, Henry, voicist, b. in Shenandoah, Kent, 24 Dec., 1813. He was the son of a Hebrew merchant, and in infancy appeared in Christmas pantomimes. Later he studied music, and subsequently taught. He settled in Rochester, N. Y., in 1843, as teacher of the piano-forte, and became widely known as a composer and vocalist. For years he travelled in this country, giving monologue entertainments of his compositions. He was engaged for the concerts of oratorio and philarmonic societies, and recited the soliloquies in "Hamlet," "Richard III." and "Macbeth" to his own music. Russell had a heavy baritone voice of small compass, but in declamatory delivery it was highly impressive. On the singer's return to Europe, he appeared in many cities of Great Britain and Ireland to repeat his American success. Finally he retired from the concert-room, and settled in London as an opulent money-lender and bill-broker. All his songs were sold at large prices, and for years returned him a handsome income. They are composed in a manly vein, entirely free from puerile sentimentality, and many of them bid fair to endure for future generations. They include "The Ivy Green," "The Old Arm-Chair," "A Life on the Ocean Wave," "Some love to Room," "I'M About," and "Woodman, spare that Tree."

RUSSELL, Israel Cook, geologist, b. near Graftonville, N. Y., 10 Dec., 1832. He was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1872, after which he spent two years in studying science at the School of mines of Columbia college. In 1874 he accompanied one of the parties sent out by the U. S. government to observe the transit of Venus, and was stationed at Queenstown, New Zealand. On his return in 1875 he was appointed assistant in geology at the School of mines, and in 1878 he became assistant geologist on the U. S. geological and geographical survey west of the 100th meridian. In 1880 he was appointed to a similar office on the U. S. geological survey, which he still (1898) holds. Besides large contributions on geological subjects to various scientific periodicals, he has published scientific memoirs, which have been issued by the government in the annual reports of the survey, or as separate monographs. These include "Sketch of the Geological History of Lake Lahontan" (1883); "A Geological Reconnaissance in Southern Oregon" (1884); "Existing Glaciers of the United States" (1885); "Geological History of Lake Lahontan" (1885); "Geological History of Mono Valley" (1888); and "Sub-Aerial Deay of Rocks" (1888).

RUSSELL, John Henry, naval officer, b. in Frederick city, Md., 4 July, 1827; d. in Washington, 1 April, 1887. He entered the navy, was attached to the "St. Mary's" in the Gulf of Mexico, 1844-'9, and participated in the first operations of the Mexican war. He was present at the blockade at Vera Cruz prior to the capture of that city. He became a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847, and was graduated at the naval academy in 1848. He was attached to the North Pacific exploring expedition in 1855-'6, and served in the sloop "Vincennes" under an appointment as acting lieutenant, and also as navigator. In this cruise the U. S. envoy to China was indebted to Lieut. Russell for opening communication with the Chinese, who had refused all intercourse. Russell boldly pushed his way alone to the senior mandarin, and delivered despatches by which American and English envoys were admitted to audience. He was commissioned master, 14 Sept., 1855, and lieutenant, 15 Sept., 1855, and in 1859-'7, when on ordnance duty at the Washington navy-yard, he was one of two officers there that remained loyal, notwithstanding that his ties and affections were with the south. He went to Norfolk to assist in preventing vessels at the navy-yard from falling into the hands of the secessionists, and had charge of the last boat that left the yard, 28 April, 1861. He was next attached to the frigate "Colorado," and on 14 Sept., 1861, he commanded a boat expedition to cut out the privateer "Jubal" at Pensacola, under the protection of shore batteries and about 9,000 men. Russell boldly approached during the night, and after a severe hand-to-hand conflict, in which 20 of the enemy were killed and 30 wounded, himself among the latter, he succeeded in destroying the "Jubal" and regained the "Colorado." Admiral Porter, in his "Naval History," says that "this was without doubt the most gallant cutting-out affair that occurred during the war." The navy department complimented Russell. The state of Maryland gave him a vote of thanks, and President Lincoln personally expressed his gratitude. Russell was then placed in command of the steamer "Kennecott" in Farragut's squadron, was present at the surrender of the forts below New Orleans, and received the garrison of Fort Jackson as prisoners on his ship. Farragut thanked him for his service in saving lives of officers and men in the flag-ship's boat during a gueilla attack at Baton Rouge, and the steamer "Continental," Commander, 16 July, 1862, was on ordnance duty at Washington in 1864, and commanded the sloop "Cyane." of the Pacific squadron, in 1864-'5. After being commissioned commander on 28 Jan., 1867, he took charge of the steamer "Ossipee," of the Pacific squadron, in 1869-'71, and during a gale in the Gulf of California rescued the passengers and crew of the Pacific mail-steamer "Continental," in September, 1869. He became captain, 12 Feb., 1874, commanded the sloop "Plymouth" in 1875, and by prompt measures saved the vessels of the North Atlantic squadron from an epidemic of yellow fever at Key West. In 1876-'7 he commanded the steamer "Powhatan" on special service. He was made commodore, 30 Oct., 1883, had charge of the Mare Island navy-yard in 1885, and was rear-admiral, 4 March, 1886, and voluntarily went upon the retired list, 27 Aug., of the same year.

RUSSELL, Jonathan, diplomatist, b. in Providence, R. I., in 1771; d. in Milton, Mass., 19 Feb., 1832. He was graduated at Brown in 1794, and educated for the law, but engaged in business, and subsequently in politics. He was U. S. minister to Norway and Sweden in 1814-'18, and one of the five commissioners that negotiated the treaty of Ghent in the former year. He settled in Mendon, Mass., on his return to this country, took an active part in politics, and in 1821-'3 was a member of congress, having been elected as a Democrat. He was a versatile and graceful writer, but, with the exception of his diplomatic correspondence while in Paris, all of his work, and Stocke's "Fourth of July oration that reached its twentieth edition (Providence, 1890), he published nothing.

RUSSELL, Noadiah, clergyman, b. in Middletown, Conn., in 1659; d. there, 3 Dec., 1713. He was graduated at Harvard in 1681, taught at Ipswich, and in October, 1688, was ordained minister of the church in Middletown, where he remained until his death. He was one of the twelve founders of Yale, and a trustee of that college. His "Diary" is published in the "New England Historical Register" for January, 1853.—His son, William, clergyman, b. in Middletown, Conn., 20

Russell, soldier, b. in Culpeper county, Va., in 1758: d. in Fayette county, Ky., 3 July, 1825. He removed with his father to the Virginia frontier in early boyhood, joined Daniel Boone's Indian expedition when he was fifteen years of age, and was appointed lieutenant in the Revolutionary army the next year, in which capacity served until he entered the House of Delegates. He was the first to reach the summit of the mountain, and to receive a sword from the enemy. He was then promoted captain, served against the Cherokee Indians, and negotiated a treaty of peace with that tribe. He subsequently fought at the battle of Whitsett's Mills and at Guilford Court-House. He removed to Kentucky at the end of the war, and here assembled in almost every general expedition against the Indians until the settlement of the country, commanding the advance under Gen. John Hardin, Gen. Charles Scott, and Gen. James Wilkinson. In the expedition under Gen. Anthony Wayne he led a regiment of Kentucky volunteers. He was a delegate to the Virginia legislature in 1789 that passed the act that separated Kentucky from that state, and on the organization of the Kentucky government was annually returned to the legislature till 1808. At that date he was appointed by President Madison colonel of the 7th U.S. infantry. He succeeded Gen. William H. Harrison in command of the frontier of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri in 1811, and therewith entered upon his last and successful campaign against the Pooria Indians in 1812. He served again in the legislature in 1823, and declined a nomination for governor. Russell county, Ky., is named in his honor.

Russell, William, elocutionist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 28 April, 1798: d. in Lancaster, Mass., 17 May, 1855. He was educated in the Latin-school and the university of his native city, and came to this country in 1819, in which year he took charge of Chatham academy, Savannah, Ga. He removed to New Haven a few years later, and taught in the New Township academy and Hopkins grammar-school. He then devoted himself to the instruction of classes in elocution in An- thony, Harrisburg, and Boston, edited the "American Journal of Education" in 1826-7, and subsequently taught in a girls' school in Germantown, Pa. He resumed his elocution classes in Boston and An- dover in 1838, and lectured extensively in New England and New York. He established a teachers' institute in New Hampshire in 1849, which he removed to Lancaster, Mass., in 1851. His superintendence was devoted to lecturing, for the most part before the Massachusetts teachers' institutes, under the care of the state board of education. He published "Grammar of Composition" (New Haven, 1825); "Lessons in Enunciation" (Boston, 1839);
"Rutgers, Henry, patriot, b. in New York city, 7 Oct., 1745; d. there, 17 Feb., 1830. He was graduated at Columbia in 1766, served as a captain in the American army at the battle of White Plains, and subsequently was a colonel of New York militia. During the British occupation of New York city, he was in command of a barrack and hospital. Col. Rutgers was a member of the New York legislature in 1784, and was frequently re-elected. He was the proprietor of land on East river, in the vicinity of Chatham square, and in other parts of the city, and gave sites for streets, schools, churches, and charities. He presided over a meeting that was held on 24 June, 1812, to prepare against an expected attack of the British, and contributed toward defensive works. From 1802 till 1826 he was one of the regents of the State university. He gave $5,000 for the purpose of reviving Queen's college in New Jersey, the name of which was changed to Rutgers college on 5 Dec., 1825. See memoir in "New York Genealogical and Biographical Record," of April, 1886; and "The Rutgers Family of New York," by Ernest H. Crosby (New York, 1886).

RUTER, Martin, clergyman, b. in Charlton, Worcester co., Mass., 3 April, 1785; d. in Washington, Tex., 16 May, 1838. He received a common-school education, studied theology, and in June, 1801, was admitted to the New York conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. He preached in New Hampshire and Montreal, Canada, became an elder at the age of twenty, was stationed at Boston, Mass., Portland, Me., and other places, had charge for a time of New Market academy, and in 1820-8 conducted the Book-concern in Cincinnati, Ohio. When Augusta college, Ky., was established in 1828 he was selected for the presidency, and he held that office until he resigned in order to return to the ministry in 1832. He preached in Pittsburg, Pa., for two years, and then became president of Allegheny college. Obtaining the appointment of superintendent of the mission to Texas, he resigned in July, 1837. He went to the field that he had selected, rode more than 2,000 miles through Texas, organized churches, made arrangements for establishing a college, and laid out the greater part of the city into streets. The fatigue and privations which he endured destroyed his health, and he died after setting out on the homeward journey. He was the first Methodist clergyman in the United States to receive the degree of D. D., which was conferred on him by Transylvania university in 1829. Rutersville, Tex., was named for him, and the college there was founded in his honor. Dr. Ruter published a "Collection of Miscellaneous Pieces": "Explanatory Notes on the Ninth Chapter of Romans"; "Sketch of Calvin's Life and Doctrine"; "Letter on Calvin and Calvinism" (1816); "Hebrew Grammar"; "History of Martyrs"; "Ecclesiastical History," which was long a standard text-book in theological seminaries; and several educational text-books. He left unfinished a "Plea for Africa as a Field for Missionary Labor," and a "Life of Bishop Asbury.

RUTHERFORD, the "Science" in John's New Tranquil. Subsequently I'nuiuoial debater studied at had public command and of proverbial integrity, and won friends by his courteous manners and profuse and elegant hospitality. His portrait is in the capitol at Richmond with the likenesses of other governors and distinguished men of Virginia. At an entertainment at his house Gen. Winfield Scott pronounced his eloque upon Robert E. Lee, saying that "he was a head and shoulders above any man in the army of the United States, and that in case of war on the Canada question he would be worth millions to his country." This expression of opinion had great influence in bringing upon Gen. Lee the command of the state forces at the opening of the civil war. — John's only son, John Coles, b. in Richmond, Va., 29 Nov., 1825; d. at Rock Castle, Giles county, Va., in August, 1866, received a good education, studied one year at Washington college, Va., and was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1842. Subsequently he studied law, and practised with success in Giles and the adjoining counties. At the age of twenty-seven he was elected to the house of delegates, and he represented his county for twelve consecutive years. He was at different times chairman of the most important committees of the house, and was favorably known as a debater and writer. He contributed, under the signature of "Sidney," some able articles to the press; one, on "Banking," published in pamphlet-form, especially gained him literary reputation. He possessed great popularity both as a public man and as a private citizen. He died within the week after his father's death.

RUTHERFORD, Friend Smith, soldier, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 25 Sept., 1820; d. in Alton, Ill., 28 Oct., 1864. He was the son of Daniel Rutherford, of the University of Edinburgh, who is regarded as the discoverer of nitrogen. He studied law in Troy, N. Y., removed to the west, and settled in practice at Alton, Ill. On 30 June, 1862, he was commissioned as captain and commissary of subsistence, but he resigned on 2 Sept. in order to assume the command of the 17th Illinois regiment. He participated in the attack on the Confederate works at Chickasaw Bayou, near Vicksburg, led the assault on Arkansas Post, and served with credit at the capture of Port Gibson and in the final operations against Vicksburg. He subsequently served in Louisiana, and died from exposure and fatigue a week before his commission was issued as brigadier-general of volunteers. His regiment, the 1st Volunteers, commanded by George Valentine, served also in the volunteer army during the civil war, and were both made brigadier-general by brevet on 13 March, 1865.

RUTHERFORD, Griffith, soldier, b. in Ireland about 1761; d. in Tennessee about 1800. He settled in North Carolina, west of Salisbury, and sat in the Provincial congress that met in 1775. He was a member of the council of safety, and was appointed a brigadier-general by the Provincial congress at Halifax on 22 June, 1776. In September, 1776, he marched at the head of 2,400 men into the country of the Cherokees, who with the Tories had been ravaging the frontier settlements, and, in co-operation with a force that had been raised in South Carolina by Col. Andrew Williamson, killed a great number of the Indians, destroyed their crops and habitations, and compelled them to make peace and surrender a part of their lands. He commanded a brigade at the battle of Sanders Creek, near Camden, 16 Aug., 1780, where he was taken prisoner. He was confined at Charleston and afterward at St. Augustine until he was exchanged on 22 June, 1781, when he took the field again, and was in command at Wilmington when the town was evacuated by the British at the close of the war. He served in the North Carolina senate, with intermissions, till 1786. Subsequently he removed to Tennessee, and in September, 1794, on the creation of the separate territory of Tennessee, was appointed president of the legislative council.

RUTHERFORD, John, senator, b. in New York city in September, 1760; d. in Rutherford, N. J., 23 Feb., 1840. His father, Walter, a son of Sir John, of Edgarton, Scotland, served in the British army from the age of seventeen, and, after learning engineering, was attached to the Canadian campaign of Sir Jeffrey Amherst, resigned his commission, married a daughter of James Alexander, and became a citizen of New York. The son was graduated at Princeton in 1776, studied law, was admitted to the bar, married a daughter of Lewis Morris, was elected clerk of the vestry of Trinity church, and had charge of much of the property of that corporation. In 1787, he removed to Tranquility, Sussex county, N. J. He was a member of the legislature of New Jersey, and a presidential elector in 1788, and was twice elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 24 Oct., 1791, till February, 1799, when he resigned to devote his attention to the management of his estate in New Jersey, engaged extensively in agriculture, and was a promoter of public improvements. He was president of the board of proprietors of eastern New Jersey. In 1826 he served on a commission to adjust the boundary between New York and New Jersey, and in 1829 and 1833 was one of a joint commission to settle boundary questions between those states and Pennsylvania. — His grandson, Lewis Morris, physician, b. in Morristania, N. Y., 23 Nov., 1816; d. in Tranquility, N. J., 31 May, 1884. He graduated at Williams in 1834, and studied law. He was admitted to the bar in 1837, and practised as the associate of Peter A. Jay, and, after his death, of Hamilton Fish, in New York city. In 1849 he abandoned the practice of law and thereafter devoted his leisure to science, principally in the direction of astronomical and geophysical analysis. In January, 1863, he published in the "American Journal of Science" a paper on the spectra of stars, the moon, and planets, with diagrams of their lines and a description of the instruments that he used, which was the first published work on star-spectra after the great revelations of RUTLEDGE, John, statesman, b. in Charleston, S.C., in 1739; d. there, 23 July, 1800. He was the eldest son of Dr. John Rutledge, who came to South Carolina from the north of Ireland about 1735, practised medicine in Charleston, and married a lady of fortune, leaving her a widow with seven children at the age of twenty-seven. The son, who was sent to England to study law at the Temple, returned to Charleston in 1761, and acquired a high reputation as an advocate. He was an earnest opponent of the stamp-act when it was discussed in the provincial assembly, and went to the congress at New York in October, 1765, and with his colleague, Christopher Gadsden, boldly advocated colonial union and resistance to oppression. He was a member of the South Carolina convention of 1774, in which he argued in favor of making common cause with Massachusetts, and carried a resolution that South Carolina should take part in the proposed congress, and that her delegates should go unhampered by instructions. He was one of those that were chosen by the planters to represent them in the first Continental congress at Philadelphia. Patrick Henry pronounced him "by far the greatest orator" in that assembly. In 1775 he was again chosen a delegate to congress. He was chairman of the committee that framed a constitution for South Carolina in 1776, and on 27 March was elected president of the new government, and commander-in-chief of the military forces. When the British fleet arrived in Cape Fear river he fortified Charleston, and insisted on retaining the post on Sullivan's island when Gen. Charles Lee proposed its evacuation. During the battle he lost 30 pounds of powder, and directed Col. William Montrie not to retreat without an order from him, adding that he would "sooner cut off his right hand than write one." He was dissatisfied with changes in the constitution, and in March, 1778, resigned his office, but in the following year he was chosen governor again by an almost unanimous vote of the legislature, superseding Rawlins Lowndes. He was clothed with dictatorial powers, and prepared to repel the British invasion. When Gen. Augustine Prevost advanced upon Charleston in May, 1779, the city was defenceless, Gen. Benjamin Lincoln with the Continental troops being 150 miles away. The latter hastened to the succor of Charleston by forced marches, and state troops were gathered for the besieging force. It was proposed by the governor's council that the British should retire, on condition that South Carolina should remain neutral during the rest of the war, and that her fate should be determined by the issue of the conflict. This measure, which the historian Ramsay thinks was a ruse, devised for the purpose of gaining time, was favored by Rutledge, but opposed by Gadsden, the younger Greene, and the patriots. On Lincoln's approach, the enemy retreated, and Rutledge, at the head of the militia, took the field against the invaders.
Rutledge was born in Charleston, South Carolina, on January 3, 1749. He attended the College of William and Mary, and then transferred to the University of Edinburgh, where he received his law degree. He returned to South Carolina and was admitted to the bar in 1766.

Rutledge was elected to the South Carolina House of Representatives in 1775 and served as its Speaker from 1784 to 1788. He also served as a delegate to the Continental Congress from 1783 to 1785, and then again from 1786 to 1788.

In 1787, Rutledge helped to draft the Constitution of the United States and signed it at the Constitutional Convention. He was appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States in 1789 by President John Adams.

Rutledge died on January 21, 1819, in New York City. He was buried in the Christ Churchyard in Charleston, South Carolina.
structios to the Navigation of Hudson’s River” (Albany, 1869); “History of the Flags of the Volunteer Regiments of the State of New York” (1865); “History of the Indian Tribes of Hudson’s River” (1867); and a “History of Orange County” (1875).

RUXTON, Frederick Augustus, English traveller, b. in Kent, England, in 1820; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 29 Sept., 1848. He was educated at Sandhurst military college, which he left at the age of seventeen, and volunteered in the Spanish service during the Carlist war of 1833–9. He was commissioned as a lieutenant in the British army after returning home, went with his regiment to Canada, resigned soon afterwards, and spent several years among the Indians and trappers of the west. He subsequently travelled in Africa, and just before the Mexican war made a tour through all the provinces of Mexico, and spent the following winter in the region of the Rocky mountains, returning to England in August, 1847. He set out on a second trip to the far west, but died on the way. He was the author of “Adventures in Mexico and the Rocky Mountains” (London, 1847), “Life in the Far West” (1849); a pamphlet on the Oregon question, and papers in the “Transactions” of the British ethnological society.

RUZ, Joaquin (rooth), Mexican linguist, b. in Merida in 1772; d. there, 15 Sept., 1830. He entered the order of St. Francis in his native city, and in 1804, after the conclusion of his order in 1809, was graduated there, and in 1810 became a priest. He was immediately assigned to the missions of the Maya Indians, of whose language he possessed a thorough knowledge. Besides numerous religious works, he wrote in the Maya language “Catecismo historico y Doctrina Cristiana” (Merida, 1822); “Gramatica Yucateca” (1831), “Historia y Geografia de Yucatan, Maya, para la enseñanza de los niños indigenas” (1845); “Analisis del idioma Yucateco” (1851); and “Leti u íchich Evangelio Jesucristo hebix San Lucas,” edited by W. M. Watts (London, 1855).

RYAN, Abraham Joseph, poet, b. in Norfolk, Va., 15 Aug., 1839; d. in Louisville, Ky., 23 April, 1866. At an early age he decided on entering the Roman Catholic church, and after the usual classical and theological studies, he was ordained, and shortly afterward became a chaplain in the Confederate army, serving until the close of the war. He wrote “The Conquered Banner” soon after Lee’s surrender. In 1865 he removed to New Orleans, where, in addition to his clerical duties, he edited the “Star,” a weekly Roman Catholic paper. From New Orleans he went to Knoxville, Tenn., after a few months to Augusta, Ga., and founded the “Banner of the South,” a religious and political weekly. This he soon relinquished, and for several years was pastor of St. Mary’s church, Mobile, Ala., but in 1880 his old restlessness returned, and he went to the north for the twofold object of publishing his poems and lecturing. He spent the month of December in Baltimore, where his “Poems, Patriotic, Religious, and Miscellaneous,” were published. There also, about the same time, he delivered his first lecture, the subject being “Some Aspects of Modern Civilization.” During this visit he made his home at Lovola college, and in return for the hospitality of the Jesuit fathers he gave poems and reading from his poems, and devoted the proceeds, $300, to found a medal for poetry at the college. His lecturing tour was not successful, and in a few months he returned to the south, where he continued to lead the same restless mode of life. Father Ryan was engaged on a “Life of Christ” at the time of his death. His most popular poems, besides that mentioned above, are “The Lost Cause,” “The Sword of Lee,” “The Flag of Erin,” and the epic “Their Story runneth Thus.”

RYAN, Edward George, jurist, b. at Newcastle House, County Meath, Ireland, 13 Nov., 1810; d. in Milwaukee, Wis., 19 Oct., 1880. He had been intended for the priesthood, but began the study of law, came to the United States in 1830, and subsequently was a member of the Episcopal church. He taught and continued his law studies in New York, was admitted to the bar in 1836, and in 1839 removed to Chicago, where he edited a paper called the “Tribune” from 1839 till its discontinuance in 1841. He went to Racine, Wis., in 1843, and to Milwaukee in 1848, and became one of the most powerful advocates at the Wisconsin bar. Among the cases in which he won reputation were the impeachment trial of Judge Levi Hubbell in 1853, the Joshua Glover fugitive slave case in 1854, and the case of Bashford vs. Barstow in 1856 to determine the title to the office of governor of the state, in which Coles Bashford, Mr. Ryan’s client, was successful. He was a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1846, and to the Democratic national convention in 1848. In 1862 Mr. Ryan, as chairman of a committee of the Democratic state convention, drew up an address to the state, which was adopted as the “Ryan Address.” He was city attorney of Milwaukee in 1870–2, and on 17 June, 1874, was appointed chief justice of the state to fill a vacancy. He was elected to the office in the following April, and served until his death.

RYAN, George Parker, naval officer, b. in Boston, Mass., 8 May, 1815; d. at sea, 24 Nov., 1855. He entered the navy 30 Sept., 1837, and graduated at the naval academy second in his class in 1860. He was commissioned lieutenant, 16 July, 1862, and was navigator of the steamer “Sacroamento” on special service in charge of the “Alabama” and “Florida” in 1862–4. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1866, and attached to the U. S. naval academy as assistant professor of astronomy and navigation in 1866–9. He was again on duty at the naval academy in 1871–4, and was promoted to commander, 3 Oct., 1874. He organized parties for the observation of the transit of Venus in 1874, and was selected to take charge of the expedition to Kerguelen islands. He was ordered to take command of the iron steamer “Huron” in 1876, and on 23 Nov., 1877, he sailed for Havana. The vessel was wrecked on Body island, N. C., and Ryan, with most of his officers and crew, was drowned. At the time of his death he was one of the most scientific navigators of the service.

RYAN, James, R. C. bishop, b. in Thurles, County Tipperary, Ireland, in 1849. He came to the United States when nineteen, and received his theological education in the seminaries of St. Thomas and St. Joseph, Bardstown, Ky. He was subsequently professor in St. Joseph’s seminary. After his ordination he was on the Kentucky mission for seven years, principally at St. Martin’s, Meade co., and at Elizabethtown, Hardin co. He removed to the Peoria diocese in Illinois in 1879, and was appointed its Episcopal see by Pope Pius, and was afterward transferred to Danville, and in 1881 he was made rector of Ottawa, where his administration was very successful. In 1888 he was nominated to the bishopric of Alton.

RYAN, Patrick John, R. C. archbishop, b. in Clonarcy, near Thurles, Ireland, 20 Feb., 1831. He was educated at Thurles and Dublin, and entered Carlow college, with a view of preparing himself for the American mission. He was ordained deacon in 1853, and set out the same year for St. Louis, Mo., where he finished his ecclesiastical studies in Carondelet seminary, and was raised to the priest-hood in 1854. He rose to be vicar-general, on 15 Feb., 1872, was elected coadjutor archbishop of St. Louis, and consecrated under the title of bishop of Tarczima on 14 April. Owing to the great age of Archbishop Ken-rick, most of the work of governing the diocese fell to his share, and his administration was energetic and successful. He was nominated archbishop of Philadelphia on 8 June, 1884. Bishop Ryan was one of the prelates that were selected in 1883 to represent the interests of the Roman Catholics of the United States in Rome. He was present at the third plenary council of Bologna in 1852, at which the opening discourse, "The Church in her Councils," was pronounced by him. He went to Rome again in 1887 on business connected with the plan of establishing a Catholic university in Washington. He has published lectures on "What Catholics do not Believe" (St. Louis, 1875) and "Some of the Causes of Modern Religious Skepti-cism" (1888).

RYAN, Stephen Vincent, R. C., bishop, b. near Almonte, Canada, 1 Jan., 1825; d. in Buffalo, 10 April, 1896. His parents settled in Pottsville, and he entered St. Charles's seminary, Philadelphia, in 1840, and in 1844 became a member of the Lazarist order. After studying theology in the Seminary of St. Mary's of the Barrens, he was ordained a priest in St. Louis on 24 June, 1849, and immediately held professorships in St. Mary's and Cape Girardeau colleges. He was afterward president of the College of St. Vincent, and in 1857 was elected visitor of the Lazarist order throughout the United States. He was instrumental in establishing the mother-house and novitiate of the community at Germantown, and transferred his residence thither from St. Louis. In 1868 he was nominated to the bishopric of Buffalo, and consecrated on 8 Nov. Bishop Ryan had frequently been called to important missions abroad.

RYAN, William Albert Charles, soldier, b. in Toronto, Canada, 28 March, 1843; d. in Santiago, Cuba, 4 Nov., 1853. He was educated in Buffalo, N.Y., and at the beginning of the war, enlisted in the New York volunteers, serving through the war, and rising to the rank of captain. He volunteered in the service of the Cuban junta in 1869, and when Thomas Jordan was made commander-in-chief of the revolutionary army became his chief of staff and inspector-general. He displayed bravery and military skill in conflicts with the Spanish troops, and several times returned to the United States to recruit new forces for carrying on the insurrection. His last expedition was in the "Virginia," which was captured by the Spanish man-of-war "Tornado" on 31 Oct., 1873, seven days after leaving the port of Kingston, Jamaica, and taken into Santiago. The passengers and crew were tried by court-martial, and all were condemned to death as pirates. After the sentence had been executed on Gen. Ryan and fifty-one others, the massacre was arrested through the interference of the captain of a British war vessel, and the surviving prisoners were subsequently released on the demand of the U.S. government.

RYAN, William Redmond, author, b. in England. He had resided for many years in the United States, when in 1847 he joined a body of U. S. volunteers, and went with them to California. On their arrival they were disbanded, and Ryan engaged in gold-mining till his return late in 1849. He published "Personal Adventures in California" (2 vols., London, 1850), which was illustrated from his own drawings, and contains many interesting details of early pioneer life in California.

RYAN, William Thomas, Canadian author, b. in Toronto, 3 Feb., 1839. He was educated at St. Michael's college, Toronto, and, entering the army, served during the Crimean war, and subsequently in the 100th royal Canadian regiment. On leaving the army he devoted himself to journalism and literature. He edited "The Volunteer Review," published at Ottawa, "The Evening Mail," of which he was proprietor, the "Daily Free Press" at Ottawa, and the "Daily Sun," and is now (1898) editor of the Montreal "Daily Post" and the "True Witness." He has contributed poems and articles to various magazines, and has been active as a political speaker on the Liberal side. He is known as an author under the name of Carroll Ryan, which he took in 1855. He has published "Oscar, and other Poems" (Hamilton, 1867); "Songs of a Wanderer" (Ottawa, 1885); "The Canadian Northwest, and the Canadian Pacific Railway" (London, 1889); and "Poems," with his wife, Mary Ann MacIver, whom he married in 1870, has published "Poems" (Ottawa, 1879).

RYDER, Albert Pinkham, artist, b. in New Bedford, Mass., 19 March, 1847. He studied art under William E. Marshall and at the Academy of design, where he began to exhibit in 1875. In 1877, 1882, and 1887 he went abroad, visiting London and Paris, and during the latter year was in Italy, France, and Germany. His paintings are notable rather for color and effect than for form, and he might be classed as a representative of the impressionistic school in this country. Among his works are "Wandering Cow," "Curfew Hour," "Pegasus," "Farm-Yard," "The Waste of Waters is their Field" (1884), "Little Man on the Acre" (1886), "Temple of the Mind," and "Phantom Ship." post, in which he remained till 1851. He was a popular lecturer and preacher, and published occasional addresses and sermons.

RYDER, Platt Powell, artist, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 June, 1831; d. 16 July, 1896. He studied under Léon Bonnat in Paris in 1869-70. Among his genre paintings are "Life's Evening," "Spinning," and "An Interior" (1870); of the latter were done for the "Reading the Cup" (1882); "Welcome Step" (1883); "Clean Shave," "Washing-Day," and "Bill of Fare" (1884); "Fireside" (1885); and "Watching and Waiting" (1886). He was elected an associate of the National Academy in 1868, and was also a founder of the Brooklyn academy of design.

RYDER, William Henry, clergyman, b. in Provincetown, Mass., 13 July, 1822; d. in Chicago, Ill., 8 March, 1888. He received no collegiate education, but at nineteen years of age began to preach the doctrine of universal salvation. At twenty-one he was pastor of the 1st Universalist society in Concord, N. H., and he subsequently preached at Nashua two years, after which he travelled two years in Europe and the Holy Land. On his return home, he entered the Universalist church in Roxbury, Mass., where he remained ten years. He resigned this post to accept a call to St. Paul's church, Chicago, in 1869. Lombard University gave him the degree of D. D. in 1863. Dr. Ryder bequeathed more than half a million dollars to charitable, educational, and religious institutions. Among the bequests is one that provides for free annual lectures, to be under the control of the pastors of the 1st Universalist, 1st Presbyterian, and 1st Congregational churches and the mayor of Chicago "in aid of the moral and social welfare of the citizens of Chicago, upon an anti-sectarian basis."

RYERSON, Adolphus Ezercton, Canadian educator, b. in Charlotteville, Upper Canada, 24 March, 1803; d. in Toronto, 19 Feb., 1882. His father, Joseph (1759-1834), was an American loyalist from New Jersey. The son received a classical education, and in 1829 founded the "Christian Guardian," of which he was appointed associate editor. He was chosen the first president of Victoria college in 1841, and in 1844 was appointed superintendent of education for Upper Canada. In 1846 he induced the legislature to pass a school act that he had drafted, and was appointed by the act an elaborate report on methods of education (Montreal, 1847). He drafted the bill, in 1850, under which the public schools of Ontario are still maintained. In 1855 he founded meteorological stations in connection with county grammar-schools, and in 1860 drafted a bill for the further development of the system of public instruction. In 1876 he resigned. He received the degree of D. D. from Trond Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn., in 1842, and that of L.L.D. from Victoria college in 1866. Dr. Ryerson published "Letters in Defence of Our School System" (Toronto, 1859) and "The Loyalties of America and their Times—1629-1861." (1890), "The Story of My Life," an autobiography, which he left unfinished at his death, was compiled and published by John George Hodgins (1883).

RYERSON, John, Canadian clergyman, b. in Norfolk, Ont., 12 June, 1800; d. in Simcoe, Ont., 5 Oct., 1878. He received a fair education, became a Wesleyan preacher at the age of eighteen, and aided in founding many institutions of the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1854 the Canadian government offered to pay the expenses of direction and maintenance of the missions of the London Wesleyan committee in the Northwest territory, sent Mr. Ryerson to explore the field. He travelled nearly 3,000 miles in the yacht of the Hudson bay company and in bark canoes, and, before returning, went to England and arranged for the transfer of the missions. His journey is described in "Hudson's Bay, or a Missionary Tour in the Territory of the Hon. Hudson's Bay Company" (Toronto, 1855).

RYERSON, Martin, benefactor, b. in Paterson, N. J., 6 May, 1803; d. in Chicago, Ill., 6 July, 1882. His early educational advantages were limited. At sixteen years of age he left home alone, and in Detroit found employment with a fur-dealer. In 1836 he went to Muskegon, Mich., and, while trading with the Indians, learned to speak the Ottawa and Chippewa languages. In 1841 he embarked in the lumber business on a limited scale, and in 1851 he established a yard at Chicago, by which his business was greatly increased, and he became wealthy. Mr. Ryerson gave freely to charitable institutions and public enterprises, and, as a token of his friendship and appreciation of Indian character, he erected in Lincoln park, Chicago, a bronze group in memory of the Ottawa nation, of which tribe his wife was a member. He expressed a wish to his son that the latter should value that at $225,000, should be forever set apart and distributed equally among eight charitable institutions of Chicago. The family have placed the property in trust for this purpose.

RYLANC, Joseph Hine, clergyman, b. near Manchester, England, 16 June, 1826. He was graduated at King's college, London, in 1841, and, after officiating as a curate in London for two years, came to the United States in 1843, and became rector of St. Paul's church, Cleveland, Ohio. In 1867-71 he was rector of St. James' church, Chicago, Ill., and since 1871 he has been rector of St. Mark's church, New York city. He received the degree of D. D. from Western Reserve college in 1867. Dr. Rylance belongs to the school of Christian nationalists. He is the author of "Preachers and Preaching" (London, 1882); "Essays on Miracles" (New York, 1874); "Social Questions: Lectures on Competition, Communism, Co-operation, and Christianity and Socialism" (New York, 1888); and Pulpit Talks on Topics of the Time" (1881).

RYLAND, Robert, clergyman, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 14 March, 1805. He was graduated at Princeton college, after which he studied at Yale divinity school in 1826, ordained to the Christian ministry in 1827, and in 1827-32 was pastor of the Baptist church in Lynchburg, Va. In 1832 he took charge of the Manual-labor school in Richmond, and when that school was chartered in 1844 as Richmond college he was made its president, serving until 1866. For twenty-five years he acted as pastor of the 1st African Baptist church of Richmond, during which time he baptized into its fellowship nearly 4,000 persons. In 1868 he removed to Kentucky, where he has been engaged in the work of teaching and preaching. Dr. Ryland has been a friend of the colored people, and a promoter of higher education.

RYLE, John, manufacturer, b. in Bolingbroke, near Macclesfield, England, 22 Oct., 1817; d. in Macclesfield, England, 6 Nov., 1887. He was born in the silk-mills of Macclesfield when but five years of age, and, having become an expert weaver and thrower, emigrated to the United States in 1839, and was engaged to establish a silk-factory at Paterson, N. J., of which he became owner in 1846. He was the first to carry on this business with success in the United States. At first the production was limited to two- and three-shilling silks. He tried weaving in 1846, and again in 1850-60, but was not able to make the manufacture of broad silks remunerative until after the civil war.
SA. Estacio de (sah), Portuguese soldier, b. in Alentejo about 1590; d. in Rio Janeiro, 20 Feb., 1667. He was a nephew of Men de Sa (q. v.). During the struggle between the French and Portuguese in Brazil the Portuguese government sent Estacio de Sa, with two galleons but few soldiers, to expel the invaders. He arrived at Bahia in 1564, and, after waiting several months to organize a sufficient force, left in 1565 for Rio Janeiro, but, on examining the fortifications, became convinced of his inferiority. He then sailed for Santos, where he remained one year organizing militia and awaiting re-enforcements, and in January, 1566, sailed again for the Bay of Rio Janeiro. On 1 March he came to anchor at the bar and landed his force, fortifying himself between the Pao d'Assucar and the Morro São João, where he laid the foundations of the future city of Rio Janeiro. The governor-general, being informed by Jesuits of the critical condition of his nephew, sent an expedition to his aid. Estacio de Sa began operations immediately by attacking the fortifications, which were taken after an obstinate battle, in which Sa was wounded. The French were completely routed and obliged to retire in their ships to Europe, but Sa died a few days afterward of his wound, and was buried in the church of São Sebastião, on the hill afterward called Morro do Castelo.

SA. Salvador Correa de, Brazilian governor, b. in Rio Janeiro in 1594; d. in Lisbon, 1 Jan., 1688. He was a grandson of the first governor of Rio Janeiro after its separation from Bahia in 1543, and his father, Martin de Sa, also held that office after it became a dependency of the governor-general of Bahia till 1609. Young Salvador entered the public service in 1612, protecting a convoy of thirty vessels from Pernambuco to Europe against Dutch privateers. He was afterward sent to Brazil to prepare an auxiliary force of 500 men and three armed ships to assist the fleet that had been sent under Padre de Toledo against the Dutch invaders, and, after saving the province of Espírito Santo from an attack by Dutch corsairs, he aided in the recapture of Bahia in 1625. He returned in 1632 to Lisbon, but was sent in 1634 as admiral of the south to suppress a rebellion of the Calequi Indians in Paraguay, whom he defeated in 1635. He was appointed captain-general of Rio Janeiro in 1637, and as such recognized in 1640 the Prince of Braganza as king John IV., and, when the Jesuits of the south refused to acknowledge the new sovereign, Sa left his uncle, Duarte Correa, in charge of the government, and sailed on 29 March for São Paulo, where he soon restored order. In March, 1644, he was appointed general of the fleet, to protect the Brazilian coast against the Dutch, and co-operated with João Fernandes Vieira in the capture of Recife. He was appointed in 1645 to establish a government in Angola, and sailed on 12 May for Africa, finishing the conquest of the Congo kingdom by the capitulation of Port São Miguel, 15 Aug., 1648. In 1658 he was again appointed governor of southern Brazil, and took charge in September, 1659, but, after quelling an insurrection in Niágara in October, 1660, he handed the government over to his successor in June of that year, and sailed for Lisbon. When Alphonso VI. was deposed, 23 Sept., 1667, Sa, whose son had been the favorite of that monarch, was banished to Africa for ten years; but, resolving to finish his days in a Jesuit convent, he obtained, by the influence of the general of the order, permission to live in retirement in his palace of Lisbon, where he died nearly a centenarian.

SA. Simão Pereira de, Brazilian author, b. in Rio Janeiro in 1701; d. there about 1769. He studied in the Jesuit college, and was afterward admitted into the order. He was graduated in theology and canonical law at Coimbra university, and by his learning became one of the most celebrated members of his order. He wrote much, and among the chief of his productions that have been preserved are "Ensai topográfico e militar sobre a Colônia do Sacramento" (Rio Janeiro, 1760), and "Descrição chronológica da diocese de Rio Janeiro" (1765).

SAAVEDRA, Cornelio (sah-vay-dro), Argentinian soldier, b. in Potosí, Bolivia, in 1790; d. in Buenos Ayres in 1829. In 1797 his family removed to Buenos Ayres, where he obtained his education. He filled different posts under the Spanish government, and on 6 Sept., 1806, was appointed chief of a battalion. When Montevideo was taken by the English troops, 2 Feb., 1807, Limiers marched with a division of 2,500 volunteers to protect the city, and Saaavedra took part in the expedition at the head of one of the companies. He was granted possession of all the arms and ammunition of Colonia, and carried them to Buenos Ayres. On 5 July, 1807, he took an active part in the reconquest of the latter city, at the head of his battalion. On 25 May, 1810, after the revolution, of which he was one of the chiefs, he was appointed president of the governing junta. Against the advice of Mariano Moreno (q. v.) he abandoned his seat in the junta, and, in December, 1810, joined the patriots under Bolívar in the campaign to retake the city, and was proclaimed an active and brave patriot, and his fame was attributed to his martial spirit and good sense. He was appointed commander in chief of the soldier, which place he occupied till 1818. He served in the Argentine army till 1821, when he retired with his family to a country-seat.

SAAVEDRA, Hernando Arias de, Spanish soldier, b. in Asuncion, Paraguay, in 1596; d. there about 1625. He was a son of one of the officers that accompanied Oszeba de Vaca, and at an early age entered a military career, taking part in many engagements against the Indians. For his services he was made governor of Asuncion, which post he held three different times, being the first native to obtain such an office. In one of his expeditions he advanced 200 leagues to the south of Buenos Ayres, and was taken prisoner by the Indians, but escaped and returned to Asuncion. Afterward he invaded the Chaco, and explored the borders of Parana and Uruguay rivers. He gained most renown by the two reforms that he promoted, of which the first was the suppression of the encomiendas or system of personal slavery, which would have resulted in the destruction of the native race.
This reform was approved by King Philip II, and in consequence, in 1609, the Jesuits Mazaeta and Cataldini were sent to found the missions of Paraguay. The second reform was the division of the Rio de la Plata into two different governments, Buenos Ayres and Paraguay, which was decreed in 1617, and effected in 1620.

SAAVEDRA Juan de, Spanish soldier, b. in Seville, Spain, about the end of the 15th century; d. in Chuquisaca, Peru, 21 May, 1554. He went to Peru in 1534 as chief judge of the expedition of Pedro de Alvarado, but after his arrival entered the service of Diego de Almagro, whom he accompanied in the discovery and conquest of Chili in 1535-40. On the latter year he founded the city of Valparaiso, and, on his return to Peru, he took part in the battle of Atamace, 12 July, 1537. He acted on behalf of Almagro as commissioner in the negotiations of Maua about the boundaries of New Toledo, but was not present at the battle of Salinas, 6 April, 1538, on account of illness. Although he always refused the offers of the brothers Pizarro during Almagro's life, after Almagro's death Saavedra accompanied his son Juan de Rada (q. e.) to Lima, and took no part in the battle of Chupas. In 1544, when Gonzalo Pizarro rose in rebellion, he appointed Saavedra his substitute at Huanuco. President Gacas in 1547 induced Saavedra to re-enter the Loyalist party, appointing him captain of cavalry, which corps he commanded in the battle of Aquaquagua. In 1548, Gacas appointed him governor of Cuzco, but in 1551 he was superseded by the audiencia of Lima. In 1554 the city of Cuzco sent him with the rank of captain to join the army of Alonso de Alvarado, operating against the rebellions Francisco Giron (q. e.), and he met his death at the battle of Chuquisaca.

SAAVEDRA GUZMAN, Antonio, Mexican poet, b. in Mexico about 1839; d. in Spain about 1860. He was a son of one of the conquerors of Mexico, and married a granddaughter of Jorge de Alvarado, brother of the founder of the Spanish dominion in Central America. His favorite studies were poetry and history, especially that of his native country, in which he was aided by his thorough knowledge of the Aztec language. The historical data that he accumulated during his years in Mexico, and held the office of deputy collector of the customs, but returned to Massachusetts in 1849, and was appointed in 1852 a secret and confidential agent of the U. S. treasury department, with reference to the operation of the Ashburton treaty as connected with our commerce with British colonies. He was elected to Congress as a Whig in place of Benjamin Thompson, serving from 25 Dec. 1853, till 3 March 1857. He was appointed secretary of the Boston board of trade. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Bowdoin in 1846, and by Harvard in 1848. He contributed to the "North American Review" and "Christian Examiner," and was the author of the life of Com. Edward Preble (1847) in Sparks's "American Biography." "The American Loyalists, or Biographical Sketches of Adherents to the British Crown in the War of the Revolution" (Boston, 1847; 2d ed., 1856); "Report on the Principal Fisheries of the American Seas," prepared for the U. S. treasury department (Washington, 1853); "Notes on Fishing and Fishing," with a Preliminary Historical Essay (Boston, 1855; 2d ed., 1856); and an address before the New England historic-genealogical society, 13 Sept., 1858, on the "Hundredth Anniversary of the Death of Major-General James Wolfe.

SABIN, Dwight May, senator, b. in Marseilles, La Salle co., Ill., 35 April, 1844. His early years were spent on a farm, and in 1857 the family removed to Connecticut. He was educated at Phillips Andover academy, which he left in 1863 to enter the Normal School; but he resigned after three months, owing to impaired health, and procured a clerkship in Washington, D. C. In 1864 he entered on farming and the lumber business in Connecticut, and in 1868 he removed to Stillwater, Minn., where he engaged in lumbering and manufacturing. Mr. Sabin now (1898) owns a large number of acres near the city, and is one of the largest stockholder in the Northwestern car company, having acquired a fortune. He served in the state senate in 1870-71, was a member of the National Republican conventions of 1873, 1876, 1880, and 1884, serving as chairman of the last, and was elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican, to succeed William Weldon, for the period that terminated on 4 March, 1889.

SABIN, Elijah Robinson, clergyman, b. in Tolland, Conn., 10 Sept., 1795; d. in Augusta, Ga., 4 May, 1870. His name being written Sabine, Sabine, and Sabon, came to this country in 1643, and held local offices in Rehoboth, Mass., and his father, Nehemiah, served in the Revolutionary war, and was fatally wounded at Trenton. In 1784 his family removed to Vermont, and the son was employed in clearing land, educating himself in leisure hours. In 1789 he began to preach, and in 1795 he succeeded the deceased pastor of a Methodist Episcopal ministry. He was appointed presiding elder of the Vermont district in 1805, and subsequently of the New London district, embracing Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and a part of New Hampshire. He was appointed chaplain of the Massachusetts house of representatives, being the first of his denomination to hold this office, and afterward became pastor of a Methodist church in Hampden, Mass. He assisted in the military hospital there, and, after the enemy took possession of the town, was taken prisoner and confined in a transport. His wife mounted a horse, rode nine miles to the British commander, and obtained his release on the plea that he was a non-combatant. In 1815 he resumed his charge in Hampden. He did while travelling in the East, for three successive years in 1827, 1828, and 1829, the son Sabin was the author of the "Road to Happiness," and Charles Observa- tor,—His son, Lorenzo (Sabine), historian, b. in New Lisbon, N. J., 28 Feb., 1803; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 April, 1877, adopted Sabine as the spelling of his surname. He was self-educated, and was employed in various capacities. He was elected to the legislature from Eastport for two terms, and held the office of deputy collector of the customs, but returned to Massachusetts in 1849, and was appointed in 1852 a secret and confidential agent of the U. S. treasury department, with reference to the operation of the Ashburton treaty as connected with our commerce with British colonies. He was elected to Congress as a Whig in place of Benjamin Thompson, serving from 25 Dec. 1853, till 3 March 1857. He was appointed secretary of the Boston board of trade. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Bowdoin in 1846, and by Harvard in 1848. He contributed to the "North American Review" and "Christian Examiner," and was the author of the life of Com. Edward Preble (1847) in Sparks's "American Biography." "The American Loyalists, or Biographical Sketches of Adherents to the British Crown in the War of the Revolution" (Boston, 1847; 2d ed., 1856); "Report on the Principal Fisheries of the American Seas," prepared for the U. S. treasury department (Washington, 1853); "Notes on Fishing and Fishing," with a Preliminary Historical Essay (Boston, 1855; 2d ed., 1856); and an address before the New England historic-genealogical society, 13 Sept., 1858, on the "Hundredth Anniversary of the Death of Major-General James Wolfe."
SABINE

May, 1836 he settled in New York city, and in 1836 he went to Philadelphia and sold old and rare books, but at the beginning of the civil war he returned to New York and opened book-shops, where he made a specialty of collecting rare books and prints. His knowledge of bibliography was extended, and he often travelled long distances to secure unique volumes, crossing the ocean as many as twenty-five times for this purpose. Two of his sons became associated with him in business, and two others were proprietors of a similar enterprise in London. He prepared catalogues of many valuable libraries that were sold by auction in New York after 1850, among which were those of Dr. Samuel F. Jarvis (1851), William E. Burton (1861), Edwin Forrest (1865), John Allan (1864), and Thomas W. Fields (1875). He also sold the collection of William Menzies (1875). Mr. Sabin republished in limited editions on large paper several curious old works of American history, edited and published for several years from 1869 "The American Bibliopolist: A Literary Register and Monthly Catalogue of Old and New Books," contributed to the "American Publishers' Circular," and undertook the publication in parts of a "Description of Books Made from Discovery to the Present Time," of which thirteen volumes were issued, and upon which he was engaged at the time of his death.

SABINE, Sir Edward, British soldier, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 14 Oct., 1788; d. in Richmond, England, 26 June, 1893. After receiving a military education, he entered the royal artillery as 2d lieutenant in 1803, became a captain in 1814, and served in the war with the United States, commanding the batteries in the siege of Fort Erie in 1814. He was appointed astronomer in the first arctic expedition under Sir John Ross in 1818, and accompanied Sir William Edward Parry's expedition of 1819-20 in the same capacity, making important researches in terrestrial magnetism. In 1821-25 he made a series of voyages ranging from the equator to the Arctic circle in quest of data concerning the variations of the magnetic needle, and conducted pendulum experiments, thus laying the basis for an accurate determination of the figure of the earth. His discoveries led to the establishment of magnetic observatories in Great Britain and the United States, and the establishment of the Cape of Good Hope, Hobart Town, St. Helena, and Toronto. In 1818 he became a fellow of the Royal society, of which he was vice-president from 1850 till 1861, and president from 1861 till 1871. He was made a knight of the Bath in 1809 and a general in 1870. During one voyage he edited the "North Georgia Gazette and Winter Chronicle," a periodical written by the officers on the "Heela" in 1819-20, which was republished (London, 1822). He also aided in the preparation of a "Natural History" (1824), which was appended to Parry's "First Arctic Voyage" (1821), and was the author of "An Account of Experiments to determine the "Power of the Earth" (1825); "The Variability of the Intensity of Magnetism upon Many Parts of the Globe" (1838); and numerous memoirs and scientific papers. He was engaged in scientific work until his death, and, with his wife as assistant, prepared reduction tables and charts of all the observations that have been made in terrestrial magnetism. In 1876-77, while serving as a soldier, b. in Capo Vincent, X. Y., 14 April, 1822; d. in Washington, D. C., 8 March, 1885. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1845, assigned to the 2d dragoons, and served in the Mexican war, being brevetted 1st lieutenant, 9 May, 1846, for gallant and meritorious conduct at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, Tex. On 30 June, 1846, he became 2d lieutenant, and he was made 1st lieutenant on 27 Dec., 1848. He was engaged in scouting in 1850, and was assistant instructor of cavalry tactics in the U.S. military academy from 10 Dec., 1850, till 16 April, 1855. On 8 March, 1853, he became captain of 1st cavalry. He was a member of the board to revise the army regulations in Washington in 1856-7, served on frontier duty, and took part in the Kansas disturbances in 1856-7, and on the Utah and Cheyenne expedition in 1858. He was appointed major of 1st cavalry on 31 Jan., 1861, lieutenant-colonel of 2d cavalry on 3 May, 1861, and inspector-general on 1 Oct., 1861. Joining the Army of the Potomac, he served on the staff of the commanding general in the Virginia peninsula and in the Maryland and Rappahannock campaigns, participating in the chief engagements. He was in charge of the inspector-general's office in Washington, D. C., from 10 Jan. till 26 May, 1863, and afterward a member of the board to organize invalid corps and treat for retiring disabled officers. From 1 April, 1864, till August, 1865, he was on inspection duty in the departments of the Tennessee, Cumberland, Arkansas, and New Mexico. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general for gallant and meritorious service in the field and during the civil war. After the war he was inspector-general of the Department of the Tennessee and of the divisions of the Atlantic and the Missouri. On the retirement of Gen. Ranald M. Mackay on 2 Jan., 1881, he became senior inspector-general of the army with the rank of brigadier-general.

SACKETT, William Augustus, congressman, b. in Aurelius, Cayuga co., N. Y., 18 Nov., 1812; d. 6 Sept., 1895. His ancestors came from England in 1635, settled in Massachusetts, and continued to live in New England until 1804, when his father moved to Cayuga county, N. Y. He received an academic education, studied law in Seneca Falls and Skaneateles, was admitted to the bar in 1834, and soon secured a lucrative practice. Elected to congress as a Whig, he served from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1853. He took part in the controversy in relation to the admission of California as a free state, and both spoke and voted for admission. He earnestly opposed the fugitive-slave law, and was uncompromisingly in opposition to slavery and the admission of any more slave states. From the committee on claims he made a report on the power of consuls, which had an influence in the final modification of those powers. He removed to Saratoga Springs in 1857, making his home there and travelled extensively in Europe, Egypt, and the Holy Land, and wrote letters describing his journeys that were published. He had been a Republican since the organization of the party, and had been active as a public speaker.
—His son, William, was colonel of the 9th New York cavalry, and was fatally wounded while leading a charge under Sheridan at Trevilian Station.

SACO, José Antonio (sah-ko), Cuban publicist, b. in Bayamo, Cuba, 21 Dec., 1837; d. in Madrid, Spain, in 1879. He finished his education in Havana, where, in 1852, he obtained the professorship of philosophy in the Seminary of San Carlos. From 1854 till 1856 he travelled in the United States, and in 1857 he returned to New York, where he devoted himself to literary labors. He translated into Spanish, from the Latin, the celebrated work of Heineius on Roman law, and translated several剧 works by German authors. In 1863 he published in Madrid "Paralelo entre Cuba y algunas colonias inglesas" (1863). He made afterward an extensive tour in the European continent, and in 1874 fixed his residence in Paris, where he published "Supresión del tráfico de esclavos en Cuba" (1845), which brought upon him the wrath of the slave-holders, and diminished his chances of being allotted to return to Cuba as one of the delegates sent to Madrid to advocate political reforms for the island, and in 1875 was again elected by the same city to the Spanish Cortes. Saco was a voluminous writer. During the last years of his life he began the publication of his great work "Historia de la esclavitud desde los tiempos más remotos" (Paris, 1876-78), one of the most exhaustive works on the slave-trade which has been written, and two volumes were published before his death. It has been translated into various European languages. Other works of Saco are "Historia de la esclavitud entre los Indios," and numerous articles and essays on a diversity of subjects, which have been collected under the title of "Colección de papeles varios" (Havana, 1882).

SADTLER, Mary Anne (Madden), author, b. in Coatehill, County Cavan, Ireland, 31 Dec., 1820. After receiving a private school education she contributed to London magazines, and in 1844 emigrated to Montreal, Canada, where she published by subscription "Tales of the Olden Time." In 1846 she married James Sadlter, then of the publishing firm of D. and J. Sadlter and Co., of New York and Montreal, and became connected editorially with the Roman Catholic press. She has translated several religious works, tales, and dramas from the French, and is the author of stories for Roman Catholic Sunday-schools, and several novels. Her works include "Alice Roby, or The Blind Man's Daughter" (Boston, 1851); "New Lights, or Life in Galway" (New York, 1853); "The Blakes and the Mandys" (1855); "The Confederate Chieftains, a Tale of the Irish Rebellion of 1641" (1859); "Bessy Conway, or the Irish Girl in America" (1862); "The Daughter of Tyrconnell" (1863); "Maureen Dhu, the Admiral's Daughter" (1870); and "Purgatory, Doctrinal, Historical, and Politiccal" (1886).—Her daughter, Anna Theressa, author, b. in Montreal, Canada, 19 Jan., 1854, was educated partially in New York city, and graduated at the convent of Villa Maria, near Montreal, in 1871. She has contributed largely to Roman Catholic periodicals, and has published numerous tales and poems from the French and Italian, and is the author of "Seven Years and More" (New York, 1878); "Ethel Hamilton, and other Tales" (1877); "The King's Page" (1877); "Women of Catholicity" (1885); and "The Silent Woman of Alood" (1887). She has also published a compilation entitled "Germans in the Old World," a study in historical geography.

SADTLER, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 25 Dec., 1833. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1842, and at the theological seminary there in 1844, and was successively pastor of Lutheran churches at Pine Grove, Pa., in 1845-9; Shippenburg, Pa., in 1849-53; Middletown, Pa., in 1853-6; and Easton, Pa., in 1856-62. In the last year he became principal of the Ladies department at Lutherville, Md., and in 1875 he accepted the presidency of Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa. He occupied this post until 1886, when, disabled for life by a fall on the ice, he was compelled to abandon the work. In 1867 he received the degree of D.D. from Pennsylvania college. He was a trustee of that institution in 1862-72, and has held honorary degrees from a number of colleges. He is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his denomination, and has published numerous baccalaureate discourses and addresses, including "A Rebellious Nation Reproved" (Easton, Pa., 1861), and "The Causes and Remedies of the Losses of her Population by the Lutheran Church in America" (Philadelphia, 1858).—His eldest son, Samuel Philip, b. in Prine Grove, Pa., 18 July, 1853, was graduated at Pennsylvania college in 1867, studied at Lehigh university in 1867-8, and was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1870 with the degree of S.B. He then studied chemistry at the University of Göttingen, where in 1871 he received the degree of Ph.D. for original researches on iodium salts. On his return he held a professorship at Pennsylvania college until 1874, when he accepted the chair of general and organic chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, which he resigned in 1891. He was also professor of chemistry in the Philadelphia college of pharmacy, to which he was appointed in 1879. Prof. Sadlter again visited Europe in 1885 for the purpose of inspecting laboratories of applied chemistry in England and on the continent, and on his return made a report of his observations to the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania for their guidance in organizing a laboratory of industrial chemistry. He is a fellow of the Chemical societies of London and Berlin, of the American association for the advancement of science, and of other societies in the United States. Since 1879 he has furnished each month notes on chemistry to the "American Journal of Pharmacy." Dr. Sadlter was chemical editor of the American reprint of the ninth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica" (Philadelphia, 1880-2), and, with Joseph P. Remington and Horatio C. Wood, edited the fifteenth and sixteenth editions of the "United States Pharmacopoeia," having on the entire charge of the chemical part of that work. Besides numerous addresses and lectures, he has published "Handbook of Chemical Experimentation for Lecturers" (Louisville, 1857), and edited the eighth edition of Attfield's "Medical and Pharmaceutical Chemistry" (Philadelphia, 1879).
SAFFOLD, Reuben, jurist, b. in Wilkes county, Ga., 4 Sept., 1788; d. in Dallas county, Ala., 15 Feb., 1847. After practising law in Georgia he removed to Jackson, Ala., in 1813. During the Indian troubles he commanded a volunteer company, and he subsequently served several terms in the legislature of Mississippi territory. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1819, was made a circuit judge, and was one of the three judges that were appointed to the supreme bench in 1820. About 1836-7 he was connected, with the Harvard observatory, in the last year acting as its director, but he was chiefly employed in observations for a standard catalogue of right ascensions. In 1865 he was appointed professor of astronomy in the University of Chicago, and director of the Dearborn observatory. His first two years there he devoted to the study of comets, and he discovered many new ones. From 1869 till 1871 he was engaged upon the great catalogue of stars that is in course of preparation by the co-operation of European and American astronomers. His work was interrupted by the Chicago fire of 1871, and after that year he was much employed in latitude and longitude work in the territories by the U. S. corps of engineers, for whom he also prepared a star catalogue, which was published by the war department. He published a second in 1879. Since 1876 he has been professor of astronomy at Williams college, which gave him the degree of Ph. D. in 1878. He is a member of various astronomical societies, and has edited volumes iv. and v. of the "Annals of Harvard College Observatory," the "Astronomical Journal," "American Journal of Science," P. Bond's discoveries in the constellation of Orion, which Prof. Safford compiled after Prof. Bond's death. His other contributions have appeared in the "Proceedings of the American Academy," the monthly notices of the Royal astronomical society, and other astronomical journals. He prepared a catalogue of polar stars as a memorial of 50th anniversary of the observatory at Williams college, which was published in 1888.

SAFFORD, William Harrison, lawyer, b. in Parkersburg, Va., 19 Feb., 1821. He was educated at Asbury academy, Parkersburg, Va., studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1842, and in 1848 removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he has since practiced his profession. From 1858 till 1860 he served in the state senate, and from 1865 till 1874 he was judge of the 2d judicial circuit of the 5th judicial circuit of Ohio. He is the author of "Life of Blennerhassett" (Chillicothe, 1859), and "The Blennerhassett Papers" (Cincinnati, 1861).

SAGARD-THEODAT, Gabriel, French missionary, lived in the 17th century. He was a pupil of the college at Paris, 1613 when, under the influence of his master, the secretary of Louis XIII., asked the superior of that order to send missionaries to Canada. Sagard entreated to be sent on the mission, but he was not allowed to leave France until eight years afterward. Shortly after his arrival in Quebec he set out for the Huron country with Father Viel. He remained there over two years, when his command was renewed in Rivière des Prairies (dune called Saut du Récollet), and Sagard returned to France. His writings include "Grand voyage du pays des Hurons, situé en l'Amérique, vers la mer Deace, et derniers confins de la Nouvelle-France, dite Canada, où il est trépidé de tout ce qui est du pays, des mœurs et naturel des sauvages, de leur gouvernement et façons de vivre, dans leur pays qu'allant en voyage, de leur foi et croyance, avec un dictionnaire de la langue huronne" (Paris, 1632), and "Histoire du Canada et voyage que les frères mineurs recoillots y ont fait pour la conversion des infidèles" (1636). The works of Sagard were very little known until recently. They were republished and edited by Henry E. Chevalier (Paris, 1860).

SAGE, Gardner Avery, donor, b. in New York city, 3 May, 1813; d. in White Sulphur Springs, Va., 22 Aug., 1882. He studied surveying, practised his profession in New York city, and acquired a fortune. He was an active member of the Reformed Dutch church, in which he held many offices of trust, and built and endowed the library of the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., which bears his name, and where he was president for thirty years. This was dedicated on 4 June, 1875, and now (1898) contains 70,000 volumes. He also founded a chair of Old Testament exegesis in the seminary, gave a residence for one of the professors, also large sums for the maintenance of Hertzog Hall, and made other bequests to aid the institutions of the Reformed church in New Brunswick. His gifts amounted to nearly $250,000.

SAGE, Henry Williams, philanthropist, b. in Middletown, Conn., 31 Jan., 1814; d. in Ithaca, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1897. He was a descendant of David Sage, who settled in Middletown in 1652. His father, Charles, was shipwrecked on the coast of Florida in 1838, and murdered by Indians. The boy's preparation for Yale at Bristol, Conn., was rudely interrupted by his father's death in 1838. In 1854 he entered mercantile life. In 1854 he established a lumber-manufactory on Lake Simeoe, Canada, and later, with John McGraw, another at Wenona (now West Bay City, Mich.), which at that time was one of the largest in the world. Mr. Sage was one of the most extensive lumber-holders of Michigan. From 1857 till 1880 he resided in Brooklyn, and was an active member of Plymouth church. To much interest in founding Cornell university, he endowed the Lyman Beecher lectureship on preaching at Yale, and built and presented to West Bay City, Mich., a public library at a cost of $30,000. Mr. Sage also endowed and built several churches and schools. His gifts to Cornell amounted to more than a million dollars.

SAGE, Russell, financier, b. in Oneida county, N. Y., 4 Aug., 1816. He received a public-school education, and then engaged in mercantile pursuits in Troy. In 1841 he was elected an alderman, and he was re-elected to this office until 1848, also serving for a term of one year as Mayor of Troy. He was then elected to congress as a Whig, and served, with re-election, from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1857. Mr. Sage was the first person to advocate, on the floor of congress, the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government. Subsequently he settled in New York city and engaged in the business of selling "privileges" in Wall street. At the same time he became interested in railroads, and secured stocks in western roads, notably the Milwaukee and St. Paul, of which he was president and vice-president for twelve years. By disposing of these investments, as the smaller roads were absorbed by trunk-lines, he became wealthy. In later years he has been closely associated with the Goulds in the management of the Warpath, St. Louis, and Pacific, the Missouri Pacific, the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, and the St. Louis and San Francisco railroads, the American cable company, the Western Union telegraph company and the Manhattan consolidated system of elevated railroads in New York city, in all of which corporations he owned stock. Mr. Sage was for many years closely connected with the affairs of the Union Pacific road, of which he was a director. He has been a director and vice-president in the importers and traders' national bank for the past twenty years, also a director in the Merchants' trust company and in the Fifth avenue bank of New York city.

SAGEAN, Mathieu (sah-zhay-ong), Canadian explorer, b. near La Chine about 1655; d. in Biloxi, La., about 1710. He early entered the service of Robert Calvert, the La Salle (q. v.), assisted him in the building of Fort Saint Louis of the Illinois, and was left there under Henry Tonty (q. v.) in 1681. Being desirous to make new discoveries, he obtained leave shortly afterward from Tonty and set out at the head of eleven Canadians and two Mohogan Indians. They ascended the Mississippi about 500 miles, and then, their provisions being exhausted, stopped a month to hunt. While thus engaged, they found another river flowing south, southeast, carried their canoes to it, sailed about 450 miles, and found themselves in the midst of an Indian tribe dwelling in well-built villages and governed by a chief who claimed descent from Montezuma. On his return to Canada, Sagean was captured by English pirates upon the shores of the St. Lawrence, and was taken to the West Indies. He followed a life of adventure for about twenty years in the East and West Indies, but toward 1700 he found his way to France and enlisted in a company of marines at Brest. There he revealed the secret of his discoveries in America. His story was written down from his dictation and sent to the secretary of the navy, Count de Pontchartrain, who caused it to be translated, and the result, Sagean was sent to Biloxi, near the mouth of the Mississippi, with orders that he should be supplied with the means of conducting a party to the country he had discovered, and which he represented as being rich in gold. But the officers in command neglected their instructions, and suffered the order to remain unexecuted. Sagean's discovery has been contested, inasmuch as he described the country as a kind of El Dorado, but other authors contend that, aside from these exaggerations, Sagean's discovery was real, and that he saw the remains of an ancient Mexican tribe that had emigrated northward after the Spanish conquest. Sagean's story, written from his dictation, is preserved among the manuscripts in the National library at Paris. It was translated into English and published by John Gilmary Shea in his collection of memoirs and narratives concerning the French colonies in America (1862).

SAGER, Abram, physician, b. in Bethlehem, N. Y., 22 Dec., 1810; d. in Ann Arbor, Mich., 6 Aug., 1877. He was graduated at the Troy polytechnic school in 1831, studied medicine in Albany and at Yale, and was graduated at the medical school of Castleton, Vt., in 1835. He settled in Detroit and afterward in Jackson, Mich. From 1837 till 1840 he assisted in the geological survey of Michigan, having charge of the departments of botany and zoology, of which branches he was professor in the state university from 1842 till 1855. In 1850 he was made professor of obstetrics, and in 1854-55 he had the chair of diseases of women and children, but he resigned in 1855, when the board of regents introduced homeopathy. He was a member of various medical and scientific societies, and was president of the Michigan medical society in 1850-2. Dr. Sager contributed papers to medical journals, and published reports on botany and zoology in 1839. His collection laid the foundation of the Ann Arbor museum of the university, to which he also presented the "Sager Herbarium" of 3,200 species and 12,000 specimens.

SAGRA, Ramon de la (sah-grah), Spanish economist, b. in Coruna in 1798; d. in Cartaile, SAHAGUN, Bernardino de (sah-ah-goon'). Spanish missionary, b. in Sahagun, Leon, late in the 15th century; d. in Mexico, 23 Oct., 1590. He studied in Salamanca, entered the Franciscan order about 1520, came to Mexico in 1529, where he was a professor in the Franciscan college of St. Martin de Tlaltelolco, and, after thoroughly learning the Aztec language, was for more than fifty years a missionary to the natives. His leisure hours were occupied in composing a civil, religious, and natural history of Mexico in twelve volumes, which were illustrated with drawings by the author and copies of the hieroglyphic writings of the Aztecs; but these drawings were not published by the order contrary to religion, as perpetuating the idolatrous customs of the natives, and his work was not allowed to be published, but it was sent by the viceroy to the chronicler Herrera, who used some of the material in his "Décadas." The work was afterward printed under the title of "Diccionario histórico universal de la Nueva España" (Mexico, 1839). He also wrote in the Aztec language "Arte de la Lengua Mexicana" (Mexico, 1576); "Dicionario trilingüe, Latino, Español y Mexicano" (1578); "Submodia cristiana en Lengua Mexicana, para que canten los Indios en las Iglesias" (1585); "Catecismo de la Doctrina Cristiana en Lengua Mexicana" (1588) and, according to Boturini and Herrera, "De la venida a México de los primeros Religiosos de Francia." A Spanish manuscript in two volumes, containing the conferences of the missionaries with the native priests in Aztec language.

SAINT CASTIN, Jean Vincent de l'Abadie (san-cas-tang). Baron de, French colonist, b. in Lescar, Bearn, in 1630; d. in Acadia in 1712. He came to Canada in 1665 as an ensign, took part in the expedition of De Courcelles, and, when his regiment was disbanded in 1668, was among the few officers that chose to remain in the colony, and was sent to Acadia to command for the king under Champlain. In 1675 Dutchmen from Santo Domingo made the latter prisoner, but Saint Castin escaped and afterward named the woods with the Indians, and gained much influence over them. He also made a fortune of about 400,000 crowns by dealing in beaver-skins with his neighbors of New England. His trading-house was at Pontoquet (now Castine), in the old fort, which he occupied or abandoned by turns, according to the needs of the time. But his trade involved him in difficulties with the royal governors, and in 1688 the king required him to establish a permanent settlement and cease all trade with the English. About this time Saint Castin married the daughter of Machoqueulo, chief of the Penobscots, and in the same year war was renewed, mainly through Saint Castin's efforts. They attacked the English posts at Port Royal, at the head of 250 Indians, and continued for years to plunder the English settlements. The authorities of Boston set a price upon his head, as they regarded him as their most insidious enemy, and employed deserters to kidnap him; but the plot was discovered, and the deserters were shot at Mount Desert. With his Indians, Saint Castin landed in 1696 at New Harbor, near Port Pemaquid, and, co-operating with the troops of Iberville, obliged the governor to surrender, and destroyed the fortress. The French dominions were thus extended over a large part of Maine. The remainder of his history is intimately connected with the struggles for the possession of Acadia. He defended Port Royal in 1706, and again in 1707, when he was wounded, he saved the fort. He is said to have gone to France in 1709, but he was in Acadia again soon afterward, where he fought to the last for the French cause, and was killed in an engagement in 1712. His son, Joseph, a half-breed, was a leader of the eastern Indians in their later difficulties with the English. In December, 1721, he was surprised at instructions and returned to Boston. After five months he was released on account of the hostile feelings that his detention provoked among the Abenakis.

ST. CLAIR, Arthur, soldier, b. in Thuro, Caithness, Scotland, in 1734; d. in Greensburg, Pa., 31 Aug., 1818. He was the grandson of the Earl of Roslyn, was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and studied medicine under Dr. John Hunter. Inheriting a fortune from his mother, he purchased a commission as ensign in the 60th foot on 13 May, 1757, and came to this country with Admiral Edward Boscawen's fleet. He served under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst at the capture of Louisburg, 26 July, 1758, and under Gen. James Wolfe at Quebec, 30 Sept., 1759. On 16 April, 1762, he resigned the commission of lieutenant-26 April, 1768, he settled in Ligonier valley, Pa., where he purchased land, and erected mills and a residence. In 1770 he was made surveyor of the district of Cumberland, and he subsequently became a justice of the court of quarter sessions and of common pleas, a member of the proprietary council, a justice, recorder, and clerk of the orphans' court, and provost of Bedford and Westmoreland counties.
In July, 1775, he was made colonel of militia, and in the autumn he accompanied as secretary the commissioners appointed to treat with the western tribes at Fort Pitt. On 3 Jan., 1776, he became colonel of the 2d Pennsylvania regiment, and, being ordered to Canada, he joined Gen. John Sullivan after the disastrous affair at Three Rivers, and aided that officer by his counsel, saving the army from capture. He was appointed brigadier-general on 9 Aug., 1776, and resigned the next day, but reitated his commission in the previous January. Joining Gen. Washington in November, 1776, he was appointed to organize the New Jersey militia, and participated in the battles of Trenton and Princeton. On the latter occasion he rendered valuable service by protecting the fords of the Assumpink. He was appointed major-general on 19 Feb., 1777, and, after serving as adjutant-general of the army, succeeded Gen. Horatio Gates in command at Ticonderoga. The works there and at Montant Independence on the opposite shore of Lake Champlain were garrisoned by less than 2,000 men, poorly armed, and nearly destitute of stores. The approach of a force of more than 7,000 men under Gen. John Burgoyne warned Gen. St. Clair to prepare for an attack. He could not, however, bring to bear all his aids and, as he had not discovered Burgoyne's designs, he neglected to fortify Sugar Loaf mountain over which the British approached. St. Clair and his officers held a council of war, and decided to evacuate the fort. The blaze of a house that had been set on fire contrary to orders discovered their movements, and immediately the British started in pursuit. St. Clair fled through the woods, leaving a part of his force at Hubbardton, which was attacked and defeated by Gen. Fraser on 7 July, 1777, after a well-contested battle. On 12 July, St. Clair reached Fort Edward with the remnant of his men. "The evacuation," wrote Washington, when the news reached him, "is an event of chagrin and surprise not apprehended, nor within the compass of my reasoning. This stroke is severe indeed, and has distressed us much." Gen. St. Clair remained with his army, and was with Washington at Brandywine, 11 Sept., 1777, acting as voluntary aide. A court-martial was held in 1778, and he was acquitted, "with the highest honor, of the charges against him," which verdict was approved by congress. Gen. John Sullivan, who, during his expedition against the Six Nations, was a commissioner to arrange a cartel with the British at Amboy, 9 March, 1780, and was appointed to command the corps of light infantry in the absence of Lafayette, but did not serve, owing to the return of Gen. George Clinton. He was a member of the court-martial that condemned Maj. Andre, commanded at West Point in October, 1780, and aided in suppressing the mutiny in the Pennsylvania line in January, 1781. He was active in raising troops and forwarding them to the south, and in October joined Washington at Yorktown a few days before the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. In November he was placed in command of a body of troops to join Gen. Nathanael Greene, and remained in command of the Pennsylvania troops in 1782. He was in the American philosophical society. On the formation of the Northwestern territory in 1789 Gen. St. Clair was appointed its governor, holding this office until 1792. The last words of Washington on his departure were: "Beware of a surprise." He made a treaty with the Indians at Fort Harmer in 1789, and in 1790 he fixed the seat of justice of the territory at Cincinnati, Ohio, which he named in honor of the Society of the Cincinnati, of which he was president for Pennsylvania in 1783-9. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the army that was operating against the Indians on 4 March, 1791, and moved toward the savages on Miami and Wabash rivers, suffering so severely from gout that he was carried on litter. The troops, having reached Fort Lagares on 4 Nov., and his force was defeated by a horde of Indians led by Blue Jacket, Little Turtle, and Simon Girty, the renegade. Washington refused a court of inquiry, and St. Clair resigned his general's commission on 5 March, 1792, but congress appointed a committee of investigation, which exonerated him. On 22 Nov., 1802, he was removed from his governorship by Thomas Jefferson. Retiring to a small log-house on the summit of Chestnut ridge, he spent the rest of his life in poverty, vainly endeavoring to effect a settlement of his claims against the government. The legislature of Pennsylvania granted him an annuity of $400 in 1813, and shortly before his death he received congress $2,000 in discharge of his claims, and a pension of $400. His Narrative of the Manner in which the Campaign against the Indians in the Year 1791 was conducted under the Command of Maj.-Gen. St. Clair, with his Observations on the Statements of the Secretary of War" (Philadelphia, 1812). See "The Life and Public Services of Arthur St. Clair," with his correspondence and other papers, arranged by William H. Smith (Cincinnati, 1852).

ST. COME, John Francis Buisson de, Canadien missionary, b. in France about 1678; d. near Mobile in 1707. He was ordained in 1683. Some time before 1700 he was sent from Canada, and began a mission among the Natchez Indians. He soon gained the confidence of the chief, who was a woman, and the affection of the people, although he was not very successful in converting them. Being obliged to visit Mobile in 1706, he embarked with three Frenchmen, and while sailing down the river the whole party were slain by the Sitimacha Indians. The Natchez avenged his death by the almost entire destruction of that tribe, and to preserve his memory gave his name to the "Lesser San," or St. Como, on the Natchez river.

ST. CYR, John Mary Ireuns, clergyman, b. near Lyons, France, 2 Jan., 1804; d. in Carondelet, Mo., 21 Feb., 1883. He studied for the priesthood and received the tonsure in Lyons, 5 June, 1830. Soon afterward he embarked as a missionary for the valley of the Mississippi, and was received into the vicariate of St. Louis. He was ordained in the cathedral of St. Louis, 6 April, 1833. He received his first appointment from Bishop Rosati, 17 April, 1833, who assigned him to Chicago, which was then a frontier post. After a journey of two weeks he arrived there, and in September, 1833, he secured the erection of the first church, and became the first resident priest. He remained in Chicago till 1857, when he went to Quincy, Ill., and thence to Kaskaskia, Sainte Genevieve, and Carondelet, Mo., where he died in 1883.

SAINT-E-CLAIRE DEVILLE, Charles, French geologist, b. in the island of St. Thomas, West Indies, in 1814; d. in Paris, France, 10 Oct., 1876. After having pursued the regular course of studies as out-door pupil at the École des mines in Paris, he undertook a journey of scientific investigation at his own expense, and in 1874 visited the Antilles and the islands of Teneriffe and Cape Verd. His geological investigations of Guadeloupe occupied more than a year, and he was engaged in it when the island was visited by the terrible earthquake of 1834. On his return to France he published his work on the Antilles, and on his second Algerian expedition, he went once more to Italy. For several years he acted as assistant to Élie de Beaumont, occupant of the chair of the history of inorganic bodies in the Collège de France, and finally became his successor. Prof. Deville was also deeply interested in meteorology, and established a network of meteorological stations over France and Algeria. In 1851 he was appointed a member of the new French Academy of Sciences in 1857 in the place of Dufrenoy, and promoted officer of the Legion of honor, 13 Aug. 1862. He published, among other works, "Voyage géologique aux Antilles et aux îles Ténériffe et de Pogo" (7 vols., Paris, 1856-64) and "Recherches sur les principaux phénomènes de météorologie, etc., aux Antilles" (1861).—His brother, Henri Étienne, West Indian chemist, b. in St. Thomas, 11 March, 1818; d. in Paris, 9 July, 1883, studied in Paris, early acquired reputation for his chemical researches, and in 1851 was appointed professor of chemistry in the Normal school of Paris, which post he held till 1859. when he was made professor in the University of Paris. He discovered the anhydrous nitric acid in 1849, a new metallic element (silicium) in 1850, and the theory of the new metal aluminum in 1855. He was also the first to make artificial diamonds, which he did at an enormous cost, and he discovered new properties of several metals. His works include "Mémoire sur les carboneux métalliques et leurs combinaisons" (Paris, 1852), "Mémoire sur les traits élémentaires du silica" (1855), "Mémoire sur la production des températures élevées" (1856); "Métallurgie du platine et des métaux que l'accompagnent" (1857); and "De l'aluminium, ses propriétés, sa fabrication" (1859).

SAINT-CROIX, Gaetan Xavier Guilhem de Pascalis (saint-ewah), Chevalier de, French soldier, b. in Mornor, 11 Dec., 1765; d. in Cape Flattery, 18 Aug., 1872. He entered the French army as a lieutenant in 1791, and served for fifteen years in Santo Domingo, Martinique, and Louisiana. He gained credit by his defence of the fortress of Belle Isle in June, 1791, which was occupied by the English in May, 1792, and became major of the regular forces in the West Indies, having been wounded in an attack on Martinique, which the English had just captured, but was defeated. After organizing the defence in Santo Domingo, he exercised himself to send re-enforcements and supplies to Havana, and prepared an expedition against Jamaica, when he died of yellow fever.

SAINT-CROIX, Louis Marie Philibert Fabre-François de Jardin de, West Indian agriculturist, b. at sea, 22 May, 1809. He studied at the military school of Saint Cyr, and became a lieutenant of the general staff, but resigned in 1838 and returned to his home in Martinique, where he engaged in agricultural experiments upon his large estate. He introduced new methods for the culture of the sugarcane and succeeded in raising a new variety of it and also the first to experiment on the culture of the cotton-plant in the French West Indies. For his services he was made a knight of the Legion of honor, and in 1860 he became treasurer-general of the department of Mayenne. His works include "Manière d'estimer le rendement de la canne à sucre" (Paris, 1841); "La question du sucre" (1842); "De la fabrication du sucre aux colonies" (1843); "Principes fondamentaux d'agriculture coloniale" (1845); and "Le sucre aux colonies" (1847).

SAINT GAUDENS, Augustus, sculptor, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 7 March, 1848. When six months of age he was brought to New York, and in that city he subsequently followed the profession of a cameo-cutter. He began to draw at Cooper institute in 1861, and in 1865—6 was a student at the National academy, modelling also in his leisure hours. In 1867 he went to Paris, where he studied under Franconis Jouffroy at the École des beaux arts at Tours, and until 1869 he remained with the latter. In 1869 he returned to New York, where he has since resided. Mr. Saint-Gaudens has been president of the Society of American artists. His more important works are the bas-relief "Adoration of the Cross by Angels," in St. Thomas's church, New York; statues of Admiral David G. Farragut (1880), in New York, of Robert R. Randall (1884), at Sailor's Snug Harbor, Staten island, N. Y., and of Abraham Lincoln (1883), in Chicago; a fountain (1886-7), in Chicago; "The Puritan," a statue of Samuel Chaplin (1887), in Springfield, Mass.; portrait busts of William M. Evarts (1872-3), Theodore D. Woolsey (1876), at Yale, and Gen. William T. Sherman (1888); and medallions of General Grant (1887), President Garfield (1887), and President Arthur (1887). Mr. Saint-Gaudens assisted John La Farge in the decoration of Trinity church, Boston, and the monument to Le Roy King, at Newport, R. I., is also the joint work of those two artists.—His brother, Louis, sculptor, b. in New York, 8 Jan., 1854, studied in the École des beaux arts, Paris, from 1870-94. He succeeded his a "Fanny" as "St. John," for the Church of the Inarnation, New York, and other statues, and has assisted his brother in most of his works.

ST. GEORGE, Sir Thomas Bligh, British soldier, b. in England about 1753; d. in London, 6 Nov., 1837. He entered the army as an ensign in the 27th foot, became a lieutenant in 1790, captain in 1794, major in 1804, and in 1815 lieutenant-colonel in the 634 foot. During the period of these promotions he served in France, Portugal, Corse, and the Mediterranean, and took part in many battles. In March, 1809, he went to Upper Canada, having been appointed inspecting field-officer of militia, there. He commanded at Amhurstburg when it was attacked by Gen. William Hull, led the British forces at the sack of York in August, 1812, and at the river Raisin, in Michigan, 23 Jan., 1813, when Gen. Winchester was defeated. At this battle Gen. St. George received severe wounds. He became colonel in 1813, major-general in 1819, was nominated a companion of the Bath in 1815, and was knighted in 1833.

SAINT HILAIRE, Augustin Francois Cesar Pronvost, French botanist, b. in Orleans, France, 4 Oct., 1799; d. there, 30 Sept., 1853. He was sent when a young man to Holland to superintend a sugar-refinery that belonged to the family, and he thus passed several years in an unengaging employment. On his return to France he devoted himself enthusiastically to the study of natural history, but his qualifications for the appointment of auditor of the counsel of the state, he embarked for Rio Janeiro on 1 April, 1816. For six years he explored the Brazilian empire, journeying about 5,000 miles from 13° south latitude to the Rio de la Plata. He returned to France in 1822 with 24,000 specimens of plants, embracing about 6,000 species, almost all of them new, and nearly all analyzed on the spot, 2,000 birds, 10,000 insects, and 135 quadrupeds, besides reptiles.
fishes, and a few minerals. On reaching home he devoted himself at once to preparation for publication of his elaborate work on the flora of Brazil; but his health, seriously impaired by the fatigues and trials he had undergone, gave way, and it was only after a long period of rest that he was enabled to complete it. He was appointed correspondent of the institute in 1819 while absent in Brazil, and became an active member the following year. He died at Lamark, 8 Feb., 1830. He was also a chevalier of the Legion of honor, and of the Portuguese Order of Christ. Among his works are "Aperçu d'un voyage dans l'intérieur du Brésil, la province Cisplétique et les missions du Paraguay" (Paris, 1823); "Flora Brasileña meridionalis, ou histoire et description de toutes les plantes qui croissent dans les différentes provinces du Brésil" (3 vols., 1825); "Memoire sur le systeme d'agriculture adopté par les Bresiliens et les resultats qu'il a eus dans la province de Minas-Geraes" (1827); "Voyage dans la province de Rio de Janeiro et Minas-Geraes" (2 vols., 1830); "Voyage dans le district des diamants et sur le littoral du Brésil" (2 vols., 1833); and "Voyage aux sources du San Francisco et dans les provinces du Minas et de l'Espiritu-Santo" (1837-58).

SAINTIN, Jules Emile, French artist, b. in Lomé, Abissi, 14 Aug., 1828. He studied in Paris under Michel Martin Drolling, Francois Edouard Picot, and Leboucher. For several years (about 1857-63) he practised his profession in New York. During his stay there he exhibited frequently at the Academy of design, and was elected an associate in 1861. He has received several medals in Europe and became chevalier of the Legion of honor in 1877. Among the portraits that he painted while he was in this country are those of Paul Morphy (1860); Stephen A. Douglas (1860), in the Corcoran gallery; Washington; and John F. Kensett (1883).

ST. JOHN, Isaac Munro, engineer, b. in Augusta, Ga., 19 Nov., 1827; d. in Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., 7 April, 1880. After graduation at Yale in 1845, he studied law in New York City, and removed to Baltimore in 1847, where he became assistant editor of the "Patriot," but chose civil engineering for a profession, and was engaged on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. In 1853 he removed to Georgia, and was employed on the defense of Augusta for the duration of the civil war, when he entered the engineer corps of the Confederate army at Richmond, Va., and was assigned to duty under Gen. John B. Magruder. He rendered valuable service in constructing fortifications during Gen. George B. McClellan's first campaign. In May, 1862, he was made major and chief of the mining and nitre bureau, which was the sole reliance of the Confederacy for gunpowder material. He was promoted through the various grades to the rank of brigadier-general, and in 1865 was made commissary-general, and established a system by which supplies for the army were collected directly from the people and placed in depots for immediate transportation. After the war he resumed his profession in Kentucky, became chief engineer of the Big Four railroad, and built the short-line to Cincinnati, which was considered a great feat in civil engineering. He was city engineer of Louisville in 1870-1, made the first topographical map of that city, and established its system of sewerage. From 1871 until his death he was consulting engineer of the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad, and chief engineer of the St. Louis and Iron Railroad.

ST. JOHN, John, governor of Kansas, b. in Franklin county, Ind., 25 Feb., 1833. In early years he was employed on his father's farm, and was clerk in a grocer's store. In 1853 he went to California, worked in various capacities, and made voyages to South America, Mexico, Central America, and the Sandwich islands, and served in wars with the Indians in California and Oregon. In 1860 he removed to Charleston, Ill., to continue the study of law, which he had begun in his minor's seat. For a short time he was in the 68th Illinois volunteers, in which he became a captain. At Alexandria, Va., he was detached from his command, and assigned as acting assistant adjutant-general under Gen. John P. Slough, in 1864 he was placed in command of the troops at Camp Mattoon, Ill., and on the organization of the 143d regiment he was elected its lieutenant-colonel, served chiefly in the Mississippi valley. At the close of the war he resumed practice in Charleston, but removed afterward to Independence, Mo., where he practised law four years with success, and won a reputation as a political orator. He removed to Olathe, Kan., in 1869, served in the state senate in 1873-4, and was elected governor of Kansas, as a Republican, in 1878, serving until 1882, when he again returned to the independent legal practice. In 1884 he was the candidate of the Prohibition party for president of the United States in 1884, and received a vote of 151,809. During the canvass he delivered addresses in various parts of the United States.

ST. JUST, Luc Letellière de, Canadian statesman, b. in Rivière Onelle, province of Quebec, 12 May, 1829; d. there, 1 Feb., 1881. He studied law, and after practising for a time was elected to the old parliament in 1850. He was defeated at the general election of 1852, and again in 1857, but in 1860 was elected for Granville division to the legislative council, where he sat until the union in 1867. In 1863 he became minister of agriculture in the Savigield Macdonald administration, retaining the office until 1864. In 1867 he was called to the senate, and in 1873, when the Liberal administration came into power, he became minister of agriculture. Toward the close of 1874 he resigned his portfolio, and was appointed lieutenant-governor of Quebec. He soon found himself at variance with different members of the local government, especially with the premier, M. de Bonchervile. The difference between them gradually became wider, and finally ended in the minister being dismissed from office, and deprived of the seat in the Senate. In 1877 he was appointed to the Legislative Council, and in 1878, on the resignation of the previous premier, he was appointed to the council. He again became minister of agriculture in 1881, and was made minister of the interior in 1883, and in 1885 became premier of Quebec, and was re-elected to the council in 1888.

ST. LEGER, Barry, British soldier, b. in 1737; d. in 1789. He was a nephew of the fourth Viscount Doneraile and fellow of St. Peter's college, Cambridge, and was of Huguenot descent. He entered the army, 27 April, 1756, as ensign of the 29th regiment of foot, and, coming to this country in the following year, served in the French war, learning the lessons of maneuver and skirmishing in border warfare. He served under Gen. Abercombie in 1757, and participated in the siege of Louisbourg in 1758.
Wolfe to Quebec in 1759, he was in the battle on the Plains of Abraham, where he checked the flight of the French. In July, 1760, he was appointed brigade-major, preparatory to marching to Montreal, and he became major of the 9th foot, 16 Aug., 1762. Maj. St. Leger was chosen by George III., at Gen. Burgoyne's recommendation, to be the leader of the expedition against Fort Stanwix, and justified their confidence in him, in his advance from Oswego, by his precautions against surprise and by his stratagem at Oriskany, and his decision of the fate of that fort, to the panic that was produced by the rumor of the approach of Arnold, which forced him to raise it. After the failure of this expedition he was promoted, in 1780, to colonel in the army, the highest rank he ever attained, and, becoming a leader of rangers under the immediate command of Gen. Haldimand, he carried on a guerrilla warfare, with headquarters at Montreal. In the summer of 1781 he proposed a plan for the capture of Gen. Philip Schuyler, which, however, failed in its object. In the autumn of the same year, in obedience to the orders of Haldimand, who was anxious to persuade Vermont to return to her allegiance, he ascended Lake Champlain with a strong force to Ticonderoga, in the expectation of meeting the Vermont colonists under Gen. Fay. On hearing a rumor of the surrender of Cornwallis, he retreated to St. John, without accomplishing his mission. He was commandant of the royal forces in Canada in the autumn of 1784, and his name appears in the army lists for the last time in 1785. St. Leger possessed some literary talent, as is shown both by his letters to Burgoyne and the British ministry, and by his volume entitled "St. Leger's Journal of Occurrences in America" (London, 1780).

ST. LUC, LA CORNE DE, French soldier, b. in 1712; d. in Montreal, Canada, 1 Oct., 1784. He belonged to a family that was noted in Canadian annals for the number of its military members. His father was Jean Louis de la Corne, who held the office of town mayor of Three Rivers, and in 1719 was major-general of troops at Quebec, and his brother was the Chevalier Pierre la Corne (q. v.), but he signed his name La Corne St. Luc. During French supremacy in Canada he was an active partisan leader against the English. He was engaged in 1749 in scouting in the vicinity of Lake St. Sacrament and Fort St. Frederick in June, 1747, nearly captured General Schuyler, a New N.Y., officer, and during the remainder of the old French war was busily employed in ambushes against convoys and small parties of the enemy. He was present in 1757 as a captain in Montcalm's expedition against Fort William Henry, and led the Indians of the left column. He served with great credit at the battle of Ticonderoga in 1758, where he carried off the enemy's gun-carriages and wagons. He took part in the battle on the Plains of Abraham in 1760, and again at the victory of St. Foy, near Quebec, where he was wounded. When hostilities began between Great Britain and her American colonies, he at once espoused the cause of the crown, and successfully incited the Indians to the north and north-west to take arms against the colonists. He was with the party that captured Ethan Allen, and with Gen. Carleton when he was repulsed by Col. Seth Warner. St. Luc was taken prisoner in 1775, and sent to New York, but, returning to Canada in May, 1777, he became the leader of the Indians in the Burgoyne campaign. When Jane McCrea (q. v.) was killed, and Burgoyne demanded that the murderers should be given up, St. Luc reminded him of the consequences, and thus secured immunity for his savage followers. He was accused by Burgoyne of deserting with his Indians at the critical moment at Bennington, and denounced by him in parliament as a runaway. At the close of the war he was appointed a member of the legislative council in Canada, and stoutly defended the political rights of the Canadians at an epoch when they were not always respected. He was a man of education, talent, and courage. His modes of warfare were brutal and sanguinary, and his unflinching obstinacy in the colonists manifests the most bitter vindictiveness.

ST. LUSSON, Simon François Danjoumont, Sieur de, French officer, lived in the 17th century. He was the deputy of the intendant of the French government in Canada, Jean Talon, who on 3 Sept., 1670, commissioned him to search for copper-mines and confer with the tribes about Lake Superior. Nicolas Perrot, who had visited the lake country a few months before, accompanied him as interpreter. On 5 May, 1673, St. Lusson concluded a treaty, with imposing ceremonies, in the presence of the Jesuit missionaries then in Upper Canada, at Sault Ste. Marie, with the principal chiefs of the Saults, Menomonees, Pottawatamies, Winnebagoes, and other tribes, seventeen in all, and formally took possession of the country surrounding Lakes Huron and Superior in the name of the king of France. The costly presents to the Indians and other expenses of the expedition were more than repaid by the gifts of furs that he received in return.

SAINT MÉMIN, Charles Balthazar Julien Fevre de, artist, b. in Dijon, France, 13 March, 1750; d. there, 3 June, 1832. He was entered at the age of sixteen in the military school in Paris, 1 April, 1764, and appointed ensign, 27 April, 1784. At the opening of the French revolution he was loyal to the crown, and joined the army of the princes, serving until it was disbanded, when he retired to Switzerland, and came thence to this country. He landed in Canada in 1793, but soon afterward reached, New York. While with the army he had given up his attention to drawing and painting, and in Switzerland he had learned to carve and gild wood. A patron named Christian had invented a machine in 1786, which he called a pantograph, by means of which the human profile could be copied with mathematical accuracy. It had great success in France, and Saint Méméin determined to introduce it into this country. He constructed such a machine with his own hands, according to his understanding of it, and also made a pantograph, by which he reduced a large design. His life-size pantographs on pink paper, finished in black crayon, were reduced by the pantograph to a size small enough to be engraved within a perfect circle two inches in diameter. The machine, of course, only gave the outline, the finishing being done in one case with crayon, and in the other with the graver and roulette, by which means he took in this country more than 800 portraits. The drawing and engraved plate, with a dozen proofs, became the property of the sitter for the price of $33, the artist reserving only a few proofs of each portrait. With these proofs he formed two sets, and wrote upon each impression the name of the subject. These two complete collections were brought to this country in 1859, and one of them is now in the Corcoran gallery, Washington, D.C. While in this country Saint-Ménin resided principally in Philadelphia and New York, but made visits to other cities, taking portraits. While he was in Philadelphia in 1798 he secured a profile portrait of Washington, which is especially interesting as being the last portrait of him that was taken from life. In 1810 Saint-Ménin returned to France, where he remained two years, when he returned to his career of engraving and followed portrait- and landscape-painting. In October, 1814, he finally quitted the United States for France, and in 1817 he was appointed director of the museum at Dijon, which post he occupied at the time of his death. Mathematics and mechanics were the pursuits he loved to follow, the arts being merely a money-making adjunct; but we owe to the phototypist and graver of Saint-Ménin the preservation of the lineaments of many distinguished citizens.

ST. OURS, Jean Baptiste de, Sieur d'Eschaillons, French-Catholic soldier, b. in Canada in 1668; d. in Montreal in 1747. His father, Pierre de St. Ouris, was the first of the family to come to the colony, and obtained extensive grants of land. The son entered the army as soon as he was fit to bear arms, was made lieutenant in 1702, and a little afterward became garde-marine. In 1708 he was one of the three commanders of the expedition against Fort Orange (now Albany). The Christian Indians having abandoned the expedition, the French were about to retreat, but St. Ouris appealed to the Indians that remained with him not to return without doing something. About 200 swore that they would follow him, and at their head he captured the village and fort of Haverhill, with its garrison, afterward leading his men back to Canada, having adroitly extracted them from an embuscade. He commanded a company of Rangers, in the expedition against the English in 1710. In 1721 he was intrusted with a special mission to various Indian tribes by the governor, De Vaudreuil. He went by way of Detroit, visited Lachine, and endeavored to put a stop to the liquor traffic with the Miami. St. Ouris also tried to bring about peace between the Siouxs and their enemies, took steps to form the Creeks into a single village, and endeavored to attract to that of Ganansigone the savages that were scattered along Lake Superior. On his return he was made major of Montreal, and subsequently became king's lieutenant.—His grandson, Charles Louis Roch Xavier, b. in Canada in 1753; d. there in 1834, on his entrance into public life decided to support the English government in Canada, and was appointed a member of the legislative council. In this post he endeavored successfully to give expression to the views of his countrymen. He opposed an attempt to have the English language adopted, and also combated a plan for confiscating the property of the Jesuits. In 1774 he was appointed major of militia, and soon afterward he became colonel. The services that he rendered to the English in the defense of the nation, and in the cause of humanity, gained him the friendship of Gen. Carleton, who made St. Ouris his aide-de-camp. He travelled through Europe in 1785, and was received with honor not only at the English court, but by Fredrick the Great and Louis XVI. On his return he took a notable part in the public life of Canada, where his influence in affairs was much increased by his moderation in debate and courtesy toward political opponents.—His kinsman, Francois Xavier, b. in Canada, was a soldier. In 1799, entered the military service and rose rapidly in rank. He was one of the commanders of the militia in the attack on Fort George, and, although wounded, he drove back a force of English at the head of a few Canadians. After the battle of Carrillon in 1758 he was one of the three officers that were specially mentioned for heroism by Montcalm. He commanded the right of the French army, with De Bonne, at Quebec, and was killed while charging at the head of his troops.

ST. PALAIS, James Maurice de Long d'Ausseac de, R. C. bishop, b. in La Salvetat, France, 15 Nov., 1811; d. in St. Mary's of the Woods, Vigo co., Ind., 28 June, 1877. He was descended from a celebrated medieval family. He studied in the College of St. Nicholas de Chardonnet in Paris, and in 1830 entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice, to become a priest. He was ordained in 1836, went to Indiana as a missionary, and, on his arrival in Vincennes, was sent to a station thirty-five miles east of that town. Here he organized a congregation, and built St. Mary's church. The first settlers of this country were, as a rule, very backward, poor, and ignorant; yet, with the few meager resources and limited opportunities at his disposal, he found means to build several churches. In 1839 he was removed to Chicago, where he devoted a great part of his time to the conversion of the Indians, until they were removed across the Mississippi. There had been priests in Chicago, prior to the advent of Father St. Palais, whose conduct had been bad; and, in consequence, the Indians found his flock demoralized, and met with opposition from a portion of them. They burned his little cabin, and for two years refused him his salary, with the avowed purpose of starving him out. He remained at his post, however, and with private means built St. Mary's church, which shortly afterward became the first cathedral of the diocese of Chicago. In 1848 Bishop Carondelet and Father St. Palais was removed to Logansport. The hardships he underwent at this station were extraordinary. He rode almost daily, sometimes for a hundred miles, without seeing a human dwelling. In 1846 he was sent to Madison, and in 1847 was appointed vicar-general and superior of the ecclesiastical seminary at Vincennes. In 1848 he was administrator of the diocese of Vincennes on the death of Bishop Bazin, and in the same year was nominated bishop by Pius IX., and consecrated in 1849. He erected two fine orphan asylums—one for boys, at Highland, and the other for girls, at Terre Haute. He paid his episcopal visit to Rome in 1849, and persuaded the Benedectines to send out a colony of their order to Indiana. In 1857 his diocese was divided, and Bishop St. Palais was removed to Logansport. Returning from his second visit to Rome in 1859, he travelled through France, Switzerland, and Germany, in furtherance of the interest of his diocese. He visited Rome again in 1869, and attended the Vatican council. When he became bishop he had thirty-three priests to assist him in attending about 80,000 people. The number of Catholic churches was fifty, although the diocese of Vincennes comprised then the whole state of Indiana. At his death the diocese of Vincennes, although reduced from its original extent, contained 90,000 souls, 151 churches, and 117 priests. He established the Franciscan Fathers at Oldenburg and at Indianapolis, the Fathers O. M. C. at Terre Haute, and the Brothers of the Sacred Heart. The following female orders also owe their advent in the diocese to his administration: the Sisters of St. Francis, the Nuns of the Order of St. Benedict, the Daughters of Charity, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Ursuline Sisters, and the Sisters of St. Joseph.

SAINT PIERRE, Legardeur Jacques de (saint-air), French soldier, b. in Normandy in 1698; d. near Lake George, Canada, in 1755. He went in early youth to Canada as ensign in a regiment of marines, served against the Iroquois, and took a commendable part in the war of 1749 against the English. In 1752 he was sent on a journey of discovery toward the Rocky mountains, which he was among the first to explore, and, on his return in October, was ordered by Gov. Duquesne to Ohio, where the French had just built Fort de Beuf upon French creek, which commanded the route to Alleghany river. On 11 Dec. he received there George Washington, then adjutant-general of Virginia, who brought a letter from Gov. Dinwiddie, indicating that the English had withdrawn from English territory. According to the journal of Washington, printed at Williamsburg just after his return, he was extremely well received by Saint Pierre, whom he describes as an able and courteous commander. In the spring of 1753 Saint Pierre was superseded by Contrecoeur and appointed commander of the Indian auxiliaries, and in that capacity he rendered great service in Baron Dieskau's expedition. He was subsequently killed in the action where Whiting's regiment was routed. Saint Pierre's account of his journey to the Rocky mountains is preserved in the National library of Paris, and has been published in the collection of John Gilmary Shea (New York, 1862). It is entitled "Memoire sur journal sommaire de Jacques Legardeur de Saint Pierre."

ST. REAL, Joseph Remi Vallières de, Canadian jurist, b. in Markham, Upper Canada (or, according to some accounts, in Quebec), 1 Oct., 1877; d. in Montreal, 17 Feb., 1847. He went to reside with an uncle in Quebec, where his aptitude for learning attracted the attention of Bishop Pineau, who, with his own approval, personally superintended his education. He afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1812, and began practice in Quebec. In 1813 he was elected to the assembly for the county of Chambly, and at once allied himself with the Canadian party in the house, then engaged in a struggle for what they regarded as constitutional liberty. During the absence of M. Papineau on a mission in England, he was chosen speaker of the assembly, and during the administration of Sir James Kempt, in 1825, was appointed judge of the district of Three Rivers, where he remained for several years. Sir Charles Bagot appointed him chief justice of Montreal in 1842. From that time until his death he was infirm in health. In 1828 the government of Canada, Sir John Colborne, having requested Judge De St. Real to grant a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Judges Panet and Bedard, suspended by Sir John some time before, Judge De St. Real refused, and was in consequence suspended from office, and suffered much loss.

SAINT SIMON, Claude Henri, Count de, b. in Paris, 17 Oct., 1700; d. there, 19 May, 1785. His education, that of the nobility of his time, was in the direction of philosophy. He entered the army in 1777, and was sent to this country as the commander of a company under the Marquis de Bouillé in 1779. He remained with the French forces, acquitting himself with gallantry until the surrender at Yorktown. Like many of his brother French officers, he was made a life-member of the Society of the Cincinnati. On the voyage home the French squadron, under the Comte de Grasse, was defeated by Admiral Rodney on 12 April, 1782, and the vessel on which Saint Simon had embarked surrendered and he himself was made prisoner and taken to Jamaica, where he remained until the declaration of peace in 1783. Before returning to France he visited Mexico, and proposed to the viceroy of that country to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by means of a canal; but no notice was taken of his proposals. When he returned he was made chevalier of St. Louis and colonel of the Aquitaine regiment. During the Reign of Terror he was arrested for being a member of the aristocracy. After an imprisonment of eleven months he was liberated and succeeded in recovering 130,000 francs as his share of the profits of his previous financial operations. He now began to study the finances of France, and planned the great scheme of a construction of society. He obtained a small clerkship, and lived in obscurity until his friend, Diard, gave him the means to issue his "Introduction aux travaux scientifiques du XIXe siècle" (2 vols, Paris, 1808). In 1810 Diard died and Saint Simon suffered from actual want. Nevertheless, he continued to pursue his studies, and, in the face of feeling and misfortune, wrote a pamphlet, as a friend, and the lack of powerful protectors, he issued his "Récorganisation de la société Européenne" (Paris, 1814) and "L'industrie, on discussions politiques, morales et philosophiques" (4 vols., 1817-18). In 1820 he published a pamphlet entitled "Paralysie," in which he advanced the most revolutionary ideas, and for which he was tried and convicted in 1820 of attempted suicide, but only succeeded in depriving himself of an eye, and lived long enough to complete his two greatest works, "Cathéchisme industriel" (1824) and "Le nouveau Christianisme." (1825). See "Saint Simon, sa vie et ses travaux," by Nicholas G. Hubbard (Paris, 1857); "Œuvres, choisies de Saint-Simon" (4 vols., Brussels, 1859; new ed., Paris, 1869); and "Saint Simon et ses contemporains," by Jules Deyrolle, Enfantin (20 vols., 1865-95).

ST. VALIER, Jean Baptiste De Laerox Chevrieres de, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Grenoble, Dauphine, France, 14 Nov., 1653; d. in Quebec, 26 Dec., 1727. He was chaplain to Louis XIV., and in 1684, when Laval, bishop of Quebec, went to France to engage a successor, his recommendation by the royal chaplain secured his appointment to that office. He arrived in Canada in July, 1685, in his capacity of vicar-general to Bishop Laval, and remained until November, 1687, when he returned to France. He was consecrated bishop of Quebec, at St. Sulpice de Paris, by Nicholas Colbert, archbishop of Carcassonne, in January, 1689, and made titular to Canada in August of the same year. He founded the general hospital of Quebec in 1693, and the Ursulines of Three Rivers in 1697. While he was bishop, Louis XIV., confirmed by letters-patent, in October, 1697, the erection of the bishopric of Quebec, and the union of the rectory to the seminary, as well as of the revenues of Notre Dame de Quebec.

SAINT VICTOR, Jacques Benjamin Maximilien, Count de, West Indian author, b. in Port Dauphin, Santo Domingo, 14 Jan., 1770; d. in Paris, 8 Aug., 1858. He studied in the College of La Fleche and became a journalist. Under Napoleon he was on the staff of the "Journal des Díbats," and after 1815 he founded several Roman Catholic and royalist magazines. In 1839 he revisited his native land, but he went afterward to the United States, explored the country for two years, and then returned to the West Indies. His work included "Tableau historique et pittoresque de Paris depuis les Gaulois jusqu'à nos jours" (3 vols., Paris, 1808-12); "Oeuvres poétiques" (1822); "Lettres sur les États-Unis écrites en 1832-33," which attracted much attention (2 vols., 1835); and "Journal de voyage" (2 vols., 1836).

SAJOUX, Charles Euchariste, physician, b. in Paris, France, 13 Dec., 1832. He came to this country at the age of nine years, was educated by private tutors, and, after attending lectures in the medical department of the University of California and at Jefferson college, Philadelphia, received his diploma in 1878. Remaining in Philadelphia, he soon obtained a lucrative practice among the French residents of that city. He was made professor of anatomy and physiology in the Wagner Free Institute of Science, and lecturer on diseases of the nose and throat in the Philadelphia School of Anatomy. Having made this class of diseases his specialty, Dr. Sajous became clinical chief in the throat department of Jefferson college hospital, and finally lecturer in the college proper, which post he now (1899) occupies. He became widely known early in his career through his initiatory and edifying devised numerous instruments that are extensively used in his specialty. Dr. Sajous is an honorary and corresponding member of a large number of American and foreign medical societies, and has received several decorations from foreign governments. His contributions to professional literature include numerous articles in medical journals, and two works, "Anatomical Treatises of Hay Perrey" (Philadelphia, 1885) and "Diseases of the Nose and Throat" (1886). In 1888 he edited and brought to a successful issue one of the largest medical works of the time, the "Annual of the Universal Medical Sciences," having for its object to collate the progressive features of the medical literature of the world, and collect information relating to medicine in uncivilized countries. In this he was assisted by sixty-six associate editors.

SALÁ, George Augustus Henry, English journalist, b. in London, 24 Nov., 1828; d. in Brighton, 8 Dec., 1895. His father was an Italian and his mother a native of the West Indies. The son was educated for an artist, but embraced the literary profession, becoming a contributor to magazines. In 1863-4 he was the American correspondent of the London "Telegraph." He published many books, including "America in the Midst of War" (London, 1865) and "America Revised" (1862).

SALABERRY, Charles Michel d'Urubarrey de, Seigneur de Chamblry and de Beaumac, Canadian soldier, b. at the manor-house of Beaumont, Lower Canada, 1 Nov., 1785; of the Chamblry family, Feb., 1829. His father, descended from a noble family, was a legislative councillor in Canada, and placed his four sons in the army, Charles being the only one that attained distinction. He entered the British service when young, and served for eleven years under Gen. Prescott in the West Indies, was present at the capture of Martinique in 1788, and accequiced Gen. de Rottenburg in the Western expedition as aide-de-camp. When recalled to Canada, he commanded the Voltigeurs, and became also one of the chiefs of staff of the militia. Late in 1812 he and his Voltigeurs, together with M. D'Eschambault's advance-guard, were attacked at Lacolle by 1,400 men of Gen. Dearborn's army, who were forced to retreat. Subsequently De Salaberry's corps participated in the battle of Chrysler's Farm, which also was disastrous to the Americans. He afterward attacked Gen. Wade Hampton's forces at Four Corners, on the Odelton route, when Hammond decided to join Dearborn by taking the route leading to Chateauguay. De Salaberry, anticipating such a movement, ascended the left bank of the river and took up advantageous positions and established lines of defense. On 23 Oct., Gen. Hampton, with 3,500 men, advanced against the British defenses, and with 1,500 men was ordered to turn the position, leaving in reserve the remainder of his troops. De Salaberry, warned of this movement, placed himself in the center of the first line of defense, leaving the second in charge of Lieut.-Col. MacDonell. The Americans were foiled in all their efforts, and De Salaberry's men poured in a deadly fire upon the Americans, when Gen. Hampton ordered a retreat. This action was regarded as so important in Great Britain that a gold medal was struck commemorating it, and De Salaberry received the order of the Bath. He subsequently entered political life, and became a legislative councillor in 1818.

SALAS, Mariano (sah'-las), Mexican soldier, b. in the city of Mexico in 1787; d. in Guadalupe, 24 Dec., 1867. He entered the army in 1813 as cadet of the Mehuila regiment, serving under the Spaniards till 14 May, 1821, when he pronounced for the plan de Iigua, and was promoted captain by M. Ramon. Afterward he fought under Santa-Anna against the Spanish invasion of Baradas in 1829, in the campaign of Texas in 1833, being promoted colonel, and in 1839 brigadier for his services against the Federal chief Mejia.

In 1844 he was appointed commander of the district of Mexico, and remained faithful to Santa-Anna in the revolution of 6 Dec., 1844, losing his place in consequence. After the fall of Herrera in January, 1846, Salas was reappointed commander and deputy to the congress, but on 4 Aug. he headed a revolt in favor of Santa-Anna, and took charge of the executive as provisional president. When Monterey capitulated to Gen. Zachary Taylor, 24 Sept., 1846, Salas was active in preparing troops and supplies for the army that was to march to the north under Santa-Anna, and, when the latter was elected president, Salas delivered the executive on 24 Dec. to the vice-president, Gomez Farias. In May, 1847, he was appointed second in command of the Army of the North in San Luis. With it he participated under Valencia in the actions of Contreras and Chamuscado, where he was taken prisoner, and, refusing to be paroled, he was released only after the peace of Guadalupe Hidalgo. He was appointed commander of Queretaro and president of the supreme military court, and in 1853 was one of the principal supporters of the dictatorship of Santa-Anna, who made him commander-in-chief of the Department of Mexico. After the fall of the dictator, Salas lived in retirement, till he took part in the deposition of Zuloaga in December, 1858, and for a few hours was in charge of the executive before the arrival of Miramon, 21 Jan., 1859. He served under the latter till his fall in December, 1869, when he was banished; but he returned in March, 1862, during the French inter- vention, and when the capital was abandoned by the republican government in 1863, was invested by the populace with the provisional command. The junta de notables appointed Salas, on 25 June, 1863, a member of the regency, in which capacity he acted till the arrival of Maximilian. But he received little acknowledgment by the imperial government, and soon after fled to Lima with his wife and children.

SALAZAR, Felipe Santiago de (sal-lah-zer-de), Peruvian soldier, b. in Lima in 1806; d. in Arequipa, 19 Feb., 1836. He studied in the College of San Carlos, at Lima, but when, in 1829, San Martin arrived in Peru, he left, notwithstanding the opposition of his father, and, baffling the vigilance of the Spanish forces, arrived in Huaura, proclaiming his country's independence. Salazar, then a student in the College of San Martin, pleased with his courage, enlisted him as a cadet of the battalion of Numancia, in which he took part in the campaign against the Spaniards. After the establishment of the republic he rose in the army, until, at the age of twenty-eight, he had obtained the rank of general. When the garrison of Callao revolted in January, 1835, against Orbe- gozo, and proclaimed in favor of La Fuente, Salazary defeated the insurgents, and was ap- pointed governor of the fortress. But on 23 Feb., he himself rose in arms against the government, and as Orbe gozo abandoned Lima, Salazary occup- ied the capital and proclaimed himself supreme chief of the republic. In a few months he had possession of the south, and Orbe gozo was reduced with a small force to the northern provinces, when he sought the intervention of Santa Cruz (q.v.), with whom he concluded a treaty. The Bolivian army invaded Peru, Salazary retired to Arequipa, and on 7 Feb., 1836, was totally routed at Socabaya. After wandering for several days, Salazary surrendered to Gen. Miller, who delivered him to Santa Cruz, who assigned him to the expedition against C.F. Manfull Bilbao, has published his life (Lima, 1853).

SALAZAR, Diego de (sal-lah-thar'), Spanish soldier, b. in the latter half of the 15th century; d. in Florida in 1521. He went to Santo Domingo with one of the expeditions of Columbus, and served there until 1509, when, entering the service of Juan Ponce de Leon, he accompanied the latter in the conquest of the island of Porto Rico, and assisted in the foundation of the city of Caparra. In 1511, when the natives, aided by the Caribes, revolted, Salazar, seeing that one of his companions who had been taken prisoner was to be executed, entered the hostile camp, where about 300 Indians, under the cacique Aimanon, were preparing for the execution, charged the enemy and liber- ated his captive. This exploit inspired the Indians with terror, and the Spaniards, taking advantage of it, thenceforth carried him, even when sick, to the battle-field. In recompense Sala- zar was appointed captain, and on the night of 25 July of the same year, when the Indians surprised and set fire to the town of Guanica, he saved the rest of the Spaniards in that island and defeated the cacique Malobadame near Aymaco, and Azucen- naba near Ahanaco. In 1542 he accompanied Ponce de Leon in his exploration of Florida, and during the second voyage to that country he met his death in an encounter with the natives.

SALAZAR, José Maria, Colombian poet, b. in Antioquia in 1783; d. in Paris, France, in Feb-ruary, 1828. He was graduated as LL. D., in the College of San Bartolome, soon afterward composed two theatrical pieces, which were performed at the theatre of Bogota, and also published several articles in the "Semanario." When the revolution of 1810 began he occupied the place of vice-rector of the College of Mompos, which he abandoned and entered public life. The civil war that fol- lowed the revolution obliged him to move to Caracas, where he was well received by Gen. Miranda, who appointed him minister to the government of Cartagena. In that city he conducted the paper "El Mensajero," and on the arrival of Morillo he emigrated, with other Colombian exiles, to the United States. In 1829 he was appointed minister of the supreme tribunal of Venezuela, and in 1827 he was sent as minister plenipotentiary to the United States. During his stay in New York he published a political pamphlet in English and Spanish about the reforms that ought to be introduced in the constitution of Colombia. He also wrote a poem, "El Solitario de Eneas" (1832), which was translated into French from a Spanish version by Emile Colin. He wrote also the poem "La Ciudad de Oro" (1817).

SALAZAR DE ESPINOZA, Juan de, Spanish soldier, b. in Villa Pamul about the end of the 15th century; d. in Asuncion about 1566. He sailed with the expedition of Pedro de Mendoza (q. v.), and assisted in the foundation of Buenos Ayres. In 1537 Salazar, with the acting governor, Galan, and the garrison, removed to Asuncion, and in 1538 was elected the first mayor of that city. In March, 1542, Salazar fought against the Guaycurus and Agaces Indians, commanding the infantry, and in 1543 he was appointed acting governor at Asuncion. On 25 April, 1544, when Cabeza de Vaca was taken prisoner by the Iroques, the former proclaimed Salazar as their chief. The latter took refuge in the Guaycurus, where he was killed in a battle, and his successor was sent to Spain, but he was absolved by the royal council of the Indies, and in 1549 the emperor appointed him treasurer of the provinces of the Plata, and, when the new gov- ernor died, his son appointed Salazar his substi- tute. The expedition sailed from San Lucar at the beginning of 1550, but Hernando de Tovio des- pired Salazar of the command on the voyage, and landed him at San Vicente, in Brazil, where he stayed almost two years, but in October, 1555, he arrived at Asuncion and took possession of his office as treasurer. Salazar was a candidate for governor in 1558, but was defeated.

SALCEDO, Francisco (sal-thay-do), Mexican monk, b. in Tepic about 1570. He attended the Franciscan order, taught theology in the city of Mexico, and on account of his profound knowledge of the aboriginal languages, including Aztec, Quiché, Cakchiquel, and Tzutuhil, was called by Bishop Gomez Fernandez de Cordova to the University of Guatemala, where he taught these tongues for many years to the clergy and mission- aries. He wrote, "Arte y Diccionario de la Lengua Mexicana," "Sermones Trilingues en Quiché, Cak- chiku y Tzutuhil," and "Documentos Cristianos en tres Lenguas," which are still pre- served in manuscript, unpublished, in the Fran- ciscan convent of Guatemala.
SALDANHA, João Carlos Oliveira, Duke de, Portuguese statesman, b. in Lisbon, 17 Nov., 1791; d. in London, England, 21 Nov., 1876. He was a grandnephew of the famous Marquis de Pombal, and received his education at the College of the nobility of Lisbon and the University of Coimbra. When the royal family fled to Brazil, he remained to serve under the French, but was made a prisoner by Wellington's forces and transported to England. In 1814 he was permitted to go to Brazil, where he was appointed commander of the Portuguese forces. He rendered great service in forwarding troops for the war that resulted in the possession of Uruguay. From 1818 till 1822 he was on the mission of Rio Grande do Sul, and, joining the liberal movement, promulgated the new constitution in 1821, but in 1822 he returned to Europe, as he was unwilling to serve under the regency of Dom Pedro. Upon his arrival in the capital he was appointed captain-general of Brazil and commander-in-chief of all the forces in the country, but, having learned of the election of Dom Pedro to the empire, he refused to return to Brazil to foster a civil war, and was imprisoned for about a year. In February, 1823, King João VI, appointed him secretary of foreign relations, and after the death of the king he became, during the regency of the Infanta Isabel Maria, governor of Oporto, where he suppressed the first movements of the partisans of Don Miguel. 1824 was a series of political struggles and revolutions, sometimes at the head of the government, and then again exiled, or ambassador in France and England. The last revolution in which he took part was in 1870, when he presided for a short time over the cabinet, and in February, 1871, he was sent as ambassador to London, where he died. His left memoirs in manuscript.

SALES, Peter de, b. in Roussillon, France, in 1771; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 16 Feb., 1854. He emigrated to the United States during one of the political convulsions of France, and was instructor at Harvard in French and Spanish from 1816 till 1830 and afterward in Spanish alone till the year of his death. He edited and enlarged Augustin E. Josse's "Grammar of the Spanish Language" (Boston, 1829), and published critical and annotated editions of the Spanish dramatists, "Don Quixote" (1836), and other Spanish classics, the "Fables" of Fontaine, with notes, and treatises on the French and Spanish languages.

SALES LATERRIER, Peter de, b. in Canada in 1789; d. there, 15 Dec., 1834. He studied medicine in London under Sir Ashley Cooper, and on his return to Quebec soon became distinguished as a surgeon. He took part in the war of 1812 as surgeon-in-chief of the Canadianvolunteers. In 1814 he visited France and England, where he married the daughter of Sir Fenwick Balmer, in the following year returned to Canada, and resided in Quebec up to 1823. Here he took a prominent part in the regency of Governor Sir John視, in the public journals, and denouncing the oligarchical régime that then prevailed. In 1823 he went to England, where he published "A Political and Historical Account of Lower Canada, with Remarks on the Present Situation of the People" (London, 1830), which created a sensation in Canada, and delayed the union of the provinces. -His brother, Mark Pascal, b. in Baie-du-Febvre in 1792; d. in Quebec, 30 March, 1875, studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, where he was a pupil of Dr. Rush, and attained his degree in 1812, and established himself in Quebec. During the war of 1812 he served as surgeon-general of the militia of Lower Canada, and in 1814 retired from his profession and took up his residence in his native Ebonlements. He was elected a member of the provincial legislature in 1824, and continued to take a leading part in Canadian politics. The Japanese and difficult highway through the turbulent provinces, which has brought that coast into communication with Quebec, is due to his enterprise.

SALINAS Y CORDOBA, Buenaventura de (cachet-amas), Peruvian clergyman, b. in Lima in the latter part of the 16th century; in Gueruaca, Mexico, 15 Nov., 1653. He belonged to the Franciscan order, and was sent as a commissioner to Spain and Rome in 1871, and returned in 1876 to Mexico as vicar-general. His works, which are mainly devoted to the assertion of the equality of Americans of Spanish race with native-born Spaniards, are "Memorial de las Historias del Nuevo Mundo par el P. y Jeronimo de Oñoria de Lima" (1654; Madrid, 1659), and "Memorial al Rey Nuestro Señor" (Madrid, 1654). The latter was written to be sent to those born of Spanish race in the Indies, but also a strong plea for the liberty of the Indians.

SALISBURY, Edward Elbridge, philologist, b. in Boston, Mass., 6 April, 1814. He was graduated at Yale in 1832, studied theology there for three years, and in 1836-9 prosecuted the study of oriental languages under Silvestre de Sacy, a part of whose library he brought to the United States, and also with Garcin de Tassy in Paris and Franz Bopp in Berlin. A professorship of Arabic and Sanskrit was created for him at Yale in 1841, and, after spending another year in the study of Sanskrit at Bonn, he entered on the duties of his professorship with the delivery of an "Inaugural Discourse on Arabic and Sanskrit Literature" (1843), and of his inaugural address to the chair of Sanskrit to William D. Whitney, providing the endowment and subsequently giving to the university his oriental library. He acted as professor of Arabic for two years longer, and then spent another year in Europe. He had meanwhile been elected corresponding secretary of the American oriental society, and for several years he conducted the "Journal" and labored for the prosperity of the society, of which he became president in 1863. Prof. Salisbury was elected a member of the Asiatic society of Paris in 1838, and a corresponding member of the Imperial academy of sciences and belles-lettres at Constantinople in 1855, and of the German oriental society in 1859, besides being a member of other learned societies, and was given the degree of LL. D. by Yale in 1869 and by Harvard in 1886. Besides oriental papers in the "Journal of the American Oriental Society," he has published articles in the "New Englander," and has printed privately an account of the Biodati family (New Haven, 1857); a lecture on the "Principles of Domestic Taste," delivered before the Yale school of his degree (1877); and a large volume of "Genealogical and Biographical Monographs" (1885). Three additional volumes have since been issued.—His wife, Evelyn, b. in Lyme, Conn., 3 Nov., 1823, a daughter of Charles J. McCurdy, began and has aided him in the completion of the latter, which
He was a circus-rider in Mexico, and in Berlin, King Homer Nissage of England. 1851-'2 He conducted experiments and microscopical examinations, the results of which were published in the “Transactions” of the American association for the advancement of science, and devoted himself later to the study of the cures and treatment of chronic diseases, publishing his therapeutical discoveries in the New York “Journal of Medicine.” In 1864 he settled in Cleveland, Ohio, where he assisted in establishing the Charity hospital medical college, before which he lectured till 1866 on physiology and pathology. He has been president of the Institute of microscopy since 1878. Among his publications are “Microscopic and Physiological Examinations of the Maize Plant during the Various Stages of its Growth,” which was published in the New York agricultural report for 1849, and reprinted in the Ohio state reports; and “Microscopic Examinations of Blood and Vegetables,” by Vario, Vaccina, and Typhoid Fever (London, 1878).

SALISBURY, Sylvester, British soldier, b. in England: d. in Albany, N. Y., about 1830. He was a captain in the force that captured New Amsterdam in 1664, and was placed in command of Port Orange, the name of which he changed to Port Albany. He married a Dutch lady named Marias, and held the offices of high sheriff and justice of the peace at Albany. When New Amsterdam was retaken by the Dutch in 1673, he was carried as a prisoner of war to Spain, then an ally of the Netherlands in the war against France and England. On his release, he was restored to his post at Albany, Sir Edmund Andros sent him to England in 1675 with a petition to King James for a captain's commission.

SALM SALT, Prince Felix, soldier, b. in Anholt, Prussia, 23 Dec., 1828; d. near Metz, Alsace, 18 Aug., 1850. He was a younger son of the reigning Prince zu Salm Salm, was educated at the cadet-school in Berlin, became an officer in the Prussian cavalry, and saw service in the Schleswig-Holstein war, receiving a decoration for bravery at Aarhus. He then joined the Austrian army, but was compelled to resign, extravagant habits having brought him into pecuniary difficulties. In 1861 he came to the United States and offered his services to the national government. He was given a colonel's commission and attached to the staff of Gen. Louis Blenker. In November, 1862, he took command of the 8th New York regiment, which was mustered out in the following spring. He was appointed colonel of the 68th New York volunteers on 8 June, 1864, serving under Gen. James B. Steedman in Tennessee and Georgia, and toward the end of the war was assigned to the command of the post at Atlanta, receiving the brevet of brigadier-general on 13 April, 1865. He next offered his services to the Emperor Maximilian, embarked for Mexico in February, 1866, and on 1 July was appointed colonel of the general staff. He became the emperor's aide-de-camp and chief of his household, and was captured at Queretaro. Soon after Maximilian's execution he returned to Europe, re-entered the Prussian army as major in the grenadier guards, and was killed at the battle of Gravelotte. He published “My Diary in Mexico in 1867, including the Last Days of the Emperor Maximilian, with Leaves from the Diary of the Princess Salm-Salm” (London, 1868). —His wife, Agnes, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1843; d. in New York City, 17 Oct., 1865. She had been adopted when a child in Europe by the wife of a member of the cabinet at Washington, but, after receiving a good education in Philadelphia, to have left her home and become a circus-rider and then a rope-dancer. Afterward she acquired a reputation as an actress under the name of Agnes Leclercq, and lived several years in Havana, Cuba. She returned to the United States in 1862, and married Prince Salm Salm on 30 Aug., 1862. She accompanied her husband throughout his military campaigns in the south, performing useful service in connection with the field-hospitals, and was with him also in Mexico. After the fall of Queretaro she re-ent to San Luis Potosi and implored President Juarez to procure the release of Maximil ian, but was refused. She then tried to establish a commissary department with him. She also sought the intervention of Porfirio Diaz and of Mariano Escobedo, and arranged a conference between the latter general and the archduke. After the death of her husband she raised a hospital brigade, which accomplished much good during the Franco-Prussian war. Subsequently she married Charles Hemenage, an attaché of the British embassy in Mexico, but soon separated from him. She published “Ten Years of My Life” (New York, 1875).

SALNAVE, Sylvain (sal-nehv), president of Hayti, b. in Cape Haytien in 1832; d. in Port au Prince, 15 Jan., 1870. He enlisted in 1850, and was captain of cavalry when Geffrard overthrew Soultouque in January, 1850, being rewarded for his aid with the rank of major. In 1861 he was bitter in his denunciation of Geffrard for what he called the latter's subservience in the matter of the occupation of the Dominican territory by Spain, and Geffrard, whose popularity began to decline, was powerless to punish Salnave. The latter promoted and encouraged frequent insurrections on the part of his opponents. He died in Paris, 1864. He was the chief of the constabulary in the northern part of Hayti, but the movement was put down with the aid of the Spanish. In July, 1866, he led a new rising at Gonaives, and, although he was again defeated, the revolt continued to increase, and, aided by a pronouncement in his favor at Port au Prince, 22 Feb., 1867, he entered the capital on 13 March. A triumvirate was now appointed, composed of Nissage-Saget, Chevalier, and Salnave, and the last was elected president on 14 June. His first act was to promulgate the new constitution that had been voted by the senate, but his despotic rule soon occasioned serious discontent. In 1869 a general insurrection, headed by Nissage-Saget and Domingue, began in the counties of the north and the south. Salnave collected his forces and fought desperately, even after his chief general, Chevalier, had gone over to the enemy, intrenching himself in Port au Prince, where he was soon besieged by the rebel army under Gen. Brice. The defence was obstinate, and Salnave refused to surrender even after his fleet had been captured. Port au Prince had been bombarded, and the grand palace had been completely destroyed by an explosion. At the instance of the British consul he endeavored on 19 Dec. to escape to Dominican territory, but was captured by Gen. Cabrall on 10 Jan., 1870, and by him surrendered to Nissage-Saget, who had assumed command at Port au Prince. On his arrival in the capital, Salnave was tried and sentenced to death by a court-martial on charges of bloodshed and treason, and was immediately executed on the steps of the ruined palace.

SALOMON, Frederick, soldier, b. near Halberstadt, Prussia, 7 April, 1826. After passing through the gymnasium, he became a government surveyor, later a lieutenant of artillery, and in 1848 a pupil in the Berlin school of architecture. Emigrating soon afterward to the United States, he settled in Manitous, Wis., as a surveyor. He was for four years county register of deeds, and in 1857-9 chief engineer on the Manitous and Wisconsin railroad. He entered the volunteer service in the spring of 1861 as a captain in the 5th Missouri volunteers, and served under Gen. Franz Sigel, being present at Wilson's Creek. After the three-months' term of service had expired he was appointed colonel of the 9th Wisconsin infantry, which he commanded in the southwest until he was made a brigadier-general, 16 June, 1862, and assigned to the command of a brigade in Kansas. On the 10th of June, 1862, he captured Newtonia, Mo. He served through the war, receiving the brevet of major-general in March, 1865, and was mustered out on 25 Aug., 1865. Gen. Salomon was subsequently for several years surveyor-general of Utah territory, where he now resides.—His brother, Edward, b. near Halberstadt, Prussia, in 1828, came with him to this country, became a lawyer, was governor of Wisconsin in 1862-3, and now practices in New York city. He has gained a high reputation as a political speaker, especially in the German language.

SALOMON, Hayim, financier, b. in Lissa, Prussian Poland, about 1740; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1783. He settled in Philadelphia some years before the Revolution as a merchant and banker, and succeeded in accumulating a large fortune, which he subsequently devoted to the use of the American government during the war for independence. He negotiated all the war subsidies obtained during that struggle from France and Holland, which he indorsed and sold in bills to American merchants at a credit of two and three months on his personal security, receiving for his commission 1 percent and for his paymastership 2 percent, as paymaster-general of the French forces in the United States, and for some time lent money to the agents or ministers of several foreign states when their own sources of supply were cut off. It is asserted that over $100,000 thus advanced have never been repaid. To the U. S. government Mr. Salomon lent about $600,000 in specie, and at his death $400,000 of this amount had not been returned. This was irrespective of what he had lent to statesmen and others while in the discharge of public trusts. His descendants have frequently petitioned for remuneration, and their claims have several times been favorably reported upon by committees of congress.

SALPOINTE, Jean Baptiste, R. C. archbishop, b. at Mont-Mirabeau, France, 21 Feb., 1823; d. in Tuscany, 16 July, 1898. He received his education in a school in Aix, and subsequently studied the classics in the College of Clermont and philosophy and theology in the Seminary of Clermont Ferrand. He was raised to the priesthood on 20 Dec., 1851, and, after spending about eight years in parochial work, was appointed to a post in the preparatory seminary of Clermont, he came to the United States in 1859, and was parish priest of Mora, N. M., until he was appointed vicar-general of Arizona in 1866. He was nominated vicar apostolic of Arizona three years afterward, and consecrated by the title of bishop of Doryla in partibus on 20 June, 1869. His vicariate included Arizona, with part of Texas and New Mexico. He immediately set about building churches, organizing new congregations, and founding schools and hospitals. The number of churches he had established within three years he increased from about forty to two hundred, and the establishments of churches, schools and hospitals increased from about a dozen to twenty-three, besides fifteen chapels. He succeeded Archbishop Lam公社 as archbishop of Santa Fé in 1885.

SALTER, Richard, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1723; d. in Mansfield, Conn., 14 April, 1780. He was graduated in 1741 at King's College in medicine, and then theology, supplied a pulpit in Boston for some time, and on 27 June, 1744, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Mansfield, where he remained till his death. He gave to Yale college in 1781 a farm, which was sold for $2,000, for the purpose of promoting the study of Hebrew and other oriental languages. He was proficient in Greek, Hebrew, and other branches of oriental literature. He was of the D. D. was conferred on him by Yale in 1782. He published an "Election Sermon" (1768), and began a "Commentary on the New Testament," but abandoned his design, when the work was in great part written.

SALTER, William D., naval officer, b. in New York city in 1794; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 3 Jan., 1869. He entered the navy, 25 Aug., 1809, was attached to the frigate "Constitution" under Com. Isaac Hull during the action with the British frigate "Guerrière," on 19 Aug., 1812, and was the last survivor of those who participated in that action. He became lieutenant on 9 Dec., 1814, was made master-commandant on 3 March, 1831, captain on 3 March, 1829, and commodore on the retired list on 10 July, 1842. He was in command of the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1856-7, and in 1863 was on a commission to examine vessels, from which duty he was relieved in 1866.

SALTONSTALL, Sir Richard, colonist, b. in Halifax, England, in 1586; d. in England about 1638. He was a nephew of Sir Richard, who was lord mayor of London in 1597. The nephew was justice of the peace for the first county court and the lord mayor of Ledsham, near Leeds. He was one of the grantees of the Massachusetts company under the charter that was obtained from Charles 1. On 26 Aug., 1629, Saltonstall, Thomas Dudley, Isaac Johnson, John Winthrop, and eight other gentlemen signed an agreement to pass the seas and to inhabit and continue in New England, provided that the patent and whole government of the plantation should be transferred to them and other actual colonists. The proposition was accepted by the general court of the company, which elected Sir Richard the first-named assistant of the new governor. He arrived with Gov. Winthrop in the "Arbella" on 22 June, 1630, and began, with George Phillips, the settlement of Watertown, but, owing to the illness of his two young daughters, who, with his five sons, had accompanied him, he returned with them and two of the sons to England in 1631, where he continued to display in all ways the greatest interest in the colony, and to exert himself for its advancement. He was one of the patentees of Connecticut, and sent out a shallop to take possession of the territory of the vessel, in the return voyage, was wrecked on Sable island in 1635. In 1644 he was sent as ambassador to Holland. A portrait that was painted by Rembrandt while he was there is reproduced in the Illustration. He was one of the judges of the high court that sentenced the Duke of Hamilton, Lord Caer, and others to death for treason in 1649. In 1651 he wrote to John Cotton and John Wilson a letter of remonstrance in regard to their persecution of the Quakers.—His son, Richard, b. in Woodsmere, Yorkshire, England, in 1610; d. in Hulme, Lancashire, 29 April, 1694, was matriculated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, in 1637, and emigrated to Massachussets with his father in 1639, and became the first settlers of Ipswich, and was chosen one of the governor's assistants in 1637. In 1642 he published a polemic against the council appointed for life. In July, 1643, he signed a letter urging the colonial authorities to take warlike measures against the French in Acadia. He befriended the regicides that escaped to New England in 1650, and protested against the importation of negro slaves. In 1652 he returned to England.—The second Richard's son, Nathaniel, councillor, b. in Ipswich, Mass., in 1639; d. in Haverhill, Mass., 21 May, 1707, was graduated at Harvard in 1659. He was an assistant from 1679 till 1686, and was offered a seat in the council by Sir Edmund Andros, but declined. After the deposition of that governor, he was chosen one of the council under the charter of William and Mary. In 1692 he was appointed one of the judges in a special commission of over and terminer to try the persons accused of practising witchcraft in Salem. Reprobing the spirit of persecution that prevailed, and foreseeing the outcome of the trials, he refused to accept the commission.—Nathaniel's son, Gurdon, governor of Connecticut, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 27 March, 1666; d. in New London, Conn., 20 Sept., 1724, was graduated at Harvard in 1684, studied theology, and was ordained minister of New London, Conn., on 19 Nov., 1691. He was distinguished not only for learning and eloquence, but for knowledge of affairs and elegance of manners. He was one of a commission that was deputed by the Connecticut assembly to wait upon the Earl of Bellomont when he arrived in New York in 1698, and was frequently called on to assist in public business. While Gov. Fitz John Winthrop was ill, Saltonstall, who was his pastor, acted as his chief adviser and representative, and on the death of the governor was chosen by the assembly to be his successor, entering on his functions on 1 Jan, 1708. In the following May he was confirmed in the office at the regular election. His first official duty was to propose a synod for the adoption of a system of ecclesiastical discipline. The Saybrook platform, which was the outcome of his suggestion, was by his influence made to conform in some essentials to the Presbyterian polity. Gov. Saltonstall was appointed agent of the colony in 1709 for the purpose of conveying an address to Queen Anne urging the conquest of Canada, and raised a large contingent in Connecticut for the disastrous expedition of Sir Hovenden Walker. He set up in his house the first printing-press in the colony in 1709, and was active in the arrangements for establishing a Yale college, influencing the decision to build at New Haven instead of at Hartford, making the plans and estimates, and during the early years of the college taking the chief part in the direction of its affairs. He was continued in the office of governor by annual election till his death.—Gurdon's nephew, Richard, jurist, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 24 June, 1709; d. 20 Oct., 1756, was graduated at Harvard in 1729, and in 1732 was chosen to represent Haverhill in the general court. Subsequently he was a member of the council. From 1736 till he resigned a few months before his death he was a judge of the superior court. He was chairman of a commission that was appointed in 1757 to trace the boundary-line between Massachusetts and New Hampshire.—Gurdon's son, Gurdon, b. in New London, Conn., 22 Dec., 1708; d. in Norwich, Conn., 19 Sept., 1783, was graduated at Yale in 1735. He was appointed colonel of militia in 1739, served at the siege of Louisburg in 1745, and was one of the commissioners for fitting out expeditions against Canada. He was a member of the general assembly in 1744–8, then of the house of representatives. He continued to sit in the assembly again at intervals till 1757. From 1751 till his death he was judge of probate at New London. In September, 1776, he was appointed brigadier-general of militia, and reported to Gen. Washington at Westchester with nine regiments.—The second Gurdon's nephew, Dudley, naval officer, b. in New London, Conn., 8 Sept., 1738; d. in the West Indies in 1786, commanded Essek Hopkins's squadron in February, 1776, and on 19 Oct., 1776, was appointed fourth in the list of captains of the Continental navy. He was commodore of the fleet that left Boston in July, 1779, to reduce a British post on Penobscot river. Saltonstall was desirous of attacking as soon as they arrived, but Gen. Solomon Lovell, the commander of militia, was unwilling. When Sir George Collier appeared off the coast with a formidable naval force, the Americans re-embarked. Saltonstall drew up his vessels in order of battle at the mouth of the river, but was greatly overmatched, and his men were demoralized. As soon as the enemy came near, his ship, the Warren, was set on fire and he was severely wounded. He saved the same manner, while the rest were captured by the enemy. The crews and the land-forces fled to the woods, and made their way by land to Boston. A court of inquiry, wishing to shield the state militia, and, perhaps, establish a claim on the Continental government for a part of the expenses by inculpating a Continental officer, blamed Saltonstall for the disastrous termination of the expedition, which had involved Massachusetts in a debt of $7,000,000, and on 7 Oct., 1779, he was dismissed the service. He afterward commanded the privateer "Minerva," and among the prizes taken by him was the "Hannah," a merchant ship bound for New York with a valuable cargo.—The third Richard's son, Richard, soldier, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 5 April, 1735; d. there 24 Oct., 1783, was graduated at Harvard in 1751. He commanded a regiment in the French war, and soon after the peace of 1763 was appointed sheriff of Essex county. In the beginning of 1776 he emigrated to England. While sympathizing with the Tories, he refused to take a command in the royal army, to fight against his fellow-countrymen. Another son, Nathaniel, physician, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 10 Feb., 1746; d. there, 15 May, 1815, was graduated at Harvard in 1766. He was a skilful physician, possessed high scientific attainments.
and during the Revolution was a firm Whig.—Another son, Leverett, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 25 Dec., 1734; d. in New York city, 29 Dec., 1782, accompanied the British army from Boston to Halifax, was given a commission, and served as a captain under Lord Cornwallis.—The second Nathaniel’s son, Leverett, lawyer, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 13 June, 1783; d. in Salem, Mass., 8 May, 1845, was graduated at Harvard in 1803, and at the same time at the age of 20. He was speaker of the state house of representatives, president of the state senate, the first mayor of Salem in 1836–8, a presidential elector on the Webster ticket in 1857, and was elected to congress to fill a vacancy, serving from 5 Dec., 1858, till 3 March, 1863. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1858. He was a man of large member of the Massachusetts historical society, the American academy of arts and sciences, and other learned bodies. When he died, he left a large part of his library to Phillips Exeter academy, where he had received his early education, and a bequest of money to purchase books for the library at Harvard. He was the author of an “Historical Sketch of Haverhill,” printed in the Collection of Massachusetts Historical Society. A descendant of Gorden, William Wanton, b. in New London, Conn. Jan. 19, 1733; d. in Chicago, Ill., 18 March, 1868, was on his mother’s side a great-grandson of Joseph Wanton. He was an early settler in Chicago, and during the last twenty years of his life held the post of assisant in bankruptcy.—The second Leverett’s grandson, Leverett, lawyer, b. in Salem, Mass., 19 March, 1828; d. 18 April, 1895, was graduated at Harvard and at the law-school, and practised in Boston till 1864. In December, 1885, he was appointed collector of customs for the port of Boston and Charlestown. He was an active member of the Massachusetts historical society and of other learned bodies, and was compiling a genealogical history of his family.

SALTS, Edzar, author, b. in New York city, 8 June, 1858. He was educated at St. Paul’s school, Concord, N. H., studied later at the Sorbonne, Paris, and in Heidelberg and Munich, Germany, and after his return to Columbia college law-school, where he graduated in 1890. His earnest literary efforts were in poetry. His first book was “Balzac,” a biography (Boston, 1884). He next devoted himself to a series of mystical philosophy, a history of which he published under the title of “The Philosophy of Disenchantment” (1885), which was followed by an analytical exposition entitled “The Anatomy of Negation” (London, 1896; New York, 1887). He is the author also of “Mr. Incom’s Misadventure” (1887); “The Truth of the Own” (1894); “Mary Magdalene” (New York, 1891); “Imperial Purple” (Chicago, 1893); and “When Dreams Come True” (New York, 1895).

SALVATIERA, Juan Maria de (sal-vat-i-er-a), Italian missionary, b. in Milan, 15 Nov., 1648; d. in Guadalajara, Mexico, 18 July, 1717. He studied in the Jesuit college of Parma, entered the Society of Jesus, went to Mexico; there he studied theology, and was for several years professor of rhetoric in the College of Puebla. Later he obtained permission to convert the Tarahumar Indians of the northwest, among whom he lived for ten years, founding several missions. He was subsequently appointed visitor of the missions in Sinaloa and Sonora, and there formed a project for the spiritual conquest of California. But all the military expeditions to that country had been without result. After obtaining permission from his superiors, he sailed on 10 Oct., 1697, for Lower California, where, on 19 Oct., he laid the foundation of the mission of Loreto. He soon learned the language of the natives, whom he propagated by his kindness, and in seven years established six other missions along the coast. In 1704 he was appointed provincial of his order, and resided in Mexico, but when his term was concluded in 1707, he returned to his mission work. In 1717 he was called to the capital by the viceroy, the Marquis de Valero, to give material for the “History of California,” which King Philip V. had ordered to be written. Although suffering from illness, Salvatierra obeyed, and, crossing the Gulf of California, continued his voyage along the coast, carried on the shoulders of the Indians, till he died in Guadalajara. He wrote “Cartas sobre la Constitución espiritual de Californias” (Mexico, 1699), and “Nuevas cartas sobre Californias” (1699), which have been used by Father Miguel Venegas in his “Historia de Californias.” Salvatierra is still known as the apostle of California.

SALVYERT, Pierre du, colonial governor, b. in France about 1600. He was an officer in the French navy, and in 1651 was appointed as the governor of New Orleans. On the recall of the Sieur de Bienville in 1724, he was sent out as governor of Louisiana. His administration was lax and inefficient, and the Natchez Indians, exasperated by the deeds of evil-disposed persons, rose against the French, and on 29 Nov., 1729, slaughtered all the male inhabitants of the post in their country. Their example was followed by the Yazoos, Perier formed an alliance with the Choctaw, and, after the latter had met the enemy in the field several times, marched into the Natchez country, and laid siege to the fortified village of the Indians until they withdrew across the Mississippi. In order to restore the prestige of French arms, the governor sent an expedition of 1,000 men against the Natchez in the following winter, which succeeded in capturing their fort and taking several hundred prisoners, who were sent to Santo Domingo and sold as slaves. In 1733 Bienville was reinstated, and Perier returned to France, where he was made lieutenant-general. In 1755 he was sent in command of a fleet for the protection of Santo Domingo, and during the war of 1756-63 he commanded a squadron.

SALVINI, Tommaso, Italian dramatist, b. in Milan, Italy, in 1741. His father and mother were actors of ability. He performed children's parts at the age of thirteen, later joined the troupe of Adelaide Ristori, and shared her triumphs. After fighting in the Italian war for independence in 1849, he returned to the stage, and, by his impersonation of the title-roles of Giuseppe Nicolini’s “Pompeo” and Vittorio Alfieri’s “Samuel,” achieved an European reputation. He was a faithful Orosmane in Voltaire’s “Zaire,” first essayed Othello in 1857, created the part of Conrad in “La morte civile,” and added to his repertoire Romeo, Hamlet, Ingomar, Paolo in Silvio Pellico’s “Francesca di Rimini,” which he played at the Dante celebration in 1865, and the Gladiator in Alexandre Dumet’s theatrical of that name, “Sullivan in “David Garrick,” Tampopo in Tasso, Sancho, Escudero, Elizabeth,” Maxime Odot in the “Romance of a Poor Young Man,” and other characters. In 1871 he visited South America, and in 1873-4 he made a tour in the United States, giving 128 performances, besides 28 in Havana. In New York city Edwin Booth played the ghost to his Hamlet. In 1881 he began to act in English.

SALZMANN, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Munzbach, Austria, 17 Aug., 1819; d. in Milwaukee, Wic., 17 Jan., 1874. He studied at the University of Vienna, where he won his doctor's degree, and was ordained a priest in 1842. He came to the United States in 1847, and was appointed pastor of St. Mary's church, Milwaukee. He succeeded Archbishop Henne as president of the Theological seminary of St. Francis, the success of which is in a great measure due to his efforts. He was one of the committee of the FRIENDS against the slave, and one of the contributors of the Bantam periodical published at Milwaukee, to which he was a frequent contributor.

SAMOSET, Indian chief, b. in New England about 1690. He was a chief of the Pemaudicks on the Maine coast, and learned English from the colonists of Montghean island, sent out by Sir Ferdinando Gorges. Three months after the landing of the Pilgrims, Samoset entered their settlement at Plymouth with the salutation "Welcome, Englishmen!" He informed them that Patuxet, where they had planted their village, was ownerless land, because its former inhabitants had been carried off by pestilence. A week later he brought Squanto, who had been taken to England, to act as their interpreter, and showed his friendly interest in evangelization. He was a fine interpreter of the Bible, and Mass., the chief sachem of the Wampanoags.

SAMPLE, Robert Fleming, clergyman, b. in Cornung, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1829. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Camonburg, Pa., in 1849, and at Western theological seminary, Allegheny City, in 1853. He was pastor of a Presbyterian church at Mercer, Pa., in 1854-5, and then at Bedford, Pa., till 1856, when he removed to Minneapolis, Minn., and after supplying a pulpit for two years was called to the pastorate of another, in which he continued until, in 1857, he exchanged it for a charge in New York City. He is a member of various church boards, and a director of the McCormick theological seminary, Chicago, Ill. He received the degree of D. D., from Wooster university, Ohio, in 1876. In 1884 he was sent as a delegate to the Presbyterian alliance at Belfast, Ireland. He has been a frequent contributor to the religious press.

Besides numerous pamphlets and sermons, he has published several books for the young on Christian experience, and also a "Memoir of Rev. John C. Tomson," 1880.

SAMPSON, or SAMSON, Deborah, heroine, b. in Plympton, Mass., 17 Dec., 1700; d. in Sharon, Mass., 29 April, 1827. She was large of frame, and accustomed to severe toil, and when not yet eighteen years of age, moved by a patriotic impulse, determined to disguise her sex and enlist in the Continental army. By teaching for two terms, she earned enough to buy cloth from which she fashioned a suit of male clothing. She was accepted as a private in the 4th Massachusetts regiment, under the name of Robert Shurtleff, and served in the ranks three years, volunteering in several hazardous enterprises, and showing unusual coolness in action. In a skirmish near Tarrytown she received a sabre cut on the temple, and four months later she was shot through the shoulder. Frightened by the noise then put on a pair of mule shoes, she was seized with brain fever, and sent to the hospital in Philadelphia. The surgeon discovered her sex, took her to his home, and on her recovery disclosed the facts to the commander of her company, who sent her with a letter to Gen. Washington. The commander-in-chief gave her a discharge, with a note ordering her to put on a pair of mules. After the war she married Benjamin Gannett, a farmer of Sharon. During Washington's administration she was invited to the capital, and congress, which was then in session, voted her a pension and a grant of lands. She published a narrative of her life in the army, under the title of "The Female Review" (Bedford, 1797), of which a new edition was issued by the Rev. John A. Vinton, with an introduction and notes (Boston, 1866).

SAMPSON, Ezra, clergyman, b. in Middleborough, Mass., 12 Feb., 1749; d. in New York city, 13 Dec., 1823. He was graduated at Yale in 1763. He was ordained to the gospel ministry, and settled in Plympton, Mass., on 15 Feb., 1755. In that year he officiated as chaplain in the camp at Roxbury, and by his vigorous discourses encouraged the patriotic determination of the militia. He retained his charge until, at the end of twenty years, his voice failed, when he resigned, removed to Hudson, N. Y., soon afterward, and in company with Harry Cropwell, began the publication in 1801 of the "American Review," from which he withdrew in 1803. He was editor of the "Connecticut Courant" at Hartford in 1804, and continued to write for the paper till 1817. In 1814 he was appointed a judge of Columbia county, N. Y., but he soon resigned. He published a "Sermon before Col. Cotton's Regiment" (1775); "A Spanking" (1777); "Endless Circumlocution; or, the Study of the Bible" (1802); "The Sham Patriot Unmasked" (1803); "Historical Dictionary" (1804); and "The Brief Remarks on the Ways of Man," a collection of moral essays originally published in the "Courant" (1817; new ed., 1855).

SAMPSON, Francis Smith, Rebaist, b. in Goodfield county, Va., 5 Nov., 1814; d. at Hampden Sidney college, Va., 31 Mar, 1881, entered the University of Virginia in 1831, was graduated M. A. in 1836, and after studying two years at Union theological seminary in Virginia, was appointed teacher of Hebrew there. He was ordained as an evangelist in 1841. He performed all the duties of professor of oriental languages and literature, but was not given the title of professor till 1849, when he returned from a year's study at Halle and Berlin. Hampden Sidney college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1849. He prepared a "Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (New York, 1856).

SAMPSON, John Patterson, author, b. in Wilmington, N. C., 13 Aug., 1857. He is of mixed Scottish and African descent, was graduated at Massachusetts college, Boston, Mass. He taught for a short time a teacher's school in New York city, and during the civil war conducted a journal in Cincinnati, Ohio, called the "Colored Citizen," in which he advocated the enlistment of negroes in the National army. In 1865 he was appointed assessor at Wilmington, N. C., and was superintendent of the Freedman's school in 1866. In 1868-9 he attended the Western theological college at Alleghany, Pa. He took an active part in reconstruction, was a member of the North Carolina constitutional convention, was nominated by the Republicans for both the legislature and congress, and for fifteen years held various posts under the state and U. S. Governments. After completing his studies at the National law university, Washington, D. C., he was admitted to the bar of Delaware supreme court in 1873. In 1882 he relinquished the practice of law, and entered the ministry of the African Methodist Episcopal church. He was appointed to a church near Trenton, N. J., was chosen chaplain of the state senate, and afterward took charge of a congregation at Trenton. He received the degree of D. D. from Wilberforce university, Ohio, in 1888. He was a delegate to the general conference in 1888, is known as a lecturer on social and scientific subjects, and has published in book-form "Common-sense Physiology" (Hampton, Va., 1890); "The Disappointed Bride" (1883);
SAMPSON

“Temperament and Phrenology of Mixed Races” (Trenton, 1854); “Jolly People” (Hampton, 1866); and “Illustrations in Theology” (1888).

SAMPSON, William, author, b. in Londonderry, Ireland, 17 Jan., 1764; d. in New York city, 27 Dec., 1836. He was the son of a Presbyterian minister, and held a commission in the Irish volunteer corps, but afterward entered Dublin University, and graduated in 1788. He had frequently been counsel for members of the Society of United Irishmen, thereby exciting the suspicions of the government, and after the failure of the rebellion of 1798 fled, but was brought back as a prisoner to Dublin. He was released on condition that he should go to Portugal. While there he was again imprisoned at the instance of the English government, which was anxious to obtain papers that had been in his possession. He was finally set free, and came to this country. He established himself as a lawyer in New York city, obtained a large practice, and through his writings, which contain severe invectives against the common law, was influential in bringing about amendments and consolidations of the laws of the state. He published “Sampson against the Hamilton for the Reform of Law-Suits” (Philadelphia, 1805); “Memoirs of William Sampson” (New York, 1807; London, 1829); “Catholic Question in America” (1813); “Discourse before the New York Historical Society on the Common Law” (1824); “Discourse and Correspondence with Learned Jurists upon the History of the Law” (Washington, 1826); and the “History of Ireland,” in 1834, a report of Dr. W. Cooke Taylor’s “Civil Wars of Ireland” (New York, 1833); also reports of various trials.

SAMPSON, William Thomas, naval officer, b. in Palmyra, N.Y., 9 Feb., 1840. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1861, and attached to the frigate “Potomac” with the rank of master. In July, 1862, he was commissioned lieutenant, and in 1862-3 he served in the practice-sloop “John Adams.” During 1864 he was stationed at the naval academy, and he then served in the “Patapsco” with the South Atlantic blockading squadron in 1864-5, and was in that vessel when she was destroyed in Charleston harbor in January, 1865. He served in the flag-ship “Colorado,” of the European squadron in 1867, and was in that vessel when she was lost in 1867-71. Meanwhile he had been commissioned lieutenant-commander on 25 July, 1866. His next service was in the “Congress” on special duty in 1872, and on the European station in 1873, after which, in 1875, he had the “Alert,” and was commissioned commander on 9 Aug., 1874. During 1876-9 he was at the naval academy, and in 1880 was given command of the “Swatara” of the Asiatic squadron. He was assistant superintendent of the U. S. naval observatory in Washington in 1882-3, and in September, 1886, was appointed superintendent of the U. S. naval academy. He was promoted captain in March, 1889, made chief of the bureau of ordnance in January, 1893, and assigned to command of the “Iowa” in June, 1893. In May, 1898, he was appointed acting rear-admiral, and in July he destroyed Cervera’s squadron off Santiago.

SAMSON, George Whitefield, clergyman, b. in Harvard, Mass., 29 Sept., 1819. He was graduated at Brown in 1839 and at Newton theological seminary in 1843. In the same year he was called to the charge of the E. street Baptist church, Washington, D.C., of which, with the exception of two years in Jamaica Plains, Mass., and some time in foreign travel, he remained pastor until 1858. In that year he called to the presidency of Columbian college, which office he held until 1871. Soon afterward he was elected president of Rutgers female college, New York city, and continued in this relation until 1873. While president of the female college Dr. Samson was also, for part of the time, pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Harrisburg, Pa. In 1874 he removed the duties of president of Rutgers, and was at the same time engaged in conducting a training-school designed to prepare young men for evangelistic work. Besides numerous articles in periodicals, he is the author of “To Damascus, or the Spiritual Medium” (Boston, 1852; 2d ed., entitled “Spiritualism Tented,” 1860); a “Memoir of Mary J. Graham,” the author of “The Holy War” (1856); “Outlines of the History of Ethics” (1869); “Elements of Art Criticism” (Philadelphia, 1867; abridged ed., 1868); “Physical Media in Spiritual Manifestations” (1869); “The Atonement” (1878); “Divine Law as to Wines” (New York, 1880); “English Revisers’ Greek Text shown to be Unauthorized” (1882); “Guide to Self Education” (1886); “Guide to Bible Interpretation” (1887); and “Idols of Fashioning” (Dublin, 1888).

SAMUELS, Edward Augustus, naturalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 4 July, 1836. He received a common-school education, began early to write for the press, and from 1860 till 1880 was assistant to the secretary of the Massachusetts state board of agriculture. For several years he has been president of the Massachusetts fish and game protection society, besides following the business of a publisher of musical works. He has given attention to invention, and is the originator of a process for engraving by photography directly from nature or from a photographic print. Mr. Samuels has contributed long essays to the U. S. and the Massachusetts agricultural reports, and has published, among other works, “Ornithology and Oology of New England” (Boston, 1867); “Among the Birds” (1867); “Mammalogy of New England” (1868); and, with Augustus C. L. Arnold, “The Living World” (2 vols., 1866-70). His latest illustrated work is entitled “With Fly-rod and Camera” (New York, 1890).—His wife, Susan Blagge Caldwell, author, b. in Dedham, Mass., 21 Oct., 1845, is a daughter of Com. Charles H. Caldwell, U. S. navy, of Boston, Mass., before her marriage, and in 1855 was a member of the school committee of Waltham. Mrs. Samuels is the author of numerous stories that have appeared in juvenile magazines and religious weeklies and of a series of books called “Springdale Stories” (6 vols., Boston, 1871), which were re-issued as “Golden Rule Stories” (1880).—His sister, Adelaide Florence, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 Sept., 1845, was educated in a district school at Milton, Mass., and became a teacher and ultimately a writer. Her publications in book-form include “Adrift in the World” (Boston, 1875); “Little Cricket” (1873); “Daisy Travers, or the Girls of Hive Hall” (1876); and other stories for youth.

SAMUELS, Samuel, seaman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 March, 1825. He shipped as cabinboy on a coasting-vessel at the age of eleven, studied navigation on shipboard, and after many voyages became at twenty-one captain of a merchantman. He commanded for several years the “Dreadnought,” the fastest of the sailing-packets. In 1863-4 he was captain of the U. S. steamship “Wicked Jack.” In 1864 he was general superintendent of the quartermaster’s department in New York city, having charge of the repairing, victualing, and despatching of vessels. In 1865 he commanded the “McClellan” at the taking of Port Fisher. He was captain of the "Fulton," the last of the American packet-steamers between New York and Havre in 1866, and in the winter commanded the "Henrietta" yacht in her race from New York to Southampton, in 1870 the yacht "Dauntless" in her race with the "Cambrìa" from Queenstown to New York, making the voyage in twenty-one days, and again in 1887 in her race across the Atlantic with the "Coronet." In 1872 he organized the Samana bay company of Saratoga, with a view to proving that the U.S. government should acquire a part of the bay as a naval station. He was granted a concession by the Dominican executive, which was confirmed by a plebiscite, and took possession in March, 1873, but in 1874 was expelled by the new government. In 1876 he organized the Rousseau electric-signal company, and introduced the English system of interlocking switches and signals. He was general superintendent in 1878-9 of the Pacific mail steamship company at San Francisco, Cal. and in 1881 he organized the United States steam heating and power company in New York city. Capt. Samuels has published a narrative of his early life and adventures in the merchant service, with a foreword of "From Forecastle to Cabin" (New York, 1887).

SANBORN, Charles Henry, physician, b. in Hampton Falls, N. H., 9 Oct., 1822. He was educated in the common schools of New Hampshire, taught for several years, was graduated at Harvard medical school in 1856, and has since practised medicine at Hampton Falls. He was active in the political revolt of the Independent Democrats of New Hampshire in 1845, which ended in detaching the state from its pro-slavery position. In 1854-5 he was a member of the legislature. He published "The North and the South" (Boston, 1856).—His brother, Franklin Benjamin, reformer, b. in Hampton Falls, N. H., 15 Dec., 1831, was graduated at Harvard in 1856, and in 1856 became secretary of the Massachusetts state Kansas committee. His interest in similar enterprises led to his active connection with the Massachusetts state board of charities, of which he was secretary in 1863-8, a member in 1870-6, and chairman in 1874-6, succeeding Dr. Samuel G. Howe. In 1875 he made a searching investigation into the abuses of the Tewsbury almshouse, and in conclusion the institution was reformed. Mr. Sanborn was active in founding the Massachusetts infant asylum and the Clarke institution for deaf-mutes, and has devoted much attention to the administration of the Massachusetts lunacy system. In 1879 he helped to reorganize the system of Massachusetts charities, with special reference to the care of children and insane persons, and in July, 1879, he became inspector of charities under the new board. He called together the first national conference of charities in 1874, and was treasurer of the conference in 1886-8. In 1863 he was associated in the organization of the American social science association, of which he was one of the secretaries until 1869, and he has since been its secretary, and professor of philosophy and William T. Harris. He assisted in establishing the Concord summer school of philosophy in 1879, and was its secretary and one of its lecturers. Since 1868 he has been editorially connected with the Springfield "Republican," and has also been a contributor to newspapers and reviews. The various reports that he has issued as a charity reformer has brought him member, from 1865 till 1888, comprise about forty volumes. He has edited William E. Channing's "Wanderer" (Boston, 1871) and A. Bronson Alcott's "Soumet and Canzonets" (1882) and "New Connecticut" (1886); and is the author of "Life of Thoreau" (1882) and "Life and Letters of John Brown" (1885).

SANBORN, Edwin David, educator, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 14 May, 1808; d. in Hanover, N. H., 29 Dec., 1885. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1832, taught for a year at Gilmanton, studied law, and afterward divinity at Andover seminary, and became professor of Latin at Dartmouth in 1835. In 1859 he became president of Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., but in 1863 he returned to Dartmouth as professor of oratory and belles-lettres. In 1880 he assumed the new chair of Anglo-Saxon and the English language and literature. He received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Vermont in 1859. He married, on 11 Dec., 1837, Mary Ann, a niece of Daniel Webster. He was a leader in public affairs in his town and state, and was several times elected to the legislature. Besides contributions to newspapers and magazines, he published lectures on education, a "Eulogy on Daniel Webster" (Hanover, 1853), and a "History of New Hampshire" (Manchester, 1853).—His daughter, Katharine Abbott, author, b. in Hanover, N. H., 1853. She taught English literature in various seminaries, and held that chair in Smith college for several years, resigning in 1886, in order to follow literary pursuits in New York city. She has lectured in public on literary history and allied subjects, and written on education, and for several years was a newspaper correspondent in New York city. She has also edited calendars and holiday books. Under the name of Kate Sanborn she has published "Home Pictures of English Poets" (New York, 1869); the "Round Table Series of Literature Lessons" (1884); "The Vanity and Insanity of Gensius" (1885); "Wit of Women" (1886); and "A Year of Sunshine" (1887).

SANBORN, John Benjamin, soldier, b. in Epsom, N. H., 5 Dec., 1826. He was educated at Dartmouth, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in July, 1854. In December of that year he removed to St. Paul, Minn., where he has since resided, engaged in the practice of the law, and participated in the public service. As adjutant-general and quartermaster-general of Minnesota he organized and sent to the field five regiments of infantry, a battalion of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery in 1861, and in the spring of 1862 left the state as colonel of the 4th Minnesota volunteers, remaining in active service in the field to the close of the war. At Iuka, its first battle, he commanded the leading brigade and was commended in the official report. About 600 of his men, out of 2,200, were killed and wounded in little more than an hour. For this he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, but the senate reversed this appointment to which he had been nominated after the Vicksburg campaign, on the recommendation of Gen. McPherson and Gen. Grant, he was again commissioned to date from 4 Aug., 1863. This appointment was con-

armed by the senate. He participated in the battles of Corinth, Port Gibson, Raymond Jackson, and Champion Hills, and in the assault and siege of Vicksburg. He was designated to lead the advance into the town after the surrender, and superintended the paroling of the prisoners of war and passing them beyond the lines. This honor was conferred on account of his gallant conduct and that of his command, especially at the battle of Jackson. He served as governor of the district of southwest Missouri and a brigade and division of cavalry in the field in October and November, 1864, and fought the actions of Jefferson City, Booneville, Independence, Big Blue, Little Blue, Osage, Marías-des-Cygnées, and Newtonia. He was never defeated by the enemy, and never failed of complete success except in the assault of 29 May at Vicksburg. He conducted a campaign against the Indians of the southwest in the summer and autumn of 1865, opened all the lines of communication to the territories of Colorado and New Mexico, and terminated all hostilities with the Comanche, Kiowa, Cheyenne, Arapahoe, and Apache of the upper Arkansas, by the treaties that he concluded at the mouth of the Little Arkansas in October, 1866. After two years, 1865–6, under the direction of President Johnson, he adjusted amicably the difficulties growing out of the war between the Cherokees, Chocataw, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles and their slaves, and declared the slaves of these tribes free. In 1867 Gen. Sanborn was designated by congress as one of an Indian peace commission, and with the other commissioners negotiated several treaties which have remained in force and, in connection with the report of that commission, have had a great influence in the amelioration of the condition of the Indians. He has been a member of the house and senate of Minnesota on various occasions.

SANCHEZ, John Sewell, Canadian judge, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 1 Jan., 1819; d. in Sherbrooke, Ontario, 18 July, 1877. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1842, removed to Canada, and in 1847 was admitted to the bar in Montreal. He was elected to parliament for Sherbrooke county in 1850, re-elected in 1852 and 1854, and was subsequently elected for Compton county, remaining a member till 1857. In 1863 he was elected for Wellington county to the legislative council, and he served in that capacity till 1870, when he became a member of the Dominion senate. He resigned this place in 1873, when he was appointed judge of the superior court at Sherbrooke by Sir John A. Macdonald, to whom he was politically opposed. In 1874 he became a judge of the court of queen's bench.

SANCHEZ DE BENAVENTA, Gabriel de (Sanchez de Benaventa), b. in Seville, Spain. He was a monk of the Franciscan order, and spent many years in Yucatan, where he was still living in 1695. He wrote "Arte de la lengua Maya" (Mexico, 1684), and was also the author of a "Vocabulario Maya y Espanol," containing descriptions of the medical and botanical plants of the country, which, at the beginning of the 19th century, in the Franciscan convent of Valladolid, Yucatan, but is now lost.

SAN CARLOS, José Miguel, Duke de, Spanish-American statesman, b. in Lima, Peru, in 1771; d. in Paris, France, 17 July, 1828. He was descended from the ancient family of Carvajal, which since the time of Charles V. had possessed the hereditary title of chief counselor for the Indies. After completing his studies at the College of Lima, he went to Spain at the age of sixteen, and entered on a military career. He commanded the right of the allied armies that attacked Toulon in 1793, was tutor of the king's children in 1797–1801, was appointed major-domo of Charles IV. in 1805, and in 1807 became viceroey of Navarre. When Ferdinand VII. ascended the throne, he made the Duke de San Carlos director of his household, and followed the advice of his old tutor, and of Escobiz, in submitting to Napoleon. During the king's captivity the duke labored incessantly for his restoration, and when he had accomplished this object, in December, 1813, he exercised the functions of prime minister until in the following November the influence of his enemies compelled his retirement. He was afterward ambassador at different courts, and died while representing his government at Paris.

SANCHES, Affonso (San-chesh), Portuguese pilot, b. in Cascaes, Estremadura, about 1450; d. about 1486. According to Francisco Gonara in his "Historia de las Indias," Abreu e Lima in his "Synopsis e deducêo chronologica," Ayres de Cazal in his "Corografíu Brasílica," Lisboa in his "Annaes do Rio de Janeiro," and other historians, Sanches commanded a caravel, and was trading on the coast of Africa, when he was arrested by the Portuguese in 1485, and currents toward the west to an unknown land, where he discovered the mouth of a mighty river, probably the Amazon, and on his return landed at some large islands, perhaps Cuba and Santo Domingo. On this homeward journey his caravel was wrecked near Madeira, or at Porto Santo, where he was rescued by Columbus, with whom he lived for the rest of his life, and to whom he left his papers and the secret of his great discovery, which afterward enabled the Genoese navigator to find America. Although no direct proofs exist as to the truth of these facts, nothing has yet been discovered to contradict them, and thus Sanches stands among the many claimants of the discovery of America.

SANCHEZ, Labrador José (San-chesh), Spanish missionary, b. in Guada, Spain, 19 Sept., 1717; d. in Ravanca, Italy, in 1799. He entered the Jesuit order in 1731, went some time afterward to Paraguay, and was professor of philosophy and theology in the academy of New Cordova. He abandoned his professorship to preach to the Indians, among whom he lived till the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Spanish colonies. He wrote a dictionary and a grammar of the Matupí language, and put them into the language; also "Paraguay natural ilustrado. Noticias de la naturaleza del Pais, con la explicacion de fenómenos fisicos, generales y particulars; usos útiles que de sus producciones se pueden hacer."

SANCHEZ DE AGUILAR, Pedro (San-chesh), Mexican bishop, b. in Valladolid, Yucatan, 10 April, 1555; d. in Santa Cruz, Bolivia, about 1609. He was a descendant of the first conquerors of Yucatan. Sanchez was sent by his father to Mexico, where he studied in the College of San Ildefonso, was ordained and graduated as doctor in theology, and was rector of several parishes in Yucatan. He became vicar-general of the bishopric of Yucatan, and in 1617 was sent to Madrid and Rome as commissionarius extraordinarius. In 1645 Philip IV. appointed him to a canonry in the cathedral of La Plata in the province of Charcas, whither he sailed after his return to Mexico, and later he was appointed judge of the Inquisition in Lima, and finally bishop of Santa Cruz. He wrote "Informe contra Idololatia Cunoles del Obispado de Yucatan" (Madrid, 1619); "Asiento de la Biblioteca"; "Catecismo de Doctrina Cristiana en idioma Yucateco"; and "Memoria de los primeros Conquis-SANDERSON, Robert, founder of a sect, b. in Perth, Scotland, in 1718; d. in Danbury, Conn., 2 April, 1771. He studied in the University of Edinburgh, engaged in the linen trade, and, on marrying the daughter of the Rev. John Glass, became an elder in his church, and reduced Glass's opinions to a system. Under Sandeman's influence churches were gathered in the principal cities of Scotland, and Newcastle, London, and other English towns. His views excited much controversy. They were similar to those of Calvijn with the distinguishing feature that the faith was a "bare belief of the bare truth." He rejected all mystical and double sense from the Scripture, prohibited games of chance, "things strangled," according to the Jewish precept, and college training, and required weekly love feasts, and a plurality of elders. The sect was divided into two parts, the Baptist Sandemansians, who practised the sacrament of baptism, and the Osborneans, which rejected it. Sandeman came to this country in 1764, and organized societies in Boston, Mass., and Danbury, Conn. During the Revolution the Sandemansians were generally loyalists, and gave the Whigs much trouble. The sect now numbers about 1,500 persons (1898). Sandeman published a series of "Letters addressed to their Brethren and Aspiants" (Edinburgh, 1757; last ed., 1889).

SANDERS, Daniel Clarke, educator, b. in Sturbridge, Mass., 3 May, 1768; d. in Medfield, Mass., 18 Oct., 1850. He was graduated at Harvard in 1788, was a teacher in the Cambridge grammar-school while studying divinity, and was licensed to preach in 1790. He was pastor of the Congregational church in Woodstock, Vt., in 1791, and in October of the latter year became president of the University of Vermont, which post he held for fourteen years. In 1809 he was pastor of the church in Medfield, Mass. He afterward accepted no settled charge, but preached occasionally, and interested himself in educational concerns, being chairman of the Medfield board of selectmen and of the district school committee. He was a member of the Massachusetts constitutional convention in 1820. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1809. Dr. Sanders was an earnest worker in the cause of education. While president of the University of Vermont he performed his duties for three years without an assistant, the class of 1809 received all its instruction from him, and he regularly taught from six to ten hours a day. He published about thirty discourses, and a "History of the Indian Wars with the First Settlers of the United States" (Montpelier, Vt., 1812).

SANDERS, Elizabeth Elkins, author, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1762; d. there, 10 Aug., 1851. She was educated in her native town, married Thomas Sanders, and resided at Salem. She was a great extensive beneficent. She corresponded with many eminent persons, and published "Conversations, principally on the Aborigines of North America" (Salem, Mass., 1828); "First Settlers of New England" (Boston, 1829); and "Reviews of a Part of Present's History of Ferdinand and Isabella," and of Campbell's Lectures on Poetry (1841). She also contributed to the press on moral and religious subjects.

SANDERS, John, engineer, b. in Lexington, Ky., in 1810; d. in Fort Delaware, Del., 29 July, 1858. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1834, became captain in the engineer corps in 1838, and for many years was engaged in improving the Ohio river, and in the construction and repair of the interior defence of New York harbor. During the Mexican war he participated in the battles of Monterey and Vera Cruz, and received the brevet of major for gallantry in the first-named action. He subsequently was employed in the improvements on Delaware bay and river, and in constructing Fort Delaware. He published "Memoirs on the Resources of the Valley of the Ohio" (New York, 1841), and a translation of Francois F. Pomedet's "Memoir of the Stability of Reetements and their Foundation" (1839).

SANDERS, William Price, soldier, b. in Lexington, Ky., 12 Aug., 1839; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., 28 Nov., 1864. He entered the U. S. military academy in 1856, became 1st Lieutenant, 10 May, 1861, and on the 14th of that month captain of the 3d U. S. cavalry. He engaged in the battles of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Mechanicville, and Hanover Court-House during the Virginia peninsular campaign, became colonel of the 5th Kentucky cavalry in March, 1863, was in pursit of Morgan's raiders in July and August, was chief of cavalry in the Department of the Ohio in October and November, and participated in the actions at Blue Lick Springs, Lenoir, and Campbell's Station, where he was mortally wounded. He became brigadier-general of volunteers, 18 Oct., 1863.

SANDERSON, John, author, b. near Carlisle, Pa., in 1801; d. there, 21 May, 1861. He was educated by a private tutor, and began the study of law in Philadelphia in 1806, but became a teacher, and was subsequently associate principal of Clermont seminary. He went abroad in 1835, and, on his return the next year, became professor of Latin and Greek in the Philadelphia high-school, which post he held until his death. Rufus W. Grisadelphia, 1856). He was also author of a pamphlet in which he successfully opposed the plan to exclude the classical languages from Girard college (1826); "Sketches of Paris" (1838; republished in London, under the title of "The American in Paris" 1838; 3d ed., 2 vols., 1848); and portions of a work enti-

SANDERSON, John Philip, soldier, b. in Lebanon county, Pa., 13 Feb., 1818; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 14 Oct., 1864. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, and served in the legislature in 1845, and in the state senate in 1847. He edited the Philadelphia "Daily News" in 1848-36, and became chief clerk of the Senate of S. Carolina. He was designed to become lieutenant-colonel of the 15th U. S. infantry. He was appointed its colonel in July, 1863, and in February, 1864, became provost-marshel-general of the Department of the Missouri. His most important public service was the full exposition that he made during the civil war of the secret political organization in the northern and western states, known as the "Knights of the golden circle" or the "Order of American knights." He published "Views and Opinions of American Stansmen on Foreign Immigration" (Philadelphia, 1843); and "Republican Landmarks" (1856).

SANDERSON, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Ball-bay, County Monaghan, Ireland, 23 May, 1825. He was graduated at the Royal college, Belfast, in 1845, came to this country the next year, and was classical teacher in Washington institute, New York city, in 1847—9. He then studied theology, and was licensed to preach in 1849, and became pastor of the Associate Presbyterian church in Providence, R. I. In 1858 he occupied the pulpit of a Presbyterian church in New York city. He was acting pastor of the Congregational church at Sangatuck, Conn., in 1872—8, assistant editor of the "Homiletic Monthly" in 1881—3, and has edited the "Pulpit Treasury" since 1883. He has published "Jesus on the Holy Mount" (New York, 1869), and "Memorial Tributes" (1883).

SANDFORD, Lewis Halsey, jurist, b. in Ovid, N. Y., Jan. 28, 1807; d. in Toledo, Ohio, July 15, 1852. He studied law at Syracuse, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in 1828, removed to New York city in 1833, and in 1843 was chosen assistant chancellor of the first circuit. He became chancellor in 1846, and from 1847 till his death was associate justice of the superior court of New York. He published "Catalogue of the New York Law University" (New York, 1843); "New York Chancery Reports" (4 vols., 1846—50); and "New York Superior Court Reports" (1849—52).—His brother, Edward, lawyer, b. in Ovid, N. Y., July 28, 1809; d. at sea, 23 Sept., 1854, received an academic education, and at fifteen years of age settled in Albany, where he engaged in teaching and lecturing. He subsequently studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1838, began practice in New York city, and in 1842 was appointed judge of the criminal court of that city. He subsequently returned to the bar, and took the highest rank in his profession. Mr. Sandford was a member of the New York senate in 1843. He was lost in the steamer "Arctic.

SANDFORD, Ralph, author, b. in Liverpool, England, about 1693; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., May 28, 1758. He was the son of John Sandford, of Liverpool, and in early life was a sailor. He emigrated to Pennsylvania, where he settled on a farm and became a Quaker preacher. Sandford was one of the earliest public advocates of the emancipation of negro slaves, and in support of his views published "A Brief Examination of the Practice of the Tories, During the Time of the Peace of Dunkirk, and of Present Dispensation, etc." (Philadelphia, 1729; 2d ed., enlarged, 1730). These were printed by Franklin and Meredith. Franklin says, in a letter dated 4 Nov., 1789: "I printed a book for Ralph Sandford against keeping negroes in slavery, two editions of which he distributed gratis." Sandford's doctrines met with but little favor, except among the poor, who were brought into competition with slave labor. The chief magistrate of the province threatened Sandford with punishment if he permitted his writings to be circulated, but, notwithstanding, he distributed the work wherever he thought it would be read. Sandford was buried in a field, on his own farm, near the house where he died. The executors of his will had the grave enclosed with a brick fence, and caused a stone to be placed at the head of it, inscribed: "In Memory of Ralph Sandford, Son of John Sandford, of Liverpool. He bore a Testimony against the Negro Trade and Dyed ye 28th of Ye 3rd Month, 1733, Aged 40 Years."—See "Memoir of Benjamin Lay and Ralph Sandford."—Robert Vaux (Philadelphia, 1813; 2d ed., 1815).

SANDOVAL, Alfonso de, Peruvian philanthropist, b. in Seville, Spain; d. in Carthagena, Spanish America, 25 Dec., 1852. He went to South America when a boy, was educated by the Jesuits of Lima, joined their order, and devoted himself to the care of the slaves, among whom he spent the rest of his life. The object of most of his writings was to advance the temporal and spiritual welfare of the negroes. His principal works are "Naturaliza sagrada y profana, costumbres, ritos, disciplina, y catecucmio de todos los Pueblos" (Sanlúcar de Barrameda, 1682); "Vida de S. Francisco Xavier y lo que obraron los P.P. de la compañia de Jesus en la India" (1619); and "De Instauramia Aethiopum Salute" (Madrid, 1646).

SANDOVAL, Gonzalo de, Spanish soldier, b. in Medellin, Spain, about 1496; d. in Moguer, Spain, near the close of 1528. He was the youngest of the lieutenants of Hernan Cortes, who, after the subjugation of Mexico, was made viceroy of New Spain in 1527; and was sent as viceroy of New Mexico in 1528, and again in 1531, to relieve the bishop of Lima of his labors. He returned to Spain in 1531, and was created the marquis of Castilla, and wasadvanced to the peerage of Spain in 1534. He died in 1559.

SANDOVAL SILVA Y MENDOZA, Gaspar de (sand-o-val), Count de Galve, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Saragossa about 1640; d. in Spain early in the 17th century. He was appointed to relieve Melchor de Pinto-Carrero, who had been promoted viceroy of Peru, and arrived in Mexico, 17 Sept., 1688. Shortly afterward, hearing that the French had founded an establishment in the Bay of San Bernard, he ordered the governor of Coahuila, Alonso de Leon (q. v.), to expel them with an expedition, which left Monclova in 1689. He sent in 1699 an expedition of seven ships and 2,000 men to Santo Domingo to assist the governor of that island against the French. He also dispatched an expedition to the French from the western part, and on 21 Jan., 1691, the latter were routed near Guaruco (now Cape May). The French governor was killed, and the city was sacked and burned. In 1691 he established several military posts in Texas, and in the same year a presidio was founded in the Bay of Pensacola. He was the first to establish schools for the Indians, taught them Spanish, and entrust them with minor employments to those that were foremost in learning. In 1692 the crop of corn failed, and the consequent famine caused a mutiny in the capital, in which the viceregal palace and several public buildings were partially burned. A second expedition, in cooperation with the English fleet, was sent in 1693 against the French establishments on the northwest coast of South America, and their forts were destroyed. His health was declining, and, after he had repeatedly petitioned the court to relieve him, he obtained in 1695 permission to deliver the executive to Bishop Juan de Ortega Montafiez, who took charge on 27 Feb., 1696. Sandoval then returned to Spain.

SANDS, Alexander Hamilton, lawyer, b. in Williamsburg, Va., 2 May, 1728; d. in Richmond, Va., 22 Dec., 1887. He studied at William and Mary in 1782—85, but was not graduated, read law, and in 1843 became deputy clerk of the state superior court. In 1845—9 he held the same office in the U. S. circuit court. He was a judge-advocate in the Confederate army during the civil war, and a short time before his death entered the Baptist ministry, serving congregations in Ashland and Glen Allan, Va. Besides contributions to periodicals, he published "History of a Suit in Equity" (Richmond, 1854); a new edition of Alexander Tate's "American Form Book" (1857); "Recollections of a Southern Barrister" (Philadelphia, 1860); "Practical Law Forms" (1872); and "Sermons by a Village Pastor." He compiled "Tate's Legal Directory of Virginia Laws," and was the editor of the "Quarterly Law Review" and the "Evening Bulletin" (1859), both in Richmond.

SANDS, Benjamin Franklin, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 11 Feb., 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 June, 1883. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1 April, 1828, and was commissioned lieutenant, 16 March, 1840. During the latter part of the Mexican war he was in the Gulf squadron, and took part in the expedition up the Tampico river and at Tuxpan. He cruised in the “Gallatin” in command of the brig “Porpoise” off the coast of Africa, for the suppression of the slave-trade, in 1851-2. He was attached to the coast-survey service in 1851-9, during which period he was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1853. He was next attached to the bureau of construction in the navy department until the civil war. He was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, commanded the steamer “Dacotah” on the blockade, participating in the engagement with Fort Caswell at the mouth of Cape Fear river. He was senior officer in command of the division on the blockade off Wilmington, N. C., in 1862-5, and also took part in both attacks on Fort Fisher in command of the steamer “Franklin.” He had charge of the division on the blockade of Texas from February to June, 1863, and on 2 June, 1865, he hoisted the U. S. flag at Galveston, the last place that was surrendered by the Confederates. He was commissioned commodore, 25 July, 1866, and appointed superintendent of the naval observatory at Washington in 1867, where he remained until the latter part of 1873. He was commissioned rear-admiral, 27 April, 1871, placed on the retired list, 11 Feb., 1874, and was then a resident of Washington until his death.

SANDS, David, Quaker preacher, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 4 Oct., 1745; d. in Cornwall, N. Y., in June, 1818. He became a merchant, but entered the Society of Friends, married a member of that denomination, and began to labor in the cause. He labored in this country and Canada till 1794, and then in Europe till he was sixty years of age. See "David Sands, Journal of his Life and Gospel Labors" (New York, 1848).

SANDS, Henry Berton, surgeon, b. in New York city, 27 Sept., 1830; d. there, 18 Nov., 1888. After studying at a high-school in New York, he graduated at the College of physicians and surgeons in that city in 1854. Since that time he had practiced in New York, giving special attention to surgery. From 1860 till 1870 he was in partnership with Dr. Willard Parker. Dr. Sands was demonstrator of anatomy in the College of physicians and surgeons in 1856-66, professor of that branch in 1869-79, and since the last-named year had held the chair of the practice of surgery. He had been connected with various hospitals as consulting or attending surgeon, was a member of many medical societies, and was president of the New York county pathological society in 1866-7, of the County medical society in 1874-5, and of the surgical society in 1883. In the latter year he became a corresponding member of the Society of surgery of Paris. Dr. Sands had a high reputation as a successful operating surgeon. Among the descriptions of his operations that he contributed to surgical literature were "Case of Cancer of the Larvax, successfully removed by Ligation" (1865); "Aneurism of the Sub-Clavian, treated by Galvano-Puncture" (1869); "Case of Traumatical Brachial Neuralgia, treated by Excision of the Cords which go to form the Brachial Plexus" (1873); "Case of Bony Ankylosis of the Hip-Joint, successfully treated by Subeutaneous Division of the Neck of the Femur" (1875); "Esmarch's Blood-Pressure Method" (1877); "Excision of the Femur by Abdominal Section" (1877); "The Question of Trephining in Injuries of the Head" (1883); and "Rupture of the Ligamentum Patellae, and its Treatment by Operation" (1885).

SANDS, Joshua Ratoon, naval officer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 13 May, 1795; d. in Baltimore, Md., 2 Oct., 1883. His father, Joshua Sands, was the creator of the port of New York, and representative in congress in 1803-5 and 1823-7. The son entered the navy as a midshipman, 18 June, 1813, and immediately entered upon his duties in Commodore Chauncey’s squadron on Lake Ontario. He participated in the action with the "Royal George," 5 Nov., 1812. The next season he was attached to the "Madison," and in the action that resulted in the capture of Toronto he carried the orders of the commodore by pulling in a small boat to the different vessels until the enemy surrendered. In May, 1813, he served in the "Pike," and fought several engagements with the British squadron under Sir James Yeo. In 1814 he was with a battery on shore and in the frigate "Superior" until peace was proclaimed. He was commissioned lieutenant, 1 April, 1818, and commander, 23 Feb., 1841. During the Mexican war he had charge of the steamer "Vixen," in which he assisted at the capture of Alvarado, Tabasco, and Laguna. He was governor of the last-named place until the investment of Vera Cruz, where he rendered service by taking the "Vixen" close under the batteries and to the castle of San Juan d’Uloa. He co-operated in the capture of Tuxpan, and in 1847 brought home the flags, trophies, and brass cannon, with a complimentary letter to the navy department for his creditable services. In 1851 he commanded the frigate "St. Lawrence" with the government exhibits for the World’s fair at London, and prior to his departure he was given the title of commodore. In 1873 he retired from active service, having served as commander of Brooklyn with a sword and epauletts, which he gave to the Historical society of Brooklyn, together with a gold snuff-box inlaid with diamonds that had been presented to him by Queen Victoria. He assisted in laying the submarine cable in 1857, took part in the expedition to Central America against the filibusters, and was ordered to command, 25 Feb., and was flag-officer in command of the Brazil station in 1859-61. He was retired on 21 Dec., 1861, SANDS, Robert Charles, author, b. in Flatbush, Long Island, N. Y., 11 May, 1759; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 17 Dec., 1832. Robert C. Sands (1748-1834), a New York merchant, was an active Revolutionary patriot, a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1777, and for many years a member of the legislature. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1815. While in college, he and James Wallis Eastburn had planned two periodicals, "The Moralist," of which but a single number appeared, and "Academic Recreations," which lasted a year. To both of these Sands contributed prose and verse. On his graduation he began to study law with David B. Ogden, but at the same time wrote on a great variety of subjects. He was one of the authors of a series of essays in the "Daily Advertiser," entitled "The Neologist" (1817), and another entitled "The Amphilogist" (1819), which were marked by purity of taste. He also began to translate the Psalms of David with his friend Eastburn, and wrote with him "Yamoyden," a poem founded on the history of the Indian, King Philip, which was published, with additions by Sands, after Eastburn's death (New York, 1820). He was admitted to the bar in 1820, declined the chair of belles-lettres in Dickinson college, but continued to devote himself to literature, and in 1823-4 issued, with others, the "St. Tammany Magazine," of which seven numbers appeared. In 1824 he began the "Atlantic Magazine," and when it became the "New York Review" he conducted it with William Cullen Bryant in 1825-7. From the latter year till his death he was an editor of the "Commercial Advertiser." During the latter part of his life he lived in Hoboken, N. J., then a rural village, the beauties of whose streams he celebrated in some of his writings. Besides the works that have been mentioned above, he wrote "The Talisman," an annual, jointly with William Cullen Bryant and Gulian C. Verplanck (3 vols., 1828-30; republished as "Miscellanies"). In this appeared "The Dream of the Princess Papantzin," one of his longest poems, and he contributed to "Tales of Glauber Spa," for which he wrote the humorous introduction (2 vols., 1832); and was also the author of "Life and Correspondence of Paul Jones" (1833). His works were edited, with a memoir, by Gulian C. Verplanck (2 vols., New York, 1834).

SANDYS, Sir Edwin, English statesman, b. in Worcester in 1651; d. in Northborne, Kent, in 1659. His father, of the same name, was bishop of Worcester, and afterward archbishop of York. The son was educated at Oxford, supported the claims of James I. to the English throne, and was knighted in 1603. He became an active member of the first London company for Virginia, led in reformatory measures, and introduced the vote by ballot. He was elected treasurer (the chief officer of the company) in 1619, and established representative government in the colony, whose security and prosperity he did much to promote. Through Spanish influence, King James, in violation of the charter, forbade his re-election in 1629, but his successor, the Earl of Northampton, continued his policy. He published "Europa Speculum, or a Survey of the State of Religion in the Western Part of the World" (best ed., 1657).—His brother, George, poet, b. in Bishopsthorpe in 1617; d. in Boxley abbey, Kent, in March, 1644, was educated at Oxford, and in 1621 became colonial treasurer of Virginia, where he built the first water-mill, promoted the establishment of iron-works, and in 1632 introduced ship-building. His translation of the last ten books of Ovid's "Metamorphoses," which he accomplished during his stay (London, 1626), is the first English literary production of any value that was written in this country. In his dedication to Charles I. he says: "it was limned by that imperfect light which was snatched from the hours of night and repose." He returned to England in 1624. Sandys is well known as a traveller from his "Relation of a Journey" in the countries on the Mediterranean sea and the Holy Land (London, 1615), and he also published metrical versions of the Psalms (1635), the Song of Solomon (1639), and other parts of the Scriptures. A collected edition of his works has been published (2 vols., London, 1872). See his life by Henry J. Todd, prefixed to selections from hismetrical Paraphrases of 1822.

SANFORD, Charles W., lawyer, b. in Newark, N. J., 5 May, 1796; d. in Avon Springs, Livingston co., N. Y., 25 July, 1878. He studied law in the office of Ogden Hoffman in New York city, and was admitted to the bar there, where he remained in continuous practice throughout his life. He was counsel for the Harlem railroad for more than twenty years, and became well known from his connection with several important suits. He was vice-president of the Bar association and a member of the Law institute. He enlisted as a private in the 3d New York militia regiment, and was promoted until he was placed in command of the 1st division. In 1867 he was retired by Gov. Reuben E. Fenton, after being at the head of the military organization in New York city for more than thirty years. On him devolved the responsibility of directing the troops that were called out to suppress the Astor place, Flour, Street-preachers', and Draft riots. At the beginning of the civil war he responded to the first call for three-months volunteers, and was placed at the head of a division under Gen. Robert Patterson. He was in command at Harper's Ferry during the battle of Bull Run.
In his early life Gen. Sanford had some experience as a manager, but having lost both of his theatres by fire in New Milford, Conn., in 1820, he was forced to begin again. He settled on a farm. Subsequently, through his brother-in-law, Samuel Hopkins, a clergyman, his attention being again turned to the pulpit, he resumed his studies, and on April 14, 1773, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Medway, Mass, where he passed the remainder of his life, with the exception of a brief period, during which he served as a chaplain in the Revolutionary army. As an orator Mr. Sanford possessed unusual gifts. As a preacher he especially excelled in "tracing the windings of the human heart, in tearing from the hypocrisy his mask, in rousing the slumbering conscience, and in quickening the sluggish affections." He early resisted the oppression of Great Britain, and relinquished his salary for a time. He was occasionally blunt and severe, especially when he met with those that came short of his own high standard of clerical dignity and decorum. He was of a litigious disposition, and a rustic garb asked what system of divinity he would recommend, he replied: "Lord Chesterfield's divinity to you!" On another occasion, on hearing that a young preacher had refused a call on the ground that there was an extensive pine-swap in the place, he exclaimed: "Young man, it is none of your business where God puts pine-swaps." Mr. Sanford never wrote his sermons, and the only publications bearing his name are two "Discussions" issued in 1789, one "on the Nature and Constitution of the Law given to Adam in Paradise," and the other "on the Scene of Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane.

SANFORD, Ezekiel, author, b. in Ridgefield, Fairfield co., Conn., in 1796; d. in Columbia, S. C., in 1822. He was graduated at Yale in 1815, and in 1819 published "A History of the United States before the Revolution, with Some Account of the Aborigines" (Philadelphia). Of this work Nathan Hale (q. v.) wrote in the "North American Review" in September of that year: "We have proceeded far enough, we trust, to support our charge of plagiarism in the work before us. The same year Mr. Sanford projected an expurgated edition of the British poets with biographical prefaces in fifty volumes, twenty-two of which he had published when his health failed (Philadelphia), and the remainder of the series was edited by Robert Walsh, for many years U. S. consul in Paris. Sanford left in manuscript a satirical novel entitled "The Humors of Europe."

SANFORD, Henry Shelton, diplomatist, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 15 June, 1833; d. in Healing Springs, Va., 21 May, 1891. He entered Washington college, but was not graduated, and afterward studied at Heidelberg, where he received the degree of J. U. D. He was secretary of the U. S. legation in Paris in 1849-53, and then charge d'affaires till April, 1854. He resigned on the question of citizen's dress for diplomatic uniform, refusing to conform to Minister Mason's course, which led, on Senator Charles Sumner's motion, to the present law, enforcing Sec. Marcy's circular instruction recommending citizen's dress as a diplomatic uniform. From 1854 till 1858 he was U. S. minister to Belgium, where he negotiated and signed the Scheldt treaty, a treaty of commerce and navigation, a consular convention (the first ever made with Belgium), a trade-mark, and naturalization conventions. In 1877 he was one of the founders of the International African association (now the Independent state of the Congo), and became a member of the executive committee, representing on it the English-speaking races. As its plenipotentiary at Washington he secured recognition of its flag in April, 1884, and he was sent as a delegate of the U. S. government to the Berlin Congo conference of 1885-6, which opened to free-trade and neutral territory of 1,000,000 square miles, with a population of 50,000,000. In 1870 Mr. Sanford founded the city of Sanford, Fla., and engaged in orange-culture, introducing into Florida various new cultures, notably that of the lemon. Trinity gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1849. Various official reports of his have been published by congress, including one on "Penal Codes in Europe" (Washington, 1854), and the "Averill's Correspondence," also published by congress, which treated very fully of several important questions of international law.

SANFORD, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Vernon, Vt., 6 Feb., 1797; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Dec., 1851. He was graduated at Union in 1820, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1823, ordained pastor of the Presbyterian church in Brooklyn, N. Y., in October of that year, and from 1829 till his death was pastor of a church in Philadelphia. He was distinguished for his power to move the sympathies and emotions of his audiences. See his "Memiors" by Robert Baird (Philadelphia, 1836).

SANFORD, Nathan, senator, b. in Bridgehampton, Suffolk co., N. Y., 1 Nov., 1777; d. in Flushing, N. Y., 17 Oct., 1838. He was educated at Yale college, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1799, and began practice in New York city. He was appointed to several local offices, and on the accession of President Jefferson was made U. S. commissioner in bankruptcy. From 1803 till 1816 he was U. S. district attorney. This was a period of the commercial difficulties with France, of the "embargo," and of the war of 1812, involving great embarrassment to American commerce. To the discussion of the difficult legal questions arising out of the occurrences of this time, Mr. Sanford brought unusual ability, extensive learning, and a liberal spirit. While holding this office, he was twice elected to the New York assembly, of which he was chosen speaker in 1811. From 1812 till 1815 he was a member of the state senate, which then, in addition to its legislative functions, sat as a court for the correction of errors. He was elected U. S. senator from New York as a Democrat, and served from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1821, when he was sent as a delegate to the State constitutional convention. There he proposed amendments, which were adopted, abolishing the property qualification for the elective franchise. On the adoption of the new constitution he was appointed to the office of chan-Sangster, as successor of James Kent. After four years' service he resigned on account of impaired health, and was again elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 31 Jan., 1826, till 3 March, 1831. During his second term as senator his efforts were especially directed toward Cameron's reform of the currency, and a change in the standard of the gold coinage was recommended by him in an elaborate report that formed the basis of subsequent legislation. He also recommended a line of policy toward France in retaliation for the dilatory course pursued by her regarding indemnity for depredations on our commerce, which, though rejected at the time, was afterward adopted by President Jackson and adopted by Congress. At the expiration of his senatorial term he retired to his estate on Long Island, where he resided until his death. His third wife was Mary Buchanan, granddaughter of Thomas MeKean, signer of the Declaration of Independence. The wedding ceremony was held in the White House, President John Quincy Adams, Miss Buchanan's nearest relative, giving away the bride. His son, Edward, poet, b. in Albany, N. Y., 8 July, 1806; d. in Gowanda, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., 28 Aug., 1876, was graduated at Union college in 1824, and studied law, but never practised, preferring journalism, politics, and literature. His first engagement was upon the editorial staff of a Brooklyn newspaper. He was subsequently employed by Robert M. Tocurnal (1850) in New York City for the Times, and with Mr. Tocurnal and others, edited the "Times" with the latter in 1836-7. He next became associate editor of the Washington "Globe," the organ of the Van Buren administration. Returning to New York city in 1838, he was made assistant naval officer at that port, and also held the office of secretary to the commission to restore the duties on goods that had been destroyed by the great fire of 1835. In 1843 he was elected to the state senate. He was a frequent contributor of both prose and verse to the "New York Mirror" the "Spirit of the Times," and the "Knickerbocker" magazine. Among his best-known compositions, only a few of which appeared over his own name, are a poetical address to "Black Hawk" and "The Loves of the Shell-Fishes." Other specimens of his graceful and humorous verse are publically known.

Sanford, Thaddeus, journalist, b. in Connecticut in 1791; d. in Mobile, Ala., 30 April, 1867. He went to New York city in early life, and engaged in commercial pursuits until 1822, when he removed to Mobile, Ala., and in 1828 became the editor and proprietor of the "Mobile Register." He continued to conduct that journal, with the exception of the period between 1837 and 1841, for twenty-six years. In 1833 he was elected president of the Bank of Mobile, and in 1835 he was appointed collector of the port by President Pierce, holding the office throughout Buchanan's administration. On the organization of the Confederate government he was appointed, and subsequently, in addition, discharged the duties of "depository" for the Confederate treasury. Mr. Sanford was intimately connected with the progress and prosperity of his adopted city for nearly half a century.

Sanfuentes, Salvador (san-foo-a-en-tays), Chilian poet, b. in Santiago, 2 Feb., 1817; d. there, 17 July, 1860. He followed preparatory studies in the National institute, and early showed literary tastes, but, according to his father's wishes, entered commercial life in the latter's store. There he attracted in 1833 the attention of Andres Bello (q. v.), who, recognizing the youth's talent, befriended him, and the next year published in his paper "El Araucano," a translation from Raine by Sanfuentes. The latter entered public life as secretary of the legation that was sent to Peru in 1836, returned to Chile in 1857, was appointed clerk of the ministry of justice and public instruction, and in 1843 became general secretary of the newly organized university. In 1844 he was named as a member of the province of Valdivia, and in February, 1847, he was called to occupy the ministry of public instruction, which place he held till June, 1849. In 1855 he was appointed judge of the court of appeals of Santiago, in 1856 he was for the second time minister of public instruction, and in 1858 he was elected judge of the supreme court, which place he held till his death. He wrote: "Cenopilotas" (1858); "El Campanario" (1858); "leyendas y obras dramáticas" (Santiago, 1849-50); "Chile desde la batalla de Chacabuco hasta la de Maipú" (1850); "Ricardo y Lucia, o la destrucción de la Imperial" (2 vols., 1857); "Teatro, o memorias de un solitario" (1856); and "Drámas inéditos" (1863). In 1873 a monument was erected in Santiago to the memory of Sanfuentes, Garcia Reyes, and Tocornal.

Sanger, George Partridge, lawyer, b. in Dover, Mass., 27 Nov., 1819; d. in Swampscott, Mass., 3 July, 1890. He was graduated at Harvard in 1840, and for a time was tutor. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and received the degree of LL. B. from Harvard in 1844. He was for many years the editor of "Massachusetts and American Almanacks." He also edited the Boston "Law Reporter" (vols. xi.-xxvi.) in conjunction with Stephen H. Phillips and George S. Hale, and after May, 1860, alone. He edited, with George Minot, the "United States Statutes at Large, Treaties, Proclamations, etc." (Boston), and in 1862-3, with John G. Locke, revised and consolidated the city ordinances of Boston, Mass., and edited the "Poet and Statesman of America," "Heading Home," and "Dr. Christiansen." He was reappointed, the latter's term of office expired, and he again held the office of city attorney. He was a frequent contributor of both prose and verse to the "New York Mirror," the "Spirit of the Times," and the "Knickerbocker" magazine. Among his best-known compositions, only a few of which appeared under his own name, is a poetical address to "Black Hawk" and "The Loves of the Shell-Fishes." Other specimens of his graceful and humorous verse are publically known.

Sanford, Charles, Canadian author, b. in Kingston, Ontario, 16 July, 1832. He was almost entirely self-educated. When fifteen years of age he was employed in the laboratory at Fort Henry, Kingston, and afterward in the ordnance office as a messenger and clerk, where he remained for ten years. In 1849 he became editor of the Amherst-Bruce "County" and sent a manuscript letter to Kingston and formed a connection with the press of that city. Since then he has gained a reputation as a poet, and his compositions have been favorably reviewed both here and in Europe. He has published "St. Lawrence and the Saguenay, and other Poems" (Kingston, 1856), "Hesperus and other Poems and Lyrics." (1890)

Sanford, John Herbert, Canadian author, b. in London, Ont., 26 March, 1831. He was graduated at Victoria college in arts in 1851 and in medicine in 1854, has been principal of the Toronto normal school, professor of chemistry and botany in the University of Victoria college, and is now (1898) engaged in active practice as a physician. He has published "Natural Philosophy" (Montreal, 1861-2); "Elementary Arithmetic" (1862); "Students' Note-Book on Inorganic Chemistry" (1862); "National Arithmetick Revised" (1864); and "Elements of Algebra" (1864).
book-form include "Manual of Missions of the Reformed Church in America" (New York, 1878); "Poems of the Household" (Boston, 1888); "Home Fairies and Heart Flowers" (New York, 1887); and several Sunday-school books. Her most successful poems are "Our Own," "The Sin of Omission," and "Are the Children at Home?"

SANKEY, Ira David, evangelist, b. in Edinburgh, Lawrence co., Pa., 28 Aug., 1849. His father, David, was for many years a state senator, president of a bank, and an editor. As a boy, Ira displayed a great liking for music. The family removed to New Castle, Pa., where, at the age of fifteen, Ira was united with the Methodist church, of which his parents were members. He became leader of the choir, superintendent of the Sunday-school, and president of the Young men's Christian association in the town. In 1870 he was delegated to the Indianapolis international convention of the last-named body, where he first met Dwight L. Moody. Since that time he has been associated with him in his evangelistic work as a singer, and has attained a wide reputation. His melodies, whether composed by Mr. Sankey or selected, are simple, pleasing, and effective, readily caught, and easily remembered. On 23 April, 1886, he presented to the town of New Castle, Pa., as a free gift, a Young men's Christian association building, equipped with organ, reading-rooms, halls, school-rooms, and an art gallery, and since then he has also given a valuable building-site to the church with which he was first connected. Mr. Sankey, however, does not confine himself exclusively to singing: he has always taken an active part in the inquiry-room, and of late has addressed meetings very acceptably. He has a fine baritone voice and can enter into an harmony, singing solos, and also leading the audiences. Mr. Sankey's compilation of "Sacred Songs and Solos" has been translated into many languages, and has had a larger circulation than any other book of hymns.

SAN MARTIN, José de, Argentine soldier, b. in Yapeyu, 29 Feb., 1778; d. in Buenos Aires, 13 Aug., 1850. At the age of eight years he was sent to Spain, where he was educated in the College of the nobility, and, entering the army in 1791, served with credit during the French invasion. Being promoted lieutenant-colonel, he left the army to offer his services in the cause of South American independence, and arrived in March, 1812, in Buenos Ayres. The government commissioned him, with the rank of colonel, to organize a regiment of mounted grenadiers, with which he took part in the campaign against the viceroy Vigodet, whom he defeated, 13 Jan., 1813, at San Lorenzo. On 18 Jan., 1814, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army in upper Peru, to replace Belgrano; but, seeing that the Spanish possessions of Peru might be attacked from the Pacific coast and deprived of the rich resources of Peru, he matured a scheme for an invasion of Chili, and, under the pretext of feeble health, retired from the command of the army and went to the province of Chuyro as governor in September, 1814. There, with the cooperation of the Chilian emigrants, he organized the famous army of the Andes, and, obtaining the consent and tacit aid of the Argentine director, Pueyrredon, he set out with his army on 21 Jan., 1817, from Mendoza. Misleading the Spanish generals by false reports, he crossed the Andes under great difficulties by the pass of Ugallata, and, surprising the Spanish at Chacabuco, totally routed them on 12 Feb., entering the capital triumphantly on the 15th. He was elected supreme chief of the republic, but declined and proposed O'Higgins, only reserving the command of the auxiliary Argentine army. The sum of $10,000, offered him by the municipality he also refused, dedicating it to the foundation of a library in Santiago. After the surprise of the united army by the Spaniards at Cancha Rayada, 19 March, 1818, he reorganized his forces and totally defeated the royalists at Maipo on 5 April of that year, liberating Chili from the Spanish yoke. After a visit to Buenos Ayres, he returned in October to Chili, and soon began to organize, with O'Higgins, a fleet and army for the invasion of Peru. In May, 1820, he was called with his troops to Buenos Ayres, but disobeying, as an established government existed in the Argentine, he was proclaimed by his army an independent chief. He resigned and on 29 Aug. sailed with an army of 4,500 men on Admiral Cochrane's fleet from Valparaiso, landing on 7 Sept., at Pisco. After a brilliant campaign he entered Lima, which had been abandoned by the Spaniards on 12 July, 1821, and on 27 July proclaimed the independence of Peru, being elected president of the government, under the title of protector. During his short administration he abolished slavery and the tribute that had been levied on the Indians, and introduced many other reforms, especially in the system of education. He sent the famous regiment of mounted grenadiers to assist Bolivar in his struggle for independence in Ecuador, and, seeing the importance of united action, he met him in Guayaquil on 25 July, 1822. What passed at this interview is unknown, but on his return to Lima, San Martin resigned on 22 Aug., and, leaving part of his army to assist Gen. Sucre, he went to Europe, where he established himself in Brussels. In 1828 he returned to Buenos Ayres shortly after the battle of Ituzaingo, and, finding his country plunged in intestine troubles, returned to Brussels, as he had made a vow never to unsheathe his sword in civil war, and in 1830 settled in Paris. Chili, Buenos Ayres, and Peru have erected statues in his honor. The one in Buenos Ayres is shown in the engraving.

SAN MARTIN, Tomás de, Spanish-American bishop, of Cordova, Spain, in 1482; d. in Lima, Peru, in 1534. He entered the Dominican order, and was appointed regent of studies in the College of St. Thomas, Seville. While here he asked to be sent to Santo Domingo as missionary to the Indians. He arrived in that island in 1525, and at once sided with Las Casas in defending the rights of the natives. He was president of the royal audience of Santo Domingo till 1529, when he went to Spain in the interests of the colony. Learning that a body of Dominicans were about to follow Pizarro to Peru, he resigned his title of president, and went with them. He remained in San Miguel de Puere when Pizarro marched to meet Atahualpa at Cajamarca, but entered Cuzco after its capture, and then went to the province of Charcas, of which he was the first apostle. In 1540 he was made vicar provincial of the Dominicans of Peru, and began the construction of the convent of San Rosario in Lima, and was afterward appointed provincial for eight years. In 1541, after the assassination of Pizarro and the proclamation of the son of Almagro as captain-general of Peru, Vare de Castro, governor of Peru, who was then at Panama, made San Martin his representative. He assembled the leading inhabitants of Lima, and proposed the election of a lieutenant-general to rule the country until the governor should arrive. His advice was followed, and the choice fell on Francisco de Barriomeuo. In the battle of Chupas in 1542, between the partisans of Almagro and the viceroy, he was present at the solicitation of the latter, but attended impartially to the wounded on both sides. In 1543 he received a letter from Charles V. charging him to see to the execution of the ordinances promulgated at the instance of Las Casas for the protection of the natives. In the civil war that resulted from the effort to give effect to these ordinances, he attempted to bring about a reconciliation between the viceroy, Nuñez Vela, and Gonzalo Pizarro, and on the triumph of the latter he was sent by him, in conjunction with the archbishop of Lima, to Spain, to solicit an amnesty. He set out in 1546, but, meeting Pedro de la Gasca at Panama, who had arrived from Spain with full power to restore order in Peru, he returned to Lima and was commissioned by the city of Lima to treat with the court of Spain concerning the administration of the country. The emperor not only granted him all the favors he asked for the city, the principal of which was the establishment of a university, but gave him the title of first bishop of La Plata and the regency of the royal audience in that city. On his arrival in Lima he was attacked by the madness of which he died.

SAN ROMAN, Miguel de, Peruvian soldier. b. in Puno in 1802; d. in Chorrillos, 3 April, 1863. He was the son of an Indian chief, and accompanied his father in the revolt of Pumacahua (q. v.), and, when the latter was captured and shot, the boy swore vengeance against the Spaniards. In 1821 he entered the army and took part in the conspiracy of Callao in 1826, by order of Bolivar he protected Bellavista. In the campaign of the restoration he served in the constitutional army, and was present in the battle of Yungay, 30 Jan., 1839. In 1841, during the war against Bolivia, he commanded one of the divisions of the Peruvian army, and after the battle of Ingavi on 18 Nov., which was fatal to his republic, he crossed Desaguadero river, occupied the department of Puno, and there he employed himself in the reorganization of the army. In 1845 he was elected senator of the republic, and he afterward became president of the council of state, and in consequence vice-president of the republic. In 1851, as a deputy, he occupied his place in the national body. He was appointed minister of war in 1855, and in 1856 was a member of the constituent congress, and an author of the constitution that was promulgated that year. In 1858, during several months, he occupied his executive as president of the council of ministers. In 1862 he was elected president of the republic; but his administration was of short duration, as he died on 16 May, 1867.

SANTA-ANNA, Antonio Lopez de, president of Mexico, b. in Jalapa, 21 Feb., 1795; d. in the city of Mexico, 20 June, 1876. He entered the Spanish army as a cadet on 6 July, 1810, and served against the patriots, rising gradually till in April, 1821, he pronounced for the Plan de Iguala and joined the army of Iturbide, by whom he was promoted brigadier and governor of Vera Cruz. After Iturbide was proclaimed emperor, Santa-Anna began to conspire against him, and, when he was relieved of his commands was returned to Mexico, he proclaimed the republic in Vera Cruz on 2 Dec., 1822. In 1823 he pronounced in San Luis Potosi for federation, and when that principle was victorious he was appointed governor of Yucatan, and afterward of Vera Cruz. On 12 Sept., 1828, he headed a revolt against the election of Gomez Pedraza, declaring in favor of Gen. Vicente Guerrero, and after the triumph of the latter he was appointed governor and commander of Vera Cruz. There he began to assemble forces against a threatened Spanish invasion, although his enemies insinuated revolutionary motives, and when, on 29 July, 1829, Gen. Barradas, with an army of 3,000 men, landed near Tampico, Santa-Anna, without awaiting orders from Mexico, marched against the enemy, whom he defeated on 20 Aug. and 10 Sept., and was followed to capture them on the next day. He was promoted major-general, but retired to his estate, where he began to intrigue against the new president, Bustamante. On 2 Jan., 1832, he pronounced in open revolt at Vera Cruz, and after finally defeating Bustamante on 12 Nov., 1832, at Casas Blancas, he was elected president, but withdrew to his country place, leaving the vice-president, Valentin Gomez Farias, in charge. He defeated several insurrections against the government, until in 1834 he headed a revolution to overthrow Gomez Farias, who was deposed by the congress, 5 Jan., 1835. Gen. Barragan was appointed provisional president, as Santa-Anna persisted in his policy of leaving the responsibility of the execution of the law in the hands of one whom he could control. He now allied himself entirely with the reactionary party; the Federal system was abolished, and the governors of the former states, now provinces, were made dependent from the central government. This gave a pretext for the separation of Texas, and that province declared its independence. Immediately Santa-Anna abandoned his estate to take the field in person, and in February, 1836, passed the Rio Grande with 6,000 men. On 6 April he stormed the Alamo fort at San Antonio, killed its defenders, afterward massacred the garrison of Goliad, and for several weeks he roamed the country. On 21 April he was surprised at San Jacinto, and totally routed by the Texan army under Gen. Samuel Houston. He fled, but was captured three days afterward, and was fortunate in escaping retaliation for his cruel execution of Texan troops. He gave a written order to his second in command to proclaim the republic of Texas, and on 14 May signed a treaty with the provisional president of Texas, David G. Burnett, recognizing the independence of that state. He was a prisoner for eight months, but was finally sent by Gen. Houston to the United States, and released in February, 1837. On his return to Mexico he was coldly received and retired to his estate. When Vera Cruz was attacked by the French fleet on 27 Nov., 1838, Santa-Anna offered his services to the government, was appointed commander-in-chief, and prepared the city for resistance. Before daylight of 5 Dec., a landing force of the French surprised his headquarters and captured his second in command, Gen. Arista, but he had time to escape, and, gathering his troops, he forced the French to re-embark. Near the port he was wounded by a cannon-ball, and it was found necessary to amputate his left leg. By his valiant defence he regained his popularity, and when President Bustamante left to suppress the revolution of Tamaulipas, congress appointed Santa-Anna his substitute. Notwithstanding that his wound had not yet healed, he was transported to the capital, and took charge of the executive from 17 Feb., 1839, till 11 July, when he retired to his estate. He was afterward made general commander of the coast department, but conspired against Bustamante till the latter's government was overthrown, and Santa-Anna was appointed by the consulting junta provisional president, 10 Oct., 1841. From that date till 6 Dec., 1844, either as provisional or constitutional president, sometimes personally, sometimes through his substitutes, he exercised virtually a military dictatorship, and, having taken the capital, the provisional president, Gen. Canalizo, was arrested. Santa-Anna was impeached, his statue was demolished, and his portrait was burned by the mob. His troops abandoned him, and on his flight toward the coast he was arrested, 15 Jan., 1845, near Jico, and imprisoned in the fort of Perote till the amnesty of May, when he retired to his ranch near Oaxaca. When the United States began, and after the unfortunate battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, a mutiny under Gen. Mariano Salas deposed President Paredes and recalled Santa-Anna, who returned on 16 Aug., 1846, was appointed commander-in-chief, and became president in December; but leaving the vice-president, Gomez Farias, in charge, he went to Guadalajara in 1847, and after the surrender of Vera Cruz, July, was permitted to sail for Havana, and thence to Cartagena. He lived afterward for some time in Venezuela, and finally in St. Thomas, whence he appeared, after the French intervention, in February, 1864, in Vera Cruz to offer his services to the regency. He was permitted to land only after signing a pledge not to interfere in politics; but from there he went to St. Thomas, where he in a few months published a manifesto, exciting disturbances in his favor, and Gen. Bazaine ordered him to leave the country, sending him in the frigate "Colbert" to St. Thomas. Maximilian afterward made him grand marshal of the empire, but he rewarded the emperor by a conspiracy against him, and fled to St. Thomas again in 1866. In the following year he went to San Domingo, and Baldwin Seward raised an army to overthrow the empire, and even offered his services to Juarez; but no response was made. In June, 1867, he chartered the steamer "Virginias," and appeared before Vera Cruz, which was still occupied by the imperialists, to raise the banner of revolution: but he was detained by the U. S. squadron of observation, and after the surrender of Vera Cruz, July, was permitted to sail for New York. He tried to effect a landing at Sisal, was captured by the blockading squadron, imprisoned at San Juan de Ulua, and sentenced by a court-martial to death, but was saved by his counsel, Alcaide, who represented his attempt as the ridiculous enterprise of a decrepit old man. He was released under conditions of leaving the republic forever, and came to the United States, whence he fostered a revolutionary movement in Jalapa in 1870, headed by his son, Angel. After Juarez's death he took advantage of the amnesty that was given by Iberdo de Tejada, returning to Mexico, and after his request for reinstatement on the army list and back-pay had been refused, he left again. In the absence of difference, his services being obscure and almost forgotten by the misfortunes that his subsequent conduct had brought upon his country.

SANCILLA, Pedro, Cuban author, b. in Santiago, Cuba, in 1829. At the age of seven years his parents took him to Spain, where he was educated. In 1843 he returned to his native country and began his literary career on the staff of a newspaper. He was banished in 1851 on account of his liberal ideas, and in 1853 he came to New York. He went to Mexico in 1861, where he joined the Republicans in their struggle against the Conservatives and Imperialists. In 1863 he married one of the daughters of President Juarez, and filled several official posts in the republic. He has published "Instrucción sobre el cultivo del Tabaco" (1847); "Ensayos Literarios" (1848); "El Papa en el Siglo XIX" (New York, 1854); "El Arpa del Proscripto" (1856); "El Lluid del Desorden" (1858); "Lecciones sobre la Historia de Cuba" (1859); a volume of "Fábulas y Alegorías" (Mexico, 1872); another volume of "Poems," and other literary productions. Some of his works have been translated into English and French.

There was taken Cuba, and dangerous taken and was banished and was defeated in 1848. He was accredited to France. He was appointed chief clerk of the ministry of justice, and in 1847, after being graduated in law, he filled the post of sub-secretary of state. At the age of twenty-three years he was elected intendant of Colchagua. As a Liberal he took an active part in the disturbances of 1850 and 1851, and was exiled to Lima. Returning to Chili in 1852, he began the practice of his profession, but in 1858 was exiled again and travelled through Europe. On his return he was minister of the treasury during 1863-4. In 1863-6, as special envoy to Peru, he signed the treaties for mutual defence against Spain with that republic, and on his return in 1867 he was appointed judge of the supreme court. He was also several times president of the faculty of law, and in 1874 became president of the court of appeals. Under President Pinto he was a member of the cabinet, as secretary of public works and instruction, in 1878, of the interior in 1879, and of foreign relations in 1880. In 1881 he was elected president of the republic, taking charge of the executive on 18 Sept. During his administration peace with Peru and Bolivia was arranged. Araucania was pacified, many reforms were inaugurated, and railroads were built. On 24 Jan., 1885, an attempt was made on his life, by means of an infernal machine, but it was frustrated. Since the close of his presidential term on 18 Sept., 1886, he has been again president of the court of appeals. Don 1 point. SANTANA, Pedro (san-tah'-nah), president of Santo Domingo, b. in Hincan, 29 June, 1801; d. in the city of Santo Domingo, 14 June, 1864. He studied law, but was living quietly on his farm when, in 1843, the Doman dynasty came to power. He espoused their cause, was appointed brigadier by the provisional governing junta, and at the head of 2,400 men defeated the southern army of 15,000 men under Riviere Herard, 19 March, 1844. On 12 July, 1844, he was proclaimed supreme chief, after vanquishing his rival, Juan Duarte (q. v.). In the following November Santana was elected constitutional president, receiving also the title of liberator of the country. During the four years of his administration he promoted agriculture and commerce, and sought to create financial resources. In 1848 the clerical party induced Souloque (q. v.) to invade Dominican territory; but Santana was called to command the troops, defeated Souloque, and, deposing President Jimenes, ruled as dictator till the election of Buenaventura Baez in October, 1852. He tried to negotiate for annexation to the United States, which Baez defeated. Santana was re-elected president in 1853, and again defeated Souloque's invasions in 1855 and 1856; but the credit of the government declined, and he resigned early in 1857. Baez was now recalled, but was driven from the island by a revolt in November, 1858, and Santana again assumed the executive. He opposed slavery, continued, and, despairing of his ability to preserve peace, Santana opened negotiations with Spain, and, on 18 March, 1861, the incorporation of Santo Domingo with the Spanish monarchy was proclaimed. Santana was commissioned lieutenant-general in the Spanish army, and received patents of nobility and the title of Don. He was wounded at the battle of San Vicente de la Jara, on 9 June, 1861, where he was accused of gross neglect of duty, and was cashiered, and afterwards imprisoned, at the order of King Amadeus of Spain. He was released in the year of the American rebellion, and fled to Brazil to escape the wrath of the king. He continued to live in Brazil till the year of his death, 1877. He was succeeded in the presidency of the republic by his son, Domingo Santana. He died at the age of 97, July 2, 1877, at the hospital of São Paulo of a stroke of apoplexy.

SANTANDER, Francisco de Paula (sán-tan-dár), president of Colombia, b. in Rosario de Cucuta in 1792; d. in Bogota, 5 May, 1840. He studied at the University of Lima, and was about to be graduated in law, when the news arrived of the declaration of independence in Caracas in 1810, followed by the revolution in Cartagena. Santander immediately took part in the patriotic movement, and was appointed secretary of the military commander of Maracaibo. In 1811 he joined the Federal forces under Baraya, in the campaign against the Unitarian forces under Nariño, and he was taken prisoner, 9 Jan., 1813. In February, 1813, he joined the forces under Bolivar, and during that year and 1814 kept up a guerrilla warfare against the Spanish troops in the district of Cucuta. When New Granada was invaded by Morillo, he retired in 1816 with the remainder of the forces under General del Carmen, and, on joining them, the rest of the dispersed patriot army under several chiefs. A meeting of all the independent leaders was held in Aracataca on 16 July, and Santander was elected commander-in-chief; but he was soon replaced by Gen. Paez (q. v.). Santander left the army of Apure in February, 1817, joined Bolivar's staff in April, and accompanied him in the campaign against Guayana and the unfortunate operations against Morillo in 1818. In August of that year he was promoted brigadier and commissioned by Bolivar to prepare a force for the campaign of 1819. He joined Bolivar in Guanahilito in June of that year, and his vote principally decided the invasion of New Granada, in which he participated, being promoted general of division on the battle-field of Boyaca on 7 Aug. When Bolivar returned to Venezuela, 20 Sept., he appointed Santander vice-president of the state of Cundinamarca, and as such he sent troops to the south against the Spanish president of Quito. The congress of Quito elected Santander on 28 Aug., 1821, vice-president of the newly constituted republic of Colombia, and from December, 1821, until September, 1826, during Bolivar's absence in Quito and Peru, he was at the head of the executive, acting with prudence and ability, and exerting himself to forward re-enforcements to Bolivar. He was re-elected in the same year; but after Bolivar's return he encountered open opposition to the latter, showing himself in the convention of Ocaña, to which he was elected by the province of Bogota, to be a personal enemy of the liberator, under the pretext that the latter had tried to subvert the constitution for personal ambition. Santander was even charged with complicity in the attempt to murder Bolivar on 25 Sept., 1828, and he was condemned to death on 7 Nov., but his sentence was commuted to banishment. He travelled through England, France, and Germany, and while absent was elected president of the new republic of New Granada for the term of 1832-6. His administration was just and progressive, especially in fostering primary education and introducing the elements of common schools, founding colleges in the provinces, and dividing the republic into three university districts. He was elected to congress in 1837, re-elected in 1839, and died during the session of that body. He wrote a justification of his conduct under the title "Apuntamientos para las Memorias de Colombia y Nueva Granada" (Bogota, 1837).

SARAVIA, Francisco (sa-ra-ve-a), Spanish physician, b. in Rio Janeiro at the end of the 17th century; d. there in 1761. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Coimbra, made a fellow of the Royal Academy of London, and on his return to Brazil practised in Rio Janeiro, where he became famous for his charity. He wrote "Portuguesa e América Ilustrada" (1750); "A visavenganza" in 1751; and "San Oriano" in 1753, to show that the apostle St. Thomas visited Brazil, and pretending to decipher sundry inscriptions and symbolical characters that he had met in the mountains of Itaquatiara in Minas Geraes (Rio Janeiro, 1752); "Polvanthes Philoconico na Moral, Politica, Instruccion Doutrinal e Historica, a work on the education of youth (1755); and "Polvanthes Brasiliano moderna historia," on endemic and epidemic diseases and their treatment (1757).

SARAVIA, Francisco (sa-ra-ve-a), Spanish missionary, b. in Sevilla about 1530; d. in Villa-Alta, Mexico, 10 Aug., 1630. He went about 1550 to Mexico, where he married and worked as a cabinet-maker, but after the death of his wife he returned to the New World at the age of 34, and took his ordination, which was highly valued. In 1574, after his ordination he was sent to the parish of Villa-Alta, in the province of Oaxaca, where he soon acquired the difficult language of the Chichimeca Indians, and set out to convert that tribe, dwelling in caves on the mountains of Oaxaca. He met with great success, persuading the Indians to leave their mountains fastnesses, founding pueblos and large villages, and living for more than fifty years in their midst. He continued his missionary trips to the mountains when a nonagenarian with a broken leg, being carried by the Indians, and he did not return to his convent of Villa-Alta till he felt his last days approaching. He wrote "Gran Homiluario Chichimeca," which he copied with his own SARAVIA. Melchor Bravo de, governor of Chili, b. in Sorin early in the 16th century: d. in Spain about 1579. In 1547, when the audience of New Granada was created, he was appointed judge, but did not take his seat, as he was promoted by the emperor to the audience of Peru, where he arrived in June, 1549. In 1532 at the death of Antonio de Mendola, vicerey of Peru, the audience took charge of the government, and directed the operations against the rebellions Francisco Hernando Giron. Saravia showed much zeal and good-will, but little aptitude in military affairs; nevertheless, King Philip II. in 1569 rewarded him with the governorship of Chili, which he held until 1575. He then returned to Spain, where he died several years afterward.

SARAVIA. Edila, a book entitled "Antigiedades Peruanas," which is frequently cited by Juan de Velasco in his "Historia del reino de Quito."

SARGENT. Nathaniel Peastee, jurist, b. in Methuen, Mass., 2 Nov, 1731; d. in Haverhill, Mass., 12 Oct., 1791. He was graduated at Harvard in 1759, and engaged in the practice of law in Haverhill. He served in the cause of liberty, was a delegate to the Provincial congress in 1775, and became a representative and judge of the superior court the next year. In 1780-91 he was chief justice of Massachusetts.

SARGENT. Aaron Augustus, senator, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 28 Sept., 1825; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 14 Aug., 1887. He learned the printer's trade, and when twenty years old was a reporter in Washington, D. C. He removed to California in 1849, where he engaged in mining, and established the "Nevea Journal." He studied law while editing that paper, was admitted to the bar in 1854, and elected district attorney of Nevada county two years later. He was vice-president of the Republican national convention in 1880, the same year he was appointed a commissioner of the Panama-Pacific Exposition in 1893, and a year later he was appointed a justice of the U. S. circuit court. Mr. Sargent was graduated at Harvard, and in 1751 became captain of a ship belonging to his father, who was a merchant. In 1775 he entered the Revolutionary army, and was a sergeant at arms of the Congress. He was graduated at Harvard, and in 1771 became a member of the House of Representatives, and a overseer of Bowdon.—His nephew, Winthorp, soldier, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 1 May, 1753; d. in New Orleans, 3 June, 1829, was graduated at Harvard, and in 1771 became a captain of a ship belonging to his father, who was a merchant. In 1775 he entered the Revolutionary army, and was a naval agent at Gloucester, 1 Jan., 1776, and captain of Gen. Henry Knox's regiment of artillery, 16 March, 1776, serving throughout the war, and taking part in the siege of Boston, the battles of Long Island, White Plains, Trenton, the Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth, attaining the rank of major. He became connected with the Ohio company in 1786, under Gen. Rufus Putnam, and was appointed surveyor of the Northwest territory by congress. He was his secretary in 1787, and was its governor in 1788-1801. During the Louisiana war he was in 1812, the Confederate States, and was a major-general, and was wounded in the expedition under Gen. the Society of the Cincinnati as a delegate from Massachusetts, and published, with Benjamin P. Smith, "Papers Relative to Certain American Antiquities" (Philadelphia, 1796), and "Boston," a poem (Boston, 1803).—Winthrop's great-nephew, Fitzwilliam, physician, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 17 May, 1820, was graduated at Jefferson college in 1839, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1843. He was surgeon in the White hospital, Philadelphia, in 1844-45. At the latter date he removed to Switzerland, where he has since resided. He has published "Bandaging and other Operations of Minor Surgery" (Philadelphia, 1848; with additions on military surgery, 1862), and edited Robert Drutt's "Principles and Practice of Minor Surgery" (Philadelphia, 1863) and James Miller's "Principles of Surgery" (1859).—His son, John Sinzey, artist, b. in Florence, Italy, in 1856, studied under Caroles Duran, and his professional life has been principally spent in Europe. In 1879 he received honorable mention at the salon, and in 1881 a medal of the 2nd class. He has exhibited in London, Paris, and New York portraits and genre paintings. Among his figures are "Finding for Our Country" and "En route pour la pêche" (1878); "Neapolitan Children Bathing" (1879); and "El Jaleo" (1882). He is especially noted for his excellent portraits, among which are those of Charles Duran and 'Docteur Pozzi.'—"Portrait of a Young Lady," exhibited at the salon of 1881; a group of four young girls, "Hall of the Four Children" (1882); "Madame G.," at the salon of 1884; and "Mrs. Marquand" and "Mrs. Boit" at the Royal academy exhibition, 1888. See sketch of Sargent by Henry James, in Harper's Magazine. —Lucius Manlius, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 June, 1876; d. in West Roxbury, Mass., 2 June, 1887, studied two years at Harvard, and studied law, but did not practise, devoting himself to literary pursuits, to philanthropic work, and to the temperance cause, for which he wrote and lectured for more than thirty years. His earliest publication was "Translations from the Minor Latin Poets" (Boston, 1867), which was followed by the original poems "Hubert and Helen, and other Verses" (1872); an "Ode" (1873): "Three Temperance Tales," that passed through 120 editions, and were translated into several languages (1848); "Dealings with the Deal" (1856); "Reminiscences of a Controversialist" (1890). He contributed to the "Boston Transcript" for many years under the signature of "Sigma," and his writings were characterized by honesty of opinion and vigor of style. His papers on the cooie trade were subsequently collected and republished in England by the Reform association. His numerous poems were never printed in book-form. He married a sister of Horace Binney. See "Reminiscences of Lucius M. Sargent," by John H. Sheppard (Boston, 1869).—Lucius Manlius's son, Horace Binney, soldier, b. in Quincy, Mass., 30 June, 1821, was graduated at Harvard in 1843, and at the law department there in 1845. At the opening of the civil war he was senior aide on the staff of Gen. John and Andrew, commanding the 1st regiment, Massachusetts cavalry, in 1861, became colonel of the same regiment in October, 1862, was on duty with the forces in South Carolina, in the Army of the Potomac and the Department of the Gulf, participating in the engagements of Secessionville, Culpeper, and Rapidan Station. And in the battles of Antietam, South Mountain, Chancellorsville, and in the Red River campaign under Gen. Banks, where he was wounded in action, 21 March, 1864, was brevetted brigadier-general for "gallantry and good conduct," and 29
Sept., 1864, was mustered out on account of wounds received in action. He has been a frequent contributor to periodical literature and the press, and has delivered numerous addresses. Another son of Lucius Manlius, Lucius Manlius, soldier, b. in Boston, 15 Sept., 1826; d. near Bellefield, Va., 9 Dec., 1864, was graduated at Harvard in 1848, and at the medical department there in 1857, becoming house surgeon and dispensary physician at the Massachusetts general hospital. He was commissioned surgeon in the 2d Massachusetts volunteers in May, 1861, and, resigned in October of that year, and became captain in the 1st Massachusetts cavalry, was ordered to the Army of the Potomac, and participated in the battles of Kelly's Ford, Antietam, South Mountain, Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville. He became major in his former regiment, 2 Jan., 1864, lieutenant-colonel, 30 Sept., and was mortally wounded in an engagement on Meherrin river.—John Osborne, lawyer, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 20 Sept., 1811, is the grandson of the first Lucius Manlius's first cousin. He was graduated at Harvard in 1830, where he founded the "Collegean," in which he was aided by his brother Epes, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and other students. He then studied law in Boston, was admitted to the bar in 1833, and in 1834-7 contributed the political articles of a Boston Atlas, which was bought by the New York city in 1838 to become associate editor of the "Courier and Enquirer," but resigned after the election of President Harrison, resumed his profession of the law, taking charge, in 1848, as a volunteer for the Whig congressional committee, of the "Battery," a campaign paper published in Washington, to advocate Gen. Zachary Taylor's election; he subsequently founded the "Republic" with Alexander C. Bullett, in which he supported the compromise measures, conducting the paper on the principle of opposition to both the Abolition and Secession parties. He discontinued its publication at the close of President Fillmore's administration, and subsequently practiced law in Washington and New York. He married in 1841-2, and since the latter date has lived in New York city. He declined the mission to China, which was offered him by President Fillmore. Mr. Sargent has done varied literary work, and his publications include a "Lecture on the Late Improvements in Steam Navigation and the Arts of Naval Warfare," with a biographical sketch of John Ericsson of New York, (1844), a version of Anastasius Grün's "Last Knight," founded on incidents in the life of the Emperor Maximilian (New York, 1872), three legal pamphlets reviewing "The Rule in Minor's Case" (New York, 1871), and four numbers of "Chapters for the Times, by a Berkshire Farmer," political (Lee, Mass., 1884).—John Osborne's brother, Epes, editor, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 27 Sept., 1814, is the grandson of the inventor of the "Mirror." He returned to Boston about 1846, and edited the "Evening Transcript," for several years, retiring from that charge to devote himself to editing a series of educational works. During his editorial career, Mr. Sargent held pleasant relationships with Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, William C. Preston, and Henry Clay. Mr. and Mrs. Clay said that Mr. Sargent's "Memoir" of him was the best and most authentic in existence. While a resident of New York he was a member of the Union club, and a founder of the New York club. He was a laborious student and worker, and engaged with success in almost every branch of literature. He began to write for the stage in 1834, and produced one of the "Bride of Genoa," a poetical drama in five acts, which was played with success at the Tremont theatre, Boston, in February, 1837, and subsequently in New Orleans and New York. He produced "Velasco" the following November at the Tremont theatre, Ellen Tree taking the part of Ida. His plays, "Change Makes Change," his comedy, and the "Priestess," a tragedy, were successfully received in this country and abroad. His novels and tales for the young include "Wealth and Worth" (New York, 1840); "What's to Be Done, or the Will and the Way" (1841); "Fleetwood, or the Stain of a Birth" (1843); and "Peculiar, a Tale of the Great Transition," which pictures the social changes in the south during the early years of the civil war (1863). His poems include "Songs of the Sea" (Boston, 1847); a second volume of "Poems" (1858); "The Woman who Dared" (1859); and numerous fugitive poems, of which the most popular are "Life on the Ocean Wave," the lyric on the death of Warren, and the lines beginning "Oh, ye keen breezes from the salt Atlantic." His miscellaneous works are "The Life and Services of Henry Clay" (Auburn, 1849); with additions by Horace Greeley, 1853; "American Adventure by Land and Sea" (2 vols., Boston, 1847); "The Critic Criticised" (1856); "Arctic Adventures by Sea and Land" (1857; with additions, 1860); "Original Dialogues" (1860). He edited the lives of Campbell, Collins, Goldsmith, Gray, Hood, and Rogers, with their correspondence, 1832-5; "Select Works of Benjamin Franklin," with his autobiography and a memoir (Philadelphia, 1853); the "Works of Horace and James Smith" (New York, 1857); and the "Modern Drama" (15 vols., 1846-58). Shortly before his death he completed a "Cyclopedia of English and American Poetry" (New York, 1883).—Lucius Manlius's great-nephew, Charles Sprague, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 April, 1841, was graduated at Harvard in 1862, became lieutenant and aide-de-camp of U. S. volunteers in November of that year, aide-de-camp in 1863, and was brevetted major of volunteers in 1865. He was chosen director of the botanical garden and Arnold arboretum of Harvard in 1873, and professor of arboriculture in 1874. Prof. Sargent planned the selection of North American woods in the American museum of natural history, New York city, in 1880. He was chairman of a commission to examine the Adirondack forests and devise measures for their preservation in 1885, and in 1888 became editor and general manager of "Garden and Forest," a weekly journal of horticulture and forestry. His publications include a "Catalogue of the Forest Trees of North America."
SARMIENTO, Domingo Faustino (se-nue-\text{-}to), president of the Argentine Republic, b. in San Juan, 13 Feb., 1811; d. in Asuncion, Paraguay, 11 Sept., 1888. In 1829 he took part in the rising against Rossas and Quiroga, and at its defeat took refuge in Chili, where he was successively clerk, school-master, and overseer in a mine. He afterwards entered journalism, and in 1842, under the protection of the minister, Manuel Montt (q. v.), he founded the first normal school for teachers in South America. In 1845-7 he travelled, by order of the Chilian government, in Europe and the United States, to study the primary-school system. He made the acquaintance of Cobden, Guizot, Humboldt, and Horace Mann, and under Mann's influence, prepared his famous "Vida de la Educación," which was afterward published by order of the Chilian government. On his return to Chili he founded a weekly paper, "La Crónica," in which he advocated the establishment in his country of a Federal republic. In 1849 he formed part of the staff of "El Progreso," and founded "El Monitor de las Escuelas," in which he advocated the interests of education. When Gen. Urquiza, aided by Brazil and Uruguay, revolted against Rossas, Sarmiento with other exiles left Chili in 1851, and took part in the campaign that ended, 3 Feb., 1852, with the battle of Monte Caseros. In 1855 he established himself in Buenos Ayres, and devoted his time to the promotion of public instruction, founding the "Escuelas de Educación Comunal." In 1856 he demanded the establishment of a department of public instruction, and he was appointed its director in 1857, establishing a model college in Buenos Ayres. In 1859 he was elected senator, and in 1860, as minister of public instruction, he influenced the vote of $100,000 for the establishment of schools. In 1861 he was elected judge of the Court of Appeals, and was elected governor of San Juan, where he suppressed a revolt of partisan chieftains. He was made minister to Chili and Peru in 1864, and to the United States in 1865. While here he was elected president of the Argentine Republic for six years, assuming office, 12 Oct., 1868. During his administration the war with Paraguay was brought to a successful termination; railways and telegraph lines were constructed, schools were multiplied, a National college was established in each province, the National observatory was founded, and immigration was promoted. After that time he was senator, obtained the rank of general, and was proprietor and editor of "El Censor," continuing always to protect the interests of public education. Of his publications the most important are "De la Educación popular" (Santiago, 1848); "Viajes por Europa, África y América" (1848); "Memoria sobre Instrucción Primaria" (1849); "Argüépolis, ó la capital de los Estados Confederados" (1850); French translation, Paris, 1851; "Civilización y Barbarie, ó Facundo Quiroga y Albo" (1853); French translation, Paris, 1853; "Vida de Abrilán Lincoln" (New York, 1866); and "Las Escuelas, base de la prosperidad en los Estados Unidos" (1868).

SARMIENTO GAMBOA, Pedro de, Spanish mariner, b. in Galicia about 1530; d. there about 1590. He was the commander of the naval station in the Pacific in 1578, when Sir Francis Drake committed depredations on the coast of Peru and Mexico, and, in the belief that Drake would return by the Strait of Magellan, Sarmiento was ordered by the viceroy to take possession of that passage and intercept him. He left Callao with eleven vessels in 1579, and after vainly waiting for Drake, who had been warned by the viceroy of Ciudad del Hope, he explored the coast, and, after some encounters with the natives, returned to Spain in 1580. On his reporting the results of his expedition to Philip II., the latter resolved to fortify the strait, and sent, toward the end of 1581, an expedition of twenty-four vessels with 2,500 men from Cadiz, under command of the Marquis de Figueroa and Valdez. The expedition was unfortunate, as eight vessels were lost in a storm, and Flores, on account of rivalry with Sarmiento, abandoned him with twelve vessels in the entry of the strait and returned to Spain. With only four vessels Sarmiento continued the voyage, arriving in January, 1583, at a favorable point, where he founded a fort and colony, which he named "San Francisco de la Chilena" (now the town of Chiloe). He left a garrison of 300 men, and sailed in 1584 for Europe, but was captured by an English fleet, sent to England, and kept a prisoner till 1588. Meanwhile his colony had dissolved and gradually perished of starvation, one of the survivors being rescued by Cavendish's fleet in 1587, and another by Meriche in 1589. After his liberation Sarmiento made a report of his experience, and a complaint against Flores, to King Philip II., which was first printed in Madrid in 1708, and again in vol. iv. of the collection of American documents that has been in course of publication by the Spanish government since 1864. It seems that Sarmiento's complaint was neglected, for he died soon after his return to Spain.

SARMIENTO DE SOTOMAYOR, Garcia, Count de Salvatierra, viceroy of Mexico and Peru, b. in Spain about 1520; d. in Cartagena, Colombia, in 1655. He was sent to replace the Marquis de Villena, who had been deposed by royal order, on suspicion of favoring the independence of Portugal, and arrived in Mexico in 1642, receiving the viceroyalty the latter part of 1642. In 1644 he sent an unsuccessful expedition under Juan Gonzalez Barriga to explore and colonize California. In the next year the city suffered by an inundation of the lagoons, and the viceroy ordered the cut of Nochistango, which had been begun by Enrique Martinez, to be repaired. The city of Salvatierra (now in the state of Guanajuato) was founded in 1647, and in the same year the viceroy was obliged to interfere between Bishop Palafox and the Jesuits. In 1648 he was promoted viceroy of Peru, and, sailing from Acapulco, he entered Lima on 29 Sept. His government in Peru did not present any noteworthy features, and he delivered the executive to his successor, Count de Alva de Aliste, on 24 Feb., 1653, dying, on his return voyage, at Lima, 22 July, 1653.

SARMIENTO VALLADARES, José, Count de Monteozuma, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Spain about 1650; d. there in 1717. Through his wife, a descendant of the Emperor Monteozuma II., he inherited the title of Count de Monteozuma and Tuita, and in 1696 was appointed viceroy of Mexico, receiving the executive on 18 Dec., from the provisional viceroy, Juan de Ortega Montafes. During his administration the Jesuit Salvatierra set out on the first successful expedition to Lower California in 1697, and during the same year he quelled a riot that was caused by scarcity of corn.
In 1697 he also sent an unsuccessful expedition to expel the Danish from St. Thomas. When King Charles II. died in 1700, appointing the grandson of Louis XIV, his heir, the Count of Montezuma, who did not favor the house of Bourbon, solicited his recall, and, as the new king, Philip V., feared Sarmiento's partiality for the Austrian succession, the latter was ordered to deliver the executive again to Bishop Ortega, which he did on Nov. 1701. On 23 Nov., 1704, Sarmiento was created Duke of Atlixco and grandee of Spain.

SARRAIN, Michel, Canadian author, b. in France in 1639; d. 9 Sept., 1734. He resided at Quebec when Canada was a French dependency, and was a member of the superior council of the colony. He became physician to the king, keeper of the king's seal in 1732, and a member of the Academy of sciences of Paris. On his arrival the historian Charlevoix expressed surprise at finding so learned a man in the colony. Sarrain contributed many articles to the publications of various learned societies, among others a "Description of the Castor," in the memoirs of the Academy of sciences (1794); "A Letter on the Mineral Waters of Cap de la Magdalene," in the memoirs of the Traversiers, or Musk-Rat of America," in the Paris "Documents"; and a description of a plant which he had discovered and named "Sarracenia purpurea." The whole genius of which this is a species was named "Sarracenia" by Tournefort, in honor of Dr. Sarrain.

SARTAIN, John, artist, b. in London, 24 Oct., 1808; d. in Philadelphia, 25 Oct., 1897. He learned to engrave in the line manner, in which style he produced several of the plates in Othley's "Early Florentine School." In 1825 he began to practise mezzotints, and when he came to the United States in 1830 was one of the first to introduce that branch of engraving here. Subsequently he usually mingled both styles, with the addition of stippled effects. He has practised his art in England; he has studied painting under John Varley and Henry Richter, and in Philadelphia he became the pupil of Joshua Shaw and Manuel J. de France. For about ten years after his arrival in this country he was also engaged in painting portraits in oil and miniatures on ivory. During the same time he found employment in making designs for bank-note vignettes, and also in drawing on wood for book-illustration. In 1843 he became proprietor and editor of "Campbell's Foreign Semi-Monthly Magazine," and thereafter devoted himself entirely to engraving and to literary work. He had an interest at the same time in the "Eclectic Museum," for which, later, when John H. Agnew was alone in charge, he simply engraved the plates. In 1848 he purchased a one-half interest in the "Union Magazine," a New York periodical, which he transferred to Philadelphia. The name was changed to "Sartain's Union Magazine," and during the four years of its existence the journal became widely known. During this period, besides his editorial work and the engravings that had to be made regularly for the periodicals with which he was connected, Sartain produced an enormous quantity of plates for book-illustration. The framing prints from his studio include "The County Election in Missouri," after Bingham (about 1855); Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gilmore, of Baltimore, two plates after Sir Thomas Lawrence, after Paul Brown; "Christ Rejected," after Benjamin West (1862); "Men of Progress, American Inventors" (1862); "Zeisberger preaching to the Indians at Gogoshunk" (about 1862), and "The Iron-Worker and King Solomon" (1876), the last three after Christian Schussele: "John Knox and Mary, Queen of Scots," after Emmanuel Leutze; "Homestead of Henry Clay," after Hamilton; "Edmond Nott and the Battle of Gettysburg" (1876–77), after Peter F. Rothermel. Since he came to Philadelphia, Mr. Sartain had taken an active interest in art matters there. He had held various offices in the Artists' fund society, the School of design for women, and the Pennsylvania academy, and had been actively connected with other educational institutions; he had dropped several times, and on the occasion of his second visit in 1862 he was elected a member of the society "Art et Amicitiae" in Amsterdam. In 1876 he had charge of the art department at the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia. In recognition of his services there, the king of Italy conferred on him the title of cavaliere, and he had received also other decorations and medals. His architectural knowledge had been frequently called into requisition, and he had designed several monuments, notably that to Washington and Lafayette in Monument cemetery, Philadelphia, for which he also modelled the two medallion heads.—His son, Samuel, engraver, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Oct., 1830, at the age of sixteen began to engrave under his father, and since his twenty-first year has been in business for himself. His prints include "Clear the Track," after C. Schussele (1854); "Christ blessing Little Children," after Sir Charles Locke Eastlake (1861); "One of the Chosen," after Guy; "Christ stiling the Tempest," after Hamilton; "The Song of the Angels," after Thomas Moran; "Evangelium"; and various portraits after Titian, Holbein, and other masters. He principally devoted himself to engraving portraits and other plates for books. He holds offices in the Artists' fund society, the Franklin institute, and other art and scientific societies of Philadelphia.—Another son, William, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 Nov., 1843, practised engraving under his father until about his twenty-fourth year, producing some very good plates, namely "Young America crushing Rebellion and Sedition" (1864) and "Little Samuel," after James Sant (1866). During 1867–8 he studied under Christian Schussele and at the Pennsylvania academy. He then went to Europe, where he studied with Léon Bonnat and at the Ecole des beaux-arts, in Paris. After an absence of eight years he returned to the United States (1877), setting up in New York, where he was elected an associate of the National academy in 1889. He was one of the original members of the Society of American artists, and is a member also of other art associations. He received a silver medal in Boston in 1881, and honorable mention in Philadelphia in 1887. Mr. Sartain paints both landscape and figure subjects, and many of his pictures are present street scenes in Italy and Algiers. Among his works are "Tombs of the Saints, at Bouzaareh" (1874); "Italian Boy's Head" and "Italian Girl's Head" (1875); "Narcissus" (1879), owned by Smith college, Northampton, Mass.; "Nubian Sheik" (1879); "A Quiet Moment" (1879–80): "A Chapter of the Koran" and "Paquita." (1888). An exhibition of his works was held in Boston in 1884. He is well known as a teacher, and has been connected with several art academies in New York and Philadelphia.—John’s daughter, Emily, contributed, in "Our Collected," March, 1841, first practised art as an engraver under her father. She studied from 1864 till 1872 at the Pennsylvania academy under Christian Schussele, and then, until 1875, with Evariste Luminais in Paris. Her style in engraving is a mixture of line and mezzotint. She has engraved some framing plots for a large number of portraits for both autographs and engravings, and, in fact, devotes herself principally to portraiture, painting genre pictures occasionally. Her "Reproof" was at the Centennial exhibition of 1876, where she gained a medal. The "Mary Smith prize" was awarded her at the Philadelphia academy in 1881, and again in 1883. From November, 1881, till February, 1883, she was art editor of "Our Collected," and since September, 1886, she has been principal of the Philadelphia school of design for women.

SARTORI, Lewis Constant, naval officer, b. in Bloomisbury, N. J., 3 June, 1812; d. in Philadelphia, 11 Jan., 1899. He entered the navy, 2 Feb., 1829, was promoted to lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and during the Mexican war was attached to the heavy squadron in Tampico. He was promoted to commander, 7 April, 1861, and assigned to the steamer "Flag" on the South Atlantic blockade. He commanded the sloop-of-war "Portsmouth" in the Western Gulf blockading squadron in 1863–5, and the steamer "Agawam," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1865–6. He was promoted to captain, 15 March, 1865, and was attached to the North Pacific squadron in 1868–70, when he was made commodore, 12 Dec., 1873, and retired, 3 June, 1874.

SARTWELL, Henry Parker, scientist, b. in Pittsfield, Mass., 18 April, 1792; d. in Penn Yan, N. Y., 15 Nov., 1867. After receiving a classical education, he began to practice medicine at nineteen years of age. He was a surgeon in the U. S. army during the second war with Great Britain, and subsequently settled in Batavia, Ontario co., N. Y., where he devoted himself to the study of botany. He removed to Penn Yan, N. Y., in 1830, where he continued to reside. His botanical labors extended over a period of forty-six years, and his collections of American plants are found in many herbariums in Europe and America. About 1846 he gave his entire attention to the study of the genus Carex, one of the most extensive and difficult of the vegetable kingdom. He then conceived the idea of gathering and grouping all the indigenous species of Carex in North America, which resulted in his publication of his work entitled "Carex Americana Septentrionalis Exsiccat," (4 vols. folio, New York, 1848). The third part of this work, intended to include fifty new species, was begun, and more than forty species had already been collected for it, when he died. His herbarium, the labor of forty years, containing about 8,000 species, is now in Hamilton college, N. Y. Dr. Sartwell kept daily records of the weather for forty years previous to his death, which were published in Penn Yan, and sent to the Smithsonian institution. Hamilton college recognized his work by conferring upon him the degree of Ph. D, in 1864.

SASNETT, William Jacob, clergyman, b. in Hancock county, Ga., 29 April, 1820; d. in Montgomery, Ala., 3 Nov., 1865. He was graduated at Oglethorpe university in 1839, and studied law, but abandoned it for the ministry, and rose to eminence. He was professor of English in Emory college, Ga., in 1849–57, president of La Grange female college in 1858, and the next year became principal of East Alabama college in Auburn. He wrote and spoke constantly in favor of the higher education of women. He received the degree of D. D. from Virginia college. His publications include many magazine articles, "Discussions in Literature and Religion" (Nashville, Tenn., 1850), and "Progress" (1855).

SASOONAN, or ALLUMMAPER ("one who is well wrapped up"), Indian chief, d. in the autumn of 1747. He was king of the Delawares as early as 1718, and in that year headed the deportation of Indians from Philadelphia. He was given an absolute release to the proprietaries for lands "situate between Delaware and Susquehanna from Duck creek to the mountains on this side Lееchav," which lands had been granted by their ancestors to William Penn. In 1728 he removed to the Susquehanna. He was friendly to the whites, and an honest, true-hearted man of good natural sense.

SAZSACUS, Pequot chief, b. near Groton, Conn., about 1590; d. in the Mohawk settlement in June, 1637. He was chief of the Pequot Indians, a brave warrior, and thought by the other tribes to be endowed with supernatural powers. He was, in consequence, the terror of the New England coast, and a dreaded foe to the settlers. His domain comprised the present towns of W. Winsted, Torrington, North Storington, and Groton, and his tribe numbered 700 warriors, besides women and children. In 1637 they attacked a small English fort at Saybrook, murdered several women at Wethersfield, and carried two girls into captivity. The colonists then mustered all their able men, and, under command of John Mason (q. v.), attacked the Pequots on the Mystic River, 5 June, 1637. The colonists were aided by several Indian tribes, including the Narragansetts, who were so alarmed by the fact that Sassaucus was in command of the Pequots that, when the hour of the attack came, they fell back in terror, exclaiming: "Sassaucus in the fort! Sassaucus in the fort! Sassaucus all one god! Nobody can kill him! The whites were finally victorious; but the chief escaped to the Mohawks, by whom he was soon murdered.

SATTERLEE, Henry Yates, clergyman, b. in New York city, 11 Jan., 1843. He was graduated at Columbia in 1863, and at the General theological seminary, New York city, in 1866, was ordained deacon the same year in the Protestant Episcopal church, and priest in 1867. He was assistant rector of Holy Trinity church, New York, Dutchess co., N. Y., in 1855–73, became its rector at the latter date, and since 1882 has had charge of Calvary church, New York city. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1882. In 1888 he declined the assistant bishopric of Ohio. Dr. Satterlee has been actively interested in the Protestant Episcopal church, and in charitible, moral and religious movements, and in the home and foreign missionary work of the Protestant Episcopal church. He has published serial articles in the magazines, and several sermons, and manuals of religious instruction.—His cousin, Walter, artist,
b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 18 Jan., 1814, was a pupil of the National academy, and has studied also under Edwin White and Léon Boumann. He was elected an associate of the academy in 1839, and is also a member of the Water-color society and the New York etching club. In 1886 he gained the Clarke prize at the academy. Among his works are the oil-paintings, "Contemplation," in Smith college, Northampton, Mass.; "The Converging Composer" (1883); "Autumn," "Good-bye, Summer," "The Cranes," and "Fortune by Tea-Leaves" (1886); and the water-colors "Solitaire" and "Old Ballads" (1878); "Two Sides of a Convert-Wall" (1884); and "The Fortune-Teller," "The Net-Mender," and "The Lightened Load" (1887). His pencil has been frequently employed in book-illustration, and he is well known as a teacher.

SAUGANASH, Richard Sherwood, surgeon, b. in Fairfield, Herkimer co., N. Y., 6 Dec., 1798; d. in New York city, 10 Nov., 1880. His father, Maj. William Satterlee, served in the Revolutionary army. After a collegiate course the son studied medicine, was admitted to practice, and in 1818 settled in Seneca county, N. Y., subsequently removed to Wisconsin and became assistant surgeon in the U. S. army in 1822, served in the first and second Florida wars, and in 1846 was assigned to duty under Gen. William J. Worth, as chief surgeon of the 1st division of regulars. After the capture of Mexico he became medical director on the staff of Gen. Winfield Scott. He became U. S. medical purveyor in 1833, held that office till the close of the civil war, and in 1864 was brevetted "lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general for diligent care and attention in procuring proper army supplies as medical purveyor, and for economy and fidelity in the disbursement of large sums of money." He became lieutenant-colonel and chief medical purveyor in July, 1866, and was retired, 22 Feb., 1869.

SAUGANASH, The, Indian name of Capt. Billy Caldwell, a half-breed leader, b. in Canada about 1790; d. in Council Bluffs, Iowa, 28 Sept., 1841. His father was an Irish officer in the British service, and his mother a Pottawattamie. He received a good education from the Jesuits at Detroit, could speak and write English and French, and was master of several Indian dialects. He early formed an acquaintance with the white people, and from 1807 till the death of the latter they were intimate and devoted friends. The Sauganash was a faithful friend to the whites, and did all he could to mitigate the horrors of savage warfare. Although he was hostile to the whites at the time of the Chicago massacre in August, 1812, it is said that the lives of the prisoners were saved through the intercession of Caldwell and Shaboma, who were not in the engagement. The Sauganash took up his residence in Chicago about 1820. In 1826 he was one of the justices of the peace there. In 1828 the Indian department, in consideration of his services, built him the first frame house in Chicago. He occupied this house (near what is now the corner of North State street and Chicago and Adams streets) and died in 1836 for Council Bluffs. By a treaty that was made 2 Jan., 1830, the Sauganash, Shabona, and other friendly Indians had reservations granted them by the government, and 1,340 acres on the north branch of the Chicago river was set apart for Caldwell, which he sold before leaving the country. Early forming an acquaintance with Captain Caldwell, his Indian brother, he engaged in business as a merchant and banker. Mr. Saunders was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of Iowa in 1846, and a state senator for eight years. He sat in the first Republican convention in the state, and in the National conventions of 1860 and 1868, was a nominee for the office of governor. He became a representative in Congress and served as governor of Nebraska territory from 1861 till its admission into the Union in 1867. During his term of office the population of the territory was only about 30,000, yet he not only raised 3,000 men for the National armies, but successfully carried on operations against hostile Indians. Much of the prosperity of the state is due to his energy. He was instrumental in causing the Union Pacific railroad to cross Missouri river at Omaha, instead of several miles below, thus improving the rapid growth of the city. In 1877-83 he served in the U. S. senate, where he secured for his state more than 600,000 acres of land by straightening the northern boundary-line.

SAUNDERS, Sir Charles, British naval officer, b. in Scotland about 1713; d. in London, 7 Dec., 1775. He joined the navy, served under Lord Anson, and won notice by his gallantry in the taking of a Spanish merchantman, lost in 1741. In 1759 Pitt gave him the command of the fleet that was intended to co-operate with Gen. Wolfe and the land forces at the capture of Quebec. He rendered the greatest assistance to Wolfe by his bombarding of the town, and displayed much skill and courage during the period when the fleet was in St. Lawrence river. He was appointed lieutenant-general of marines in 1769, in 1775 a lord of the admiralty, and in 1776 first lord of the admiralty, also in 1770 an admiral.

SAUNDERS, Ephraim Dool, clergyman, b. in Brookside, Morris co., N. J., 30 Sept., 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 Sept., 1872. He was graduated at Yale in 1831, and, after studying theology in New York for a year, entered the Presbyterian ministry in 1834, where he engaged in teaching. He was licensed to preach there in 1833, ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1834, and was instrumental in building three churches, but relinquished preaching on account of a throat trouble, and became principal of an academy in Petersburg, Va. After travelling in Europe, he engaged in missionary work in the Hawaiian mission, lost in 1844, he established, in West Philadelphia, Saunders Institute, a military school, which attained a high reputation. He discontinued the school in 1870, and in 1871 gave the buildings and grounds, which were valued at $100,000, to found, as a memorial of his son, Courtland, the Presby-terian hospital, toward which in the previous year he gave $20,000 besides his personal efforts. He received the degree of D. D. from Lafayette. During the civil war Dr. Saunders was active in raising volunteers and obtaining money for bounties, and established a drill class, in which he trained many officers for the volunteer service. See his "Life," by Thomas D. Spulce (Philadelphia, 1873).—His son, Court-land, who was a teacher in the institute, served as a captain in the National army, and was killed at Antietam. He published a work on "Paradigms of Latin Verbs" (Philadelphia, 1860).

SAUNDERS, Frederick, author, b. in London, England, 14 Aug., 1807. He came to New York in 1837, and opened a branch of the publishing establishment of Saunders and Ottley, London, for the purpose of selling American authors' works and of their own publications, and to seek the protection of an international copyright law. After a persistent effort had been made in behalf of this object, involving a large amount of money, the enterprise was abandoned. In this work Mr. Saunders obtained the cooperation and sympathy of the literary men of the country, and his six visits to Congress, presented at distant intervals, bore the signatures of Washington Irving, William Cullen Bryant, George Bancroft, and many others. He was thus the pioneer in this important movement. Mr. Saunders was for some time city editor of the "Evening Post," and in 1859 became assistant librarian of the Astor library, of which, since 1876, he has been librarian. Madison university gave him the degree of M. A. in 1853. He has been a frequent contributor to magazines and reviews, and has published "Memoirs of the Great Metropolis, or London from the Tower to the Crystal Palace" (New York, 1862); "New York in a Nutshell" (1853); "Salad for the Solitary, or an Epicure" (1863), and "Salad for the Social" (1866), of which many editions appeared in New York and London, and which were reissued in one volume, illustrated (New York, 1872; new ed., 1883); "Pearls of Thought, Religious and Philosophical; gathered from Old Authors," (1859); "Morality and Religion," (1869); "Fifteen Years of Wed- dings, Love, and Marriage" (1868); "Evenings with the Sacred Poets" (1869; revised and enlarged, 1885); "Pastime Papers" (1885); and "Story of some Famous Books" (London, 1887), in "The Book-Lover's Library." Most of his books were published both in New York and in London, and ran through numerous editions. He has also edited "Our National Centennial Jubilee," (1877), and, with Henry T. Tuckerman, "Homes of American Authors" (1853).

SAUNDERS, John, jurist, b. in Virginia in 1754; d. in Fredericton, New Brunswick, in 1834. His grandfather emigrated to Virginia from England, and acquired large landed estates. John received a liberal education, and entered law in 1774, raised a troop of horse at his own expense, and joined the royal forces. He was subsequently captain of cavalry in the Queen's rangers, was often in engagements, and was twice wounded. At the peace he went to England, became a member of the Middle Temple, and practised law. In 1790 he became a judge of the supreme court of New Brunswiek, and in 1794 the chief justice of the council of that colony. In 1822 he became chief justice. Judge Saunders possessed two estates in Virginia, both of which were confiscated.

-SAUNDERS, Prince, attorney-general of Hayti, b. in Thetford, Vt., about 1775; d. in Hayti, 12 Feb., 1840. He was of African descent, and, after receiving an excellent education and teaching in free colored schools in Colchester, Conn., and Boston, Mass., emigrated to Hayti in 1807. Here he was employed at once by Henry Christophe to improve the state of education in the island, and sent to England to procure teachers, books, and apparatus. In that country his first name was mistaken for a title, and as he took no pains to correct this misapprehension he received much attention, and was a guest at many great houses. At that of Sir Joseph Banks, president of the Royal society, "everybody," says Charles R. Leslie in his "Recol- lections," (1854), "when I got near to his Highness I got near to hear what passed in his circle, and a gentleman, with a star and ribbon, said to him: 'What surprises me is that you speak English so well.' Saunders, who had never spoken any other language in his life, bowed and smiled acceptance of the compliment." The result of this mission was not satisfactory to Christophe, and immediately after his close Saunders returned from Hayti to the United States, where he studied divinity, and preached for some time in Philadelphia. A few years later he went again to Hayti, where he was made attorney-general, which office he held at his death. He was the author of the Haytian criminal code, and published "Documents Relative to the Kingdom of Hayti, with a Preface" (London, 1816); "Memoir on Slavery" (Philadelphia, 1818); "Address on Education" (1818); and "Haytian Papers" (Boston, 1818).

SAUNDERS, Romulus Mitchell, statesman, b. in Caswell county, N. C., 5 March, 1791; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 21 April, 1867. His uncle, James Saunder, was an officer in the congress of North Carolina which met at Halifax, 4 April, 1776, and also in the congress held at the same place, 12 Nov., 1776, and was appointed colonel of the northern regiment of his county. James's younger brother, William, the father of Romulus, was an officer in the North Carolina line. The son was educated at the University of North Carolina, studied law in Tennessee, and was admitted to practice in that state in 1812, having been adopted by his uncle James on the death of his father. He returned to North Carolina and was elected to the house of commons from Caswell county from 1815 till 1820, serving as speaker of the house in 1819 and 1820. In 1821 he was elected as a Democrat to congress, where he served until 1829. He was elected attorney-general of the state in 1823. In 1828 he was appointed by President Jackson one of the board of commissioners to decide and allot the amounts that were due citizens of the United States for injuries by France, as settled by the treaty of 4 July, 1831. In 1853 he was elected by the legislature judge of the superior courts, which post he resigned in 1854 to become the candidate of the Democratic party for governor, but he was defeated by John Moorehead. In 1844 he was again elected to congress, and in the Democratic national convention of that year he introduced the celebrated two-third rule, by which the votes of two thirds of all the members of the convention were made necessary for a nomination. The adoption of this rule resulted in the defeat of Martin Van Buren for the nomination and the selection of James K. Polk. He continued in congress until 1845, when he was appointed minister to Spain. He was specially directed by President Polk to negotiate for the purchase of Cuba, and was authorized to offer $100,000,000 for that island. He returned home in October, 1849, and was elected to the house of commons from Wake county in 1850, where he was earnest in securing the construction of the North Carolina railroad, in the reconstruction of the Raleigh and Gaston railroad, and in the development of internal improvements by the state. He was elected judge of the superior courts in 1854, and one of the commissioners to revise and codify the laws of the state. He served as judge until 1863, when he was deposed by Gov. William W. Holden.

SAUVEUR, Baudoin (so-vur), Flemish naturalist, b. in Ypres in 1779; d. in Brussels in 1832. He enlisted early in the French army, served in the West Indies, and afterward went to New Orleans, where he became a wealthy merchant and devoted his leisure to the study of natural history and geology. Declining health and heavy losses in business caused him to retire to Europe, and he fixed his residence in a suburb of Brussels. His works include "Carte geologique du delta du Mississippi" (Brussels, 1827); "Voyages scientifiques dans les bassins du Mississippi et de L'Arcansas" (1828); and "Etudes critiques sur les formations geologiques dans la vallee du Mississippi" (1839).

SAY, Edward, naturalist, b. in Portsmouth, Mass., 26 Nov., 1761; d. in Brierly, 6 July, 1811. He was originally a goldsmith, but later turned his hand to portrait-painting. Washington sat to him several times, and in 1789-90 Say painted his portrait for Harvard. He produced also the well-known "Family Group at Mount Vernon." This was for a long time exhibited in the museum that Savage established in New York, and is now owned by William P. Haverne. His portraits of Washington and Henry Knox were frequently engraved by the artist himself and by others.

SAVAGE, Edward Hartwell, policeman, b. in Alstead, N. H., 18 May, 1812. He received a public-school education, and since 1851 has served as a member of the police force in Boston, Mass., being chief of police in 1870-8. Since 1861 he has been justice of the peace for Suffolk county, Mass. He has published "Boston Police Recollections, or Boston by Daylight and Gaslight" (Boston, 1860), and "Five Thousand Boston Events from 1860 to 1880" (1884).

SAVAGE, James, antiquary, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 July, 1784; d. there, 8 March, 1873. He was descended from Maj. Thomas Savage, who came to Massachusetts from England in 1655. After graduation at Harvard in 1803 he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1807, and served in both houses of the legislature. He was also a member of the executive council, and a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1820, filled several municipal offices, was a member of the school committee. He was the founder of Provident institution for savings, the first savings bank in Boston, and the second in the United States, of which he was also secretary, treasurer, vice-president, and president, and for nineteen years he was treasurer of the Massachusetts historical society, of which he was also president, and edited several of its collections. Thackray was much impressed by his sturdy individuality, and remarked to a friend: "I want to see that quaint, charming old Mr. Savage again." Edwin P. Whipple calls him "the soul of integrity," and says: "It is curious that James Savage, the most eloquent of men when his soul was stirred to its depths, should now be particularly honored merely as an acute antiquarian, ... His hatred of iniquity sometimes blazed out in a fury of wrathful eloquence which amazed those who specially esteemed him as a prodigy of genealogical knowledge, and even disturbed the equanimity of those who chiefly knew him as the most valued and trustworthy of friends." Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1841. For five years Mr. Savage was an associate editor of the "Monthly Anthology," which was founded in Boston in 1803 and continued until 1811, preparing the way for the "North American Review." The discovery of the missing manuscript of John Winthrop's journal in the tower of the Old South church, Boston, in 1826, led Mr. Savage to prepare and annotate the original manuscripts, which he published under the title of "John Winthrop's History of New England from 1630 to 1846, with Notes to illustrate the Civil and Ecclesiastical Concerns, the Geography, Settlement, and Institutions of the Country, and the Lives and Manners of the Ancient Planters" (2 vols., Boston, 1825–6; 2d ed., with corrections, 1833). The first volume of Winthrop's "Journal" had been published from the family manuscripts (Hartford, 1790). In addition to numerous genealogical, historical, political, and controversial pamphlets, he edited William Paley's works (5 vols., Cambridge, 1828; new ed., 1830), and prepared a "Genealogical Dictionary of the First Settlers of New England, showing Three Generations of Those who came before May, 1649" (4 vols., Boston, 1860–4). This work, which occupied him several years, and which displays extraordinary industry and research, has been called "the most stupendous work on genealogy ever completed." He delivered the Fourth-of-July oration in Boston in 1811, and an address on the constitution of Massachusetts on 26 Jan., 1832, both of which were published.

SAVAGE, John, jurist, b. in New York in 1779; d. in Utica, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1863. After graduation at Union in 1799 he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised his profession. In 1814 he was a member of the state assembly, and he was then elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Dec., 1815, to 3 March, 1819, after which he became U. S. district attorney. He was state comptroller from 12 Feb., 1821, till 13 Feb., 1823, and a member of the 18th legislature, 1823 till 1827, and U. S. assistant treasurer in New York. He was a presidential elector on the Polk and Dallas ticket in 1845. Union gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1829.

SAVAGE, John, journalist, b. in Dublin, 13 Dec., 1828; d. in Spragueville, Pa., 9 Oct., 1888. He was educated in a military academy, and studied in the art-school of the Royal Dublin Fusiliers. He was active in revolutionary clubs, established two journals that were suppressed by the British government, and afterward organized and led armed peasants in the south of Ireland. When the cause was lost, he escaped to New York in 1848, and became a proof-reader for the New York Tribune." Afterward he was literary editor of "The Citizen," and later for the "Democratic Review." He was editor of "The Review." In 1857 he removed to Washington, where he was chief writer for "The States," the organ of Stephen A. Douglas, of which paper he became the proprietor. He was active in organizing the Irish brigade and the Irish legion for the National army during the civil war, and served in the 69th New York regiment. The degree of L. L. D. was conferred on him by St. John's college, Fordham, N. Y., in 1875. Mr. Savage wrote several popular war-songs, including "The Starry Flag" and "The Muster of the North." He is the author of "Lays of the Fatherland" (New York, 1850); "'98 and '48; the Modern Revolutionary History and Literature of Ireland" (1856); "Our Living Representative Men" (Philad., 1861); "First and Last, or the Frontier" (New York, 1863); "Campaign Life of Andrew Johnson" (1864); "Life and Public Services of Andrew Johnson" (1866); "Fenian Heroes and Martyrs" (Boston, 1868); "Poems: Lyric, Dramatic, and Romantic" (1870); "Pictureque Ireland" (1878–85); and several plays, including "Sylvia" (Boston, 1868), which was produced in 1868 (1845); "Waiting for a Wife," a comedy (1859); and "Eva, a Goblin Romance" (1865).

SAVAGE, John Houston, lawyer, b. in McMinnville, Warren co., Tenn., 9 Oct., 1815. He received a public-school education, and before he was of age served as a private under Gen. Edmund P. Gaines on the Texas frontier, and also for six months against the Seminoles in Florida. Afterward he studied law, and began to practise in Smithville, Tenn. He was made colonel of Tennessee militia, and in 1841–7 was attorney-general of the 4th district of his state. In 1844 he was an elector on the Polk ticket. In 1847 he was appointed major of the 14th infantry, U. S. army, and served in the Mexican war, being wounded at Chapultepec, was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 11th infantry, and, after the death of Col. William M. Graham, commanded this regiment until the close of the war. On returning to Tennessee he resigned the practice of law, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1853, and again from 3 March, 1859, till 3 March, 1865, being a member of the committee on military affairs. During the civil war he was colonel of the 16th Tennessee Confederate infantry, and was wounded at Perryville and at Murfreesboro'. He served in the legislature of Tennessee in 1857, 1879, and 1887, and now (1898) practise law in McMinnville.

SAVAGE, Minot Judson, clergyman, b. in Norridgewock, Me., 10 June, 1841. He was educated at Bowdoin, graduated at Bangor theological seminary in 1864, and became a Congregational missionary in California. He was pastor of churches in Framingham, Mass., in 1867, and Hannibal, Mo., in 1869. In 1873 he had charge of a Unitarian society in St. Louis, and in 1877 became the pastor of the "Church of the Unity" in Boston. Among his publications are "Christianity, the Science of Manhood" (Boston, 1873); "The Religion of Evolution" (1876); "Bluffton, a Story of Today" (1878); "Life Questions" (1879); "The Morns of Evolution" (1880); "Belief in God" (1881); "Beliefs about Man" (1884); "Poems" (1882); "Reliefs about Man" (1885); "The Bible" (1887); "The Sphinx" (1883); "The Religious Life" (1886); "Social Problems" (1886); and "My Creed" (1887).

SAWTELLE, Charles Greene, soldier, b. in Norridgewock, Me., 10 May, 1834. His father, Cullen Sawtelle, was a member of Congress in 1845–7 and 1849–51. After graduation at the U. S. military academy in 1854, he served in quelling Kansas border disturbances, in the Utah expedition in 1858, and on garrison duty in California in 1859–60. On 17 May, 1861, he became captain of the staff and assistant quartermaster. He superintended the forwarding of troops and supplies for the Army of the Potomac until 17 Aug., 1862, and the embarkation during the Maryland campaing. He became chief quartermaster of the 2d corps in the Rappahannock campaign, and engaged on Gen. Stoneman's raid toward Richmond in May, 1863. From 21 June till 6 Aug., 1863, he was assistant chief quartermaster of the Army of the Potomac, and forwarded supplies from Washington and Alexandria, Va., for the Pennsylvania campaign. He was chief quartermaster of the cavalry for the West, till 15 Feb., 1864, and then transferred to Brownsville, Tex., and was in charge of the transports and supplies for Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's army on its return from Red river, which he met at Atchafalaya. He constructed a bridge of 900 feet across the river, using 21 steamers as pontoons. From 19 May till 6 June, 1864, he was in charge of steam transportation in the Department of the Gulf, and was chief quartermaster in the military division of west Mississippi, from 6 June, 1864, till 2 July, 1865. He received the brevets of major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865. In 1881 he attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and served in the quartermaster's departments of the Columbia and of the South.
and of the military divisions of the Atlantic and of the East. In 1894 he became colonel, in 1896 quartermaster-general, and was retired in 1898.

SAWTELLE, Henry Allen, clergyman, b. in Sidney, Me., 11 Dec., 1832; d. in Waterville, Me., 22 Nov., 1883. His early years were spent on a farm. He was graduated at Colby university in 1854, and at Newton theological institution in 1858, and was ordained in 1859. He was twice re-elected, and served in the state senate, of Maine, in 1859, 1860. He was elected to Congress in 1861, and served as a delegate to Constantinople. In 1862-4, he was assistant secretary of the navy, and in 1864, he was commissioned a rear admiral in the Navy. He was a brigadier-general in the regular army in 1865. He was the author of "The North American Review," "The New Englander," and "The New England Advocate." He was the founder of the "American Biblical Association." He died in Washington, D.C., 17 Apr., 1883.

SAWYER, Frederick Adolphus, senator, b. in Bolton, Mass., 12 Dec., 1822; d. in Sewance, Tenn., 31 July, 1891. After teaching for several winters he was graduated at Harvard in 1844, and continued to study law in Boston, Mass., South Carolina, and New Hampshire till 1850, when he took charge of the normal school in Charleston, S. C. He passed through the lines to the National forces in 1861, and, going to New England, made many speeches in advocacy of the re-election of President Lincoln. In February, 1863, he went to Charleston again and took an active part in the reconstruction of South Carolina. He was appointed, on 30 May, collector of internal revenue for the 2d district of South Carolina—the first civil appointment in the state after the war—was elected to the State constitutional convention, but was unable to take his seat, and afterward chosen to the U. S. sen. for the term that ended in 1873. In that body he served on the committees on private land-claims, education in the District of Columbia, pensions, and appropriations. Mr. Sawyer was one of the leaders in opposition to the re-election of Gov. Franklin J. Moses. On 10 March, 1873, he became assistant secretary of the treasury, which office he held till June, 1874. From that time till 1880 he was engaged in private business, being also connected with the bank. In 1880 he was appointed a special agent of the war department till 1887, and since that time he had conducted a preparatory school in Ithaca, N. Y.

SAWYER, Frederic William, author, b. in Saco, Me., 22 April, 1810; d. in Boston, Mass., 6 Sept., 1873. He removed to Boston in June, 1839, where he began to practise law in 1839, and established the Sawyer's bank. He has published "Merchant's and Shipmaster's Guide" (1840); "Plea for Amusements" (1847); and "Hits at American Whims," which had previously appeared in the Boston "Transcript," under the signatures of "Carl" and "Canty Carl" (1860).

SAWYER, Horace Bucklin, naval officer, b. in Burlington, Vt., 25 Feb., 1797; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 July, 1868. He was ship's boy for several years, and was ship's boy, 4 June, 1812, and became lieutenant, 1 April, 1818, commander, 9 Dec., 1839, and captain, 12 April, 1853. He served on the "Constitution" when she took the "Cyane" and "Levant" in 1815, and in the suppression of piracy in the West Indies and the Mediterranean, in the "Spark" and "Carvin." In 1844, he was a member for legislature of Vermont gave him a handsome sword for his services in the second war with Great Britain.

SAWYER, Leicester Ambrose, clergyman, b. in Pinckney, N. Y., 28 July, 1807; d. in Whitesboro', N. Y., 29 Dec., 1898. He was graduated at Hamilton, studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry. He was pastor of various churches in New York and Connecticut, and was president of Central college, Ohio, in 1842-7. From his entrance into the ministry he devoted himself to the study of the Bible in the original tongues, and finally, abandoning the common uses of the Bible, he became a Baptist. After ordination he left the Presbyterian church in 1854, and until 1859 was pastor of a Congregational church in Westmoreland, N. Y. Since 1860 he has resided at Whitesboro, N. Y., where he has engaged in literary work, and was for a time connected with the Utica "Morning Herald." He has published "Elements of Biblical Interpretation" (New Haven, 1836); "Moral Philosophy" (1839); "Moral Philosophy" (1845); "Critical Exposition of Baptism" (Columbus, Ohio, 1845); "Organic Christianity, or the Church of God" (1834); "Reconstruction of Biblical Theories, or Biblical Science Improved" (1862); and "Final Theory, Vol. I. Introduction to the New Testament, Historic, Theologic, and Critical" (Whitesboro, N. Y., 1873). He was graduated at the Hampden-Sydney College, and was named a member of the New Testament (Boston, 1891), and his "American Bible," with critical studies, was in course of publication in numbers (1860—88).—His cousin, Lorenzo, jurist, b. in Le Ray, N. Y., 33 May, 1820; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 7 Sept., 1891. He worked on his father's farm, and, after removing to Pennsylvania and then to Ohio, finished his studies at Western Reserve college. He then studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1846, and, after successive removals to Illinois and Wisconsin, went in 1850 to California, where he worked for some time in the mines. He settled in Sacramento in the practice of his profession, and, after a brief residence in Nevada, went, in 1853, to San Francisco, where he afterward removed. He became city attorney in 1854, was appointed judge of the district court of the state in 1863, and in 1863 was elected a justice of the state supreme court, of which he was chief justice in 1868-70. In the latter year he became U. S. circuit judge for the 9th circuit, embracing all the Pacific states. Judge Sawyer's decisions, both as a state and a Federal judge, have been highly commended. In 1865 he was made a judge of the U. S. Circuit Court, and gave him the degree of LL. D. He had delivered numerous public addresses, including one at the laying of the corner-stone of Leland Stanford, Junior, university, 14 May, 1887, of whose board of trustees he was chosen president.

SAWYER, Lennel, politician, b. in Camden county, N. C., in 1777; d. in Washington, D. C., 9 Jan., 1852. He was educated at Plattsburg academy, Long Island, N. Y., studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but, instead of practising, devoted himself to politics. He served in the legislature in 1800-1, having been chosen as a Democrat, was a presidential elector in 1804, and served in congress in 1807-13, 1817-23, and 1825-9. He was eccentric in his conduct, of dissipated habits, and negligent of his legatees at Plattsburg academy. He was elected repeatedly, often over powerful opponents. His prodigality and good-fellowship, though they made him many friends, brought him near to poverty in the closing years of his life. In 1850 he removed to Washington, where he was a clerk in one of the departments till his death. He published a "Life of John Randolph." (New York, 1844), and an "Autobiography" (1844), and was also the author of several plays.

SAWYER, Philetus, senator, b. in Whiting, Vt., 22 Sept., 1816. When he was a year old his father, who was a farmer and blacksmith, removed to Essex county, N. Y., where the son’s youth was spent in manual labor and in attending the common schools at intervals. At seventeen years of age, by an arrangement with his father, he became the master of his own time, and in 1847, when he had saved about $2,000, he removed to Wisconsin.

After two years of farming he went to Algonia (now part of Oshkosh) and engaged in the lumber business, in which he was very successful and won a reputation for integrity. He was chosen to the legislature in 1857 and 1861, served as mayor of Oshkosh in 1863–4, and was a delegate to the Locals’ convention of 1866. He was chosen to congress as a Republican in 1864, and served by successive re-elections from 1865 till 1875, during which time he was also a delegate to the National Republican conventions of 1864, 1876, and 1880. In the lower house of congress Mr. Sawyer served for some time as chairman of the committee on the Pacific railroad, and as a member of the committees on commerce and labor. He was nominated for governor there and in the senate he has been known as a valuable working member, but he seldom takes the floor.

He has given $12,000 toward a building for the Young men’s Christian association in Oshkosh, and contributed liberally to other religious, benevolent, and educational enterprises.

SAWYER, Sylvanus, inventor, b. in Templeton, Vt., Nov. 25, 1805. His father was a mill-owner and lumberman, and from childhood the son showed great mechanical ingenuity. While he was a lad he invented a reed-organ that embodied many of the features of those that are now in use. From about his twelfth till his twenty-first year feebile health unhindered him for farm labor, and he occupied himself in carpenter’s and smith’s trade. In 1829 he went to Augusta, Me., with a view of working with his brother-in-law, a gunsmith, and, though his health soon forced him to return, he gained knowledge that enabled him to repair fire-arms and do much similar work, in which he engaged till his majority. During this time he also made several inventions, including a plan for a locomotive to be worked by road-power.

In 1831 he went to Boston about 1843, and, while working in a machine-shop there, invented a machine for preparing chair-cane from rattan. Thousands of dollars had been spent in vain attempts to construct such a machine, but Mr. Sawyer’s was successful, and after it was patented, in June, 1851, he and his brother Joseph established a shop at East Templeton, Vt., where they manufactured chair-cane by its means. In the following December the American rattan company was formed to use their machine, and erected a large shop in Fitchburg, Mass. Mr. Sawyer devised several auxiliary machines, and, besides serving as director, was manager of the company’s shop. His inventions have largely reorganized the chair-cane business, transferring it from southern India, China, and Holland to this country. In the summer of 1853 he invented improvements in rifled cannon projectiles, which were patented in 1855. These embrace the placing of a coating of lead or other soft metal on the rear end of the shell, which is expanded laterally by the discharge and prevents the “windage” or passage of gas by the projectile, also filling the grooves of the rifling and obviating the use of helical projections; and the arrangement of a percussion-cap so as to insure the explosion of the shell on impact.

In 1857–8, with his brother Addison, Mr. Sawyer conducted experiments on his invention, at his own expense, for the benefit of the U. S. ordnance bureau, and after thorough tests it was approved, and the secretary of war announced that the practicability of rifled cannon and projectiles had at last been demonstrated. It was recommended that four field-guns be issued for practice, but before the order was carried into effect the civil war had begun. The 42-pounders (rifle) carpenters were mounted at Newport News and upon the Rip Raps (Port Wool), the latter being the only guns there that could reach Sewell’s Point battery, a distance of three and one-half miles, which they did with great accuracy, and made fearful havoc with the railroad-iron-clad batteries. An 18-pounder rifled gun also did great execution on board the steamer “Fancy.” Mr. Sawyer claimed that he was treated unjustly by the ordnance officers during the civil war. Notwithstanding the report in his favor, his guns were not extensively adopted, but his improvements were incorporated in others that, said, were infringements on his patents. He was advised by government officials to wait till the civil war was over, and he was engaged in the manufacture of ordnance of the army and navy; but they both died shortly after its close, and nothing had been done in the matter. But he received several orders for guns directly from department commanders, to whom he furnished the first batteries of cast-steel rifled guns made in this country. He made other improvements in projectiles in 1861–2, and in 1864–5 built a shop for the manufacture of ordnance; but the close of the wars in this country and South America caused it to be turned to other uses. He took out patents on dividers and calipers in 1867, a steam-generator in 1868, a sole sewing-machine in 1876, and a centering watchmaker’s lathe in 1882. He subsequently engaged in the manufacture of watchmakers’ tools, but soon retired from business, and took much interest in agriculture. He had served as an alderman in Fitchburg.

SAWYER, Thomas Jefferson, d. in Reading, Vt., 9 Jan., 1884; d. in Medford, Mass., 24 July, 1899. He was graduated at Middlebury, was pastor of a Universalist church in New York city, where he also edited the “Christian Messenger.” In the year 1834 he began to be engaged in the liberal institute, Oneida county, where he also taught theology. In 1852 he returned to his charge in New York, but in 1861 he retired to a farm at Clinton, where he lived in retirement, declining the presidencies of St. Lawrence university, Canton, N. Y., Lombard university, Il., and Tufts college, Mass., which he had been instrumental in founding in 1862. He was also active in establishing the theological school of the university in 1856. In 1863–5 he edited the “Christian Ambassador,” and then resided on a farm in New Jersey till 1869, when he became professor of theology in Tufts. Prof. Sawyer had defended the doctrines of Universalism in the press, and in public discussions and in several discourses. Harvard gave him the degree of D.D. in 1859, and he is a member of the Theological historical society of Leipsic. Besides contributions to denominational literature, he has published in bookform “Letters to Rev. Stephen Remington in Review of his Lectures on Universalism” (New York, 1839); “Reviews of Rev. E. F. Halfield’s Universalism as it Is” (1839); “Emancipation,” and other discourses (1845); “Memoirs of Rev. Stephen R. Smith” (Boston, 1862); discussions with Rev. Isaac Westcott on “The Doctrine of Emancipation” (New York, 1853) and “The Doctrine of Universal Salvation” (1854); “Who is Our God, the Son or the Father?" opposing the views of Henry Ward Beecher (1859); and "Endless Punishment in the Very Words of its Advocate." (Boston, 1880).—His wife, Caroline Melchetel, b. in Newton, Mass., 8 Dec., 1812; d. at Cottage Hill, Mass., 19 May, 1894, was educated principally at home, and began to write at an early age, but published nothing till her marriage to Dr. Sawyer in September, 1831, when she removed with him to New York, and began to contribute in prose and verse to the magazines. She edited the "Ladies' Repository," a Universalist monthly, from 1861 till 1864, and published the "Juvenile Library" (4 vols., New York, 1845); "The Poetry of Hebrew Tradition" (Hartford, 1847); the "Poems" of Mrs. Julia H. Scott, with a memoir (Boston, 1854); "Friedel," from the German of Van Horn (Philadelphia, 1856); and "The Rose of Sharon," an annual (8 vols., 1856-68).

SAXE, John Godfrey, poet, b. in Highgate, Vt., 2 June, 1816; d. in Albany, N.Y., 31 March, 1887. He entered Wesleyan university in 1833, but left in his freshman year, and was graduated at Middlebury in 1839. During the four years following he studied law in Southbridge, Mass., and began the practice of law in New York. He was admitted to the bar in 1843, and from 1847-8 he was superintendent of common schools. His fondness for literature gradually led him into journalism, and in 1850 he purchased the "Burlington Sentinel," which he edited until 1856.

Mr. Saxton served as attorney-general of Vermont in 1836, and for a time was deputy collector of customs. In 1859, and again in 1869, he was the unsuccessful Democratic nominee for governor. Settling in New York, he devoted himself to the study of art and literature until 1872, when he moved to Albany, and became an editor of the "Evening Journal." In 1866 Middlebury gave him the degree of LL.D. Mr. Saxton achieved his greatest reputation by his poetry. As a young lawyer he sent his earliest verses to the "Kuiekerboeker," and in after years he contributed to "Harper's Magazine" and the "Atlantic Monthly." "The Rail, the Briefless Barrister," "The Proud Miss McBride," and similar humorous poems, as well as his more serious "Jerry, the Miller," "I'm growing Old," "The Old Church-Bell," and "Treasures in Heaven," were very popular. His published works include "Progress: a Satirical Poem" (New York, 1846); "Humorous and Satirical Poems" (Boston, 1850); "A Money King in all the Realms of Earth" (1859); "The Flying Dutchman, or the Wrath of Herr Von Stoppelhouse" (New York, 1863); "Clever Stories of Many Nations rendered in Rhyme" (Boston, 1865); "The Times, the Telegraph, and other Poems" (London, 1865); "The Masquerade, and other Poems" (Boston, 1866); "Fables and Legends of Many Countries" (1872); and "Leisured-Days Rhymes" (1875). There have also been numerous collections of his poems.

SAXE-WEIMAR-EISENACH, Carl Bernhard, Duke of, b. in Weimar in 1792; d. in Holland, 31 July, 1862. He entered the service of the king of the Netherlands, took part in the principal campaigns of 1806-15 against the French, and became lieutenant-general in 1831. In 1825 he obtained leave of absence, and sailed for this country in the royal sloop-of-war "Pallas." He visited all the principal cities of the United States and Canada, and on his return published "The North America, 1825-26" (Philadelphia, 1828). In this work he shows himself to be an excellent and intelligent observer.

SAXTON, Joseph, mechanician, b. in Huntingdon, Pa., 22 March, 1799; d. in Washington, D. C., 26 Oct., 1873. He received a limited education, and was apprenticed to a watchmaker, after which he constructed a printing-press, and published a small newspaper at irregular intervals. In 1817 he went to Philadelphia, where he worked at his trade, and invented a machine for cutting the teeth of wheels, the outlines of which were true epicycloidal curves. Meanwhile he learned to draw with facility, and devoted some time to the study of engraving. He then became associated with Isaiah Lapham, a celebrated engraver, and constructed an astronomical clock with compensating pendulum and an escapement on a new plan devised by himself. The town clock in the belfry of Independence hall was also made by him about this time. In his ambition to obtain knowledge he became a member of the Franklin institute, and acquired reputation among its members for his ingenuity. In 1828 he visited England, and, being attracted to the Adelaide gallery of practical science in London, he constructed many ingenious mechanical toys for that institution. He also made numerous original investigations, met many celebrated engineers and mechanicians, and was introduced by Michael Faraday to the meetings of the Royal institution. In 1833 he exhibited before the British association for the advancement of science a magneto-electric machine, with which he showed a brilliant electric spark, decomposed water, exhibited the electric light between charcoal points, and gave a rapid series of intense shocks. During his residence in England he also invented the locomotive differential pulley, an apparatus for measuring the velocity of vessels, and a fountain-pen, and perfected the read-out-of-machine, an apparatus for tracing lines on maps to an infinitesimal distance from each other that shall represent by an engraving the design on the face of the medal. He was tendered the office of director of the printing machinery of the Bank of England, but declined this place in order to accept, in 1857, that of constructor and curator of the standard weights and measures of the U. S. mint in Philadelphi a. During his connection with the mint he constructed the large standard balances that are used in the annual inspection of the assays and the verification of standard weights. In 1843 he was given charge of the construction of the standard balances, weights, and measures to be presented to each of the states for insuring uniformity of measurement and weight of its coinage of which the mint was the chief of the U.S. coast. He invented an automatic instrument for recording the height of the tides, and applied the reflecting pyrometer that had been previously invented to the construction of measuring rods that would retain their length while subjected to different temperatures. A deep-sea thermometer and an immersed hydrometer were among his later inventions. Mr. Saxton received from the Franklin institute in 1864 a medal for his reflected permeter, and in 1851 was awarded a gold medal at the World's fair in London for a large balance of extreme precision. In 1857 he was elected a member of the American philosophical society, and in 1863 became a charter member of the National academy of sciences. A sketch of his life was contributed by Joseph Henry to the first volume of the "Biographical Memoirs" of the latter body (Washington, 1877).

SAXTON, Luther Calvin, impostor, b. in Massa-vichusetts in 1806; d. after 1869. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1825. In 1830 he published the "Fall of Columbia" (New York). He went to Rochester, N.Y., about 1869, and there interested Aristarchus Champion, an aged, wealthy, and somewhat eccentric man, in three schemes—the Union book company, with a capital of $5,000,000; an International book, with a capital of many millions; and a vast manufacturing corporation. Only the book company was put into operation. Half the stock was to be in books, manuscripts, and copyrights, and of these Saxton professed to have a great supply. Champion furnished capital in the form of notes and mortgages to the amount of $31,475. Saxton established a magazine and visited Europe as the general agent of the company; but after a time Champion grew suspicious, and had him arrested and indicted for false charges. Saxton was brought to trial, 8 Dec., 1863, convicted, sentented to Auburn prison, 31 Dec., for three years, and served out his full term.

SAXTON, Rufus, soldier, b. in Greenfield,
Mass., 19 Oct., 1824. He attended Deerfield academy, worked on a farm until his twentieth year, and afterward entering the U. S. military academy, was graduated in 1846. He served the armies of the United States as 1st lieutenant in 1855, and in 1855-6 led a surveying party across the Rocky mountains. In 1855-9 he was employed in the cost survey, and made improvements in the instruments for deep-sea soundings, one of which, a self-registering thermometer, bears his name.
In 1859 he became an instructor at the U. S. military academy, and at the opening of the civil war was at St. Louis acting as quartermaster with the rank of captain, and was engaged in break-ning up Camp Jackson. (See Lyon, Nathaniel.)
He joined Gen. George B. McClellan in western Viringia, afterward accompanied Gen. Thomas W.
Sherman to Port Royal as quartermaster, and on 13 April, 1862, was made brigadier-general of volunteers. For a short time after the retreat of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks from the Shenandoah, Gen. Saxton commanded at Harper's Ferry, and successfully resisted an attack on his position by Confederate troops under Gen. Ewell. He was military governor of the Department of the South in 1862-5, and was appointed quartermaster with the rank of major in July, 1866. He was brevetted
brigadier, 13 March, 1865, for faithful and meritorious services during the war; and promoted lieutenant-colonel and deputy quarter-master-general, 6 June, 1872, and colonel and assistant quartermaster-general, 10 March, 1882.
From 1883 till 1888 he was in charge of the Jeffersouville department at Louisville, Ky.

SAY, Thomas Say, merchant, b. in Phila-adelphia, Pa., 16 Dec., 1799; d. there in 1829. His father, William Say, was an early Quaker colonist. The son was educated in the Friends' school, and learned the saddler's trade, but afterward became an apothecary. When a young man he supposed that he visited heaven in a trance. William Mentz published "The Visions of a Certain Thomas Say, of the City of Philadelphia, which he saw in a Trance" (Philadelphia, 1747, on the appearance of which Say printed in the "Pennsylvania Journal" of 2 March, 1747, the following notice: "Whereas a certain William Mentz has printed for sale, without my knowledge or consent, 'The Vision of Thomas Say,' which is but an incorrect and imperfect part of what I propose to make public. And as I never intended what I had wrote on that head to be published during my life, all persons are desired not to encourage the said Mentz in such wrong proceeding." After his death his son, Dr.
Benjamin Say, published an account of the vision in "A Short Compendium of the Extraordinary Life and Writings of Thomas Say, copied from his Manuscript" (Philadelphia, 1796). He was a man noted benevolence, a zealous promoter of education, and for many years was the treasurer of the Society for the instruction of blacks. He helped to found the Pennsylvania hospital, and was one of the founders of the House of employment.—His son, Benjamin, physician, b. in Philadelphia in 1766;
d. there, 23 April, 1818, was educated in Quaker schools, and in 1780 received the degree of M. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He sympathized with the colonies during the Revolution, and in 1781 he was among those known as the "fighting Quakers," who initiated the formation of the Union society in Pennsylvania, entitled
"The Monthly Meeting of Friends, called by some Free Quakers, dis-Tunguizing us from the brethren who have disowned us." Dr. Say was well known in his profession, and in 1787 was a founder of the College of physicians of Philadelphia, whose treasurer he was from 1791 till 1809. He was a contributor to the Pennsylvania hospital, a founder of the Pennsylvania university in 1790, and for many years the president of the Humane society. From 1808 till 1811 he served in congress. He published "Spasmodic Affections of the Eye" (Philadelphia, 1792), and the work mentioned above (1796).—Benjamin's son, Thomas, naturalist, b. in Philapelphia, Pa., 27 July, 1787; d. in New Harmony, Ind., 10 Oct., 1834, abandoned the practice of his pursuits and devoted himself to the study of natural history. In 1812 he was a founder of the Academy of natural sciences at Philadelphia, and he became a chief contributor to its journal.
In 1818 Mr. Say took part in a scientific exploration of the islands and coasts of Georgia, visiting eastern U. S. for the same purpose, but progress of the party to the interior was stopped by hostile Indians. In 1819-20 he accompanied the expedition under Maj. Stephen H. Long to the Rocky Mountains as chief geologist, and in 1823 took part in that to the sources of St. Peter's river.
He removed to the New Harmony settlement with Robert Owen in 1825, and after their separation remained there as agent of the property. His principal work is "American Entomology" (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1824-38). His "American Conchology," seven numbers of which were published at New Harmony, was incomplete at the time of his death. His discoveries of new species of insects were supposed to have been greater than had ever been made by a single individual before. He was a frequent contributor to the "Transactions" of the American philosophical society, the New York Lyceum, "American Journal of Science," and many other publications. His complete writings on the entomology of the United States were edited by William Statistics, and published. He was one of the editors of Dr. John L. Le Conte, with a memoir by George Ord (New York, 1859).

SAVLER, Milton, congressman, b. in Lewisburg, Ohio, 4 Nov., 1831; d. 18 Nov., 1892. He was graduated at Miami university in 1852, and afterward at Cincinnati law-school, and practised law at Cincinnati. He was a member of the legislature of Ohio in 1852-3, was elected to congress, and served by successive elections from Dec., 1873, till 1880. He was chosen speaker of the house of representatives pro tempore, 24 June, 1876.

SAVLES, John, author, b. in Vernon, N. Y., 9 March, 1825; d. 22 May, 1897. His ancestor came to this country in the ship with Roger Williams, whose daughter he married. John was educated in the town school at Holland, and in 1844 removed to Georgia. He taught there and in Texas, and, having studied law in the mean time, was admitted to the bar of Texas in 1846. He practised successfully at Bremen, and was a member of the legislature in 1853-5. When the civil war began he was made brigadier-general of Texas militia, and he was subsequently on the staff of Gen. John B. Magruder. He was appointed special judge of the supreme court of Texas in 1851, and in 1880 became one of the law faculty of Baylor university. He published "A Treatise on the Practice in the District and Supreme Courts of Texas" (1858); "A Treatise on the Civil Jurisdiction of the Peace in the State of Texas" (1862); "A Treatise on the Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions in the Courts of Texas" (1872); "The Probate Laws of Texas" (1872); "Laws of Business and Form-Book" (1872); "Constitution of Texas, with Notes" (1872); "Notes on Texan Reports" (1873); "The Masonic Jurisprudence of Texas, with Forms for the Use of Lodges and the Grand Lodge" (1875); and "Revised Civil Statutes and Laws passed by the Legislature of Texas, with Notes." (1876).

SAVRE, David Austen, philanthropist, b. in Bottle Hill, N. J., 12 March, 1793; d. in Lexington, Ky., 11 Sept., 1870. He removed in early life to Lexington, where he became a successful merchant and banker. Though repeatedly meeting with heavy losses, he gave about $80,000 to benevolent objects during his life-time, including $100,000 to found the Savre Institute. — His nephew, Lewis Albert, surgeon, b. in Bottle Hill (now Madison), N. J., 29 Feb., 1820, was graduated at Transylvania university Ky., in 1833, and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1842. The office of provost to Dr. Willard Parker, professor of surgery in that institution, was at once given to him, and he held it until 1832. He was appointed in 1833 surgeon to Bellevue hospital, and in 1839 surgeon to the Charity hospital on Blackwell's island, both of which posts he continued to hold until 1873, when he became consulting surgeon. Dr. Savre advocated clinical practice in medical colleges, and was in 1861 among the first to suggest the establishment of Bellevue hospital medical college. On the formation of the faculty, he became professor of ophthalmic surgery, and fractures and luxations, and later of clinical surgery, which chair he still (1888) holds. In 1844 he was appointed hospital surgeon of the 1st division of the New York state militia, but he resigned in 1866. Since 1870 he has been consulting surgeon to the Home for incurables in Westchester county, N. Y. From 1860 till 1866 he was resident physician of the city of New York, during which time he presented many papers to the board of health. Among these was one showing that cholera is a portable disease, if not a contagious one. He was one of the representatives of the United States at the international medical congress in Philadelphia, and in 1877 he was sent by the same body as a delegate to the British medical association. On this occasion he was invited to give demonstrations of his mode of treatment of hip-joint and spinal diseases in the University college hospital, Guy's, St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas's, and the Royal orthopedic hospital in London, also in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Cork. In 1879 he went as a delegate to the 6th International medical congress in Amsterdam, and before that body gave demonstrations of his plan of treatment for Pott's disease and lateral curvature of the spine. He attended the international medical congresses in London in 1881, Copenhagen in 1884, and in Washington in 1887, at each of which he read papers descriptive of his recent improvements in the treatment of the diseases of which he makes a specialty. Dr. Savre's inventions include many surgical appliances, among which are a urotyloscope, splints for extension of the hip-, knee-, and ankle-joints in chronic disease, a flexible probe, improved tracheotomy-tube, bistoury probang for removing foreign bodies from the oesophagus, scrotal clamp, club-foot shoe, new method for treating fractured clavicle, and the use of plaster of Paris in the treatment of spinal diseases and curvature. In 1872 he was made a knight of the order of Wasa by Charles XIV., king of Sweden and Norway, for his services to medical science. He is a member of numerous medical societies at home and abroad, and was one of the original members of the American medical association, of which he was vice-president in 1866, and president in 1886. His bibliography is exceedingly large, consisting chiefly of contributions to professional journals, and includes the books "Practical Manual of Ophthalmia Contagiosa" (New York, 1869); "Lectures on Orthopedic Surgery and Diseases of the Joints" (1876), of which several editions have been issued and which have been re-published in Germany and France; and "Spinal Curvature and its Treatment" (London, 1877).

SAVRE, Stephen, patriot, b. on Long Island, N. Y., in 1734; d. in Virginia, 27 Sept., 1818. He was graduated at Princeton in 1757, engaged early in business, and became a successful merchant and banker in London. He was sheriff of that city in 1774, and possessed the confidence of the Earl of Chatham at a critical period. He ardently favored the cause of the independence of the American colonies, and suffered for his devotion to his country. An officer of the royal guards, named Richardson, was seized by Mr. Sayre, and charged with hoisting of high treason against him for the use of a light and unguarded expression referring to the king's death. Mr. Sayre was committed to the tower, and, though released soon afterward, his banking-house failed, and, having lost everything, he was forced to leave England. He was afterward employed by Benjamin Franklin on some important missions, was his private secretary, and visited France, and went with Arthur Lee to Berlin at the time of the first suggestion of the scheme of armed neutrality. After leaving Berlin, Mr. Sayre went to Copenhagen, Stockholm, and St. Petersburg, and in each of those cities received ample supplies to support the cause of the independence of the United States. In 1793 he was an active opponent of Washington's administration.

Sayres, Edward Smith, consul b. in Marcus Hook, Pa., 6 Oct. 1769; d. in Philadelphia, 29 March, 1841. His father, Caleb Smith Sayres, was a distinguished physician, who is mentioned by Dr. Benjamin Rush as being particularly skilful in the treatment of yellow fever during the epidemic of 1798. The son was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He was appointed vice-consul of Brazil in 1841, of Portugal in 1839, of Sweden and Norway in 1831, and in 1840 and 1842, respectively, also for Brazil. In 1872 he succeeded consul Franklin for long and faithful services to the empire. He was at the time of his death dean of the consular corps at Philadelphia, and probably the oldest foreign consul in point of service in the United States.

Scadding, Henry, Canadian author, b. in Dunkeswell, Devonshire, England, 29 July, 1813. He was the eldest son of his father, Caleb Smith Sayres, who lived near York (now Toronto). He was educated at Upper Canada college, Toronto, and at St. John's college, Cambridge, England, where he was graduated in 1837. In 1838 he was appointed to a classical tutorship in Upper Canada college, and in the same year he was ordained a priest of the Church of England in Canada. In 1847 he became rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity in Toronto, which post he resigned in 1857. He was also a canon of St. James's cathedral, Toronto. He has been president of the Canadian institute, Toronto, was awarded the confederation medal in 1867, in appreciation of his useful public labors as a man of letters, was president of the Pioneer association of Toronto, and received the degree of D.D. from Cambridge university in 1852. He edited the "Canadian Journal of Science, Literature, and History" in 1869-78, and published "Memorial of the Rev. William Honywood Ripley" (Toronto, 1849); "Shakespeare the Seer—the Interpreter" (1864); "Truth's Resurrection" (1865); "Christian Pantheism" (1865); "Toronto of Old" (1873); "The Federalist" (1869); "A History of the Old French Fort at Toronto" (1887); brief memoirs of John Strachan, first bishop of Toronto (1869), and Henry Dundas and Sir George Yonge (1878); and numerous pamphlets and articles on the archeology and history of Upper Canada, and other subjects. In his writings Dr. Scadding has principally aspired to the reputation of a local historian and antiquary, and as such has done much valuable work.

Scammell, Alexander, soldier, b. in Mendon (now Milford), Mass., probably in 1746; d. in Williamsville, Va., 6 Oct., 1781. He was graduated at Harvard in 1769, and taught in Kingston and Plymouth, Mass. In 1771 he went to Portsmouth, N. H., and in the following year he was employed by the government in exploring and surveying land and timber for the royal navy, and in assisting to make surveys for the forts. In 1780 he served on board a sloop-of-war to transmit despatches, plans, and reports to the plantation office in Great Britain. Later he studied law with John Sullivan in Durham, N. H., until 1775. On 14 Dec., 1774, he was of the force under John Sullivan, John Langdon, and others that captured William and Mary fort, Newcastle, and secured its arms and 96 barrels of powder, one of the first overt acts of the Revolution, which was declared treason by the royal governor. While Sullivan was a member of the Continental congress Scammell had charge of his legal affairs, which detained him from joining the army at Cambridge. When his preceptor was appointed major-general in the Revolutionary army, Scammell was made a brigade-major. On 10 Dec., 1776, he was appointed adjutant-general of the American army, and consequently became a member of Gen. Washington's regiment, and he was transferred later to the 1st regiment. In 1777 his regiment was ordered to the northern army under Gen. Horatio Gates. In that campaign he was notably active, and was wounded at Saratoga, 5 Jan., 1778. He was appointed adjutant-general of the American army, and consequently became a member of Gen. Washington's military family. Preferring active command and the post of danger, in March, 1781, he was given command of a chosen regiment of light infantry, and on 30 Sept., at the siege of Yorktown, as officer of the day, while reconnoitering the enemy's position, he was captured by Hessian dragoons, and wounded after his surrender. On request of Gen. Washington, Cornwallis permitted him to be taken to Williamsburg, where he died.

SCAMMON, Jonathan Young, lawyer, b. in Whitefield, Me., 27 July, 1812; d. in Chicago, Ill., 11 March, 1890. He studied at Waterville, from which he received the degree of LL.D. in 1839, studied law in Hallowell, Me., and became a stockholder in the bank to the bar, and removed in 1835 to Chicago, where he began the practice of his profession. He prepared a new edition of the laws of Illinois ("Gale's Statutes"), was appointed reporter of the supreme court, and published "Scammon's Reports" (4 vols., 1852-74). He associated the latter with McCagg and Full in 1847, and subsequently Samuel W. Fuller, in the firm of Scammon, McCagg, and Fuller. He took an important part in pioneer enterprises, was one of the main organizers and directors of the first rail-road west of Lake Michigan, the Galena and Chicago (now Northwestern), laid the foundation of the first successful public-school system in Chicago, and actively identified himself with many societies. He was one of the founders of the Chicago astronomical society and its first president, and built and maintained at his own expense for many years Dearborn observatory, in which was placed the first grand refractor that was manufactured by Alvan Clark and Sons, of Cambridge, Mass. The observatory cost $30,000. He acquired wealth, most of which was lost in the great fire of 1871 and the panic of 1873, and he was at the head of several large and successful financial institutions. Mr. Scammon was a Whig and a Republican in politics. He was one of several gentlemen that established the "Chicago American" in 1844 to aid in the election of Henry Clay, in 1845, he was a member of the Chicago "Tribune" favored the election of Horace Greeley, he established the "Inter-Ocean" as a Republican paper. He was a Swedishborn, was the first of that belief in Chicago, instituted the Chicago society of the New Jerusalem and the Illinois association of that church, and was for ten years vice-president of the general convention of his denomination in the United States. He was the first layman to introduce the homoeopathic system of medicine in Chicago, and founded the Hahnemann hospital, of which and the Hahnemann medical college he continued many years a trustee. Many acts of the legislature originated with him, especially these reforming the circulating medium and driving out of circulation the depreciated currency that inundated the city; he was the northwest. He had been officially connected with the city, county, and state government, and a member of the legislature, and of the Republican national conventions of 1864 and 1872. Mr. Scammon contributed largely to the periodical press.—His brother, Eliakim Parker, soldier, b. in Whitefield, Me., 27 Dec., 1815; d. in New York city, 7 Dec., 1894. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837. In January, 1838, he was appointed 2d lieutenant of topographical engineers, and he was assistant professor of mathematics at West Point from 1837 till 1838, and of ethics from 1841 till 1846. He was aide-de-camp to Gen. Winfield Scott in Mexico in 1846-7, engaged on the survey of the northern lakes in 1847-54, in 1853 became captain. In 1856 he was dismissed for "disobedience of orders." He was then professor in Mount St. Mary's college, Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1858 he became president of the polytechnic college in that city from 1859-61. He became colonel of the 23d Ohio regiment in June, 1861, served in western Virginia and Maryland, and was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers, 15 Oct., 1862, for gallant conduct at the battle of South Mountain, Md. He commanded the district of Kanawha from November, 1862, till 3 Feb., 1864, was a prisoner of war from the latter date till 3 Aug., and then led a separate brigade at Morris island. S. C. From November, 1864, till April, 1865, he was in charge of the district of Florida. He was U. S. consul in Prince Edward island from 1866 till 1870, and afterward professor of mathematics and history, in Seton Hall college, Orange, N. J.—Another brother, Charles Mell, b. 1816, was for one time a reporter in Chicago, and became a ship-captain and sailed to California in 1850. He engaged in the whale-fishery and discovered the habitat of the gray whale in a bay on the coast of California, which was named Scammon lagoon. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861 he became commander of a U. S. revenue cutter in San Francisco, and he was subsequently appointed captain in that branch of the service in which he still remains. He is the author of work on "The Marine Mammals of the Northwestern Coast of America and the American Whale Fishery" (San Francisco, 1874).

SCANLAN, Lawrence, R. C. bishop, b. in Ballintarsna, County Tipperary, Ireland, 28 Sept., 1843. He studied classics in Thurles in 1860, and in 1863 entered the mission college of All Hallows, Dublin, to prepare for the priesthood. He was ordained priest in 1868, and immediately embarked for the United States, where he was appointed assistant pastor of St. Patrick's church, San Francisco. In 1871 he was sent to Pioche, Nevada, which had become suddenly a place of great importance, owing to the discovery of mines. He built a church, school, and the first institution of Protestant faith, and while bringing about a marked change in the lives of the miners, when, in 1873, he was transferred to Salt Lake City. A few years afterward he was appointed vicar forane of the territory of Utah. In this post he gave proof of financial ability as well as missionary zeal. After liquidating a heavy debt on the church in Salt Lake, he secured a site for an academy in 1876. To collect funds for this purpose he travelled on horseback night and day through every part of the territory, and before the end of the year he succeeded in erecting the finest building of the kind in Utah. He afterward built five churches, five schools, and two hospitals. In 1881 he erected a fine hospital in Salt Lake City. In 1886 he founded the College of All Hallows, an academy in 1876. To collect funds for these buildings, all of which were built by the contributions of the Roman Catholics of Utah without aid from any other quarter. He was made bishop in 1887, and transferred in 1891 to Salt Lake.
at Middleton, Cork, he entered the Foreign missionary college of All Hallows, Dublin, where he studied theology, and affiliated himself to the diocese of Nashville. He was ordained a priest early in 1871, and embarked immediately afterward for the United States. He was appointed assistant at the cathedral of Nashville after his arrival, then pastor of St. Columba's church, East Nashville, and after a few years rector of the cathedral. He governed the diocese as administrator, during a vacancy in the see, from November, 1880, till June, 1883. In 1885 he organized the congregation of St. Joseph's, in West Nashville, and on the creation of the diocese of Nashville, was elected bishop. He was transferred in 1891 to Omaha.

SCARBOROUGH, John, P. E. bishop, b. in Castlereagh, in the north of Ireland, 25 April, 1831. On his father's death in 1840 he came to the United States, and obtained his early education and training in Lansingburg, N. Y. He was graduated at Trinity in 1854, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in 1857, and was ordained deacon in Trinity church, New York, 28 June, 1857, by Bishop Horatio Potter, and priest in St. Paul's church, Troy, N. Y., 14 Aug., 1858, by the same bishop. His first post was as assistant in St. Paul's church, Troy, in 1857-60. He was rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1860-7, and then became rector of Trinity church, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1878, to which post he held until 1875. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Trinity in 1872, and served as deputy to the general convention in 1871 and 1874. Having been elected bishop of New Jersey, he was consecrated in St. Mary's church, Birmingham, N. J., 2 Feb., 1875. Bishop Scarborough has published a few occasional sermons, and several addresses and addresses.

SCARBOROUGH, William Saunders, educator, b. in Macon, Ga., 16 Feb., 1852. He is of African descent. He was graduated at Oberlin in 1875, and taught in the Lewis high-school at Macon, but in 1876 returned to Oberlin and entered the theological department for the purpose of studying Hebrew and Hellenistic Greek. He declined an offer from the American association to enter into service in Africa, and in 1877 was called to fill the chair of ancient languages in Willerforce university, near Xenia, Ohio. He is a member of the American philological society, the Modern language association, and similar societies. Liberia college, Africa, gave him the degree of L.L. D. in 1882. His publications include "First Lessons in Greek" (New York, 1881), and "Theory and Functions of the Thematic Vowel in the Greek Verb."
Ohio, in 1843-5, at Red Hook, N. Y., in 1845-51, and at Easton, Pa., in 1851-7. From the last year till 1864 he was professor of the German language and literature in Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, and then till his death he was professor of systematic theology of the newly established theological seminary at Philadelphia, and its president. He was a representative of the strictly conservative and confessional party in the Lutheran church, defending his position with great force in many publications, and was a leader in the organization of the general council in 1857. He published a large number of historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles, and left several manuscripts of value, including a complete "System of Lutheran Theology." Among his works are "Manual of Sacred History," translated from the German (Philadelphia, 1855); "Luther's Small Catechism," a revised translation (1859); "Inaugural Address at Gettysburg" (New York, 1860); and "Arndt's True Christianity," translated from the German (1849). His grandson, Charles William, theologian, b. in Hagerstown, Md., May 5, 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 March, 1896. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1832, and at Gettysburg theological seminary in 1835, licensed to preach in 1835, and ordained in 1836. Immediately afterward he took charge of a parish in Montgomery county, which he served until 1841. He was pastor at Harrisburg, Pa., in 1841-9, and at Gettysburg, Pa., in 1849-73, when he was re-tired as pastor emeritus. In 1864, when the theological seminary was established in Philadelphia, he was elected professor of ecclesiastical history, which post he had since held. He held high office in the councils of his church, and had been one of the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania since 1859, receiving from it the degree of D. D. in 1879. That of L. L. D. was given him in 1887 by Thiel college, Greenville, Pa. Dr. Schaff had long been leader of the conservative and confessional party in the Lutheran church. He took an active part in the establishment of the theological seminary at Philadelphia in 1864, and in the organization of the general council in 1867. He was especially versed in American Lutheran history and the historical and doctrinal development of the Lutheran church in this country, and had written numerous articles for church papers and theological reviews. He was for several years co-editor of the "Lutheran Home Journal" in Philadelphi, and the "Philadelphia, Lutheran and Missionary." Since 1879 he had been editor-in-chief of "The Foreign Missionary" in Philadelphia, and since 1886 he had been one of the editors of the "Lutheran Church Review." He published "Martin's Explained Catechism," translated from the German (Philadelphia, 1857); "Early History of the Lutheran Church in America" (1857); "Golden Treasury for the Children of God," translated from the German (1890); "Family Prayer, for Morning and Evening, and the Festivals of the Church Year"; the "Halle Reports," translated from the German (Reading, 1889); and a "Church Book" (1891).

SCHAEFFER, Philip, clergyman, b. in Coire, Switzerland, 1 Jan., 1819; d. in New York, 20 Oct., 1893. He was educated at Coire, Stuttgart gymnasium, and the universities of Tübingen, Halle, and Berlin. At Berlin, in 1841, he took the degree of B. D., and passed examinations for a professorship. He then travelled as tutor to a nobleman, and, on returning to Berlin, took the university on exegesis and church history in 1842-4. On the recommendation of several eminent theologians he was called to a professorship in the theological seminary of the German Reformed church of the United States at Mercersburg, Pa. He was ordained at Elberfeld, came to this country in 1844, and in 1845 was tried for heresy, but acquitted. In 1854 he visited Europe, representing the American German churches at the ecclesiastical diet at Frankfort, and at the Swiss pastoral conference at Basel, lectured in Germany on America, and received the degree of D. D. from Berlin. His connection with Mercersburg was retained from 1844 till 1863, when he removed to New York. He was secretary of the New York Sabbath committee until 1871, and during the period delivered courses of lectures on church his-general conference of the alliance, which, after two postponements on account of the Franco-German war, was held in New York in October, 1873. Dr. Schaff was also, in 1871, one of the alliance delegates to the emperor of Russia to plead for the religious liberty of his subjects in the Baltic provinces. He was president of the American Bible revision committee, which was organized in 1871 at the request of the English committee, and to which he was sent to England to negotiate and arrange terms with the British revisers and the university presses with regard to cooperation and publication of the Anglo-American revision. That same year, in August, he attended a conference of the Old Catholics, Greeks, and Protestants at Bonn, with a view to promote Christian unity among the churches there represented. Dr. Schaff was first president of the newly (1888) organized American society of church history, with its officers representing all the leading branches of the Protestant church; and, in addition to the cultivation of that particular branch of literature to which it is specially devoted, the society aims at uniting Christian thought and sentiment throughout the world. Dr. Schaff's works are mostly historical and exegetical; some of them are written in German, and others in English, but the German ones have been translated. Among the most important are his "History of the Apostolical Church" (New York, 1853); "Sketch of the Political, Social, and Religious Character of the United States" (1855); "Germany, its Universities and Religion" (1857); "History of the Christian Church" (6 vols., 1858-88); "German Hymn-Book, with Introduction and Notes" (1859; ed. with music, 1874); "The Christ of the Gospels" (1864); "The Person of Christ, with Replies to Strauss and Renan" (1865); "Lectures on the Civil War and the Overthrow of Slavery in America" (1867); "Christ in Song" (1869); "Revision of the English Version of the New Testament" (1784); "The Vatican Council" (1785); "History and Collection of the Creeds of Christendom" (3 vols., 1876); "Harmony of the Reformed Confessions" (1877); "Through Bible Lands" (1878); "Dictionary of the Bible" (1880); "Library of Religious Poetry," edited in cooperation with Arthur Gilman; ""Gospel"" (1888). He edited the Greek Testament and the English Version (1883; 3d revised ed., 1888); "Historical Account of the Work of the American Committee of Revision of the English Version" (1885); "Christ and Christianity" (1885); and "Church and State in the United States, or the American Idea of Religious Liberty and its Practical Effects, with Official Documents" (New York, 1889). He edited the Anglo-American adaptation of Lange's "Critical, Theological, and Homiletical Commentary on the Bible" (beginning in 1864, 24 vols., New York and Edinburgh), and the "International Revision Commentary on the New Testament" (beginning in 1891). Dr. Schaff founded and edited the "Kirchenfreund," the first German monthly in this country, and with Prof. Henry B. Smith, edited the "Philosophical and Theological Library," a series of volumes begun in 1873 (New York and London). He contributed articles to American and foreign reviews, and to Herzog's Smith's, and other encyclopedic works. See Life by his son (1897).

SCHANK, John Stillwell, educator, b. near Frechold, N. J., 24 Feb., 1817; d. in Princeton, 16 Dec., 1898. He was graduated at Princeton, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1843, settled in Princeton, and followed the practice of his profession there until 1865. In 1847 he was called to the curatorship of the college museum and was appointed professor of anatomy, physiology, and zoology. In 1853-6 he instructed the senior class in chemistry, and in 1857 he was elected to succeed John Torrey in the professorship. Under his direction the course was enlarged and extended, and he lectured on anatomy, physiology, chemistry, and hygiene. He was a member of various scientific societies, and received the degree of LL. D. from Lafayette.

SCHANK, John, British naval officer, b. in Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1740; d. in Dawlish, England, 6 March, 1823. He entered the royal navy when young, was a lieutenant in 1776, and was employed on the lakes during the Revolutionary war, constructing in less than six weeks the "Indestructible," which captured the king of Prussia's gunboat on Lake Champlain, and displaying ability as a seaman. His talents as an engineer were applied in Gen. John Burgoyne's expedition to the building of floating bridges, and on his return to England he was made a post-captain for his services. He attained the rank of admiral of the blue in 1822. He devised a method of navigating vessels in shallow water by the use of sliding keels, and contrived other ingenious inventions, and was the author of several works on naval architecture.

SCHARRF, John Thomas, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 1 May, 1843; d. 28 Feb., 1898. He entered the counting-house of his father in Baltimore, when sixteen years of age. In the beginning of the civil war he joined a Confederate battery, was engaged in the battle around Richmond in 1862, was wounded at Cedar Mountain, at the second battle of Bull Run, and again at Chancellorsville, and on 20 June, 1863, was appointed a midshipman in the Confederate navy. In January, 1864, he took part in the capture of the steamer "Underwriter," near New Berne, N. C. He rejoined the army after all the ports were occupied, and was captured in Maryland while on his way to Canada with dispatches. After the war he engaged in mercantile business, then in journalism, and in 1874 was admitted to the bar. In 1878 he was a member of the legislature. Since 1884 he had been a commissioner of the land office of Maryland. Georgetown college gave him the degree of LL. D. D. He has been editor of the Baltimore "Telegram" and "Morning Herald." Besides many historical addresses and magazine articles, he has published "Chronicles of Baltimore" (Baltimore, 1874); "History of Maryland" (3 vols., 1879); "History of Baltimore City and County" (Philadelphia, 1881); "History of Western Maryland" (2 vols., 1881); "History of Philadelphia" (3 vols., 1884); "History of Westernchester County, N. Y." (2 vols., 1886); "History of the Confederate States Navy from the Laying of the First Keel to the Sinkin of the Last Vessel" (1887; 2d ed., Albany, 1894); "History of the State of Delaware" (1888); and "Natural and Industrial Resources and Advantages of Maryland" (Annapolis, 1894).
SCHAUFFLER, William Gottlieb, missionary, b. in Stuttgart, Germany, 22 Aug., 1798; d. in New York city, 27 Jan., 1883. He emigrated to Odessa, Russia, with his parents and about 400 others, in 1804, and adopted his father's trade, that of a tailor. In 1810 he entered the St. Andrew's College in Odessa, and in 1820 the theological seminary of the Roman Catholic church. In 1820 he was ordained, and was permitted in 1821 the preaching of Ignatius Lind, a Roman Catholic priest and evangelist. He turned his thoughts toward religion, and he resolved to devote his life to mission work. After serving as an independent missionary in Turkey in 1826 he made his way to the United States, with no property but his clothes, his flute, and one dollar in money, and entered Andover theological seminary, where he supported himself for a time by turning wooden bed-posts. He was graduated in 1830, ordained on 11 Nov., 1831, and returned to Turkey under the auspices of the American board. He married an American lady soon afterward, and resided chiefly in Constantinople during his missionary service of forty-four years, laboring principally among the Jews and Armenians. In 1843 he was instrumental in persuading Sir Stratford Canning, the British minister, to interfere in behalf of members of the latter race that had been persecuted by the Armenian patriach. For his efforts in behalf of the German colony in Constantinople he received a decoration from the king of Prussia. From 1839 till 1842 he resided in Vienna engaged in translating the Hebrew Bible into German, and a volume was published in that city in two quarto volumes. He made a visit to this country in 1857-8, and from 1877, three years after his retirement from active work, resided here till his death. The University of Halle gave him the degree of D. D. in 1867, and Princeton that of LL. D. in 1879. Dr. Schaufler was a scholar of fine attainments, being "sufficiently conversant with the ancient and modern languages." Besides the work mentioned above, he was the author of a translation of the Bible into Turkish, which received high praise. His English publications include, besides single sermons, "Essay on the Right Use of Property" (Boston, 1832), and "Meditations on the Last Days of Christ" (1837; new ed., 1853 and 1839). He wrote his Autobiography, "I Started," with an introduction by Prof. Edwards A. Park (New York, 1887).

SCHEBOSH, John Joseph, missionary, b. at Skippack, Pa., 27 May, 1721; d. in Ohio, 4 Sept., 1788. He united with the Moravian church in 1742, and for forty-five years served in the Indian mission. His real name was Joseph Bull, and he was of Quaker parentage, but he was universally called Schebosh (running water), the name that was given him by the Indians. His wife was a convert from the Sopis Indians, who, after a union of forty-one years, died in 1787, leaving issue.

SCHELL, Augustus, politician, b. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 1 Aug., 1812; d. in New York city, 27 March, 1894. He graduated from Union College in 1836, and at Litchfield Law-school, was admitted to the bar in 1839. He was a life long and active member of the bar in New York city. He was made chairman of the Tammany Hall general committee in 1852, and was at the head of the Democratic state committee in 1853-6. During the administration of President Buchanan he was collector of the port of New York. He was chairman of the National committee of the way of the Democratic party that supported John C. Breckinridge for the presidency in 1860, and in 1872 held the same office during the Greeley canvass. In 1867 he was an active member of the convention to revise the state constitution. After the trial of William M. Tweed and his associates Mr. Schell labored for the purification and rehabilita-

SCHENCK, Alexander Jacob, author, b. in Wiedenbruck, Prussia, 16 March, 1826; d. in West Hoboken, N. J., 21 May, 1881. He studied theology and philology in Bonn and Tubingen, and came to the United States in 1851. In 1854 he became professor of ancient and modern languages in Dickinson college, but he resigned in 1859 to devote himself to literature. He was a writer for the New York "Tribune" till 1869, when he undertook the editorship of the "Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexion" (11 vols., New York, 1869-74). From 1874 till his death he held the office of assistant superintendent of the public schools in New York city. He was a contributor to other cyclopedias of statistical, geographical, and religious articles. He was one of the editors of the "Methodist" and of the "Methodist Quarterly Review." He prepared, with Rev. George F. Crooks, a "Latin-English Dictionary" (Philadelphia, 1857), and published several editions of "Schen's Statistics of the World"; the "American Ecclesiastical Year-Book" (New York, 1860); the "Ecclesiastical Almanac" (1869 and 1870); and, with Henry Kiddle, a "Voyage through the Med. Sea" (1872-3), which was followed by two annual supplements called the "Year-Book of Education" (1878 and 1879).

SCHENCK, James Findlay, naval officer, b. in Franklin, Ohio, 11 June, 1807; d. in Dayton, Ohio, 21 Dec., 1882. His ancestor, Rodolf Martense Schenck, emigrated from Holland to New Amsterdam in 1630. He was appointed to the U. S. military academy in 1827, and in 1828 entered the navy as midshipman, 1 March, 1825. He became passed midshipman, 4 June, 1831, and lieutenant, 32 Dec., 1835, and in August, 1845, joined the "Congress," in which he served as chief military aide to Com. Robert F. Stockton at the capture of Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and San Pedro, Cal. He also participated in the capture of Guymas and Mazatlan in Mexico in 1846, and in 1849 returned home as bearer of despatches. He was commissioned for efficient services in the Mexican war. Lieut. Schenck then entered the service of the Pacific mail steamship company and commanded the steamer "Ohio" and other steamers between New York and Aspinwall in 1849-52. He was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1857, and assigned to the frigate "S. Lawrence," 19 March, 1862, on the West Gulf blockade. On 7 Oct., 1864, he was ordered to command the "Powhatan" in the North Atlantic squadron, and he also received notification of his promotion to commodore to date from 2 Jan., 1863. He led the 3d division of the squadron in the two attacks on Fort Fisher, and was highly commended for his services. Com. Schenck had charge of the naval station at Moon's City till, in 1865-6, was promoted to rear-admiral, 21 Sept., 1868, and retired by law, 11 June, 1889. His brother, Robert Cumming, diplomatist, b. in Franklin, Ohio, 4 Oct., 1809; d. in Washington, D. C., 23 March, 1890. He was graduated at Miami university in 1837, was a tutor for three years longer, then studied law with Thomas Corwin and admitted to the bar, and established himself in practice at Dayton, Ohio. He was a member of the legislature in 1841-2, displaying practical knowledge and pungent wit in the debates, and was then elected as a Whig to congress, and thrice re-elected, serving from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1851. He was a member of important committees, and during his third term he was the chairman of that on roads and canals. On 12 March, 1851, he was commissioned as minister to Brazil. In 1852, with John S. Pendleton, who was accredited to the Argentine Republic as charge d'affaires, he arranged a treaty of friendship and commerce with the government of that country and one for the free navigation of the river La Plata and its great tributaries. They also negotiated treaties with the governments of Uruguay and Paraguay. He left Rio Janeiro on 8 Oct., 1853, and after his return to Ohio engaged in the railroad business. He offered his services to the government when the civil war began, and was one of the first brigadier-generals appointed by President Lincoln, his commission bearing date of 17 May, 1861. He was attached to the military department of Washington, and on 17 June moved forward by railroad with a regiment to dislodge the Confederates at Vienna, but was surprised by a masked battery, and forced to retreat. On meeting re-enforcements, he changed front, and the enemy retired. His brigade formed a part of Gen. Daniel Tyler's division at the first battle of Bull Run, and was on the point of crossing the Stone Bridge to make secure the occupation of the plateau, when the arrival of Confederate re-enforcements turned the tide of battle. He next served in West Virginia under Gen. William S. Rosecrans, and was ordered to the Shenandoah valley with the force that was sent to oppose Gen. Thomas J. Jackson. Pushing forward by a forced march after the battle of Front Royal, Gen. Robert H. Milroy, he had a sharp and brilliant engagement with the enemy at McDowell. At Cross Keys he led the Ohio troops in a charge on the right, and maintained the ground that he won until he was ordered to retire. Gen. John C. Fremont then intrusted him with the command of a division. At the second battle of Bull Run he led the first division of Gen. Franz Sigel’s corps. He was wounded in that action by a musket-ball, which shattered his right arm, incapacitating him for active service till 16 Dec., 1862, when he took command of the middle department and eighth corps at Baltimore, having been promoted major-general on 18 Sept. After performing effective services in the Gettysburg campaign, he resumed his command on 3 Dec., 1863, in order to take his place in the house of representatives, in which he served as chairman of the committee on military affairs. He was re-elected in 1864, and was placed at the head of the same committee, where he procured the establishment of the National military and naval asylum. In 1865 he was president of the board of visitors to the U. S. military academy, and was one of the committee of congress on the death of President Lincoln, serving also on the committee on reerection. In 1866 he attended the Loyalists’ convention at Philadelphia and the soldiers’ convention at Pittsburg, Pa. He was re-elected to congress in 1866 and in 1868, when his opponent was Clement L. Vallandigham, serving as chairman of the committee of ways and means and of the ordnance committee. On 22 Dec., 1870, he received the appointment of minister to Great Britain. In 1871 he was one of the “Alabama” commission. He resigned his post in 1876 in consequence of the failure of the Emma silver mine company, in which he had permitted himself to be chosen a director, and resumed the practice of law in Washington, D. C.

SCHENCK, Noah Hunt, clergyman, b. in Pennington, Mercer co., N. J., 30 June, 1825; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y. 4 Jan., 1885. He was graduated at Princeton in 1844, studied law in Trenton, N. J., was admitted to the bar in 1847, and practiced there till 1848, when he removed to Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1851 he abandoned his profession for the ministry, and after graduation at the theological seminary in Gambier, Ohio, in 1853, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. After having charge of parishes in Ohio, Chicago, Ill., and Baltimore, Md., he was called in 1869 to St. Ann’s, Brooklyn, N. Y., where he remained till his death. The new church building, one of the finest in Brooklyn, was erected early in Dr. Schenck’s rectorship, and in 1879 he succeeded in freeing it from debt. Dr. Schenck was active in the missionary work of his church, sat for many years in its general convention, and in 1874 went to St. Petersburg as a delegate, at the request of the Evangelical alliances to memorialize the czar in favor of Russian dissenters. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1865. Dr. Schenck founded and edited “The Western Churchman” during his pastorate in Chicago, and in 1867 became co-editor of “The Protestant Churchman” in New York. He was the author of numerous published sermons and addresses, of which a collection appeared in book-form (New York, 1885). A memorial of him was issued by the wardens and vestry of St. Ann’s church, including an address by Bishop Littlejohn (Brooklyn, 1885).

SCHENCK, William Edward, clergyman, b. in Princeton, N. J., 29 March, 1819. He was graduated at Princeton in 1838, and at the theological seminary in 1841. In 1842 he was ordained to the study of law. After doing missionary work in the Pennsylvania coal region, he was ordained in 1843, and until 1852 held pastorates successively in Manchester, N. J., New York city, and Princeton. He was then superintendent of church extension in the presbytery of Philadelphia till 1854, when he became corresponding secretary of the Presbyterian board of publication. He was also its editor in 1862–’70, and in the same years served as permanent clerk of the general assembly of the old-school branch of his denomination. Since 1865 he has been a director of Princeton theological seminary, Jefferson college, Pa., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1861. Dr. Schenck has published “Historical Accounts of the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton, N. J.” (Princeton, 1851); “Aunt Fanny’s Home” (Philadelphia, 1865); “Children in Heaven” (1866); “Nearing Home” (1867); and sermons and tracts in English and German. He has also prepared a “General Catalogue of Princeton Theological Seminary” (Trenton, 1861), and its necrological reports since 1870.
SCHERZER

When vols., (2 Dutch, "Bevieune") He is 1 July, a "An coutumes New in 1876, brother, Christian empire. He is 1877, a printer, 29 (2 vols., Stuttg. "Children's Bread: a Bible Catechism" (1874); "Words to Christian Teachers" (1877); "Music in our Churches" (1881): "The Church in Ephesus and the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches" (1884); and "People's Hymn-Book" (Philadelphia, 1887).

—His brother, Bradhurst, b. in New York city, 21 Sept., 1824, was educated in his native city, and then entered the southern army, to which he was elected by his grandfather, Jacob Schieffelin. He subsequently became one of the firm of Schieffelin Brothers, and retired from active business on the formation of the present firm. Mr. Schieffelin has been largely interested in political affairs, and has connected himself with the People's party, whose platform is the product of his pen. He believes that no republic can exist where wealth is allowed to accumulate in the hands of a small minority, and favors a law limiting inheritance. In 1883 he was nominated by his party for state senator from the 10th district of New York city, but failed of election.

SCHIMMELIN. Alexander Oliver, styled also Oeskmelin and Esquemeling, and generally known as "the British Francis Winslow," was a Dutch soldier, b. in Flanders about 1645; d. in France in 1707. He studied medicine, but on 2 May, 1666, embarked as a contract laborer on a vessel belonging to the French company of the West Indies, and was sold for thirty crowns to M. de La Vie, agent of the company in Tortugas. After serving his master for three years, he was freed, and enlisted with the buccaneers, with whom he remained till 1674, when he returned to Europe on a Dutch vessel. Later he made three voyages to South America as surgeon on board Dutch and Spanish vessels. The narrative of his adventures, written originally not in Dutch, as it is claimed, but in French, fell into the hands of Baron de Frontignieres, who published them with the title "Histoire des aventures du sieur Esquemeling, capitaine en Indes occidentales," but did not bind them to the laws of the Indies, contenant ce qu'ils ont fait de remarquable, leurs meurs, leurs entreprises, avec la vie, les meurs et les coutumes des habitants de Saint Domingue et de l'ile de la Tortue; une description exacte de ces lieux, ainsi que l'histoire de la chambre des comptes des Indes Occidentales" (2 vols., Paris, 1864). The first volume contains also a monograph on the flora and fauna of South America. An enlarged edition (4 vols., Treves, 1757) contains the "Relation du voyage fait à la mer du Sud avec les flibustiers en 1655-7," by Ravenne de Lussan, and a "Histoire des pirates Anglais." The Dutch edition, which is claimed by some to be the original, "Geschiichte van de Vroebuyters van Amerika." (Amsterdam, 1700), is asserted by others to be only a translation and fauna of South America. For his services at Bull Run he was nominated brigadier-general. The appointment was at first rejected, but, on being presented again, was confirmed in March, 1863, the commission dating from ern Presbyterian theological seminary, Pittsburg, Pa., but not long afterward entered the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city. He was not graduated, but was ordained deacon in St. George’s church, New York, 7 July, 1859, by Bishop Boone, of Amoy, China, and priest, in the mission chapel, Sung-ya-Vara (4 vols., Stuttgart, 1871-2); "Smyrna" (Vienna, 1873); and "Das wirtschaftliche Leben der Völker" (Leipsic, 1885).

SCHEIFFELIN. Samuel Bradhurst (shef-lin), author, b. in New York city, 24 Feb., 1811. He was educated in private schools, and early turned his attention to business, but contributed largely to the religious press. His works include "Message to Ruling Elders, their Office and their Duties" (New York, 1838); "The Foundations of History: a Series of First Things" (1840); "Common MILK for Rabes" (1841); "Bible Catechism" (1847); "Children's Bread: a Bible Catechism" (1874); "Words to Christian Teachers" (1877); "Music in our Churches" (1881): "The Church in Ephesus and the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches" (1884); and "People's Hymn-Book" (Philadelphia, 1887).

—His brother, Bradhurst, b. in New York city, 21 Sept., 1824, was educated in his native city, and then entered the southern army, to which he was elected by his grandfather, Jacob Schieffelin. He subsequently became one of the firm of Schieffelin Brothers, and retired from active business on the formation of the present firm. Mr. Schieffelin has been largely interested in political affairs, and has connected himself with the People’s party, whose platform is the product of his pen. He believes that no republic can exist where wealth is allowed to accumulate in the hands of a small minority, and favors a law limiting inheritance. In 1883 he was nominated by his party for state senator from the 10th district of New York city, but failed of election.

SCHIMMELPFENNIG. Alexander, soldier, b. in Prussia in 1824; d. in Minersville, Pa., 7 Sept., 1865. He served as an officer of the Prussian army in Schleswig-Holstein in 1848, and soon afterward came to the United States. At the beginning of the civil war he was elected colonel of a Pennsylvania regiment, which he commanded during General Pope’s campaign in Virginia. For his services at Bull Run he was nominated brigadier-general. The appointment was at first rejected, but, on being presented again, was confirmed in March, 1863, the commission dating from 29 Nov., 1862. At Chancellorsville he commanded a brigade in Gen. Carl Schurz's corps, and served with credit at Gettysburg. In February, 1864, he was sent to St. John's island, near Charleston, and thence crossed to James island. When Charles-ton was evacuated on the approach of Gen. William T. Sherman's army, Gen. Schimmelpennin entered and took possession, 18 Feb., 1865. He remained in command of the city for some time, but was finally relieved on account of sickness, the result of exposure, which in a short time terminated in his death. He was the author of "The War between Russia and Turkey" (Philadelphia, 1834).

SCHLAGINTWEIT, Robert von (shlah-gin-vite), German explorer, b. in Munich, Bavaria, 25 Oct., 1851; d. in Riesen, Hesse-Darmstadt, 6 June, 1885. He assisted his brothers, Hermann and Adolf, in the geological exploration of India in 1854-57, prepared the work entitled "Results of a Scientific Mission to India and High Asia" (4 vols., Leipsic, 1860-61), and filled the chair of geography in the University of Giessen. In 1867-70 he lectured in German and English throughout the United States, and afterwards in Canada, Boston, and while in the country explored the Pacific coast. He published "Die Pacificiselnahen in Nordamerika" (New York, 1870), and "California" (1871).

SCHLAGINTWEIT, Michael, clergyman, b. in St. Gall, Switzerland, 14 July, 1716; d. on Chestnut Hill, now a part of Philadelphia, Pa., in November, 1766. He was educated at the gymnasium of his native town and at the University of Helmstedt, Brunswick, taught for several years in Holland, entered the German Reformed ministry, officiated for a few months in Switzerland, and then went to Amsterdam and volunteered his services as a missionary to the destitute congregations of Pennsylvania. He arrived in Philadelphia on 6 Aug., 1746, and on 1 Jan., 1747, was installed as pastor of the United churches of Germantown and Philadelphia. For a great part of the time he was absent on missionary tours among the German Reformed settlers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey, and New York. He organized a synod, which met in Philadelphia on 29 Sept., 1747. It was at this Synod in Germantown, thatpromotion was made of his appointment to visit Europe for the purpose of making a complaint before the synods of South and North Holland. In Amsterdam he published (1751) a journal of his experiences and transactions in America, with an account of the Reformed congregations and their deacons of pastors. Of this book he made a German translation (Frankfort, 1752), and afterward it was rendered into English by Rev. David Thomson, of Amsterdam, and distributed throughout Great Britain. He returned to Pennsylvania in March, 1752, bringing with him six young ministers and substantial aid in money. As a result of his appeal, a fund of more than $20,000 was collected in England and Holland for the support of the ministry among the Germans in America. Schlietter withdrew from the active duties of the pastorate in 1755, and devoted himself to the establishment of these schools, which met with strong opposition among the Germans, because the scheme included the teaching of the English language. The project rendered him unpopular, and in 1756 he abandoned this work and accepted a chaplaincy in the Royal American regiment that was tendered him by Lord Loudon. He accompanied the Pennsylvania troops in the expedition against Louisburg, and remained with the army till 1759. After his return from Nova Scotia he preached at Chestnut Hill, where he resided, and in neighboring places, but held no further relations with the authorities of the church. When the Revolutionary war began he still held the appointment of chaplain in the royal army, and officiated as such for a short time. But his sympathies were with the patriots, and when English troops invaded Germantown in September, 1777, he fled to St. Thomas Aquinas and, while his house was plundered, see his "Life," by Rev. Henry Harbaugh (Philadelphia, 1857).

SCHLEY, William, governor of Georgia, b. in Frederick, Md., 15 Dec., 1786; d. in Augusta, Ga., 29 Nov., 1858. He was educated at the academies of Louisville and Augusta, Ga., studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1815, and practiced in Augusta. In 1825-8 he was a judge of the superior court. In 1830 he entered the legislature, and in 1832 he was elected as a Democrat to congress. When his term ended he was chosen governor of the state for the two years ending with October, 1837. He was an ardent Democrat and strict constructionist. The building of the first railroad in Georgia, the Augusta and Charleston rail line, was also accomplished by his efforts. He also advocated the establishment of a lunatic asylum and a geological survey of the state. Gov. Schley published a "Digest of the English Statutes in Force in Georgia" (Philadelphia, 1826).

SCHLEY, Winfield Scott, naval officer, b. in Frederick county, Md., 9 Oct., 1839. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1859, served on board the brig "Niagara" in 1860 and was attached to the frigate "Potomac" of the Western Gulf squadron in 1861-2, and subsequently took part on board the gun-boat "Winona" and the sloops "Monongahela" and "Richmond," in all the engagements that led to the capture of Port Hudson, being promoted lieutenant on 16 July, 1862. He served on the "Waterice" in the Pacific in 1864-65, quelling an insurrection of Chinese coolies on the Middle China islands in 1865, and later in the same year landing at La Union, San Salvador, to protect American interests during a revolution. He was instructor at the naval academy in 1866-9, served on the Asiatic station in 1869-72, taking part in the capture of the Corea forts on Sallee river, after two days of fighting, in June, 1871, and was re-commissioned as a lieutenant in 1874-75, being promoted commander in June, 1874. In 1875-9 he was on the Brazil station, and during the cruise sailed in the "Essex" to the vicinity of the South Shetland islands in search of a missing sealer, and rescued a shipwrecked crew on the islands of Tristan d'Acunha. In 1884 he commanded the relief expedition, that rescued Lieut. Adolphus W. Greely and six of his companions at Cape Sabine in Grinnell Land, passing through 1,400 miles of ice during the voyage. He was commissioned chief of the bureau of equipment and recruiting at the navy department in 1885, and promoted captain in 1888, commodore in 1898, and assisted in destroying Admiral Cervera's Spanish squadron in July, 1898, during the occupation of Paraguay.

SCHMIDEL, Ulrich (shmee-del), German historian, b. in Strasburg, Bavaria, about 1511; d. there about 1570. He was the son of a wealthy merchant, and received a good education, but entered the military service, and enlisted in the expedition of Pedro de Mendez as an arquebusier. He also accompanied Don Ayolas on his first trip in quest of provisions, and afterward went with Ayolas in his expedition up Paraguay river, and was one of the soldiers that were left with Domingo Irala (y, r) in charge of the vessels in the port of Candelaria. When Galvez de Vaca was deposed in April, 1844. Schmidel sustained Itala, who was the new governor, and in 1846 accompanied him in his expedition to Peru as far as the foot of the Andes, where he was despatched with Nuño de Chaves to President La Gasa. He accompanied Itala on his last disastrous expedition of 1850, and, hearing in 1552 of the death of his elder brother, to whose estate he was to succeed, he obtained his discharge. In Seville he presented to the council of the Indies letters from Itala with the report of his discoveries, and arrived toward the close of 1554 in Straubingen, where he afterward resided. He had kept a diary during his wanderings, and wrote an interesting narrative of his adventures under the title of "Vahre Geschicht einer merkwürdigen Reise, gemacht durch Ulrich Schmidel von Straubingen, in America oder der Neuen Welt, von 1534 bis 1554, wo man findet alle seine Leiden in 19 Jahren, und die Beschreibung der Länder und merkwürdigen Völker die ergessen, von ihm selbst geschrieben" (Frankfort, 1557), of which a Latin version appeared in Nuremberg in 1569; as "Vera historia," etc. Henry Ternaux-Compass has also published a translation of the work in his "Voyages, relations et mémoires," and Barcia in his "Historiadores primitivos de Indias." Schmidel is certainly the first historian of the Argentine, and his narrative is valuable, as it gives the names and tells of the habits of the savage inhabitants of the Indian nations that were extinct a century later.

SCHMIDT, Frederick Augustus, clergyman, b. in Lettenberg, Germany, 3 Jan., 1837. In 1841 he came to the United States with his widowed mother to settle in Missouri with relatives that had emigrated in 1839 with the Saxon colony under the leadership of Martin Stephan. He was graduated at the General-Synodical theological seminary at St. Louis in 1857. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry at Eden, Erie co., N. Y. He served as pastor there and in Baltimore, Md.; was professor in the Norwegian Lutheran college, at Decorah, Iowa, in 1861-'71; in Concordia theological seminary, St. Louis, Mo., in 1871-'9; in the Norwegian Lutheran seminary, Madison, Wis.; in the Lutheran Theological Seminary, Divinity-school, Northfield, Minn., since 1886. He received the degree of D. D. in 1884 from Capitol university, Columbus, Ohio. He has for years been a leader among the Norwegian Lutherans. In 1873 he was sent as delegate from the Norwegian synod to the general assembly of the Norwegian mission society at Christiana, Norway. He was editor of the "Lutheran Watchman" in Decorah, Iowa, in 1864-'5; "Altes und Neues" in Madison, Wis., in 1860-'5; and "Lutherske Vidnesbyrd" in Madison, Wis. (now Northfield, Minn.), in 1882-'7; and co-editor of "Kirkebidrag," at Decorah, Iowa, in 1865-'71, and "Lehre und Weihe" in St. Louis, Mo., in 1872-'9. He has published "Intimiten" (a collection of documents from Lutheran authors) under the question of predestination, the controversy on which point among Lutherans in America and Europe was started by the publication of "Altes und Neues" in 1880.

SCHMIDT, Henry Emmanuel, clergyman, b. in Nazareth, Pa., 21 Dec., 1806; d. in New York city, 11 Feb., 1889. He received his training in the Moravian church on his native soil and in 1832 became a candidate for the ministry, but in 1829 severed his connection with the Moravian church, and was licensed as a Lutheran clergyman. He was pastor of a congregation in Bergen county, N. J., in 1831-'3, assistant professor in Hartwick seminary, N. Y., in 1833-'6, pastor in Boston, Mass., in 1836-'8, professor of German and French in Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, Pa., in 1838-'9, and of German in the theological seminary there in 1839-'43, pastor at Palatine, N. J., in 1844-'5, principal of Hartwick seminary, N. Y., in 1845-'8, and published "History of Education," and literature in Columbia in 1848-'50. On 1 Nov., 1850, he was compelled by failing health to resign the last-named post, and was retired as professor emeritus. In 1850 Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, Pa., conferred on him the degree of D. D. He was a frequent contributor to the "Evangelical Review" (Gettysburg, Pa.) and to other periodicals, and published "History of Education," and including part of: "History of Education, Ancient and Modern," and part ii. "Plan of Culture and Instruction based on Christian Principles" (1842); "Inaugural Address," delivered in the chapel of Columbia college (New York, 1849); "Scriptural Character of the Lutheran Doctrine of the Lord's Supper" (1852); and "Course of Ancient Geography" (1850).

SCHMUCKER, John George, clergyman, b. in Michaelstadt, Darmstadt, Germany, 18 Aug., 1771; d. in Williamsburg, Pa., 7 Oct., 1854. His parents emigrated to this country in 1874, and, after a residence of two years in Pennsylvania, settled near Woodstock, Va. In 1789 he began to study for the ministry, a year later he was an assistant to the German Lutheran minister in Philadelphia, and in 1796 he was ordained. After holding several pastorate he was called, in 1809, to York, Pa., where he remained till failing health compelled him to retire in 1832. He then removed to Williamsburg, Pa., where several of his children resided, and there he remained during the rest of his life. In 1825 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was one of the founders of the general synod of the Lutheran church in the United States, in 1821, an active supporter of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., and for many years president of its board of directors. He was also active in the establishment of Pennsylvania college, and for more than twenty-two years was one of its trustees. For more than twenty years he was a professor at and active engaged in all its important operations. He was a frequent contributor to periodicals, and a poet of merit. Among his works are: "Vornehmste Weisagungen der Heiligen Schrift" (Hagerstown, Md., 1857); "Reformations-Geschichte zur Jubelfeier der Reformation" (York, Pa., 1857); "Prophectic History of the Christian Religion, or Explanation of the Revelation of St. John" (2 vols., Baltimore, 1817); "Schwärmergeist unserer Tage entlarvt, zur Warnung erweckten Seelen" (York, Pa., 1827); "Lieder-Anhang, zum Evangel. Gesamtbuch der General-Synode" (1833); and "Wächtersstimme an Zion's Kinder" (Gettysburg, Pa., 1838). His son, Samuel Simon, theologian, b. in Hagerstown, Md., 26 Feb., 1845, spent two years in the University of Pennsylvania, and then taught in York in 1856. He began theological studies under the direction of his father, but in 1818 entered Princeton seminary, where he was graduated in 1820. Among his fellow-students at Princeton were Bishop Muhlenberg of the German, and Dr. Robert Beir. After being licensed, he was his father's assistant for a few months, and then followed a call to New Market, Va. He was ordained at Frederick, Md., 5 Sept., 1821, and served his first charge in 1820-'6. He interested himself at once in the preparation of young men for the ministry, took an active part in the organization of the general synod in 1821, and was throughout his life one of the leaders of that body. He was the author of the formula for the government and discipline of the Evangelical Lutheran church, which, adopted by the general synod in 1827, has become the ground-plan of the organization of that body. From its establishment in 1826 till his resignation in 1864 he was chairman of the faculty of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., and for four years he was the only instructor. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him in 1830 by Rutgers and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1846 he took an active part in the establishment of an ecclesiastical connection between the Lutheran church in Europe and America, and was a delegate to the Evangelical alliance which met in London during that year. He aided much in preparing the way for the latter by his "Fraternal Appeal" to the American churches, with a plan for union (1838), which was circulated extensively in England and the United States. His published works number more than one hundred. Among them are: "Biblical Theology of Storr and Flott," translated from the German (2 vols., Andover, 1826); "Elements of Popular Theology" (1834); "Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Christlichen Kirche, auf der Grundlage der Busch en Werke" (Gettysburg, Pa., 1834); "Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches on Christian Union" (Andover, 1838); "Portraiture of Lutheranism" (Baltimore, 1840); "Retrospect of Lutheranism" (1844); "Psalms, or Essays of Metaphysical Philosophy" (New York, 1842); "Dissertation on Capital Punishment" (Philadelphia, 1845); "The American Lutheran Church, Historically, Doctrinally, and Practically Delineated" (1851); "Lutheran Manual" (1853); "American Lutheran Vindicated" (Baltimore, 1856); "Appeal on Behalf of the Christian Sabbath" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Evangelical Lutheran Catechism" (Baltimore, 1859); "The Church of the Redeemer" (1867); "The Unity of Christ's Church" (New York, 1870); and a large number of discourses and addresses, and articles in the "Evangelical Review" and other periodicals. — Samuel Simon's son, Samuel Mosheim, author, b. in New Market, Shenandoah co., Va., 12 Jan., 1829; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 May, 1883, wrote his name Schmucker. He was graduated at Washington college, Pa., in 1849. After studying theology and being licensed to preach, he accepted a call from the Lutheran church at Lewiston, Pa. In 1845 he became pastor of the 1st church in German town, Pa., but in October, 1848, received an honorable dismissal from his synod, and studied law at the Philadelphia law-academy, where he served as secretary. In January, 1850, he was admitted to the bar, and at once began practice. In March, 1853, he removed to New York city, but after two years returned to Philadelphia, and thereupon employed himself chiefly in writing. His publications include "Errors of Modern Inhediity" (Philadelphia, 1848); "Aldotion of Judges by the People" and "Constitutionality of the Maine Liquor Law" (1852); "The Spanish Wife, a Play, with Memoir of Edwin Forrest" (New York, 1854); "Court and Reign of Catherine II., Empress of Russia" (1856); "The Life and Reign of Nicholas I., of Russia" (1851). With John C. Fremont, with his "Explorations," and "Life and Times of Alexander Hamilton" (Philadelphia, 1856); "History of the Mormons, Edited and Enlarged" (New York, 1856); "Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson," and "The Yankee Slave- Driver" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Memorable Scenes in French History" and "Arctic Explorations and Discoveries," (New York, 1859); Dr. Kent Kane and Other American Explorers" and "History of Napoleon III." (Philadelphia, 1858); "History of the Four Georges" and "History of All Religions" (New York, 1859); "Life, Speeches, and Memorials of Daniel Webster" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Life and Times of Henry Clay," "Life of Washington Nicol" "Blue Laws of Connecticut," and "History of the Modern Jews." (Philadelphia, 1860); "The Religion of the Indians," (Philadelphia, 1861); "A History of the Civil War in the United States" (1863).—Another son of Samuel Simon, Beale Melanchthon, clergyman, b. in Gettysburg, Pa., 26 Aug., 1827; d. in Pottstown, Pa., 18 Oct., 1888. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college in 1844, studied at Gettysburg theological seminary, and in 1849 was ordained to the Lutheran ministry by the synod of Virginia. In 1870 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was pastor at Martinsburg, Va., Allentown, Easton, and Reading, Pa., and since 1880 at Pottstown, Pa., and held many offices in connection with his denomination. He was one of the founders of the general council in 1867, a delegate to every convention since its organization, and uninterruptedly a member of its most important committees. Dr. Schmucker was a fine liturgical scholar, and performed more than any other man for the liturgical and hymnological development of the Lutheran church. He was co-editor of the "Halleische Nachrichten" (Allentown, Pa., and Halle, Ger., 1844-50); "Geschichte der Lutheranischen Kirche in Amerika," (2 vols., Pa., vol. i, 1889), which is the primary source of information concerning the early history of the Lutheran church in this country. Dr. Schmucker also edited "Liturgy of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Collection of Hymns of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania" (1863); "Church-Book of the General Council" (1868); and "Ministerial Acts of the General Council" (1874). He published numerous articles on doctrinal, historical, and liturgical subjects, of which many have been republished separately in pamphlet-form.

SCHNECK, Benjamin Shroder, clergyman, b. in Upper Bern, Berks co., Pa., 14 March, 1806; d. in Chambersburg, Pa., 19 April, 1874. He was educated by his father, a German schoolmaster of Reading, studied theology, and was ordained to the ministry of the German Reformed church on 5 Sept., 1826. He was pastor of congregations in Centre county, Pa., till 1844, preaching in both English and German, and then in Gettysburg for one year. He took charge in 1836 of the "Weekly Messenger" at Chambersburg, and in 1858 of the "Reformirte Kirchenzeitung," the German organ of his church. He still continued editor of the "Weekly Messenger," with an assistant, till 1844, when he resigned, resuming charge again in 1847, and giving it up finally in 1852. He retired from the editorship of the German paper in 1864, when SCHOFF, Stephen Alonzo, engraver, b. in Danville, Vt., 16 Jan., 1818. He began engraving under the direction of Oliver Peckton, of Boston, with whom he remained until he was nearly of age, subsequently passing a short time with Joseph Andrews, the engraver to Washington, and then visiting Europe. There he spent about two years in Paris, studying drawing a part of the time at the school of Paul Delaroche, and perfecting himself in his art. On his return to this country he engaged in bank-note work in New York, and soon was employed upon his first important work, "Cuirass Maurs on the Real War in the United Nations," (Philadelphia, 1866). This plate was issued about 1845, and, to dispose of its publication and aid the young artist, the master American engraver, Asher Brown Durand, engraved the head and gave some touches to the figure. Other important works from the burin of
Mr. Schofield is William Penn, engraved for the Pennsylvania historical society, a folio portrait of Ralph Waldo Emerson from a drawing-general and "The Bathers," after William M. Hunt. Mr. Schofield's work is executed in pure line, and exhibits much delicacy and a nice appreciation of the feeling of the artist he is reproducing. Recently he has turned his attention to etching, producing some beautiful plates. Mr. Schofield has at different times made Boston, Washington, and New York his home, but at present (1898) he is living at Rosedale, Va., in the active exercise of his profession.

SCHOFIELD, John McAllister, soldier, b. in Chautauqua county, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1831. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, in the same class with Philip H. Sheridan, James B. McPherson, and John B. Hood. He was assigned to the 1st regiment of artillery and served in garrison in South Carolina and Florida in 1853-5, and as assistant professor of natural philosophy at the U. S. military academy in 1855-60, being commissioned 1st lieutenant, 31 Aug., 1855, and captain, 14 May, 1861. On his departure from West Point in 1860 he obtained leave of absence and filled the chair of professor of physics at Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., until April, 1861. At the opening of the civil war he entered the volunteer service as major of the 1st Missouri volunteers, 26 April, 1861, and was appointed chief of staff to Gen. Nathaniel Lyon, with whom he served during his campaign in Missouri, including the battle of Wilson's Creek, in which Lyon was killed. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 21 Nov., 1861, and a few days later brigadier-general of Missouri militia, and he was in command of the district from November, 1861, till November, 1862, and of the Army of the Frontier and the district of southwest Missouri from that date to April, 1863. He was appointed major-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and from May, 1863, till February, 1864, in command of the Department of the Missouri. He was then assigned to the command of the Department and Army of the Ohio, and in April, 1864, joined the forces that were collecting near Chattanooga under Gen. William T. Sherman for the invasion of Georgia. He took part in the Atlanta campaign, being engaged at the battles of Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, and Atlanta. When Sherman left Atlanta on his march to the sea, Schofield, with the 23rd army corps, was ordered back to Tennessee and became part of the army that was then being organized under Gen. George H. Thomas to resist Hood's invasion of Tennessee. Schofield retreated skillfully before the superior forces of Hood, inflicted a severe check upon him in a sharp battle at Franklin, 30 Nov., 1864, and joined Thomas at Nashville, 1 Dec., 1864. For his services at the battle of Franklin he was made brigadier-general and brevet major-general in the regular army. He took part in the battle of Nashville and the subsequent pursuit of Hood's army. In January, 1865, he was detached from Thomas's command and sent with the 23rd army corps by rail to Washington, and thence by transports to the mouth of Cape Fear river, the entire movement of 15,000 men with their artillery and baggage over a distance of 1,800 miles being accomplished in seventeen days. He was assigned to the command of the Department of North Carolina on 9 Feb., 1865, captured Wilmington on 22 Feb., was engaged in the battle of Bentonville, N. C., with General Hood, and surrendered to General Sherman at Goldsboro' on 22 March. He was present at the surrender of Johnston's army on 26 April, and was charged with the execution of the details of the capitulation. In June, 1865, he was sent to Europe on a special mission from the state department in regard to the French intervention in Mexico, and he remained until May, 1866. In August he was assigned to the command of the Department of the Potomac, with headquarters at Richmond. He was in charge of the 1st military district (the state of Virginia) from March, 1867, till May, 1868. Gen. Schofield succeeded Edwin M. Stanton as secretary of war, 2 June, 1868, and remained in that office until the close of Johnson's administration, and under Grant until 12 March, 1869, when he was appointed major-general in the U. S. army and ordered to the Department of the Missouri. He was in command of the Division of the Pacific from 1870 till 1876 and again in 1882 and 1883, superintendent of the U. S. military academy from 1876 till 1881, and in command of the Division of the Missouri from 1883 till 1886, when he took charge of the Division of the Atlantic. He became senior major-general of the army, and later lieutenant-general, and was retired, on reaching the age of sixty-four, in 1895. He was president of the board that adopted the present tactics for the army (1870), went on a special mission to the Hawaiian islands in 1873, and was president of the board of inquiry on the case of Capt. Henry F. Porter in 1870.

SCHOMBURGK, Robert Herman, German explorer, b. in Freiburg on the Unstruth, Prussia, 4 June, 1804; d. in Schöneberg, near Berlin, 11 March, 1865. He entered commercial life, and in 1826 came to the United States, where, after working as a clerk in Boston and Philadelphia, he became a partner in 1828 in a tobacco-manufactory at Richmond, Va. The factory was burned, and Schomburgk emigrated to Brazil and to the territories in the West Indies and Central America, he went to the island of Anegada, one of the Virgin group, where he undertook to make a survey of the coast. Although he did not possess the special knowledge that is required for such a work, he performed it well, and his reports procured him in 1834, from the Geographical society of London and some botanists, means to explore the interior of British Guiana, which was then entirely unknown. After a thorough exploration during 1833-34 he went to London in the summer of 1839 with valuable collections of animals and plants, mostly new species, among them the magnificent water-fishes known now as the Victoria regia and the Elizabetha regia, and many species of orchids, one of which has since been named for him the Schomburgkia orchid. Schomburgk sailed again from London for Georgetown in December, 1840, as president of a commission to determine the boundary-line between British Guiana and Brazil, and to make further geographical and ethnological observations. He was joined there by Capt. Charles Wilkes. On 27 April, 1841, Schomburgk presented a report of his journey to the Geographical society, for which the queen
SCHOOLCRAFT

John Henry Schoolcraft, born in 1822 in Michigan, was a prominent American ethnologist, linguist, and writer. He is best known for his research and publications on the history and cultures of Native American tribes, particularly the tribes of the Great Lakes region.

Early Life and Career:

Schoolcraft was born in 1822 in New York and spent his early years there. He moved to Michigan in 1831, where he married Jane Johnston, a woman of British and Native American heritage, and settled in Detroit. Schoolcraft was a member of the territorial legislature of Michigan in 1832 and served as the secretary of state from 1833 to 1835.

His involvement in the political realm was not his sole focus. Schoolcraft was also deeply interested in the natural and cultural history of the region. He wrote extensively on these topics, compiling valuable data that would later form the basis of his work on Native American societies.

Years in the Field:

As an ethnologist, Schoolcraft was known for his fieldwork and the thoroughness of his studies. He conducted extensive research among the Native American tribes of the Great Lakes region, particularly the Ottawas, Chippewas, and Potawatomis. His work included the compilation of language studies, vocabularies, and detailed observations of their customs and traditions.

Key Works:

- "Narrative and Descriptive of the Indian Tribes of the American Union," published in 1851, is considered one of Schoolcraft's most significant works. It provides a comprehensive overview of the tribes of the Great Lakes region.
- "The Indian Tribes of the Upper Mississippi," published in 1856, is another important work that details the cultures and languages of the tribes in the region.
- "The Indian Tribes of the Upper Mississippi," published in 1860, continues the series with additional insights into the tribes' ways of life.
- "The Indian Tribes of the Upper Mississippi," published in 1864, is the final installment of the series, offering a detailed look at the tribes and their interactions with European settlers.

Influence and Legacy:

Schoolcraft's work had a significant impact on the field of Native American studies. His detailed fieldwork and commitment to accuracy in his research have made his contributions enduring. His work was instrumental in shaping the understanding of Native American cultures during the 19th century and continues to influence scholarship today.

In 1867, Schoolcraft moved to Washington, D.C., where he served as the secretary of the government's Bureau of American Ethnology. He passed away in 1878 in Washington, D.C., leaving behind a legacy of important contributions to the field of Native American studies.

(New York, 1856), was compiled from notes that he furnished to the editor, Cornelia Mathews. To the five volumes of Indian researches compiled under the direction of the war department he added a sixth, containing the post-Columbian history of the Indians and of their relations with Europeans (Philadelphia, 1857). He had collected material for two additional volumes, but the government suddenly suspended the publication of the work.—His wife, Mary Howard, b. in Beaufort, S.C., was his assistant in the preparation of his later works, when he was confined to his chair by paralysis and unable to use his hands. They were married in 1847, five years after the death of his first wife, Mrs. Schoolcraft was the author of "The Black Gauntlet, a Tale of Plantation Life," published in 1840.

Schouler, William (schooler), journalist, b. in Kilbarchan, Scotland, 31 Dec., 1814; d. in West Roxbury, Mass., 24 Oct., 1872. He was brought to this country in 1815, received a common-school education, and engaged in calico printing. He was the proprietor and editor of the Lowell "Courier" in 1841-7, in 1847-53 joint proprietor and editor of the Boston "Daily Atlas," in 1853-6 the editor of the Cincinnati "Gazette," in 1853-8 the editor of the Ohio "Staats-Zeitung," and in 1858 of the Boston "Atlas and Bee." He was four times elected to the Massachusetts house of representatives and once to the senate. In 1853 he was a member of the Massachusetts constitutional convention, and was chosen clerk of the house of representatives. In 1857 he was adjutant-general of Ohio, and from 1859 till 1866 held the same office in Massachusetts. He was the author of "A History of Massachusetts in the Civil War" (2 vols., Boston, 1869-71).—His son, James, lawyer, b. in West Cambridge (now Arlington, Mass.), 20 March, 1839, was graduated at Harvard in 1859, studied law, and began to practise in Boston. In August, 1862, he joined the National army, and served for nearly a year as a lieutenant in the signal service. Since 1864 he has been a lecturer in the Boston university law-school and in the National law university, Washington, D. C. He has published legal treatises "On Domestic Relations" (Boston, 1870); "On Personal Property" (2 vols., 1873-6); "On Bailments, including Carriers" (1880); "On Husband and Wife" (1882); "On Executors and Administrators" (1883); and "On Wills" (1885); also a United States Civil War "Compendium," bringing it down to 1865 (5 vols., New York, 1880-91; new edition, 1895); "Thomas Jefferson" (1893); and "Historical Briefs" (1896).

Schooten, Willem Cornelis (shoo-ten), Dutch navigator, b. in Hoorn in 1560; d. in Antongil bay, Madagascar, in 1625. He had been for years in the employ of the Dutch East India company, when he quarrelled with one of the directors and resigned in 1610. From that time he resolved to find a new route to the Indies, eluding the charter of the East India company. He interested in his scheme Hoorn's richest citizen, Isaac Lemaire, and they formed a company with a capital of 200,000 florins, one half being furnished by Isaac Lemaire, the other by Schooten. The expedition left the Texel, 14 June, 1615, Schooten being the commander, and a son of Isaac, James Lemaire, acting as his deputy and director-general. The details of the discoveries are to be found in the article Lemaire, James. The navigators were arrested in Batavia by George Spielenberg for infringing upon the privileges of the East India company, but on Schooten's arrival in Holland, he secured an acquittal, and even compelled the company to pay him heavy damages. He resumed the exercise of his profession, and was returning to Europe after a successful voyage to the Indies, when stress of weather forced him to enter the Bay of Antongil, and he died there. A narrative of Schooten's expedition was written by Aris Classen, the clerk of the admiral, and published under the title "Scheeps-Journal en Beschrijving van de Zee-vaart van ..." (1617). The large galleys, then called "Corbis," and Schooten, geboren te Hoorn, toen hy heeft ondertekent van de zee-vaart van Magellao een nieuwe doorgang in de groote Zuidzee" (Amsterdam, 1617). It was translated into French (Amsterdam, 1617), into German (Arnhem, 1618), and into Latin (Amsterdam, 1619). The name of Schooten has been given to an island that he discorvered on the Southern coast of Chili.

Schréiber, Collingwood, Canadian engineer, b. in Colchester, Essex, England, 14 Dec., 1831. He came to Canada in 1832, and was engaged on the engineering staff of the Hamilton and Toronto rail way till its completion in 1856. He then engaged in private engineering in Toronto till 1869, when he entered the service of the Canadian railway company, the government of Nova Scotia as division engineer on the Pictou railway, and he continued in this service till 1876, when the works were completed. In 1868 the Dominion government appointed him to take charge of the surveys in connection with the Intercolonial railway, of the route by the way of Lake Temiskinata; and in 1869, as superintending engineer, he was placed in charge of the extension of the railway to the "Historic Grounds," and in 1871 as consulting engineer to the Dominion government. In 1875 he was appointed superintending engineer and commissioner's agent for the entire length of the Intercolonial railway, which post he held till 1873, when he was made chief engineer of government railways in operation, and in 1880 he was also made chief engineer of the railway company of the Canadian Pacific railway. In 1889 he was appointed chief engineer of the railways and canals in Canada, and deputy minister of the same, which position he still holds.

Schréiber, Edmund, soldier, b. in York, Pa., 16 Sept., 1812; d. in Washington, 11 Feb., 1899. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, assigned to the 2d artillery, became 1st lieutenant, and on 7 July, 1838, captain on the staff and assistant to the chief of artillery of the Rapidan River, in the war of 1839. He held the rank of captain in the 2d artillery from 17 Aug., 1842, till 18 June, 1846, resigned his commission on 31 July, 1846, and was treasurer of the Saratoga and Washington railroad company, N. He re-entered the army on 14 May, 1861, as lieutenant-colonel of the 11th infantry, became aide-de-camp to Gov. Edwin D. Morgan, of New York, reunited, organized, and instructed his regiment at Fort Independence, Mass., and became colonel on the staff and additional aide-de-camp on 18 May, 1862, having been made chief of staff of the 1st corps in command of the Potomac. He served in the Shenandoah and the northern Virginia campaigns, and was appointed colonel on the staff and inspector-general, U.S. army, on 13 March, 1863, after serving as acting inspector-general from January till March, 1863. He was at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and afterward bore thirty-one battle-flags and other trophies to the War department. He participated in the Richmond campaign from the Rapidan to Petersburg, was on special duty under the orders of the secretary of war from 22 March till 23 June, 1863, and was brevetted brigadier-general, U.S. army, for faithful and meritorious services in the field on 1 Aug., 1864, and major-general. U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865. From 10 Dec., 1865, till 15 April, 1871, he was on special duty in the secretary of war's office and in charge of the inspection bureau, and in 1866–71 was inspector of the U. S. military academy, was on a tour of inspection in Texas, New Mexico, and Kansas, and of the recruiting service in the United States Signal Corps from 1863. Particularly upon the affairs of the Freedmen's bureau in 1873, was on duty in the war department in 1873–76, and was made inspector of the division of the Pacific on 29 May, 1876. From 16 Nov. to 13 Dec., 1877, he was a member of the retiring board in San Francisco, and of the board to examine the career of Wiiliam A. Robinson. In 1881, he was in the U. S. army. He was retired in January, 1881.

SCHROEDER, John Frederick, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 8 April, 1800; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1857. After graduation at Princeton with the highest honor in 1819, he studied Hebrew, entered the general theological seminary of the Episcopal church, then in New Holland, near Philadelphia, was graduated in Baltimore in 1823. He was an associated minister at Trinity church, New York city, from 1824 till 1838, when he travelled in Europe. On his return in 1839 he resigned his charge at Trinity church, and established in Flushing, L. I., a school for girls, which he called St. Ann's hall, and which he removed to New York in 1840, when he was made rector of the Church of the Trinitarian, and to Brooklyn, when he was called to St. Thomas' church in 1852, which charge he resigned shortly before his death. He delivered many lectures, was a member of the New England historic genealogical society, active in public charities, and rendered much service during the cholera epidemics of 1832–4. Princeton and Yale gave him the degree of A. M. in 1823 and Washington (now Trinity) college that of S. T. D. in 1836. He edited a volume of original essays and dissertations on biblical literature by a society of clergymen, to which he contributed treatises translated from the German, on "The Authenticity and Canonical Authority of the Scriptures of the Old Testament" and "The Use of the Syriac Language in Scripture," published in 1838 before the New York Historical Society (New York, 1829); "A Useful Chart of the Diocese of New York from 1830 to 1850;" "Memoir of Mrs. Mary Anna Boardman" (New Haven, 1849); and "Maxims of Washington" (New York, 1855); and several other books. He left unfinished "The Life and Times of Washington," which was completed by others (1857–51).

SCHUETTE, Conrad Herman Louis, clergyman, b. in Varrel, Hanover, Germany, 17 June, 1843. He was graduated at Capital university, Columbus, Ohio, in 1863, and at the theological department in 1865, and was ordained to the ministry in the latter year. He was pastor at Delaware, Ohio, in 1865–75, had been professor of mathematics and natural sciences at Capital university since 1872, and since 1881 also professor of ethics, symbols, and homiletics in the theological department. He is a frequent contributor to the religious press, has been editor-in-chief of the "Columbus Theological Magazine" since 1886, and has published "The Church Member's Manual" (Columbus, 1879), and "The State, the Church, and the School" (1883).

SCHULTZ, John Christian, Canadian senator, b. in Amherstburg, Ont., 1 Jan., 1840; d. in Winnipeg, 13 April, 1896. He was educated at Oberlin, in medicine at Queen's University, and Victoria university, Cobourg, and was graduated as a physician in 1860. The same year he went to the northwest and practised his profession at Fort Garry (now Winnipeg). He also engaged in the fur-trade, wrote for the "Norwester," and studied the fauna, flora, soil, and climate of the country. Dr. Schultz was leader of the Canadian party at the time of the first Riel rebellion in 1885–89, and was captured, imprisoned, and sentenced to death by Louis Riel. After suffering great hardships he escaped and reached Duluth, Minn., whence he made his way to Canada. He was appointed a member of the Northwest council in December, 1872, was elected to the Dominion parliament in March, 1871, for Lisgar, Manitoba, and represented that constituency until his defeat in 1872, when he was defeated. He became a member of the Canadian senate, 22 Sept., 1882. Dr. Schultz was a member of the Dominion board of health for Manitoba and the Northwest territories, was president of the Northwest trading company, and a director of the Manitoba Southwestern Colonization railway. He was actively engaged in organizing these companies, and served as managing director and western telegraph company. He was lieutenant-governor of Manitoba, and was knighted in 1895.

SCHURMAN, James, patriot, b. in New Jersey in 1577; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 23 Jan., 1824. After graduation at Queen's (now Rutgers) college in 1775, he served in the Revolutionary army as captain of a volunteer company, participated in the battle of Long island, and during the war was captured, imprisoned, and sentenced to death by the sugar-house, where he suffered many hardships. With a single companion he escaped and joined the American army at Morristown, N. J. He was a delegate to the Continental congress from New Jersey in 1785–7, and was elected to the 1st congress as a Federalist, serving from 4 March, 1789, to 3 March, 1791, and again to the 5th congress, serving from 15 May, 1797, till 3 March, 1799. He was then chosen U. S. senator in place of John Rutherford, serving from 3 Dec., 1799, till 6 Feb., 1801, when he resigned. Subsequently he became mayor of the city of New Brunswick, and was again elected to congress, serving from 24 May, 1813, till 3 March, 1815.

SCHURMAN, Jacob Gould, Canadian educator, b. in Freetown, Prince Edward island, 22 May, 1854. He won the Gilchrist Dominion scholarship in 1875, and was graduated in London university in 1877. He was professor of philosophy and English literature in Acadia college, Nova Scotia, in 1880–2, and in Dalhousie college, Halifax, in 1892–6, was elected honorary life governor of University college, London, in 1884, and in 1886 professor of philosophy at Cornell university, becoming its president in 1892. He has published several pamphlets, also "Kantian Ethics and the Ethics of Evolution" (London, 1881); "The Ethical Imprint of Darwinism" (New York, 1857); "A People's University," the founder and daily (Ithaca, 1889); "Belief in God" (1890); and "Agnosticism and Religion" (1896).

SCHURZ, Carl, statesman, b. in Liblar, near Cologne, Prussia, 2 March, 1829. After studying at the gymnasia of Cologne, he entered the University of Bonn in 1846. At the beginning of the revolution of 1848 he joined fried Kinkel, professor of rhetoric in the university, in the publication of a liberal newspaper, of which he was at one time the sole conductor. In the spring of 1849, in consequence of an attempt to promote an insurrection at Bonn, he fled with Kinkel to the Palatinate, entered the revolutionary army as adjutant, and took part in the defence of Rastadt.
On the surrender of that fortress he escaped to Switzerland.
In 1850 he returned secretly to Germany, and effected the escape of Kinkel from the fortress of Spandau.
In June, 1851, he was in Paris, acting as correspondent for German journals, and he afterward spent a year in teaching in London. He came to the United States in 1852, resided three years in Philadelphia, and then settled in Watertown, Wis. In the presidential canvass of 1856 he delivered speeches in German in behalf of the Republican party, and in the following year he was an unsuccessful candidate for lieutenant-governor of Wisconsin. During the contest between Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln for the office of U. S. senator from Illinois in 1858 he delivered his famous "The Language of the Whirlwind" address in the Alsatian language, which was widely published. Soon afterward he removed to Milwaukee and began the practice of law. In 1859-60 he made a lecturist in New England, and aroused attention by a speech in Springfield, Mass., against the ideas and policy of Mr. Douglas. He was a member of the Republican national convention of 1860, and spoke both in English and German during the canvass.
President Lincoln appointed him minister to Spain, but he resigned in December, 1861, in order to enter the army. In April, 1862, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and on 17 June took command of a division in the corps of Gen. Franz Sigel, with which he participated in the second battle of Bull Run. He was made major-general of volunteers, March, 1863, and at the battle of Chancellorsville commanded a division of Gen. Oliver O. Howard's corps. He had temporary command of this corps at Gettysburg, and subsequently took part in the battle of Chattanooga. During the summer of 1865 he visited the southern states, as special commissioner, appointed by President Johnson, for the purpose of examining their condition. In the winter of 1865-66 he was the Washington correspondent of the New York "Tribune," and in the summer of 1866 he removed to Detroit, where he founded the "Post." In 1867 he became editor of the "Westliche Post," a German newspaper published in St. Louis. He was temporary chairman of the Republican national convention in Chicago in 1868, where he moved an amendment to the platform, which was adopted, recommending a general amnesty. In January, 1869, he was chosen U. S. senator from Missouri, for the term ending in 1875. He opposed some of the chief measures of President Grant's administration, and in 1872 took an active part in the organization of the Liberal party, presiding over the convention in Cincinnati that nominated Horace Greeley for the presidency. After the election of 1872 he took an active part in the debates of the Senate in favor of the restoration of special payments and against the continuation of military interference in the south. He advocated the election of Rutherford B. Hayes in the presidential canvass of 1876, and in 1877 President Hayes appointed him secretary of the interior. He introduced competitive examinations for appointments in the interior department, effected various reforms in the Indian service, and adopted systematic measures for the preservation of the forests on the public lands.
After the expiration of the term of President Hayes he became editor of the "Evening Post" in New York city, giving up that place in January, 1884. In the presidential canvass of that year he was one of the leaders of the "Independent" movement, advocating the election of Grover Cleveland. He remained an active member of the civil service reform league. Among his more celebrated speeches are "The Irresistible Conflict" (1858); "The Doom of Slavery" (1860); "The Abolition of Slavery as a War Measure" (1862); and "Eulogy on Charles Sumner" (1874). Of his speeches in the senate, those on the reconstruction measures, against the annexation of Santo Domingo, and on the currency and the national banking system attracted much attention. He has published a volume of speeches (Philadelphia, 1865) and a "Life of Henry Clay" (Boston, 1857).

SCHUSSEL, Christian, artist, b. in Guebwillers, Alsace, 16 April, 1824; d. in Merchantville, N. J., 20 Aug., 1879. He studied under Adolphe Yvon and Paul Delaroche in 1843-52, and then came to the United States. Here, for some time, he resided in New York, then removed to Paris, where he had also followed in France, but later he devoted himself almost entirely to painting. His best-known works are "Clear the Track" (1854); "Franklin before the Lords in Council" (1856); "Men of Progress" (1857), in Cooper institute, New York; "Zeisberger preaching to the Indians" (1859); The Iron-Worker and King Solomon" (1860); "Washington at Valley Forge" (1862); and "Home on Furlong" and "McClellan at Antietam" (1863). About 1863 he was attacked by palsy in the right hand, and in 1865 he went abroad, undergoing severe treatment, with no apparent benefit.
On his return, in 1868, he was elected to fill the seat of John Newbold, who had died, and founded, of drawing and painting in the Pennsylvania academy, which he held until his death. During this period he produced "Queen Esther denouncing Haman," owned by the academy (1869), and "The Alsatian Fair" (1870). Most of the paintings that have been named became widely known through the large prints by John Sartain and other engravers.

SCHUYLER, Peter, first mayor of Albany, b. in Albany, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1652; d. there, 19 Feb., 1724. He was the second son of Philip Schuyler, the first of the family, who emigrated from Amsterdam, and, settling in Albany, became a well-known merchant in that town. The father was ambitious to become a landed proprietor, and at his death in 1683 held property not only in Alb-bany, from which he rose to the rank of colonel, the highest grade conceded to a native of New York. He also received during the same year the office of judge of the court of oyer and terminer, and in October, 1865, was made a justice of the peace. On 22 July, 1868, Albany was incorporated as a city, and Peter Schuyler became its first mayor. He was also chairman of the board of common council, and continued in that office for six years. He was in the habit of saying that he could deal with the savages better than any man of his time. During the difficulties between the French and English on the northern boundary he conducted all negotiations with the Five Nations and other Indians. In 1691 he had command of the army that was sent against the French and Indians, and defeated the invading force from Canada. He was made a member of the council in 1692, and used every effort to relieve the sufferings of the settlers on the frontiers, who were exposed to the ravages of the Indians. In the expedition against Montreal in 1709 he was second in command, and led one of the New York regiments, but, from lack of supplies and proper support, the French were allowed to retreat, and the expedition produced no effect. He continued in his allegiance, looking upon the French as formidable enemies and the English as incompetent protectors, and accordingly an appeal was made to England for means to conquer Canada. Col. Schuyler, accompanied by five chiefs, sailed for England in December, 1709, and was absent for seven months. Queen Anne offered to confine him to the order of knighthood, but he declined, although he accepted a gold snuffbox and some pieces of silver plate as well as a diamond brooch and ear-rings for his wife. In July, 1719, he became president of the council, acting as. governor until the arrival of Peter Burnet in September, 1729. He continued active in the affairs of the colony thereafter until his death. —His nephew, Peter, soldier, b. probably near Newark, N. J., in 1710; d. at Peterborough, his farm (now Newark, N. J.), 7 March, 1762, was left an ample estate by his father, Arent, and, becoming interested in military affairs, qualified himself to assume command of troops should the necessity occur. When it was determined to invade Canada, he was authorized to take command of the army assembled under the direction of a regiment that became known as the "Jersey Blues." He arrived in Albany early in September, and, although the expedition was abandoned, he was assigned to Fort Clinton, in Saratoga, which he held until 1747, when lack of provisions compelled its abandonment. The peace of Aix la Chapelle in 1748 terminated the war, and he returned to his home in New Jersey. In 1754 the war was again renewed, and, taking the field at the head of his regiment, he was stationed at Oswego, where, in 1756, he and one half of his regiment were captured by Gen. Montcalm. He was taken to Montreal and then to Quebec, where he remained until October, 1757, when he was released on parole. While in prison he spent his money liberally in caring for his fellow-captives, buying the freedom of the Indians, and providing food for his countrymen at his own residence, also supplying them with clothing. He returned to New York, where he was engaged in mercantile pursuits. He died a few years later.

—Aaron, a descendant of Arent, the first Peter's brother, educator, b. in Seneca county, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1828, was educated at Seneca academy, Ohio, of which he was principal from 1851 till 1862, and from the latter year until 1875 he was professor of mathematics in Baldwin university, Ohio. From 1875 till 1885 he was president of that university, and he is now (1888) vice-president and professor of mathematics and astronomy in Kansas Wesleyan university, Salina, Kan. He has written "A Treatise on Analytic Geometry," Wesleyan university in 1869, and that of L. D. from Otterbein university in 1875. He has published "Higher Arithmetic" (New York, 1860); "Principles of Logic" (Cincinnati, 1869); "Complete Algebra" (1870); "Surveying and Navigation" (1873); "Elements of Geometry" (1876); "Empirical and Rational Psychology" (1889); and has written "A Treatise on Analytic Geometry" (1887).
Anthony's son, Montcgomery, journalist, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 19 Aug., 1843, entered Hobart college in 1858, but was not graduated. He became connected with the New York World in 1860, and served with the 3rd New York until 1863, when he joined the editorial staff of the New York "Times." Mr. Schuyler has given special study to architecture, and has published critical papers on that art in " Scribner's Magazine," "Harper's Magazine," "The American Architect," and similar periodicals, as well as occasional poems. In connection with William C. Goff, he edited "The Brooklyn Bridge" (New York, 1885).—George Washington, great-grandson of the first Peter's brother, Philip, state official, b. in Stillwater, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1810; d. in Ithaca, N. Y., 1 Feb., 1898, was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1857, and at first studied theology, but then engaged in business in Ithaca, N. Y. In 1833-5 he was treasurer of the state, after which, on 3 Jan., 1866, he was appointed superintendent of the banking department of New York, and served until February, 1870. He was elected to the assembly in 1875, was chairman of its committee on banks and banking, and during his membership obtained the passage of the general savings-bank law, and of a law for the protection of railroads. He was elected to Congress on 1 Jan., 1876, till May, 1880, he was auditor of the capital department, and he was the first to propose making the canals free waterways by the abolition of tolls, which was subsequently effected by constitutional amendment. Mr. Schuyler was a trustee of Cornell university from its foundation, and its treasurer in 1868-74. He was the author of "Colonial New York: Philip Schuyler and his Family" (2 vols., New York, 1885).—George Washington's son, Engrace, diplomat, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1840; d. in Venice, Italy, 16 July, 1890, was graduated at Yale and at Columbia law-school, after which he practised law, and devoted his leisure to literary pursuits. He entered the diplomatic service of the United States in 1868, and was consul at Moscow in 1867-79, and at Reval in 1869-70, and secretary of legation at St. Petersburg in 1870-7. While holding the last place he was on several occasions acting chargé d'affaires, and in 1873, during a leave of absence, made a journey of eight months through Russian Turkestan, Khokan, and Bokhara. He became secretary of legation and consul-general in Constantinople in 1876, during the summer of which year he was sent to investigate the Turkish massacres in Bulgaria, and made an extended report to his government, which did much to influence the subsequent history of that part of Turkey. In 1878 he was sent to Birmingham as consul, and a year later he was transferred to Rome as consul-general, after which, in 1880, he became chargé d'affaires and consul-general in that city. At Saragossa, where he was a member of the United States to conclude and sign commercial and consular treaties with Romamia and Servia. From 1882 till 1884 he was minister resident and consul-general to Greece, Servia, and Romamia, and he then returned to the United States, where he resumed his literary work, and also lectured. He was elected a corresponding member of the Royal Academy, and also to the London, Russian, Italian, and American geographical societies, and decorations were presented to him by the governments of Russia, Greece, Romamia, Servia, and Bulgaria. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Williams in 1882, and by Yale in 1885. In addition to contributions to magazines and reviews in the United States and England, he edited John A. Porter's "Selections from the Kalevala" (New York, 1865); translated Ivan Turgénieff's "Fathers and Sons" (1887); and Leo Tolstoy's "The Cossacks: a tale of the Caucasus" (1875); and was the translator of "Turkestan: Notes of a Journey in Russian Turkestan, Khokan, Bokhara, and Kuldja" (1876); "Peter the Great, Emperor of Russia" (2 vols., 1884); and "American Diplomacy and the Furtherance of Commerce" (1886).—Schuyler, Philip John, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 22 Nov., 1733; d. there, 18 Nov., 1804. He was the second son of John, nephew of Peter. He studied at Schools in Albany, and received his higher education in New Rochelle, N. Y., where he was placed under the care of a Huguenot minister. In 1753, at the opening of the last French and Indian war, he was authorized by James De Lancy, acting governor of the province, to recruit a company for the army, and he was commissioned its captain on 18 June, 1755. His company served under General Phineas Lyman, and took part in the battle of Lake George on 18 Sept., 1755. Schuyler spent the ensuing winter at Fort Edward, and in the spring of 1756 accompanied Col. John Bradstreet to Oswego as commissary. In an attack that was made on the colonial force on their return by a superior number, he showed unusual ability and military skill. The incapacity of the British generals and apparent indifference of the authorities in London led to his resigning from the army in 1757, but he was frequently consulted in an advisory capacity and at times in providing supplies for the army. In the spring of 1758, at the earnest solicitation of Bradstreet, he joined the army again as his deputy commissary, with the rank of major, and served until the close of the campaign. Much important business was transacted directly by him, owing to Bradstreet's feeble health, and in 1761 he went to England, as the latter's agent, to settle accounts with the home government. After the peace of 1763 he returned to the management of his private business. His property was large, and his estate in Saratoga, with its timber, which he transported down the Hudson on his own vessels to New York. He also built a flax-mill, the first of its kind in the country, for which he received a medal from the Society for promoting arts. In 1764 he was appointed by the general assembly of New York a commissioner to manage the controversy on the part of his province respecting the boundary-line between that colony and Massachusetts lay, and later he was concerned in the settlement of the similar difficulty between New York and the New Hampshire grants. He was appointed colonel of a new regiment of militia in the territory lying north of Albany, and in 1768 was chosen to represent Albany in the colonial assembly. He advocated the bold measures of the times in support of the rights of the colonists in spite of the majority, and came to be the acknowledged leader of the opposition. He inspired hope and courage among his constituents, and it was on his nomination in 1770 that Edmund Burke became agent in England for the colony of New York. He was a delegate to the Continental congress that convened in Philadelphia in May, 1775, by which he was placed on a committee with General Washington to draw up rules and regulations for the army. On the recommendation of the Provincial congress of New York he was appointed on 19 June one of the four major-generals that were named by congress.

He accompanied Washington from Philadelphia, and was assigned by him to the command of the northern department of New York. He succeeded to Albany, where he once engaged in the difficult task of organizing an army for the invasion of Canada. Troops were collected, but lack of arms, ammunition, and pay delayed any movement. There was also considerable ill feeling between the commanders of the colonial forces as to questions of relative rank, particularly at first between Ethan Allen and Gen. Gates, and in New York Gen. Schuyler was in the habit of placing that fort and Crown Point in a state of defence. Subsequently the failure of Schuyler's health led to his transferring the command to Gen. Richard Montgomery. He then returned to Albany, where he continued his exertions in raising troops and forwarding supplies to the army. After the death of Montgomery he made every effort to reinforce the American army. Early in 1776 he directed an expedition to Johnstown, where he seized the military stores that had been collected by Sir John Johnson. Jealousy existed among the officers at the front, and the New England contingent, especially, was dissatisfied with his leader, in consequence of which Gen. John Thomas was directed by congress to take command of the army in the field, while Schuyler was continued in Albany exercising the general direction of affairs, and especially the duties of quartermaster-general and commissary-general. During the early part of 1776 he was kept continually busy by the movements of Sir John Johnson and other Tories in the Mohawk valley. Many complaints were sent to him by his soldiers, as well as to Gen. Washington and congress. Schuyler's perfect knowledge of the situation, the topography of the country, and the available supplies, led him to doubt the expediency of continuing the American forces in Canada; but, in opposition to his recommendation, congress persisted in its action, and the weak army under Gen. Thomas, suffering with smallpox, oppressed with want, and lacking in discipline, was kept on the frontier. Meanwhile a strong British force, under Gen. John Burgoyne, had arrived in Canada, and the American army had fallen back on Crown Point greatly reduced in numbers. In May, Gen. Horatio Gates was ordered to the command of the army in Canada, which had been made vacat by the death of Gen. Thomas. On reaching Albany, believing himself in command of the department, he issued orders that conflicted with those of Schuyler, in consequence of which the latter agreed to co-operate with him, and meanwhile submitted the question of precedence to congress, through Gen. Washington. That body recommended that the officers act in harmony with each other. Schuyler occupied himself at this time in negotiations with the Six Nations, in virtue of his office of Indian commissioner, and in fitting out a fleet for operations on Lake Champlain. Gates was not satisfied with the action of congress, and began to intrigue for the removal of Schuyler, who, on 14 Sept., 1776, formally offered his resignation, but congress declared that it could not dispense with his service, and his president. John Hancock, requested him to continue in command. Great credit is due to Schuyler for conducting the affairs of this department under peculiarly adverse conditions; and the proffer of his resignation was the result of persistent neglect on the part of congress to take action on his appeals for supplies and men, as well as their habit of conferring directly with Gates, who openly used his influence among the New England delegates to have himself confirmed as commanding general. In spite of chronic illness, Schuyler acquiesced in the action of congress, continued to co-operate with Gates and in preparing defenses to meet Burgoyne, whose invasion was confidently expected. Early in 1777 he was chosen to represent New York in the Continental congress, and was appointed chief of the military in the state of Pennsylvania. He then made his appeal to congress concerning letters of censure that had been sent to him from that body, and the commander-in-chief, in that he was directed to proceed to the Northern department and take command there. Closing his official work in Pennsylvania, where he had rendered excellent service in organizing the militia, Schuyler returned to Albany early in June, and proceeded with his preparations for an attack from Canada. The advance of Burgoyne forced the American armies to retreat until Ticonderoga was evacuated by Gen. Arthur St. Clair on 4 July, his force being wholly inadequate to its defense, and other retrograde movements followed. The great victory at Bennington, however, had been won before 19 Aug., when Gates took command of the army in virtue of a resolution passed by congress on 1 Aug. While this resolution was taken by Gates to have been for some time absent from the army in Philadelphia, using his influence to injure Schuyler, whom he charged with neglect of duty in permitting the evacuation of Fort Ticonderoga. The selection of Gates to the command was made by congress after Washington had declined to act. A committee of investigation was authorized by congress, and congress, on 18 March, 1778, recommended to congress the convention, which declared itself unanimously of opinion that Schuyler was "not guilty of any neglect of duty," and acquitted him "with the highest honor," which proceeding congress tardily confirmed several months later. Schuyler continued with the army in a private capacity until the surrender of Burgoyne. He finally succeeded in effecting his resignation on 19 April, 1779.

Before his vindication by the court-martial he was chosen, in October, 1778, by the New York legislature a representative in congress; but he refused to take his seat until the sentence had been confirmed, after which he was a member of congress until 1781. Meanwhile he continued to act as Indian commissioner, holding councils and making treaties with the different tribes of the Six Nations. Although unwilling to enter active military service again, he was appointed in 1779 to confer with Washington on the state of the Southern department, and divided his time thenceforth until the close of the war between congress and Washington's headquarters, where he became one of the most trusted counselors of the commander-in-chief. In 1789 he was elected state senator from the western district of New York, and he served until 1784, again from 1786 till 1790, and finally from 1792 till 1797. Throughout his political life he was a Federalist, and with Alexander Hamilton and John Jay shared Schuyler, Frederick, explorer, b. in Galena, III., 29 Sept., 1849; d. in Portland, Oregon, 2 Nov., 1892. After graduation at the U. S. military academy at West Point, he joined the regular army, and was stationed at garrison and frontier duty until 1877. He also studied law and medicine, and was admitted to the bar of Nebraska in 1875, and received his medical degree at Bellevue hospital medical college, New York, in 1876. On hearing the story of Capt. Thomas F. Barry, who, while on a whaling expedition in the Repulse bay in 1871-73, was visited by Esquimaux who described a stranger that had travelled through that region several years before, and who had buried papers in a cavern, where silver spoons and other relics had been found, Lieut. Schwatka determined to search for traces of Sir John Franklin's party, and, obtaining leave of absence, fitted out an expedition. On 19 June, 1878, accompanied by William H. Gilder (q. v.), as second in command, he sailed in the "Esmeralda" for King William's Land. The party returned on 22 Sept., 1880, having discovered and buried many of the skeletons of Sir John Franklin's party, and removed much of the mystery of its fate. Lieut. Schwatka found the grave of Lieut. John Irving, 3d officer of the "Terrible," and, in addition to many interesting relics, a paper which was a copy of the Crozier record that was found in 1876 by Lieut. William R. B.額, 3d officer in Sir Leopold McClintock's expedition, and which contained two records, the latter, under date of 25 April, 1848, stating the death of Sir John Franklin on 7 June, 1847. This expedition was also marked by the longest sledge-journey on record—3,251 statute miles, during which a branch of Béck's river was discovered, which Lieut. Schwatka named for President Hayes. Afterward he explored the course of the Yukon river in Alaska, and rejoined his regiment in July, 1884. In August of that year he resigned the commission of 1st lieutenant, 3d cavalry, to which he had been appointed in March, 1879. He commanded the New York "Times" Alaskan exploring expedition of 1886. Lieut. Schwatka had received the Requête Arctic medal from the Société Philomypique of New York (1867); the Franklin medal from the geographical society of Paris, and a medal from the Imperial geographical society of Russia; and was an honorary member of the Geographical societies of Bremen, Geneva, and Rome. He is the author of "Along Alaska's Great River" (New York, 1885); "Nimrod in the North" (1885); and "The Children of the North." Col. William H. Gilder (New York, 1881): "The Franklin Search under Lieut. Schwatka" (Edinburgh and London, 1881); and "Als Eskimo unter den Eskimo," by Henry Klutschak (Leipsic, 1881).
SCHWEINITZ, Lewis Davis von, botanist, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 13 Feb., 1870; d. there, 8 Feb., 1884. In 1798 he went to Germany and was educated in the Moravian college and theological seminary, returning in 1812. He filled important ecclesiastical offices at Salem, N. C., and subsequently at Bethlehem. From early boyhood he devoted himself to the study of botany. By his own researches he added more than 1,200 new species to the catalogue of the botany of the United States, and prepared a monograph of American fungi, which had previously been but little studied. He was a member of various learned societies in the United States, Germany, and France. The University of Kiel, in Denmark, conferred upon him the degree of Ph. D. A new genus of plant was named Schweinitzia in his honor, and while a resident of Salem he was elected president of the University of North Carolina, which honor he declined because it involved relinquishing work in the Moravian church. His herbarium, which comprised at the time of his death the largest private collection of plants in the United States, he bequeathed to the Academy of natural sciences at Philadelphia. His principal works are "Conspicue Fungorum Americeno-Daniacorum in America Boreali Medietudinem" (Philadelphia, 1832). See a "Memoir of Lewis David von Schweinitz" (Philadelphia, 1835), and a "Sketch of the Life and Scientific Work of L. D. von Schweinitz," in the "Journal of the Elisha Mitchell Scientific Society of the University of North Carolina." (Raleigh, 1880).—His son, Emil Adolphus (de Schweinitz), Moravian bishop, b. in Salem, N. C., 26 Oct., 1819; d. there, 3 Nov., 1879, was a graduate both of the American and of the German Moravian theological seminaries. After filling various ecclesiastical offices in Pennsylvania and North Carolina, among them that of principal of the Salem female academy, he was appointed president of the governing board of the southern district of the Moravian church and corresponding bishop of Pennsylvania and Delaware, and subsequently president of the Moravian church in 1874. He attended three general synods in succession, at Herrnhut, Saxony, in 1857, 1869, and 1879, and on the last two occasions was constituted one of the vice-presidents of that body.—Another son, Edmund Alexander (de Schweinitz), Moravian bishop, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 20 March, 1835; d. there, 18 Dec., 1887, was graduated at the theological seminary in his native place, and then continued his studies at the University of Berlin. He began his ministry in 1859 and had charge successively of churches at Philadelphia, Lebanon, Philadelphia, Littitz, and Bethlehem. On 28 Aug., 1870, he was consecrated to the episcopacy at Bethlehem, and at his death he was the presiding bishop of the northern district of the Moravian church. In 1871 Congress conferred upon him the degree of S. T. D. He was appointed a delegate to the general synod that met at Herrnhut, Saxony, in 1857; and the one that convened at the same place in 1879, at which he was present in his official capacity, elected him its president, an honor that was never before conferred upon an American bishop. He originated in 1860 the "North American and Indian Herald," the weekly journal of his church, and from 1867 till 1881 he was president of the theological seminary. Besides various sermons and essays and numerous cyclopaedia articles, he was the author of "The Moravian Manual" (Philadelphia, 1859; 2d enlarged ed., Bethlehem, Pa., 1869); "The Moravian Episcopate" (Bethlehem, 1865; 2d revised ed., London, 1874); "The Life and Times of David Zeisberger, the Western Pioneer and Apostle of the Indians" (Philadelphia, 1870); "Some of the Fathers of the American Moravian Church" (Bethlehem, 1881); and "The History of the Church as an Institute for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," the second series of which work, comprising the "History of the Renewed Unitas Fratrum," was engaged at the time of his death.

SCOFIELD, Glenni William, jurist, b. in Chautauqua county, N. Y., 11 March, 1817; d. in Warren, Pa., 30 Aug., 1891. After graduation at Hamilton, he removed to Pennsylvania, and was admitted to the bar in 1843. He was a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1850-51 and of the state senate in 1857-3, and in 1861 was appointed president judge of the 16th judicial district. He was then elected to congress as a Republican, and served from 7 Dec., 1863, till 3 March, 1875. He took an active part in the reconstruction measures, and served on important committees, being chairman of that on naval affairs. On 29 March, 1875, he was appointed register of the treasury, and he served until 1881, when he was appointed an associate justice of the U. S. court of claims. Hamilton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1884.

SCOLLARD, Clinton, poet, b. in Clinton, Oneida co., N. Y., 18 Sept., 1801. After graduation at Hamilton, he studied for two years in Harvard, and travelled in Europe in 1866-7, spending several months in Cambridge university before visiting Greece, Egypt, and Palestine. He has published two volumes of poems, "Pictures in Song" (New York, 1884) and "With Reed and Lyre" (Boston, 1886).

SCORESBY, William, English explorer, b. in Crotton, Yorkshire, 5 Oct., 1790; d. in Towyn, 21 March, 1857. His father, of the same name, was a daring and successful whale-fisher. The son followed the sea, and in 1806 was chief mate on the voyage in which his father reached the highest latitude (61° 13' 42") that had then been attained on sea. During the intervals between voyages, with the sanction of his father, he devoted himself to the study of the science of sea-faring. He was sent to Edinburgh university. During his voyages he made many observations on the electric phenomena of the arctic regions, and was instrumental in inducing Sir Joseph Banks to send out a series of expeditions for the discovery of the north pole. Young Scoresby continued in the whaling service after his father's death, and, when he had made seventeen voyages to Spitzbergen or Greenland, he published "An Account of the Arctic Regions, with a History and Description of the Northern Whale Fishery" (2 vols., 1829). This work added largely to science in the departments of physical geography, natural history, and magnetic observation. In 1822 he made an exploring voyage along the east coast of Greenland, which was then comparatively unknown, and published the results in a "Journal of a Voyage to the Northern Whale Fishery, including Researches and Discoveries on the Eastern Coast of West Greenland, made in the Summer of 1822, in the Ship 'Baffin,' of Liverpool" (Edinburgh, 1823). On his return to Liverpool he received the intelligence of the death of his wife, and spent the remaining years of his life in a monastic life. In 1824 he was elected a fellow of the Royal society, and he was subsequently made corresponding member of the Institute of France. When about forty years of age, he deemed it his duty to become a clergyman, and accordingly entered himself at Cambridge, took his degree of B. D. in 1834, and that of D. D. in 1839. He first labored as chaplain of the Mariners' church at Liverpool, then removed to Exeter, and afterward became vicar of Bradford. After several years, through his health failing, he resigned his charge, and retired to Torquay, but continued his philanthropic efforts, and his physical researches, the latter mainly in regard to terrestrial magnetism and its relation to navigation. For the further and better prosecution of these researches, in 1847 Dr. Scoresby made a voyage to the United States, and in 1853 to Australia in the "Aristarchus". He named, Dr. Scoresby wrote "Discourses to Seamen" (1831); "Magnetical Observations" (3 parts, 1839-52); "American Factories and their Female Operatives" (1843); "Lectures on Zoistic Magnetism" (1849); "Sabbaths in the Arctic Regions" (1850); "The Franklin Expedition" (1850); "My Father: being Records of the Adventurous Life of the late William Scoresby, Esq., of Whitby" (1851); and "Voyage to Australia and Round the World for Magnetic Research," edited by Archibald Smith (1859). His life has been written by R. E. Scoresby-Jackson, M. D. (London, 1861).

SCOTT, Andrew, Scottish poet, b. in Bowden, Roxburghshire, in 1737; d. there, 22 May, 1839. He was of humble parentage, and, after being employed in several trades, as a printer, and as editor of periodicals and newspapers, he took part in the American revolution, and became a representative in the Pennsylvania legislature, and was appointed a judge of the superior court of the state of Pennsylvania in 1803, a post which he held until his death. He was a consistent friend of liberty, and while governor of Pennsylvania, he was a member of the committee that drew up the Declaration of Independence of the United States. He died in New York, 1839.

SCOTT, Charles, soldier, b. in Cumberland county, Va., in 1753; d. 22 Oct., 1813. He served as a non-commissioned officer in Braddock's defeat in 1755, and at the beginning of the struggle for independence, came into the army in Maryland, or perhaps the Mariposas, in 1773. In 1776 he was a private in the 3d Virginia battalion, and was elevated to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He served at the Battle of Monmouth, and was captured by the British. He was exchanged, and served in the Indian campaign of 1782. He was killed at the Battle of Longwood in 1782.

SCOTT, Edward, lawyer (1774-1832), became a well-known lawyer in Tennessee, served as judge of the state circuit court in 1754-56, and published "Laws of the State of Tennessee" (2 vols., Knoxville, 1821).—Edward's son, Charles, lawyer, b. in Knoxville, Tenn., 12 Nov., 1811; d. in Jackson, Miss., 30 May, 1855. He was graduated at the University of Virginia, where he married, but he afterward removed to Jackson, Miss., and formed a partnership with George S. Verger. In 1852 he was elected chancellor of the state. His decision in the case of Johnston vs. the State of Mississippi, establishing the liability of the state for the payment of the bonds of the Union bank, attracted much attention. In 1859 Judge Scott was succeeded by Judge Carter. He was an active Freemason, and published "Ancient and Modern Masonic Books." He was a member of the Tennessee legislature, and was a delegate to the convention of 1861.

SCOTT, Dred, slave, b. in Missouri about 1810; d. after 1857. He was a negro slave, and about 1834 was taken by his master, Dr. Emerson, an army surgeon, from Missouri to Rock Island, Ill., and then to Fort Snelling, in what is now the Wisconsin territory. Here he married, and two children were born to him. On his return to Missouri he sued in a local court in St. Louis to recover his freedom and that of his family, since he had been taken by his master to live in a free state. Scott won his case, but his master now appealed to the state supreme court, which, in 1832, reversed the decision of the lower court. Shortly afterward the family were sold to a citizen of New York, John F. A. Sandford, and, as this afforded a ground for bringing a similar action in a Federal court, Scott sued again for freedom, this time in the U. S. circuit court in St. Louis in May, 1854. The case was lost, but an appeal was made to the U. S. supreme court, and, the importance of the matter being realized by a few eminent lawyers, several offered to take part in the argument. Those on Scott's side were Montgomery Blair and George T. Curtis, while opposed to him were Reverdy Johnson and Henry S. Geyer. None of these asked for compensation. The case was tried in 1856, and the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. A new opinion was prepared by Justice Nelson, but before its delivery it was withdrawn by the court that, in view of the importance of the case and its bearing on the whole slavery question, which was then violently agitating the country, Chief-Justice Taney should write a more elaborate one. Taney's opinion was read, 6 March, 1857, two days after the inauguration of President Buchanan, and excited intense interest throughout the country. It was in favor of the constitution, and in favor of slavery. It affirmed, among other things, that the act of congress that prohibited slavery north of latitude 36° 30' was unconstitutional and void. Thomas H. Benton said of this decision that it made a new departure in the working of the government, declaring slavery to be the organic law of the land, while freedom was the exception. The passage that was most quoted is that which unfavorably commented upon, was that in which Taney described the theory of the negroes at the formation of the constitution, saying: "They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit." Afterward Scott and his family passed by inheritance.
to the family of Calvin C. Chaffee, a member of congress from Massachusetts, and on 26 May, 1857, they were married in St. Louis by Taylor Blow, to whom Mr. Chaffee had conveyed them for that purpose. See Benjamin C. Howard’s “Report of the Decision of the Supreme Court, and the Opinions of the Judges thereof, in the Case of Dred Scott” (Washington, 1857); Thomas H. Benton’s “Historical and Legal Examination of the Decision of the Dred Scott Case” (New York, 1860); Joel Parker’s “Personal Liberty Laws and Slavery in the Territories: Case of Dred Scott” (Boston, 1861); and “Abraham Lincoln, a History,” by John Hay and John G. Nicolay. A portrait of Dred Scott, probably the only one in existence, painted from an old photograph, is in the possession of the Missouri historical society.

SCOTT, Gustavus, lawyer, b. in Prince William county, Va. 4 d. in Washington, D. C., in 1891. His father, Rev. James Scott, a Scotchman, became a minister of the Episcopal church and came to this country about 1750. Gustavus was educated at King’s college, Aberdeen, Scotland, and after his friend, Sir Robert Eden, was made governor of Maryland, removed to that province and practised law there for some time. In 1816, a number of people of Maryland decided to send deputies from all the counties to a convention to be held in Annapolis. 22 June, 1774, he was sent as a delegate from Somerset, and participated in all its subsequent deliberations down to the adoption of the first constitution and the organization of the state government in 1777. He was a member of the Association of the freedom of Somerset, which decided in July, 1775, to throw off the proprietary power and assume a provisional government, and his signature is attached to the original pledge that now (1898) hangs in the state-house at Annapolis. He was a member of the convention that framed the first constitution of Maryland. After the formation of the state government he removed to Dorchester county, and represented it in the assembly in 1780 and again in 1784, when he was elected a delegate to the Continental congress and served till 1785. He was one of the originators of the Potomac canal company in 1784, and one of the committee of the Maryland legislature, to whom was referred the claim of James Rumsey (q. v.), for the exclusive privilege of making and selling steam engines in Maryland. He voted in favor of Rumsey’s claim, and the bill was passed. He was also one of the original commissioners appointed to superintend the erection of the capitol buildings at Washington, and when the state of Maryland lent the government several thousand dollars for the purpose, the credit of the general government was so low that the state required Scott and two others to give to it their individual bonds as security.

SCOTT, Gustavus Hall, naval officer, b. in Fairfax county, Va., 13 June, 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., 23 March, 1882. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1 Aug., 1838, became passed midshipman, 11 June, 1834, and made two cruises in the West Indies in the “Vandah” in 1835-37 and 1839-40, in which he participated in the Seminole war. He was also present off Charleston, S. C., during the nullification excitement. He was commissioned lieutenant, 37 Feb., 1841, and was flag lieutenant of the Pacific squadron in the frigate “St. Lawrence” in 1832-3. He was commissioned commander, 10 Nov., 1845, and a deputy commodore in 1856-59. When the civil war began he resisted the efforts of partisans in his native state to make him join the Confederates. In June, 1861, he commanded the steamer “Keystone State,” went in pursuit of the Confederate privateer “Sunkist,” and capturing the steamer “Sailor” off Tampa, towed her to Philadelphia. He commanded the steamer “Maranta” in the operations with the army in James river, rendered valuable service in saving stores that were left by the army at Aquia creek, was on the blockade, and had numerous engagements with Confederate batteries in the vicinity of Norfolk. He was commissioned captain, 4 Nov., 1863, and commanded the steamer “De Soto,” in which he captured several blockade-runners in 1864. Subsequently he took charge of the steam sloop “Canandaigua” on the blockade, and was senior officer at the surrender of Charleston, S. C., in 1865. He was a member of the examining board for the admission of volunteer officers to the regular navy in 1865, served as light-house inspector in 1869-71, and was promoted to commodore, 10 Feb., 1869, and to rear-admiral, 14 Feb., 1875. He was then commander-in-chief of the North Atlantic squadron until 13 June, 1874, when he was retired, having reached the age of sixty-two years.

SCOTT, Irving Murray, mechanical engineer, b. in Beltsville, Md., 17 Feb., 1824; d. in Dec., 1887. He was educated at Milton academy, Md., and the Baltimore mechanics’ institute, and in 1854 entered the manufactory of Obel Hussey, the inventor of reaping-machines, where he made rapid progress in the machinist’s art, and perfected himself in the different methods of working in iron and wood. In 1857 he gained admittance to the iron-works of a Baltimore firm. There he soon became an expert draughtsman, and was placed in charge of the construction of stationary and fire engines. He also devoted all his leisure moments to reading and study. In 1858 he was engaged as draughtsman at the Union iron-works, San Francisco, Cal., where he remained until 1862. About that time the construction of improved quartz-mining machinery became one of the most important branches of mechanical industry in that state. Desiring to become practically acquainted with it, he spent a year at the Miners’ foundry in the same city, returning to the Union works in 1863, when he was made superintendent. In 1865 he became a partner, and in 1867 the business was reorganized as the Union iron-works and Co. Soon afterward the new firm erected extensive works at Petreoro. These were constructed under the immediate supervision of Mr. Scott, and he designed the machinery by means of which the treasures of the Comstock mines have been extracted, including that used in the pumping, milling, reducing, and refining works, in connection with James A. Fitch and William H. Fairchild, mining engineers. He has also invented the Scott and Eckart and Scott and O’Neil cut-off engines, a Union heater, a safety-valve check, and an air-valve for compressor. Mr. Scott has been president of the Mechanics’ institute and of the Art association of San Francisco during three terms each. He is a regent of the University of California and a trustee of the University San Francisco.

SCOTT, James, poet, b. in Langside, Scotland, in 1806; d. in Newark, N. J., in 1857. He studied at Glasgow and Belfast, emigrated to this country in 1832, became a lexicant in 1834, and was pastor at German Valley and Newark, N. J. He was given the degree of D. D. by Lafayette in 1844. He was a first cousin of Scott, the English poet, and Robert Pollok in his “Life” (New York, 1849), and before his death completed a narrative poem called “The Guardian Angel” (1859).
SCOTT, John, clergyman, b. in Washington county, Pa., 27 Oct., 1820. He was educated in the common schools and under private tutors, entered the ministry of the Methodist Protestant church in 1842, and has been a member of almost every general conference of that denomination since 1854. He has edited the "Methodist Recorder" in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1844–70, and since 1879, and also conducted the "Missionary Sunday-School Journal" in that city in 1832–4, and the "Home Companion" in Cincinnati. At the same time, till 1884, he was editor of the Sunday-school publications of his church. Washington college, Pa., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1869. Dr. Scott is the author of "Pulpit Echoes" (Cincinnati, 1873) and "The Land of Saginaw, or Sketches of Patriarchal Life and Times" (Pittsburg, 1880), and has also written an introduction to Rev. Dr. George Brown's "Recollections of an Itinerant Life" (Cincinnati, 1866), and published various discourses.

SCOTT, John, senator, b. in Alexandria, Pa., 14 July, 1824; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 Nov., 1896. His father was a landholder in Huntington county, Pa., and a member of congress 1829–31. The son received a common-school education, pursued a classical course with private tutors, and then studied law in Chambersburg, was admitted to the bar in 1846, and practised in Huntington. He was prosecuting attorney in 1846–9, and a member of the board of revenue commissioners in 1851, served in the legislature in 1852, and from 1856 till 1875 sat in the Senate, having been chosen a Republican. In the Senate, Mr. Scott, on 17 May, 1872, moved the "enforcement bill," authorizing the president to suspend the habeas corpus act in states where "ku-klux" outrages should occur, and made a speech in its favor. On the expiration of his senatorial term he removed to Pittsburg, Pa., and became general counsel of the Pennsylvania company, and subsequently he was made general solicitor of the Pennsylvania railroad company in Philadelphia, serving for eight years.

SCOTT, John Morin, patriot, b. in New York in 1730; d. there, 14 Sept., 1784. His grandfather, John, the second son of Sir John Scott, bart., of Auchen, Scotland, came to this country, was made a citizen of New York in 1724, and purchased Fort Hunter, on Mohawk river. John Morin was his only child. He was graduated at Yale in 1746, studied law, and was an early opponent of British aggression, with voice and pen. He was one of the founders of the Sons of Liberty, and his bold advocacy of extreme measures cost him an election to the Continental congress in 1774. He was one of the chief members of the New York general committee in 1775, a delegate to the Provincial congress of that year, and on 8 June, 1776, was made a brigadier-general. He was with his brigade in the battle of Long Island, but retired from military service in March, 1777, and became secretary of state of New York, which office he held till 1789. In 1780–3 he was a member of congress.

His only son, Lewis Allaire, succeeded him in the secretariat.—Lewis Allaire's only son, John Morin, lawyer, b. in New York city, 25 Oct., 1789; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 April, 1858, lost his father early in life, and was taken by his mother to Philadelphia. He was graduated at Princeton in 1803, after pursuing higher studies there for a year longer under the superintendence of William Rawle, and was admitted to the bar. After losing his moderate fortune in a mercantile venture, he entered into active practice, and became a successful lawyer. He served in the war of 1812 as 1st lieutenant of cavalry, and in 1815 was chosen to the legislature, where he served several terms. He served afterward for many years a member of the Philadelphia city council, a delegate to the constitutional convention of 1837, and in 1841–42 served as mayor of the city. He delivered many orations and addresses, including one before the Washington benevolent society (Philadelphia, 1815).

SCOTT, John Rudolph, actor, b. in Philadelphia, 17 Oct., 1809; d. there, 2 March, 1869. He made his "debut" at the New York Park theatre in the part of Morin in "Sojourn," and after playing at various theatres, he gradually rose to distinction in leading tragic roles. As a robust actor he almost rivaled Edwin Forrest for a time, and contended with him for popularity. His representations of King Lear and Sir Giles Overreach were forcible and scholarly performances. In 1847 Scott went to England, playing at the Princess theatre in London for short time, where he opened as Sir Giles Overreach. Some of the best London critics were delighted with his efforts, but the general public was not attracted. On his return to the United States he became a member of the New York Bowery theatre, and later joined the players at the Chatham street National theatre. Diverting his attention from study to vote performances of melodramatic and sensational parts, Scott soon became careless and neglectful, lapsing into the condition of a conventional performer. At the last his most successful roles were those of sailors and pirates; William, in the nautical play of "Black-Eyed Susan," was one of his favorite parts.

SCOTT, Julian, artist, b. in Johnson, Lamoille county, Vt., 13 Feb., 1846. At the opening of the civil war, in 1861, he entered the army as a private, and after his discharge and return home, he opened a studio in Philadelphia, and was largely employed in making war scenes. In 1863 he went to Europe, and became a student at the Royal Academy, London, and subsequently studied under Emmanuel Leutze until 1868. He first exhibited at the Academy of design in 1870, and was elected an associate the following year. He was chosen a life-fellow of the American geographical society in 1873. Among his works, mostly pictures of army life, are "Rear-Guard at White Oak Swamp," owned by the Union league club (1869–70); "Battle of Cedar Creek," in the state-house at Montpelier, Vt. (1871–2); "Battle of Golding's Farm" (1871); "The Recall" (1875); "On Board the 'Hartford'" (1874); "Old Records" (1875); "Duel of Burr and Hamilton" (1876); "Reserves awaiting Order" (1874); "In the Cornfield at Antietam" (1875); "Charge at Petersburg" (1882); "The War is Over" (1885); and "The Blue and the Gray" (1886).

SCOTT, Levi, M. E. bishop, b. near Odessa, Del., 11 Oct., 1802; d. there, 13 July, 1882. In April, 1826, after being licensed as a local preacher, he became a member of the Philadelphia conference. Without much early education, he was a diligent student, and a preacher of remarkable clearness, force, and thoroughness. After filling several pastorates, he was appointed presiding elder in 1864.
This office, then one of very great influence, he filled for two years, and he then returned to the pastorate. From 1840 till 1842 he was principal of Dickinson grammar-school. In 1848 he was made one of the agents of the Methodist book concern in New York city. This position he held for four years, when at the general conference of 1852, at Boston, Mass., he was elected and ordained bishop. The degree of M.A. was conferred upon him by Wesleyan university in 1840, and that of D.D. by Delaware college. He fixed his residence, after he was elected bishop, at Olean, Del. He was very industrious in the discharge of the duties of his office, and had the reputation of great piety. He lived to fourscore, and for several years was ensheathed in mind and body.

SCOTT, Martin, soldier, b. in Bennington, Vt., 17 Jan., 1788; d. near Molina del Rey, Mexico, 8 Sept., 1847. He was appointed a lieutenant in the army in April, 1814, became captain in the 5th infantry in August, 1828, was brevetted major for gallantry at Palo Alto and Rosaca de la Palma, 9 May, 1846, and was promoted major on 29 June. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for services at Monterey, where he led his regiment, and he was killed at its head in the battle of Monterey. Mr. Scott had been a famous as a marksman from early youth, and it is of him that the well-known incident is related of the coon that said: "You need not fire, I'll come down."

SCOTT, Orange, clergyman, b. in Brookfield, Vt., 13 Feb., 1800; d. in Newark, N. J., 31 July, 1874. His parents removed to Canada in his early childhood, and remained there about 20 years, then afterward returned to Vermont. The son's early education was limited to thirteen months' schooling at different places. He entered the Methodist ministry in 1822, and became one of the best-known clergymen of his denomination in New England. He was presiding elder of the Springfield district, Mass., in 1830-4, and of Providence district, R. I., in 1834-5. Mr. Scott was active as a controversialist. About 1833 he became an earnest anti-slavery worker, and his zeal in this cause brought much unpopularity upon him. His bishop preferred charges against him in 1838, before the New England conference, but they were not sustained. Finally, with others, he withdrew from the church in 1844, and on 31 May, 1845, organized the Wesleyan Methodist church in a general convention at Utica, N. Y., of which Mr. Scott was president. Till 1841 he conducted "The True Wesleyan," in advocacy of the principles of the new church, which were opposed both to slavery and to the episcopal form of church government. In 1846 failing health forced him to retire from ministrations. Besides many contributions to the press, he was the author of "An Appeal to the Methodist Episcopal Church" (Boston, 1838). See his life, by the Rev. Lucius C. Matlack (New York, 1847).

SCOTT, Richard, colonist, b. in Gloucester, Suffolk, England, in 1607; d. in Providence, R. I., about 1650. He was a lineal descendent of John Baliol, founder of Baliol college, Oxford. Scott came to Boston in 1634, married Katharine Marbury, sister of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson, about 1637, and soon afterward joined Roger Williams. He was co-proprietor with Williams in the latter's purchase from the Indians, and a signer and the supposed author of the celebrated covenant that was made among the settlers of Rhode Island. In 1657 he became a Quaker, and his wife and daughters were whipped and imprisoned in Boston for their faith. He was a commissioner to Massachusetts in 1645 to settle the controversy with that colony in regard to Shawomet, and a deputy to the assembly in 1656.

SCOTT, Richard William, Canadian senator, b. in Prescott, Ontario, 24 Feb., 1825. He was educated in his native place, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1848. He was mayor of Ottawa in 1852, had a seat in the Canadian assembly from 1857 till 1863, and in the Ontario assembly from 1867 till November, 1873, when he resigned. Mr. Scott was elected speaker of the Ontario assembly, 7 Dec., 1871, but resigned on being appointed a member of the executive council and commissioner of crown lands for that province on the 21st of the same month. He retained this office till 7 Nov., 1873, when he was sworn as a member of the queen's privy council. He was secretary of state in the Mackenzie administration from 6 June, 1874, to 31 Oct., 1875, when he was out of power with his colleagues in office. He acted as minister of finance during the absence of Richard J. Cartright in England in 1874, as minister of inland revenue during the illness of Felix Geoffrion in 1875-6, and as minister of justice during the absence of Edward Blake in England in 1876. He was present at the Centennial exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876 in a official capacity. Mr. Scott was principally instrumental in securing the passage of the separate school law of the province of Ontario, and the Canada temperance act, which was framed by him, and which is known as the "Scott act." He became a member of the Dominion senate, 13 March, 1874, and was a secretary of state in the Laurier administration in 1896.

SCOTT, Robert Kingston, soldier, b. in Armstrong county, Pa., 8 July, 1826. His grandfather fought in the Revolution, and his father in the war of 1812-15. The son received a good education, studied medicine, and began practice in Henry county, Ohio. In October, 1841, he became lieutenant-colonel of the 6th Ohio regiment, of which he was made colonel in 1862. He served at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, and Corinth, led a brigade at Hatchie river, Tenn., commanded the advance of Gen. John A. Logan's division on the march into Mississippi, and was engaged at Port Gibson, Raymond, and Champion Hills. He was afterward at the head of a body of 15th corps, was made prisoner near Atlanta, but was exchanged on 24 Sept., 1864, and was in Sherman's operations before that city and in the march to the sea. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 12 Jan., 1865, and also received the brevets of brigadier- and major-general in the volunteer army, to date from 20 Jan., and 2 Dec., 1865, respectively. Gen. Scott was assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's bureau in South Carolina in 1865-8, resigned from the army on 6 July of the latter year, and in 1868 became the first governor of the reconstructed state, having been chosen as a Republican. He was re-elected in 1870 by a majority of 33,554 in a total vote of 138,608. In the autumn of 1871 the governor and other state officers were openly charged with a fraudulent over-issue of state bonds. Gov. Scott justified his course in a message to the legislature, and a rescission of impeachment was voted in that body. Much excitement was also caused in this year by "Ku-Klux" outrages, and Gov. Scott's appel to the president to aid in suppressing them, which was done by the use of U. S. troops. Gov.
Scott afterward removed to Napoleon, Ohio. On 25 Dec., 1880, he shot and killed Warren G. Drury, age twenty-three years. Drury and a son of Gen.
Scott had been drinking together, and while quartering for the boy Gen. Scott met the former, when the shooting took place. He was tried, and acquitted on 5 Nov., 1881, the defence being that the discharge of the pistol was accidental.

SCOTT, Thomas, Canadian member of paraliament, b. in Lanark, Ontario, in 1841. He was educated at the Perth high-school, became a journalist, and published and managed the Perth "Expositor,"
in the Conservative interest, from 1861 till 1873, when he removed to Manitoba. He was elected mayor of the city of Winnipeg in 1877, and again
by acclamation in 1878, and chosen to the legislature of Manitoba in 1878 and 1879, but resigned to become a candidate for the Canadian parliament for Selkirk in 1890. He was elected, and was reed in 1895. In the latter year he was in Europe for many years in the volunteer service, held a com-mmand in the Ontario rifles in the Red river expeditionary force under Col. Garnet (now Lord) Wolseley in 1870, and led the second expedition to the Red river in 1871 to oppose the Fenians. He commanded the 59th battalion during the campaign of 1885 against Louis Riel, and received a medal. He was elected president of the Liberal-Conservative association of Manitoba in 1886, and was appointed collector of customs for Winnipeg in 1887.

SCOTT, Thomas Alexander, railroad-manager,
b. in London, Franklin co., Pa., 28 Dec., 1824; d.
in Darby, Pa., 21 May, 1881. His father, Thomas, who died when the son was ten years old, kept a tavern on the turnpike between Philadelphia and Pittsburg. The boy worked on a farm, attended a village school, served in country stores, and became, on 1 Aug., 1841, clerk to Maj. James Patton, collector of tolls on the state road at Columbus, Pa.
In 1847 he was made chief clerk to the collector of tolls at Philadelphia, and in 1850 he became connected with the partially constructed Pennsylvania railroad, was appointed its general superintendent in 1853, and in 1859 was chosen vice-president. He soon became known as one of the most enterprising railroad men in the country.
At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed on the staff of Gov. Andrew G. Curtin, and was very energetic in equipping volunteers and sending them forward to Washington. On 27 April, 1861, he was asked by the state of Pennsylvania to open a new line from Washington to Philadelphia, which he did by way of Annapolis and Perryville with surprising quickness. He was commissioned colonel of volunteers on 3 May, and on 23 May was given charge of all government railways and telegraphs. On 1
Aug. he was appointed assistant secretary of war, which office he held till 1862, when he resigned to organize military companies for the defense of the northwest, and in March to perform the same duty on the western rivers. On 1 June he resigned to devote himself to his railway affairs, but on 24 Sept., 1863, he entered the government service again for a time, and superintended the transportation of two army corps to relieve Gen.
William S. Rosecrans at Chattanooga. This he did with remarkable speed, connecting different lines by improvised trucks, and sending out trains in great numbers by every available route. Col.
Scott was instrumental in furthering the policy by which the Pennsylvania road secured control of its western lines. In 1871, when a separate company was chartered to operate these, he became its president. He was also president of the Union Pacific railroad from March, 1871, till March, 1872, and in 1874 succeeded to the presidency of the Pennsylvania road. Failing health forced him to travel abroad in 1878, and on 1 June, 1880, he died. He was energetic, alertness, and sound business principles of Col. Scott may be attributed much of the prosperity that has been attained by the road of which he was an officer. Besides his connection with the Pennsylvania system, he was the projector of the Texas Pacific road, and for many years its president.

SCOTT, Thomas Fielding, P. B. bishop, b. in tredred county, N. C., 12 March, 1807; d. in New York city, 14 July, 1867. He was graduated at Franklin college, Athens (now University of Georgia), in 1829, was ordained deacon in St. Paul's church, Augusta, Ga., 12 March, 1843, by Bishop Elliot, and priest in Christ church, Macon, Ga., 24 Feb., 1844, by the same bishop. He became at this date rector of St. James's church, Marietta, Ga., and, afterblg afterward of Trinity church, Columbus, Ga. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Georgia in 1853. He was elected missionary bishop of Oregon and Washington territories, and was consecrated in Christ church, Savannah, Ga., 8 Jan., 1854. On his way to the eastern states, Bishop Scott contracted a fever in crossing the Isthmus of Panama, and he died a few days after landing in New York.

SCOTT, Walter, religious leader, b. in Mofatt, Dumfries-shire, Scotland, 31 Oct., 1796; d. in Mars-wick, Ky., 23 April, 1861. He came of the same ancestry as the novelist. After an academic training he was graduatated at the University of Edinburgh, and afterward sailed to the United States,
where he arrived,
7 July, 1818. He pursued his studies and taught in New York and Pittsburg, and in the latter city in 1821 he formed an acquaintance with Thomas and Alexander Campbell, which soon became a lasting friendship, and the three engaged in an earnest and critical examination of the Bible and of the earlier writers, by which they became convinced that the existing forms of Christianity were in wide departure from the simple discipline of the primitive church. In 1822 the Campbells and Scott had arrived at a harmonious agreement concerning the reformation of the union of Christian, and, without desiring to form another sect, they endeavored to draw men together into the original denomination upon common grounds of orthodox religion. In pursuance of this plan, Alexander Campbell now began the publication of the "Christian Baptist," which obtained a large circulation.
Scott wrote for this periodical, and at once took the pulpit and proceeded to point out what he considered the glaring defects in the modern manner of preaching the gospel. His powers of oratory were remarkable, and he lived to see an organized ministry preaching to many followers those views of Christianity which had engaged all the faculties of his life. Scott was deeply concerned at the opening of the civil war, and published "The Union," a pamphlet in the interest of peace (Cincinnati, 1860). The illness of which he died was intensified by grief at hearing the attack on Fort Sumter. His published works were "The Gospel Restored" (1854); and "The Messiahship, or the Great Demonstration" (1855), besides brief contributions to the press explaining his religious views. His life has been written by William Baxt. (1874).

SCOTT, William Anderson, clergyman, b. in Rock Creek, Bedford co., Tenn., 31 Jan., 1813; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 14 Jan., 1885. He was graduated at Cumberland college, Tenn., in 1833, studied in Princeton theological seminary in 1833-'4, and in 1835 was ordained by the presbytery of Louisiana. After missionary service in 1835-'7 and teaching in 1830-'40, he was pastor of churches in New Orleans, La., and San Francisco, Cal., after which he went to England in 1861 and was for some time settled over a congregation in Birmingham. On his return he had charge of a church in New York city in 1863-'70, and then of one in San Francisco till his death. He was also professor of mental and moral philosophy and systematic theology in the theological school of the latter city after its establishment in 1871. The University of Alabama gave him the degree of D. D. in 1844, and the University of the city of New York that of LL. D. in 1872. Dr. Scott edited the New Orleans "Presbyterian," for three years, founded the "Pacific Expositor," and was the author of "Daniel, a Model for Young Men" (New York, 1854); "Achan in El Dorado" (San Francisco, 1853); "Trade and Letters" (New York, 1856); "The Giant Judge" (San Francisco, 1858): "The Bible and Politics" (1839): "The Church in the Army, or the Four Centurions of the Gospels" (New York, 1892); "The Christ of the Apostle's Creed" (1867); and other works.—His son, Robert Nicholson, soldier, b. in Winchester, Va., 22 Dec., 1831; m. Dorcas D. Co., 3 March, 1857, attended school in Hartford, Conn., and New Orleans, La., and studied law in San Francisco, Cal., but was appointed from California 2d lieutenant of infantry, 21 Jan., 1857, and served on the Pacific coast till the civil war, commanding the U. S. steamer "Massachusetts" during the San Juan difficulties in 1859. He was promoted captain in September, 1861, and afterward served on staff duty in the adjutant-general's department. He was with the Army of the Potomac till June, 1863, receiving a major's brevet for garrison at Gaines's Mill, where he was wounded, and in 1863-'4 was senior aide-de-camp to Gen. Henry W. Halleck. He continued to serve on staff duty till 1870, with the department of military sciences in a school at Faribault, Minn., 1862-'3, and 1873-'7 commanded Fort Ontario, N. Y. From 1877 till his death he was in charge of the publication of war records in Washington. He was promoted major in 1879, and lieutenant-colonel in 1885. In 1878 he served as military secretary to a congressional committee on the reorganization of the military laws of the United States." (1872).

SCOTT, William Cowper, clergyman, b. in Martinsburg, Va., 13 Jan., 1817; d. in Bethesda, Va., 23 Oct., 1884. His father and grandfather were ministers of the Presbyterian church, and the son, after graduation at South Hanover College, Ind., in 1837, and at Union theological seminary, Va., in 1840, also became a clergyman of that denomination. He was pastor of several churches in his native state till his death, except during two years, when feebie health compelled him to desist from preaching, and he was occupied in teaching and writing. His published works were some of a critical and literary character, and included a chapter of a book of the author of a work on "Genius and Faith, or Poetry and Religion in their Mutual Relations," which has received high praise for its depth of thought and its correct literary taste (New York, 1853).

SCOTT, Winfield, soldier, b. in Dinwiddie county, near Petersburg, Va., 13 June, 1788; d. at West Point, N. Y., 29 May, 1869. He was educated at William and Mary college, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1806, and in 1809 entered the army as a captain of light artillery. While stationed at Baton Rouge, La., in 1809, he was court-martialed for remarks on the conduct of his superior officer, Gen. Wilkinson, and was suspended for one year, which he devoted to the study of military tactics. In July, 1812, he was made lieutenant-colonel and ordered to the command of the United States artillery on Fort George, 27 May, he was severely hurt by the explosion of a powder-magazine. In the autumn he commanded the advance in Wilkinson's descent of the St. Lawrence—an operation directed against Montreal, but which was abandoned. In March, 1814, he was made a brigadier-general, and established a camp of instruction at Buffalo. On 3 July, Scott's and Ripley's brigades, with Hinds' artillery, crossed the Niagara river and took Fort Erie and a part of its garrison. On the 5th was fought the battle of Chippawa, resulting in the defeat of the enemy, and on 25 July, that of Lundy's Lane, or Bridgewater, near Niagara Falls, in which Scott had two horses killed under him and his side was considerably injured. Of the left shoulder was critical, his recovery painful and slow, and his arm was left partially disabled. At the close of the war Scott was offered and declined a seat in the cabinet as secretary of war, and was promoted to be major-general, with the thanks of congress and a gold medal for his services. He assisted in the reduction of the army to a peace establishment, and then visited Europe in a military and diplomatic capacity. He returned to the United States in 1816, and in 1817 married Miss Mayo, of Richmond, Va. A part of his time he now devoted to the elaboration of a manual of firearms and military tactics. In 1832 he set out from Fort Dearborn (now Chicago, Ill.) with a detachment to take part in the retaliatory attempt against the Seminoles and other Indians. Capt. Scott, the capture of Black Hawk ended the war before Scott's arrival on the field. In the same year he commanded the Federal forces in Charleston harbor during the nullification troubles, and his tact, discretion, and decision did much to prevent the threatened civil war. In 1835 he went to Florida to engage in the war with the Seminoles. In 1837 he was appointed to the command of the Florida territory, and was made a brigadier-general of the United States army. He was recalled in 1837 and subjected to inquiry for the failure of his campaigns, the court finding in his favor. In 1838 he was efficient in promoting the peaceful removal of the Cherokees from Georgia to their present reservation beyond the Mississippi. The threatened collision with Great Britain, growing out of the disputed boundary-line between Maine and New Brunswick, was averted in 1839, mainly through the pacific efforts of Scott, and the question was finally settled by the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842.

By the death of Gen. Macomb in 1841 Scott became commander-in-chief of the army of the United States. In 1847 he was assigned to the chief command of the army in Mexico. Drawing a portion of Taylor's troops operating from the Rio Grande, and assembling his force at Lobos Island, on 9 March he landed 12,000 men and invested Vera Cruz. The mortar - battery opened on the 22d, and the siege - guns two days later. A few days after the latter, and on the 26th the city and the castle of San Juan d'Uluoa capitulated, after nearly 7,000 missiles had been fired. The garrison of 5,000 men grounded arms outside of the city on the 29th. On 8 April, Scott began his march toward Jalapa, and on the 17th reached the Mexican army under Santa-Anna, which occupied the strong mountain-pass of Cerro Gordo, in a defile formed by the Rio del Plan. On the following morning at sunrise the Americans, 8,500 strong, attacked the Mexican army of more than 12,000, and at 2 p.m. had driven the enemy from every point of his line, capturing 5 generals, 3,000 men, 4,500 stand of arms, and 13 cannon, and killing and wounding more than 1,000, with a loss of less than 500. Paroling his prisoners and destroying most of the stores, Scott encamped on the next day to Jalapa, which he captured on 19 April. Perote was occupied on the 22d, and Puebla on 15 May. Here the army remained, drilling and waiting for re-enforcements till 7 Aug. Gen. Scott had vainly asked that the new troops should be disciplined and instructed in the United States before joining the army in Mexico, and the failure to do this gave Santa-Anna an opportunity to create a new army and fortify the capital. Scott began on 7 Aug. to advance toward the city of Mexico by the National road, and, while diverting the attention of the enemy by a feint on the strong fortress of El Peñon on the northwest, made a detour to San Augustin on the south. He then attacked and carried successively Contreras and Churubusco, and could have taken the capital, but an armistice till 7 Sept. was agreed upon to allow the peace commissioner, Nicholas P. Trist, an opportunity to negotiate. At its close, operations were resumed on the southwest of the city, defended by 14,000 Mexicans occupying Molino del Rey, and Gen. Worth's loss was in storming Molino del Rey before the attack on the wooded and strongly fortified eminence of Chapultepec. On 8 Sept., Gen. Worth with 3,500 men attacked Molino del Rey, capturing much material and more than 800 prisoners, but losing one fourth of his command, including fifty-eight officers. On the 13th Chapultepec was stormed and carried, and on the morning of the 14th Scott's army marched into the city and occupied the national palace. There was some street-fighting and firing upon the troops from the buildings, but this was soon suppressed, order was established, and a contribution levied on the city of $150,000, two thirds of which Gen. Scott remitted to the United States to found military asylum. Taxes were laid for the support of the army, and a civil organization under the protection of the troops was created. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, negotiated by Mr. Trist and other commissioners, Judge Clifford, afterward of the supreme court, of the number, was signed on 2 Feb., 1848, and soon after Mexico was evacuated by the U. S. troops. A court of inquiry into the conduct of the war only redeemed to the fame of Scott. In 1852 he was the candidate of the Whig party for the presidency, and received the electoral votes of Vermont, Massachusetts, Kentucky, and Tennessee, all the other states voting for the Democratic candidate, Gen. Pierce. In 1859 Gen. Scott as commissioner successfully settled the difficulty arising from the disputed boundary-line of the United States and British America through the Straits of Fuca. Age and infirmity prevented him from taking an active part in the civil war, and on 31 Oct., 1861, he retired from service, retaining his rank, pay, and allowances. Soon afterward he made a brief visit to Europe, and he passed most of the remainder of his days at West Point, remaining with his family. When he died, 24 May, 1866, he left word that he wished to be the first to die, as a testimonial to the belief that \"I have come here to die.\" Two weeks he lingered, and then fell for a short time into a stupor, from which he awoke, retaining entire possession of his mental faculties and recognizing his family and attendants to the last. A few minutes after eleven on the morning of 29 May he passed away so calmly that the exact moment of his death was not known. As Frederick the Great\'s last completely conscious utterance was in reference to his favorite English greyhound, Scott\'s was in regard to his magnificent horse, the same noble animal that followed him in his funeral procession a few days later. Turning to his servant, the old veteran\'s last words were: \"James, take good care of the horse.\" In accordance with his expressed wish, he was buried at West Point on 1 June, and his remains were accompanied to the grave by many of the most illustrious men of the land, including Gen. Grant and Admiral Farragut.

Gen. Scott was a man of true courage, personally, morally, and religiously brave. He was in manner, association, and feeling, courtly and chivalrous. He was always equal to the danger—great on great occasions. His unwavering loyalty and patriotism were ever conspicuous and of the loftiest character. All who appreciated his military genius regretted, when the war of the rebellion began, that Scott was not as he had been at the period of his Mexican victories. He had not the popularity of several of his successors among the soldiers. He was too stately and too exacting in his discipline—that power which Carnot calls \"the glory of the soldier and the strength of armies.\"
It was to these characteristics that Scott owed his title of "Puss and Feathers," the only nickname ever applied to him. Physically he was "framed in the prodigality of nature." Not even Washington possessed so majestic a presence. As Surrarow was the smallest and physically the most insignificant looking, so was Scott the most imposing of all the illustrious soldiers of the century, possibly of all the centuries. The steel engraving represents him at upward of three score and ten. The vignette is from a painting byingham, taken at the age of thirty-seven.

A portrait by Weir, showing Scott as he was at the close of the Mexican war, is in the U.S. military academy. The statue by Henry K. Brown stands in Scott circle, Washington. Gen. Scott was the author of a pamphlet against the use of intoxicating liquors (Philadelphia, 1821):

"General Regulations for the Army" (1837); "Letter to the Secretary of War" (New York, 1827); "Infantry Tactics," translated from the French (3 vols., 1835); "Letter on the Slavery Question" (1843); "Abstract of Infantmary Tactics" (Philadelphia, 1861); "Memoirs of Lieut.-Gen. Scott, written by Himself" (2 vols., New York, 1864). Biographies of him have been published by Edward Deering Mansfield (New York, 1846); Joel Tyler Headley (1852); and Orville James Victor (1891). See also "Campaign of Gen. Scott in the Valley of Mexico," by Lieut. Raphael Semmes (Cincinnati, 1852).—His son-in-law, Henry Lee, soldier, b. in New Berne, N. C., 3 Oct., 1814; d. in New York city, 6 Jan., 1886, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1836, and served the 4th infantry as 2d lieutenant. After three years' service, he was engaged in Mexico, where he took part in the war against the Seminoles, and in 1837-8 was engaged in removing Cherokees to the west, after which, until 1840, he served with his regiment as adjutant. In 1842 he was appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. Winfield Scott, whose daughter, Cornelia, he had married, and accompanied him to Mexico in the capacity of chief of staff. He attained the rank of captain on 16 Feb., 1847, and for his gallantry in the siege of Vera Cruz, the battles of Cerro Gordo and Churubusco, and the capture of the city of Mexico, received the brevets of major and lieutenant-colonel. After the war he was acting judge-advocate of the eastern division in 1848-9, and senior aide-de-camp to Gen. Scott from 1850 till 1861. He had been made lieutenant-colonel on the staff on 7 March, 1855, was promoted colonel on 14 May, 1861, and was inspector-general in command of the forces in New York city until 30 Oct., 1861, when he retired from active service for "disability resulting from long and faithful services, and from injuries and exposure in the field till 1861." He accompanied Gen. Scott to Europe on leave of absence, remaining abroad till the close of the war. He tendered his resignation in 1862, but it was not accepted until four years later. He was the author of "A Military Dictionary" (New York, 1861).

SCOUlLEK, James Brown, clergyman, b. near Newville, Cumberland co., Pa., 13 July, 1820. He was graduated at Dickinson college in 1839, and at the Associate Reformed theological seminary, Alleghany, Pa., in 1842. He was successively pastor of the United Presbyterian churches in Philadelphia, Cuyversville, and Argyle, N. Y., in 1844-62, and editor of the "Christian Instructor," Philadelphia, Pa., in 1862-83. Maskingham college, Concord, Ohio, gave him the degree of D.D. in 1880. He has contributed largely to magazines, and is the author of "History of the Big Spring Presbytery" (Harrisburg, Pa., 1879); "History of the Presbyterian Church of Argyle" (1880); a "Manual of the Presbyterian Church" (1881); and "Calvinism, Its History and Influences" (1888).

SCOVILLE, Joseph A., journalist, b. in Connecticut in 1811; d. in New York city, 25 June, 1864. He engaged in journalism in New York, and afterward was for some years the private secretary of John C. Calhoun. During the civil war he was New York correspondent of the London "Herald" and "Standard," under the signature of "a man in the column vitæ," and in the latter he espoused the administration of President Lincoln. He published "Adventures of Clarence Bolton, or Life in New York" (London, 1860); "The Old Merchants of New York," under the pen-name of Walter Barrett, Clerk (4 vols., 1861-6); "Vigor," a novel (1864); and "Marion" (1864).

SCRANTON, George Whitefield, manufacturer, b. in Madison, Wisconsin, 1811; d. in Scranton, Pa., 24 March, 1861. He settled in Oxford, N. J., in 1820, where he was a teamster and subsequently a clerk, engaged in the manufacture of iron in 1838, and the next year, with his brother Joseph, built furnaces for smelting ore with anthracite coal in the village of Steeum, Pa., which was subsequently named Scranton in honor of the two brothers. For many years he was president of the Lackawanna and Western, and the Cayuga and Susquehanna railroads, and in 1858-61 he was a member of congress, having been elected as a Protectionist Republican,—His brother, Joseph Hand, capitalist, b. in Madison, Conn., 27 June, 1813; d. in Baden-Baden, Germany, 6 June, 1872, began life as a clerk in New Haven, subsequently engaged in business, and in 1847 became a resident in the coal region of the Lackawanna valley. Pa. With the aid of other members of his family he developed the vast coal and iron interests of that section, and lived to see Scranton, which was a hamlet of two or three houses, become a city with a population of 50,000. He was successively for twenty years the manager and superintendent, and president of the Lackawanna iron and coal company, and president of several railways and manufacturing and banking institutions.

Screven, William, clergyman, b. in England in 1629; d. in Georgetown, S. C., in 1713. He came to this country about 1649, settled in Piscaraway, N. H., and suffered such persecution from the Puritans on account of his religous faith that he removed to South Carolina and founded the first Baptist church of Charleston. He subsequently removed to a spot about sixty miles north of Charleston, and was the original proprietor of the land on which the town of Georgetown was built. He is the author of "An Ornament for Church Numbers," (Charleston, 1683); "The True Church of God," (Charleston, 1721).—His grandson, James, soldier, b. in Georgia about 1714; d. near Midway, Ga., 24 Nov., 1778, early espoused the patriot cause, and in 1774 was one of the committee that drew up articles of association for the defence of liberty in Georgia.
He was commissioned brigadier-general of Georgia militia when the State was invaded by the British from East Florida, commanded a brigade, and, after repeated skirmishes with the enemy between Sunbury and Savannah, received a mortal wound at Midway. Congress ordered the erection of a monument to his memory.

SCUDDER, Charles, publisher, b. in New York city, 21 Feb., 1824; d, in Locerne, Switzerland, 26 April, 1885. At the age of 16, he entered Princeton college, where he graduated in 1849, and began the study of law, but was obliged by ill health to make a trip to Europe. On his return he formed a partnership in 1856 with Isaac D. Baker, under the firm-name of Baker and Scudder, and began the publishing business. A year or two later Mr. Baker died, and Mr. Scudder continued under the title of Charles Scudder, and later of Charles Scudder and Co. With Charles Welford (who died in May, 1855) he formed in 1857 the house of Scudder and Welford for the importation of foreign books, which is still carried on under the same firm-name. In 1863 he began the publication of "Hours at Home," a monthly magazine, which in 1870 was merged in "Scribner's Monthly," under the editorship of Joseph G. Holland, and which was published by a separate company, Scudder and Co., with Dr. Holland and Roswell Smith as part owners. On Mr. Scudder's death, the next year, the firm of Charles Scudder and Co. was reorganized as Scudder, Armstrong, and Co., the partners being John Blair Scudder, Andrew C. Armstrong, and Edward Seymour, and in 1877 the publication-house was removed to 743 Broadway, its present site. Mr. Seymour died 28 April, 1877, and in 1878, when Mr. Armstrong retired, the firm-name was changed to Charles Scudder's Sons, under which form the business has been conducted since 1879 by Charles Scudder and Arthur H. Scudder, younger brothers of John Blair. In 1881 the firm sold out their interest in the magazine company, on the agreement that the character of the magazine and of the company should be altered, and the names were accordingly changed to the "Century Magazine" and the Century company. Charles Scudder's Sons agreed also not to publish any magazine for five years, but after the expiration of that time, in January, 1887, they began the publication of "Scribner's Magazine," edited by Edward L. Burlingame (q.v.). The house has been from the beginning solely a publishing firm as distinguished from a printing and publishing firm, and this has had an influence on the character of its publications, which have chiefly been confined to the works of contemporary authors. Besides its valuable list of literary and educational works, it has a large department from which have issued some of the most important and successful publications of the time.

JOHN BLAIR, eldest son of Charles, b. in New York city, 4 June, 1850; d. there, 21 Jan., 1879, studied at Princeton, and succeeded his father as head of the firm in 1871.

SCUDDER, David Colt, missionary, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 Oct., 1833; d. near Periyakulam, India, 19 Nov., 1862. He was graduated at Williams in 1853, and at Andover theological seminary in 1859. Having determined to become a missionary, he prepared himself by study of the Eastern languages until his ordination on 25 Feb., 1861, and in 1862 he was given the Periyakulam station in the Madura district of southern India, where he labored until his death. He contributed a series of papers on foreign missions to the New York "In-—His brother, Samuel Hubbard, naturalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 April, 1837, was graduated at Williams in 1857, and at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1862, where in 1862–4 he acted as assistant to Louis Agassiz in the Museum of comparative zoology. In 1892–70 he was secretary of the Boston society of natural history and the scientific society of Harvard in 1864–70 and as its president in 1880–7. Mr. Scudder was appointed in 1879 assistant librarian of Harvard, where he remained until 1885, and in 1886 he became palaeontologist of the U. S. geological survey, which place he now (1898) holds. He is a member of many scientific societies, was chairman of the section on natural history of the American association for the advancement of science in 1874, and general secretary of the association in 1875, librarian of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1877–85, and in 1877 was elected to the National academy of sciences. His specialty is entomology, and he has chiefly studied butterflies and fossil insects, in the knowledge of which he has no superior in this country. He has reported officially on the insects of New Hampshire and the expeditions of the United States topographical surveys that were collected in the Yellowstone expedition of 1873, and on the geological surveys under Lieut. George M. Wheeler, Ferdinand V. Hayden, the British North America boundary commission, and the Canadian geological survey. During 1885–5 he was editor of "Science," published in Cambridge. His bibliography down to 1880 has been collected by George Dimmock and includes about 300 titles. His larger works are "Catalogue of the Orthoptera of North America" (Washington, 1868); "Entomological Correspondence of Thaddeus William Harris" (Boston, 1869); "Fossil Butterflies" (Salem, 1875); "Catalogue of Scientific Serials of all Countries, including the Transactions of Learned Societies, in the Natural, Physical, and Mathematical Sciences, 1663–1876" (Cambridge, 1879); "Butterflies, their Structure, Changes, and Life Histories" (New York, 1882); "Nomenclator Zoologicus: An Alphabetical List of all Generic Names that have been employed by Naturalists for Recent and Fossil Animals" (Washington, 1882); "Systematic Review of Our Present Knowledge of Fossil Insects" (1886), originally contained in "Scribner's Magazine" (Munich, 1885); and the "Winnipeg Country, or Roving it with an Eclipse Party," by A Rochester Fellow (Boston, 1896).—Another brother, Horace Elisha, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 Oct., 1838, was graduated at Williams in 1858, and soon afterward came to New York city, where he taught for three years. Meanwhile he wrote his "Dream Letters" (Cambridge, 1863), and then he prepared "The Life and Letters of David Colt Scudder" (New York, 1864). The "American Commonwealts," also known as "American Poems" (1879) and "American Prose" (1880), was the work of Charles W. Scudder. —Horace E. Scudder was one of the authors of Justin Winsor's "Memorial History of Boston" (Boston, 1889–1), SCRIBNER, Charles, publisher, b. in New York city, 21 Feb., 1824; d. in Locerne, Switzerland, 26 April, 1865. According to some, he was graduated at Williams in 1845, and at the University of Virginia in 1846; according to others, at the University of Virginia in 1844–70 and as its president in 1880–7. Mr. Scudder was appointed in 1879 assistant librarian of Harvard, where he remained until 1885, and in 1886 he became palaeontologist of the U. S. geological survey, which place he now (1898) holds. His other works include "The Bodley Books," a series of books for children (8 vols., Boston, 1875-81); "The Dwellers in Five-Sisters Court" (1876); "Men and Manners in America" (New York, 1876); "Stories and Romances" (Boston, 1880); "The Children's Book" (1881); "Boston Town" (1881); "Noah Webster," in the "American Men of Letters" series (1882); a "History of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1884); and "Men and Letters". He was joint author with Mrs. Richard Taylor of "Life and Letters of Bayard Taylor" (Boston, 1884).—David Cott's daughter, Vida Dutton, author, b. in Madura, India, 15 Dec., 1861, was graduated at Smith college in 1884, and subsequently spent a year in higher studies at Oxford, England. In 1887 she became instructor at Wellesley college, which place she now (1898) fills. Miss Scudder has published "How the Rain Sprites were Freed" (Boston, 1885), and "Selected Poems from George MacDonald" (New York, 1887).

SCUDDER, Henry Joel, lawyer, b. in Northport, L. I., in 1825; d. in New York city, 12 Feb., 1888. He was graduated at Trinity in 1846, admitted to the bar of New York city in 1848, and five years later entered into a partnership with James C. Carter, under the firm-name of Scudder and Carter, in which he continued until his death, gradually advancing to the front rank in his profession, especially in matters regarding admirality law. He was chosen to congress as a Republican in 1872 from a district that had never before been represented by a member of that party, served one term, declined re-nomination, and was an unsuccessful candidate for a seat on the New York supreme bench in 1875. Columbia gave him the degree of A. M. in 1862, and Roanoke college, Va., that of J. D. D. in 1881.

SCUDDER, John, missionary, b. in Freehold, N. J., 3 Sept., 1793; d. in Wynberg, Cape of Good Hope, Africa, 15 Jan., 1835. He was graduated at Princeton in 1811, and at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1813. He then settled in New York city and practised successfully, but in 1819 went to India as a missionary under the direction of the American board. He was ordained to the ministry of the Dutch Reformed church in 1829, settled in Ceylon, and laboured there for nineteen years in the double capacity of clergyman and physician. His most important service was the establishment of a large hospital, of which he was also physician in chief, and he was especially successful in the treatment of cholera and yellow fever. He also founded several native schools and churches. He was transferred to the Madras station in 1839, was in the United States in 1842-5, and, returning in 1847, labored until his death, which occurred on a visit to the Cape of Good Hope that had been undertaken for the benefit of his health. His seven sons and two daughters were all missionaries in southern India. He published "Letters from the East" (Boston, 1833); "Appeal to Youth in Behalf of the Heathen" (1848); "Letters to Pious Young Men" (1846); "Pravin for Passing over Jordan" (New York, 1852); and many tracts and papers that were published in the "Missionary Herald." See a "Memoir" of him by Rev. John B. Waterbury (1856).—His son, Henry Martyn, clergyman, b. in Panditeripo, Ceylon, 5 Feb., 1822; d. in Winchester, Mass, 4 June, 1855, was graduated at the University of New York, and at Union theological seminary, and returned to India as a missionary to the Madura station under the care of the American board. He labored successfully at Madras, Arcot, Vellore, Coonoos, and Oolacoom, organized schools and churches, founded the Arcot mission, and established a dispensary there. Having studied medicine, he also practised that profession. He prepared various religious books and tracts in the Sanscrit, Tamil, and Telugu languages. The failure of his health in 1864 compelled his return to this country, and he was pastor of the Howard Presbyterian church in San Francisco, Cal., in 1865-71, of the Central Congregational church in Brooklyn in 1872-82, and from the latter date till 1887 of the Plymouth Congregational church, Chicago, from which he retired in 1883, and spent a year travelling in Japan. His publications include "Liturgy of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church" (Madras, India, 1862); "The Bazaar Book, or the Vernacular Teacher's Companion" (1865); "Sweet Savors of Divine Truth," a catechism (1868); and "Spiritual Teaching" (1879). These are all in the Tamil language. Another son, John, Waterbury, missionary, b. in Panditeripo, Ceylon, in 1830, was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1850, and at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1855. He was then ordained a missionary to India under the Reformed Dutch church, and since 1857 has held native charges there. He has published translations from the Tamil of Henry M. Scudder's "Spiritual Teaching" (Madras, 1859), and his "Bazaar Book" (1870), and a "History of the Arcot Mission" (1872). He is also a member of the committee for the revision of the Tamil translation of the Bible.—Another son of John, Silas Doremus, physician, b. in Ceylon, India, 6 Nov., 1833; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 10 Dec., 1877, was graduated at Rutgers in 1856, studied medicine, and subsequently was practised as a physician. He went to India as a medical missionary in 1860, established himself at Arcot, and founded a dispensary and hospital there which was supported by English and native residents. He also successfully treated a large native out-door practice, and obtained patients among high-caste Hindoo women, which had not hitherto been accomplished. After thirteen years' labor for the American board he returned to this country on account of an illness which had been occasioned by overwork.

SCUDDER, Nathaniel, patriot, b. near Huntington, Long Island, N. Y., 10 May, 1733; d. near Shrewsbury, N. J., 17 Oct., 1781. He was graduated at Princeton in 1751, studied medicine, and practised for many years. He had been a member of the council of safety. On 30 Nov., 1777, he was elected a delegate to congress. In the labors and responsibilities of legislation during the Revolutionary war he took an active part. On 13 July, 1778, he made a powerful appeal to the legislature of New Jersey to confer upon the delegates in congress the authority to sign the articles of confederation. This letter, published in "New Jersey Revolutionary Correspondence," stamps him at once as a strong writer and clear thinker, and a whole-hearted patriot. He served in congress during the years 1777-9. From 1778 till 1782 he was a trustee of the College of New Jersey. He was also an elder in the church of the celebrated old Monmouth battle-ground. During the Revolution, Monmouth county was frequently excited by the incursions of foraging parties of British troops and Tories. In an engagement with a party of refugees at Black's point near Shrewsbury, Col. Scudder was killed while leading a battalion of his regiment. He was buried with the honors of war in the old graveyard at the Trenton church. He was the only congressman that was killed in battle during the Revolutionary war.

SCULL, Nicholas, surveyor, b. about 1700.

About 1722 he was engaged in surveying in Pennsylvania, and occasionally in the public service, acting in Indian affairs in the capacity of runner or as interpreter for the Delawares. He was also a member of Franklin's Junta club. In 1744 he became, for six weeks, in April, and in June, 1748, he succeeded William Parsons as surveyor-general of the province, serving till December, 1761. He made a map of the improved parts of Pennsylvania, which was published by act of parliament in January, 1759. He was sheriff of Northampton county in 1753-5. His sons, James, Peter, William, Edward, and Jasper were surveyors. William published a map of the provinces in 1770.

SELABRA, Vicenço Coelho de (say-ah-brahl), Brazilian chemist, b. in Minas Geraes in 1766; d. in Lisbon, Portugal, in March, 1804. He was graduated at Coimbra in 1787, and, returning to his native country, took part in the conspiracy of Minas Geraes in 1788. He was banished to Portugal, where in 1789 he became corresponding member of the Academy of sciences of Lisbon, and in 1795 the University of Coimbra made him assistant professor of zoology, mineralogy, botany, and agriculture. He wrote "Elementos de chmica" (2 vols., Lisbon, 1787); "Formação e deras" (1789); "Calorico" (1789); "Memoria sobre a cultura do reino ou da mona em Portugal" (1794); and "Nomenclatura chimica Portugueza." French and Latin translations were published in 1789.

SEABURY, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Groton, Conn., 31 July, 1706; d. in Hempstead, Long Island, N. Y., 15 June, 1764. He was educated partly at Yale, and was graduated at Harvard in 1724. After becoming a licensed preacher of the Congregationalists in 1729, he was ordained deacon and priest in the Church of England and the Church of Scotland in London in 1731, and served as a missionary of the Society for propagating the gospel. He was rector of St. James's church, New London, from 1732 till 1743, and of St. George's church, Hempstead, L. I., from 1743 till his death, connecting with his work here the charge of a school and the care of mission stations both on Long island and at Fishkill, N. Y. He was largely instrumental in establishing the New London (1742), and a pamphlet entitled "A modest reply to a letter from a gentleman to his friend in Dutchess County." (New York, 1739).

His son, Samuel, 1st bishop of the diocese of Connecticut, b. in Groton, Conn., 30 Nov., 1729; d. in New London, Conn., 25 Feb., 1796, was graduated at Yale in 1748, was a catechist of the Society for propagating the gospel, a student of theology under his father, until 1752, and then for a year a student of medicine at the University of Edinburgh. He was ordained deacon by Dr. John Thomas, bishop of Lincoln, 21 Dec., 1753, and priest by Dr. Richard Oswald, bishop of Carlisle, in London, 23 Dec., 1753. He served as a missionary at New Brunswick, N. J., from 25 May, 1754, became rector of Jamaica, including Flushing and New Town, L. I., 12 Jan., 1757, and rector of St. Peter's, Westchester, N. Y., 1 March, 1767. There he was prevented from the exercise of his ministry by the Whigs, by some of whom he was at one time seized and imprisoned in New Haven. He then retired to the city of New York, where he supported himself in part by the practice of medicine, serving also as chaplain of the king's American regiment under commission of Sir Henry Clinton of 14 Feb., 1758. He was particularly obnoxious to the American party on account of his authorship of the series of pamphlets signed A. W. Farmer, and entitled "Free Thoughts on the Proceedings of the Continental Congress" (16 Nov., 1774); "The Congress Canvassed" (26 Nov., 1774); and "A View of the Controversy between Great Britain and her Colonies" (24 Dec., 1774). He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Oxford, 15 Dec., 1777. Dr. Seabury was elected bishop of Connecticut by the Church of England clergy therein at Woodbury, 25 March, 1783, and applied to the English episcopate for consecration in London. He awaited their assent sixteen months, but it was withheld on account of unwillingness to act without the sanction of the civil authority, and failure at that time to procure such sanction; one who was to exercise his office in a foreign state not being able to take the oath of allegiance required by law of those who made themselves bishops in the English church. He was finally consecrated bishop, 14 Nov., 1784, at Aberdeen, by Bishops Kilgour, Petrie, and Skinner, representing the episcopate of the Scotch church, who could not be deterred from exercising the powers of the episcopal office by the apprehension of the loss of temporalities of which they had been long since deprived. Bishop Seabury exercised episcopal jurisdiction with the acceptance of the laity as well as of the clergy in Connecticut, residing in New London as rector of St. James's church until his death, and also, by its invitation, over the church in Rhode Island. He was the first presiding bishop of the churches in the several states, united under the general convention in 1789. He joined in the jubilee churches, in honor of Madison in the consecration of Bishop Claggett, through whom every bishop of the Anglican communion subsequently consecrated in the United States traces his episcopate. Bishop Seabury's knowledge of and devotion to the church system, applied with remarkable prudence and patience, made him peculiarly valuable to his church in this country in that formative period that succeeded the Revolution. The special benefits for which it is indebted to him are, directly, the transfer to this country of a free, valid, and regular episcopacy, and, indirectly, the clearing of the way for the transmission of the episcopate of the established Church of England by demonstrating the possibility of obtaining consecration from another and equally valid source, and the fact that episcopacy could live in this country, the reunion through him in the consecration of Claggett, of the lines of the Scottish church and of the English non-jurors with the line of the established Church of England, represented by White, Provost, and Madison; the securing of the just rights of the episcopate in the government of the church, which had been attained by the amendment of its constitution changing the house of bishops from a mere house of revision to a co-ordinate branch of the legislature; and, lastly, the restoration of the obligation and invocation to the communion office. Two volumes of his sermons (1791) and many occasional papers were published during his life, and a third volume of discourses after his death (1798). See his "Life and Correspondence," by Rev. Eben Edwards Beardsley, D. D. (Boston, 1881). The "Bishop's palace," as his simple residence at New London was jestingly styled, is shown in the accompanying illustration.—His grandson, Samuel, clergyman, son of Rev. Charles Seabury, b. in New London, 9 June, 1801; d. in New York city, 10 Oct., 1872, was privately educated, and received the degree of M. A. and D. D. from Columbia college in 1823 and 1837, respectively. He was ordained deacon in 1826, and priest in 1828, by Bishop Hobart, and was professor of languages in Flushing institute and St. Paul's college until 1834, after which he was editor of "The Churchman" until 1849. He was rector of the Church of the Annunciation, New York, from 1838 till 1868, and professor of biblical learning, etc., in the General theological seminary, New York, from 1862 till his death. His reputation and influence were chiefly established by his editorial writings. He was the author of "Historical Sketch of Augustine Bishop of Hippo" (New York, 1833); "The Continuity of the Church of England in the 16th Century" (1853); "The Supremacy and Obligation of Conscience" (1860); "American Slavery distinguished from the Slavery of English Theorists, and justified by the Law of Nature" (1861); "Mary the Virgin" (1868); and "The Theory and Use of the Church Calendar in the Measurement and Distribution of Time" (1872).—The second Samuel's son, William Jones, clergyman, b. in New York city, 25 Jan., 1837, was graduated at Columbia in 1856, and admitted to the New York bar in 1858, but, abandoning law for divinity, was graduated at the General theological seminary in 1866, ordained deacon, 5 July, 1866, and priest, 30 May, 1867, by Bishop Horatio Potter. He has been rector of the Church of the Annunciation, New York, from 1868, and professor of ecclesiastical polity and law in the General theological seminary since 1873. He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart college in 1876 and from the general theological seminary in 1885. He has edited Dr. Samuel Seabury's "Memorial" (New York, 1878), and "Discourses on the Nature and Work of the Holy Spirit" (1874), and is the author of "Suggestions in Aid of Devotion and Godliness" (1878), and various pamphlets, including "The Union of Divergent Lines in the American Church" (New York, 1883). For a complete bibliography of these four clergymen see the "American Church Review" for July, 1885.

SEALSFIELD, Charles, author, b. in Poppitz, Moravia, Austria, 3 March, 1793; d. in Solothurn, Switzerland, 26 May, 1864. His real name was Karl Postel. He became a member of a religious order in his youth, but escaped from the convent in Prague in 1822, soon afterward came to this country, where he assumed the name of Sealsfield, and for a short time was connected with the "Courier des Etats-Unis" in New York city. He went back to Europe about 1828 as correspondent in Paris of the "Courier and Enquirer," and in 1832 settled in Solothurn, but returned to the United States, and passed several years in Louisiana and the subsequently Central Army in Mexico and the United States. His principal works are "Tokolah, or the White Rose" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1828); German ed., under the title of "Der Legitime und die Republikaner," (3 vols., Zurich, 1835); "Transatlantische Reiseskizzen" (2 vols., 1835); "Der Virey und die Aristokratien," a Mexican novel (2 vols., 1834); "Lebensbilder aus beiden Hemisphären" (2 vols., 1834; 2d ed., entitled "Morton, oder die grosse Tour," 1840); "Deutsch-amerikanische Wahrverwandtschaften" (5 vols., 1838-42); and "Süden und Norden" (3 vols., 1842-43). His works have been translated into English, and several of them into French. Two complete editions have been published in German (5 vols., Stuttgart, 1845-7; 18 vols., 1846). See "Erinnerungen an Sealsfield" (Brussels, 1864).

SEAMAN, Ezra Champion, author, b. in Chatham, N. Y., 14 Oct., 1803; d. in Ann Arbor, Mich., 1 July, 1880. He was educated in the common schools, admitted to the bar at Ballston Spa, N. Y., was chief clerk to the U. S. comptroller of the treasury in 1849-53, and subsequently inspector of Michigan state prisons. He edited the "Ann Arbor Register" from 1837 to 1861, "Essays of the Progress of Nations" (Detroit, 1846; with additions, New York, 1848; supplement, Detroit, 1852); "Commentaries on the Constitution and Laws, People and History, of the United States" (Ann Arbor, 1863); "The American System of Government" (1870); "Views of Nature" (1873); and essays and pamphlets. SEAMAN, Valentine, author, b. in Hempstead, L. I., 2 April, 1770; d. in New York city, 3 July, 1817. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1792, studied medicine under Dr. Nicholas Romeyn, and was a surgeon to the New York hospital from 1796 until his death. He was active in the introduction of vaccination in New York city, sustaining his theory as to its expediency in the face of opposition. His publications include a "Pharmacopeia" and "Inaugural Discourse on Opium" (Philadelphia, 1792); "Waters of Saratoga" (New York, 1793; 2d ed., with "Waters of Balston," 1800); "Midwife's Monitor" (1800); and "On Vaccination" (1816).

SEARING, Laura Catherine (Reedon), author, b. in Somerset county, Me., 9 Feb., 1840. She became deaf about the age of ten, through an attack of spinal meningitis, and her education was consequently carried on in a somewhat irregular manner. Though she also lost the power of speech, being unable to make herself understood, she retained her memory of sounds and her appreciation of rhythm. She early began writing verse, and contributed both prose and poetry to the press, while attending the Missouri state institution for the deaf and dumb, her parents having removed to St. Louis. In 1819 she became a writer for the "Republican" of that city, adopting the pen-name of "Howard Glyndon." Subsequently she was sent to Washington, D. C., as war correspondent for a New York newspaper, and resided in Europe until the end of 1848, perfecting herself in French, Italian, Spanish, and German. On her return she severed her connection with the New York "Times," for which she had corresponded, and for the next eight years was employed on the "Mail" in the same city. Meanwhile she was taking lessons in articulation from various teachers, among them Alexander Graham Bell, with marked success. In 1850 she married Edward W. Searing, of the New York bar, and in 1856 they removed for her health to California, where she now (1888) resides. Besides being a frequent contributor to periodical literature, Mrs. Searing has published "Notable Men of the Thirty-Seventh Congress," in pamphlet-form (Washington, 1850); "Idylls of Battle and Poems of the Rebellion" (New York, 1864); "A Little Boy's Story," translated from the French (1868); and "Sounds from Secret Chambers" (Boston, 1874).

SEARLE, George Mary, astronomer, b. in London, England, 27 June, 1839. He was graduated at Harvard in 1857, and then became assistant at the Dudley observatory, Albany, where he discovered on 11 Sept., 1858, the asteroid Pandora. In January, 1859, he entered the service of the U. S. coast survey, and in September, 1862, he was appointed assistant professor in the U. S. naval academy. He returned to Harvard as assistant in the observatory in June, 1866, and remained there until March, 1868, when he joined the Paulists, and was ordained as a priest in that community in March, 1871, having been converted to the Roman Catholic faith in 1862. He has had charge of the science teaching of the seminary that forms part of the home in New York. Father Searle is also a photographer of considerable skill, and has advanced that art by his studies. He has contributed largely to the journals and reviews of the Roman Catholic church and to the "Astronomical Journal" and the "Quarterly Review of Astronomy." (New York, 1877.)—His brother, Arthur, astronomer, b. in London, England, 21 Oct., 1837, was graduated at Harvard in 1856, and then was variously engaged for about twelve years. In 1869 he was appointed assistant at Harvard college observatory, where he has since continued in various offices until 1887, when he was made full professor of astronomy. He has made photometric measurements of certain variable stars, researches in zodiacal phenomena, and observations with the meridian photometer during 1879-'82. Prof. Searle's papers have appeared in scientific journals at home and abroad and in the "Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences," of which body he is a member. He is also the author of "Outlines of Astronomy" (Boston, 1875).

SEARLE, James, member of the continental congress, b. in New York city about 1730; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Aug., 1797. Little is known of his early life, but when he attained his majority he engaged in business with his brother John in Madeira, and was admitted to the firm of John Searle and Co. in 1757. He left Madeira in 1760, settled in Philadelphia, and in 1765 signed the "non-importation agreement," by which the citizens of Philadelphia bound themselves to order no more goods from Great Britain. He was a manager of the U. S. lottery in 1776-'8, and in August of the latter year became a member of the naval board, resigning that office in October on account of his objections to the existing naval regulations. From November, 1778, till July, 1789, he was in the Continental congress, serving as chairman of the commercial committee, and on that to apportion the quota of the several states. He was also a member of the marine committee, and that on foreign affairs. He was sent to Europe as the agent of the state of Pennsylvania in July, 1789, "to negotiate a loan of $290,000 in such countries or states as he should judge most likely to favor his views"; but the mission was unsuccessful. He returned to Philadelphia in 1789, and, having lost his fortune, re-entered business and resided for several years in New York city.

SEARS, Barnás, educator, b. in Sandisfield, Mass., 10 Nov., 1802; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 6 July, 1880. He was graduated at Brown in 1825, and completed his theological studies at the Newton seminary in 1829. After a two years' pastorate in Hartford, Conn., he accepted a professorship in Hamilton literary and theological institution (now Madison university), Hamilton, N. Y. On leaving that place in 1833 he spent some time in Germany prosecuting his studies. During this residence abroad he shared the privilege of establishing Baptist missions in Germany. On his return he was elected a professor in Newton theological seminary, and for several years was its president. In 1848 he was made secretary and executive agent of the Massachusetts board of education. In 1855 he became president of Brown university, which place he filled with eminent ability and success until 1867, when he accepted the office of general agent of the Peabody educational fund. In the administration of this great trust, for which he was singularly qualified, he remained until his death. His last years were spent in Staunton, Va. He received in 1841 from Harvard the honorary degree of D. D., and from Yale in 1862 that of LL. D. Dr. Sears ranked with the most eminent scholars and educators of his day. Besides contributions to the "Christian Review," of which he was for some time after 1839 the editor, he was the author of an enlarged edition of "Sketches of the History of the Bible" (2 vols., New York, 1842); "Essays on Classical Literature," with Bola B. Edwards and Cornelius C. Felton (Boston, 1843); "The Ciceronian, or Prussian Mode of Instruction in Latin" (1844); "Select Treatises of Martin Luther, in the Original German" (1846); "Life of Luther" (Philadelphia, 1850; republished in England as "Mental and Spiritual History of Luther, 1795-1846" (1849); "Discourse at the Centennial Celebration of Brown University" (1846).

SEARS, Edmund Hamilton, clergyman, b. in Sandisfield, Mass., in 1819; d. in Weston, Mass., 16 Jan., 1876. He was graduated at Union in 1844, and at Harvard divinity-school in 1857, and was pastor of Unitarian societies in Westfield, Mass., 1849-50, and in Lancaster, Mass., and in Lancaster, Ohio. He then edited the "Monthly Religious Magazine" for several years, and from 1865 until his death was pastor in Weston, Mass. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1871. He published "Regeneration" (Boston, 1853; 9th ed., 1857); "Pictures of the Olden Time" (1857); "Christian Discourses on the New Testament," "Gospel of the Heart of Christ" (1872); and "Sermons and Songs of the Christian Life" (1875).
SEARS, Edward I., editor, b. in County Mayo, Ireland, in 1819; d. in New York city, 7 Dec., 1876. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, in 1839, came to this country in 1848, and for many years was professor of languages in Manhattan college. He became editor and proprietor of the "National Intelligencer," a literary magazine, in 1860, and conducted it until his death. He was a writer of cultivated taste and pure and expressive style, and contributed regularly to English and American reviews. He published, under the pen-name of "H. E. Chevalier," "Legends of the Sea" (New York, 1863).

SEARS, Isaac, publisher, b. in Norwalk, Conn., in 1819, d. in Canton, China, 29 Oct., 1870. His ancestor, Richard, emigrated to this country from Colechester, England, in 1630. Isaac commanded a privateer against the French in 1758-61, but lost his vessel in the latter year, and then engaged in the West Indian and European trade, making New York city his home. On the passage of the stamp act he ardently engaged in the patriot cause and became an active member of the Sons of liberty. In November, 1775, with a troop of horse, he went to the printing establishment of James Rivington, editor of the "Royal Gazette," destroyed his presses, and carried off his type, which was afterward converted into bullets. He was a member of the Provincial congress of New York in 1789 and of the assembly in the same year. He lost his fortune by the war, and in 1785 became supercargo on a merchant ship, contracting the fever from which he died on his first passage to China.

SEARS, Robert, publisher, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, 28 June, 1810; d. 17 Feb., 1892. His father was one of the loyalists of the Revolution. He became a bookseller and newspaper proprietor, and was active in St. John and in New York city, where he opened a small printing-office in Park row. In 1839 he began the publication of illustrated works, which were sold almost entirely by subscription. He was a liberal patron and friend of the earlier wood-engravers, did much to develop that art, then in its infancy, and was one of the first to awaken and develop the taste that for pictorial representation which has grown to such large dimensions. He was also one of the first to recognize the value of judicious advertising. He expended many thousands of dollars in making his publications known throughout the United States, and in 1847 procured an extensive recognition of the merits of American wood-engraving in the British public by presenting a complete set of his publications to Queen Victoria and receiving her personal thanks for the same. Among his publications are "Illustrations of the Bible" (New York, 1840); "Biблиography" (1843); "Wonders of the World" (1847); "Pictorial History of the United States," his most important work (1847); and "Description of the Kingdom of Great Britain" (1847).

SEATON, William Winston, journalist, b. in King William county, Va., 11 Jan., 1855; d. in Washington, D. C., 16 June, 1895. He was a descendant of Henry Seaton (of the Scottish family of that name), an adherent of the fortunes of the Stuarts, who came as a political exile to Virginia at the end of the 17th century. His mother, whose maiden name was Winston, was a cousin of Patrick Henry. He was taught by a brother of the Earl of Fife later, a Scotchman, who for several years kept an academy at Richmond. When eighteen years of age he engaged ardenty in politics, and became assistant editor of a Richmond paper. He next edited the Petersburg "Republican," but soon purchased the "North Carolina Journal," published at Halifax, which was then the capital of the state. When Raleigh became the capital, he removed thither and connected himself with the "Register," edited by Joseph Gales, Sr., whose daughter he married. In 1812 he removed to Washington and joined the "National Intelligencer," in which he was a partner in 1818. He was a judge of the U. S. district court, 1846-55, and in the latter year was appointed a judge of the United States district court. He was president of the state senate in 1846, a presidential elector in 1848, and was elected a U. S. senator from Arkansas as a Democrat in place of Chester Ashley, deceased, serving from 1847 till 1853. He was re-elected for the term that ended in 1859, and

SEBASTIAN, William King, senator, b. in Vernon, Tenn., in 1814; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 20 May, 1865. He was graduated at Columbia college, Tenn., studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised his profession at Helena, Ark. He was prosecuting attorney in 1857-7, circuit judge in 1840-2, and in the latter year was appointed a judge of the state supreme court. He was president of the state senate in 1846, a presidential elector in 1848, and was elected a U. S. senator from Arkansas as a Democrat in place of Chester Ashley, deceased, serving from 1847 till 1853. He was re-elected for the term that ended in 1859, and in the latter year was chosen again for another full term. He was chairman of the committee on Indian affairs, and a member of the committee on territories. Mr. Sebastian was expelled for disorderly conduct on 11 July, 1861, but it was afterward claimed that he was loyal, and he secured the relief of suspension and paid his full salary to his children. He remained quietly at Helena until the National troops occupied that place, and in 1864 removed to Memphis, Tenn.

SECCOMB, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Medford, Mass., in 1796; d. in 1860. He was descended from Richard Seccomb, who, coming from England, settled in Lynn, Mass., in 1699. He was graduated at Harvard in 1731, and became minister of Kingston, N. H., in 1737. He published "Plain and Brief Rehearsal of the Operations of Christ as God" (Boston, [1740]); "Business and Diversion Inoffensive to God," a discourse (1745); and "The Ways of Pleasure and the Paths of Peace," a discourse.—His brother, John, clergyman, b. in Medford, Mass., 25 April, 1709; d. in Chester, Nova Scotia, in January, 1770, was graduated at Harvard in 1728, and was minister of the Congregational church at Harvard, Mass., from 10 Oct., 1733, till September, 1757. In 1763 he became minister of a dissenting congregation in Chester, Nova Scotia, where he remained till his death. He gained great notoriety as a humorous poet by "Father Abbey's Will," which was published in both the "Gentleman's Magazine" and "European" magazines in May, 1732. It was reprinted in the "Massachusetts Magazine" in November, 1734, and in 1854 by John Langdon Sibley, with historical and biographical notes. The subject of the poem, Matthew Abdy, held a ministerial position in connection with Harvard college. He also published an oration sermon (Halifax, 1770), and a "Sermon on the Death of Abigail Bulcker, with an Epistle by Matthew Bayles, D. D." (Boston, 1772).

SEDDON, James Alexander, lawyer, b. in Falmouth, Stafford co., Va., 13 July, 1815; d. in Goochland county, Va., 10 Aug., 1889. Thomas Seddon, his father, who was first a merchant and then a banker, was descended from James Seddon, of Lancashire, England, who settled in Stafford county, Va., in colonial days. Susan Alexander, his mother, was a lineal descendant of the Earl of Stirling. Throughout the course of life Mr. Seddon was of a frail constitution, and, owing to his delicate health, his early education was much neglected. The knowledge of the ancient classics and literature, for which he was noted in after-life, was mainly self-acquired. At the age of twenty-one he entered the law-school of the University of Virginia, where he was graduated with the degree of B.1. He settled in Richmond in the practice of the law, and almost immediately advanced to the front rank of the bar. In 1838 he was nominated by the Democratic party for congress, and, though the district was a doubtful one, he was elected by a handsome majority. In 1847 he was renominated, but, not being in accord with the resolutions of the nominating convention, he declined, and the Whig candidate was elected. In 1849 he was re-elected, serving from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1851. Owing to his health, he declined another nomination at the end of his term, and retired to Sabot Hill, his estate at James River, near Richmond. In Congress he took part in most of the important debates of the period, and was recognized as a leader of his party. In 1846 he participated actively in the debates upon the revenue bill, advocating the principles of free-trade. In 1860 the excitement of impending war brought him again into politics. On 19 Jan., 1861, he was appointed by the legislature of Virginia a commissioner with John Tyler and others to the Peace Convention, which met at the call of Virginia in Washington on 4 Feb. He represented Virginia in the committee upon resolutions, and, in accordance with the instructions of his state, made a minority report recommending that the constitution should be amended according to the resolutions that had been introduced in the senate by John J. Crittenden and by a further critical examination of any state peaceably to withdraw from the Union. He became a member of the first Confederate congress, and in November, 1862, having been chosen by Jefferson Davis as secretary of war, became a member of his cabinet. He devoted himself to the duties of his office until 1 Jan., 1863, when he retired finally from public life to his country estate.

SEDENO, Antonio, soldier, b. in Spain about the end of the 15th century; d. in Cubagua, Venezuela, in March, 1538. He went to Santo Domingo with Diego Columbus in June, 1590, where he served till 1512, when he was appointed by King Ferdinand first treasurer of Porto Rico. In 1513 he became alderman of Saint John. Several years afterward, being accused of peculation in the treasury, he was imprisoned, but escaped to Santo Domingo, where he served until 1528. On his return, an expedition to the Windward islands, especially Trinidad, the headquarters of the Carib Indians, who devastated Porto Rico repeatedly, was suggested by the governor, and Sedeno sailed to Spain, where he obtained a royal permit for the conquest of the island of Trinidad. He returned to Porto Rico; he recruited 150 men, and sailed early in 1530, landing on the southwest coast of the island in the territory of Caicrque Chacomar, by whom he was received in a friendly manner. Soon the abuses of his followers caused a general revolt, but, aided by Chacomar, Sedeno defeated the natives in many encounters, and built a fortress, which he called Pari. Leaving a garrison, he returned in 1531 to Porto Rico, carrying many Carib prisoners; but on his arrival he was forced to release them. Although meanwhile Geromino Ortal had been appointed adelantado of Trinidad and taken possession of Fort Paria, and Sedeno's claim had been declared void by the audiencia of Santo Domingo, the latter gathered some troops in Porto Rico, to whom he promised the fabulous wealth of the river Meta, which was included in his original grant. He landed in Trinidad during Ortal's absence, captured Fort Paria by surprise, and, entering by the river Pedernales, invaded the mainland, where he had serious disputes with Ortal about the boundaries of his province. He was finally poisoned by his native enemy, the chief of Cubagua.

SEGDWICK, John, soldier, b. in Cornwall, Conn., 13 Sept., 1813; d. near Spottsylvania Court House, Va., 9 May, 1864. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837, 24th in a class of fifty members, among whom were Gen. Joseph Hooker,

Vol. V.—29
Gen. Braxton Bragg and Gen. Jubal A. Early. Immediately after his graduation he served in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians. His first engagement was a skirmish near Fort Clinch, 20 May, 1838. The same year he was employed in removing the Cherokees to their new home beyond the Mississippi. He was made 1st lieutenant of artillery, 19 April, 1839. In the Mexican war he was successively brevetted captain and major for gallant conduct at Contreras, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. He also distinguished himself at the head of his command in the attack on the San Carlos in front of Monterey. He served in the city of Mexico. He was made captain, 26 Jan., 1849, major of the 1st cavalry, 8 March, 1855, and served in Kansas and on the western frontier. At the beginning of the civil war he was lieutenant-colonel of the 2d cavalry. On 25 April, 1861, he was promoted to the colonelcy of the 1st cavalry, and on 31 Aug. was commissioned a brigadier-general of volunteers and placed in command of a brigade of the Army of the Potomac, which in the subsequent organization of the army was assigned to the 2d corps, under Gen. Sumner. Gen. Sedgwick assuming command of the 3d division. In this capacity he took part in the siege of Yorktown and the subsequent pursuit of the enemy up the peninsula, and rendered good service at the battle of Fair Oaks. In all the seven days' fighting, and particularly at Savage Station and Glendale, he bore an honorable part, and at the battle of Antietam he exhibited conspicuous gallantry, exposing himself recklessly. On this occasion he was twice wounded, but refused for two hours to be taken from the field. On 23 Dec., he was appointed major-general of volunteers, and in the succeeding February he assumed command of the 6th army corps. At the head of these troops he carried M'gree's Heights in the rear of Fredericksburg during the Chancellorsville campaign in May, 1863, and, after the retreat of Gen. Joseph Hooker across the Rappahannock, succeeded only by very hard fighting in withdrawing his command in the face of a superior force, against which he had contended for a whole day, to the left bank of the river. He commanded the left wing of the Army of the Potomac during the advance from the Rappahannock into Maryland in June, and also at the succeeding battle of Gettysburg, where he arrived on the second day of the fighting, after one of the most extraordinary forced marches on record, his steady courage inspiring confidence among his troops. During the passage of Rapidan river on 7 Nov., 1863, he succeeded, by a well-executed manoeuvre, in capturing a whole Confederate division with guns and colors, for which he was thanked by Gen. Meade in a general order. In command of his corps he took part in the spring campaign of the Wilderness under Gen. Grant, and on 5 and 6 May had position on the National right wing, where the hardest fighting of those sanguinary engagements took place. Three days later, while directing the placing of some pieces of artillery in position in the intrenchments in front of Pennsylvania Court-House, he was struck in the head by a bullet from a sharpshooter and instantly killed. Gen. Sedgwick was one of the oldest, ablest, and bravest soldiers of the Army of the Potomac, inspiring both officers and men with the fullest confidence in his military capacity. His simplicity and honest manliness endeared him, notwithstanding he was a strict disciplinarian, to all with whom he came in contact, and his corps was in consequence one of the best in discipline and morale in the army. He declined the command of the Army of the Potomac just before it was given to Gen. Meade, but several times held it temporarily during that general's absence. A fine bronze statue of Gen. Sedgwick stands on the plateau at West Point.

SEDGWICK, Robert, soldier, b. in England about 1600; d. in Jamaica, W. I., 24 May, 1636. He had been a member of the Artillery company in London, and settled in Charlestown, Mass., in 1636. He engaged in business, became a successful merchant, and was for many years a deputy from Charlestown to the general court. He was one of the founders of the Ancient and Honorable artillery company in 1638, its captain in 1640, and commanded the castle in 1641. In 1643 he became colonel of the Middlesex regiment, and in 1652 commander of all the Massachusetts militia. He was associated with John Winthrop, Jr., in 1643–4, in establishing the first furnace and iron-works in the country. He was employed to expel the French from Pentucket in 1654, was engaged in the expedition against the Spanish West Indies in 1655, when Jamaica was taken, and was one of three commissioners appointed by Cromwell to govern that island. Just before his death the protector advanced him to the sole command with the rank of major-general. His descendant, Theodore, statesman, b. in Hartford, Conn., in 1746; d. in Boston, 24 Jan., 1813, lost his father when he was thirteen years of age, and was aided by his brother to enter Yale, which he entered in 1759, and from which he graduated in 1765, owing to a slight misdemeanor, without being graduated. He afterward studied divinity, but abandoned it for law, was admitted to the bar in April, 1766, and practiced in Great Barrington, and afterward in Shefield, Mass. Though always strongly attached to the mother country, he engaged in the war of the Revolution on the side of the colonies, served as aide to Gen. John Thomas in his expedition to Canada in 1776, and was subsequently actively engaged in procuring supplies for the army. He represented Sheffield in the Massachusetts legislature both before and after the Revolution, and was a member of the Continental congress in 1783–4. In the winter of 1787 he was active in the suppression of Shays's rebellion, and incurred the especial enmity of the insurgents, who frequently threatened his life. His house was attacked by them during his absence in the legislature. He was an active member of the Massachusetts convention that ratified the constitution of the United States in 1788. In 1799 he was elected to congress, of which he remained a representative by successive elections till March, 1836, when he was elected to the U. S. Senate. He served in this body for seven years, and was president pro tempore in 1797. In 1799 he was again elected to the house of representatives, and was chosen its speaker. In 1802 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, which office he held till his death. Soon after the adoption of the Massachusetts constitution Elizabeth Freeman, a negro slave of great force of character and intelligence, having fled from her master in consequence of cruel treatment, Judge Sedgwick defended her from the latter's suit to recover his slave. The court pronounced her free, thus making the earliest practical application, so far as known, of the declaration of the Massachusetts bill of rights, that "all men are born free and equal." He was an active member of the old Federal party, and an intimate associate of many of its leaders. His judicial opinions were remarkable for clearness of expression and elegance of diction. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, and in 1799 received the degree of LL. D. from Princeton.—His eldest son, Theodore, lawyer, b. in Sheffield, Mass., 31 Dec., 1789; d. in Pittsfield, Mass., 7 Nov., 1839, was graduated at Yale in 1809; studied law with his father, was admitted to the bar in 1801, and practised at Albany until 1821, when he removed to Stockbridge, Mass., owing to impaired health, and retired from the active practice of his profession. He afterward interested himself in agriculture, was repeatedly chosen president of the Agricultural society of the county, was a member of the legislature in 1824, 1825, and 1827, and in the last year carried through a bill for the construction of a railroad across the mountains from Boston to Albany, which had been generally regarded as a chimerical scheme. He was for a series of years the unsuccessful candidate of the Democratic party for lieutenant-governor. He was an earnest advocate of free-trade and temperance, and an opponent of slavery. His death resulted from a stroke of apoplexy, which occurred at the close of an address to the Berkshire agricultural society of Pittsfield. He published "Hints to my Countrymen" (1826); "Public and Private Economy, illustrated by Observations made in Europe in 1836-7" (3 vols., New York, 1838); and addresses to the Berkshire agricultural association (1823 and 1830).—His wife, Susan Ridley, author, b. about 1789; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1867, was a granddaughter of Gov. William Livingston, of New Jersey, and the author of "Moral of Pleasure" (Philadelphia, 1839); "The Young Emigrants" (Boston, 1830); "Allen Prescott" (2 vols., New York, 1835); "Alida, or Town or Country" (1844); and "Walter Thorneby" (1830). The Sedgwick mansion at Stockbridge is seen in the illustration on page 452.—Stockley Dwight, second son of the first Theodore, author, b. in Sheffield, Mass., in 1785; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 23 Dec., 1831, was graduated at Williams college in 1804, and became an eminent member of the New York bar. He contributed to the "North American Review" and other journals, and published an "Appeal to the City of New York on the Proposed Alteration of its Charter in 1822". His "English Practise of the Common Law" (New York, 1832) was an argument against the complexity and absurdity of that system which was one of the first suggestions of the code of civil procedure afterward adopted by the state of New York. He was an ardent opponent of slavery and an advocate of free-trade, in support of which he published numerous papers, including a series of forty-seven articles in the "Banner of the Constitution." Mr. Sedgwick was instrumental in persuading William Cullen Bryant to remove to New York, and was one of the first to appreciate his talents. During the struggle of the Greeks for independence two frigates that had been built for them in this country were detained to answer exorbitant charges for their construction. Through the exertions of Mr. Sedgwick and his associate counsel one of the ships was discharged from attachment and sent to Greece. His death was caused by paralysis, brought on by his efforts in this litigation. His "Refutation of the Reasons in the Award in the Case of the Two Greek Frigates" was subsequently published (1826).—The first Theodore's daughter, Catherine Maria, author, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 28 Dec., 1789; d. near Roxbury, Mass., 31 July, 1867, received an excellent education, and, on her father's death in 1813, undertook the management of a private school for young ladies, and continued it for fifty years. Her brother's Theodore and Henry encouraged the development of her powers. Miss Sedgwick's first work of fiction, "A New England Tale," appeared anonymously (New York, 1822; last ed., with "Miscellanies," 1836), and its very favorable reception encouraged her to prosecute authorship. "Redwood" followed (2 vols., 1834), also anonymous. It was reprinted in England, and translated into several European languages, the French translator erroneously attributing the authorship to James Fenimore Cooper. "The Traveller" appeared next (1826); "Hope Leslie, or Early Times in Massachusetts" (2 vols., 1827); "Clarence, a Tale of Our Own Times" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1830); "Le Bousu," one of the "Tales of the Glauber Spa" (1832); and "The Linwoods, or Sixty Years Since in America" (2 vols., 1833). This was the last, and by many is thought to be the best, of her novels. That year she also published a collection of her "Sketches and Tales" from the magazines. She next issued a series of papers illustrative of common every-day life, and incalculating moral lessons, under the title of "The Poor Rich Man and the Rich Poor Man" (New York, 1836); in 1837, "Live and Let Live" issued in 1838 "A Love-Token for Children" and "Means and Ends, or Self-Training." In the spring of 1839 she visited Europe, travelling for a year, and conveying her impressions in "Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home," which were published after her return (2 vols., 1841). These were followed that same year by "Historical Sketches of the Old Painters" and biographies of the sisters "Lucetia and Margaret Davidson." Among her other works are "Wilton Harvey, and Other Tales" (1845); "Moral of Manners" (1846); "Facts and Fancies" (1848); and "Married or Single?" (1857). Miss Sedgwick both edited and wrote articles for literary periodical publications, and she contributed largely to the annuals. Collections of these papers constitute several volumes of her works. She is thoroughly American in thought and feeling, and with very marked individuality, of the best New England type. Her delineations of character and manners, as then found, in her native state, are unsurpassed for their picturesqueness and truth. See her "Life and Letters," by Mary E. Dewey (New York, 1871).—Elizabeth Dwight, author, married Charles, a son of the first Theodore, and was well known as a teacher. She wrote "Beatitudes and Pleasant Sundays," "Lessons without Books," "A Talk with my Pupils" (New York, 1865), and "Spanish Conquest."—The second Theodore's son Theodore, lawyer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 27 Jan., 1811; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 9 Dec., 1859, was graduated at Columbia in 1829, and admitted to the bar in May, 1833. The following fifteen months he passed in Europe, principally in Paris, as an attaché to the U. S. embassy under Edward Livingston. On his return he practised law successfully in New York till 1850, when failing health forced him to desist for a time from active professional life. President Buchanan tendered him the mission to the Hague in 1857, and he twice declined the office of assistant secretary of state. In January, 1858, he was appointed U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York, which office he held till his death. He was a member of the New York Crystal palace association in 1852. Mr. Sedgwick was a frequent contributor to periodicals and newspapers and published "Mourning of William Livingston" (New York, 1833); "What is Monopoly?" (1835); "Statement re New York Court of Chancery" (1838); "Thoughts on the Annexation of Texas," a series of papers in opposition to that measure (1844); "Treatise on the Measure of Damages, or an Inquiry into the Principles which govern the Amount of Compensation in Suits at Law" (1847); "The American Citizen: a Discourse, at Union College" (1847); and "Treatise on the Rules which govern the Interpretation and Application of Statutory and Constitutional Law" (1857; 2d ed., enlarged, with notes by John Norton Pomeroy, 1874). He edited the political writings of William Leggett (2 vols., New York, 1840).—The third Theodore's son, Arthur George, lawyer, b. in New York city, 6 Oct., 1844, was graduated at Harvard in 1864, became 1st lieutenant in the 25th Massachusetts regiment, was captured at Deep Bottom, Va., and confined in Libby prison during the latter part of the summer of 1864. His confinement having produced an illness which incapacitated him for further service, he entered Harvard law-school, and after graduation was admitted to the Boston bar, where he practised law for several years, during part of this time editing the "American Law Review" with Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Returning to New York in 1872, he practised, and was also for some time one of the editors of the "Evening Post," and also of the "Nation," to which he constantly contributed legal, political, and critical articles. He edited the 5th edition of his father's work on "Damages" (New York, 1869), and with G. Willett Van Nest the 7th (1890). He also published, with F. S. Wait, "A Treatise on the Principles and Practice of Government, in Massachusetts and New York," and "John, grandnephew of the first Theodore, was born in New York city, 22 June, 1829; d. in Norfolk, Conn., 11 Sept., 1897, was graduated at the University of New York, and was assistant district attorney of New York. Since 1 Jan., 1872, he had been judge of the superior court of the city of New York.—Selley, William Henry, actor, b. in Montgomery, Wiles, 4 Dec., 1809; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 17 Jan., 1872. He was the son of a British army officer, who was killed in the peninsular war. The boy left home when he was fourteen years old, joined a company of strolling players, and, assuming the name of W. H. Smith, began to play minor parts in the Shrewsbury theatre. In 1832 he obtained his first regular engagement at the New Theatre in New York, and, in 1837, the country. He was the first American who practised his profession in San Francisco. He subsequently engaged in journalism, was one of the editors of the New York "Times," and the "Evening Post," and for some time was an editor of the "Commercial Advertiser." He is the author of "Dungerfield's Best of Romance" (New York, 1864), and "Marion Rooko, or the Quest for Fortune" (1865), and also contributed to magazines. He died in New York city, 18 Jan., 1899.—Selley, Julius Hawley, educator, b. in Bethel, Conn., 14 Sept., 1824; d. in Amherst, Mass., 12 May, 1893. He was graduated at Amherst, studied for the ministry at Andover, and, on his ordination in theology at Halle, Germany, in 1852-'3, he was ordained to the classis of Schenectady in 1853, and in that year became pastor of the 1st Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N. Y., where he remained until 1858. In that year he was elected professor of mental and moral philosophy at Amherst college, which post he held until 1874, when he was chosen to congress in 1874 from Massachusetts without being nominated by any party, serving from 6 Dec., 1875, till 3 March, 1877, and at the end of his term declined a renomination. While in congress, though a Republican, he opposed the electoral commission and the declaration of the election of Rutherford B. Hayes to the office of president of the United States. In 1874 he was installed as president of Amherst college, which office he resigned in 1890. In 1872 he visited India by invitation, and delivered an address. In 1873 he was appointed by the governor of Massachusetts one of a commission to revise the laws of that state on taxation. During the early years of his presidency at Amherst he inaugurated the "Amherst system" of college self-government, by which the students have a large share in maintaining discipline, and which has been productive of good results. President Seelye had been a trustee of the Clarke institute for deaf-mutes, and of Smith college for women, and had served on the board of visitors of Andover theological seminary. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1862, and that of L. L. D. from Columbia in 1876. In addition to articles in various reviews, sermons and addresses, and contributions to religious magazines, he published: "An Account of the Travels of Albert Seeligman," "History of Philosophy" (New York, 1856); "Lectures to Educated Hindus" (Bombay, 1873; republished by the Congregational publishing society, Boston, 1878, under the title "The Way, the Truth, the Life"; also translated into Hindustani, Japanese, and German); "Christian Missions" (New York, 1875); and revised and edited Hickok's "Moral Philosophy," Boston 1880.-His brother, Laurens Clark, educator, b. in Bethel, Conn., 20 Sept., 1837, was graduated at Union college in 1857, studied at Andover theological seminary in 1857-9, and was at Berlin and Heidelberg universities in 1860-2. He afterward travelled in Europe, Egypt, and Palestine, and in 1863 was ordained pastor of the North Congregational church at Springfield, Mass., where he remained two years. He was professor of English literature and oratory at Amherst from 1865 till 1873, and in 1874 became president of Smith college for young women (which he had organized) at Northampton, Mass. His various contributions to reviews include articles on college education and on Celtic literature. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him at Union college, 1865.

SEEMAN, Berthold German traveller, b. in Hanover, Germany, 29 Feb., 1825; d. at the Jabali mine, Nicaragua, 10 Oct., 1871. He was educated at the lyceum of his native city, took his degree at the University of Göttingen, and was appointed in 1840 naturalist on board the British government vessel "Herald" on an exploring expedition round the world. He subsequently served on three arctic voyages (1846-51), and published "A Narrative of the Voyage of the 'Herald,' and Three Cruises to the Arctic Regions in Search of Sir John Franklin" (London, 1852). Then appeared "Popular History of Palms" (1855), and "Botany of the Voyage of the 'Herald'" (1857). He was appointed in 1869 by the colonial office one of the royal commissioners to the Fiji islands, to ascertain their fitness for British colonization, the results of which appeared in "Viti, an Account of a Government Mission to the Viti, or Fiji Islands" (1862). He also issued "Popular Nomenclature of the American Flora," "Paradisus Vindobonensis," and "Twenty-four Views of the Coast and Islands." He accompanied Capt. Richard Parry on his travels to Central America, and, in collaboration with him, wrote "Dottings on the Roadside in Panama, Nicaragua, and Mosquito" (1869). He was editor of the "Bonplandia" and of the "Journal of Botany, British and Foreign." Dr. Seeman contributed largely to scientific, literary, and political journals in London. "Flora Vitiensis," he completed only a short time before his death.

SETON, John, actor, b. in Liverpool, Eng., 16 Jan., 1803; d. in New York city, 19 Sept., 1885. He began the study of law in 1818, but preferring the stage, entered upon his professional career at the age of sixteen. He came to this country in 1827, played for two seasons at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia, and gained great popularity in New York as Jimmey Twitcher in the "Golden Farmer." He was stage-manager at the Astor place opera-house during the Macready riot, and afterward held the same post at the Tremont theatre, Philadelphia, at Charleston and Columbia, S. C., and at New Orleans, La. His last appearance was at the Broadway theatre in October, 1867. In certain comic parts he had no superior either in this country or in England.

SEGAR, Joseph E., member of congress, b. in King William county, Va., 1 June, 1844; d. in 1883. He received a common-school education, and in 1866 was elected to the state house of representatives, where he served for several terms. He was elected to congress as a Unionist from Virginia, serving from 6 May, 1862, till 3 March, 1864, and was chosen U. S. senator from Virginia in the place of Lemuil J. Bowden, deceased, but was not admitted to a seat. He was appointed a commissioner on the part of the United States under the United States and Spanish claims convention of 1877.

SEGHERS, Charles John, archbishop, b. in Ghent, Belgium, 26 Dec., 1839; d. in Alaska, 28 Nov., 1886. He studied for the priesthood in the ecclesiastical seminary of Ghent, and afterward in the American college, Louvain, was ordained a priest at Molsheim in 1863, and went to Vancouver's island as a missionary, rising to be vicar-general. During these years he also labored for the conversion of the Indians in British North America. In 1871 he was made administrator of the diocese, and on 29 June, 1873, he was consecrated bishop of Vancouver's island. His accession to the episcopate gave a great impulse to Roman Catholicism in the north. He was succeeded by his archbishop who attempted the conversion of the Alaskan Indians. In 1878 he visited that territory and all the adjacent islands, travelling on snowshoes and afterward going on dog-sleds or canoes among the tribes in the interior and along the coast. Toward the end of the year he was appointed coadjutor archbishop of Oregon and reached Portland on 1 July, 1879. He spent a year in exploring Washington territory, Idaho, and Montana, and published a series of letters in Roman Catholic periodicals in the eastern states, describing his adventures. In 1881 he succeeded to the archbishopric, but for several years he had been anxious to resign his see in order to devote himself to the conversion of the Alaska Indians, and he visited Europe in 1884. He obtained permission from the pope. His resignation was at length accepted, and he was reappointed bishop of Vancouver's island, retaining his title of archbishop. On his return he stopped at Baltimore, Md., to take part in the 3d plenary council in 1884, and he reached Victoria early in the following year. He then set about re-establishing among the Alaska Indians the mission that had come to a stand-still during his absence in Oregon. He left Victoria in July, 1886, for Alaska in company with two Jesuits and a guide named Fuller, according to some accounts an Englishman, according to others an American.
They arrived safely at Chilean, and then travelled northward along the coast until they reached the station of the Alaska trading company at the head of Stewart's river. Leaving the Jesuits to establish a mission among the Stekn Indians, the archbishop, with Fuller and some Indian guides, set out on 8 Sept. for Muklakayet, a village near the mouth of the Tanana river, which he reached on 24 Oct. He spent a few weeks in missionary duties among the Indians, during which he had a well-received, and then decided to push on to Nulato, 200 miles down the Yukon river. Travelling on sleds, the party arrived at a deserted village about thirty miles from their destination. They entered a hut, and, after making a fire, lay down before it. At daylight the next morning Fuller, who had several times exhibited anger at being drawn farther and farther into these desolate regions, levelled his rifle at the archbishop and shot him. The murderer, while afterward expressing great remorse, gave no sufficient reason for committing the crime. Arch bishop Segers, besides being one of the most adventurous of explorers, was a divine of great erudition and an effective propagator.

SEGUIN, Adolphe, Edward Sheldon, actor and singer, b. in London, England, 7 April, 1809; d. in New York city, 13 Dec., 1832. He was one of the earliest pupils of the Royal academy of music, from which he retired in 1820 with all the honors. He first appeared at the Queen's theatre, London, in 1831, as Polyphemus in Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and in 1828 came to this country and made his first appearance on the American stage on 15 Oct., at the National theatre, New York, as Gen. Von der Teimer in the opera of "Amelie." He afterward performed in the principal cities with great success as a bass-singer and comic actor.

—His wife, whose maiden name was Ann Childe, b. in London, England, in 1814, was a pupil of the Royal academy of music, and appeared for several seasons at Her Majesty's theatre, London. She was long a member of the Italian opera company in that city, and first appeared on the American stage, 15 Oct., 1838, at the National theatre, New York city. She subsequently travelled as a star through the United States and gained great popularity. She made her first appearance in Philadelphia, 4 Nov., 1839, as Cenerina in "Der Freischultz," but afterward retired from the stage and engaged in teaching in New York, where she died in 1888.

SEGUIN, Edouard, physician, b. in Clamecy, France, 20 Jan., 1812; d. in New York city, 28 Oct., 1880. He was educated at the College of Auxerre and St. Louis, and then studied medicine and surgery under Jean Gaspard Itard. At the suggestion of Harl he determined to devote himself to the training of idiots, and thoroughly investigated the causes and philosophy of idiocy and the best means of dealing with it. In 1837 he began to treat an idiot boy, and in 1839 he opened the first school for idiots. He was soon able to obtain remarkable results by his system of training. In 1840 a commission from the Academy of sciences in Paris investigated the results of his method with idiot children, and in their report declared that, up to the time when he began his labors, idiots could not be educated or cured by any means, but that he had solved the problem. After the revolution of 1848 he came to the United States, and after visiting various schools, modelled on his own, that had been established in the United States, and assisting in their organization, he settled in Cleveland, and later in Portsmouth, Ohio. In 1869 he removed to Mount Vernon, N. Y., and he received the degree of M. D. from the medical department of the University of the city of New York in 1861, after which he came to reside in New York city.

Subsequent to 1866 he devoted attention to the study of animal heat, adding greatly to the knowledge on that subject by the methods of thermometry that he devised and the instruments he invented, of which the physiological thermometer, largely used by physicians, is the most immediately important. He was a commissioner to the World's fair in Vienna from the United States, and published a special "Report on Education." He was a member of various medical societies, and was president of the Association of medical officers of American institutions for idiotic and feeble-minded persons. To Dr. Segur more than any other person is due the honor of showing to what degree the congenital failures of nature can be redeemed and educated to comparative usefulness. According to his testimony, "not one idiot in a thousand has been entirely refractory to treatment, not one in a hundred has not been made more happy and healthy; more than thirty percent have been taught to conform to social and moral law, and rendered capable of order, of good feeling, and of working like men; third of the remaining become capable of the ordinary transactions of life under friendly control, of understanding moral and social abstractions, of working like two-thirds of a man; and twenty-five to thirty percent come nearer and nearer to the standard of manhood, till some of them will defy the scrutiny of good judges when compared with ordinary young men and women.

His writings, which are numerous, include: "Résu- mé de ce que nous avons fait pendant quatorze mois" (Paris, 1839); "Conseils à M. O. sur l'éducation de son enfant idiot" (1839); "Théorie et pratique de l'éducation des idiots" (2 parts, 1841—2); "Hygiène et éducation des idiots" (1843); "Images graduées à l'usage des enfants arriérés et idiots" (1846); "Traitemen moral, hygiène et éducation des idiots et des autres arriérés" (1846), which is accepted as the standard authority on the subject; "Jacob Rodrigue Pêche, notice sur sa vie et ses travaux" (1847); "Historical Notice of the Origin and Progress of the Treatment of Idi- ots" (translated by Dr. John S. Newbery, Hartford, 1850); "Idiocy and its Treatment by the Physiological Method" (New York, 1850); and "Remarques concernant l'Idiozy" (1879); "Prescription and Clinical Record" (1870); "Medical Thermometry," with C. A. Wunderlich (1871); "Manual of Thermometry for Mothers" (1873); "Thermomètres physiologiques" (Paris, 1873); "Tableaux de thermomètre mathématique" (1873); and "Medical Thermometry and Human Temperature" (New York, 1876).

SÉGUR, Louis Philippe, Comte de, French historian, b. in Paris, 10 Dec., 1753; d. there, 27 Aug., 1830. He was the eldest son of the field-marshall Louis de Ségur, studied in the school of artillery at Strasburg, and obtained in 1769 the commission of lieutenant of cavalry. He was promoted captain in 1771, and major in 1776. He became an advocate of the cause of the American colonists at court, and as early as 1777 asked from the king permission to serve in this country as a volunteer, but was reprimanded. He was afterward appointed colonel of the regiment "Soissons," and embarked on 5 April, 1781, in the frigate "La Gloire." He served during the remainder of the war, and after the withdrawal of the French forces in 1782 obtained leave to remain, and visited the southern states, Mexico, Peru, and Santo Domingo, where he owned a large estate. A few years later in his "Mélanges" he published the journal of his travels, which attracted much attention. He was minister to Russia in 1784–9, and to Berlin in 1792. Ruined by the revolution, he supported his family during the following years in most extremerly by his pen. He was deputy to the corps législatif in 1801, elected in 1803 a member of the French academy, and afterward became a councillor of state, grand master of the ceremonies, count of the empire in 1810, and a senator, 5 April, 1814. After the restoration of the Bourbons he became a peer of France, 4 June, 1814, and always sided with the liberals. His works include "Planches politiques" (Paris, 1795); "Mélanges" (1796); "Tableau historique et politique de l'Europe, 1780–1796" (3 vols., 1801); "Histoire de Frédéric Guillaume II." (1801); "Politique de tous les cabinets de l'Europe pendant les régnes de Louis XV. and Louis XVI." (3 vols., 1801–02); "Galerie morale et politique" (3 vols., 1817–24); "Histoire de France" (9 vols., 1824–29); and "Mémoires sur souvenirs et anecdotes" (3 vols., 1824). His complete works were published in 1824 (33 vols.).

SEGURA, Juan Bautista (say-goo-'rahta), Spanish missionary, b. in Toledo, Spain; d. in Virginia in February, 1571. He entered the Society of Jesus at Alcala in April, 1566, was appointed vice-provincial of Florida in 1568, and sailed the same year from Florence with a mission of Moravians. Landed at Havana, he made arrangements for the education of young Indians, and then set out for the province of Carlos in Florida. He spent several months in studying the language, at the same time attending to the spiritual interests of the Spanish soldiers. When able to converse with the natives, he labored for about a year in the countries along Apalachee Bay, but with little success. Thinking that he would have better prospects at a distance from the Spanish ports, he accepted the offer of a converted Indian, Luis de Velasco, who promised to conduct him in safety to his tribe and assist him in his plans endeavors. Accompanied by Luis, a Jesuit, and seven lay brothers, Segura sailed from Santa Helena on 5 Aug., 1570, entered the Spanish ports, ascended the Potomac, and landed on 10 Sept. The missionaries found the natives in a miserable condition, owing to a famine which had prevailed for several years, and therefore sent their vessel back for supplies, especially seed-corn, which they hoped to persuade the Indians to plant. They then pressed on through a vast tract of marsh and wood, expecting to find a village which Luis said was ruled by his brother. They spent more than a month travelling, living on roots and herbs, but without reaching their destination. In February they were deserted by their guide, who went to his brother's village, about five miles distant, promising to prepare his countrymen for their arrival. Some time having elapsed without hearing from him, Segura sent three of his company to beg him to return. The messengers were attacked and killed by Luis at the head of a band of Indians. Luis then proceeded to the hut which the missionaries had erected and demanded the hatchets and knives which they had with them. Segura gave them up silently, and then knelt with his companions in prayer. At a signal they were all massacred, only an Indian boy escaping. The remains given to the country which Segura attempted to evangelize was Axacan. It lay between the Potomac and the Rappahannock, probably extending on each side of these rivers. He wrote "Tratado de la Humildad y Obediencia" (Madrid, 1690).

SEGUROLA, Sebastian de (say-goo-ro-'la), Spanish-American soldier, b. in Guipuzcoa, Spain, 27 Jan., 1749; d. in La Paz, Bolivia, 2 Oct., 1789. After pursuing the studies then necessary for the career of arms, he was appointed a cadet in the regiment of royal guards in 1786. In 1788 he was sent from Cadiz to take part in the expedition sent by the viceroy of Buenos Ayres to check the incursions of the Portuguese on Spanish territory. He was decorated with the cross of Calatrava for his services, and appointed corregidor over the province of Lareaja. He took part in the campaign on the Rio de la Plata, and, on the conclusion of peace, fixed his residence in Sorata, the principal town of his government of Lareaja. Here he received intelligence of the rebellion of Jose Gabriel Tupac-Amaru, cacique of Tungasuca, which extended to several provinces, and he was ordered to take command of the city of La Paz and the neighboring provinces on 1 Jan., 1781. The siege of La Paz was the most memorable incident in the rebellion, and the city's safety was entirely due to his firmness and energy. In 1782 he was raised to the rank of brigadier, and appointed governor of the city, which post he held until his death. His "Diario de los sucesos del cerco de la ciudad de La Paz en 1781 hasta la total pacificación de la rebellion general del Perú," printed in the first volume of the "Archivo Boliviano" (Paris, 1871), cured Moravian evangelists among the white settlers and the hostile tribes, and contains interesting letters from the Inca and other Indian chiefs.

SEIDEL, Nathaniel, Moravian bishop, b. in Lauban, Silesia, 2 Oct., 1718; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 17 May, 1782. He emigrated to this country in 1742, and became the most indefatigable of the Moravian missionaries among the white settlers and the Indians. For eighteen years his life was an almost uninterrupted succession of journeys. He began such itinerant work with a visit to the aborigines of the Susquehanna in 1748; after that he repeatedly traversed Pennsylvania as far as Sunbury, the eastern counties of New York, New England as far as Boston, and Maryland as far as Frederick. He performed part of his work on horseback, and the subsequent expeditions against the hostile tribes, and contains interesting letters from the Inca and other Indian chiefs.
groundless suspicion of having been engaged in outrages in Pennsylvania, so affected him that his health gave way and he died two months later. An old record says of him: "His episcopate was precious and excellent; his memory will live in this country, in the West Indies, and among the Indians of our Latin-American missions."

SEIDEBUSH, Rupert, R. C., bishop, b. in Munich, 13 Oct., 1820; d. in Richmond, Va., 3 June, 1893. He began his theological studies in Bavaria, and emigrated to the United States in 1851. In 1852 he entered the Benedictine order in St. Vincent's abbey, Westmoreland co., Pa. He was raised to the priesthood on 22 June, 1853, was for some years stationed at Newark, N. J., and in 1887 was made abbot of the monastery of St. Louis on the Lake, Minn. The northern part of Minnesota was erected into a vicariate apostolic by a papal brief on 12 Feb., 1875, and he was appointed its vicar apostolic on 30 May following, under the title of bishop of Itala in partibus. The Roman Catholic church has made great progress during his administration. In his diocese he sustained 35 priests, 6 college students, 90 churches, 50 chapels and stations, 14 convents, a monastery, seminary, college and academy. The Roman Catholic population, including white and Indian, exceeded 45,000.

SEIP, Theodore Lorenzo (sipe), clergyman, b. in Eastern, Pa., 25 June, 1842. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1864, and at the same time in theological studies, in Philadelphia, in 1867, and in the latter year was ordained to the ministry. Immediately after his ordination he became principal of the academic department of the newly established Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa. He was adjunct professor of Greek there in 1867-72, professor of Latin in 1872-80, of Greek in 1880-86, and president of the college since 1886. He received the degree of D.D. in 1886 from the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Seip has done more than any other man for the successful establishment and endowment of Muhlenberg college. He is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church. Besides sermons and addresses, he has published "Inaugural Address at the Dedication of the College," (Allentown, Pa., 1886); "Muhlenberg College," an address delivered before the ministry of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1887); and "History of the College Association of Pennsylvania," of which he was a founder (1887).

SEISS, Joseph Augustus (sees), theologian, b. in Graeachau, Frederick co., Md., 18 March, 1823. His ancestors, whose original name was Sissi, emigrated from the Alsatian mountains and settled near Reading, Pa. His grandfather removed at an early period to the Moravian settlement of Graeuchau, Md. His father, who was a farmer, would have preferred him to be a field-laborer, and, on account of his studious habits and thirst for knowledge, called him "dumber Joseph," but his mother sympathized with him and encouraged him. After his confirmation, in his sixteenth year, as a member of the Moravian church, he determined to devote his life to the ministry. Receiving no encouragement from his father or his church, he was, by the help of a few Lutheran clergymen, enabled to enter Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1839. Here he remained a year or two, afterward pursu ing his theological course in private. In 1842 he was licensed to preach by the synod of Virginia, and in 1844 he was ordained to the Lutheran ministry. After holding pastorates in Virginia and Maryland he was called to St. John's English Lutheran church, Philadelphia, in 1858. In 1874 the necessity for an English Lutheran church in the western part of the city led to the establishment of the church of the Holy Communion by members of St. John's congregation, and he was at once elected its pastor. A beautiful Gothic church of green serpentine marble was erected on the corner of Broad and Arch streets, at a cost of $825,000. It was consecrated on 1 Feb., 1879, and became one of the finest Protestant churches in Philadelphia. Dr. Seiss is an eloquent pulpit orator. His style is clear, ornate, attractive, and forcible. He published his first work at the age of twenty-two years, and has now attained a wide reputation as an author. His publications number more than a hundred, and some of them have been republished in England and translated into other languages. A bibliography of his published works (Philadelphia, 1887) makes a duodecimo volume of fifteen-seven pages. He was joint editor of the "Lutheran," Philadelphia, in 1860-1, and of the "Lutheran and Missionary" in 1861-73, editor of the same for several years, and editor of "Prophetic Times" in 1863-73. He spent the years 1864-5 in European and Eastern travels, including a tour through Syria and Palestine. His numerous publications include "Popular Lectures on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (Baltimore, 1846); "The Baptist System Examined" (Philadelphia, 1854; revised ed., 1858); "The Last Times" (1856); "The Lutheran Church" (1859); "Holy Types" (1860); "Petros, or the Wonderful Building" (1862); "Lectures on the Epistle of the Church Year" (2 vols., 1868); "The Apocalypse, with Revised Text" (3 vols., 1869-71; complete ed., London, 1882; German translation, Bielefeld, 1884-7); "Urriol, or Some Occasional Discourses" (1874); "A Miracle in Stone, or the Great Pyramid" (1877); "Recreation Songs" (1878; with supplement, 1877); "Life after Death" (1878); "Practical Sermons" (1879); "Blossoms of Faith" (1880); "Remarks on Indul- dency" (1882); "The Gospel in the Stars" (1882; enlarged ed., 1885); "Luther and the Reformation" (1883); "Lectures on the Epistles of the Church Year" (2 vols., 1885); "Right Life" (1886); "The Children of Silence" (1887); and "Christ's Descent into Hell" (1887). He has also published various liturgical works, including "The Book of Forms" (1869); "How shall we Order our Worship" (1869); "The Golden Altar" (1882); and several collections of church music.

SELDEN, Samuel Lee, jurist, b. in Lyme, Conn., 12 Oct., 1800; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1876. His ancestors settled in the colony of Connecticut in 1636. He began to practise law in Rochester in 1824, and was chancellor clerk and first judge of common pleas in Monroe county for many years, and in 1847 was elected justice of the supreme court. In 1856 he was elected judge of the court of appeals, which place he resigned in 1862.—His brother, Henry Rogers, jurist, b. in Lyme, Conn., 14 Oct., 1805; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 18
Selkirk, or Seal Craig, Alexander, Scottish mariner, b. in Largo, Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1676; d. at sea in 1721. When a young lad he ran off to sea and engaged in several buccaneering expeditions, half exploring and half piratical. In 1703 he was sailing-master of a privateer called "Cinque Ports Galley," but, having had a quarrel with his captain, whose name was Stradling, he was, in September of the following year, at his own request, put on shore at Juan Fernandez, an uninhabited island 400 miles off the coast of Chili (seen in the accompanying illustration), with some necessaries, such as a knife, kettle, axe, gun, ammunition, and a few books. The island is twelve miles long, four miles broad, and mostly covered with mountains, the highest peak being 3,000 feet above the sea-level. There are also numerous fertile valleys, and many wild goats frequent the cliffs. In this lonely island Selkirk remained for four years and four months, till the arrival of two English vessels, under the command of Captain Rogers (q.v.), by whom he was finally taken off in February, 1709. Rogers made Selkirk his mate, and sailed with him round the world, reaching England on 14 Oct., 1711. In his account of his voyage (1712) he tells of Selkirk's experiences in the island. Selkirk had built two huts, the roofing being long grass, and the wainscoting the skins of goats. Pimento wood supplied his hearth and light, burning very clearly and yielding a fragrant smell. He made goat-skins into clothes, and petted cats and kids. Rogers also tells of Selkirk's difficulty in returning to the use of speech and to the ordinary provisions used on shipboard. Selkirk returned to Largo, eloped with a girl, married her, and brought her to London. He subsequently joined the navy, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. It is said that Daniel Defoe met Selkirk at Wapping.
ping, and that his adventures suggested "Robinson Crusoe," founded upon Selkirk's "Providence Display'd" (London, 1712), an exceedingly rare pamphlet. Cowper's "Lines on Solitude, supposed to be written by Alexander Selkirk," beginning "I am monarch of all I survey," are well known. See "The Life and Adventures of Alexander Selkirk," by John Howell (Edinburgh, 1829). A bronzen statue of Selkirk was recently unveiled at Largo on the site of the cottage in which the mariner was born.

SELKIRK, Edward, clergyman, b. in Waverton, Lancashire, 13 Oct., 1770. He was graduated at Trinity in 1801, at the General theological seminary in 1814, was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church the same year, and became priest in 1814. He was then rector of Trinity church, Albany, N. Y., in which he continued till 1834, when he became rector emeritus. He was an honorary canon of the Albany cathedral. He had published "An Address on the Laying of the Corner-Stone of Trinity Church" (Albany, 1844) and "History of Trinity Church" (1870).

SELKIRK, Thomas Douglas, Earl of, b. at the family-seat, St. Mary's isle, Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, in June, 1771; d. in Pau, France, 8 April, 1829. He studied at Edinburgh university from 1788 till 1790, early developing a taste for literary pursuits, and was an associate of Sir Walter Scott. He succeeded his brother as Lord Dacre in 1797, and his father as Earl of Selkirk in May, 1799. In 1803 he settled a colony of 500 Scottish Highlanders upon waste land that was given to him by the government in Prince Edward island, and soon afterward he established a small colony in Kent county on the Bay of Fundy. While on an excursion he conceived the project of planting a colony of evicted Highlanders from the estates of the Duke of Sutherland in the Red river country. To accomplish this he purchased a large tract of land on the Red river for colonization from the Hudson bay company. His Highland colonists began to arrive in 1811, and in 1812 the Red river colony was established. Trouble arose between the colony and the Northwest trading company, and the emigrants were driven from their new homes. In 1816 Lord Selkirk went to Red river to aid his colonists against their enemies, and, assisted by a small armed force, restored them to their lands and reimbursed them for their losses. He became financially embarrassed in consequence of the war of 1812, and in 1820 engaged in iron-making for the government. At this time he conceived the plan of a large iron works on the St. Lawrence river. He realized the plan, and in 1826 founded the Laprairie iron company, which in 1837 was reorganized as the Lake Superior iron company. He was declared insane in 1828, and spent the rest of his life in a private asylum.

SELLERS, William, mechanical engineer, b. in Upper Darby, Pa., 19 Sept., 1824. He was educated at a private school, and at the age of fourteen was apprenticed to a wheelwright. In 1844 he became foreman in the firm of William Sellers and Co., and in 1856 he moved to Philadelphia, where he became chief engineer of William Sellers and Co. (the senior partner of which firm was his second cousin), makers of machines' tools, and general millwrights. Since 1885 he has devoted himself chiefly to consulting practice. Mr. Sellers has obtained more than thirty letters-patent for inventions of his own, one of the first of which, a coupling device for shafting (1857), is the essential factor in the modern system of interchangeable shafting parts. His invention in 1866 of feed-disks for lathes or other machine tools was the first practical solution of the problem of the infinite gradation of feeds. His other patents relate chiefly to improvements of lathes or modifications of existing machines. The use of absorbent cotton for surgical operations was recommended by him as early as 1861, and he proposed the employment of glycerine in order to keep photographic plates wet. He was appointed professor of mechanics in the Franklin institute in 1881, and non-resident professor of engineering practice in Stevens institute of technology in 1888, both of which chairs he still (1898) holds. The order of St. Olaf was conferred on him by the king of Sweden in 1877, and the degree of doctor of engineering by Stevens institute in 1888. He was president of the Franklin institute during 1870-3, and of the American society of mechanical engineers during 1883-7. He has been a member of that office in the Pennsylvania society for the prevention of cruelty to animals and the photographic society of Philadelphia. He is a member of other learned societies both at home and abroad. Mr. Sellers was chosen a member of the Seybert commission to investigate the claims of Spiritualists, owing to his knowledge of sleight-of-hand, and in 1884 he was appointed a member of the committee by the society, from his childhood. He was American correspondent of the "British Journal of Photography" in 1861-3, and, in addition, contributed many papers to technical journals.
abroad, was elected to the American philosophical society in 1864, to the National academy of sciences in 1873, and correspondent of the Société d'encouragement pour l'industrie nationale in 1873. After the formation of the Fairmount park commission in 1867 he was appointed a commissioner for five years, during which time all of the land now comprised in this great park was purchased by the commission. He was active in the organization of the World's fair in Philadelphia in 1876, and was at the beginning vice-president of the management. In 1878 he was elected a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, and he is a director of several railroads. His publications include short papers and discussions on technical subjects.

SELLSTEDT, Lars Gustaf, artist, b. in Sundsvall, Sweden, 30 April, 1819. For several years he followed the life of a sailor, but came to the United States in 1834, and in 1842 settled in Buffalo, N. Y., where he still (1888) resides. Soon after his arrival in that city he began to paint, and during his studies profited much by association with Thomas Le Clear and William H. Beard. He has devoted himself chiefly to portraiture, his works in that line including Solomon G. Haven (1856): George W. Clinton (1862); Millard Filimore (1869); a portrait of himself in his studio, one of his best works (1871); Sherman S. Roger (1873); William G. Fargo (1871); Benjamin Fitch (1878); and Grover Cleveland (1884). He has also painted a few marine and genre pictures. Since 1858 he has exhibited frequently at the National academy, where he was elected an associate in 1871, and an academician in 1874. In Buffalo he has held office in the Fine arts academy since 1863.

SELWYN, Alfred Richard Cecil, Canadian geologist, b. in Somersetshire, England, in 1834. He was educated privately, and continued his studies in Switzerland, and in 1845 was appointed assistant on the geological survey of Great Britain. In 1852 he was made director of the geological survey of the colony of Victoria, Australia, in 1854 and 1859 he examined and reported upon coal-fields and gold-fields in Tasmania and South Australia, and other capacities until he left Australia in 1869, when he went to Canada and succeeded Sir William E. Logan as director of the geological survey of that country. He has contributed to and edited twenty volumes of annual reports of the geological and natural history survey. He was pensioned in 1893.

SELYNS, Henricus, clergyman, b. in Amsterdam, Holland, in 1639; d. in New York city in July, 1701. His ancestors were clergymen in the Reformed church in Holland for a century previous to his birth. He was educated for the ministry, and in 1660 was sent to this country by the classis of Amsterdam to become pastor of the Reformed Dutch church of Breukelen (Brooklyn). To supplement his salary, he was also permitted to keep a store. He was at the SYRENSVAN'S farm, Bowerie (now Bowery), New York, where he taught negroes and the poor whites. He returned to Holland in 1664, but in 1662 accepted a call from the 1st Reformed Dutch church of New York city, of which he was pastor until his death. He was on intimate terms with the most eminent men of his day, and was the chief of the early ministers of his church, and to secure for it an independent and permanent foundation under the English government. He and his consistory obtained, in May, 1696, the first church charter that was issued in the colony. Although his original work that has been preserved is scanty, he wrote much, and Cotton Mather says of his poetical powers that "he had so nimble a fancy for putting his devout thoughts into verse that upon this, as well as upon greater accounts, he was a David unto the blocks in the wilderness." He collected all the records of the New York Reformed Dutch church to the date of his own ministry, and transcribed them with his own pen. This volume is still extant and in good preservation in the records of the Reformed Dutch church of New York city. His only publications are "Poems" translated from the Dutch into English by Henry Murphey and printed in his "Anthology of the New Netherlands." in the collections of New York historical society, and a Latin poem (1657) prefixed to some editions of Cotton Mather's "Magnalia."

SEMME, Alexander Aldebaran, naval officer, b. in Washington, D. C., 8 August, 1814; d. in Hamilton, Va., 22 Sept., 1885. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 22 Oct., 1841, attended the naval academy at Annapolis, and became a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847. He was promoted to master, 11 Aug., 1855, and to lieutenant, 15 Sept., 1855. During the civil war he rendered creditable service in command of the steamer "Rhode Island" on the Atlantic coast blockade in 1861, and in the steamer "Wamsutta" on the South Atlantic blockade during which he conducted numerous engagements with forts and batteries on the coasts of Georgia and Florida, where he captured several blockade-runners in 1862-3. He commanded the monitor "Lehigh" in the bombardment of Fort Pringle, and participated in the operations at Charleston until that city surrendered. He cooperated with Grant's army, fought the Howlett house batteries, and was present at the fall of Richmond in 1865. He was commissioned a commander, 25 July, 1866, promoted to captain, 24 Aug., 1873, and stationed at the Pensacola navy-yard in 1873-5. In 1880 he was president of the board of inspection, after which he was commandant of the navy-yard at Washington. He was commissioned commodore, 10 March, 1882, and was in command of the navy-yard at the time of his death, but had left the care of his health in the hands of the Virginia Military Institute.

SEMME, Raphael, naval officer, b. in Charles county, Md., 27 Sept., 1809; d. in Mobile, Ala., 30 Aug., 1877. President John Quincy Adams appointed him a midshipman in the U. S. navy in 1826, but he did not enter upon active service until 1832, the intermediate years being spent in study. In 1834, after returning from his first cruise, he was admitted to the bar, but decided to remain a seaman. In 1837 he was promoted lieutenant, and in 1842 he removed to Alabama. At the beginning of the war with Mexico he was made flag-lieutenant under Com. Conner, commanding the squadron in the Gulf, and in the siege of Vera Cruz he was in charge of one of the naval batteries on shore. He was in command of the U. S. brig "Somers" on the blockade of the Mexican coast, when the brig foundered in a gale, and most of her crew were drowned. Lient.
Semmes served for several years as inspector of light-houses on the Gulf coast, in 1855 was promoted commander, and in 1859 became secretary of the light-house board at Washington. On the scession of Alabama, 15 Feb, 1861, he resigned his commission in the U. S. navy and reported to Jefferson Davis at Montgomery, who instructed him to return to the north and endeavor to procure mechanics skilled in the manufacture and use of ordnance and rifle machinery and the preparation of fixed ammunition and percussion-caps. He was in Washington at the time. In Washington
he examined the machinery of the arsenal, and conferred with mechanics whom he desired to go south. Within the next three weeks he made a tour through the principal workshops of New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, purchased large quantities of percussion-caps in New York, which were sent to Montgomery without any dis-guish, made contracts for light artillery, powder, and other munitions of war, and shipped thousands of pounds of powder to the south. He returned to Montgomery on 4 April, to find that he had been commissioned commander in the Confederate navy, and placed in charge of the light-house bureau, which he relinquished within two weeks to give to his attention the work of outfitting the vessels which he captured eighteen merchantmen.
Within the blockade of that ship at Tangiers by two U. S.
men-of-war, he sold her and went to England, having been promoted meantime to the rank of captain. There the fast steamer “Alabama” was built for him, and in August, 1863, he took command of her at the Azores islands, put to sea, and captured twenty-six American and Englishmen, most of which he burned at sea. Upon her loss in the battle with the “Kearsarge,” on 19 June, 1864 (see Winslow, Jonx A.), he returned to England, and in London was presented by officers of the British army and navy with a sword to replace that which he had cast into the sea from the deck of his sinking ship.
On 3 Oct, 1864, he sailed for Havana, whence he reached the coast of Peru the day after he passed through Texas and Louisiana. He was appointed rear-admiral, and ordered to the James river squadron, with which he guarded the water approaches to Richmond until the city was evacuatcd. At Greensboro, N. C., on 1 May, 1865, he participated in the capitulation of Gen. Johnston’s army. He returned to Mobile and opened a law office. There, on 15 Dec, 1865, he was arrested by order of Sec. Welles and was imprisoned. The reason, as given by the attorney-general of the United States, was his liability to trial as a traitor, which he had evaded by his escape after the destruction of the “Alabama.” From his prison he wrote to President Johnson a letter claiming immunity for all passengers and crew of the “Alabama,” who were he was a party at Greensboro, and the subsequent quarrel between Mr. Johnson and the Republican majority of congress interrupted any proceedings looking to his trial. He was released under the third of the president’s amnesty proclamations, and in May, 1866, was elected judge of the probate court of Mobile county, but an order from President Johnson forbade him to exercise the functions of the office. He then became editor of a daily paper in Mobile, which he gave up to accept a professor’s chair in the Louisiana military institute. He afterward returned to Mobile and resumed the practice of law, in which he was occupied till his death. He published “Service Afloat and Ashore during the Mexican War” (Cincinnati, 1851); “The Campaign of Gen. Scott in the Valley of Mexico” (1852); “The Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter” (New York, 1864); and “Memoirs of Service Afloat during the War between the States” (Baltimore, 1869). The action of the British government in permitting the “Alabama” and other similar cruisers to be fitted out in its ports gave rise to the so-called “Alabama claims” on the part of the United States, settled by arbitration in 1872. (See Grant, Ulisses S.—His Contri,

D. C., 17 Dec, 1828, was educated at Georgetown college, and graduated at the National medical colleges of Washington, D. C., and Philadelphia, studied in Paris and London, and on his return settled in Georgetown, D. C., but removed to New Orleans, La. He was commissioned a surgeon in the Confederate army in 1861, served in that capacity in Gen. Thomas J. Jackson’s corps in the Army of Northern Virginia, was surgeon in charge
in the Jackson military hospital, Richmond, Va., became medical inspector of the Department of Northern Virginia in 1862, inspector of hospitals in the Department of Virginia in 1863, and president of the examining boards of the Louisiana, Jackson, Stuart, and Winder hospitals, Richmond, Va., in 1865. He was visiting physician to the Charity hospital, New Orleans, La., in 1869—7, removed to New Orleans, and in the same year was appointed professor of surgery and anatomy in the University of Louisiana, and professor of physiology in the Savannah medical college. Subsequently he took orders in the Roman Catholic church, and in 1886 he became president of Pio Nono college, Macon, Ga. He was a secretary of the American medical association in 1858—9, a member of several professional societies, and the author of medical and other papers. His publications include “Medical Sketches of Paris”
(New York, 1852); “Gunshot Wounds” (1864); “Notes from a Surgical Diary” (1866); “Surgical Notes of SEMPLE. James, senator, b. in Green county,

Ky. 5 Jan., 1838. He was in Elshad Landing, Ill., 20
Dec., 1866. His educational advantages were limited to the common schools of Greensburg and the law-school at Louisville, Ky. After his graduation at the latter he removed at once to Edwsrdsville, Ill., and practised his profession. At the beginning of the Black Hawk war he was commissioned brigadier-general. He represented Madison county several times in the legislature, and was twice speaker of the house. From 1837 till 1842 he was minister at Bogota, Colombia. In 1843 he was elected judge of the superior court, but he soon resigned to enter the U. S. senate, where he served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1847, filling the unexpired term of Samuel McRoberts, deceased. He became an active advocate of the 4th of July, in opposition to the Oregon question. Returning to his home in 1847, he declined to accept any political office. He expended consideratine time and money during the last years of his life in experimenting on a steam road-wagon which he had made, but it proved a failure.
SEMPLE, Robert, British author, b. in Boston,
Mass., in 1766; d. in Fort Douglas, British America, 19 June, 1816. He was nominated chief governor of all the factories and territories of the Hudson bay company in 1815, and, sailing from England, reached York factory, British America, in August of the same year. He made a tour of inspection of all the posts of the company immediately upon his arrival, and did not reach his headquarters at Fort Douglas (now part of Winnipeg) until the spring of 1816. For some time previous to the arrival of Gov. Semple there had been a conflict of authority between the Hudson bay company and the Northwest trading company, which resulted in bloodshed on several occasions. On 19 June, 1816, Cuthbert Grant, a half-breed, representing the Northwest company, in command of a band of Indians and others, marched against Fort Douglas, attacked Gov. Semey, killed him by parleying with them, and killed him and twenty-seven others. He is represented as a mild, just, and honorable man. Among other works he wrote "Walks and Sketches at the Cape of Good Hope." (London, 1808); "Charles Ellis, or the Friends," a novel (1806); "A Journey through Spain and Italy" (2 vols., 1807); "Spanish Past-Guide" (1808); "Second Journey in Spain" (1810); "State of Caraccas" (1812); and "Tour from Hamburg" (1814).

SEMLE, Robert Baylor, clergyman, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 20 Jan., 1769; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 25 Dec., 1831. After receiving a good education he taught in a private family and then began to study law, but abandoned it and devoted himself to the ministry. In 1790 he was appointed by his flock as pastor of the Baptist church, and he continued in this relation until his death. He soon became one of the most useful and popular men in Virginia, performed frequent and extensive preaching tours, and with equal vigor and wisdom promoted the new enterprises of benevolence that were beginning to attract the attention of his denomination. The interests of missions and education found in him a powerful friend. He received many testimonies of public confidence and esteem. He was for some time financial agent of Columbia college, and president of its board of trustees, declined an invitation to the presidency of Transylvania university in 1805, and in 1820 was elected president of the Baptist triennial convention, continuing to hold this office until his death. He received the honorary degree of D. D. from Brown in 1816. Dr. Semple was the author of a "Catechism" (1809); a "History of Virginia Baptists" (1810); "Memoir of Elders Stranghan"; "Letters to Alexander Campbell," etc.

Senechal, Louis Adelard, Canadian senator, b. in Varennes, Lower Canada, 10 July, 1829; d. in Montreal, 11 Oct., 1837. He was educated in his native village, went to Paris, and afterward engaged in business. He was a member of the Quebec assembly for Drummond and Arthabaska from 1867 till 1871, and of the Dominion parliament for Yamaska from 1867 till 1872, and became a member of the Dominion senate, 12 March, 1887. In 1857 he opened to navigation the Yamaska river between Sorel and St. Aime, and the St. Francis river between Sorel and St. Francis. He has constructed numerous railways, including the ice railway on the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Longueil, which he worked for two winters. Under his management the Richelieu line was extended from Hamilton and Toronto to Chietontin, a distance of about 1,000 miles. He was a general superintendent of the government railways of the province of Quebec; was a member of the North Shore railway, the Montreal City Passenger railway, and the Richelieu and Ontario navigation company. He was a commander of the French Legion of honor.

Sener, James Beverly, lawyer, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 18 May, 1837. He received an academic preparation, attended lectures at the University of Virginia, graduated 24th, and was graduated in 1860. He then studied law at Lexington, Va., was admitted to the bar in March, 1860, and served as sergeant (or sheriff) of the city of Fredericksburg, Va., in 1863-5. He was army correspondent of the Southern associated press, with Gen. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia in 1862-5, and from 1865 till 1875 was editor of the Fredericksburg "Ledger." Mr. Sener was a delegate from Virginia to the National Republican conventions of 1872 and 1876 and served as a member of the House of Delegates from 1876 till 1880. He was a member of congress in 1873-5, and was the chairman of the committee on expenditures in the department of justice, being the first chairman of such a committee. He was chief justice of the Wyoming territory from 18 Dec., 1879, till 10 March, 1884.

Seney, Joshua, member of the Continental congress, b. on the eastern shore of Maryland in 1750; d. there in 1799. He was educated by private tutors, engaged in planting, and supported the patriot cause during the Revolution. He was a member of the Continental congress in 1787-8, and of the 1st congress in 1789, and served by re-election till 1 May, 1792, when he resigned. He was a presidential elector in that year, supporting Washington. He was the son of the Rev. Dr. Seney, and the grandson of Col. James Nicholson. His grandson, George Ingraham, banker, b. in Astoria, L. I., 12 May, 1826; d. in New York, 7 April, 1893, was the son of a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church. George was a student in 1845 at Wesleyan, from which he received the degree of A. M. in 1849, was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1847, and by the banks rose from the post of paying-teller in the Metropolitan bank, New York city, to the presidency of that institution, holding the latter office in 1877-84, when the bank was suspended and Mr. Seney lost a fortune of several million dollars, a large part of which he afterward regained. His contributions to charitable and educational institutions include $41,500 to the Long Island historical society, $250,000 to Emory college and Wesleyan female college, Macon, Ga., and $100,000 to benevolent objects in Brooklyn. He founded the Seney scholarships and largely endowed Wesleyan university, and had contributed to miscellaneous charities more than $400,000. His gallery of pictures containing 280 specimens, was the largest in the world. He also presented several valuable paintings to the Metropolitan museum of art, New York city.

Senter, Isaac, physician, b. in New Hampshire in 1755; d. in Newport, R. I., 20 Dec., 1799. He went to Newport, R. I., early in life, studied medicine with Dr. Thomas Moffat, was a surgeon in the Revolutionary army, and accompanied Benedict Arnold's expedition to Quebec, an interesting account of which he published in the "Bulletin of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania." He afterward practised in Pawtucket, but finally settled in Newport, and became one of the most eminent surgeons and practitioners in the state. He was an honorary member of the medical societies of London, Edinburgh, and Massachusetts, and for many years was a member of the Society of the Cincinnati of Rhode Island. He contributed to the medical journals, and published "Remarks on Phthisis Pulmonalis" in the "Transactions of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia" (1795).

Septenville, Charles Edouard Langlois (say-tong-veil), Baron de, French author, b. in Paris, 17 Nov., 1840. He devoted himself to historical researches, especially upon the early history of South America. In March, 1876, he was elected a deputy by the city of Amiens, and is member of various learned

SERCEY, Pierre César Charles Guillaume, Marquis de, French naval officer, b. near Autun, 26 April, 1753; d. in Paris, 10 Aug., 1836. He entered the navy in 1766, was commissioned ensign in May, 1779, and served under the Count de Guichen. He participated in several danger-owous enterprises during the siege of Pensacola, Fla., he was made lieutenant and given the cross of St. Louis. On his return to France he was ordered to the command of "La Surveillance" in 1790, and sailed for Martinique. He was promoted captain in 1792, and in January, 1793, was ordered to con-toy to France all the merchant vessels in those waters. In December the same year he landed with valuable cargoes, when the rising of the negroes in Santo Domingo occurred. He rescued 4,000 of the colonists. As his scanty supply of provisions and the feebleness of his naval force did not permit of his attempting to cross the Attlantic, he set sail for the coast of New England, where he arrived in safety. On his return to France in December he was imprisoned for six months for being of noble birth. In December, 1795, he was given command of the naval force that was detailed to accompany the two civil com-misioners that were charged with the execution of the decree giving liberty to the blacks in Maurritius and Réunion. Sercey, fearing that scenes similar to those he had witnessed at Santo Domingo might be enacted there, warned the colonists of the nature of the commissioners' errand, and they were in consequence not allowed to land. In 1804, at his earnest request, he was placed on the retired list, and sailed for the Mauritius, which he gallantly defended against the English in 1810. On the declaration of peace in 1814 he was appointed provost-marshal-general in the met-land for the exchange of French prisoners. On his return to France he was promoted vice-admiral, again placed on the retired list in April, 1832, and became a member of the house of peers.

SERGEANT, John, missionary, b. in Newark, N. J., in 1710; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 27 July, 1749. His grandfather, Jonathan, was a founder of Newark in 1667. John was graduated at Yale in 1729, and served as tutor there in 1731-5. He began to preach to the Indians at Housatonic, in western Massachusetts, in 1734, and the next year permanently settled among them and taught them in their own language. In 1736, when the general court purchased the Indians all the land at Skate洛ok, and in return granted them the town of Stockbridge, he was made owner of one sixtieth part, and ordained "settled missionary to the Indians" there and at Kaunammeck. A short time before his death he established a manual-labor school at Stockbridge that was in successful operation several years. He translated into the Indian language parts of the Old Testament, corrected the Irish and Hebrew of the Book of Revelation, and published a "Letter on the Indians" (1743) and "A Sermon" (1743).—His son, Erastus, physician, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 7 Aug., 1742; d. there, 14 Nov., 1814, passed two years at Princeton, and studied medicine with his uncle, Dr. Thomas Williams, in Deerfield, Mass. He then settled in Stockbridge, and was the first practitioner in that town. He was a skilful surgeon, and the principal operator within a circle of thirty miles radius. He entered the Revolutionary army in 1775 as major of the 7th Massachusetts regiment, and served with it on Lake Champlain from December, 1776, till April, 1777, and subsequently till Burgoyne's surrender. Another son of John, John, missionary, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1747; d. there, 8 Sept., 1824, studied at Princeton two years, was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church, and in 1775 took charge of the Indian part of the Stockbridge congregation. When they removed to New Stockbridge, N. Y., he followed them and labored among them until his death. One of his daughters established a temperance society for Indian women. Mr. Ser-gent possessed little worldly wisdom, and was better known for his useful and blameless life than for his intellectual gifts, but he exercised great influence among the Indian tribes, and, on hearing of his expected death, one of the chiefs said: "We have lost an ancient. We expected his death, and we do not know what darkness will succeed."—The first John's nephew, Jonathan Dickinson, lawyer, b. in Newark, N. J., in 1746; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Oct., 1793, was the grandson of Jonathan Dickinson, the first president of Princeton. He was graduated there in 1762, studied law, and began practice in his native state. He took his seat in the Continental congress a few days after the signing of the Declarion of Independence, served in 1776—7, and in July, 1777, became attorney—general of Pennsylvania. In 1778, congress having ordered a court-martial to sit in the trial of Gen.

Arthur St. Clair and other officers in relation to the evacuation of Ticonderoga, he was appointed by that body, with William Patterson, of New Jersey, to assist the judge-advocate in the conduct of the trial. He resigned the office of attorney-general in 1780, settled in his profession in Philadelphia, was counsel for the state of Pennsylvania in the controversy with Connecticut concerning the Wyoming lands in 1782, and was conspicuous in the management of many other important cases. When the yellow fever visited Philadelphia in 1793 he was appointed one of the health committee, and in consequence redusied large sums among the poor, nursed the sick, and was active in sanitary measures, but fell a victim to the epidemic.—Jonathan Dickinson's son, John, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 5 Dec., 1739; d. there, 25 Nov., 1852, was graduated at Princeton in 1765, and, abandoning his intention to become a merchant, was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1799. For more than half a century he was known throughout the country as one of the most honorable and learned members of his profession and its acknowledged leader in Philadelphia. He entered public life in 1801, when he was appointed commissioner of bankruptcy by Thomas Jefferson, was a member of the legislature in 1808–10, and of congress in 1815–20, 1823–24, and 1827–33. He, in 1841, and 1845, sat as the passage of the Missouri compromise. He was appointed one of the two envoys in 1826 to the Panama congress, was president of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention in 1839, and Whig candidate for the vice-presidency on the ticket with Henry Clay in 1832. He declined the mission to England in 1841, and his last public service was the resolution that determined a long-pending controversy. The question at issue concerned the title to Pea Patch island as derived by the United States from the state of Delaware, and by James Humphrey claiming through Henry Gale from the state of New Jersey. This involved the question of the boundary between the two states, or, in other words, the claim to Delaware river, and the decision in favor of the United States incidentally decided the boundary dispute in favor of Delaware.—Another son of Jonathan Dickinson, Thomas, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Jan., 1782; d. there, 8 May, 1860, was graduated at Princeton in 1798, studied law under Jared Ingersoll, and was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1803. He was in the legislature in 1812–14, in the latter year was appointed associate justice of the circuit court of the District of Philadelphia, and secretary of the commonwealth in 1817–19. While holding that office he began the formation of the state law library at Harrisburg. He was attorney-general in 1819–20, postmaster of Philadelphia in 1828–32, and in February, 1834, became associate-justice of the state supreme court, which office he held till his resignation in 1846. His judicial decisions were esteemed of great weight. He had become so noted in the last part of his career that it is said that he was the only judge that ever sat on the Pennsylvania bench not one of whose decisions was reversed. He was the chief exponent of the limited equity jurisdiction of the court, and was of service in bringing this into an intelligible and convenient shape. He returned to the bar in 1847, and successfully practised until the failure of his health compelled his gradual abandonment of professional labor. He was provost of the law academy of Philadelphia in 1844–55, for many years president of the Pennsylvania historical society, a member of the American philosophical society, and a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania. He married, on 14 Sept., 1812, Sarah Bache, a granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin. His publications include “Treatise upon the Law of Pennsylvania relative to the Proceedings by Foreign Attachment ” (Philadelphia, 1811); “Report of Cases adjudged in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,” with William Rawle, Jr. (17 vols., 1814–29); “Constitutional Law” (1829); “Sketch of the National Judiciary Powers exercised in the United States Prior to the Adoption of the Present Federal Constitution” (1824); “An Exposition of the View of the Land Laws of Pennsylvania” (1838).

SERRA, José de la sair-nah, last viceroy of Peru, b. in Jerez de la Frontera, Spain, in 1770; d. in Cadiz in 1832. At an early age he entered the army, seeing his first service as a cadet in the defense of Ceuta against the Moors in 1794. He served with distinction against the French in Catalonia in 1793, under Admiral Mazarredo, against the British in 1797, and in the second siege of Saragossa in 1809, where he was captured and carried to France as a prisoner. Soon he escaped, and, after travelling for some time in Switzerland and the Orient, returned in 1811 to Spain, and served under Wellington till the expulsion of the French in 1813. In 1816 he held the rank of major-general and was appointed to take command in Peru. He arrived on 22 Sept. in Callao, and, proceeding at once to Lima, he took charge of the army in Cotagaita on 12 Nov. The viceroy urged him to begin offensive operations against the province of Tucumán, which was occupied by the Argentine patriots. Serna objected to the insufficiency of his forces, but Pezuela insisted, when suddenly they were surprised by the victorious march of San Martín across the Andes and the reconquest of Chiloé. The army of upper Peru was henceforth reduced to a defensive warfare and to the interception of movements in several parts of the country. Serna’s opposition to the viceroy increased, and at last he asked for permission to retire to Spain. His leave of absence arrived in May, 1819, and in September he resigned the command of the army to Gen. Canterac. On his arrival in Lima in December, his partisans made a demonstration in favor of not allowing Serna to leave Peru on the eve of a threatened invasion from Chili, and the viceroy, to avoid disagreement, promoted him lieutenant-general and appointed him president of a consulting council of war. After the landing of San Martín in Pisco, 8 Sept., 1820, Serna, through secret machinations, obtained an appointment as commander-in-chief of the army that was gathered at Azapa, near Arica, and, in the progress of the advance of San Martín, and was ordered by the viceroy to march to Chacoy. On 29 Jan., 1821, the principal officers of the camp, partisans of Serna, presented a petition to the viceroy, requesting him to resign in favor of the latter. Pezuela refused, and ordered Serna to subdue the mutiny; but the latter pretended to be unable to do so, and, after vain efforts, he deliberately delivered himself to the executive on the evening of the same day. When San Martín threatened the capital, a Spanish commissioner, Capt. Manuel Abreu, arrived from Europe with orders to negotiate for a pacific arrangement, and Serna sent him to make proposals to San Martín. The negotiations lasted from 2 May till 24 June, but produced no result, and on the next day hostilities between the armies began again. As the situation became daily more critical, Serna had the capital of the Spanish army in the mountain plain of Ayavanco on 8 Dec., and when the next day the Spaniards defeated the Spanish army lost 2,000 wounded and dead and 3,000 prisoners, and as the rest was entirely dispersed. Gen. Canterac, the second in command, signed an honorable capitulation the next day, and the viceroy, who on the date of the battle had been created by the king Count de los Andes, was, soon afterward, permitted to sail for Europe. He was honorably received at court, his administration was approved, and he was appointed captain-general of several provinces.

SERRA, Angel sair-rah, Mexican linguist, b. in Zitacuaro, Michoacan, about 1640; d. in Queretaro about 1700. He entered the Franciscan order in Mexico, and became guardian of the Convict of San Pedro y San Pablo, where he studied the Tarasco language, in which he soon became the recognized authority in Mexico. Wishing to utilize his knowledge, he was sent to the Sierra Gorda as missionary to the Indians, and was appointed priest parish priest of Charapa of the diocese of Queretaro. He wrote "Manuel Trilingüe, Latino, Castellano y Tarasco, para administrar los Sacramentos á los Españoles y á los Indios" (Mexico, 1867); "El Catecismo del P. Bartolomé Cañata, traducido al Tarasco" (Queretaro, 1699); and "Arte, Diccionario y Confesionario en Tarasco," which was ready for the press when the author died.

SERRANO Y DOMINGUEZ, Francisco, Duke de la Torre, Spanish soldier, b. at San Fernando near Cadiz, 17 Oct., 1810; d. in Madrid, 26 Nov., 1885. He was the son of a Spanish general, entered the military college as a cadet in 1822, and in 1825 became ensign. He served till 1833 in the coast-guard, but after the death of Ferdinand VII, he espoused the cause of the child-regent, Isabella II. He was promoted in 1840 major-general, and served chief of the captaincy-general of Valencia, and in 1843 elected to the cortes, of which he became vice-president. He joined in the overthrow of the regency of Espartero on 21 July, and the declaration that Queen Isabella was of age. In November of the same year he was for ten days minister of war, and was in the army, and sent to Cadiz, and after the young queen's marriage in 1846 he obtained such influence over her that a public scandal followed, and he was appointed captain-general of Granada. In order to bring him to Madrid again, the queen appointed him inspector-general of cavalry and captain-general of New Castle; he took part in several short-lived ministries and was military procurator-general and in February, 1854, was exiled for participation in the insurrection of Saragossa. In June he returned to take part in the successful revolution under Espartero and O'Donnell, and in July, 1856, he joined the latter in his successful coup d'état, and was sent in 1857 as ambassador to Paris. In 1869 he went as captain-general to Cuba, and during his absence he organized the numbers of the colony of Guadeloupe, and advised the Spanish crown was brought about. For this, although it cost the nation millions of money and thousands of lives, he was created Duke de la Torre on his return to Spain, and made captain-general of the army. In 1869 he was imprisoned in Aliante for his protest, as president of the senate, against the illegal dissolution of the cortes, and in July, 1868, was exiled to the Canary islands, but on 19 Sept. he landed at Cadiz, and aided in overthrowing the government of Queen Isabella, vanquishing the royal troops at Alcosea on 28 Sept. On 8 Oct. he became chief of the provisional government, and on 16 June, 1869, he was elected regent of the kingdom, which place he occupied till the restoration of Isabella II., crowned by Prince Amadeo, who in January, 1871, made him prime minister. In 1872 he took the field as commander-in-chief against the Carlists, and, after the proclamation of the republic in 1873, he retired to France. He returned to Spain toward the end of the year, and after the coup d'état of Gen. Pavía was made chief of the executive, 4 Jan., 1874, negotiating privately, it is thought, with Martinez Campos the restoration of the monarchy under Alfonso XII, on 9 Jan., 1875. He continued to take an active part in politics as chief of the right centre, and in 1883 was appointed ambassador of Spain to France. He married a Cuban lady of great beauty, and left a son and two daughters.

SERRILL, Edward Wellman, civil engineer, b. in New York city, 5 Nov., 1826. He was educated at schools in his native city, and then studied surveying and civil engineering under the direction of an elder brother. In 1843 he became assistant engineer in charge of the Central railroad of New Jersey, and in 1845 served in a similar capacity on the construction of other roads. He accompanied the expedition that in 1848 located the route of the railroad between Aspinwall and Panama, and on his return, a year later, was engaged in building the suspension-bridge across the Niagara river at Lewiston; also that at St. Johns, New Brunswick. Mr. Serrill was in charge of the Harrodsburg bridge in Kentucky, the construction of the Bristol bridge over Avon river, in England, which had the largest span of any bridge in that country at the time it was built. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the 1st New York volunteers as lieutenant-colonel, soon became its colonel, and served as chief engineer of the 10th army corps in 1863. He was chief engineer and chief of staff of General F. S. Ballinger, 1864, and designed and personally superintended the construction of the "Swamp-angel" battery that bombarded Charleston. Many valuable improvements of guns and processes, that proved of practical service during the war, were suggested by him, and the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers was conferred on him. In 1865, as colonel he settled in New York, and engaged principally in the building of railroads, becoming in 1887, president and consulting engineer of the Washington County railroad. In addition to papers on scientific and technical subjects, he has published nearly fifty reports on railroads and bridges.

SERVENS, Claude (sair-vahns), Flemish missionary, b. at Ypres, 4 July, 1631; d. in Mexico, 1549. After finishing his studies in Brussel, he went to the New World in quest of fortune, and served in Cuba and Mexico. But the cruelty of the conquerors to the Indians so affected him that he resolved to devote his life to their relief, and in 1537 entered the Dominican order in Mexico. Later he became secretary of Las Casas, and accompanied him to the Governor and Don Pedro de Alvarado. He was appointed to the Spanish crown was brought about. For this, although it cost the nation millions of money and thousands of lives, he was created Duke de la Torre on his return to Spain, and made captain-general of the army. He was imprisoned in Aliante for his protest, as president of the senate, against the illegal dissolution of the cortes, and in July, 1868, was exiled to the Canary islands, but on 19 Sept. he landed at Cadiz, and aided in overthrowing the government of Queen Isabella, vanquishing the royal troops at Alcosea on 28 Sept. On 8 Oct. he became chief of the provisional government, and on 16 June, 1869, he was elected regent of the kingdom, which place he occupied till the restoration of Isabella II., crowned by Prince Amadeo, who in January, 1871, made him prime minister. In 1872 he took the field as commander-in-chief against the Carlists, and, after the proclamation of the republic in 1873, he retired to France. He returned to Spain toward the end of the year, and after the coup d'état of Gen. Pavía was made chief of the executive, 4 Jan., 1874, negotiating privately, it is thought, with Martinez Campos the restoration of the monarchy under Alfonso XII, on 9 Jan., 1875. He continued to take an active part in politics as chief of the right centre, and in 1883 was appointed ambassador of Spain to France. He married a Cuban lady of great beauty, and left a son and two daughters.

SERVOS, Thomas Lowery, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Oct., 1786; d. in New York city, 30 Nov., 1866. He was educated in his native city, and then engaged in the shipping business. In 1808 he settled in Natchez, Miss., where he purchased cotton and sold goods that were consigned to him from the north, and in 1817 he moved to New Orleans, where he continued his mercantile career. Meanwhile, in 1814, when the seaports of the United States were threatened by the British navy, Mr. Servoss was in New York, and, on learning that New Orleans was about to be attacked, he left at once for that city by way of Pittsburg, where he found two keel-boats laden with muskets. He took passage on one of these, and by his knowledge of river navigation he placed himself in command of it, with others, in consequence of which the U. S. troops received the arms; otherwise, as has been said by John H. Eaton in his "Life of Andrew Jackson," New Orleans would have fallen into the hands of the British. In 1827 Mr. Servoss settled permanently in New York. He built, in 1831, the first five packet ships that ran regularly between New York and New Orleans, and was agent of the line. Mr. Servoss was active in charitable enterprises and held office in various benevolent societies. He contributed articles on popular topics to journals, and presented a series of historical reminiscences to the New York historical society in 1858. He married a daughter of John Pintard.

SETON, Elizabeth Ann, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 28 Aug., 1771; d. in Emmettsburg, Md., 4 Jan., 1821. She was the daughter of Dr. Richard Bayley, a physician of New York, and married William Seton, of the same city. Her husband's father, William Seton (1746-1798), belonged to an impoverished noble Scottish family, emigrated to New York in 1798, and became superintendent and part owner of the iron-works of Ringwood, N. J. He was a loyalist, and the last royal public notary for the city and province of New York prior to the war. His silver notarial seal, dated 1779, is still in the possession of his family. He was ruined financially at the close of the Revolution, but remained in New York, where he founded the once famous mercantile house of Seton, Maitland and Co. In 1803 she went to Italy with her family. On the death of her husband she returned to the United States, and in 1805 she was received into the Roman Catholic church. To support her seven children she opened a school in New York, but, not meeting with success, she was about to remove to Canada, when she made the acquaintance of Dr. William Louis Dubourg, then president of St. Mary's college, who invited her to reside in Baltimore and open a school for girls. Before this she had formed the design of founding a congregation of women for the service of children and orphans, and $8,900, given by a young convert to Dr. Dubourg for charitable uses and transferred by the latter to Mrs. Seton, enabled her to carry out this purpose. A farm was purchased at Emmettsburg, Md., and on 22 June, 1809, Mrs. Seton moved thither, with three companions, forming the nucleus of an order that afterward spread over the United States. The community increased rapidly in numbers, and pupils flocked to the school. In 1811 Mother Seton adopted the rules and constitution of St. Vincent de Paul, with some modifications, and the institution, having received the sanction of the highest ecclesiastical authority, became a religious order. Afterward a group of buildings, embracing a residence for the Sisters, a novitiate, a boarding-school for young girls, a school for poor children, and an orphan asylum, was erected. In 1814 Mother Seton sent a colony of Sisters to Philadelphia to take charge of the place of asylum. In 1827, in response to another application from New York, another body came to that city. At her death there were more than twenty communities of Sisters of Charity, conducting free schools, orphanages, boarding-schools, and hospitals, in the states of Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Delaware, Massachusetts, Virginia, Missouri, and Louisiana, and in the District of Columbia and Illinois. In 1830, by the constitution of her order, no one could be elected to the office of mother-superior for more than two terms successively, an exception was made in her favor by the unanimous desire of her companions, and she held the office during life. See "Memoirs of Mrs. S— , written by Herself: A Fragment of Real History" (Elizabethtown, N. J., 1817); "Life of Mrs. Seton, Foundress and First Superior of the Sisters of Charity in the United States," by Rev. Charles I. White, D. D. (7th revised ed., Baltimore, 1879); and "Vie de Madame Elizabeth Seton," by Madame de Barbary (Paris, 1868). A collection of her letters and papers, edited by her grandson, Monsignor Seton, has been published (2 vols., New York, 1899).—Her grandson, William, died in France, a student of New York city. Henry William Seton, an officer in the U. S. navy, is recognized by Burke's "Peerage" as the head of the ancient family of the Setons of Parbroath, senior cadets of the Earls of Winton in Scotland. He was educated at Mount St. Mary's college, Emmetsburg, Md., and by private tutors, and served as captain of the 4th New York volunteers, during the first part of the civil war, until he was disabled at Antietam. He is a frequent contributor to periodicals and journals, and has published "Romance of the Charter Oak" (New York, 1870); "The Pride of Lexington; a Tale of the American Revolution" (1871); "Rachel's Fate and Other Tides" (1882); "The Poor Millionaire, a Tale of New York Life" (1884); and "The Shamrock, a Tale of West and Meola, a Tale of the Tyrol" (New York, 1888). He is also the author of "The Pioneer," a poem (1874).—Robert, another grandson of Elizabeth Ann, clergyman, b. in Pisa, Italy, 28 Aug., 1839, was educated in Mount St. Mary's college, Emmettsburg, Md., and in the Academia ecclesiatrica, Rome, where he was graduated with the degree of D. D. In 1860 he was raised to the rank of private chamberlain to Pope Pius IX. He is the first American that was honored with the Roman Prelatura, and is the dean of all the monsignori in the United States. He was made prothonotary apostolic in 1867, and rector of St. Joseph's church, Jersey City, in 1876. He has written "Memoirs, Letters, and Journal of Elizabeth Seton" (2 vols., New York, 1869) and "Essays on Various Subjects, chiefly Roman Catholic," a frequent contributor to Roman Catholic periodicals.

SETON, Samuel Waddington, educator, b. in New York city, 23 Jan., 1789; d. there, 20 Nov., 1869. He was educated in the schools of New York, engaged in mercantile pursuits, and made a voyage to China. After his return to New York he was a banker till 1827, when he was elected as one of the Public School directors, in which capacity he was visitor of their schools, and had charge of their extensive system of supplies and libraries. He held the office until the society was merged in the present board of education in 1833. He was then appointed assistant superintendent, which post he held till his death.
took a warm interest in religious matters, and during the forty-eight years in which he held the office of Sunday-school superintendent was absent from his post only twelve times.

SETTLE, Thomas, jurist, b. in Rockingham county, N.C., in 1791; d. there, 5 Aug., 1857. He received a common-school education, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Wentworth, N.C. He entered public life in 1810 as a member of the house of commons, and was in congress in 1817-21, having been elected as a Democrat. He was again in the legislature in 1826-8, the last year was speaker of the house, and in 1832-54 was a judge of the supreme court of North Carolina, and eminent for his influence to prevent secession, but, when the civil war began, entered the Confederate army as captain in the 3d North Carolina regiment. After a service of twelve months he returned to civil life and became solicitor of the 4th judicial district. He united with the Republican party in 1863, was elected to the state senate in that year, became its speaker, and took an active part in reconstruction measures. He was a judge of the state supreme court in 1869-71, and resigned to become U.S. minister to Peru, but held office for only a few months on account of the failure of his health, was an unsuccessful candidate for congress in 1872, and in June of that year was president of the National Republican convention held in Philadelphia. He was reappointed a justice of the state supreme court in 1873, and was defeated for governor in 1876. In 1877 he became United States district judge of the northern district of Florida.

SEUSEMAN, Joachin, missionary, b. in Hesse-Cassel; d. in Jamaica, W. I., 1772. He came to Pennsylvania with the first Moravian colony in 1735, and settled in the western slope of the Alleghenies, and, by his courage, address, and military ability, became one of the principal men in the colony. When Lord Dunmore's war began in 1773 against the Shawnee and other Indian tribes, he resumed his rank in the Virginia line, served throughout the campaign, and on 10 Oct., 1774, took part in the battle of Point Pleasant. At the beginning of the Revolution he drew up the memorial of the citizens of Watauga to the North Carolina legislature asking to be annexed to that colony, that "they might aid in the unhappy contest, and bear their full proportion of the expenses of the war." Their petition was granted and the whole of what is now Tennessee was organized into a county of North Carolina, then known as Washington county. Seuser was chosen a delegate to the State convention, and in the "declaration of rights" introduced a clause thus defining the limits of the state: "That it shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment of one or more governments westward of this state, by consent of the legislature," showing that he had already in mind the establishment of a separate commonwealth beyond the Alleghenies. In the spring of 1777 the legislature of North Carolina met, and Seuser was again a representative from Watauga, and procured for the settlement the establishment of courts and the extension of state laws. On his return he was appointed clerk of the county and district judge,

SEVERANCE, Luther, editor, b. in Montague, Mass., 28 Oct., 1707; d. in Augusta, Me., 25 Jan., 1855. After learning the printer's trade in Peterboro, N. H., he worked in Washington, Philadelphia, and several other cities, and in 1825 settled in Augusta, Me., and established the "Kennebec Journal." He served in the legislature in 1839-1, in the state senate in 1835, and again in the legislature in 1839-42. He was in congress in 1843-7, having been elected as a Whig, and in 1850 was appointed United States minister to the Sandwich islands, which post he held four years. See a "Memoir" of him by James G. Blaine (Augus., Me., 1860).

SEVIER, John, pioneer, b. in Rockingham county, Va., 23 Sept., 1743; d. near Fort Decatur, Ga., 24 Sept., 1815. He was descended from an ancient French family who spelled their name Xavier. His father, Valentine, emigrated to this country from London about 1740, and, settling in Rockingham county, John was educated, until he was sixteen years of age, at the academy in Fredericksburg, Va., married the next year, and founded the village of Newmarket in the valley of the Shenandoah. He there became celebrated as an Indian fighter, was a victor in many battles with the neighboring tribes, and in 1772 was appointed captain in the Virginia line. In the spring of that year he removed to Watauga, a settlement on the western slope of the Alleghenies, and, by his courage, address, and military ability, became one of the principal men in the colony. When Lord Dunmore's war began in 1773 against the Shawnee and other Indian tribes, he resumed his rank in the Virginia line, served throughout the campaign, and on 10 Oct., 1774, took part in the battle of Point Pleasant. At the beginning of the Revolution he drew up the memorial of the citizens of Watauga to the North Carolina legislature asking to be annexed to that colony, that "they might aid in the unhappy contest, and bear their full proportion of the expenses of the war." Their petition was granted and the whole of what is now Tennessee was organized into a county of North Carolina, then known as Washington county. Seuser was chosen a delegate to the State convention, and in the "declaration of rights" introduced a clause thus defining the limits of the state: "That it shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment of one or more governments westward of this state, by consent of the legislature," showing that he had already in mind the establishment of a separate commonwealth beyond the Alleghenies. In the spring of 1777 the legislature of North Carolina met, and Seuser was again a representative from Watauga, and procured for the settlement the establishment of courts and the extension of state laws. On his return he was appointed clerk of the county and district judge, and with James Robertson was in reality in control of all judicial and administrative functions in the settlement. He was elected colonel by the over-mountain people in the same year, enlisted every able-bodied male between the ages of sixteen and fifty in the militia, and made them swear that they would not desert, in innumerable Indian fights. He entered the territory of the savages in 1739, burned their towns, and fought the successful battle of Boyd's Creek. With Col. Isaac Shelby, in 1790, he planned the battle of King's Mountain, raised 450 men, was appointed their colonel, and in a critical moment of the action rushed on the enemy, up the slope of the mountain, within short range of their muskets, and turned the fortunes of the day. For this service he received thanks and a sword and pistol from the North Carolina legislature. A fellow-soldier says of him, in that battle: "His eyes were flames of fire, and his words were electric bolts crashing down the ranks of the enemy." He subsequently rendered important services at Musgrove's mill and in defending the frontier against the ravages of the Indians. In 1781 he conducted several expeditions against the Chichemauka towns, was foremost in many skirmishes as well as treaties and negotiations with the Indians, and was revered and loved by the settlers as their father and friend. At the close of the war the Watauga settlement had widely extended its borders, and contained a large extent of Indian country, which is now the state of Tennessee, comprising about 29,000,000 acres, brought with its possession the obligation to bear a correspondingly large part of the Federal debt. Therefore, in June, 1784, the legislature of North Carolina ceded it to the general government. When the news of this act reached the settlers they determined to form a government of their own, and apply for admission into the Union. They were the more ready to do this as they considered themselves neglected by the North Carolina government. Accordingly, on 23 Aug., 1784, they called a convention, organized a constitution and state government, elected John Sevier governor, and named their state Franklin, in honor of Benjamin Franklin. In the mean time, before the convention met, the legislature of North Carolina met again and made haste to undo what had been done at the former session. They gave the Watauga settlers a superior court, formed the militia into a brigade, and appointed Sevier brigadier-general. After this Sevier earnestly opposed the scheme of a separate government, and advised all his compatriots to take no further steps toward it; but public opinion was strongly against, a return to North Carolina, and he finally consented to accept the governorship of the new state, taking the oath of office on 1 March, 1785. Within sixty days he established a superior court, reorganized the militia, and founded Washington college, the first institution of classical learning west of the Alleghenies. He also entered into treaties of peace with the Cherokee Indians after continued warfare for fifteen years, and for two years governed with unbroken prosperity. But dissatisfaction arose in North Carolina, and at the end of that time Gov. Richard Caswell issued a proclamation declaring the new government to be a revolt and ordering that it be at once abandoned. With great difficulty the attempt to subdue it, but the settlers finally submitted to a surer force. Sevier was captured and imprisoned, but rescued, and the country was ceded to the U.S. government under the title of "the territory south of the Ohio river." Sevier then took an oath of allegiance to the United States, was commissioned brigadier-general of that section in 1789, and in 1790 chosen to congress as the first representative from the valley of the Mississippi. He conducted the Etowah campaign against the Creeks and Cherokees in 1793, which completely broke the spirit of the Indians, so that they could not reclaim the French and Holston settlements again during Sevier's lifetime, and in 1796, when the territory was admitted into the Union as the state of Tennessee, he was chosen its first governor. He served three consecutive terms, was re-elected three successive times after 1803, and was chosen a member of congress in 1811, and was returned to that body for a third term in 1815, but died before he could take his seat. Near the close of his congressional career he was appointed by President Monroe to act as U.S. commissioner to settle the boundary-line between Georgia and the Creek territory in Alabama. But the labor was too great, and he died in his tent, attended only by a few soldiers and Indians. His biographer, James R. Gilmore, says of him: "He was in the active service of his country from a boy of eighteen till he died at the age of seventy years. During all this period he was a leader of men, and a prime mover in the important events which occurred beyond the Alleghanies. His sway was potent and undisputed in civil as well as military affairs. As long as he lived he was the real seat of power. A rule like his was never since in the state of Tennessee. A monument to his honor is erected in Nashville, and Sevier county, Tenn., is named for him. See "The Rear-Guard of the Revolution," by James R. Gilmore (New York, 1886), and "Life of John Sevier," by the same author (1887).—His nephew, Ambrose Hundley, senator, b. in Greene county, Tenn., 4 Nov., 1801; d. in Little Rock, Ark., 31 Dec., 1848, received little early education, was re-elected to the Arkansas legislature in 1822, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1823. He was clerk of the territorial legislature and a member of that body in 1823-5, a delegate to congress in 1827-36, having been chosen as a Democrat, and U.S. senator from the latter year till 1848. During this service he was chairman of the committee on Indian affairs for three years, prepared reports on foreign relations, and in 1848 was a U.S. commissioner to negotiate peace with Mexico.

SEVILLA, José, philanthropist, b. in Peru, S. A., about 1890; d. in New York city in March, 1888. He settled in New York city late in life, and bequeathed his property, valued at upward of $1,000,000, for the establishment of an unsectarian home for unfortunate children. Both sexes were to be freely admitted and educated in such a manner as to become self-supporting.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. in Bishopstone, England, 28 March, 1652; d. in Boston, Mass., 1 Jan., 1739. His early education was received in England before his parents came to New England. They went to Newbury, Mass., and his lessons were continued there. He was admitted to enter Harvard in 1667, and took his first degree in 1671, his second in 1675. He studied divinity and had preached once before his marriage, but after that event, which took place on 28 Feb., 1677, he left the ministry and entered public life. His wife was Hannah Hull, the daughter and only child of John and Judith (Quincy) Hull. The position which his father-in-law held as treasurer and mint-master undoubtedly had something to do with the change in the young man's plans. One of his first ventures after his marriage was to assume charge of the printing-press in Boston. This was under his management for three years, when other engagements compelled him to relinquish it. His family connections, both through his marriage and on the maternal and paternal sides, brought him in contact with some of the most prominent men of the day. In 1684 he was chosen an assistant, serving for two years. In 1688 he made a voyage to England, and remained abroad a year in the transaction of business, visiting various points of interest. In 1692 he became a member of the council and judge of the probate court. Judge Sewall appeared prominently in judging the witches during the time of the Salem witchcraft. His character was shown more clearly at that time and immediately afterward than at any other time during his long life. He was extremely conscientious in the fulfilment of duty, and yet, when he found he was in error, was not too proud to acknowledge it. Of all the judges that took part in that historic action, he was the only one that publicly confessed his error. The memory of it haunted him for years, until in January, 1697, he confessed in a "bill," which was read before the congregation of the Old South church in Boston by the minister. During its reading, Sewall remained standing in his place. The action was indicative of the man. During the remaining thirty-one years of his life he spent one day annually in fasting and meditation and prayer, to keep in mind the sense of the enormity of his offence. In 1699 he was appointed a member of the commission for the English Society for the propagation of the gospel in New England. Soon afterward he was appointed their secretary and treasurer. His tract, entitled "The Selling of Joseph," in which he advocated the rights of the slaves, was published in 1700. He was very benevolent and charitable, and his sympathies were always with the down-trodden races of humanity. In 1718 he was appointed chief justice, and served till 1728, when he retired on account of the increasing infirmities of old age. He also published "The Accomplishment of Prophecies" (1713); "A Memorial Relating to the Kennebec Indians" (1721); "A Description of the New Heaven" (1727). The Massachusetts historical society published his diary, which covers the larger portion of his life, in their "Historical Collections," and it has also published his letter-book, in which he kept copies of his important letters. These throw light upon the civil and social life of the day in a marked degree and strengthen the opinion that he was a man of eminent ability and of sterling character. In addition to his diary, he kept a "commonplace book," in which he recorded quotations from various authors whose works he had read. At the time of his death he had also filled twelve manuscript volumes with abstracts of sermons and addresses that he had heard at various times. His funeral sermon, by the Rev. Thomas Prince, was highly eulogistic, but evidently a just tribute to one of the most remarkable men of his age.—His son, Joseph, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 Aug., 1688; d. there, 27 June, 1769, was graduated at Harvard in 1707, studied theology, and was ordained on 16 Sept., 1713, as Ebenezer Pemberton's colleague in the pastorate of the Old South church, Boston. He was elected president of Harvard in 1724, but declined. He was one of the commissioners appointed by the London corporation for propagating the gospel in New England, and a corresponding member of the Scottish society for promoting Christianity and knowledge. The University of Glasgow gave him the degree of D.D. in 1731. He was a rigid Calvinist and a foe to free discussion and novel opinions, but gave his support and approval to Whitefield's revival in 1740. He contributed to the support of indigent students, and gave many books to replenish Harvard college library when it was burned in 1764. His benevolence gained him the familiar epithet of "the good," while his religious fervor caused him to be sometimes called "the weeping prophet." Many of his sermons were published.—Samuel's nephew, Stephen, jurist, b. in Salem, Mass., 18 Dec., 1704; d. 10 Sept., 1760, was graduated at Harvard in 1719, and was librarian of the college in 1726-8, and then a tutor till 1739, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts. In 1752 he was made chief justice, and he served in that capacity, and also as a member of the council, till the close of his life. He expressed doubt of the legality of general writs of assistance, which were demanded by the customs authorities for the purpose of suppressing illicit trade, yet before he could finally pass judgment upon the question he died, to the general regret of the patriot party.—Samuel's grandnephew, Samuel, engineer, b. in York, Me., in 1724; d. there, 28 July, 1815, was the inventor of various useful improvements. He is said to have been the first to drive piles as a foundation for bridges, introducing this device at York in 1761. In 1786 he erected the Charleston bridge on this plan.—Stephen's nephew, Jonathan, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 Aug., 1729; d. in St. John, New Brunswick, 36 Sept., 1766, was graduated at Harvard in 1748, taught in Salem till 1756, studied law, and began practice in Charlestown in 1758. He inclined to the patriotic side of the disputes with Great Britain until he was chagrined by the refusal of the legislature to pay the debts left by his uncle and by the opposition of James Otis and his father to his petition. He was rewarded for his subsequent adhesion to the cause of the crown with the posts of solicitor-general, attorney-general (which appointment he received in 1757), advocate-general, and judge of admiralty, his emoluments amounting to £6,000 a year. He was offered the appointment of judge of admiralty at Halifax in 1768, but declined. No lawyer in Massachusetts surpassed him in elo-

In the same year he was a member of the electoral college of Massachusetts. He became chief judge in 1813, and died while holding court in Wiscasset, where a monument was erected to his memory by the members of the bar. —The second Samuel, Stephen, Hebraist, b. in York, Me., 4 April, 1734; d. in Boston, Mass., 23 July, 1794, was graduated at Harvard in 1761, taught in the grammar-school at Cambridge, and in 1762 became librarian and instructor in Hebrew at Harvard. Two years later he was installed as the first Hancock professor of Hebrew, occupying the chair till 1785. He was an active Whig during the Revolution, and represented Cambridge in the general court in 1777. His wife was a daughter of Edward Wigglesworth. He published seven Greek and Latin poems in the "Pietas et gratulatio" (Cambridge, 1761), a "Hebrew Grammar" (1763); a funeral oration in Latin on Edward Holyoke (1759); an English oration on the death of Prof. John Winthrop (1759); a Latin version of the first book of Edmund Quincy, "Of the New Thoughts" (1789); "Carmina sacra qua Latine Graecque condita America" (1789); "The Scripture Account of the Shechinah" (1794); and the "Exposition of the Psalms according to the Sodom and Gomorrath" (1799). He left a manuscript Chaldee and English dictionary, which is preserved in the library of Harvard college. —Another brother, David, jurist, b. in York, Me., 7 Oct., 1735; d. there, 22 Oct., 1825, was graduated at Harvard in 1755, studied law, and established himself in practice in York in 1758. He was appointed justice of the peace in 1758, and register of probate in 1765. Like his friend and classmate, John Adams, he was an earnest Whig, and was an active patriot from the beginning of the Revolution. He was representative for York in 1776, was chosen a member of the council of Massachusetts, and was appointed in 1777 a justice of the superior court. From 1789 till 1818 he was U. S. judge. He presided at the first and last sessions of the convention which adopted the constitution of 1788. He was one of the signers of the constitution of 1788, and register of probate for Grafton county, N. H. Afterward he settled in Portsmouth. In the early part of the Revolution he wrote "War and Washington," a favorite song of the soldiers of the Revolutionary army. He produced other patriotic elegies and odes, paraphrases of Ossian, epistles, and epigrams. In an "Epistle to Cato," written in 1778, drawing a parallel between the characters and events of the Revolution and those of the play, occurs the couplet.

"No pent-up Utica contracts your powers,
But the whole boundless continent is yours,
With Paris as your crown and Rome the base of your paper."

The poems which were mostly the productions of his youth, were collected into a volume (Portsmouth, 1801). —Joseph's grandson, Samuel, jurist, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 Dec., 1757; d. in Wiscasset, Me., 8 June, 1814, was graduated at Harvard in 1776, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Marblehead, Mass. He was frequently a member of the legislature, was elected to congress for two successive terms, and served from 15 May, 1797, till 10 Jan., 1800, when he resigned on being appointed a judge of the Massachusetts supreme court. In the same year he was a member of the electoral college of Massachusetts. He became chief judge in 1813, and died while holding court in Wiscasset, where a monument was erected to his memory by the members of the bar. —The third Samuel, Jotham, clergyman, b. in York, Me., 1 Jan., 1766; d. in Chestevelle, Me., 3 Oct., 1850, was a macon in his youth, and received only a rudimentary education, yet, after a theological examination in 1798, he was licensed to preach, and on 18 June, 1800, was ordained as an evangelist. From that time till the close of his life he labored as a missionary. He was installed as pastor of the Congregational church in Chestevelle on 22 June, 1820, but continued his missionary tours, preaching wherever a few could be gathered together, on week days as well as on Sundays, and organizing many new churches. His ministry extended over a period of fifty years, and in this time he preached four and a half times on an average every week. His field was confined chiefly to Maine and parts of New Hampshire and Rhode Island, though his journeys extended into eleven other states and into New Brunswick. A memoir was published by his son, Jotham (Boston, 1832). —The third Samuel's son, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Marbridge, Mass., 1 June, 1783; d. in Burlington, Mass., 18 Feb., 1858, was graduated at Harvard in 1807, and practised theology in Cambridge, and was pastor of the Congregational church at Burlington, Mass., from 1814 till his death. He was fond of antiquarian studies, and left a "History of Woburn, Mass., from the Grant of its Territory to Charlestown in 1640 to 1860," which was published, with a memorial sketch, by his brother, Rev. Charles Chauney Mitchell, 1869. His son, Jonathan Mitchell, poet, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1748; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 29 March, 1808, was brought up in the family of his uncle, and educated at Harvard. He left college to engage in mercantile business, afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised with success. In 1774 he was appointed register of probate for Grafton county, N. H. Afterward he settled in Portsmouth. In the early part of the Revolution but the condition of his health prevented him from accepting a permanent pastorate. He resided for five years in St. Augustine, Fla., studied law with his uncle, Kiah B. Sewall, of Mobile, Ala., returned to Maine before the civil war, was admitted to the bar in 1860, and has since practised in Wiscasset. He is the author of a "Memoir of Joseph Sewall, D. D." (Boston, 1840); "Lectures on the Holy Spirit and his Converting Power" (1846); "Sketches of St. Augustine and its Advantages for Inviduals" (New York, 1849); "Ancient Dominions of Maine" (Bath, 1859).—Jotham's grandson, John Smith, educator, b. in Newcastle, Me., 20 March, 1830, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1850, went with the expedition of Com. Matthew C. Perry on the "Saratoga" as captain's clerk to China and Japan, taught for a year after his return, then entered Bangor theological seminary, and was graduated in 1856. He was pastor of the Congregational church at Wenham, Mass., till 1867, when he became professor of rhetoric and English literature at Bowdoin. He exchanged this chair in 1875 for that of homiletics at Bangor theological seminary.

SEWARD, Theodore Frelinghuysen, musician, b. in Florida, N. Y., 25 Jan., 1835. He is a conductor of music. His father's farm at the age of eighteen to study music under Lowell Mason and Thomas Hastings, became organist of a church in New London, Conn., in 1857, and in Rochester, N. Y., in 1859, removed to New York city in 1867, and conducted the "Musical Pioneer," and afterward the New York "Musical Gazette." He first became interested in the tonic sol-fa system during a visit to England in 1869, and on his return endeavored inefffectually to introduce the method without adopting the notation. He subsequently took charge of the performances of the "Jubilee singers," wrote down more than one hundred of their plantation melodies, and, while making the tour of Europe with them, in 1875-6, became more impressed with the advantages of the new system of musical instruction. After a course of study at the Tonic sol-fa college in London, he returned to the United States in 1877, intending to make the establishment of the system his sole purpose. Besides writing on the subject for many religious and educational journals, and lecturing before gatherings of teachers, he has undertaken the complete preparation of "Musical Reform," taught the system in classes and public schools, and prepared a series of text-books. He was the founder of the American tonic sol-fa association, and of the American vocal music association. In conjunction with Lowell Mason, he prepared "The Pestalozzian Music-Teacher" (New York, 1871). Among his other publications are "The Sunnyside Glee-Book" (New York, 1866); "The Temple Choir" (1897); and "Coronation" (1672).

SEWARD, William Henry, statesman, b. in Florida, Orange co., N. Y., 16 May, 1811; d. in Auburn, N. Y., 10 Oct., 1872. His father, Dr. Samuel S. Seward, descended from a Welsh emigrant to Connecticut, combined medical practice with a laundromatery as "The Sunnyside Glee-Book" (New York, 1866); "The Temple Choir" (1897); and "Coronation" (1872).

dissension within the party. He secured more humane and liberal provisions for the treatment of the insane, a mitigation of the methods of discipline in the penitentiary, and the improvement of the common schools. His proposition to admit Roman Catholic and foreign-born teachers into the public schools, while it was opposed by the opposite party, drew upon him the reproaches of many of the Protestant clergy and laity, and subjected him to suspicion and abuse. His recommendations to remove disabilities from foreigners and to encourage, rather than restrict, emigration, likewise provoked the hostility of native-born citizens. His proposition to abolish the court of chancery and make the judiciary elective was opposed by the bench and the bar, yet within a few years the reform was effected. At his suggestion, specimens of the natural history of the state were collected, and, when the geological survey was completed, he prepared an elaborate introduction to the report, reviewing the settlement, development, and condition of the state, which appeared in the work under the title of "Notes on New York." In the conflict between the proprietors and the tenants of Rensselaerwyck he advocated the claims of the latter, but firmly suppressed their violent outbreaks. He was re-elected, with a diminished majority, in 1840. A contest over the enlargement of the Erie canal and the completion of the lateral canals, which the Democrats prophesied would plunge the state into a debt of forty millions, grew sharper during Gov. Seward's second term, and near its close the legislature stopped the public works. His projects for building railroads were in like manner opposed by that party.

In January, 1843, Seward retired to private life, resuming the practice of law at Auburn. He continued an active worker for his party during the period of its decline, and was a frequent speaker at political meetings. In 1843 he delivered an address before the Phi Beta Kappa society at Union college on the "Elements of Empire in America." He entered largely into the practice of patent law, and in criminal cases his services were in constant demand. Frequently he not only defended accused persons gratuitously, but gave pecuniary assistance to his clients. Among his most masterly forensic efforts were an argument for freedom of the press in a libel suit brought by J. Fenimore Cooper against Horace Greeley in 1846, and the defence of John Van Zandt, in 1847, against the charge of aiding fugitive slaves to escape. At the risk of violence, and with a certainty of opprobrium, he defended the demented negro Freeman, who had committed a revolting murder, embalmed, many supposed, by Seward's eloquent presentation of the doctrine of moral insanity in another case. In September, 1847, Seward delivered an eulogy on Daniel O'Connell before the Irish citizens of New York, and in 1848 an eulogy on John Quincy Adams before the New York legislature. He took an active part in the presidential canvass, and in a speech at Cleveland described the conflict between freedom and slavery, saying of the latter: "It must be abolished, and you and I must do it."

In February, 1849, Seward was elected U. S. senator. His proposal, while governor, to extend suffrage to the negroes of New York, and many public utterances, placed him in the position of the most consistent opponent of slavery within the state party. President Taylor selected Seward as his most intimate counsellor among the senators, and the latter declined to be placed on any important committee, lest his pronounced views should compromise the administration. In a speech delivered on 11 March, 1850, in favor of the admission of California, he spoke of the exclusion of slavery as determined by "the higher law," a phrase that was denounced as treasonable by the southern Democrats. On 2 July, 1850, he delivered a great speech on the compromise bill. He supported the French spoliation bill, and in February, 1851, advocated the principles that were afterward embodied in the homestead law. His speeches covered a wide ground, ranging from a practical and statistical analysis of the question respecting steam navigation, deep-sea exploration, the American fisheries, the duty on rials, and the Texas debt, to flights of passionate eloquence in favor of extending sympathy to the exiled Irish patriots, and moral support to struggles for liberty, like the Hungarian revolution, which he reviewed in a speech on "Freedom in Europe," delivered in March, 1852. After the death of Zachary Taylor many Whig senators and representatives accepted the presidency of President Fillmore, but Seward resisted it with all his energy. He approved the nomination of Winfield Scott for the presidency in 1852, but would not sanction the platform, which upheld the compromise of 1850. In 1853 he delivered an address at Columbus, Ohio, on "The Destiny of America," and one in New York city on "The True Basis of American Independence." In 1854 he made an oration on "The Physical, Moral, and Intellectual Development of the American People," before the literary societies of Yale college, which gave him the degree of LL. D. His speeches on the repeal of the Missouri compromise and on the admission of Kansas made a profound impression. He was re-elected to the Senate in October, 1855, in spite of the vigorous opposition of both the National American party and the Whigs of southern sympathies. In the presidential canvass of 1856 he zealously supported John C. Fremont, the Republican candidate. In 1857 he journeyed through Canada, and made a voyage to Labrador in a fishing-schooner, the "Log," of which was afterward published. In a speech at Rochester, N. Y., on 13 October, 1858, he alluded to the "irrepressible conflict," which should only terminate in the United States becoming either entirely a slave-holding nation or entirely a free-labor nation. He travelled in Europe, Egypt, and Palestine in 1859.

In 1860, as in 1856, Seward's pre-eminent position in the Republican party made him the most conspicuous competitor for the presidential nomination. He received 133 votes in the first ballot at the convention, against 102 given to Abraham Lincoln, who was eventually nominated, and in whose behalf he actively canvassed the western states. Lincoln appointed him secretary of state, and before leaving the senate to enter on the duties of this office he made a speech in which he disappointed some of his party by advising patience and moderation in debate, and harmony of action for the sake of maintaining the Union. He cherished hopes of a peaceful solution of the national troubles, and, while declining in March, 1861, to enter into negotiations with commissioners of the Confederate government, he was in favor of evacuating Fort Sumter as a military necessity and politic measure, while re-enforcing Fort Pickens, and holding every other post then remaining in the hands of the National government. He issued a circular note to the ministers abroad on 9 March, 1861, deprecating foreign intervention, and another on 24 April, defining the position of the United States in regard to the rights of neutrals. Negotiations were carried on with European governments for conventions determining such rights. He protested against the unoffical intercourse between the British cabinet and agents of the Confederate states, and refused to receive despatches from the British and French governments in which they assumed the attitude of neutrals between belligerent powers. On 21 July he sent a despatch to Charles F. Adams, minister at London, defending the decision of congress to close the ports of the seceded states. When the Confederate commissioners were captured on board the British steamer "Trent," he argued that the seizure was in accordance with the British doctrine of the "right of search," which the United States had resisted by the war of 1812. The release of these prisoners, at the demand of the British government, would now commit both governments to the maintenance of the American doctrine; so they would be "cheerfully given up." He firmly rejected and opposed the proposal of the French emperor to unite with the English and Russian governments in mediating between the United States and the Confederate government. He made the Seward-Lyons treaty with Great Britain for the extinction of the African slave-trade. The diplomatic service was thoroughly reorganized by Sec. Seward; and by his able despatches and the uncensored presentation of his views and arguments, through able ministers, to the European cabinets, the respect of Europe was retained, and the efforts of the Confederates to secure recognition and support were frustrated. In the summer of 1862, the army having become greatly depleted, and public perception of the fact being deemed unwise, he went to the north with letters from the president and secretary of war, met and conferred with the governors of the loyal states, and arranged for their joint proffer of re-enforcements, to which the president responded by the call for 300,000 more troops. Mr. Seward firmly insisted on the right of American citizens to re- dress for the depredations of the "Alabama," and with equal determination asserted the Monroe doctrine in relation to the French invasion of Mexico, but, by avoiding a provocative attitude, which might have involved his government in foreign war, was able to defer the decision of both questions till a more favorable time. Before the close of the civil war he intimated to the French government the irritation felt in the United States in regard to its armed intervention in Mexico. Many despatches on this subject were sent during 1865 and 1866, which gradually became more urgent, until the French forces were withdrawn. When the Mexican empire fell. He supported President Lincoln's proclamation liberating the slaves in all localities in rebellion, and three years later announced by proclamation the abolition of slavery throughout the Union by constitutional amendment. In the spring of 1865 Mr. Seward was thrown from his carriage, and his arm and jaw were fractured. While he was convalescing these injuries President Lincoln was murdered and on the same evening, 14 April, one of the conspirators gained access to the chamber of the secretary, inflicted severe wounds with a knife in his face and neck, and struck down his son, Frederick W., who came to his rescue. His recovery was slow and his sufferings were severe. He concluded the treaty with Russia for the cession of Alaska in 1867. He negotiated treaties for the purchase of the Danish West India islands and the Bay of Samana, which failed of approval by the senate, and made a treaty with Colombia to secure American control of the Isthmus of Panama, which had a similar fate.

Sec. Seward sustained the reconstruction policy of President Johnson, and thereby alienated the more powerful section of the Republican party and subjected himself to bitter censure and ungenerous imputations. He opposed the impeachment of President Johnson in 1868, and supported the election of Gen. Grant in that year. He retired from office at the end of eight years of tenure in March, 1869. After a brief stay in Auburn, he journeyed across the continent to California, Oregon, British Columbia, and Alaska, returning through Mexico as the guest of its government and people. In August, 1870, he set out on a tour of the world, accompanied by several members of his family. He visited the principal countries of Asia, northern Africa, and Europe, being received everywhere with great honor. He studied the principal institutions of those countries, their ethnological characteristics, and their commercial capabilities. Returning home on 9 Oct., 1871, he devoted himself to the preparation of a narrative of his journey, and after its completion to a history of his life and times, which was not half finished at the time of his death. The degree of L.L.D. was given him by Union in 1866. He published, besides occasional addresses and numerous political speeches, a volume on the "Life and Public Services of John Quincy Adams" (Auburn, 1849). An edition of his "Works" was published, which contains many of his earlier essays, speeches, and addresses, with a memoir by George E. Baker, reaching down to 1853 (3 vols., New York, 1856). This a fourth volume was added in 1863, and a fifth in 1884, containing his later speeches and extracts from his diplomatic correspondence. His official correspondence during the eight years was published by order of congress. The relation of his "Travels Around the World" was edited and published by his adopted daughter, Olive Risley Seward (New York, 1878). Charles P. Adams published an "Address on the Life, Character, and Services of Seward" (Albany, 1873), which was thought by some to have extolled him at the expense of President Lincoln's fame, and elicited replies from Gilman Welles and others. Mr. Seward's "Autobiography," which extends to 1834, has been
continued to 1846 in a memoir by his son, Frederick W., with selections from his letters (New York, 1877). The vignette portrait represents Gov. Seward in early life, and the other illustration is a view of his residence at Auburn. There is a bronze statue of Mr. Seward, by Randolph Rogers, in Madison square, New York. — His son, Augustus Henry, b. in Auburn, N. Y., Oct. 1836; d. in Montrose, N. Y., 11 Sept. 1865. He was a member of the S. military academy in 1857, served through the Mexican war as lieutenant of infantry, afterward in Indian territory till 1851, and then on the coast survey till 1859, when he joined the Utah expedition. He was made a captain on 19 Jan., 1859, and on 27 March, 1861, a major on the staff. He served as paymaster during the civil war, receiving the brevets of lieutenant-colonel and colonel at its close. — Another son, Frederick William, lawyer, b. in Auburn, N. Y., 8 July, 1830, was graduated at Union in 1849, and after he was admitted to the bar at Rochester, N. Y., in 1851, was associate editor of the Albany "Evening Journal" till 1861, when he was appointed assistant secretary of state, which office he held for the eight years that his father was secretary. In 1869 he was a special mission to Santo Domingo. He was a member of the New York legislature in 1875, and introduced the bill to incorporate the New York elevated railroad and the amendments to the constitution providing for a reorganization of the state canal and prison systems, placing each under responsible heads, and abolishing the old boards. He was assistant secretary of state again in 1877-'81, while William M. Evarts was secretary. Union conferred on him the degree of LL. D. in 1878. His principal publication is "The Story of the Life of William H. Seward," (3 vols., New York, 1891). Mr. Seward resides at Montrose-on-the-Hudson. — Another son, William Henry, soldier, b. in Auburn, N. Y., 18 June, 1839, was educated by a private tutor, and in 1861 engaged in banking at Auburn. He entered the volunteer service as lieutenant-colonel of the 138th New York infantry, and afterward made colonel of the 9th New York heavy artillery. In 1863 he was sent on a special mission to Louisiana. Col. Seward was engaged at Cold Harbor and the other battles of the Wilderness campaign. He afterward commanded at Fort Foote, Md., and took his part in the battle of Monocacy, where he was wounded, but retained his command. He was commissioned as brigadier-general on 13 Sept., 1864, was commandant for some time at Martinsburg, Va., and resigned his commission on 1 June, 1865, returning to the banking business at Auburn. He is president of the Auburn city hospital, and an officer in various financial and charitable enterprises. — William Henry's nephew, Clarence Armstrong, lawyer, b. in New York city, 7 Oct., 1828; d. 24 July, 1897, was a member of his uncle's family, his parents having died when he was a child. He was graduated at Harvard in 1848, studied law, and began practice in Auburn as a partner of Samuel Blackford, whom he assisted in the compilation of the "New York Codes and Criminal Justice." (Auburn, 1850.) In 1854 he established himself in New York city. He was judge-advocate-general of the state in 1856-'59. After the attempted assassination of Sec. Seward and his son, Frederick W., he was appointed acting assistant secretary of state. He was a delegate to the National Republican convention of 1859, and a presidential elector in 1860. His practice had involved enterprises of various kinds, and had included companies, patents, and extraditions. — Another nephew of William Henry, George Frederick, diplomatist, b. in Florida, N. Y., 8 Nov., 1849, was prepared for college at Seward institute in his native village, and entered Union with the class of 1869, but was not graduated. In 1861 he was appointed U. S. consul at Shanghai, China. In the exercise of extra-territorial jurisdiction he had to pass judgment on river pirates claiming to be Americans, who infested the Yang-tsé-Kiang during the Taiping rebellion, and by his energy and determination checked the evil. In 1863 he was made consul-general, and introduced reforms in the consular service in China. He returned to the United States in 1866 to urge legislation for the correction of abuses in the American judicial establishment in China, which he was only able to effect on a second visit to the United States in 1869. He went to Siam in 1868 to arrange a difficulty that had arisen in regard to the interpretation of the treaty with that country. He was appointed U. S. minister to Corea in 1869, but at his suggestion the sending of a mission to that country was deferred, and he did not enter on the duties of the office. In 1873 he landed the crews of two American vessels-of-war, and, as dean of the consular corps, he was commissioned as one of the volunteers for the suppression of a riot which endangered the European quarter. On 7 Jan., 1876, he was commissioned as minister to China. During his mission he was called home to answer charges against his administration, in congress, and was completely exculpated after a long investigation. He declined to undertake the task of negotiating a treaty for the restriction of Chinese immigration, and, in order to carry out the views that prevailed in congress, he was recalled, and James B. Angell was appointed his successor on 9 April, 1880. After his return to the United States, Mr. Seward became a broker in New York city. He was president of the North China branch of the Royal Asiatic society in 1865-'6. Besides his official reports and diplomatic correspondence, he has written a book on "Chinese Immigration in its Social and Economic Aspects," containing arguments against anti-Chinese legislation (New York, 1881).

SEWELL, Jonathan, Canadian jurist, b. in Cambridge, Mass., in 1766; d. in Quebec, Canada, 12 Nov., 1839. He was the son of Jonathan Sewall, attorney-general of Massachusetts, who, about 1727, adopted the English form of the name. He was educated in the grammar-school at Bristol, England, and was sent to New Brunswick in 1783. He entered a study law with Ward Chipman. After his admission to the bar he practised for a year in St. John, and then removed to Quebec, where he soon attained a high professional position. In 1793 he became solicitor-general. In 1795 attorney-general and judge of the court of vice-admiralty, and from 1808 till 1838 chief justice of Lower Canada. The question of boundaries between the Dominion government and Ontario was settled in acquaintance with a decision rendered by him in 1818. He held the office of president of the executive council from 1808 till 1829, and that of speaker of the legislative council from 9 Jan., 1809, till his death. He went to England in 1814 to answer complaints that were made against the rules of practice that he enforced in his court, which charges were dismissed by the privy council. While there Judge Sewell was the original proposer of Canadian federation, publishing a pamphlet entitled, "Plan for a General Federal Union of the British Provinces in North America" (London, 1815). The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1822. He was the author of an "Essay on the Judicial History of France so far as it relates to the Law of the Province of Lower Canada" (Quebec, 1824).—His son, Edmund Wil- longby, clergyman, b. in Quebec, Canada, 3 Sept., 1800, received a classical education in Quebec and in English schools, studied for clerical orders, and was ordained a priest of the Church of England on 27 Dec., 1827. He was incumbent of the Church of the Holy Trinity at Quebec, and an assistant minister of the cathedral till 1828.—Jonathan's grandson, William Grant, journalist, b. in Que- bec, 25 Aug., 1803, was called to the bar, but preferred journalism, and in 1833 removed to New York city and became translator and law reporter for the "Herald." He was afterward connected for six years with the New York "Times," becoming one of its principal editors. Infuriated by health compelled him to pass three winters in the West Indies, and, while there, he studied the regular medicine which he had previously dispassionately in "The Ordal of Free Labor in the West Indies" (New York, 1861).

SEWELL, William Joyce, senator, b. in Castlebar, Ireland, 6 Dec., 1833. He was left an or- phan, came to the United States in 1851, was for a time employed in mercantile business in New York city, made several voyages as a sailor on merchant vessels, afterward engaged in business in Chicago, Ill. At the beginning of the civil war, being in the eastern part of the country, he entered the army as a captain in the 5th New Jersey regiment. He rose to be colonel in October, 1862, and commanded a brigade at Chancellorsville, where he led a brilliant charge and was badly wounded. He was recommended without a salary for the bar, but was also recommended for the bar, but preferred journalism, and in 1833 removed to New York city and became translator and law reporter for the "Herald." He was afterward connected for six years with the New York "Times," becoming one of its principal editors. Infuriated by health compelled him to pass three winters in the West Indies, and, while there, he studied the regular medicine which he had previously dispassionately in "The Ordal of Free Labor in the West Indies" (New York, 1861).

SEYBERT, Adam, chemist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 May, 1773; d. in Paris, France, 2 May, 1853. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1794, and then spent some time at the École des mines in Paris, also studying at the universities of London, Edinburgh, and Hamburg, Germany. He returned to Phila- delphia, and, acquiring a collection of minerals, devoted his attention specially to the practice and study of chemistry and mineralogy. In 1805 he was called on by the elder Silliman to name the few specimens that at that time constituted the collection belonging to Yale. Dr. Seybert was elected a Democrat to congress, and served from 27 Nov., 1809, till 2 March, 1815, and again from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 Dec., 1819. He was chosen a member of the American philosophical society in 1797, and contributed his papers on "Experiments and Observations on Land and Sea Air" and "On the Atmosphere of Mars" to its transactions during that year. His publication of "The Statistical Annals of the United States from 1789 till 1818" (Philadelphia, 1818) was reviewed by Sydney Smith in the "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1821. In this article occurs the oft-quoted question, "Who reads an American book?" He be-queathed $18,421 for educating the deaf and dumb, and $500 for the Philadelphia orphans. His son, Henry (1802-1883), was also educated at the École des mines, and achieved considerable reputa- tion by his analyses of American minerals. Shortly after the death of his father his attention became diverted from science.

SEYFFARTH, Gustavus, clergyman, b. in Ueigen, Saxony, 13 July, 1796; d. in New York city, 17 Nov., 1858. He studied in the gymnasium at Leipsic, afterward in the university, and in 1820 in Paris under the direction of Champollion, the celebrated French Egyptologist. He became well known as a scientist and archaeologist and a decipherer of Egyptian hieroglyphics. In 1823 he published his "Pelas Hieroglyphicum Egyptia- num," and from 1823-1839 was professor of oriental archæology in the University of Leipsic, during which time he published the most important of his numerous scientific and archæological works. In 1835 he emigrated to the United States, and was elected professor of archaeology and exegesis in Concordia Lutheran theological seminary, St. Louis, Mo., where he remained until 1871. From this date until his death he lived in Philadelphia in retirement. In 1873 he celebrated the fiftieth an- niversary of his doctorate, and he received from the University of Leipsic an annual pension, in recognition of original investigations in archæology. He claims to have been the first to decipher the hieroglyphics on the celebrated Rosetta stone; and he translated numerous Egyptian manuscripts in the collection of the New York historical society, and the characters on the obelisk in Central park, New York. He published numerous treatises, both in Germany and in the United States, many of which have been translated into different lan- guages. Among his published works are "De Sonis literariun gecearum tum genuinis tum fictis, explicationes, ac, explicationes, xvi. specimen hieroglyphicum" (1829); "Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Literatur, Kunst, Mythologie und Geschichte des alten Aegypten" (1826); "Brevis Defensio hieroglyphicis inventae a Fr. Aug. Spohl et G. Sfahr" (1827); "Répliche aux objections de Mon. Champollon contre le même système" (1827); "Systema Astronomiae Egyptianae" (1834); "Chronologia Sacra: eine Untersuchung über das Geburtjahr Christi" (1846); "Theologische Schriften der alten Aegypter, nach dem Turnier Papyrus, zum ersten Male übersetzt" (Gottingen, 1855); "Grammatia Egyptians: erste Abtheilung zur Uebersetzung all-aegyptischen Literatur-Werken, 1. Gesetz: Gesammt Satzungen des Hieroglyphischen Schriftsystem (1855); "Summary of Researches in Biblical Chronology, Universal History, and Biblical Archaeology, with Special Reference to Dr. Abbott's Egyptian Museum, together with a Translation of the First Sacred Books of the Ancient Egyptians" (New York, 1857); "Die wahre Zeitrechnung des alten Testaments, nebst einer Zeittafel zum neuen Testamenten" (St. Louis, Mo., 1848); "An Astrono- mical Inscription concerning the Year 22, B.C." (1860); "Amerikanischer Kalendermann" (1869); "Chronologia Veterum" (1871); and "Die Allgemeinheit der Sündfluth."
SEYFFERT, Anton, Moravian missionary, b. in Krutlich, German Bohemia, 15 Aug., 1712; d. in Zeist, Holland, 19 June, 1785. He united with the Moravians in 1728. In 1734 he was sent to Georgia with the first colony of Moravians, to establish a mission among the Creek and Cherokee Indians, but, owing to hostilities between Florida and Georgia, the enterprise was abandoned. In 1740 he removed to Pennsylvania, where he served in the church schools and in the ministry till April, 1745, when he returned to Europe.

SEYMOUR, Charles Bailey, editor, b. in London, 23 Oct., 1829; d. in New York city, 2 May, 1869. He came to New York in 1849, and became connected with the "Times," serving as musical and dramatic editor until his death. From January to July, 1861, he was associated with Theodore Igen in editing the New York "Weekly Review." He was correspondent for the "Times" at the Paris exposition of 1867, where his services as one of the American commission procured him a medal from the emperor. He was the author of "Self-Made Men" (New York, 1858).

SEYMOUR, Horatio, P. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 5 Jan., 1826. He was graduated at Columbia in 1850, at the head of his class, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in New York in 1854. He was ordained deacon in New York city, 17 Dec., 1854, by Bishop Horatio Potter, and priest in Greenburgh (Dobb's Ferry), N. Y., 23 Sept., 1855, by the same bishop. His first field of labor was as missionary at Annandale, Dutcheess county, N. Y., from January, 1855, till July, 1856. As part of the result of his activity a church was built, and a training institution founded. For orders was founded. The latter was chartered by the legislature of New York, under the title of St. Stephen's college, and Mr. Seymour was chosen to be first warden. He became in November, 1861, rector of St. Mary's church, Manhattanville, New York city, in October, 1862, of Christ church, Hudson, N. Y., and a year later of St. John's church, Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1863 he was elected professor of ecclesiastical history in the General theological seminary, and in 1875 he became dean of the same institution, in conjunction with his professorship. During his connection with the seminary he was invited to rectorships of churches in Chicago, San Francisco, and Troy, N. Y., but declined. He was also active in securing $90,000 for new chapel and library buildings, and earnestly opposed the removal of the seminary from the city into the country. From 1867 till 1879 he served as chaplain to the House of mercy, New York, without salary. He was also superintendent of the Society for promoting religion and learning in the state of New York until 1878. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Racine in 1865, and that of D.D. from Columbia in 1878. Dr. Seymour was elected in 1874 bishop of Illinois in succession to Bishop Whitehouse; but the house of deputies, in general convention then assembled, owing, it is understood, to strong feeling against ritualism and its ramifications, refused to confirm the election. He was unanimously chosen bishop of the new diocese of Springfield, Ill., 19 Dec., 1877. This election was confirmed by the standing committees and the bishops, but Dr. Seymour declined in April, 1878. At the diocesan convention in May, 1878, he was again unanimously chosen, but he was constrained to withdraw his letter and accept the bishopric. He was consecrated in Trinity church, New York, 11 June, 1878. The Episcopal church under his care has largely increased, and is well supplied with schools and other agencies for promoting the spread of the gospel. He attended the third Pan-Anglophone council held at Lambeth palace, London, in the first week of July, 1888, and during the conference made an address that was much admired. Bishop Seymour has contributed freely to church literature in annual addresses to his convention, and he has advocated the change of the name Protestant Episcopal church to "Church of the United States." His latest work is "Modern Romanism not Catholicity" (Milwaukee, Wis., 1880).

SEYMOUR, Jonathan, statesman, b. in Pompey Hill, Onondaga co., N. Y., 31 May, 1810; d. in Utica, N. Y., 12 Feb., 1886. He attended school in his native village until he was ten years of age, when he was sent to Oxford academy. In the spring of 1824 he entered Geneva academy (now Hobart college), and remained there a year, going thence to Cambridge's military school at Middle-town, Conn. He studied law with Greene C. Bronson and Samuel Boardley, and was admitted to the bar in 1832, but he never practised his profession, the care of the property he had inherited taking up much of his time. He became military secretary of Gov. William L. Marcy in 1833, and held the place until 1839. In 1841 he was elected to the state assembly as a Democrat, and in 1842 was elected mayor of Utica by a majority of 139 over Spencer Kellogg, the Whig candidate. In 1843 he was renominated, but was beaten by Frederick Hollister by sixteen votes. In the autumn of the same year he was elected again to the assembly, and in the session that began in 1844 he distinguished himself among men like John A. Dix, and Horatio Seymour, and Philip Hoffman. He was chairman of the committee on canals, and presented an elaborate report, which was the basis of the canal policy of the state for many years. He advocated the employment of the surplus revenue to enlarge the locks of the Erie canal and proceed with the construction of the Black river and Genesee valley canals, and he showed thorough confidence in the development of trade with the west. He was once more elected to the assembly in the autumn of 1844, and was chosen speaker in the legislature of 1845. In 1850 he became the candidate of the Democratic party for governor, as a man acceptable to all its factions; but he was defeated by the Whig candidate, Washington Hunt, by a majority of 292, though Samuel E. Drake, the Whig candidate, was elected lieutenant-governor. In 1852 he was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Baltimore, and did all in his power to have the vote of the New York delegation cast wholly for William L. Marcy, but failed. The same year he was again nominated as the Democratic candidate for governor, and was elected by a majority of 22,228 over John B. Watson, Washington Hunt. During his term there was a strong temperance movement in the state, and the legislature passed a prohibitory law, which Gov. Seymour vetoed, declaring its provisions to be unconstitutional, and denying its good policy. In 1854 he was renominated for the governorship, and received 156,495 votes, to 156,804 cast for Myron H. Clark, the Whig and temperance candidate, 124,952 for Daniel Ullman, the "Know-Nothing" candidate, and 35,500 for Greene C. Bronson, the candidate of the "Hard-shell" Democrats. The vetoed law was again passed by the legislature, approved by Gov. Clark, and afterward declared unconstitutional by the court of appeals. In 1856 Mr. Seymour was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Cincinnati, and he supported the Democratic candidates of Buchanan and Breckinridge, actively in the presidential canvas of that year. In a speech delivered at Springfield, Mass., 4 July, 1856, he set forth the political principles that he had previously followed and afterward adhered to. It gives the key to his whole political career. He argued against centralization and for local authority: "That government is most wise which is in the hands of those best informed about the particular questions on which they legislate, most economical and honest when controlled by those most interested in preserving frugality and virtue, most strong when it only exercises authority which is beneficial to the governed." He argued against the attempt to reform by legislative restraint, instancing a prison as a type of society perfectly regulated and yet vicious. He argued for a liberal policy in regard to immigration, saying that it was bringing acquisitions of power, peacefully and easily, such as no conqueror had ever won in battle. He did not deny the right of the people of this country to regulate immigration or even to forbid it altogether, which he asserted many years afterward in regard to the importation of Chinese. He argued that the growth of the north was so much more rapid than that of the south that public supremacy had passed into the hands of the free states. He argued for the right of the people of the territory in question to settle the slavery question for themselves, assuming that under such a policy there would be a rapid increase of free states.

In 1857 Mr. Seymour received from President Buchanan the offer of a first-class foreign mission, but declined it; and he took no prominent part in politics again until the secession movement began. He was a member of the committee on resolutions at the convention held in Twaddle hall, Albany, 31 Jan., 1861, after the secession of six states, to consider the feasibility of compromise measures; and he delivered a speech designed mainly to show the peculiar dangers of civil war. When the war began in 1861, Mr. Seymour was in Madison, Wis., and the Democratic papers of the legislature, then in session, called him into consultation as to the proper course of political action. He counselled the simple duty of loyalty, to obey the laws, and maintain the national authority, and he was active in raising one of the first companies of Wisconsin volunteers. When he returned home in the autumn he spoke at a Democratic ratification meeting held in Utica, 28 Oct., 1861, saying: "In common with the majority of the American people, I deplored the election of Mr. Lincoln as a great calamity; yet he was chosen in a constitutional manner, and we wish, as a defeated organization, to show ourselves giving him a just and generous support." He was an active member of the committee appointed by Gov. Edwin D. Morgan to raise troops in Oneida county, and he contributed liberally to the fund for the volunteers. In the following winter he delivered at Albany an address on the state and national defences: at a meeting of representative Democrats, held in the state capital in the disastrous summer of 1862, he introduced a resolution that "we were bound in honor and patriotism to send immediate relief to our brethren in the field"; and, at the request of the adjutant-general of the state, he became chairman of the committee to take charge of recruiting in his own neighborhood. On 10 Sept., 1862, the Democratic state convention nominated him for governor on the ground that, by that body, accepting the nomination, he intimates that compromise measures might have prevented the war, justified the maintenance of party organization, criticized the spirit of congress as contrasted with that of the army as he had found both during a visit to the national capital and the camps, and argued that the Republican party could not, in the nature of things, save the nation. After canvass in which he asserted on all occasions the right of criticizing the administration and the duty of sustaining the government, he was elected, defeating Gen. James S. Wadsorth by a majority of 10,752 votes. Perhaps the fairest statement of his position in regard to the war at that period is to be found in the following passage from his inaugural message of 7 Jan., 1863: "The assertion that this war was the unavoidable result of slavery is not only erroneous, but it has led to a disastrous policy in its prosecution. The opinion that slavery must be abolished to restore our Union creates an antagonism between the free and the slave states which ought not to exist. If it is true that slavery must be abolished our Union can be preserved by the government, that the south must be held in military subjection, that four millions of negroes must for many years be under the direct management of the authorities at Washington at the public expense, then, indeed, we must endure the waste of our armies in the field, further drain upon our population, and still greater burdens of debt. We must convert our government into a military despotism. The mischievous opinion that in this contest the north must subjugate and destroy the south to save our Union has weakened the hopes of our citizens at home and destroyed confidence in our success abroad." This argument against the probability of success along the path that finally led to it was of course supplemented by an unprivilleged expression of the glorification of the war as a medium of the Union and the supremacy of the constitution. On 23 March, 1863, President Lincoln wrote to Gov. Seymour a letter seeming to suggest a personal pledge of co-operation, and the governor sent his brother to Washington to convey assurances of loyal support, but along with them a protest against the imprisonment of the senators and representatives of the southern states. On 28 April, 1863, Gov. Seymour sent to the legislature a message suggesting a constitutional amendment as a necessary preliminary to a law allowing soldiers in the field to vote; and on 24 April he vetoed a bill to give the effective franchise to qualified voters of the army and navy of the state of New York," on the ground that it was unconstitutional. The amendment that he had recommended was afterward adopted. In everything pertaining to the raising of troops Gov. Seymour's administration showed conspicuous energy and ability, but especially in the effort to meet Lee's invasion of the north in the early part of 1863. On 15 June the secretary of war telegraphed to Gov. Seymour asking for help, and within three days 12,000 state militia, "well equipped and in good spirits," were on their way to Harrisburg. The good-will for such an achievement was not rare during the war, but it was not often joined with the necessary executive ability, and President Lincoln and Sec. Stanton both sent their thanks to Gov. Seymour for his promptitude. On 2 July, Gov. Curtin, of Pennsylvania, telegraphed for aid, and on the two following days troops were sent to his assistance.

During the absence of the New York militia the draft riots began. They had their pretext, if not their origin, in two grievances, which were afterward abolished. One was the commutation clause in the draft law, which provided that any drafted man might obtain exemption by paying the government three hundred dollars. The poor regarded this as a fraud upon them in the desperate lottery of life and death. The other was a discrimination against New York state, and especially New York city, in the allotment of quotas. Gov. Seymour had been anxious to have this injustice corrected, and to have the draft postponed; but it began in the metropolis on Saturday, 11 July, 1863. On Sunday the names of those drawn were published, and on Monday the rioting began. The rioters stopped at no outrage, not even the murder of the innocent and helpless. That night the governor reached the city, and the next day he issued two proclamations, the first calling upon all citizens to retire to their homes and preserve the peace, and the second declaring the city in a state of insurrection. The same day he took measures for enrolling volunteers and gathering all available troops. On Tuesday he also spoke to a mob in front of the city-hall. Then, and ever afterward, his impromptu speech was the subject of bitter criticism. It seems clear, from various accounts, that he spoke instinctively and that he promised the crowd that if they had grievances they would be redressed, declared himself their friend, and urged the necessity of obedience to law and the restoration of order. The design of the speech was twofold—to persuade the crowd to disperse, and, in any event, to gain time for the concentration of the forces within reach to repel the incursions of the forces under the direction of Gen. John E. Wool, with but slight aid from the National forces, order was restored within forty-eight hours. The rioting lasted from Monday afternoon until Thursday evening, cost about a thousand lives, and involved the destruction of property estimated at from half a million to three million dollars in value. The rally of the city by Gov. Seymour, President Lincoln, and counting out the injustice done in the enrolment, and asking to have the draft stopped, in order that New York might fill her quota with volunteers. The president conceded that there was an apparent unfairness in the enrolment, but refused to stop the draft. A commission, appointed by the war department to investigate the matter, declared that the enrolment under the act of 3 March, 1863, was imperfect, erroneous, and excessive, especially with reference to the cities of New York and Brooklyn. On 16 April, 1864, a Republican legislature passed a resolution thanking Gov. Seymour for his "prompt and efficient efforts" in pointing out the errors of the enrolment and procuring their correction. He took an active part in the state canvass of 1863, making many speeches in defence of his own record and the principles of his party, and attacking the policies of the administration; but in the election the state gave a Republican majority of about 29,000. On 22 April, 1864, the governor sent to the legislature a message urging the payment of interest on the state debt in gold; and this action was construed by political opponents as a covert attack on the national credit. On 3 Aug., 1864, the Democratic national convention met in Chicago, and Gov. Seymour presided, refusing to be a candidate for the presidential nomination. But he became a candidate for the governorship that year, and was defeated by Reuben E. Fenton, Republican, by a majority of 8,293.

After the close of the war Mr. Seymour remained a leader in politics. He made speeches in the state canvasses of 1865, 1866, and 1867, opposing strongly the reconstruction policy of the Republican party, and criticizing sharply its financial methods. He presided over the state conventions of his party, 3 Oct., 1867, and 11 March, 1868, and over the National convention that met in New York city, 4 July, 1868. In spite of previous declarations that he would not be a candidate before that body, and in spite of his protestations during its proceedings, the convention nominated him for the presidency, and he allowed himself, against his better judgment, to be overpersuaded into accepting the nomination. In the election of 3 Nov., 1868, he carried the states of Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, and Oregon; Mississippi, Virginia, and Texas did not vote; and the rest of the states voted for Gen. Grant, the Republican candidate. The electoral vote stood 214 for Grant and 80 for Seymour; the popular vote, 5,013,671 for Grant and 3,709,213 for Seymour. This defeat virtually closed Mr. Seymour's political career, for, though mentioned in connection with the presidency regularly every four years, offered the senatorship, and nominated for the governorship, he refused steadily to have anything more to do with public office. The remote origin of his last illness was a sunstroke, which he suffered in 1884, before entering the repairing of the roads in Deerfield, near Utica, where he had settled in 1864. See the accompanying view of his residence at Deerfield on the left bank of the Mohawk river. Mr. Seymour was of fair stature, slight and gracefully built, and had a refined face, lighted up by dark, glowing eyes. In social intercourse he was simple in manner and considerate in spirit. As an orator he was easy, agreeable, and powerful, plausible and candid in ordinary arguments, and yet rising often into true eloquence. He made many speeches on other than political occasions; he loved farming, and often delivered addresses at agricultural gatherings; he was a member of the Protestant Episcopal church, and frequently took part in its conventions as a lay delegate; he was a member of the commission for the state survey, and was an especial and the champion of the canal system. It may be said broadly that he was master of everything connected with the history, topography, and institutions of New York. Mr. Seymour married, 31 May, 1833, Mary Blecker, of Albany, who survived him only twenty days. They had no children.

SEYMOUR, Moses, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 23 July, 1742; d. in Litchfield, Conn. 17 Sept., 1826. He was fifth in descent from Richard, the ancestor of all of his name in the United States, who settled in Hartford in 1635. Richard is supposed to be the son of Chaplain Richard of Popham’s expedition, who was the first to preach the gospel to the Indians in this country. Moses removed to Litchfield in early life, became captain of a company of militiamen in the 30th Connecticut militia regiment, and in 1775 was given the same rank in the 5th cavalry, with which he served in repelling Tryon’s invasion in 1777, and at the surrender of Burgoyne. He also did good service as commissioner of supplies at Litchfield, which was then a depot for military stores. In 1783 he retired with the rank of major. Maj. Seymour held the office of town-clerk for thirty-seven years consecutively from 1789 till his death, was elected annually to the legislature from 1795 till 1811, and was active in the affairs of the Protestant Episcopal church. He was greatly instrumental in securing the proceeds of the sale of the Western Reserve for the promotion of common-school education, and is said to have originated the plan. He is one of the figures in Col. Trumbull’s painting of the surrender of Burgoyne.—Moses’s son, Horatio, senator, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 31 May, 1778; d. in Middlebury, Vt., 21 Nov., 1853, was graduated at Yale in 1797, studied law at Litchfield law-school, and removed in October, 1799, to Middlebury, Vt., where he continued his studies with Daniel Chipman, and was admitted to the bar in 1801, elected by the Connecticut state council from 1800 till 1817, and in October, 1829, was elected to the U. S. senate as a Clay Democrat, serving two terms, from 1821 till 1833. While in the senate he was chairman of the committee on agriculture. At the expiration of his second term he resumed the practice of his profession. He was the Whig candidate for governor of the state in 1833, but was defeated by Silas H. Jenness. In October, 1847, he was appointed by the legislature judge of probate for the district of Addison. Mr. Seymour had acquired a competency, but lost it, chiefly through becoming surety for others. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1847.—Another son, Henry, merchant, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 30 May, 1790; d. in Utica, N. Y., 30 Aug., 1857, settled at Storrs, Conn., and at Paterson, N. Y., accumulated a fortune, and afterward removed to Utica. He served in both branches of the New York legislature, and was mayor of Utica, canal commissioner, and president of the Farmers’ loan and trust company.—Henry’s son, Horatio, governor of New York, is noticed elsewhere.—Moses’s grandson, Henry, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 9 Feb., 1804; d. there, 12 Aug., 1851, was the son of Ozias Seymour, who was for many years sheriff of Litchfield county. He was placed in a mercantile house in New York at the age of fourteen, but illness forced him to return home, and he then entered Yale. An affection of the eyes compelled him to learn his lessons by hearing them read to him, and the training that this gave to his memory had much influence on his subsequent career. He was graduated in 1824, read law, was admitted to the bar in 1826, and engaged in active practice. He was county clerk in 1826-44, served in the legislature in 1842, 1849, and 1850, and in the last year was speaker of the house. In the same year he was chosen to congress as a Democrat, serving two terms. He was one of the small number of anti-Nebraska Democrats whose opposition nearly defeated the Kansas-Nebraska bill, but in the contest that followed he adhered to the Democratic party. In 1855 he became a judge of the state superior court, but in 1863 the Republican legislature refused to re-elect him and his Democratic colleague, through fear that they might interfere with the National draft by writs of habeas corpus, though they had been War Democrats. In 1864 he was an unsuccessful candidate for governor, and in 1870 a legislature whose majority was Republican chose him to the bench of the Supreme Court. He in 1871 succeeded to the chief-justicehip, and in 1874, by constitutional limitation of age, he retired. After that he was employed chiefly as committee and arbitrator in the trial of causes. In one county the majority of the cases on the superior court docket were referred to him by agreement for decision. In 1875 he was chairman of the commission that settled the long-standing boundary dispute between Connecticut and New York, and in 1878 he was at the head of the one that prepared the new state practice act. From 1876 till his death he delivered an annual course of lectures at Yale law-school. He was elected to office for the last time in 1881, when he was again a member of the legislature. Judge Seymour was an active member of the Protestant Episcopal church and a delegate to every general convention from 1868 till his death. Trinity gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1866, and Yale in 1873. A memorial of him was printed privately (Hartford, 1882)—Origen Storrs’s son, Edward Woodruff, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 30 Aug., 1832; d. there, 16 Oct., 1872, was graduated at Yale in 1854, and attained reputation at the bar. He served in the lower house of the Connecticut legislature four times, was in the senate in 1876, and in 1882 was chosen to congress, serving two terms, and later was supreme court judge.—Origen Storrs’s daughter-in-law, Mary Harrison, author, b. in Oxford, Conn., 7 Sept., 1855, is the wife of Rev. Storrs O. Seymour, of Hartford, Conn. She was educated in Brooklyn, N. Y., and Baltimore, Md., and, besides many contributions to periodicals, chiefly for children, has published “Mollie’s Christmas Stocking” (New York, 1859); “Sunshine and Starlight” (Boston, 1858; London, 1879); “Posy Vinton’s Picnic” (Boston, 1869); “Ned, Nellie, and Muggins” (New York, 1876); “Every Day” (1857); republished as “A Year of Promise, Praise, and Prayer.” (London, 1879); and “Through the Darkness” (New York, 1884).—SEYMOUR, Thomas Hart, governor of Connecticut, b. in Hartford, Conn., in 1808; d. there, 3 Sept., 1868. His early education was obtained at the school of the merchant and shipowner, was afterwards educated at Capt. Alden Partridge’s military institute at Middletown, Conn., in 1829. He was, for some time after his return to Hartford, the commanding officer of the Hartford light-guard. He then studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Hartford about 1833. He soon attained to a fair practice, but never aspired to a high position in his profession. In 1837-’8 he became editor of a Democratic paper, “The Jeffersonian,” and about the same time was judge of probate for the district. His popular manners and address soon threw him into politics, and in 1840 on was elected to Congress for the Hartford district. At the expiration of his term he declined a renomination. In March, 1846, he was commissioned major of the 9th or New England regiment of volunteers in the Mexican war. On 13 Oct. 1847, Col. Ransom, its commander, having fallen in the assault on Chapultepec, Maj. Seymour led the troops, scaled the height, and with his command was the first to enter that fortress. He was promoted to the command of the regiment, and took part in the capture of Mexico. In 1849 he was nominated for governor, but, though gaining largely over the vote of the preceding year, he was not elected. The next year he was again a candidate, and was chosen by a handsomely major, and re-elected in 1851, 1852, and 1853. In 1852 he was presidential elector. In the autumn of 1855 President Lincoln appointed him U. S. minister to Russia, and, resigning the governorship, he filled the office for four years. He formed a warm personal friendship for both the Czar Nicholas and his son, and received from them many costly tokens of their regard. After nearly a year of European travel he returned to the United States in 1859. When the civil war began, his sympathies were largely with the South, and he continued his opposition to the war until its close as the leader of the Connecticut Peace Democrats. In 1862 the state senate voted that his portrait, with that of Isaac Toney, should be removed from the chamber till the comptroller should be satisfied of his loyalty. In 1863 he was again a candidate for governor, but was defeated by William A. Buckingham, after an exciting contest.

SEYMOUR, Truman, soldier, b. in Burlington, Vt., 25 Sept., 1824; d. in Florence, Italy, 30 Oct., 1891. He was a kinsman of Moses, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, assigned to the 1st artillery, and in the war with Mexico won the brevet of 1st lieutenant for gallantry at Cerro Gordo, and that of captain for capture of Chapultepec by the 1st lieutenant, 26 Aug., 1847, and in 1850-’3 was assistant professor of drawing at West Point. He served against the Seminoles in Florida in 1856-’8, was made captain, 22 Nov., 1860, and took part in the defence of Fort Sumter in 1861, for which he received the brevet of major. He commanded the 5th artillery and the 2nd camp of instruction the brevets of lieutenant-colonel and for South Mountain and Antietam respectively. After 18 Nov., 1862, he was in the Department of the South, serving as chief of staff to the commanding general from 8 Jan. till 23 April, 1863, leading a division on Pony island, S. C., on 4 July, taking part in the attack on Morris island on 10 July, and commanding the unsuccessful assault on Charleston harbor on 18 July, when he was severely wounded. He was in charge of an expedition to Florida in February, 1864, and took possession of Jacksonville on 7 Feb. He left that town with 5,000 men on the 18th, and on the 29th met the enemy under Gen. Joseph Finegan near Olustee. After a three-hours’ battle, Gen. Seymour was forced to retire to Jacksonville. He returned to Virginia after commanding the district of Florida till 28 March, 1864, led a brigade in the 6th corps of the Army of the Potomac, and was elected to Congress from that district. He was in the Wilderness, 6 May, 1864. After being taken to Charleston, S. C., where he was exposed, by order of Gen. Samuel Jones, to the fire of the National batteries on Morris island, he was exchanged on 9 Aug., and led a division in the Shenandoah valley and the Richmond campaign, being engaged in the assault on the Confederate picket-lines at Petersburg, on 26 March, 1863, and the general attack of 2 April, which ended the siege of that place. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers “for ability and energy in handling his division, and for gallantry and valuable services in action,” and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for gallantry at the capture of Petersburg, both commissions to date from 10 March, 1865. He was present at Lee’s surrender and was made major-general in the army at 24 Aug., 1865, and became major of the 5th artillery, 13 Aug., 1866. After the war he commanded forts in Florida, Fort Warren, Mass., in 1869-’70, and Fort Preble, Me., in 1870-’5, and on 1 Nov., 1876, he was retired from active service. Since his retirement he has resided in Europe, chiefly in Florence. Williams college gave him the degree of A. M. in 1865.

SHACKELFORD, James M., soldier, b. in Lincoln county, Ky., 7 July, 1827. After receiving an education in private schools, he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1854, and practised in Kentucky. He served in the war with Mexico as a lieutenant. During the civil war he was colonel of the 35th Kentucky volunteers, and subsequently of the 8th Kentucky cavalry, and was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 2 Jan., 1863. His command captured Gen. John H. Morgan in Columbiana county, Ohio, in July, 1863. Since the war he has practised his profession in Evansville, Ind. In 1880 he was a Republican presidential elector for Indiana.

SHAFFER, Helen Alma, educator, b. in Newark, N. J., 35 Oct. 1830. After graduation at Oberlin college in 1861, she was a teacher of mathematics in the Central high-school in St. Louis, Mo., from 1865 till 1875, and in 1877 became professor of mathematics at Wellesley college, near Boston, Mass. She was made president of this institution in January, 1888, and died there, 20 Jan., 1894.

SHAFFNER, Taliaferro Preston, inventor, b. in Smithfield, Franklin co. Va., in 1818; d. in Troy, N. Y., 11 Dec., 1884. He was chiefly self-educated, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but gave much time to invention. He was an associate of Samuel F. B. Morse in the introduction of the telegraph, built the line from Louisville, Ky., to New Orleans, and that from St. Louis to Jefferson City in 1851, and held office in various telegraph companies. He was a projector of a North Atlantic cable via Labrador, Greenland, Iceland, the Faroe islands, and Scotland, and was the inventor of several methods of blasting with nitroglycerine and other high explosives, for which twelve patents were issued. In 1864 he was in the service of Denmark during the Dano-Prussian war. He was a member of various societies of the Pacific coast. Mr. Shaffner published the “Telegraph Companion: devoted to the Science and Art of the Morse American Telegraph” (2 vols., New York, SHALER, Oscar Lovell, jurist, b. in Athens, Va., 19 Oct., 1812; d. in Florence, Italy, 23 Jan., 1873. His grandfather, James Shafter, fought at Bunker Hill. Bennington, and Saratoga, and for twenty-five years served in the Vermont legislature. He was a county judge, a member of the Constitutional convention of 1836, and of the legislature. After graduation at Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn., in 1834, Oscar studied law at Harvard, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in Wimington, Va., in 1836. In 1834 he removed to California, and practised his profession there until 1864, when he became associate justice of the state supreme court for a term of ten years; but he resigned this post in 1867, owing to impaired health, and resided in Europe until his death.—His brother, James McMillan, lawyer, b. in Athens, May, 1816; d. 30 Aug., 1892, was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1837, and at Yale law-school in 1839. He was admitted to the bar in 1840, practised law in Torrington, Conn., and served in the legislature, and in 1842-9 was secretary of state. Removing to Wisconsin in 1849, he served in the legislature, was its speaker, and in 1852 was a defeated candidate for congress. In 1852 he removed to California, and, in connection with his brother and others, formed the law-partnership of Shafter, Park, and Haywood, and subsequently became associated with James M. Seawell. He served in the California senate in 1861-2 and again in 1863-4, when he was made president pro tempore. He was a member of the convention that adopted the present constitution of California. Mr. Shafter was made judge of the supreme court in 1892. He was a trustee of the Leland Stanford, Jr. university at Palo Alto, California.

SHAKESPEARE, Edward Orram, physician, b. in Dover, Del., 19 May, 1846. He is descended from Edmund, one of the brothers of the poet, William Shakespeare. After receiving his bachelor's degree at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1867, he was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1869. At first he practised in Hanover, Del., and subsequently removed to Philadelphia. He makes a specialty of ophthalmic surgery, and is lecturer on refraction and accommodation of the eye, and operative ophthalmic surgery in the University of Pennsylvania. In 1885 he was sent as the representative of the United States to Spain and other countries in Europe where choleræ existed, in order to investigate the causes, progress, and prophylactic measures of that disease. He spent six months in studying the subject, and made his report to congress. Dr. Shakespeare is a member of several medical societies, and has devised for clinical purposes a new ophthalmoscope and ophthalmometer.

SHALER, Alexander, soldier, b. in Haddam, Conn., 19 March, 1867. He was educated in private schools, entered the New York militia as a private in 1845, and became major of the 7th New York regiment, 13 Dec., 1860. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 65th New York volunteers in June, 1861, became colonel, 17 July, 1862, and commanded the military prison at Johnson's Island, Ohio, during the winter of 1862-4. He served with the American forces in the Philippine Islands, participating in all its battles, until 6 May, 1894, when he was taken prisoner at the battle of the Wilderness, and was held in Charleston, S. C., during the summer of that year. After his exchange he commanded a division of the 7th corps and the post of Dutch's Bluffs, Ark., serving in the southwest until he was mustered out on 24 Aug., 1865. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 30 May, 1866, and brevetted major-general of volunteers on 27 July, 1865. From 1867 till 1870 he was president of the board of commissioners of the Metropolitan fire department, and commissioner of the fire department of the city of New York city from 1870-3. He was consulting engineer to the Chicago board of fire and police in 1874-5, being charged with the reorganization and instruction of the fire department in that city. From 1877 till 1886 he was major-general of the 1st division of the national guard of New York, and was an organizer and president of the National rifle association of the United States. While a member of the board for the purchase of sites for armories, he was accused of bribery; but, although he was tried twice, the jury disagreed. Gen. Shaler published a "Manual of Arms for Light Infantry using the Rifle Musket" (New York, 1861).

SHALER, Nathaniel Southgate, geologist, b. in Newport, Ky., 22 Feb., 1841. He was graduated in 1862 and 1866 at Yale, and at Harvard, where he received private instruction from Louis Agassiz, and then spent two years in Kentucky, during the civil war, serving in the Federal militia as an officer in the artillery and on the staff. In 1864 he was appointed assistant in paleontology in the Museum of comparative zoology at Harvard, and in 1865 he was given charge of the instruction in geology and paleontology in the Lawrence school, which he continued until 1872. Meanwhile he received the degree of S. D. for higher studies in 1865, and in 1868 was appointed professor of paleontology in Harvard, which chair he held till 1887, when he became professor of geology. Dr. Shaler was appointed director of the Kentucky geological survey in 1873, and devoted a part of each year until 1890 to that work, in connection with which he published reports entitled "Geological Survey of Kentucky" (6 vols., Frankfort, 1876-'82), and "Memoirs of the Geological Survey of Kentucky" (1 vol., Cambridge, 1876). In 1884 he was appointed geologist to the U. S. geological survey in charge of the Atlantic division. He is a member of several geological and other scientific institutions, and has published upward of one hundred memoirs, including frequent popular articles in the "Atlantic Monthly," "Scribner's Magazine," and similar periodicals. Dr. Shaler has published "Thoughts on the Nature of Intellectual Property and its Importance to the State" (Boston, 1878); with William M. Davis, "Illustrations of the Earth's Surface; Glaciers" (1891); "A First Book in Geology" (1884); and "Kentucky, a Pioneer Commonwealth" (1885), in the "American Commonwealth Series."
received his early education in St. Joseph's college, near Susquehanna, and afterward studied for the priesthood in St. Charles Borromeo-seminary, Philadelphia. He was ordained a priest on 3 July, 1859, and placed in charge of the preparatory seminary at Glen Riddle. The see of Harrisburg was created in 1868, and Dr. Shanahan was consecrated its first bishop on 18 July of that year. He introduced parochial schools, academies, and charitable institutions. When he was raised to the episcopate there were in it 3 convents, 7 parochial schools, 22 priests, and about 29,000 Roman Catholics. At his death the number of priests was 51; churches, 51; chapels and stations, 75; academies, 7; orphan asylums, 3; parochial schools, 29; while the defective population had increased to more than 33,000.

SHANK, David, British soldier, b. in Virginia; d. in Glasgow, Scotland, 16 Oct., 1831. He was appointed a lieutenant under Lord Dunmore in Virginia in 1775, participated in the defence of Gwynn's island and other skirmishes, and served as a volunteer in the battle of Long Island, 27 Aug., 1776. In March, 1777, he became a lieutenant and in 1778 was appointed Gen. Howe's army into New Jersey. He was engaged in the battle of the Brandywine, 11 Sept., 1777, commanded the picket at Germantown on 4 Oct., and checked the American column that attacked the right of the British army. He was also present at Monmouth, and succeeded to the command of a company in October, 1778. In August, 1779, he led a troop of dragoons, and afterward the cavalry of the Queen's rangers in Virginia, with which he sustained a severe action at Spencer's Ordinary. In October, 1783, he returned to England, and in 1792 assisted in raising, under the patronage of the Marquis of Buckingham, a light-infantry corps of 400 men called the Queen's rangers for Canada, in which company he was commissioned senior officer, and he commanded the troops in Upper Canada in 1796 after receiving the brevet of major on 1 March, 1794. He was made lieutenant-colonel in January, 1798, and in 1799 returned to England. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the Canadian fencibles on 3 Sept., 1793, was promoted to colonel in 1798, and was commissioned major-general in 1811 and lieutenant-general in 1822.

SHANKS, William Franklin Gore, author, b. in Shelbyville, Ky., 20 April, 1837. He was educated in Louisville, and wrote for the Louisville "Journal" and the "Courier." At the beginning of the civil war he became a correspondent of the New York "Herald," and joined its staff in 1863. In 1866 he contributed regularly to Harper's "Weekly" and "Monthly," and prepared an index of the contents of the latter for the first forty volumes. On the death of Henry J. Raymond, he transferred his services from the "Times" to the "Tribune," remaining there until 1880. While city editor of the "Tribune" he was imprisoned for contempt of court for refusal to divulge the name of the writer of an article in the paper, taking the ground that he was a "privileged correspondent." After his release on a writ of habeas corpus he brought charges against District Attorney Winchester Britton, who was removed by Gov. Dix. In 1880 he instituted suit, for the first time in this country, against the vendor of a libel, recovering two judgments, and the court of appeals sustained the legal point at issue. In 1885 he organized the National press intelligences, of which he was president, and he is still a contributor to various newspapers. He has published "Recollections of Distinguished Generals" (New York, 1865); edited "Bench and Bar" (1868); and printed privately "A Noble Treason," a tragedy (1870).

SHANLY, Charles Dawson, journalist, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 9 March, 1811; d. in Arlington, Fla., 15 Aug., 1875. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, in 1834, and, after holding the office of assistant secretary of the department of public works in Canada in 1844, went to New York, and, after serving commissioned with the brevet of that city. In 1860 he was one of the chief contributors to "Vanity Fair," and at one time he was its editor. In 1855-6 he conducted "Mrs. Grundy." His writings consisted of essays and descriptive articles, poems, and ballads, some of which were imaginative and pathetic, while others were satirical or bittersweet. They were contributed to the "New York Leader," "Weekly Review," "Albion," and "Atlantic Monthly," and other literary papers, while on the daily journals he was a regular writer on social events and passing trites. He was an expert draughtsman of comic sketches, and passionately fond of painting. Of his writings, there were published in book-form, illustrated by Henry J. LeRoy, "A.J," (New York, 1866); "The Monkey of Porto Bello" (New York, 1866); and "The Truant Chicken" (1866). His best-known poems are "Civil War" and "The Walker of the Snow."—His brother, Walter, Canadian engineer, b. at the Abbey, Stradbally, Queen's county, Ireland, 11 Oct., 1819, was educated privately, afterward prepared himself for civil engineering, and came to Canada in 1837, settling in the county of Middlesex. He was resident engineer, under the Canada board of works, on the Beauchanois and Welland canals from 1843 till 1848, resident engineer Northern New York railroad, 1848-51, chief engineer of the Ottawa and Prescott railway in 1851-53, of the western division of the Grand Trunk railway in 1853-59, and general manager of the same line from 1857 till 1862. His greatest achievement in engineering was the completion of the Hoosac Mountain tunnel, in Massachusetts, in 1869-75, in which enterprise he was assisted by his brother, Francis. He was chief engineer of the Canada Atlantic railway, 1878-83, and later he was consulting engineer of that line. He sat in the Canadian assembly in 1868-74, when he was elected a Liberal member of the union parliament as a Conservative. He was an unsuccessful candidate in 1872 and 1874, re-elected by acclamation on the death of the sitting member in July, 1883, and again elected in February, 1887.

SHANNON, Wilson, governor of Ohio and of Kansas, b. in Belmont county, Ohio, 24 Feb., 1802; d. in Lawrence, Kan., 31 Aug., 1877. He was graduated at Athens college, Ohio, and at Transylvania university, Ky., and became a lawyer. He began practice at St. Clairsville, Ohio, and in 1835 was prosecuting attorney for the state. He was governor of Ohio in 1838-40, and again in 1842-4, and in 1844 he went as U. S. minister to Mexico. He was a representative in congress in 1855-56, and territorial governor of Kansas in 1855-6. During Gov. Shannon's administration in Kansas the troubles between the free-state and pro-slavery parties began to assume a threatening aspect. The governor favored the latter, though he tried to be cautious. He succeeded in peacefully terminating the " Wakarusha war" in 1855, but hostilities were resumed in the following year, ending in the burning of the town of Lawrence by a band of "border ruffians." His efforts as a U. S. marshal's posse, Shannon was finally removed, and succeeded by John W. Geary. He subsequently practised law in Lawrence.

SHAPLEY, Rufus Edwards, author, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 4 Aug., 1840. He was graduated at Dickinson college in 1860, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and has practiced in Philadelphia since 1866. He has published "Solid for Mollyo: a Political Satire on Boss Rule" (New York, 1881), and, in collaboration with Ainsworth R. Spofford, has edited a "Library of Wit and Humor." (5 vols., Philadelphia, 1884.)

SHARKEY, William Lewis, senator, b. in Musseel Sholes, Tenn., in 1797; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 April, 1873. He removed with his parents to the territory of Mississippi in 1804, and, as a substitute for his uncle, was present at the battle of New Orleans. After graduating at Greenville College, Tenn., he studied law. He was admitted to the bar of Mississippi in 1823, and began practice at Warrenton. He removed to Vicksburg in 1825, was elected a member of the Legislature in 1827, and was chief justice of the court of errors and appeals in 1832-35. In 1835 he was appointed Provisional Governor, and in 1836 was elected U. S. senator.

SHARON, William, capitalist, b. in Smithfield, Ohio, 9 Jan., 1821; d. 13 Nov., 1887. He received a good education and studied law, but relinquished it to engage in banking in Nevada. He became largely interested in silver-mines in that state, and amassed great wealth. He afterward became a trustee of the Bank of California, in San Francisco, and during the troubles of that institution, arising out of the death of its president, he brought its affairs to a satisfactory settlement. He was United States senator from Nevada from 1875 till 1881. He gained notoriety as defendant in a case for divorce that was instituted against him by Sarah Atleoa Hill, who, claiming to be his wife, gained her suit, and married Judge David S. Terry, who was her counsel in the case.

SHARP, Daniel, clergyman, b. in London, England, 25 Dec., 1783; d. near Baltimore, Md., 23 April, 1853. He came to this country in 1805 to engage in commercial pursuits, but soon abandoned these to devote himself to the ministry. After a course of study in Philadelphia, he became, in 1809, pastor of the Baptist church in Newark, N. J. From 1812 until his death he was pastor of a church in Boston. For several years he was associate editor of the "American Baptist Magazine." He was president of the Baptist missionary board in Boston, and the first president of the American Baptist missionary union, president of the board of trustees of Newton theological seminary for eighteen years, a fellow of Brown university from 1828 to the time of his death, and an overseer of Harvard. He received the honorary degree of D. D., from Brown in 1828, and Harvard in 1843. Dr. Sharp published numerous discourses and sermons. The "Recognition of Friends in Heaven" passed through four editions.

SHARP, Jacob, capitalist, b. in Montgomery county, N. Y., in 1817; d. in New York city, 5 April, 1888. He was of humble parentage and worked on a farm till 1857, when he began rafting on the Hudson river. He invested his money in timber, and furnished the material for the building of piers and bulkheads in New York city. In 1850 he conceived the scheme of a street railroad to be constructed on Broadway, and in 1884, after years of scheming against powerful opposition, he succeeded in his object. He was afterward arrested on the charge of bribing the New York board of aldermen in connection with securing the resolution for the construction of the Broadway street railway, and on 14 July, 1867, was sentenced by Judge Barrett to imprisonment for four years and a half in the state prison, and to pay a fine of $5,000. The court of appeals, on 29 Nov., 1887, set aside the conviction, and Sharp was released in consequence. He died suddenly from the effect of his conviction and imprisonment.

SHARPE, George Henry, lawyer, b. in Kingston, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1828; d. in New York city, 13 Jan., 1900. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1847, was admitted to the bar in 1854, and practised until he entered the army in 1861 as a captain in the 90th New York infantry. He became colonel of the 150th New York, and took part in all the battles of the Army of the Potomac. He served upon the staffs of Generals Hooker, Meade, and Grant, and was brevetted brigadier-general in 1864, and major-general in 1865. He was attached to the U. S. legation at Vienna in 1861, and was a special agent of the state department in Europe in 1867. In 1875-76 he was U. S. marshal for the southern district of New York, and took the census that demonstrated the great election frauds of 1868 in New York city, which led to the enforcement of the Federal election law for the first time in 1871. He was surveyor of customs for New York from 1873 till 1878. He was a member of the assembly in 1879-80, and in 1889-90 was the speaker. He delivered an address at the centennial at Independence, Missouri, in 1876, and was a member of the centennial committee. He was a member of the commission of the 75th anniversary of the organization of the state government in 1877, and before the Holland society on its visit to Kingston in 1886, both of which were published.

SHARPE, William, congressman, b. in Cecil county, Md., 13 Dec., 1742; d. in Fredrick county, N. C., in July, 1798. He received a classical education, studied law, and in 1763 began practice at Mecklenburg, N. C. He was a member of the Provincial congress that met at New Bern in April, 1775, at Hillsborough in August following, and at Halifax in 1776. He was aide to Gen. Griffith Rutherford in 1776 in his campaign against the Indians, and in 1777 was appointed one of the commissioners to treat with them. He was a member of the Congress at Philadelphia in 1777-78.

SHARPLESS, James, artist, b. in England about 1751; d. in New York city, 26 Feb., 1811. He was intended for the priesthood, but studied art. He came to this country in 1794, but, after remaining here several years, revisited England, returning to this country in 1809. He is buried in the churchyard of St. Peter's in Barclay street, New York. The only known work of Sharpless that is unquestionably authentic is a collection of small portraits in pastel. These are usually in profile, although some give the full face. Sharpless used a thick gray paper, softly stained.
and of woolly texture. His colored crayons, which he manufactured himself, were kept finely powdered in small glass jars, and he copied with a candid's sharpened pencil. He is said to have worked with great rapidity, wholly completing in two hours a portrait for which he charged $15 for a profile, and $20 for a full face. He usually made a réplica of each portrait, which he retained for his own use. This personal collection came into the possession of a gentleman in Virginia, it is said, as a cudgel's sharpened pistol. The prolific and the portraits remained his. Each one originally had the name of the subject attached to it, but during the civil war a descendant of the owner removed them from his home, and many of the names were lost, out of 130 only 70 were named. Subsequently an effort was made to identify them, but with only partial success. At the Centennial exhibition in 1876, forty of them were purchased for the National museum in Independence hali, Philadelphia, where they now are. Among them are portraits of George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe, Anthony Wayne, Horatio Gates, James Wilkinson, Elias Dayton, James Clinton, De Witt Clinton, Charles Brockton Brown, Chancellor Kent, Judge Witherspoon Johnson, it on ivory in miniature. In 1854 there were brought from England what purported to be three original oil-portraits by Sharpless, two of Washington, one profile and the other full face, and one of Mrs. Washington. They were exhibited in New York, and created much interest. In 1882-3 they were again brought to this country and exhibited more widely, and again in 1886-7, when they were offered for sale at an extravagant price, but an investigation threw doubt on their authenticity and caused their withdrawal. Sharpless had a turn for mechanics as well as art, and in the first volume of the "Medical and Philosophical Register" (1811) is published a paper by him on steam-carriages. His widow returned to England and had a side of his effects at Bath, but his two sons settled to the practice of law in the north, and settled in the south. It was probably from one of them that the Virginia gentleman obtained the collection of pastel portraits.

SHARPS, Christian, inventor, b. in New Jersey in 1811; d. in Vernon, Conn., 13 March, 1874. He early developed a talent for mechanics, became a machinist, and was conversant with every department of machinery. In 1832 he invented the Sharpless breech-loading rifle. In 1851 he removed to Hartford, Conn., to superintend the manufacture of this rifle, and he subsequently invented other fire-arms of great value, and patented many ingenious implements of various kinds.

SHARWOOD, George, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 July, 1810; d. there, 29 May, 1882. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1836 was admitted to the bar. He had been a member of the Philadelphia bar association and of the bar of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and in 1882 was the secretary of the bar of the State of Pennsylvania. He was of the firm of Sharswood, of England, who settled at New London, Conn., before 1665. His grandfather, James (b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 April, 1747; d. there, 14 Sept., 1836), was a humber merchant, served in the Revolutionary war, and was an original member of the Democratic party, and served in the general assembly of Philadelphia, and also in the select council. He was actively interested in founding the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank, and in 1817 wrote numerous articles against the Bank of the United States. On the 28th of July, 1825, he was a member of the New York legislature, and in 1828 was a member of the house of representatives of the city of New York in Columbia college, in 1836, conferred on him the degree of LL. D. See an address by George W. Biddle on the "Professional and Judicial Character of Chief-Justice Sharswood,"—His cousin, William, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1836, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1856, and then studied at Jena, Germany, where he received the degree. of Ph. D. in 1859. He has published "Studia Physica," a series of monographs (Vienna); "Ele- ments, a Drama" (Philadelphia, 1862; reissued as "The Betrothed," 1865); and "The Miscellaneous Writings of William Sharswood." (vol. i., 1862), besides contributions to scientific journals.

SHATTUCK, Aaron Draper, artist, b. in Francestown, N. H., 9 March, 1832. He became in 1850 the pupil of Alexander Ransom in Boston, and two years later entered the schools of the Academy of Fine Arts in New York. His pictures exhibited at the academy were a "Study of Grasses and Flowers" (1856). The following year he was elected an associate, and he became an academician in 1861. In 1867 he held the post of recording secretary. His works include "White Mountains in October" (1868); "Sunday Morning in New England" (1879); "Sheep and Cattle in Landscape" (1874); "Autumn near Stockbridge." (1876); "Granny Pastures" (1877); "Cows by the Meadow Brook." (1881); "Cattle" (1882); and "Peaceful Days" (1884). He invented in 1883-5 a stretcher-frame with keys, a great improvement on the old methods of tightening canvases.

SHATTUCK, George Cheyne, physician, b. in Templeton, Mass., 17 July, 1853; d. in Boston, 18 March, 1884. He was graduated at Harvard in 1873 and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1876, and became a successful physician in Boston. He was at one time president of the Massachusetts medical society. Dr. Shattuck, by his will, devised more than $60,000 to charitable objects. He contributed largely to Dartmouth college, and built its observatory, which he furnished with valuable instruments. "Shattuck school," at Faribault, Minn., a collegiate boarding-school under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal church, of which Dr. Shattuck was a liberal patron, was named for him. He received the degree of L.L.D. from Dartmouth in 1883. Dr. Shattuck published two Boylston prize dissertations, entitled "Structure and Physiology of the Skin" (Boston, 1869) and "Causes of Bilary Secretions" (1869), and "Yellow Fever of Gibraltar in 1825," from the French (1839).

SHATTUCK, Lemuel, author, b. in Ashby, Mass., 15 Oct., 1793; d. in Boston, 17 Jan., 1859. He taught in various places, and was a merchant in Concord, Mass., from 1823 till 1833. He was afterward a member of the common council of that city, and for several years a representative in the legislature. In 1844 he was one of the founders of the New England historic-geological society, and he was its vice-president for five years. He was also a member of various similar societies. He published "History of Concord, Mass." (Boston, 1835); "Vita Bataviae," with valuable instruments; "Travels in Boston," and "History of Boston" (1845); "Report on the Sanitary Condition of Massachusetts," (1850); and "Memorial of the Descendants of William Shattuck," (1855).

SHAUBENAU, Ottawa chief, b. near Maumee river, Ohio, about 1755; d. near Morris, Ill., 27 July, 1859. His name is also spelled Shawbene, Chab-o-neh, Shab-ee-ner, Chambline, and in other ways. He is descended from Tecumseh from 1807 till the battle of the Thames in 1813. In 1810 he accompanied Tecumseh and Capt. Billy Caldwell (see SAGANASH) to the homes of the Pottawattamies and other tribes residing in what are now Illinois and Wisconsin, with the hope of securing the cooperation of Indian braves in driving the white settlers out of the country. At the battle of the Thames he was by the side of Tecumseh when he fell, and at the death of their leader Shawbena and Caldwell both lost faith in their British allies, and never again took sides with them. They soon afterward met Gen. Lewis Cass at Detroit, and agreed to submit to the United States. In the effort made by Black Hawk in February, 1832, to incite the Pottawattamies and Ottawas to make war against the whites, Shawbena frustrated his plans, and thus incurred the hatred of the Sac chief. In early manhood Shawbena married the daughter of a Pottawattamie chief, whose village was on the Illinois river, near the city of Ottawa. Here he lived for a few years, but removed about twenty-five miles north, to what is known as Shawbena's grove, in DeKalb county. There he and his family resided till 1837, when he was removed to western Missouri. Unfortunately, his tribe and that of Black Hawk had reservations near each other. War began between them. His eldest son and a nephew were killed, and Shawbena went back to his old home in Illinois. After spending three years in Kansas on a new reservation, he returned again to Illinois, but found his land occupied by strangers, who rudely drove him from the grove that bore his name. The Washington officials had decided that he forfeited his title when he moved from his land. Some of his friends subsequently bought ten thousand acres of land in Illinois, near Morris, Ill., where he died. He was a superb specimen of an Indian. See "Life of Shawbena," by N. Matson (Chicago, 1878).

SHAVEK, George Frederick, inventor, b. in Ripley, Chautauqua co., N. Y., 4 Nov., 1855. He was educated at the high-school of his native town, and from 1873 till 1879 was in the employ of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern railway. He has recently been engaged in the introduction of his improved mechanical telephone, was president of the Consolidated telephone company in 1883-4, and since 1887 has been vice-president and general manager of the Shaver corporation, which has charge of that and other of his inventions. The principal features of Mr. Shaver's telephone are the manner of carrying the line around curves, and the way in which it is fastened to the diaphragm. His other devices include a self-righting and self-bailing life-boat, which has been used by the U. S. and Canadian governments, a compound automatic mail-catcher, a dynamophone to enable deaf persons to hear, a type-writer, and an automatic script-writer. Mr. Shaver is the son of Edward Shaver, of Boston.

SHAW, Albert, journalist, b. in New London, Butler co., Ohio, 23 July, 1857. He was graduated at Iowa college in 1879, and then studied history and political science at Johns Hopkins, where he took the degree of Ph. D. in 1884. Since 1883 he has been an editor of the Minneapolis "Tribune." He has published "Local Government in Illinois" (Chicago, 1880); "History of the City of Chicago," and "History of Commerce" (New York, 1884); "Cooperation in a Western City" (Baltimore, 1886); and "The National Revenue" (Chicago, 1888), and is a frequent contributor to periodicals.

SHAW, Albert Duane, consul, b. in Lyme, Jefferson co., N. Y., 27 Dec., 1841. He was educated at St. Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y., and New York university in 1861-3, and was elected to the legislature in 1867. He was appointed U. S. consul at Toronto, Canada, in 1868, and in 1878 promoted to Manchester, England, where he served till 1885. Mr. Shaw is known for his valuable consular reports to the state department, on foreign manufactures, and tariff and revenue reform. On his retirement from office in Manchester the citizens gave him a public reception in the city-hall, and presented him, through the mayor, with a silver casket and address. He has been active in politics as a Republican orator.

SHAW, Annie Cornelius, artist, b. in West Troy, N. Y., 16 Sept., 1852. She studied in Chicago, and was elected an associate of the Chicago academy of design in 1873, and an academician in 1876. Her principal works are "On the Calumet" (1872); "Mississippi Valley," "Rutland," and "Kenne Valley N. Y." (1875); "Eel Tide on the Coast of Maine" (1876); "Head of a Jersey Bull" (1877); "Returning from the Fair" (1878); "In the Rye-Field" and "Road to the Creek" (1880); "Close of a Summer Day" (1882); "July Day" and "In the Clearing" (1883); "Fall Ploughing," "Ashen Days," and "The Corn-Field" (1884); and "The Russet Year" (1885). Her "Illinois Prairie" was at the Centennial exhibit in 1876.

SHAW, Charles, lawyer, b. in Bath, Me., in 1782; d. in Montgomery, Ala., in 1888. He was graduated at Harvard in 1805, and practised law for several years in Lincoln county, Me., but removed to Alabama, and was judge of a court in Montgomery at the time of his death. He published a "Topographical Historical Description of Boston from the First Settlement," which was highly praised (1817).

SHAW, Henry, philanthropist, b. in England, 24 July, 1800; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 25 Aug., 1889. He came to this country in 1819, and in May of that year established himself in the hardware business in St. Louis with a small stock of goods. When he was forty years of age he retired from business with what at that time was considered a large fortune. He then spent nearly ten years in travel, and on his return founded the nucleus of the Missouri botanical garden. As it grew more attractive he conceived the idea of making his garden a public resort, and opened his gates to all comers, maintaining the property, which covered about fifty acres, at his own expense, and extending to all the hospitality of his residence. In 1870 he gave to the city of St. Louis a tract of 190 acres of land adjoining his garden, on condition of its maintenance as a public park by the city. It was laid out under the supervision of Mr. Shaw, who enriched it with many works of art. In June, 1883, he gave to Washington university improved reddish loam, valued at $10,000, which, in accordance with his wishes, was used in organizing and maintaining a school of botany as a department of the university. At the same time the Missouri botanical garden and arboretum were placed in such relation to the school as to secure their full use for scientific study and investigation to the professor and students for all time to come.

SHAW, Henry Wheeler, humorist, b. at Lancaster, Mass., 21 April, 1818; d. in Monterey, Cal., 14 Oct., 1885. His father, Henry Shaw, was a member of the Massachusetts legislature for twenty-five years, and was also a member of congress in 1818-21. The son was admitted to Hamilton about 1832, but, becoming captivated with stories of western life and adventure, abandoned his college studies, went to the westward. He worked on steamboats on Ohio river, then became a farmer, and afterward an auctioneer. In 1858 he settled in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., as an auctioneer, and in that year he wrote his first article for the senior editor of this work, followed in 1859 by his "Essay on the Mule." No attention was paid to these early sketches by him, and Mr. Shaw concluded that an author he was a failure. A year later he was induced to make another effort, and decided to adopt a method of spelling that more nearly represented his style of enunciation. The essay on the mule became "An Essay on the Mule, by Josh Billings," and was sent to a New York paper. It was reprinted in several of the comic journals, and extensively copied. His most successful literary venture was a travesty on the "Old Farmers' Almanac," published for many years by the Thomas family, "Josh Billings' Farmers' Almanac" (New York, 1870). Two thousand copies were first printed, and for two months few were disposed of, but during the next three months over 90,000 were printed and sold. For the second year 127,000 copies were distributed, and for the ten years of its existence the supply was very large. He began to lecture in 1863, his lectures being a series of pithy sayings without care or order, delivered in an apparently awkward manner. Their quaintness and drollery, coupled with mannerisms, peculiarly his own, made him popular on the platform. For twenty years previous to his death he contributed regularly to the "New York Weekly," and the articles appearing in the "Century," magazine under the pen-name of "Uncle Esek" are said to be his. Besides the books mentioned above, he published "Josh Billings, his 'Savings'" (New York, 1866); "Josh Billings on Ice" (1875); "Every Body's Friend" (1876); "Josh Billings' Complete Works," in one volume (1875); and "Josh Billings' Spice-Box" (1881). See his "Life," by Francis S. Smith (New York, 1883).

SHAW, James Boylan, clergyman, b. in New York city, 25 Aug., 1805; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 8 May, 1890. He was fitted for the sophomore class at Yale, but, instead of entering college, began the study of medicine; then that after law and afterward prepared for the Presbyterian ministry, being licensed to preach in 1882. He was for nearly fifty years in charge of the Brick church in Rochester, and then became pastor emeritus. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Rochester in 1852. Dr. Shaw was moderator of the general assembly of his church in 1863, and in 1873 chairman of the first committee that was sent by the Presbyterian church in the United States to the established church of Scotland. He was a trustee of Genesee college, Hamilton college, and Auburn theological seminary, and a corporate member of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. He published occasional sermons.

SHAW, John, naval officer, b. in Mount Mellick, Queens county, Ireland, in 1773; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Sept., 1823. He was the son of an English officer, and, after receiving an ordinary education, came to this country with an elder brother in December, 1790, and settled in Philadelphia, Pa. He became a sailor in the merchant marine, and in 1797 was master of a brig that sailed to the West Indies. When hostilities with France began, he entered the U. S. navy as a lieutenant, 3 Aug., 1798. In December of the following year he was given command of the "Enterprise," one of two schooners that had been built especially for chases and conflicts with small fast-sailing privateers. She was of 163 tons burthen, carrying 12 light guns, and a crew that varied from 60 to 75 men. In this vessel, during a cruise of eight months, he captured eight French privateers, and recovered eleven American prizes, fighting five spirited actions, two of them with vessels of superior force. His most serious action, which was considered one of the warmest combats of the war, was with the "Flambion," of 14 guns and 100 men, which, after a lively chase, he forced to fight and to strike her colors after a little more than an hour. The French vessel lost about half her crew in killed and wounded, to the "Enterprise's" ten. Lieut. Shaw cruised in the Mediterranean in the "George Washington" in 1801, and in the "John Adams" in 1803; meanwhile he had been promoted to master-commandant, 22 May, 1804. He became captain, 27 Aug., 1807, and commanded the squadron in 1814 that was blockaded by the enemy in Thames river between New London and Norwich, Conn. In 1816-'17 he had charge of the Mediterranean squadron, and afterward he commanded the navy-yards at Boston, May, 1826.

SHAW, John, poet, b. in Annapolis, Md., 4 May, 1778; d. at sea, 10 Jan., 1809. He was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, in 1795, studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, and was appointed surgeon in the fleet that was sent to Algiers in December, 1798. He also served as secretary to Gen. William W. Eaton in Tunis, but returned in 1800, and then went, in 1801, to continue his studies in Edinburgh. He went to Canada with the Earl of Selkirk in 1805, but removed to Baltimore, Md., in 1807. He died on a voyage from Charleston, S. C., to the Bahamas. Dr. Shaw was a contributor to the "Portfolio." His poems, with a memoir, and extracts from his foreign correspondence and journals, were published (Philadelphia, 1810).

SHAW, Oliver, musician, b. in 1776; d. in Providence, R. I., 1 Jan., 1849. He was well known as a singer and teacher, and composed numerous ballads, which were very popular at one time. They include "Mary's Tears," "Nothing True but Heaven," "Sweet Little Ann," and "The Death of Professor L. Ritter refers to him as the "blind singer."

SHAW, Samuel, merchant, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 Oct., 1754; d. at sea, 30 May, 1794. His father, Francis, a merchant of Boston, was associated with Robert Gould in 1770 in founding the town of Gouldsborough, Me. Operations were begun on a large scale, but the Revolution put a stop to them, and Shaw lost much money in the enterprise. Samuel early entered the counting-house of his father. He was an ardent patriot, and before the Revolution had a quarrel with Lieut. Wm. P. Lee, of the British army, who was billeted at his father's house. A duel was prevented only by the interposition of Maj. John Pitcairn. Young Shaw was commissioned a lieutenant of artillery, 1 Jan., 1776, served in New York, and much money to Yorktown, and at the close of the war had attained the rank of major, and aide-de-camp to Gen. Henry Knox. He went to Canton in February, 1784, as supercargo, and on his return, a year from the following May, Gen. Knox made him first secretary of the war department. He made several more voyages between New York and Canton, and in February, 1786, was appointed U. S. consul at the latter place. He died on his way from that city to Boston. His friend, Josiah Quincy, published "The Journal of Major Samuel Shaw, the First American Consul at Canton, with a Life of the Author." (Boston, 1847.)

His nephew, Robert Gould, merchant, b. in Gouldsborough, Me., 4 June, 1756; d. in Boston, Mass., 3 May, 1853, was the son of Francis Shaw, who, with his father, Francis, was interested in founding the town of Gouldsborough, Me., and lost much money when the enterprise failed. Robert went to Boston about 1789, and was apprenticed to his uncle William. When he came of age he entered business for himself, which he continued till 1810 in various partnerships. From the latter year till his death he conducted his affairs alone. He resided for several years in London, and in 1807 invested largely in lands in Maine. He accumulated a fortune, and bequeathed $110,000 to be put at interest until it should amount to $400,000. This is to be designated the Shaw fund, and is to be devoted to the support of an asylum for mariners' children. He also left $10,000 to purchase a site for the institution.—Robert Gould's eldest son, Francis George, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Oct., 1809; d. in West New Brighton, Staten island, N. Y., 7 Nov., 1882, entered Harvard in 1825, but left in 1828 to enter his father's counting-room. From 1830 to 1834 he engaged actively in business. In 1841, his health having improved, he went to West Roxbury, near Brook Farm, where an experiment in associative life, in which he was interested, was begun under the leadership of George Ripley. In 1847 he left West Roxbury, and, after living more than three years upon the north shore of Staten island, he went to Europe with his family. After four years he returned in 1855 to Staten island, where he resided until his death. While living at West Roxbury he was a member of the school committee and one of the overseers of the poor, a justice of the peace, and president of the first common council of Roxbury when that town became a city. He was also a member of the jury of Norfolk county that first proposed the establishment of the State reform-school of Massachusetts. During his residence on Staten island he was a trustee of the village in which he lived, a trustee of the Seaman's retreat and of the S. R. Smith infirmary, treasurer of the American union of associationists and of the Sailor's fund, president of the Freedman's relief association and of the New York branch of the Freedman's union commission, and connected with the various organizations of that state. He was also a hereditary member of the Massachusetts Society of the Cincinnati. Possessed of an ample fortune, he held it as a trust for the unfortunate. All good causes, the help of the poor, the ignorant, the criminal, and the enslaved, had always his ready sympathy and his hearty support. He was the author of several translations from George Sand, Fourier, and Zschokke.—Francis Gould's son, Robert Gould, soldier, b. in Boston, 19 Oct., 1837; d. at Fort Wagner, S. C., 18 July, 1863, entered Harvard in 1856, but left in March, 1859. He enlisted as a private in the 5th New York regiment on 19 April, 1861, became 2d lieutenant in the 2d Massachusetts on 28 May, and 1st lieutenant on 8 July. He was promoted to captain, 10 Aug., 1862, and on 17 April, 1863, became colonel of the 54th Massachusetts, the first regiment of colored troops from a free state that was mustered into the U. S. service. He was killed in the assault on Fort Wagner while leading the advance with his regiment. A bust of him has been made by Edmonia Lewis, the colored sculptor, and was unveiled by William P. Ottis, in Memorial hall, Harvard university. In May, 1897, a handsome equestrian monument by Augustus St. Gaudens was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies on Boston Common.
SHAW, Thompson Darrah, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 20 Aug., 1801; d. in Germantown, Pa., 26 July, 1874. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 20 May, 1829, was commissioned lieutenant, 17 May, 1829, and served in the West Indies in 1831-2. He was transferred to the "Vermont" in April, 1833, and then to the "Lexington" as flag-lieutenant of theBrazil squadron, and subsequently as an officer of that ship until 1835. He was on leave at Philadelphia for two years, and was then 1st lieutenant of the frigate "Constitution," of the Pacific squadron, in 1835-41. During the Mexican war he commanded the schooner "Petrel," and was highly complimented for his services at "Tampico," "Vera Cruz," and "Teques in 1846-7. Upon his return to Philadelphia a committee of citizens presented him with a sword and epaulets. He was commissioned commander, 7 Aug., 1850, had charge of the naval rendezvous at Philadelphia in 1852-4, and in 1854-5 commanded the sloop "Falmouth" in the Home squadron. He was placed on the retired list in 1855, but claimed that this did him an injustice, and was restored to his rank by a naval court in 1857. He was then on leave until the civil war began, when he took command of the steamer "Montgomery," in the Gulf blockading squadron. He was retired, 26 Feb., 1862, on his own application, after more than forty years' service. He was continued on special duty at New York, Philadelphia. His services were subsequently promoted to commodore on the retired list, 4 April, 1867, after which he was unemployed. See "Defence of Thompson Darrah Shaw before the Naval Court of Inquiry," by his counsel Robert K. Scott (Washington, 1857).

SHAW, William Smith, lawyer, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 12 Aug., 1773; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 April, 1828. He was graduated at Harvard in 1793, became private secretary to his uncle, President John Adams, and at the close of the latter's administration began to study law in Boston with William Sullivan. He was admitted to the bar in April, 1804, and in the same year became treasurer of the Anthropology society, the nucleus of the Boston Athenæum. He devoted much of his time to the college matters, and was a founder of the "Athenæum Shaw," he was the first to suggest making the library public, and connecting with it a reading-room. After the incorporation of the institution he was its secretary and librarian till 1835, and its secretary alone till 1824. At his decease he left it collections of coins, pamphlets, and books to the value of $9,000. For many years after 1800 he was clerk of the U. S. district court, and he took part in politics as secretary of the state Federalist committee. Mr. Shaw was a fellow of the American academy, an original member of the American antiquarian society, and an officer of the Linnean society. Besides his connection with the "Monthly Anthology and Boston Review," the publication of the Anthropology society, he was a promoter of the North American Review." His portrait, by Gilbert Stuart, was painted by order of the trustees of the Athenæum on his retirement from office. See "Memorials of William Smith Shaw," by Joseph B. Felt (Boston, 1832). His cousin, Lemuel, jurist, b. in Barnstable, Mass., 9 Jan., 1781; d. in Boston, Mass., 30 March, 1861. His brother, John, b. 25 Dec., 1788, was pastor of the West Parish of Barnstable from 1790 till his death in 1807. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1809, and, after serving for a year as usher in the Franklin school in Boston, began the study of law in that city. He had also been an assistant editor of the Boston "Gazette," and in 1802 proposals were issued for the publication by subscription of his translation of a French work on the "Civil and Military Transactions of Bonaparte." He completed the translation, but it met with no financial support. He was admitted to the bar in 1810, became corresponding member of the Athenæum in Boston, and rose gradually to eminence in his profession. He was several times a member of the legislature between 1811 and 1819, and in 1820 a delegate to a national constitutional convention. In 1821-2 and 1828-9 he sat in the state senate. He draughted the charter of the city of Boston, and held various minor town offices, but never allowed these to interfere with his legal practice. In January, 1829, at a meeting that was held in opposition to the recently established tariff, he was the head of a committee to draft a memorial to congress. In 1830, on the death of Chief Justice Isaac Parker, of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, Mr. Shaw was appointed his successor, though he had never held any judicial office. He declined peremptorily at first, but finally accepted. He took his seat in September, 1830, and held it till his resignation, 31 Aug., 1839. During this period he gained a high reputation for his judicial ability, and he is regarded as one of the foremost jurists that New England has produced. Shaw men have contributed more to the growth of the law as a progressive science. Among other noted cases he presided at the trial of the convent rioters in 1834, and at that of Prof. John W. Webster for the murder of Dr. George Parkman. His charge to the jury in the latter case was widely condemned as harsh, but public opinion generally sustained him. In 1853 Judge Shaw visited Harvard, where he was cordially received by members of the bar. He was an overseer of Harvard for twenty-two years, and for twenty-seven years one of its corporation, and he held membership in many learned societies. His reported decisions fill a large part of fifty volumes, and include many in novel and complicated cases. Among his published addresses are a "Fourth-of-July Oration" (1834); a "Military Address" (1830); and "Address at the Opening of the New Court-House, Worcester" (1845).

SHAYS, Daniel, insurgent, b. in Hopkinton, Mass., in 1747; d. in Sparta, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1825. He served as an ensign at the battle of Bunker Hill, and attained the rank of captain in the Continental army, but "resigned his commission for reasons quite philosophical." He then resided at Pelham (now Prescot), and in 1786 took part in the popular movement in western Massachusetts for the redress of alleged grievances. This had begun as early as 1782, and had increased as popular discontent, incident on the unsettled condition of affairs at the close of the Revolution, became greater. Conventions were held in several western counties, lists of grievances were drawn up, committees of correspondence were established, and the same machinery was sought to be used against the state government that had been successful in overturning British rule in 1775. The complaints were divers, but were, in general, that the governor's salary was too high, the senate aristocratic, the lawyers extortorate, and taxes too burdensome. Among the demands were, that the general court should no longer sit in Boston, and that a large issue of paper money should be made. Though the conventions deprecated violence, there were uprisings in several counties, directed against the courts, which were popularly regarded as the instruments of legal oppression, especially in the collection of debts. The tribunals were prevented from sitting, in many cases, and the malcontents grew bolder. The militia was often powerless, as its members largely sympathized with the mobs. An attempt by the legislature to repress some of the more serious disorders, which had occurred in the courts, became known as a leader in the rebellion when, at the head of about 1,000 men, he appeared at Springfield to prevent the session of the supreme court at that place. The court-house, by the governor's order, had been occupied by a somewhat smaller body of militia under Gen. William Shepard, which sustained the court, but, after sitting through the forenoon, dispersed, and on the fourth day both parties dispersed. Shays was also present at the large gathering of insurgents that took place in Worcester in December, and retired at the head of a large party of them to Rutland, Vt., on Dec. At this time he seems to have regretted his part in the agitation, as, in the absence of meetings in the state, he expressed his desire to desert his followers and receive a pardon. The officer was afterward empowered to offer him one on that condition, but had no opportunity to do so. In January, 1787, three bodies of insurgents concentrated on Springfield, where they hoped to capture the Continental arsenal, which was defended by Gen. Shepard. Shays, with 1,000 militia, occupied Springfield. At a council held, under the state, he expressed his desire to desert his followers and receive a pardon. Account of the New Netherland in 1643-4” (New York, 1862); “The Operations of the French Fleet under Count de Grasse” (1864); “The Lincoln Memorial” (1865); translations of Charlevoix’s “History and General Description of New France” (6 vols., 1866–72); Hennepin’s “Description of Louisiana” (1889); Le Clerc’s “Establishment of the Faith” (1881); and Penalosa’s “Expedition” (1882); “Catholic Church in Colonial Days” (1886); “Catholic Directory of the United States” (1889); and “Life and Times of Archbishop Carroll” (1888). He also translated De Courey’s “Catholic Church in the United States” (1856); and edited the Cramoisy series of narratives and documents bearing on the early history of the French-American colonies (26 vols., 1857–60); “Washington’s Private Diary” (1861); Carthew’s “History of the Five Indian Nations” edition of 1727 (1866); Alsop’s “Maryland” (1869); a series of grammars and dictionaries of the Indian languages (15 vols., 1860–74); and “Life of Pius IX.” (1875). He had also published “Bibliography of American Catholic Bibles and Testaments” (1859), corrected several of the very erroneous Catholic Bibles, and revised by the Vulgate Chalmers’ original Bible of 1738 (6 vols., 1857; and had organized several prayer-books, school histories. Bible dictionaries, and translations.

SHEAFE, James, senator, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 16 Nov., 1755; d. there, 5 Dec., 1829. He was graduated at Harvard in 1773, was for several years a member of the board of selectmen of the town of Portsmouth, a representative, and subsequently a senator, in the New Hampshire legislature, and a member of the State executive council. He was a representative in Congress from New Hampshire from 1779 till 1801, and U. S. senator from 7 Dec., 1801, till 1802, when he resigned. He was defeated as the Federalist candidate for governor in 1816 by William Plumer, a Democrat. Mr. Sheafe was a merchant and ship-owner.

SHEAFER, Peter Wenrick, mining engineer, b. in Halifax, Pa., 31 March, 1819. He completed his education in the academy at Oxford, N. Y., in 1837, and was associated with Henry D. Rogers in the first geological survey of Pennsylvania in 1838. In this connection he was specially engaged in tracing the geological features of the range of mountains that extends from near Pottsville to beyond Shamokin and Tamaqua. In 1839 he was appointed to theanganese to mining engineering, and he has been specially active in the development of the coal and iron interests of that district. The management of the coal-mines of the Philadelphia and Reading coal and iron company, and of those that were bequeathed by Stephen Girard to Philadelphia, were for a long time confided to him. He has been consulted frequently on questions of mining law, and has testified in court as an expert in these subjects. In 1849 he secured the passage of a bill for completing the first state survey, and in 1873 he was influential in securing the appointment of J. P. Lesley (q. e.) to undertake the charge of the second survey of Pennsylvania. Mr. Sheafier is a member of various societies, including the American Institute of mining engineers, to whose transactions he has contributed professional papers. He issued in 1875, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Geological Survey, a map of Pennsylvania as it was in 1755.

SHEAFE, Sir Roger Hale, bart., British soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 July, 1756; d. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 17 July, 1851. He was the third son of William Hale, deputy collector of customs at Boston. After the death of his boy’s father, Earl Percy, whose quarters were at his mother’s own house, took charge of his education, and procured him a commission in the 3th foot, 1 May, 1778. He became a lieutenant-colonel in 1798, served in Holland in 1799, and in the expedition to the Baltic in 1801. He was on duty in Canada from September, 1802, till October, 1811; on 23 Nov., 1810, received the brevet rank of colonel, and on 4 June, 1811, became a major-general. He served again in Canada from 29 July, 1812, till November, 1813, and commanded the British troops after the fall of Gen. Sir Isaac Brock at Queenston, where he defeated the American troops, and for this service was made a baronet, 16 Jan., 1813. He defended York (now Toronto) when it was attacked in April, 1813. Sir Roger had been appointed administrator of the government of Canada West after the death of Brock, and continued as such, and in command of the troops, till June, 1813. He was promoted lieutenant-general, 19 July, 1821, was advanced to the full rank of general, 28 June, 1838, and became colonel of the 36th regiment, 21 Dec., 1829.

SHEARMAN, Thomas Gaskell (sher-man), lawyer, b. in Birmingham, England, 25 Nov., 1814. He came with his parents to New York when he was nine years old, was educated privately, studied law, was admitted to the bar in Kings county in 1839, and became successful in practice in New York city. Since 1879 Mr. Shearman has been an active worker in the cause of free-trade. He was joint author of “Tillinghast and Shearman’s Practice, Pleadings, and Forms” (New York, 1861–5), and “Shearman and Reiffelder on Negligence” (1869), prepared for the commissioners of the code of the whole of the “Book of Forms” (Albany, 1860), and drafted that part of the civil code that relates to obligations, etc. (Albany, 1865), and has written numerous pamphlets on free-trade, protection, indirect taxation, and cognate subjects.

SHECUT, John Linnaeus Edward Whitriddle, author, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 4 Dec., 1770; d. in Charleston, S. C., in 1836. He was graduated in medicine at Philadelphia in 1791, and soon afterward began practice in Charleston, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was actively concerned in founding the South Carolina homespun society, the first cotton-factory in the state, and in 1813 organized the Antiquarian society of Charleston, now the Literary and philosophical society of South Carolina. Dr. Shecut maintained that a predisposing cause of yellow fever was the far-away lateral of the sphere consequent upon its being deprived of its due proportion of electricity, and he is said to have been the first physician in Charleston to apply electricity in the treatment of this disease. He was the author of “Flora Carolinensis, a Historical, Medical, and Economical Display of the Vegetable Kingdom” (2 vols., Charleston, 1809); “An Inquiry into the Properties and Powers of the Electric Fluid, and its Artificial Application to Medical Uses” (1818); “Shecut’s Medical and Philosophical Essays (1819); "Elements of Natural Philosophy" (1826); and "A New Theory of the Earth" (1826).

SHEDD, Joel Herbert, civil engineer, b. in Pepperell, Mass., 31 May, 1834. He was educated in Bridgewater academy, and then took a three-years' course in civil engineering in a Boston office. On the completion of his studies he established himself in his profession in Boston, but in 1859 removed to Providence, R. I., where he has since resided. In 1860 he was appointed commissioner for Massachusetts on the Concord and Sudbury rivers, and he has been chairman of the state board of harbor commissioners of Rhode Island since its organization in 1876. He was commissioner from Rhode Island to the World's fair in Paris in 1878, and chairman of the Rhode Island body of the interstate commission on boundary-lines between that state and Connecticut in 1886-7; and was also at the head of the similar commission on the encroachments of Pawtucket river in 1887-8. Mr. Shedd was elected a member of the American society of civil engineers in 1869, and was chairman of its sub-committee on sewerage and sanitary engineering at the World's fair in Philadelphia in 1876. He has been commissioner of the harbor department of the New England and the middle states, as well as for the U. S. government and the states of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The most important single work of engineering that he has designed and executed is the Providence water-works, costing $4,300,000. Every element of these works was studied fundamentally, and nothing was copied. They have been much referred to, and have a European reputation. Mr. Shedd has probably done more to improve the quality of American hydraulic elements than any other engineer, both by the rigidity of his demands and by his careful testing of the material. He has been frequently called on to testify on engineering matters in court, and he has contributed largely to professional journals. Among his articles are the section on "Rain and Drainage," in French's "Farm Drainage" (New York, 1859); "Essay on Drainage" (Boston, 1859); and reports on "Ventilation" (1864); "Roads" (1865); "Water-Works" (1868-9); and "Sewerage" (1874-84). The latter include reports to nearly all of the principal cities of New England. — His wife, Julia Ann Clark, b. in Providence, R. I., 9 May, 1839, has been his companion in all the arduous tasks of a busy life, and besides translations in book-form, has published "Famous Painters and Paintings" (Boston, 1874); "The Ghirlandaie Gates" (1879); "Famous Sculptors and Sculpture" (1881); and "Raphael, his Madonnas and Holy Families" (1883).

SHEDD, William Greenough Thayer, author, b. in Acton, Mass., 21 June, 1829; d. in New York city, 17 Nov., 1894. He was graduated at the University of Vermont and at Auburn seminary, and in 1844 was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Brandon, Vt. He became professor of English literature in the University of Vermont in 1845, which chair he held till appointed to that of systematic theology at Andover Theological Seminary in 1852. In 1854 he was made professor of church history in Andover theological seminary. In 1862 he became associate pastor of the Brick church (Presbyterian) in New York city, but he resigned in 1863, and was appointed to the professorship of biblical literature in Union theological seminary, and in 1874 to that of systematic theology in the same Institution, which he held until 1890. He had published "Eloquence a Virtue, or Outlines of Systematic Rhetor; from the German of Dr. Francis Theremin" (New York, 1830); "Coleridge's Works, with Introductory Essays" (7 vols., 1853); "Lectures on the Philosophy of History" (Andover, 1856); "Discourses and Essays" (1856); "A Manual of Church History," from the German of Heinrich Ernst Ferdinand Guericke (2 vols., 1857); "The Confession of Augustine," with introductory essay (1860); "History of Christian Doctrine" (2 vols., New York, 1863); "Homiletics and Pastoral Theology" (1867); "Sermons to the Natural Man" (1871); "Theological Essays" (1877); "Lawyer Essays" (1878); "Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans" (1879); "Sermons to the Spiritual Man" (1881); and "Doctrine of Endless Punishment" (1882). Dr. Shedd wrote the "Gospel of Mark" in vol. ii. of the translation of Lange's commentary; and contributed an introduction to Samuel R. Asbury's translation of Dr. Carl Ackerman's work, "The Christian Element in Plato and the Platonic Philosophy" (Edinburgh, 1860); and to the American edition of Dr. James McCosh's "Evolution of the Mind" (New York, 1869).

SHEELIGH, Matthias, clergyman, b. at Charlestown, Chester co., Pa., 29 Dec., 1821. He is a descendant of a German family that came to this country early in the 18th century, and whose name originally was Schillic. He studied in West Chester, Pa., and in Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1849-1, and was graduated at the theological seminary there in 1852. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry of the Lutheran church, and in 1885 he received the degree of D. D. from Newberry college, Newberry, S. C. He has filled various pastorates in New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and since 1869 has been at Fort Washington, Pa., near Philadelphia. He was secretary of the general synod in 1886, 1869, and 1871, and has been a member of the Lutheran board of publication since 1859, and its president in 1869-71, and a director of Gettysburg theological seminary since 1864. In 1868 he was appointed by the general synod one of its delegates to the meeting of the World's evangelical alliance that was held in New York in 1873. He has been very successful as a poet and statistician, and is a frequent contributor to religious periodicals. He has been editor of the "Sunday-School Herald," in Philadelphia, since 1869, and of the "Lutheran Almanac and Year-Book," since 1871. Besides numerous doctrinal and historical articles in theological reviews, and many contributions in poetry and prose to periodicals, he has published "Hymns for the Seventh Jubilee of the Reformation" (Philadelphia, 1867); "An Ecclesiad: A Jubilee Poem before the General Synod" (1871); "A Gettysburgiad: A Jubilee Poem before the Gettysburg Theological Seminary" (1876); and "Luther: A Song Tribute, more than Fifty Original Poems, on the Four Hundredth Anniversary of Luther's Birth" (1883). A large number of his hymns have found a place in collections. He has a volume of original sonnets nearly ready for publication. Besides these, he has published "Ola Thorlaksson, an Icelandic Narrative," translated from the German (1870);
"Outline of Old Testament History" (1869); "Outline of New Testament History" (1870); "Herald of the Picture Books" (12 vols. 1878); and "A Brief History of Maryland" (1883).

SHEFFIELD, Joseph Earle, donor, b. in Southport, Conn., 19 June, 1793; d. in New Haven, Conn., 16 Feb., 1882. He received a common-school education, and in 1808, when only fifteen years of age, began his business career as a clerk in New Berne, N. C. In 1813 he became a partner in a New York house, but remained in New Berne to represent the business there. He travelled extensively in the south on business matters, and visiting Mobile, Ala., he decided to transfer his southern business to that city, and in a few years became its chief cotton merchant. In 1835 he returned to his native state, and established himself in New Haven. He took an active part in the construction of the New Haven and Northampton canal, and was one of the most energetic in securing the charter for the New York and New Haven railroad. His next enterprise was building the Chicago and Rock Island railroad, which proved very profitable to him. His donations to Yale have been munificent. In 1860 the name of its scientific department, which was reorganized and placed on a firm basis by his liberality, was changed to the Sheffield scientific school in his honor. Its two buildings are called respectively Sheffield hall and North Sheffield hall. He gave to other colleges, seminaries, and religious institutions, and his gifts amounted to more than $1,000,000.

SHEFFIELD, William Palme, senator, b. on Block island, R. I., 30 Aug., 1819. He was educated at Kingston academy, R. I., and by private tuition at Harvard law school in 1843, and admitted to the bar in 1844. He was a member of the legislature in 1842–5, 1849–52, 1857–61, 1863–73, and 1875–84. He was chosen to congress as a Unionist in 1869, served one term, and in 1884 he was appointed by the governor to fill out the unexpired term of Henry B. Anthony in the state senate till 2 Feb., 1885, when the vacancy was filled by the legislature. He was a member of the Rhode Island constitutional convention in 1841, and of the one that framed the existing constitution in 1842. He was a commissioner to revise the state laws in 1871–2, has been president of the People's library since its foundation, and a trustee of the Redwood library, in Newport, for many years. His publications include many speeches and monographs, especially concerning alterations on the constitution of Rhode Island; "Historical Sketch of Block Island" (Newport, 1876); "Historical Sketch of Newport" (1876); and "Rhode Island Privateers" (1883).

SHIEGOUE, James Henry, artist, b. about 1810; d. 7 April, 1879. He devoted himself mainly to portraiture, but produced also landscape and genre pieces. He first exhibited at the Academy of Design, New York, in 1833, was elected an associate in 1841, and became an academian two years later. From 1848 till 1852 he was corresponding secretary of the academy.

SHELBY, Evan, pioneer, b. in Wales in 1729; d. at King's Meadows (now Bristol), Tenn., 4 Dec., 1794. At the age of fifteen he emigrated with his father's family to North Mountain, near Iagers-town, Md. He received a meager education, but when quite young became noted as a hunter and woodsman. In the old French war he rose from the rank of private to that of captain, in which capacity he served throughout the campaign of Gen. John Forbes. He then engaged in trade with the Indians, and afterward embarked extensively in herding and raising cattle on the Virginia border. He colonized his employed when, in 1774, war began with the Shawnees and Delawares. Raising a body of fifty volunteers in the Watauga district, he led them on a march of twenty-five days through a truckless wilderness, and joined the Virginia army on the eve of the battle of Point Pleasant. Toward the close of the action, all his ranking officers being either killed or disabled, the command devolved upon him, and he utterly routed the enemy. In 1779 he led a successful expedition against the Chickamauga Indians. He subsequently served with the Virginia army on the seaboard, rising to the rank of colonel, and then to that of general—his eldest son, Isaac, governor of Kentucky, b. in North Mountain, Md., 11 Dec., 1750; d. near Stanford, Ky., 18 July, 1836, acquired a common English education, and the principal of the most energetic in securing the charter for the New York and New Haven railroad. reformed the troops, and inflicted upon the Indians a severe defeat, with the loss of only two men dead and four wounded. This victory and John Shelby's defence of Wattaga, frustrated the rear attack by which the British hoped to envelop and crush the southern colonies. Soon afterward Gov. Patrick Henry promoted Shelby to a captaincy, and made him commissary-general of the Virginia forces. When Sevier, in 1779, projected the expedition that captured the British stores at Chickamauga, presumably equipped and mounted the troops by the pledge of his individual credit. In this year he was commissioned a major by Gov. Thomas Jefferson, but, when the state line was run, his residence was found to be in North Carolina. He then resigned his commission, but was at once appointed to the colony of Sullivan county by Gov. Caswell. He was in Kentucky, perfecting his title to lands he had selected on his previous visit, when he heard of the fall of the southern settlers and the desperate situation of affairs in the southern colonies. He at once returned to engage in active service against the enemy, and, crossing the mountains into South Carolina, in July, 1780, he won victories over the British at Thickett's Fort, Cedar Springs, and Musgrove's Mill. But, as the disasters of the Southern army increased, and the last engagement, he was obliged to retreat across the Alleghanies. There he soon concerted with John Sevier the remarkable expedition which resulted in the battle of King's Mountain, and turned the tide of the Revolution. For this important service he and Sevier received the thanks of the North Carolina legislature, and the latter was appointed a governor of the state. Having been elected to the general assembly, Shelby soon afterward left the army to take his seat, but, before he left, suggested to Gen. Horatio Gates the expedition which, carried out by Morgan under Gen. Greene, resulted in the victory at Cowpens. Being soon afterward recalled to South Carolina by Gen. Greene, he marched over the mountains with Col. Sevier and 500 men, and did important service against the British in the vicinity of Charleston. In the winter of 1782-3 he was appointed a commissioner to survey the lands along the Cumberland that were allotted by North Carolina to her soldiers, and this done, he repaired to Boonesborough, Ky., where he settled as a planter. He was a delegate to all the conventions in Kentucky; in 1792 he succeeded to the governorship on the resignation of the executive by which separation of Kentucky from Virginia, and succeeded, in connection with Thomas Marshall and George Muter, in thwarting the reasonable scheme of Gen. James Wilkinson and his associates to force Kentucky out of the Union and into an alliance with Spain. When, in 1792, Kentucky was admitted as a state, Shelby was almost unanimously elected its first governor. During nearly the whole of his administration the western country was in a state of constant irritation, in consequence of the occupation of the Mississippi by Spain; but, by his firm and sagacious policy, this discontent was kept from breaking out into actual hostilities. Finally, by the treaty of 20 Oct., 1795, the Spaniards ceded the navigation of that river; and Shelby's term of office, springing soon afterward, he refused to be again a candidate, and returned to the cultivation of the farm which he had reluctantly left at what he deemed the call of his country. He subsequently refused all office except that of presidential elector, to which he was chosen six times successively under Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe; but, on the eve of the second war with Great Britain, his state again peremptorily demanded his services. Our first western army had been captured, Michigan was in the hands of the enemy, and the whole frontier was threatened by a strong coalition of Spaniards, armed by Great Britain. Instinctively the people turned to Shelby, and he consented to serve as governor "if there should be a war with England." Organizing a body of 4,000 volunteers, he had them mounted on his own responsibility, and at the age of sixty-three led them in person to the re-enforcement of Gen. William Henry Harrison, whom he joined just in time to enable that general to turn the tide of fortune, and win a decisive victory on Lake Erie. For his services in this campaign Shelby received a gold medal and the thanks of congress and of the Kentucky legislature. In March, 1817, he was tendered the post of secretary of war by President Monroe; but he declined, and never again held any office except that of commissioner for the purchase from the Chickasaws of their remaining lands in Tennessee and Kentucky.

SHELBY, Alexander, physician, b. in Suffield, Conn., 23 Oct., 1766; d. in Montgomery county, N. Y., 10 Sept., 1836. He was graduated at Yale in 1787, settled in Montgomery county, N. Y., took an active part in politics, was speaker of the New York assembly in 1804, 1806, and 1812, and a judge of the county court. He was graduated at Columbian College in 1812, and became eminent in his profession. He was a regent of the University of New York state, a member of the convention that framed the State constitution in 1820, and chairman of the committee on the executive departments. SHELDON, David Newton, b. in Suffield, Conn., 26 June, 1807; d. in Waterville, 4 Oct., 1889. He was graduated at Williams, studied in Newton theological seminary, and was pastor of Baptist churches in Maine till 1836, when he became a Unitarian. In 1841-53 he was president of Waterville college (now Colby university). He obtained the degrees of B. A. and D. D. He published sermons and "Sin and Redemption" (New York, 1856).

SHELDON, Edward Austin, educator, b. in Perry Centre, N. Y., 4 Oct., 1833; d. in Oswego, 16 Sept., 1897. He studied at Hamilton, but was not graduated. In 1869 that college gave him the degree of A. M. He was superintendent of public schools at Syracuse, N. Y., in 1851-3, occupied the same post in Oswego in 1853-99, and since 1862 had been principal of the Oswego state normal training-school. He was the first to introduce into this country a systematic course of objective instruction in the public schools, and in 1861 organized the first training-school for teachers, and his system was subsequently adopted by the normal schools of New York state. He published "First Reading Book and Reading Charts" (New SHELTON, George William, author, b. in Summerville, S. C., 28 Jan., 1843. He was graduated at Princeton in 1863, and served during 1864 at City Point, Va, in charge of the sick and wounded of Gen. Grant's army. In 1865 he was appointed tutor in Latin and belles-lettres in Princeton, and in 1869 he became instructor in the oriental languages at Union theological seminary, New York, where he remained until 1873, after which he studied for two years in the British museum. Mr. Sheldon then devoted himself to journalistic work and was art critic of the New York "Evening Post" in 1876-82, and dramatic critic and city editor of the New York "Commercial Advertiser" in 1882-83. He has published "American Painters" (New York, 1879); "The Story of the Volunteer Fire Department of the City of New York" (1882); "Hours with Art and Artists" (1882); "Artistic Homes" (1882); "Artistic Country Seats" (1886); "Selections in Modern Art" (1886); and "Recent Ideals of American Art" (1888).

SHELTON, Henry Clay, clergyman, b. in Marion, N. Y., 1814. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, and at the theological department of Boston university in 1851, studied in Leipzig in 1874-'5, and since the latter date has been professor of historical theology in Boston university. Mr. Sheldon's standpoint is that of evangelical Arminianism, in opposition both to Calvinism and to Liberalism. He has published a "History of Christian Doctrines" (2 vols., New York, 1889).

SHELTON, Lionel Allen, soldier, b. in Otsego county, N. Y., 30 Aug., 1829. He was brought up on a farm in Ohio, educated at Oberlin, taught for several years, and after attending the law-school in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in 1851, and settled in Elyria, Ohio. He served one term as judge of probate, supported John C. Frémont in 1856, and in the Philadelphia republican convention in 1856, was commissioned brigadier-general of militia in 1860, and actively engaged in raising recruits for the National army at the beginning of the civil war. He became captain of cavalry in August, 1861, was chosen major soon afterward in the 20th Ohio cavalry, transferred as lieutenant-colonel to the 42d Ohio infantry, became colonel in 1863, and in the latter regiment in West Virginia, Kentucky, and eastern Tennessee. In November of that year, when his regiment was placed under Gen.William T. Sherman at Memphis, he commanded a brigade which participated in the battles of Chickasaw Bayou and Arkansas post. He led a brigade in the 13th army corps in 1863, was wounded at the battle of Fort Gibson, became colonel in 1863, and was wounded at Vicksburg and in subsequent skirmishes. In March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. After the war he settled in New Orleans, La., practised his profession, and in 1879-'87 was in congress, having been elected as a Republican. During this time he was chairman of the committee on militia. He was appointed governor of New Mexico in 1881, served till 1885, and was receiver of the Texas and Pacific railway in 1885-7.

SHELLABARGER, Samuel, b. in Clark county, Ohio, 10 Dec., 1817; d. 6 Aug., 1896. He was graduated at Miami in 1842, studied law under Gen. Samson Mason, was admitted to the bar in 1847, was a member of the first legislature in Ohio that met under the present constitution, and in 1869 was elected to congress as a Republican. He took his seat in the special session that met in accordance with President Lincoln's call, on 4 July, 1861, and served in 1863, 1863-'5, and in 1870-'3. He was chairman of the committees on commerce, that on charges by Frey against Rocke Conkling, and that on the provost-marshal's bureau, and was on the special committees on the assassination of President Lincoln, civil service, and the New Orleans riots. He was U. S. minister to Portugal in 1869-'70, and in 1874-'5 was one of the civil service commission. He then resumed the practice of his profession in Washington, D. C.

SHELTON, Frederick William, author, b. in Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y., in 1814; d. in Carthage Landing, N. Y., 20 June, 1881. He was graduated at Princeton in 1834, studied for the ministry, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1847. He was rector of the church in Huntington, L. I., for several years, also of the church in Fishkill, N. Y., and in 1854 accepted a call to Montpelier, Vt. About ten years later he removed to Carthage Landing, N. Y., and devoted himself chiefly to authorship. Mr. Shelton's publications were "The Trollopiad, or Travelling Gentleman in America," a satirical poem (New York, 1857); "Salander and the Dragon," a romance (1851); "The Rector of St. Bartholomew's, or Superannuated" (1853); "Up the River," a series of rural sketches on the Hudson (1853); "Christalline, or the Heiress of Fall-Down Castle," a romance (1853); "Peepees from a Relf, or Parish Sketch-Book" (1855). He also published several lectures on popular topics, and was a frequent contributor to the "Knickerbocker Magazine" and other periodicals. To the former he contributed a series of local humorous sketches, beginning with "The Kushow Property, a Tale of Crowhill in 1848," followed by "The Tanneum Papers," and other articles. In 1870 he wrote for the benefit of Lewis Gaylord Clark (q. v.) after his retirement from the editorship of the "Knickerbocker Magazine."

SHELTON, William, clergyman, b. in Fairfield, Conn., 11 Sept., 1798; d. there, 11 Oct., 1883. He was the son of Rev. Philip Shelton (1734-1825), the first clergyman ordained by a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States. He was graduated at the General theological seminary in New York city in 1823, was ordained deacon by Bishop Brownell, and priest in 1826 by the same bishop. He officiated for a time at Plattsburg and Red Hook, N. Y., and also in Fairfield, Conn. In 1829 he accepted the rectory of St.
Paul's church, Buffalo, N. Y., where he served for fifty years, and then became rector emeritus. His death occurred while he was on a visit to his native place. Dr. Shelton published no contributions to church literature, but devoted himself wholly to his pastoral work and to his share in the work of the church at large.

SHEPARD, Charles Upham, mineralogist, b. in Little Compton, R. I., 29 June, 1804; d. in Charleston, S. C., 1 May, 1886. He was graduated at Amherst in 1834, and spent a year in Cambridge, Mass., studying botany and mineralogy with Thomas Nuttall, and at the same time gave invention in these branches in Boston. The study of mineralogy led to his preparation of papers on that subject which he sent to the " American Journal of Science," and in this manner he became acquainted with the elder Silliman. He was invited in 1837 to become Prof. Silliman's as-istant, and continued so until 1831. Meanwhile for a year he was curator of Franklin Hall, an institution that was established in Brownell, New,
in New Haven for popular lectures on scientific subjects to mechanics. In 1839 he was appointed lecturer on natural history at Yale, and held that place until 1847. He was associated with Prof.
Silliman in the scientific examination of the culture and manufacture of sugar that was undertaken by the latter at the special request of the secretary of the treasury; and in the southern states, particularly Louisiana and Georgia, were assigned to him to report upon. From 1834 till 1861 he filled the chair of chemistry in the Medical college of the state of South Carolina, which he relinquished at the beginning of the civil war, but in 1865, upon the urgent invitation of his former colleagues, he resumed his duties for a few years. While in Charleston he discovered rich deposits of phosphate of lime in the immediate vicinity of that city.
Their great value in agriculture and subsequent use in the manufacture of superphosphate fertilizers proved an important addition to the chemical industries of South Carolina. In 1845 he was chosen professor of chemistry and natural history in Amherst, which being vacated by the resignation of Prof. Brownell, he continued the lectures on natural history until 1877, when he was made professor emeritus. He was associated in 1835 with Dr.
James G. Percival in the geological survey of Connecticut, and throughout his life he was actively engaged in the preparation of the American Journal of Science. He announced in 1835 his discovery of his first new species of microbe, that of warwickite in 1838, that of danburite in 1839, and he afterward described many other new minerals until shortly before his death. Prof. Shepard acquired a large collection of minerals, which at one time was unsurpassed in this country, and which in 1877 was purchased by Amherst college, but three years later was partially destroyed by fire. Early in Life he became interested in the mineral resources of the state, and his cabinet, long the largest in the country, likewise became the property of Amherst. His papers on this subject, from 1829 till 1882, were nearly forty in number and appeared chiefly in the "American Journal of Science." The honorary degree of M. D. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1839, and that of LL. D. by Amherst in 1865. He was a member of many American and foreign societies, including the Imperial society of natural science in St. Petersburg, the Royal society of Göttingen, and the Society of natural sciences in Vienna. In addition to his many papers, he published "Treatise on Mineralogy" (New Haven; 3d ed., enlarged, 1855); a "Report on the Geological Survey of Connecticut" (1837); and numerous reports on mines in the United States.—His son, Charles Upham, chemist, b. in New Haven, Conn., 4 Oct., 1842, was graduated at Yale in 1863 and at the University of Göttingen in 1867, with the degree of M. D. On his return he was appointed professor of chemistry. He resigned the professor ship of chemistry at the state of South Carolina, which he held from 1863 till 1883, and since that time he has devoted himself entirely to the practice of analytical chemistry.
Dr. Shepard has been active in developing the chemical resources of South Carolina, and has paid special attention to the nature and composition of the phosphate deposits of that state. In 1887, he presented the second catalog of minerals that was left by his father, numbering more than 10,000 specimens, to the collections at Amherst, and his cabinet of representatives of more than 290 different meteorites has been deposited in the U. S. national museum in Washington, D. C. He is a member of scientific societies and has contributed to the literature of mineralogy.

SHEPARD, Elliott Fitch, lawyer, b. in Jamestown, N. Y., 23 July, 1833; d. 24 March, 1893. He was educated at the University of the city of New York, admitted to the bar in 1858, and for many years practised in New York. In 1861 and 1862
he was aide-de-camp on the staff of Gov. Edwin D.
Morgan, was in command of the depot of volunteers at Elmira, was ordered in organizing, equipping and forwarding to the field nearly 50,000 troops. He was instrumental in raising the 51st New York regiment, which was named for him the Shepard rifles. He was the founder of the new state bar association in 1876, which has formed the model for the organization of similar associations in other states. In March, 1898, he purchased the New York "Mail and Express.

SHEPARD, Irwin, educator, b. in Marcellus, Onondaga co., N. Y., 5 July, 1843. He received his primary education in the public schools in Michigan, entered the National army in 1862, and served nearly three years in the 17th Michigan volunteers.
He commanded the party that burned the Armstrong house in 1863, and was later ordered to Knoxville, Tenn., in November, 1863, and was employed as aide-de-camp bravery in that action, and wounded in the battle of the Wilderness in May, 1864. He was graduated at Olivet college in 1871, and was superintendent of city schools and principal of the high-school, Charles City, Iowa, in 1873-5, occupied a similar office at Winona, Minn., from the latter date till 1879, and has since been president of the Michigan normal school.

SHEPARD, Isaac Fitzgerald, soldier, b. in Natick, Mass., 7 July, 1816; d. 25 Aug., 1880. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, was principal of a Boston grammar-school in 1844-57, and served in the legislature in 1856-90. He became a member of the regiment of United States in Nathaniel Lyon in 1861, colonel of the 3d Missouri infantry in 1862, and in 1863 colonel of the 1st regiment of Mississippi color troops, commanding all the colored troops in the Mississippi valley. On 27 Oct., 1863, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He was adjutant-general of Missouri in 1867-80, and was placed in Hankow, China, in 1874-80. He was chairman of the Missouri state Republican committee in 1870-1, and department commander of the Grand army of the republic at the same time.
He edited the Boston “Daily Bee” in 1846-7, the “Missouri Democrat” in 1848-9, the “Missouri State Atlas” in 1871-2, and had published “Pebbles from Canaust,” poems (Boston, 1840); “Poetry of Feeling” (1844); “Scenes and Songs of Social Life” (1846); “Nonschold Tales” (1861); and several single poems and orations.

SHEPARD, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Salisbury, Mass., 22 June, 1799; d. in Brentwood, N. H., 4 Nov., 1869. When he removed to New Hampshire, and after studying medicine settled in Brentwood, where he soon won reputation in his profession. In 1770 he united with a Baptist church, and in 1771 he was ordained to the ministry. He preached through a wide extent of country, and in his double office of minister and physician looked after the cure of both soul and body. While pastor of the church at Brentwood he had the oversight of several other churches that were branches of this central body. He was thus a sort of Baptist diocesan bishop. No man in the history of his denomination in New Hampshire was better known in his day. He published several tracts, chiefly relating to baptism.

SHEPARD, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Toweseter, Mass., 13 Nov., 1799; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 23 Aug., 1849. He was graduated at Cambridge, 1827, ordained in the established church, and in 1830 silenced for non-conformity. He was subsequently tutor and chaplain in the family of Sir Richard Darby, whose cousin he married. He was silenced again in 1833, and in October, 1835, sailed for this country, settled in Boston, and from that time till his death, was pastor of the church in Cambridge, succeeding Thomas Hooker. He soon became involved in the Antinomian controversy, actively opposed the innovators, and was a member of the synod that silenced them. His second wife, Joanna, whom he married in 1837, was the daughter of Thomas Hooker. He was active in founding Harvard, and instrumental in placing it at Cambridge. Nathaniel Morton, the historian, says of him: “By his death not only the church and people of Cambridge, but all New England, suffered a great loss.” By his third wife, Margaret Boradell, he was the ancestor of President John Q. Adams. He was a vigorous and popular writer on theological subjects, and published New England’s Lamentations for Old England, New England’s Defenders of the Gospel Breathing out on the Indians of New England” (1848); New York, 1865; “Theses Sabianae” (1849); and left in manuscript numerous sermons that were subsequently printed in England. These include “Subjectation to Christ,” with a memoir of him by Samuel Mather and William Greenhill (London, 1815) and ed. Aberdeen (1869); new ed. Aberdeen (1869). His autobiography was published (Cambridge, Mass., 1839), and his collected works, with a memoir of him by Rev. Horatio Alger (3 vols., Boston, 1853). Cotton Mather also wrote his memoir in the “Magnalia,” and in his “Lives of the Chief Fathers of New England.”—His son, Thomas, clergyman, b. in London, 5 April, 1811; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 22 Dec., 1867, was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and from 1858 till his death was assistant pastor of the Cambridge church. He published an election sermon (1872), and edited a volume of miscellaneous sermons (1875).

SHEPARD, William, soldier, b. near Boston, Mass., 1 Dec., 1737; d. in Westfield, Mass., 11 Nov., 1797. He enlisted in the provincial army when fourteen years of age, served in 1757-63, was a captain under Sir Jeffrey Amherst, and participated in the battles of Fort William and Crown Point. He became colonel of the 4th Massachusetts regiment in 1777, and served till 1783, participating in twenty-two engagements, and winning a reputation for efficiency and courage. He settled on a farm in Medway, Mass., after the peace, was a member of the executive council in 1788-90, a brigadier-general of militia, and in that capacity during Daniel Shepley’s ministry in 1786 prevented the insurgents from seizing the Springfield armory. He was subsequently major-general of militia, and in congress in 1797-1803.

SHEPHERD, Nathaniel Graham, author, b. in New York city in 1853; d. there, 23 May, 1869. He studied art in New York, taught drawing in Georgia for several years, returned to his active duty, and engaged in the insurance business, devoting his leisure to study and to writing poems. At the beginning of the civil war he became a war correspondent for the New York “Tribune.” He contributed largely to periodicals and journals, and was the author of “The Dead Drummer-Boy,” “The Roll-Call,” “A Summer Reminiscence,” and other poems, which were widely circulated.

SHEPHERD, Oliver Lathrop, soldier, b. in Clifton Park, N. Y., 15 Dec., 1839; d. 16 April, 1894. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and assigned brevet 2d lieutenant, 4th infantry, on 2 Oct., 1840, served in the Seminole war, and became 1st lieutenant in the 3d infantry, 3 Nov., 1845. In 1846 he was selected by Gen. Zachary Taylor as commander of the supply train in its march from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, and served in the war with Mexico, receiving the brevet of captain for gallant and meritorious conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, and that of major for Chapultepec. He was appointed captain on 1 Dec., 1847, served on the frontier, and commanded Fort Defiance, New Mexico, which he defended with three companies against a night attack of the Navajo Indians, with about 2,500 braves, on 29 April, 1860, and was afterward stationed at Fort Hamilton, N. Y. He then commanded a battalion of the 3d infantry in the defence of Washington, became lieutenant-colonel of the 18th infantry, 14 May, 1861, served in the Tennessee and Mississippi campaign in the Army of the Ohio, and was engaged in the battles of Murfreesboro, Stones River, and Nashville, 30-31 Dec., 1862, receiving the brevet of colonel for service during the siege of Corinth, 17 May, 1862. He participated in Gen. Don. Carlos Buell’s movement through Alabama and Tennessee to Louisville, Ky., in July and September, and also in Gen. William S. Rosecrans’s Tennessee campaign, serving with the Army of the Cumberland from November, 1862, till April, 1863, and commanding a brigade of regular troops from 31 Dec., 1862, till 3 Jan., 1863. He became colonel of the 15th infantry on 21 Jan., 1863, and was brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Stone River, Tennessee, and from 7 May, 1863, till 13 Feb., 1866, he was superintendent of the regimental recruiting service of the 1st, 2d, and 3d regiments. In 1866 he was appointed major-general of the state of Alabama, and on 26 June, 1866, was brevetted major-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Sandy Creek in 1865, and in the battle of Mobile Bay in 1864.

SHEPHEY, John, lawyer, b. in Grotto, Conn., 16 Oct., 1757; d. in Soo, Me., 9 Feb., 1837. His family settled in Grotto about 1700. The name ap-
Shepley was a member of the State convention of 1788, where he opposed the adoption of the constitution of the United States. John entered Harvard in the class of 1806, but left before graduation, studied law and practised in Rutland and Fitchburg, Mass., served in the legislature, was a member of the convention for amending the State constitution, and in 1823 went to Maine, where he formed a partnership with his brother Ether. For many years he was reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of Maine, and he published “Maine Reports” (Hallowell, 1836-49).—His brother, Ether, jurist, b. in Groton, Mass., 2 Nov., 1789; d. in Portland, Me., 15 Jan., 1857, after graduation at Dartmouth in 1811, studied law at South Berwick, was admitted to the bar in 1814, and began to practise in Saco. He was a member of the legislature in 1819, a delegate to the convention that framed the constitution of Maine in 1820, and U. S. district attorney for that state from 1821 till 1833. He had removed to Portland about 1821. He was elected a U. S. senator as a Democrat, serving two terms, and on 3 March, 1836, when he resigned, having been chosen a justice of the supreme court of Maine, of which he was chief justice from 1843 until 1855. In 1856 he was appointed sole commissioner to revise the statutes of Maine. He received the degree of LL. D. from Waterville (now Colby University), in 1842, and from Dartmouth in 1845. While serving on the bench he furnished the materials for twenty-six volumes of reports, and published “The Revised Statutes of Maine” (Hallowell, 1857), and “Speech in Congress on the Removal of the Deposits,” in which he vindicated the course of President Jackson (1857).—Ether’s son, George Forster, soldier, b. in Saco, Me., 1 Jan., 1819; d. in Portland, Me., 20 July, 1845, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1837, and, after studying law at Harvard, began practice in Bangor, Me., in 1840, but in 1844 removed to Portland. From 1853 till 1861 he was U. S. district attorney for Maine, during which time he argued important cases in the U. S. supreme court. In 1860 he was a delegate at large to the National Democratic convention in Charleston, and attended its adjourned session in Baltimore. He was commissioned colonel of the 12th Maine volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, and participated in “The Life of Benjamin F. Butler’s expedition against New Orleans, commanding as acting brigadier-general a brigade at Ship Island, and at the capture of New Orleans he led the 3d brigade, Army of the Gulf. On the occupation of that city he was appointed military commandant and acting mayor, and assigned to the command of its defenses, resigning in June, 1862, when he was appointed military governor of Louisiana, serving until 1864. On 18 July, 1862, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers. After the inauguration of a civil governor of Louisiana, Gen. Shepley was placed in command of the military district of eastern Virginia, became chief of staff to Gen. Geoffrey Weitzel, and for a short time during the absence of that officer commanded the 25th army corps. He continued with the Army of the James to the end of the war, entered Richmond on 3 April, 1865, and was appointed the first military governor of that city. Resigning his commission on 1 July, 1865, he declined the appointment of associate judge of the supreme court of Maine, but in 1869 accepted that of U. S. circuit judge for the first circuit of Maine, which office he held until his death. Dartmouth gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1878. His decisions are reported in Jabez S. Holmes’ “Reports” (Boston, 1877).

Sheppard, John Hannibal, author, b. in Cirencester, Gloucestershire, England, 17 March, 1789; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 June, 1873. In 1793 his parents settled in Harwich, Mass., and in 1805 moved to Harvard, which he left in his junior year, but in 1806 the university placed his name among the graduates of 1808. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and practised in Wiscasset, Me. From 1817 till 1834 he was register of probate for Lincoln county, and in 1845 he settled in Boston, Mass. He was an early and efficient member of the New England historic-philosophical society, its librarian in 1861-9, and contributed to its “Register.” The degree of A. M. was given to him by Bowdoin in 1830, and by Harvard in 1871. In addition to several Masonic and antiquarian addresses, he was the author of occasional poems, of “Reminiscences of the Vaughan Family.” (Boston, 1865), and an abridged and modified edition of the same, entitled “The First Book of the Constitution” (1861). He had also contributed to the “Vocabulary of the Philosophical Sciences,” edited by Prof. Charles P. Krauth, D. D.

Sheppard, Moses, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1771; d. in Baltimore, Md., 1 Feb., 1857. He was early thrown upon his own resources, owing to the forfeiture of the property of his father, Nathan Sheppard, who adhered to the mother country during the Revolutionary war, and entered the employ of John Mitchell as a clerk. In a few years he was made partner, and after the death of Mr. Mitchell conducted the business alone, from which he retired in 1832. Mr. Sheppard took an active interest in the question of American slavery, in common with the Society of Friends, of which he was a member, and aided with counsel and money the American colonization society. He paid graduated sums to Dr. Samuel McDowell and other colored men that became eminent in Liberia, and his influence prevented the passing of a law to banish free negroes from Maryland. His fortune was bequeathed to find the Sheppard asylum for the insane in Baltimore.—His grandnephew, Nathan, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 9 Nov., 1834; d. in New York city, 24 Jan., 1888. He was transferred to the University College in 1854, and at Rochester theological seminary in 1859. During the civil war he was special correspondent of the New York “World” and the Chicago “Journal” and “Trammee,” and, during the Franco-German war, of the “Cincinnati Gazette.” His experiences were published as “Shut up in Paris,” a diary of the siege (London, 1871), and was translated into French, German, and Italian. He was also a special American correspondent of the London “Times” and a contributor to “Fraser’s Magazine” and “Temple Bar.” In 1873 he became lecturer on modern English literature, and teacher of rhetoric, at the University of Chicago, and four years later he accepted a similar charge at Alleghany college. He spent four years in Europe, and lectured in London and at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1870 delivered a course before the Edinburgh philosophical society and on “Public Speaking” before the Universities of Aberdeen and St. Andrew’s, Scotland, which has been issued as “Before an Audience” (New York, 1886). In 1884 he settled in Saratoga Springs, founded the Saratoga atheistum, and was its president until his death. He also compiled and edited “The Dickens Reader” (1881); “Character Readings from George Eliot” (1883); “The Essays of George Eliot,” with an introduction (1883); “Darwinism Stated by Darwin Himself” (1884); and “Saratoga Chips and Carlsbad Wafers” (1887).

SHERATON, James Paterson, Canadian clergyman, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, 29 Nov., 1841. After graduation at the University of New Brunswick in 1862 he studied theology in the University of King’s college, Windsor, Nova Scotia, took orders in the Church of England in 1864–5, and became rector of Shediac, New Brunswick, in 1865, and of Picton, Nova Scotia, in 1874. In 1877 he became principal and professor of exegetical and systematic theology in Wycliffe college, Toronto, which office he now holds. He is a member of the senate of the University of Toronto in 1885. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Queen’s university, Ontario, in 1882. He was editor of “The Evangelical Churchman” from 1877 till 1882, and since that date has been its principal editorial contributor, and he is the author of essays on education, the church, and Christian unity.

SHERIDAN, Philip Henry, soldier, b. about 1764; d. in Claverton, Nottinghamshire, England, 14 Feb., 1830. He entered the British army, in which he became captain in 1783, lieutenant-colonel in 1794, colonel in 1798, lieutenant-general in 1811, and colonel of the 33rd regiment in 1815. He served with credit in the taking of Seringapatam in 1797, and in 1809 was appointed a member of the Privy Council. In 1816 he was raised to the Duke of Wellington, being second in command at the battle of Talavera, 27–28 July, 1809. For his conduct there he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, and in 1816 he was transferred to the governorship of Lower Canada. At this time the farmers had suffered from the total loss of their wheat crop, and he advanced for their relief £12,000, which parliament augmented by the additional sum of £35,500. During his administration he effected the admission of the speaker of the assembly, a colonet, and innumerable other benefits. He resigned his office in 1818, returned to England, and was made general in May, 1825.

SHERBURNE, Andrew, sailor, b. in Rye, N. H., 30 Sept., 1765; d. in Augusta, Oneida co., N.Y., in 1831. He sailed before the mast at an early age, was shipwrecked, captured by the British, confined in the Old Mill prison in England, and transferred to a British fleet. He was made a pensioner for his services in the navy during the Revolution, and wrote his own "Memoirs" (Utica, 1828: 2d ed., Providence, 1831).

SHERBURNE, John Samuel, jurist, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1757; d. there, 2 Aug., 1850. After graduation at Dartmouth in 1776 he studied law at Harvard, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in Portsmouth. He served as a brigadier major on the staff of Gen. William Whipple, and lost a leg at the battle of Brandy Hill, R. I., 29 Aug., 1778. He was elected a representative to congress from New Hampshire, serving from 2 Dec., 1793, till 3 March, 1797, and was subsequently appointed by President Jefferson U. S. district attorney for New Hampshire, serving from 1801 till 1825. After the death of his father, he was U. S. judge for the district of New Hampshire.—His son, John Henry, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1794; d. in Europe about 1850, entered Phillips Exeter academy in 1809. In 1825 he became register of the navy department in Washington, D. C., and for several years was foreign correspondent for the Philadelphia "Saturday Courier." He published "Osceola," a tragedy: "Erratic Poems":; "Life of John Paul Jones" (Washington, 1825): "Naval Sketches" (Philadelphia, 1847): "The Tourist’s Guide in Europe, or Penelings in England and on the Continent"; and "Suppressed History of the Administration of John Adams, 1797-1801," as printed and suppressed by John Wood in 1802 (1846).—His son, John Henry (1814-1849), was a U. S. naval officer and served in the Mexican war.

SHERIDAN, Philip Henry, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 6 March, 1831; d. in Nopquist, Mass., 5 Aug., 1888. After attending the public school he was entered as a cadet in the United States military academy, 1 July, 1848. On account of a quarrel with a cadet file-closer in 1850, whose conduct he thought too relaxed, he was suspended from the academy for a year, but returned, and was graduated, 1 July, 1853, standing thirty-fourth in a class of fifty-two, of which James B. McPherson was at the head. Gen. John M. Schofield and the Confederate Gen. John B. Hood were also his classmates. On the day of his graduation he was appointed a brevet 2d lieutenant in the 1st infantry, and in the army and Oregon, he was made 2d lieutenant in the 4th infantry, 22 Nov., 1854, 1st lieutenant, 1 March, 1861, and captain in the 13th infantry, 14 May, 1861. In December of that year he was chief quartermaster and commissary of the army in southwestern Missouri. In the Mississippi campaign from April to September, 1862, he was quartermaster’s inspector, and was ordered to turn back the advance upon Corinth. It then became manifest that his true place was in the field. On 29 May, 1862, he was appointed colonel of the 2d Michigan cavalry, and on 1 July was sent to make a raid on Boonsville, Miss. He did excellent service in the pursuit of the enemy from Corinth to Baldwyn, and in many skirmishes during July, and at the battle of Boonsville.
In reward for his skill and courage he was appointed, 1 July, a brigadier-general of volunteers, and on 1 Oct., was placed in command of the 11th division of the Army of the Ohio, in which capacity he took part in the successful battle of Perryville, on 8 Oct., between the armies of Gen. Buell and Gen. Bragg, at the close of which the latter retreated from Kentucky. In this action Sheridan was conspicuous for the brilliant manner in which he had driven back McCook's corps and were pressing upon the exposed left flank of Gilbert, Sheridan, with Gen. Robert B. Mitchell, arrested the tide, and, driving them back through Perryville, re-established the broken line. His force marched with the army to the relief of Nashville in October and November. He was then placed in command of a division in the Army of the Cumberland, and took part in the two days' battle of Stone River (or Murfreesboro), 31 Dec., 1862, and 3 Jan., 1863. Buell had been relieved from the command of the army on 30 Oct., and Rosecrans promoted in his place. The Confederate army was still under Bragg. The left of Rosecrans was strong, and his right was weak. Sheridan was ordered to hold his ground while the left should cross the river. The project of Bragg, well-conceived, was to crush the National right, and he almost succeeded. Division after division was driven back until Cheatham attacked him in front, while Cleburne essayed to turn his flank, and Sheridan was reached; the fate of the day seemed to be in his hands. He resisted vigorously, moved his division forward to the top of the ridge and drove the enemy across the summit and down the opposite slope. In this action he first attracted the marked attention of Gen. Grant, who saw that he might be one of his most useful lieutenants in the future—a man with whom to try its difficult and delicate problems. A horse was shot under him in this action, but he pushed on in the pursuit to Mission Mills, with other portions of the army of Thomas harrassing the rear of the enemy, for Bragg, having abandoned all his positions on Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga Valley, and Missionary Ridge, was in rapid retreat toward Dalton.

After further operations connected with the occupation of east Tennessee, Sheridan was transferred by Grant to Virginia, where, on 4 April, 1864, he was placed in command of the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac, all the cavalry being consolidated to form that command. Here he seemed in his element; to the instincts and talents of a general he joined the fearless dash of a dragoon. Entering with Grant upon the overland campaign, he took part in the bloody battle of the Wilderness, 5 May, in which a large portion of his division and cavalry fell, or on the wings, he was engaged in raids, threatening the Confederate flanks and rear. His fight at Todd's Tavern, 7 May, was an important aid to the movement of the army; his capture of Spottsylvania Court-House, 8 May, added to his reputation for timely dash and daring; but more astonishing was his great raid from the 9th to the 24th of May. He cut the Virginia Central and the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroads, and made his appearance in good condition near Chaffton station on 23 May. In this raid, having under him kindred spirits in Merritt,uster, Wilson, and Gregg, he first made a descent upon Beaver Dam on 10 May, where he destroyed a locomotive and a train, and recaptured about 400 men who had been made prisoners. At Yellow Tavern, on 11 May, he encountered the Confederate cavalry under J. E. B. Stuart, who was killed in the engagement. He next moved upon the outer defences of Richmond, rebuilt Meadow's bridge, went to Bottom's bridge, and reached Hanish's on 34 May. He returned by Hanoverton and Totopetomoy creek, having done much damage to the stores and bridges, and won great renown with little loss. He led the advance to Cold Harbor, crossing the Pamunky at Hanoverton on 27 May, fought the cavalry battle of Hawes's Shop on the 28th, and held Coldoprimarily incapable of solution. He was ordered to hold the place to the point of starvation, and he said he would. The enemy had possession of the approaches by land and water, men and animals were starving, and forage and provisions had to be hauled over a long and exceedingly difficult wagon-road of seventy-five miles.
Harbor until Gen. William F. Smith came up with the 6th corps to occupy the place. The bloody battle of Cold Harbor, fought on 31 May and 3 June, setting out on 7 June, Sheridan made a raid toward Charlottesville, where he expected to meet the National force under Gen. Hunter. This movement, it was thought, would force Lee to detach his cavalry. Unexpectedly, however, Hunter made a detour to Lynchburg, and Sheridan, unable to join him, returned to Jordan’s point, and on the 14th, after again cutting the Virginia Central and Richmond and Fredericksburg railroads and capturing 500 prisoners, he rejoined for a brief space the Army of the Potomac. In quick succession came the cavalry actions of Trevilian station, fought between Wade Hampton and Torbert, 11 and 12 June, and Tunstall station, 21 June, in which the movements were foined to cover the railroad-crossings of the Chickahominy and the James. There was also a cavalry affair of a similar nature at St. Mary’s church on 24 June. Pressed by Grant, Lee fell back on 28 July, 1864.

The vigor, judgment, and dash of Sheridan had now marked him in the eyes of Grant as fit for a far more important station. Early in August, 1864, he was placed in command of the Army of the Shenandoah in part in the army of Student, who retired from the command, and from that time till the end of the war Sheridan seems never to have encountered a military problem too difficult for his solution. His new army consisted at first of the 6th corps, two divisions of the 8th, and two cavalry divisions, commanded by Gen. Torbert and Wilson, which he took with him from the Army of the Potomac. Four days later, 7 Aug., the scope of his command was constituted the Middle Military Division. He had an arduous and difficult task before him to clear the enemy out of the valley of Virginia, break up his magazines, and relieve Washington from chronic terror. Sheridan grasped the situation at once. He posted his forces in front of Berryville, while the enemy under Early occupied the west bank of Opequon creek and covered Winchester. In his division, besides the 6th corps under Wright and the 8th under Crook, Sheridan had received the addition of the 19th, commanded by Emory. Torbert was placed in command of all the cavalry. Having great confidence in Sheridan, Grant yet acted with a proper caution before giving him the final move. He directed him to first take Harpers Ferry to meet Sheridan, and told him he must not move till Lee had withdrawn a portion of the Confederate force in the valley. As soon as that was done he gave Sheridan the laconic direction, “Go in.” He says in his report: “He was off promptly on time, and I may add that I have never since deemed it necessary to visit Gen. Sheridan’s camp.” On the morning of 19 Sept., Sheridan attacked Early at the crossing of the Opequon, fought him all day, drove him through Winchester, and sent him “whirling up the valley,” having captured 5,000 prisoners and five guns. The enemy did not stop to reorganize until he had reached Fisher’s hill, thirty miles south of Winchester. Here Sheridan pursued him up the valley, drove him through Harrisonburg and Staunton, and in scattered portions through the passes of the Blue Ridge. For these successes he was made a brigadier-general in the regular army on 10 Sept. Returning leisurely to Strasburg, he posted his army for a brief repose behind Cedar creek, while Torbert was despatched on a raid to Staunton, with orders to devastate the country, so that, should the enemy return, he could find no sustenance, and this was effectually done. To clear the way for an advance, the enemy now sent “a new cavalry general,” Thomas L. Rosser, down the valley; but he was soon driven back in confusion. Early’s army, being re-enforced by a part of Longstreet’s command, again moved forward with celerity and secrecy, and, torching the north fork of the Shenandoah, on 18 Oct., approached rapidly and unobserved, under favor of fog and darkness, after again cutting through 600 yards of Sheridan’s left flank, which was formed by Crook’s corps. When, on the early morning of the 10th, they leaped upon the surprised National force, there was an immediate retreat and the appearance of an appalling disaster. The 8th corps was rolled up, the exposed centre in turn gave way, and soon the whole army was in retreat. Sheridan had been at Winchester, and at this juncture had just returned to Winchester, twenty miles from the field. Hearing the sound of the battle, he rode rapidly, and arrived on the field at ten o’clock. As he rode up he shouted to the retreating troops: “Face the other way, boys; we are going back!” Many of the Confederates had left their ranks for plunder, and the attack was made upon their disorganized battalions, and was successful. A portion of their army, ignorant of the swiftly coming danger, was in fact, and had determined to give a finishing-blow to the disorganized National force. This was caught and hurled back by an attack in two columns with cavalry supports. The enemy’s left was soon routed; the rest followed, never to return, and the valley was thus finally rendered impossible of occupancy by Confederate troops. They did not stop till they had reached Staunton, and pursuit was made for as far as Mount Jackson. They had lost in the campaign 16,652 killed or wounded and 13,000 prisoners. Under orders from Grant, Sheridan devastated the valley. He has been censured for this, as if it were wanton destruction and cruelty. He destroyed the barns and the crops, mills, factories, farming-tenants, etc., and drove off all the cattle, sheep, and horses. But, as in similar cases in European history, although there must have been much suffering and some uncalled-for rigor, this was necessary to destroy the resources of the enemy in the valley, by means of which they could continually menace Washington and Pennsylvania. The illustration is a representation of “Sheridan’s Ride,” a statuette, by James E. Kelly. The steel portrait is taken from a photograph made in 1884, at the request of the president. Among other things, Sheridan a major-general in the army were: “For personal gallantry, military skill, and just confidence in the courage and patriotism of his troops, displayed by Philip H. Sheridan on the 19th of October at Cedar Run, where, under the blessing of Providence, his routed army was reorganized, a great national disaster averted, and a brilliant victory achieved over the rebels for the third time in pitched battle within thirty days, Philip H. SHERMAN

After the war Sheridan was in charge of the military division of the Gulf from 17 July to 15 Aug., 1866, which was then created the Department of the Gulf, and remained there until 11 March, 1867. From 12 Sept. to 10 March he was in command of the Department of the Missouri, with headquarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. Thence he conducted a winter campaign against the Indians, in which he took charge of the military division of the Mississippi, with headquarters at Chicago. When Gen. Ulysses S. Grant became president, 4 March, 1869, Gen. William T. Sherman was made general-in-chief and Sheridan was promoted to lieutenant-general, with the understanding that both these titles should disappear with the men holding them.

In 1879 Sheridan visited Europe to witness the conduct of the Franco-Prussian War. He was with the German staff during the battle of Gravelotte, and presented some judicious criticisms of the campaign. He commanded the western and southwestern military divisions in 1878. On the retirement of Sherman in 1883, the lieutenant-general became general-in-chief. In May, 1888, he became still further distinguished by the recognition of his claims, a bill was passed by both houses of Congress, and was promptly signed by President Cleveland, restoring for him and during his lifetime the full rank and emoluments of general. He was the nineteenth general-in-chief of the United States army. Sheridan never was defeated, and often plucked victory out of the jaws of defeat. He was thoroughly trusted, admired, and loved by his officers and men. He bore the nickname of "Little Phil," a term of endearment, due to his size, like the "petit corporal" of Napoleon I. He was below the middle height, but powerfully built, with a strong countenance indicative of valor and resolution. Trustful to a remarkable degree, modest and reticent, he was a model soldier and general, a good citizen in all the relations of public and private life, thoroughly deserving the esteem and admiration of all who knew him. In 1879 Sheridan married Miss Ruckcr, the daughter of Gen. Daniel H. Ruckcr, of the U. S. Army. He was a Roman Catholic, and devoted to his duties as such. He was the author of "Personal Memoirs" (2 vols., New York, 1886).

SHERMAN, Buren Robinson, governor of Iowa, b. in Phelps, N. Y., 28 May, 1836. In 1849 the family removed to Elmina, where he attended the public schools, and in 1852 was apprenticed to a jeweler. In 1855 the family emigrated to Iowa, where he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1859, and began practice in Vinton in January, 1890. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in the 13th Iowa infantry, was promoted lieutenant, was severely wounded at Shiloh, and advanced to captain for gallant conduct on the field, but in the summer of 1863 his wounds compelled him to resign. On his return he was elected county judge of Benton county, which post he resigned in 1890 to accept the office of clerk of the district court to which he was three times re-elected. He was chosen auditor of the state in 1874, and twice re-elected, retiring in January, 1881. In 1892-6 he was governor of Iowa. During his two terms of service many new questions were presented for settlement, among which was that of total prohibition of the liquor traffic, which Gov. Sherman favored in letters and speeches. He held public offices to strict accountability, and removed a high state official for wilful misconduct. In 1885 he received the degree of L.L. D., from the University of Iowa.
SHERMAN, Henry, lawyer, b in Albany, N. Y., 6 March, 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 28 March, 1879. After graduation at Yale in 1829 he studied theology and then law, returning in 1832 to Albany. He soon removed to New York city, and in 1850 to Hartford, Conn., and was employed in the U. S. treasury department in Washington from 1861 till 1865, when he resumed his law-practice in that city. He was a personal friend of President Lincoln, and on the morning before his assassination offered him the chief justiceship of New Mexico. He was afterward commissioned by President Johnson, but soon resigned. Mr. Sherman was the author of “An Analytical Digest of the Law of Marine Insurance to the Present Time” (New York, 1841); “The Governmental History of the United States of America” (1843; enlarged ed., Hartford, 1860); and “Slavery in the United States of America.” (Hartford, 1853).

SHERMAN, John, clergyman, b. in Dedham, England, 26 Dec., 1613; d. in Watertown, Mass., 8 Aug., 1685. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was called a “College Puritan,” came to New England in 1634, and preached in Watertown in the open air. After continuing for some time in Connecticut, he was chosen a magistrate of that colony. On 27 May, 1641, and from 1644 until his death, he was pastor of the Congregational church in Watertown, Mass. He was a fellow of Harvard, delivered lectures there for many years, and was a popular preacher and an eminent mathematician. In 1682 he delivered a discourse before the convention of Congregational ministers in Massachusetts, the first sermon on that occasion that is now upon record. He published several almanacs, to which he appended pious reflections.

SHERMAN, Roger, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Newton, Mass., 19 April, 1721; d. in New Haven, Conn., 23 July, 1793. His great-grandfather, Capt. John Sherman, came from England to Watertown, Mass., about 1635. His grandfather and father were farmers in moderate circumstances. In 1723 the family removed to Stomington, Mass., where he spent his boyhood and youth. He had no formal education, but he attained an education that was obtained in the ordinary country schools, but by his own unaided exertions he acquired respectable attainments in the several branches of learning, especially mathematics, law, and politics. He was early apprenticed to a shoemaker, and continued in that occupation until he was twenty-two years of age. It is said that while at work on his bench he was accustomed to have before him an open book, so that he could devote every spare minute to study. At the age of nineteen he lost his father, and the principal care and support of a large family thus devolved upon him, with the charge of a small farm. In 1746 he removed with his family to New Milford, Conn., performing the journey on foot, and taking his shoemaker’s tools with him. Here, in partnership with his brother, he engaged in mercantile business. In 1745 he was appointed surveyor of lands for the county in which he resided, a post for which his early attention to mathematics qualified him. Not long afterward he furnished the astronomical calculations for an almanac that was published in New York, and he continued this service for several years. Meanwhile, encouraged to this step by a judicious friend, he was devoting his leisure hours to the progress that he was admitted to the bar in 1754. In 1755 he was elected a representative of New Milford in the general assembly of Connecticut, and the same year he was appointed a justice of the peace. In 1759 he was made one of the judges of common pleas in Litchfield county. Two years later he removed to New Haven, where he received appointments being given him. In addition to this, he became treasurer of Yale college, from which, in 1765, he received the honorary degree of M. A. In 1766 he was appointed judge of the superior court of Connecticut, and in the same year was chosen a member of the upper house of the legislature. In the former office he continued twenty-three years; in the latter, nineteen. When it was said, “The Revolution was not Roger Sherman’s devil; he unreservedly devoted himself unreservedly to the patriotic cause.” In such a crisis he was obliged to be a leader. In August, 1774, he was elected a delegate to the Continental congress, and was present at its opening on 5 Sept. following. Of this body he was one of the most active members. Without showing gifts of popular speech, he commanded respect for his knowledge, judgment, integrity, and devotion to duty. He served on many important committees, but the most decisive proof of the high esteem in which he was held is given in the fact that, with Adams, Franklin, Jefferson, and Livingston, he was appointed to prepare a draft of the Declaration of Independence, to which document he subsequently affixed his signature. Though a member of congress, he was at the same time in active service on the Connecticut committee of safety. In 1783 he was associated with Judge Richard Law in revising the statutes of the state, and in 1784 he was elected mayor of New Haven, which office he continued to hold until his death. He was chosen, in conjunction with Dr. Samuel Johnson and Oliver Ellsworth, a delegate to the convention of 1787 that was charged with the duty of framing a constitution for the United States. Governor Wentworth having taken the lead in the committee, a variety of proof exists that a number of the propositions that he offered were incorporated in that instrument. In the debates of the Constitutional convention he bore a conspicuous part. He was also a member of the State convention of Connecticut that ratified the constitution, and was very influential in securing that papers that he wrote under the signature of “Citizen” powerfully contributed to the same end. Immediately after the ratification of the constitution he was made a representative of Connecticut in congress, and took an active part in the discussions of that body. In February, 1790, the Quakers having presented an address to the house on the subject of “The liberal wickedness of the Articles which can trade for slaves,” Mr. Sherman supported its reference to a committee, and was successful in his efforts, though he was strongly opposed. He was promoted in 1791 to the senate, and died while holding this office. The career of Roger Sherman most happily illustrates the possibilities of American citizenship. Beginning life under the heaviest disadvantages, he rose to a career of usefulness, honor, and success. He was never removed from an office except by promotion or because of some legislative restriction. Thomas Jefferson spoke of him as "a man who never said a foolish thing"; and Nathaniel Macon declared that "he had more common sense than any man I have ever known." In early life he united with the Congregational church in Stonington, and through his long career he remained a devout and practical Christian. Mr. Sherman was twice married. His first wife was Sarah S. Jan., the daughter of William M. Evarts and George F. Hoar.—His nephew, Roger Minot, lawyer, b. in Woburn, Mass., 22 May, 1873; d. in Fairfield, Conn., 30 Dec., 1844, was graduated at Yale in 1792, and served as tutor there during 1795. He was ad

The text continues with the biography of Sherman, detailing his military career and personal life. It includes his service during the Mexican War, his marriage to Mrs. Susan E. Evarts, and his appointment as major-general of volunteers during the Civil War. It also mentions his imprisonment during the Radical Reconstruction period, his service as governor of the Territory of Arizona, and his contributions to the Salem Art Association. The biography concludes with his death on 14 Feb., 1891, and his contributions to the Union cause during the Civil War.
and lived for a time in New York as agent for the St. Louis firm. In 1858-9 he was a counsel-sor-at-law in Leavenworth, Kan., and in the next year became superintendent of the State military academy at Alexandria, La., where he did good work; but when that state seceded from the Union he promptly resigned and returned to St. Louis, where he was for a short time president of the Fifth street railroad.

Of the civil war he took what were then considered extreme views. He regarded President Lincoln's call for 75,000 three-months men, April 15, 1861, with scorn. It was a matter, declaring that the rising of the secessionists was not a mob but to be put down by the "posse comitatus," but a war to be fought out by armies. On 13 May he was commissioned colonel of the 13th infantry, with instructions to report to Gen. Scott at Washington. That officer had matured a plan of campaign, and was about to put it into execution. Sherman was put in command of a brigade in Tyler's division of the army that marched to Bull Run. His brigade comprised the 63d, 69th, and 79th New York and the 2d Wisconsin regiments. The enemy's left had been fairly turned, and Sherman's brigade was hotly engaged, when the Confederates were re-enforced; the National troops made fatal delays, and, struck by panic, the whole column retreated. Sherman's brigade had lost 111 killed, 295 wounded, and 293 missing. On 3 Aug., 1861, he was made a brigadier-general of volunteers, to date from 17 May, and on 28 Aug., 1861, he was sent from the Army of the Potomac to be second in command to Gen. Robert Anderson in Kentucky. Few persons were prepared for the curious problem of Kentucky politics. What has been called the secession of Kentucky was at least partially successful. On account of broken health, Gen. Anderson soon asked to be relieved from the command, and he was succeeded by Sherman on 17 Oct. It was expected by the government that the men, to keep Kentucky in the Union, could be recruited in that state, and that the numbers required would be but few; but this expectation was disappointed. Sherman labored for a great war, and declared that 60,000 men would be required to drive the enemy out of the state and 200,000 to put an end to the struggle in that region. Most men looked upon this prophetic sagacity as craziness. He was relieved from his command by Gen. Buell on 12 Nov., and ordered to report to Gen. Halleck, commanding the Western Department of the West. He was placed in command of Benton Barracks. At this time Gen. Ulysses S. Grant was in command of the force to move on Forts Henry and Donelson in February, 1862, and just after the capture of these strongholds Sherman was assigned to the Army of the Tennessee.

It consisted of six divisions, of which Sherman was in command of the 6th. He had expected to lead Sherman's division, but, as he was too sick, Grant's division, and assigned to command the 4th. The division of Sherman's division was 2,034. He was wounded in the hand, but did not leave the field, and he richly deserved the praise of Gen. Grant in his official report: "I feel it a duty to a gallant and able officer, Brig.-Gen. W. T. Sherman, to make mention. He was not only with his command during the entire two days of the action, but displayed great judgment and skill in the manage-against Vicksburg from the river, which resulted in its capture, with 31,000 prisoners, on 4 July, 1863, thereby opening the Mississippi and fully accomplishing the original purpose. During this brilliant campaign Gen. Sherman was most active, and therefore was appointed a brigadier-general in the regular army, 17 April, 1863. Meanwhile Rosecrans, having expelled the enemy from middle Tennessee, had forced him to evacuate Chattanooga, fought the bloody battle of Chickamauga, and fell back into Chattanooga, where he was in a precarious condition. On 4 Oct. Sherman was ordered to take his corps, the 15th, from the Big Black via Memphis, with such other commands, by the rapid movement for Chattanooga, was now getting into position; he was preparing to cross the river from the west bank, below the mouth of the Chickamauga, with the purpose of attacking the northern end of Mission ridge, while a division of cavalry was sent to the enemy's right and rear to cut the railroad behind him. At 1 o'clock, on the morning of the 6th, Sherman, with six regiments, crossed the Christian Creek, and by 3 o'clock P.M. he was intrenched at the north end of Mission ridge. Thus the disposal of troops in Grant's line of battle was: Sherman on the left, in front of Tunnel Hill; Thomas in the centre, at Fort Wood and Orchard Knob; while Hooker was to come up from Wathatchie, take Lookout mountain, and, crossing to Rossville, advance upon the ridge, to complete the organization. There was open communication between these bodies by special couriers. While preparations were making for the centre attack under Thomas, it was evident that the enemy's design was to crush Sherman. Fierce assaults were made upon him in quick succession, which he resisted, and thus performed the service in drawing the fire upon himself, while Thomas was preparing the main attack upon the ridge, which was successful. On the morning of the 25th Sherman pursued the enemy by the roads north of the Chickamauga, arriving at Ringgold on that day, and everywhere destroying the enemy's communications.

During these operations Gen. Burnside was besieged by Longstreet in Knoxville, Tenn., and was in great straits. On 3 Dec., under orders from Grant, which another commander was slow to obey, Sherman made forced marches to Burnside's relief, and reached Knoxville not a minute too soon, and after supplying Burnside with all the assistance and re-enforcements he needed marched back to Chattanooga. Toward the end of January, 1864, he returned to Memphis and Vicksburg, whence, with parts of McPherson's and Hubbert's corps, then unemployed, he marched to Jackson and Meridian, where he broke up the Confederate combinations and destroyed their communications. On 2 March, Grant had been made lieutenant-general; on the 12th he assumed command of all the armies of the United States, with the purpose of putting in person the campaign of the Army of the Potomac. On 12 March he assigned Sherman to the command of the military division of the Mississippi, comprising the Departments of the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and the Arkansas—in a word, of the entire southern region, with temporary headquarters at Nashville. In a letter of 4 March, 1864, Grant acknowledges to Sherman his great gratitude for the co-operation and skill which so largely contributed to his own success, and on 19 Feb., 1864, Sherman received the thanks of congress for his services in the Chattanooga campaign. On 25 March he began to prepare his command for action, to put the railways in good condition, and protect them and to make provision for the supplies of the army in its approaching campaign. On 10 April he received his final instructions from Grant to move against Atlanta. Ordering his troops to rendezvous at Chattanooga, he made it his headquarters on 28 April. His force consisted of 100,000 men, comprising Gen. George H. Thomas; the Tennessee, Gen. James B. McPherson; and the Ohio, Gen. John M. Schofield. It was 99,000 strong, with 254 guns, while the Confederate army, under Johnston, about 41,000 strong, soon re-enforced up to 62,000 men, was prepared to resist his advance, and if Sherman had the advantage of attack, Johnston had that of fighting behind intrenchments and natural obstacles. Moving from Chattanooga, Sherman came up with him at Dalton, 14 May, and turned his position at Buzzard's Roost by sending McPherson through Snake Creek gap, when Johnston fell back to Resaca. After an assault, 15 May, Johnston retreated to Cassville and behind the Etowah on the 17th. After the turning of Allatoona pass, which he had decided to make on 6 May, Sherman occupied the Hope church, in the neighborhood of Dallas, Johnston still further retreated to a strong position on Kennesaw mountain, having contracted and retired his flanks to cover Marietta. Sherman advanced his line with each retrograde movement of the enemy and pressed operations, continually gaining ground. Both armies habitually fought from behind log parapets and Sherman ordered an attack on the fortified lines, 27 June, but did not succeed in breaking through. He then determined to turn the position, and moved Gen. James B. McPherson's army on 3 July toward the Chattahoochee, which compelled Johnston to retire to another intrenched position on the northwest bank of that river, whence he fell back on Atlanta as Sherman moved on to entrench his army on the west rear with a part of the army, while the rest lay intrenched in his front. On 17 July began the direct attack on Atlanta. Gen. John B. Hood, who had superseded Gen. Johnston on 17 July, made frequent sorties, and struck boldly and fiercely. There was a severe battle at Peach Tree creek on 20 July, one on the east side of the city two days later, and on the 28th one at Ezra church, on the opposite side of Atlanta, in all of which the National forces were victorious. After an ineffective cavalry movement against the railroad, Gen. Sherman left one corps intrenched on the Chattahoochee and moved with the other five corps on the enemy's only remaining line of railroad, twenty-nine miles south of Atlanta, where he defeated him at Jonesboro, occupied his line of supply, and finally, on 1 Sept., the enemy evacuated the place. Here Hood's presumption led to his own destruction. Leaving the south almost defenseless, he moved upon Nashville, where he was disastrously defeated by Thomas. Sherman had sent Thomas to that city purposely to resist his advance, and when the diminished army he moved upon Savannah, threatening Augusta and Macon, but finding little to oppose him in his march to the sea. Sherman moved steadily forward until he reached the defensive works that covered Savannah and blocked Savannah river. These were promptly taken by assault, and communications were opened with the fleet, which furnished ample supplies to his army. Savannah thus became a marine base for future operations. Sherman announced in a brief note to President Lincoln the evacuation of the city. "I beg to present you," he writes, "as a Christmas gift, the city of Savannah, with 150 heavy guns, plenty of ammunition, and 25,000 bales of cotton." His army had marched 500 miles in twenty-four days, through the heart of Georgia, and had lived in plenty all the way. The value of this splendid achievement cannot be overestimated. On 12 Aug. he had been appointed major-general in the U. S. army, and on 10 Jan. he received the thanks of congress for his "triumphal march." After the occupation of Savannah the question arose whether Sherman should come north by sea or march with his army through the Atlantic states. He preferred the latter plan. Schofield, leaving Thomas in Tennessee, was sent by rail and steamers to the coast of North Carolina with his corps (23d) to march upon Goldsboro', N. C., to co-operate with him. Sherman left Savannah in February, moved through the Salkehatchie swamp, flanked Charleston, compelled its evacuation, and entered Columbia on the 17th. Thence he moved on Goldsboro' by way of Winniboro', Cheraw, and Fayetteville, opening communication by Cape Fear river with Schofield on 12 March, fighting at Averysboro' and Bentonville, where the enemy resisted his advance vigorously. At Averysboro' on the 16th Gen. Henry W. Slocum with four divisions attacked the intrenched position of Gen. William J. Hardee, and, turning his left flank, compelled him to fall back, while the cavalry, under Gen. Hugh Judson Kilpatrick, were attacked and driven back by the Confederate infantry of Gen. Lafayette McLaw on the road to Bentonville. At the latter point Gen. Johnston's force was attacked in a strongly intrenched position on the 19th by the left wing of Sherman's army, under Gen. Slocum, whose right flank had been broken and driven back. After an obstinate combat, the Confederates withdrew in the night. Sherman and Schofield met at Goldsboro' on 23 and 24 March as originally planned. Leaving his troops there, he visited President Lincoln and Gen. Grant at City Point, returning to Goldsboro' on the 30th. The interview on board the "Ocean Queen" is represented in the accompanying vignette copy of a painting by G. P. A. Healy, entitled "The Peacemakers," the fourth member of the group being Admiral Porter. Sherman is shown at the moment that he said to Mr. Lincoln: "If Lee will only remain in Richmond till I can reach Burkesville, we shall have him between our thumb and fingers," snitting the action to the word. He was now ready to strike the Danville road, break Lee's communications, and cut off his retreat, or to re-enforce Grant in front of Richmond for a final attack. He would be ready to move on 10 April. Johnston at Greensboro' received news of Lee's surrender on the 12th, and on the 14th sent a flag of truce to Sherman to know upon what terms he would receive his surrender but fully empowered." Sherman wrote to him, "to arrange with you any terms for the suspension of hostilities, and am willing to confer with you to that end. That a base of action may be had, I undertake to abide by the same conditions entered into by Gen. Grant and Lee at Appomattox Court-House, Va., on the 9th inst." After considerable correspondence and a long interview with Gen. Johnston, having in view an immediate and complete peace, Sherman made a memorandum or basis of agreement between the armies, which was considered by the government as at once too lenient and exceeding his powers. It included in terms of capitulation not only the army of Johnston, but all the Confederate troops remaining in the field. By the 7th article it was announced in general terms "that the war is to cease; a general amnesty so far as the executive of the United States can command, on condition of the disbandment of the Confederate army, the distribution of arms, and the resumption of peaceful pursuits by officers and men hitherto composing said armies." In order to secure himself against the assumption of power, the article is thus continued: "Not being fully empowered by our respective principals to fulfill these terms, we individually and officially pledge ourselves to promptly obtain authority, and will endeavor to carry out the above programme." It was an honest effort on the part of a humane commander to put an end to the strife at once. Perhaps affairs were somewhat complicated by the assassination of President Lincoln on 14 April, which created great indignation and sorrow. It not only affected the terms between Johnston and Sherman, but it caused the latter to fall under the suspicion of the secretary of war. On their arrival in Washington they were promptly and curtly disapproved by a despatch sent, not to Sherman, but to Gen. Grant, on the morning of 24 April, directing him to go at once to North Carolina, by order of Sec. Stanton, to repudiate the terms and to negotiate the whole matter as in the case of Lee. Gen. Sherman considered himself bound for the terms as agreed on. It was supposed that in the terms of agreement there was an acknowledgment of the Confederate government and a proposed re-establishment of the state authorities and that it might furnish a ground of claim for the payment of the Confederate debt in the future. Such certainly was not its purpose, nor does it now appear that such could have been its effect. Sherman was a soldier treating with soldiers, and deserved more courteous and considerate treatment from the government authorities, even if in his enthusiasm he had exceeded his powers. On 10 March, Sherman set out for Alexandria, Va., and arrived on the 19th. He determined then not to revisit Washington, but to await orders in camp; but he afterward, at the John Sherman, residing in Mount Vernon, where he was sent to school. At the age of twelve he returned to Lancaster and entered the academy to prepare himself for college. In two years he was sufficiently advanced to enter the sophomore class, but a desire to be self-supporting led to his becoming junior in the corps of engineers engaged on the Mississippi. He was placed in charge of the section of that work in Nebraska early in 1838, and so continued until the summer of 1839, when he was removed because he was a Whig. The responsibility of attending the measurements of excavations and embankments, and the levelling for a lock to a canal, proved a better education than could have been procured elsewhere in the same time. He began the study of law in the office of his brother Charles, and in 1844 was admitted to the bar. He formed a partnership with his brother in Mansfield, and continued with him until his entrance into Congress, during which time his ability and industry gained for him both distinction and pecuniary success.

Meanwhile, in 1848, he was sent as a delegate to the Whig convention, held in Philadelphia, that nominated Zachary Taylor for the presidency, and in 1852 he was a delegate to the Baltimore convention that nominated Winfield Scott. His attitude as a conservative Whig, in the alarm and excitement that followed the attempt to repeal the Missouri compromise, secured his election to the 34th Congress, and he took his seat on 3 Dec., 1855. He is a ready and forcible speaker, and his thorough acquaintance with public affairs made him an easy subject for derision in the house from the first. He grew rapidly in reputation as a debater on all the great questions agitating the public mind during that eventful period: the repeal of the Missouri compromise, the Dred-Scott decision, the imposition of slavery upon Kansas, the fugitive-slave law, the national finances, and other measures involving the very existence of the republic. His appointment by the speaker, Nathaniel P. Banks, as a member of the committee to inquire into and collect evidence in regard to the border-raffian troubles in Kansas was an important event in his career. Owing to the illness of the chairman, William A. Howard, of Michigan, the duty of preparing the report devolved upon Mr. Sherman. Every state was verified by the clearest testimony, and has never been controverted by any one. This report, when presented to the house, created a great deal of feeling, and intensified the antagonisms in congress, being made the basis of the canvass of 1856. He acted with the Republican party in supporting John C. Frémont for the presidency, and when the house that party resisted the extension of slavery, but did not seek its abolition. In the debate on the submarine telegraph he showed his opposition to monopolists by saying: 'I cannot agree that our government should be bound by any contract with any private incorporated company for president's request, went to see him. He did not complain that his agreement with Johnston was disapproved. It was the publication that constituted the gravamen of the offence, its tone and style, the insinuations it contained, the false inferences it occasioned, and the offensive orders to the subordinate officers of Gen. Sherman which succeeded the publication. These he bitterly resented at the time, but before Mr. Stanton's death they became fully reconciled.

Preliminary to the disbandment of the National armies they passed in review before President Johnson and cabinet and Lieut.-Gen. Grant—the Army of the Potomac on 23 May, and Gen. Sherman's army on the 24th. Sherman was particularly observed and honored. He took leave of his army in an eloquent special field order of 30 May. From 27 June, 1865, to 3 March, 1869, he was in command of the military division of the Mississippi, with headquarters at St. Louis, embracing the Departments of the Ohio, Missouri, and Arkansas. Upon the appointment of Grant as general of the army on 25 July, 1866, Sherman was promoted to be a major general and when Grant became president of the United States, 4 March, 1869, Sherman succeeded him as general, with headquarters at Washington. From 10 Nov., 1871, to 17 Sept., 1872, he made a professional tour in Europe, and was everywhere received with the honors due to his distinguished rank and service. At his own request, and in order to make Sheridan general-in-chief, he was placed on the retired list, with full pay and emoluments, on 8 Feb., 1884. He has received many honors, among which may be mentioned the degree of LL. D. from Dartmouth, Yale, Harvard, Princeton, and other universities, and membership in the Board of regents of the Smithsonian institution, 1871-73.

A thorough organizer, he is also prompt in execution, demanding prompt and full service from all whom he commands. He is an admirable writer, and goes at once to the very point at issue, leaving no one in doubt as to his meaning. His favorites are always those who do the best work in the truest spirit, and his written estimate of them is always in terms of high commendation. Without being a natural orator, he expresses himself clearly and forcibly in public, and as he is continually called out, he has greatly developed in that respect since the war.

In personal appearance he is a typical soldier and commander, tall and erect, with auburn hair carelessly brushed and short-cropped beard, his eyes dark hazel, his head large and well-formed; the resolution and strong purpose and gravity exhibited by his features in repose would indicate to the stranger a lack of the softer and more humane qualities, but when he is animated in social conversation such an estimate is changed at once, and in his bright and sympathizing smile one is reminded of Richard's words: "Grim-visaged War has smoothed his wrinkled brow."

His association with his friends and comrades is exceedingly cordial, and his affection for those allied to him is as tender as that of a woman. A life of Gen. Sherman has been written by Gen. Manning F. Force in the "Great Commanders" series (New York, 1898), and he has published "Memoirs of Gen. William T. Sove and Sherman," (2 vols., New York, 1875; new ed. 1885). His brother John, statesman, in Lancaster, Ohio, 10 May, 1823, after the death of their father in 1829, leaving the large family with but limited means, the boy was cared for by a cousin named fifty years; and the amendment I desire to offer will reserve the power to congress to determine the proposed contract after ten years. All bills making appropriations for public expenditures were closely scrutinized, and the then prevalent system of making contracts in advance of appropriations was denounced by him as illegal. At the close of his second congressional term he was recognized as the foremost man in the house of representatives. He had, from deep and unchanged conviction adopted the political faith of the Republican party—"a system of any partisan rancor or malignity toward the south.

He was re-elected to the 36th congress, which began its first session amid the excitement caused by the bold raid of John Brown. In 1859 he was the Republican candidate for the speakership. He had subscribed, with no knowledge of the book, for Hinton R. Helper's "Impending Crisis," and this fact was brought up against him and estranged from him a few of the southern Whigs, who sought to declare that he was not hostile to slavery. He refused, and after eight weeks of balloting, in which he came within three votes of election, he yielded to William Pennington, who was chosen.

Mr. Sherman was then made chairman of the committee of ways and means. He took the Republican stand and sought to secure legislation upon appropriation bills, saying: "The theory of appropriation bills is, that they shall provide money to carry on the government, to execute existing laws, and not to change existing laws or provide new ones." In 1860 he was again elected to congress, and, when that body convened in December, the seceding members of both houses were out of session and defined. At the time of President Buchanan's administration the public indebtedness was less than 200,000,000, but by this time it had increased to nearly 100,000,000, and in such a crippled condition were its finances that the government had not been able to pay the sala ries of members of congress and many other demands.

Mr. Sherman proved equal to the occasion in providing the means for the future support of the government. His first step was to secure the passage of a bill authorizing the issue of what are known as the treasury-notes of 1860.

On the resignation of Salmon P. Chase, he was elected to his place in the senate, and took his seat on 4 March, 1861. He was re-elected senator in 1867 and in 1873. During most of his senatorial career he was chairman of the committee on finance, and served also on the committees on agriculture, the Pacific railroad, the judiciary, and the patent office. After the fall of Fort Sumter, under the call of President Lincoln for 75,000 troops he tendered his services to Gen. Robert Patterson, was appointed aide-de-camp without pay, and remained with the Ohio regiments till the meeting of congress in July. Congress adjourned, and he returned to Ohio, and received authority from Gov. William Denison to raise a regiment. "Largely at his own expense, he recruited two regiments of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and a battery of artillery, comprising over 2,500 men. This force served during the whole war, and was known as the Sherman troops. The able services rendered by him to the Union cause were his efforts in the senate to maintain and strengthen the public credit, and to provide for the support of the armies in the field. In the suspension of specie payments, about the first of January, 1862, the issue of United States notes became a necessity. The question of making them a legal tender was not at first received with favor. Mainly through the efforts of Senator Sherman and Sec. Chase, this feature of the bill authorizing their issue was carried through congress. They justified the legal-tender clause of the bill on the ground of necessity. In the debates on this question Mr. Sherman said: "I do believe there is a pressing necessity that these demand-notes should be made legal tender, if we want to avoid the evils of a depreciated and dishonored paper currency. I do believe we have the constitutional power to pass such a provision, and that the public safety now demands its exertion. The fears of the opponents of the bill, he said, had made the only speech in the senate in favor of the national-bank bill. Its final passage was secured only by the personal appeals of Sec. Chase to the senators who opposed it. Mr. Sherman's speeches on state and national banks are the most important that he made during the war. He introduced a refunding act in 1867, which was adopted in 1876, but without the resumption clause. In 1874 a committee of nine, of which he was chairman, was appointed by a Republican caucus to secure a concurrence of action. They agreed upon a bill fixing the time for the resumption of specie payment at 1 Jan., 1879. This bill was reported to the caucuses and the senate with the distinct understanding that there should be no debate on the side of the Republicans. Mr. Sherman was asked to manage it according to his own discretion. The bill was passed, leaving its execution dependent upon the will of the secretary of the treasury for the time being.

Mr. Sherman was an active supporter of Rutherford B. Hayes for the presidency in 1876, was a member of the committee that visited Louisiana to witness the election, was a delegate to the Republican national convention in 1880, and was a member of the committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the deaths of several persons in a railroad accident at Philadelphia in 1880. He was appointed to the Senate in 1881, and was re-elected in 1887 and again in 1893, resigning in 1897 to enter Governor McKinley's cabinet as secretary of state. His advanced age induced him to resign his office soon after the declaration of war with Spain, in May, 1898. In December, 1883, he was defeated for re-election, and declined re-election at the close of his senatorial term in 1887. His name was presented by Joseph B. Foraker in nomination for the presidency at the National convention held in 1884, but the Ohio delegation was divided between him and James G. Blaine, so that he received only 30 votes from the state. Again in 1888 his name was presented by Daniel H. Hastings, in behalf of the Pennsylvania delegation at the National convention, and on the first ballot he received 329 votes and on the second 249, being the leading candidate, and continued so until Benjamin Harrison received the support of those whose names were withdrawn. Mr. Sherman has published "Selected Speeches and Reports on Finance and Taxation, 1850-1857" (New York, 1879). See "John Sherman, What he has said and done: Life and Public Services," by Rev. Sherlock A. Bronson (Columbus, Ohio, 1880).

SHERWIN, Thomas, educator, b. in Westmoreland, N. H., 20 March, 1799; d. in Dedham, Mass., 23 July, 1869. He worked on a farm in Temple, N. H., served an apprenticeship to a civil engineer in Groton, Mass., and after graduation from Harvard in 1825, taught an academy in Lexington, Mass., in 1825-6. He was a tutor in mathematics at Harvard in 1826-7, and from 1828 till 1838 was submaster of the English high-school of Boston, of which he had charge from that date until his death. This school was reputed a model of its kind. He was an outsider to the American Museum of science and arts, active in establishing the Massachusetts institute of technology, and was president of the Massachusetts teachers' association in 1845. He was the author of an "Elementary Treatise on Algebra" (Boston, 1841).—His son, John H. (1834-1911), author, b. in Fishkill, N. Y., 17 Oct., 1841, was graduated at Yale. He held offices in Englewood, N. J., and at one time during the civil war was commissioner of the draft. He afterward became aide-de-camp to Gen. James S. Wadsworth, with the rank of colonel, and served with the Army of the Potomac until the close of the war. He had contributed to magazines, and was the author of "The Case of Credit" (Boston, 1869); "Comic History of the United States" (1870); and a chapter on "American Turbulin" in "Pliny Chips and Guide to Prehistoric Archaeology," by Edward T. Stevens (London, 1870). Col. Sherwood died in Englewood.

SHERWOOD, Mary Elizabeth, b. in Keene, N. H., about 1800; m. William S. Wilson, member of congress from New Hampshire, and married John Sherwood, a lawyer of New York city. She is well known as a society leader, and has devoted special attention to the advancement of literary and artistic pursuits. One of her sons married, in 1885, Rosina Emmet, the artist. Mrs. Sherwood has given readings that have been exceedingly successful, has written for various periodicals, and is the author of "The Sacrament of Destiny" (New York, 1877); "Home Amusements" (1881); "Amities of Home" (1881); "A Transplanted Rose" (1882); "Manners and Social Usages" (1884); "An Epistle to Posterity" (1897); and "Here, There, and Everywhere" (Chicago, 1898).

SHERWOOD, William Hall, painter, b. in Lyons, N. Y., 31 Jan., 1854. His talent for music manifested itself at a very early age, and when he was nine years old he began to appear in concerts in New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada. He afterward gave lessons also at Lyons musical academy, which was founded by his father, Rev. Lyman H. Sherwood. In 1871 he became the pupil of William Mason, and won first prize at a composition contest that year. He studied for seven months under Theodore Kullak, and subsequently also with Doppler, Ernst Friedrich E. Richter, and Carl Friedrich Weitzmann. During this period he frequently appeared before the public, at the Beethoven festival in Berlin, at Weimar with Liszt, and on other occasions, meeting with much success. In 1876 he returned to the United States, and appeared in most of the principal cities, playing frequently in Philadelphia during the Centennial exhibition. In the autumn of the same year he settled in Boston, and soon became widely known as a soloist and teacher. Since then he has played at various times in all the larger cities of the Union, and is noted for his excellent technique, variety of interpretations, and depth of tone. His work as a composer is limited to about twenty pieces for the piano, and many more in manuscript.

SHEW, Joel, physician, b. in Providence, Saturaga co., N. Y., 13 Nov., 1836; d. in Oyster Bay, N. Y., 6 Oct., 1855. After studying medicine and receiving his degree, he visited the water-cure establishments of Dr. Vincent Priessnitz, which he founded in 1826 in Gräfenhain, Austrian Silesia, and became an advocate of Priessnitz's system, which he introduced into the United States. He was physician in the first hydrophatic institution opened in New York in 1844, and in 1845 became numerous reviews. He was the author of "Plea for the Old Foundations" (New York, 1856); "The Lamb in the Midst of the Throne, or the History of the Cross" (1883); and "Books and Authors, and how to use Them" (1886). He also edited the "Memoirs" and two volumes of "Sermons" of the Rev. Ichabod Spencer, D. D. (1853), and David Brainerd's "Memoirs," with notes (1884).—His son, John H. (1834-1911), author, b. in Fishkill, N. Y., 17 Oct., 1841, was graduated at Yale. He held offices in Englewood, N. J., and at one time during the civil war was commissioner of the draft. He afterward became aide-de-camp to Gen. James S. Wadsworth, with the rank of colonel, and served with the Army of the Potomac until the close of the war. He had contributed to magazines, and was the author of "The Case of Credit" (Boston, 1869); "Comic History of the United States" (1870); and a chapter on "American Turbulin" in "Pliny Chips and Guide to Prehistoric Archaeology," by Edward T. Stevens (London, 1870). Col. Sherwood died in Englewood.

SHERWOOD, Mary Elizabeth, b. in Keene, N. H., about 1800; m. William S. Wilson, member of congress from New Hampshire, and married John Sherwood, a lawyer of New York city. She is well known as a society leader, and has devoted special attention to the advancement of literary and artistic pursuits. One of her sons married, in 1885, Rosina Emmet, the artist. Mrs. Sherwood has given readings that have been exceedingly successful, has written for various periodicals, and is the author of "The Sacrament of Destiny" (New York, 1877); "Home Amusements" (1881); "Amities of Home" (1881); "A Transplanted Rose" (1882); "Manners and Social Usages" (1884); "An Epistle to Posterity" (1897); and "Here, There, and Everywhere" (Chicago, 1898).

SHERWOOD, William Hall, painter, b. in Lyons, N. Y., 31 Jan., 1854. His talent for music manifested itself at a very early age, and when he was nine years old he began to appear in concerts in New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada. He afterward gave lessons also at Lyons musical academy, which was founded by his father, Rev. Lyman H. Sherwood. In 1871 he became the pupil of William Mason, and won first prize at a composition contest that year. He studied for seven months under Theodore Kullak, and subsequently also with Doppler, Ernst Friedrich E. Richter, and Carl Friedrich Weitzmann. During this period he frequently appeared before the public, at the Beethoven festival in Berlin, at Weimar with Liszt, and on other occasions, meeting with much success. In 1876 he returned to the United States, and appeared in most of the principal cities, playing frequently in Philadelphia during the Centennial exhibition. In the autumn of the same year he settled in Boston, and soon became widely known as a soloist and teacher. Since then he has played at various times in all the larger cities of the Union, and is noted for his excellent technique, variety of interpretations, and depth of tone. His work as a composer is limited to about twenty pieces for the piano, and many more in manuscript.
managed by a similar establishment in New Lebanon Springs, N.Y. He contributed to "The Water-Cure Journal," and was the author of several works on water treatment, including "Hydropathy, or the Water-Cure" (New York, 1849); "Cholera treated by Water" (1845); "Children: Their Hydropathic Management" (1852); and "The Hydropathic Family Physician" (1854).

SHIELDS, James, soldier, b. in Dungannon, County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1810; d. in Ottumwa, Iowa, 1 June, 1879. He emigrated to the United States in 1826, studied law, and began practice at Kaskaskia, Ill., in 1829. He was sent to the legislature in 1836, elected state auditor in 1839, in 1843 appointed judge of the supreme court, and in 1845 made commissioner of the general land-office. When the war with Mexico began he was appointed a brigadier-general, his commission dating from 1 July, 1846, and was assigned to the command of the Illinois contingent. He served under Gen. Zachary Taylor on the Rio Grande, under Gen. John E. Wool in Chihuahua, and through Gen. Winfield Scott's campaign. At Cerro Gordo he gained the brevet of major-general, and was shot through the lung. After his recovery he took part in the operations in the valley of Mexico, commanding a brigade composed of marines and of New York and South Carolina volunteers, and at Chapultepec he was severely wounded. He was mustered out on 20 July, 1848, and in the same year received the appointment of governor of Oregon territory. This office he resigned on being elected U.S. senator from Illinois as a Democrat, and served from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1855. After the expiration of his term he removed to Minnesota, and when the state government was organized he returned to the U.S. senate as one of the representatives of the new state, taking his seat on 12 May, 1858, and serving till 3 March, 1859. At the end of his term he settled in California, and at the beginning of hostilities in 1861 was in Mexico, where he was engaged in superintending a mine. Hastening to Washington, he was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers on 19 Aug. He was assigned to the command of Gen. Frederick W. Lander's brigade after the latter's death, and on 23 March, 1862, at the head of a division of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's army in the Shenandoah valley, he opened the second campaign with the victory at Winchester, Va., after receiving a severe wound in the preparatory movements on the preceding day. He was in command at Port Republic on 9 June, and was defeated by Gen. Thomas J. Jackson. Resigning his commission on 28 March, 1863, he settled in California, but soon removed to Carrollton, Mo. He was elected senator from Missouri in 1867, and is believed to be the only man who has successively represented three states in the U. S. senate.

SHIELDS, Mary, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 Jan., 1820; d. there, 8 Oct., 1880. She was a daughter of John Shields, a wealthy merchant of that city, and inherited a large estate from him and from her brother. She was active in benevolent work, and bequeathed $1,409,000 for charitable purposes. The Pennsylvania deaf and dumb asylum, the Institution for the blind, the Old man's house, the House of mercy for the care of consumptives, the Indigent and single woman's society, received each one sixth of this sum, and the remaining sixth was divided between the Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia. "to relieve and make more comfortable the sick and insane poor at the almshouse."

SHIELDS, Patrick Henry, jurist, b. in York county, Va., 16 May, 1773; d. in New Albany, 6 June, 1848. In accordance with his father's will he was educated for the legal profession at Hampden Sidney and William and Mary colleges. Inheriting a large tract of land near Lexington, Ky., he removed to that state in 1801, but found the title to the estate defective. In 1805 he passed into Indiana territory, and joined his classmate and life-long friend, William Henry Harrison. He was commissioned the first judge of Harrison county in 1808, and it is recorded of him that he fought gallantly in the battle of Tippecanoe. His house was often the headquarters of the military authorities. He was a member of the Constitutional convention at Corydon in 1816, and filled judicial offices until the time of his death. Judge Shields, as one of the founders of the state, took an active part in reformating the territorial courts, in organizing the school-system, and in maintaining the congressional ordinance of 1787, which prohibited the third-fifth mileage of state. He was at the time himself a slave-holder. According to family tradition, he was the author of the constitutional article which confirmed Indiana as a free state.—His grandson, Charles Woodruff, educator, b. in New Albany, Ind., 4 April, 1825, entered Princeton as an advanced student, and was graduated with distinction in 1844. After a course of two years there he entered the Perugia, and in 1846 was licensed to preach to the presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J., in 1848. In 1849 he was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian church of Hempstead, L. I., and in 1850 he was installed as pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, Pa. He had been early imbued with a philosophical spirit, and published in 1861 an elaborate treatise entitled "Philosophia Ultima," in which he expounded an academic scheme of irreligious studies for the consolidation of religion and science. His friends, profoundly impressed by this exposition, created for him in Princeton a new professorship of the harmony of science and revealed religion. This chair was the first of its kind in any American college, and at the time held the peculiarity that its assiduousness in all its orthodoxy were questioned, but its usefulness as well as its timeliness was soon abundantly vindicated. He was appointed professor of modern history in 1871, but soon resigned this added chair that he might not be diverted from the aim of his life, which he has pursued in college lectures, in papers before the philosophical society of Washington, in contributions to periodicals, and in elaborate published works. He received the honorary degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1861, and that of LL. D. from Columbia university, Washington, in 1877. Dr. Shields has advocated the restoration of theology, as a science of religion, to its true philosophical position in a university system of culture, as dis-tungished from the clerical or sectarian systems of education, and the placing of philosophy as an umpire between science and religion, as embracing without invading their distinct provinces. This view he has maintained at Princeton in systematic lectures and in his "Religion and Science in their Relation to Philosophy" (New York, 1873). He looks forward to the formulation of an ultimate philosophy, or science of the sciences, which is to be reached inductively from the collective intelligence of men working through successive generations. This forms the argument of his great work, "The Philosophia Ultima," now (1898) passing through a revised edition, and of which vol. i. is an historical and critical introduction, while vol. ii. is to treat of the history and role of the sciences. Dr. Shields has been an earnest advocate of the restoration of the Presbyterian prayer-book of 1661 for optional use by ministers and congregations that desire a liturgy. To this end he published "The Book of Common Prayer as amended by the Presbyterian Divines" (1864), with an appendix entitled "Litur gia Expurgata" (1864). He looks forward to the organic union of the Congregational, Presbyterian, and Episcopal principles of the Presbyterian church in an "American Catholic Church" of the future. His irreligious writings under this head embrace a series of essays entitled "The United Churches of the United States," "The Organic Af dfinity of Presbyterian and Episcopacy," and "The Christian Denominations and the Historic Episco pate." No essays have excited wider remark in the theological world. The style of Dr. Shields is remar kable for lucidity of statement and graceful rhetoric. He divides his time equally between Princeton and his villa at Newport.

SHILLABER, Benjamin Penhallow, humorist, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 12 July, 1814; d. in Chelsea, Mass., 25 Nov., 1890. After a common school education he became a printer. In 1832 he removed to Boston, and, at the end of five years, he went for a year, in 1837, to British Guiana. In 1840 he became editor of the Boston "Post," which post he held for about 15 years. From 1853 till 1853 he was editor of a comic paper called "The Carpet-Bag," to which John G. Saxe and other humorists contrib uted, and from 1856 till 1866 he conducted the "Saturday Evening Gazette." His "Life and Sayings of Mrs. Parting ton" (Boston, 1854) gave him a world-wide reputa tion. It had been preceded by "Without Reason and without" (1853), and was followed by "Knitting-Work" (1857); "Partingtonian Patch twork" (1857); and "Lines in Pleasant Places" (1858). In 1879 he began the "Ike Partington Juvenile Series," with "Ike and his Friends" (1879), which followed with "Cruises with Captain Bob" (1881), and "The Doublerunner Club" (1882). In 1882 he published "Wide-Swath," a collection of verses, embracing his "Lines in Pleasant Places" and other poems. He contributed sketches and essays to various periodicals, during the intervals between each published volume, with great success.

SHIMEALL, Richard Cunningham (shim-e-ll), author, b. in New York city in 1803; d. there, 19 March, 1874. He was graduated at Columbia in 1821, and at the Protestant Episcopal general theological seminary in 1824, and the same year was ordained to the ministry. After officiating for ten years as rector of a Protestant Episcopal church, he united with the Reformed Dutch church, and still later with the Presbyterian church. Mr. Shimeall was a distinguished scholar, and had a thorough knowledge of the Greek and Oriental languages. He adopted the views of the English Millenarians, and most of his works were upon subjects connected with the prophecies and their interpretation. His principal publications are "Age of the World as founded on Sacred Records" (New York, 1842); "The End of Prechayy" (1843); "Our Bible Chronology, Historic and Prophetic" (1850); "Christ's Second Coming" (1853); "Political Economy of Prophecy, with Special Reference to the History of the Church" (1866); "Prophetic Career and Destiny of Napoleon III." (1866); "Distinc tion between the Last Personal Antichrists and the Many Antichrists of Prophecy" (1868); "The Up seen World; the Heavenly Blessedness, or where and how" (1870).

SHINDLER, Mary Stanley Bruce Palmer, author, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 15 Feb., 1810. Her father, the Rev. B. M. Palmer, was pastor of a Congregational church at Beaufort, and when she was three years old he removed with her to Charleston, S. C., where she was educated. In June, 1833, Miss Palmer married Charles E. Dana, and removed with him first to New York, and in 1837 to Birmingh ton, Iowa. On his death, soon afterward, she returned to her family in Charleston. Here she be gan to write, and became well known as a poet. In May, 1848, she married the Rev. Robert D. Shind ler, a clergyman of the Episcopal church, who was for a time professor in Shelby college, Kentucky. She removed with her husband in 1850 to Upper Marlborough, Md., and in 1869 to Nacogdoches, Tex. She has published "The Southern Harp," (Boston, 1840); "The Northern Harp" (New York, 1841); "The Parted Family, and other Poems" (1842); "The Temperance Lyre" (1842); "Charles Morton, or the Young Patriot" (1843); "The Young Sailor" (1844); "Forecastle Tour" (1844); and "Letters to Relations and Friends on the Incr tracy" (1843). She had, before her death in 1883, been a frequent contributor to popular periodicals.

SHINGASK (swampy ground overgrown with grass), called by the whites "King Shingask," In dian chief, lived in the 18th century. He was a brother of Tamaqua, or King Beaver, and ranked first among Indian warriors during the French and Indian war. The frontiers of Pennsylvania suf fered severely from the forays of this Delaware, and Gov. William Denny in 1756 set a price of £200 upon his head or scalp. Although he was an implacable foe in battle, he was never known to treat a prisoner with cruelty.

SHINN, Asa, clergyman, b. in New Jersey, 3 May, 1781; d. in Baltimore, 20 February, 1853. When he was seven years old his parents was removed to Virginia. He was entirely self-edu cated, united with the Methodist church in 1798, and in 1800 became an itinerant preacher. After being admitted on trial by the Baltimore circuit in 1801, he was sent in 1803 to form a new circuit in the wilderness of the Ohio, on the waters of the Ho ckhockee. After laboring there, in South Carolina and in Maryland, he withdrew in 1829 from the Methodist Episcopal church and united with the newly organized Methodist Protestant church.
SHIPP, Bernard, author, b. near Natchez, Miss., 30 April, 1813. His father, William Shipp, a native of Virginia, was a merchant of Natchez for thirty years. He was educated at Lexington, Ky., and at Philadelphia, and, after spending his youth and early manhood at Natchez, removed to Louisville, Ky. He published "Pamela, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1844), and "The Progress of Freedom, and other Poems" (New York, 1852).

SHIPPEN, Edward, mayor of Philadelphia, b. in Hilllwm, Cheshire, England, in 1639; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2 Oct., 1712. He was the son of William Shipp. His brother, Rev. William Shipp, D. D., was rector of Stockport, Cheshire, and his nephew, Robert Shipp, D. D., was principal of Brasenose college, and vice-chancellor of Oxford university. Edward was bred to mercantile pursuits, and emigrated to Boston, Mass., in 1668, where he became a wealthy merchant. In 1671 he became a member of the Ancient and Honorable artillery company of Boston. He married Elizabeth Lybrand, a Quakeress, united with that sect, and shared the "foulings,ishments, and banishments," of the Quaker leaders, till he was finally inflicted on the Quakers. In 1693 Mr. Shipp was either banished or driven to take refuge in Philadelphia. He did not quit Boston without erecting a memorial on "a green," near "a pair of gallows, where several of our friends had suffered death for the truth, and were thrown into a hole." He asked leave of the magistrates to erect some more lasting monument there, but they were not willing. About the time he was leaving he gave a piece of land for a Friends' meeting-house, located in Brattle's pasture, on Brattle street, near the site of the Quincy house, and on which was constructed the first brick church in Boston. In Philadelphia his wealth and character obtained for him position and influence. In 1695 he was elected to the assembly, and in 1700, and again in 1706, was elected to the provincial council, of which he continued a member till his death, and for ten years he was the senior member. He was commissioned a justice of the peace in the same year, and in 1697 a judge of the supreme court, and the presiding judge of the courts of common pleas and quarter sessions and the orphans' court. In 1701 he became mayor of Philadelphia, being so named in William Penn's city charter of that year, and during this year he was appointed by Penn to be one of his commissioners of property, which office Shipp held till his death. As president of the council, he was the head of the government from May until December, 1703. In 1704, and for several years thereafter, he was chosen one of the aldermen, and from 1705 till 1718 he was the treasurer of the city. He contracted his third marriage in 1706, which led to his withdrawal from the Society of Friends. His house long bore the name of "the Governor's House." "It was built in the early rise of the city, received then the name of 'Shippen's Great House,' while Shipp himself bore the additional title of "the biggest person, the biggest house, and the biggest coach." —His son, Joseph, b. in Boston, 28 Feb., 1679; d. in Philadelphia in 1741, lived in Boston until 1704, when he moved to Philadelphia. He was among the men of science in his day, and in 1727 he joined Benjamin Franklin in founding the Junto for mutual information and the public

SHIPPEN, George Wolfe, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1824. He was educated in the public schools at Virginia theological school, and the Philadelphia divinity school, and was graduated at the latter in 1863. He entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and has been rector of churches in Philadelphia, Shamo- kin, and Lock Haven, Pa., Troy, N. Y., and of Grace church, Newton, Mass., where he still (1898) remains. He has been head master of St. Paul's school, Troy, edited for ten years "The Teachers' Assistant," contributed articles to church periodicals, and has published "Manual of Instruction upon the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels for the Christian Year" (New York, 1874); "Manual of the Prayer-Book" (1875); "Manual of Church History" (1876); "Stories for the Happy Days of Christmas Time" (1879); "Questions that Troubles in Religion" (1882); and edited "Proverbs." "Hymnal" (1885).

SHIPMAN, George Elias, physician, b. in New York city, 4 March, 1820; d. in Chicago, 29 Jan., 1893. He entered Middlebury, was graduated at the University of New York, and four years later completed his medical studies at the University of physicians and surgeons. In 1846 he removed to Chicago, where he soon had a large and lucrative practice. In 1848 he founded the "Northwestern Journal of Homoeopathy," and was its successful editor four years. Since that date he had contributed many articles to medical journals, and in 1855 he became editor of the "United States Medical and Surgical Journal," and in 1859 he published "The Homoeopathic Guide." In 1871 he conceived the idea of establishing a home for foundlings; or, as he firmly believed and declared, he founded the home in obedience to the expressed desire of God. With $77,38 in hand he opened it, 30 Jan., 1871, trusting in the Lord to furnish the needed funds as wanted. On 9 May, 1874, possession was taken of a new building that cost $40,000. To this an addition was made in 1883-4, making the aggregate cost of buildings $88,690. During the first thirteen years 4,978 children were received, of which 890 were given away, and 1,007 were restored to their parents. No state or municipal aid has ever been contributed to the support of the home, nor had Dr. Shipman ever asked for any assistance.

SHIPP, Albert Hiceah, educator, b. in Stokes county, N. C., 15 Jan., 1819; d. in Cleveland Springs, N. C., in 1887. He was graduated in 1840, and received into the South Carolina Methodist conference in 1841. In 1847 he became president of Greensborough female college, N. C., and in 1849 professor of history and French in the University of North Carolina. He was for some time professor of Wofford college, Spartanburg Court House, S. C., in 1854 professor of exegetical and biblical theology in Vanderbilt university, and in 1882 dean of the faculty and chancellor of that university. He originated the feature of biblical professorships in all Methodist institutions of learning, and was among the first to advocate biblical institutes for the proper education of preachers for the Methodist Episcopal church, south. He had been a member of every general conference since (1850. He had published "The History of Methodism in South Carolina" (New York, 1846), and "The Progress of Freedom, and other Poems" (New York, 1852).
good."—Joseph's son, Edward, merchant, b. in Boston, Mass., 9 July, 1703; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 23 Sept., 1781, was brought up to mercantile pursuits by James Logan, and was in business with him in 1732, as Logan and Shippen; afterward with Thomas Lawrence, in the fur-trade, as Shippen and Lawrence. In 1744 he was elected mayor of the city. In 1745, and for several years thereafter, he conducted a court of oyer and terminer in Philadelphia. In May, 1752, he removed to Lancaster, where he was appointed prothonotary, and continued such until 1778. He had large transactions as paymaster for supplies for the British and provincial forces when they were commanded by Gen. Forbes, Gen. Stanwix, and Col. Bouquet, and managed them with so much integrity as to receive public thanks in 1770. He was a court judge under both the provincial and state governments.

In early life he laid out and founded Shippensburg, Pa. In 1746-8 he was one of the founders of the College of New Jersey, and he was one of its first board of trustees, which post he resigned in 1767. He was also a subscriber to the Philadelphia academy (afterward the University of Pennsylvania), a founder and first president of the Pennsylvania hospital and the American philosophical society. Mr. Shippen's advanced age prevented him from taking an active part, except as a committee-man, during the Revolution, yet his sentiments were warmly expressed in behalf of his country.—William, another son of Joseph, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 1 Oct., 1712; d. in Germantown, Pa., 4 Nov., 1791, applied himself early in life to the study of medicine, for which he had a remarkable genius. He speedily obtained a large and lucrative practice, which he maintained throughout his life. He was a member of the Junto, and aided in founding the Pennsylvania hospital, of which he was the physician from 1733 till 1778, the public academy, and its successor, the College of Philadelphia (now the University of Pennsylvania), being chosen in 1749 one of the first trustees of the academy. He was a trustee of the college in 1753-79, and a member of the American philosophical society, of which he was vice-president in 1768, and for many years after. He was for nearly sixty years a member of the 21 Presbyterian churches of being (1729) one being (1729) one of the founders. On 20 Nov., 1778, he was chosen by the assembly of Pennsylvania to the Continental congress, and he was re-elected in 1779. He was for thirty years a trustee of Princeton college. Dr. Shippen was notably liberal toward the poor, and, it is said, not only gave his professional art and medicines without charge, but oftentimes assisted them by donations from his purse. He retained his physical powers very late in life, and it is said that "at the age of ninety he would ride in and out of the city on horseback without an overcoat in the coldest weather."—William's son, William, known as William Shippen the younger, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 21 Oct., 1730; d. in Germantown, Pa., 11 July, 1806, was graduated at Princeton in 1754, and delivered the valedictory for his class. He studied medicine with his father until 1738, when he went to England, and studied under Dr. John and Dr. William Hunter and Dr. McKenzie; and in 1761 he graduated M. D. at Edinburgh. Returning to Philadelphia in 1762, he entered on the practice of his profession, and on 16 Nov., 1762 he became the first surgeon of the regiment on anatomy that was ever delivered in this country. The first were delivered at the state-house, and the subsequent ones in rooms that were constructed by his father for the purpose in the rear of the latter's residence. After the first lecture he made the following announcement in the "Pennsylvania Gazette": "Dr. Shippen's anatomical lectures will begin to-morrow evening, at six o'clock, at his father's house in Fourth street. Tickets for the course to be had of the doctor at five pistoles each; and any gentlemen who incline to see the subject prepared for the lectures, and learn the art of dissecting, etc., are to pay five pistoles more." Dr. Shippen's school of anatomy was continued until 23 Sept., 1765, when he was chosen professor of anatomy and surgery in the newly established medical school of the College of Philadelphia, of which he was one of the founders. This was the first medical school in this country. Dr. Shippen obtained this post in 1789, when he was elected professor of anatomy, surgery, and midwifery in the University of the state of Pennsylvania, and in 1791, on the union of these institutions, under the name of the University of Pennsylvania, he became professor of anatomy in the latter, retaining the place until 1806. On 15 July, 1776, he was appointed chief physician of the Fly, flying camp in 1777, he laid before congress a plan for the organization of a hospital department, which, with some modifications, was adopted, and on 11 April, 1777, he was unanimously elected "Director-General of all the Military Hospitals for the Armies of the United States." He was charged with an improper administration of the office, and arraigned before a military court, which led him to resign the post in 1781. The investigation did not develop any matters reflecting on his integrity. In 1778-9, and again from 1791 till 1802, he was one of the physicians of the Pennsylvania hospital. He was for more than forty years a member of the American philosophical society, in which he held the offices of curator and secretary. His skill and eloquence as a teacher, exercised during forty years in the first medical school in the country, made him widely known at home and abroad, and won for him permanent distinction and respect in the medical world.—Edward, son of the second Edward, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, 16 Feb., 1739; d. there, 16 April, 1806, at the age of seventy-seven, was the champion of the study of the law with Tench Francis, and, while pursuing his studies, drafted the first common recovery in Pennsylvania. In 1748 he went to London to complete his law studies at the Middle Temple, and, returning to Philadelphia, was admitted to the bar. On 22 Nov., 1752, he was appointed judge of the vice-county, and in 1755 he became one of the commissioners to wait upon the "Paxton Boys," who were engaged in an insurrection, to persuade them to disperse, which mission was successful. He held several local offices until the Revolution. He took a deep interest in the provincial wars, and watched and recorded every occasion when the provincial troops were successful. In 1762 he was appointed prothonotary of the supreme court, retaining this post till the Revolution. He became a member of the provincial council in 1779, in which office he served for five years. During the war for independence he probably sympathized with the mother country, as he was, by order of the council, placed on his parole to give neither succor nor information to the enemy. He remained in Philadelphia during the British occupancy. In May, 1784, he was appointed president judge of the court of common pleas, and in September of the same year he became a judge of the supreme court, in which latter office he retained until 1806, when the court was abolished. In 1785 he was chosen a justice for the dock ward of Philadelphia, and in the same year was appointed president of the court of quarter sessions of the peace and over and terminer.

In 1791, at which time he was still at the head of the court of common pleas, he was appointed an associate justice of the supreme court, in which office he served till 1799. Gov. McKean then nominated Judge Shippen to be the chief justice, which office he resigned in 1805. He "was a man of large views," said Chief-Justice Tilghman. "Everything that fell from that venerated man," said Judge Duncan, "is entitled to great respect." The best extant portrait of him is that by Gilbert Stuart, now in the possession of Mr. Joseph Shippen, who is correctly represented in the accompanying vignette. To this pen we owe the first law reports in Pennsylvania. In 1790 he received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Pennsylvania, of which institution he was a trustee from 1791 till his death. His third daughter, Margaret, b. in Philadelphia in 1760; d. in London, 24 Aug., 1804, was second wife of Benedict Arnold, Joseph, another son of the second Edward, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, 30 Oct., 1762; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 10 Feb., 1810, was graduated at Princeton in 1783, and shortly afterward entered the provincial army, in which he rose to the rank of colonel, and served in the expedition that captured Fort Du Quesne. After the troops were disbanded he went to Europe, partly on a mercantile venture, but chiefly for travel. He returned to Philadelphia in 1761, and in the following year was chosen to succeed the Rev. Richard Peters as secretary of the province, in which post he served until the Revolution, when the provincial council ceased to exist. He subsequently removed to Lancaster, Pa., where in 1789 he became a judge of the county courts. He was fond of the fine arts, and encouraged artists. He, with his partner, William Allen and other friends, greatly aided him with means for pursuing his artistic studies in Italy, for which West was grateful during life. He was for more than forty years a member of the American philosophical society. — Edward, great-grandson of the second Edward, lawyer, b. on his father's estate, "Elm Hill," Lancaster co., Pa., 16 Nov., 1821, was the son of Dr. Joseph Galloway Shippen. He received an academical education, studied law, and, on 11 April, 1846, was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia, where he has since practised, gaining reputation in his profession. Mr. Shippen is known for his active interest in education. He was for many years a member of the board of public education in Philadelphia, and from 1891 to 1898 was one of the five members of the board of public instruction. He was delegate to several national educational conventions, before some of which he has delivered important addresses. He is one of the founders of the Teachers' institute and of the Teachers' benevolent association of Philadelphia. By an appointment of the mikado, he was for many years in charge of the Japanese boys that were sent by the government for education in the United States. He returned. During the civil war he was chief of the educational department of the sanitary commission. During the Centennial exposition in 1876 Mr. Shippen was the president of the Chilian commission. For his benevolent interest in the Italians in Philadelphia he received, on 19 Oct., 1877, from Victor Emanuel, the order of Cavaliere della Corona d'Italia. He is the president of the art club of Philadelphia. He is consul for the Argentine Republic, Chili, and Ecuador, at Philadelphia, and has filled that position for several years. Several of Mr. Shippen's addresses on educational subjects have been published, among them one on the dedication of the Hollingsworth school, 31 Oct., 1867 (Philadelphia, 1867); "Compensation of Teachers" (1872); and "Educational Antiques" (1874).—Edward, great-grandson of Chief-Justice Edward, surgeon, b. in New Jersey, 18 June, 1826, is the son of Richard Shippen. He was graduated at Princeton in 1843, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1848, entered the navy as assistant surgeon, 7 Aug., 1849, and was commissioned surgeon, 26 April, 1861. He was on the "Congress" when she was destroyed by the "Merrimac" at Newport News, Va., and was injured by a shell, and in 1864—5 was on the ironclad "Monitor" and performed service in both attacks on Port Fisher and the operations of Bermuda Hundred. He made the Russian cruise under Admiral Farragut, was commissioned medical inspector in 1871, was fleet-surgeon of the European squadron in 1871—3, in charge of the Naval hospital in 1874—7, commissioned medical director in 1876, and was president of the naval medical examining board at Philadelphia in 1890—2. Dr. Shippen has contributed largely to Hanersey's "Naval Encyclopedia," the "United Service Magazine," and to kindred publications. — William, soldier, b. about 1745; d. near Princeton, N. J., 3 Jan., 1777. He followed the sea in his youth, was a soldier in the royal army about 1760, and subsequently engaged in the provision business in Philadelphia. In March, 1776, he was commissioned as captain of a privateer, and later in the year he commanded the marines in a schooner cruis ing in Delaware river, which took several prizes. His force was transferred to an armed boat, and afterward joined Washington's army. He was killed in the battle of Princeton. — Alexander Eakin, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1735; d. SHIRLEY 1870-7 he studied in Munich, under George Raab, Richard Wagner, Arthur George von Rummberg, and Wilhelm Landskessus. His first work of importance was the "Toning of the Bell" (1874), which was followed by "Sheep-shearing in the Bavarian Highlands" (1876). The latter, which is probably the best of his works, received honorable mention at the Paris exposition in 1878. Other notable works from his easel are "Good Morning," in the Buffalo academy (1878); "Indian Girl" and "Val Learndress" (1884); and "Jenius" (1886), owned by the Academy of design, New York. His largest work is the frieze for the dining-room in the house of Darius O. Mills, New York. Mr. Shirlaw has also earned an excellent reputation as an illustrator. He was one of the founders of the Society of American artists, and was its first president. In his return from Europe he took charge of the Art students' league, New York, and for seven years taught in the composition class. He became an associate of the National academy in 1887, and an academician the following year.

SHIRLEY, John Milton, lawyer, b. in Sonborn, N. H., 16 Nov., 1831; d. in Andover, N. H., 21 May, 1887. He was educated at Sonborn and the Northfield conference seminary, studied law, and in 1854, was admitted to the bar. He represented Andover in the legislature in 1859-60, and was postmaster of that place from 1856 till 1869. He published "The Early Jurisprudence of New Hampshire"; "Complete History of the Dartmouth College Case"; "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Judicial Court," vols. 49-54 (Concord, 1875); "History of Casco and the Superior Court of Judicature," vol. 55 (1876).

SHIRLEY, Paul, naval officer, b. in Kentucky, 19 Dec., 1820; d. in Columbus, Ohio, 24 Nov., 1876. He entered the navy in 1843 became master, 3 Dec., 1853; lieutenant, 21 July, 1854; commander, 5 Nov., 1863; and captain, 1 July, 1870. While in command of the sloop "Conyn," of the Pacific squadron, he captured the piratical cruiser "J. M. Chapman" in 1863, for which service he was complimented by Rear-Admiral Charles H. Bell. He also, while in command of the "Swannene," took the piratical steamer "Conyn," at Cape St. Lucas, Lower California, and thereby saved two mail-steamers that would have been captured. He was fleet-captain of the North Pacific squadron, and commanding officer at Port Townsend. He was superintendent of the Government steamer "Independence," at Mare island, Cal., in 1869-70.

SHIRLEY, William, colonial governor of Massachusetts, b. in Preston, Sussex, England, in 1634; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 24 March, 1771. He studied law and came to Boston in 1731, where he practiced his profession. He was a commissioner for the settlement of the boundary between Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and acted as such when he was appointed governor of Massachusetts in 1741. He administered the government of the colony until 1745, and in this year planned the successful expedition against Cape Breton. He was in England from 1749 till 1753, and was one of the commissioners at Paris for settling the limits of the British colonies in North America. He went to Massachusetts in 1750. In 1753 he returned as governor of Massachusetts, treated with the eastern Indians in 1754, explored Kennebec river, and erected several forts. He was commander-in-chief of the forces in British North America at the opening of the French war in 1755, planned the expedition of Gen. John Pocumuck against Niagara, and went with it, as far as Oswego. In 1759 he was made lieutenant-general, and he afterward became governor of one of the Bahama islands, but returned to Massachusetts in 1770 and built the mansion in Roxbury that was afterward the residence of Gov. Eustis. He published "Electra," a tragedy; "Birth of Hercules," a mask; a "Letter to the Duke of Newcastle," with a portrait of the "Siege of Louisburg" (1745); and the "Conduct of Gen. William Shirley briefly stated" (London, 1758).—His son, William, was killed with Gen. Braddock in 1755. Another son, Sir Thomas, b. in Boston; d. in March, 1809, was a major general in the British army, created a baronet in 1786, and was governor of New South Wales.

SHIBER, Gullieh, clergyman, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 1 Nov., 1786; d. in Salem, S. C., 27 June, 1838. His parents removed when he was young to Bethabara, a Moravian settlement in the south, and gave him a common-school education. He taught for a few years, then learned the trade of a tinsmith, and began business in Salem, S. C., where he soon combined a bookstore with his tinshop. He was a warm Moravian, and built the first paper-mill south of the Potomac. While an apprentice he had studied law, was admitted to the bar, and soon acquired an extensive practice among the German settlers. Later he became a large landowner, had numerous slaves, and was frequently elected to the legislature. After his fifty-fifth year he desired to enter the ministry, but, finding it impossible to take the long theological course that was required by the Moravian church, he induced the village authorities to make a change in their laws, which, being confirmed by the legislature, permitted another denomination within their borough. He then took a course of reading, and in 1811 was appointed by the Lutheran synod of New Jersey to a mission. The indignant Moravians tried to compel him to leave the town, but he proved his right to remain by their own recent enactment, and labored there gratuitously till a few years before his death. He was a founder of the general synod of the Lutheran church, of which he was president in 1825, and one of the committee to prepare a Lutheran hymn-book, and to publish the translation of Luther's catechism. In 1825 he was a director of the theological institution which adopted measures for the formation of the seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., to which he left three thousand acres of land. He translated Stelling's "Scenes in the World of Spirits," and prepared "A Comprehensive Account of the Rise and Progress of the Christian Church" by Dr. Martin Luther (author), "to which I add," Md., 1838.

SHOCK, William Henry, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 15 June, 1821. He entered the navy as 3d assistant engineer, 18 Jan., 1845, and served in the Mexican war. He was promoted 2d assistant engineer, 10 July, 1847, became 1st assistant engineer, 31 Oct., 1848, was senior engineer of the coast-survey steamer "Lecureux" in 1849, and superintended the construction of the machinery of the steamer "Susquehanna" at Philadelphia in 1807-1. He was promoted to chief engineer, 11 March, 1851, superintended the construction of the machinery of the steamer "Princeton" at Boston in 1851-2, and, after a year's service as engineer inspector of U. S. mail steamers, made a cruise as chief engineer of the "Princeton" and superintended the construction of marine-engineers at West Point, N. Y., in 1854-5. He was president of the examining board of engineers in 1860-2, after which he superintended the building of river monitors at St. Louis, Mo., in 1862-3. He was fleet-engineer under Admiral Farragut during the operations at Mobile, where he rendered valuable services, as also under Admiral Thatcher in 1863-5. In the summer of 1865 he was temporarily appointed chief of the bureau of steam engineering, which post he filled again in 1871, and received the thanks of the department for the efficient manner in which he had discharged the duties. In 1873 he went to Europe to inspect foreign dock-yards and to represent the bureau of steam engineering at the Vienna exhibition, and was appointed one of the American judges of award by the president. He was appointed engineer-in-chief of the navy, 3 March, 1877, in which capacity he served until 15 June, 1888, when he was retired.

He has been for many years an active member of the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia and a contributor to the journal of that institution. In 1886 he designed and constructed projectiles to have a rotary movement fired from smooth-bore guns, the experiments with which resulted satisfactorily. He has also invented and patented a relieving cushion for wire-reeling Patents, which has been adopted in the navy (1869), a projectile for small arms, improving the efficiency of muskets (1870), and steam radiators and mechanisms for rapid heating purposes (1874). He is the author of "Steam Boilers: their Design, Construction, and Management" (New York, 1881). This became the textbook of the U. S. naval academy on the subject and is a standard work.

SHOEMAKER. George Washington, inventor, b. near Williamsport, Pa., 14 Dec., 1801. He received his education at Keystone academy, Factoryville, Pa., and then entered his father's woollen-mill. Having mechanical ability, he made various improvements in the plant, and in 1866 invented a ring-machine, by which wool-spinning may be carried on continuously. With the Crompton mule, now in general use, an output of 150 pounds is obtained in ten hours with 250 spindles, while the new system, with an equal number of spindles, has given during the same time 640 pounds of yarn. It is estimated that, under favorable conditions, from 800 to 1000 pounds of yarn can be produced in ten hours. The cost of a machine in the shoemaker type is much less than that of the other.

SHOEMAKER. William Lukens, poet, b. in Georgetown, D. C., 10 July, 1822. He is of Quaker descent. After graduation at Jefferson college in 1841 he entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, where he took his degree in 1846, but has never practised. He has written many poems, sonnets, and translations of German ballads and lyrics, but they have never been published in book-form. The best known of them are "The Sweetheart Bird-Song," which was set to music by Michael Kafke, "The Sabbath of the Year," and "Twixt Soon be Dark." Some of his verses are included in John J. Piatt's "Union of American Poetry and Art" (Cincinnati, 1880-1).

SHOLES. Charles Clark, journalist, b. in Norwich, Conn., 8 Jan., 1816; d. in Kenosha, Wis., 5 Oct., 1867. He was brought up in Danville, Pa., and there learned the trade of printing; after which he went to Indianapolis, Ind., where he was a journeyman in the newspaper-office of Simon Cameron. In 1836 he went to Wisconsin and conducted in Green Bay the first journal in that part of the west. Mr. Sholes was soon appointed clerk of the territorial district court, and in 1837 was elected to the territorial legislature from Brown county. In 1838 he purchased in Madison the "Wisconsin Inquirer," and early in 1839 the "Kenosha Telegraph," but subsequent business engagements compelled him to relinquish these journals. He fixed his residence in Kenosha in 1847, of which place he was several times mayor, frequently represented Kenosha county both in the assembly and senate of the state, and in one session was chosen speaker of the former body. In 1857 he was elected mayor of Kenosha, an embarrassment to his senator, governor, but failed of election. Mr. Sholes was one of the early organizers of what afterward grew into the Northwestern telephone company, with which corporation he was connected at the time of his death. He was an active Abolitionist and zealous promoter of the cause of popular education. His brother, Christopher Latham, inventor, b. in Moorestown, Pa., 14 Feb., 1819; d. in Milwaukee, 17 Feb., 1890, was educated in private schools in his native state, and then followed the printer's trade. In 1819 he went to Wisconsin and was postmaster of Kenosha during Polk's administration. He was a member from Racine county, of the first state senate in 1848, and was elected to the assembly in 1851-2, and again to the senate in 1856-7. During the administration of Governor Johnson he held the office of collector of customs of the port of Milwaukee and he was commissioner of public works for Milwaukee in 1869-73, and again in 1876-8. Mr. Sholes was a member of the school board of Milwaukee in 1870-1, part of which time he was its president. In addition to his work as a journalist, which had been his profession when not holding office, he had interested himself in inventions, the most important of which was the type-writing machine that was introduced through the firm of E. Remington and Sons. It was begun in 1866, and when patented in 1898 was about the size of a sewing-machine. It is worked with lettered keys arranged in four rows, each type-carrier being thrown up as its key is struck. The type letters are engraved on the ends of steel bars, which are pivoted in the circumference of a circle, so that the end of each bar will strike at the same point in the centre of the circle. An inked ribbon passes over the centre of the circle, and over the whole cylinder carries the paper to receive the impression. The cylinder, by a spring and ratchet mechanism, is rotated, and when a line is completed it is also given a lateral movement. In 1873 this invention passed into the hands of the Remingtons for manufacture, since which time many minor improvements have been added to it, increasing its usefulness.
SHORT, Charles, educator, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 28 May, 1851; d. in New York city, 34 Dec., 1896. He was graduated at Kenyon college in 1871, and in 1847 till 1863 he was classical instructor in Roxbury and Philadelphia, and in the latter year he became president of Kenyon college, Ohio, and professor of moral and intellectual philosophy. In 1868 he was called as professor of Latin to Columbia college, where he remained until his death. In 1871 Dr. Short was appointed a member of the American committee for the revision of the N.T. Testament, and subsequently he was secretary of that body. "Dr. Short," says the Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, "was remarkable as a painstaking scholar, who would have contributed more to classical literature but for his reluctance to let anything pass from his pen till he had exhausted his ability upon it." He was a member of many learned societies, to which he contributed papers of much originality. He was also a member of the Century club, and a vestryman in St. Thomas's church, New York city, where a tablet has been erected to his memory. He received the degree of LL.D. from Kenyon college in 1868. His works include revisions of Schmitz and Zumpt's "Advanced Latin Exercises" (1869), and Mitchell's new "Lexicon," and is called "the five-volume treatise for Herzog's "Real Encyclopaedia"" (1890); the essay "On the Order of Words in Attic-Greek Prose," prefixed to Yonge's "English-Greek Lexicon," the most exhaustive treatise that has yet appeared on the subject (1870); and, with Chauncey T. Lewis, a new edition of Andrews's Freund's "Latin Lexicon" (1878). He was also a contributor to various periodicals.

SHORT, Charles Wilkins, botanist, b. in Woodford county, Ky., 6 Oct., 1794; d. in Louisville, Ky., 7 March, 1893. He was graduated at Transylvania university in 1810, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1811, and in 1825 was called to the chair of materia medica and medical botany in Transylvania university. In 1838 he removed to Louisville, Ky., where he was associated with Dr. Charles Caldwell, Dr. Lunsford P. Vandell, Dr. John Esten Cooke, and Dr. Daniel Drake in founding the medical department of the University of Louisville. He continued to hold a chair in that institution until 1840, when he retired. He then devoted himself to his private practice, and was appointed, March 7, 1842, by Dr. Robert Peter, and Henry A. Griswold, prepared "Plants of Kentucky." Dr. Short was one of the editors of the "Transylvania Journal of Medicine" in 1828-39, and the author of various botanical notices. At his death his vast herbarium, the result of his life-long collections and exchanges, was bequeathed to the Smithsonian Institution. It is now in the possession of the Academy of natural sciences in Philadelphia.

SHORT, William, diplomatist, b. in Spring Garden, Va., 30 Sept., 1759; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Dec., 1849. He was educated at William and Mary college, and at an early age was chosen a member of the executive council of Virginia. When Thomas Jefferson was appointed minister to France in 1785, Short accompanied him as secretary of legation, and after his departure was made charge d'affaires on 26 Sept., 1789, his commission being the first one that was signed by Gen. Washington as president, but he was not regularly commissioned till 20 April, 1790. He was transferred to the Hague as minister-resident on 16 Jan., 1794. On 19 Dec. of the same year, by leave for Madrid, having been appointed on 18 March commissioner plenipotentiary with William Car-
Indianapolis, and moved to St. Augustine, Fla., early in 1861. He erected a battery at Fernandina under orders of the governor of Florida, was appointed lieutenant in the Confederate army, became major of artillery in October, 1861, and was assigned to Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston at Shiloh as senior artillery officer of his army, and massed the artillery against Gen. Prentiss' position. He was inspector of artillery under Gen. Beauregard after the latter's succession to the command, subsequently served under Hindman as chief of artillery, commanded a division, as major, at the battle of Prairie Grove, and was appointed brigadier-general, 12 Sept., 1862, and ordered on duty at Mobile, Ala. Afterward he commanded a Louisiana brigade at Vicksburg, and received the first attack of the National forces. He surrendered at that place, and after his exchange was chief of artillery to Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, and constructed the defensive works on Chattahoochee River. On the surrender of Gen. John B. Hood to the command of the army in July, 1864, Gen. Shoup was made chief of staff. He was relieved at his own request, and prepared a pamphlet, which was submitted to the Confederate congress, recommending the enlistment of negro troops. After the close of the war in 1865 he was elected to the chair of mathematics and mechanics in the University of Mississippi. He then studied for the ministry, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, and had been rector of churches in Nashville, Tenn., Jackson, Miss., and New Orleans. He was professor of metaphysics in the University of the south, and the author of "Infantry Tactics" (Little Rock, 1862); "Artillery Division of the Engineer and Mercantile Academy" (New York, 1874); and "Mechanism and Personality" (Boston, 1889).

SHREVE, Henry Miller, inventor, b. in Burlington county, N. J., 21 Oct., 1785; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 6 March, 1854. He was educated in western Pennsylvania, and as a boy became interested in the navigation of western rivers. In 1810 he carried the letters of introduction and a letter of credit, taken by an American from Galena river to New Orleans, thus establishing a business that previously had been exclusively in the hands of the British. During the war of 1812 he conveyed supplies to Fort St. Philip past the British batteries by protecting his vessel with cotton-bales. At the battle of New Orleans he had charge of one of the field-pieces that proved so destructive to that column of the British army that was led by Gen. Sir John Keane. In May, 1815, he ascended the Mississippi to Louisville in the "Enterprise," the first steam vessel that ever performed that voyage, and subsequently he built the "Washington" on a plan of his own invention, with improvements that made it superior to Robert Fulton's boat. By using a ram-outfit made of hollowed trees it was possible to save three-fifths of the fuel. In March, 1817, his vessel made its first trip laden with passengers and freight, and demonstrated its superiority. When its success was thoroughly shown, Fulton and his associates, having the exclusive right to navigate all vessels propelled by fire and steam in the rivers of said territory," entered suit against him and secured his boats, this case was decided in his favor. In 1826 he was appointed superintendent of western river improvements, which place he held until 1841. During that time he had charge of the removal of the great Red river raft, "consisting of an accumulation of trees, logs, and driftwood of every description firmly imbedded in its channel for more than 160 miles," and in consequence the river was opened for a distance of 1,200 miles. He built the snag-boat "Heliopolis" in 1829 for removing snags and "sawyers" from Ohio river, and during the same year built a steam mortar battering-ram for harbor defense.

SHREVE, Thomas H., journalist, b. in Alexandria, Va., in 1808; d. in Louisville, Ky., 23 Dec., 1853. He was educated in the academy at Alexandria, engaged in mercantile pursuits, settled in Cincinnati in 1830, and in 1834 purchased a share in the "Mirror," a weekly literary journal. In 1838 he was made editor-in-chief of the "Louisville Courier," and subsequently he became one of the editors of the Louisville "Journal." From the time of his editorial connection with the Cincinnati "Mirror" he contributed essays and poems to magazines. He published "Drayton, an American Tale" (New York, 1851). Some of his verses are reprinted in William T. Coggins' "Poets and Poetry of the West" (Columbus, 1860).—His cousin, Samuel Henry, engineer, b. in Trenton, N. J., 2 Aug., 1829; d. in New York city, 27 Nov., 1884. He was graduated at Princeton in 1848, and at Harvard law-school in 1850, and afterward studied civil engineering. He had charge of the construction of several railroads, and became in 1875 editor of the New York rapid-transit commission. He was chief engineer of the Metropolitan elevated railroad and engineer-in-chief of the Brooklyn elevated railroad. He was the author of a work on "The Strength of Bridges and Roofs" (New York, 1873), which was translated into French, and at the time of his death had almost completed a treatise on the "Theory of the Arch."

SHUBRICK, John Templar, naval officer, b. on Bull's island, S. C., 31 Oct., 1790; d. in Washington, D. C., 27 May, 1874. He entered the navy as midshipman, 19 Aug., 1806, was attached to the "Chesapeake" during the surrender of the British ship "Leopard," and remained in that vessel under Decatur until 1808. He was commissioned lieutenant, 28 May, 1812, attached to the "Constitution" during her escape from the British fleet in July, 1812, and participated in the capture of the "Guerrérie" and "Java." On 6 Jan., 1813, he was transferred to the "Hornet," and was executive officer at the capture of the British brig "Peacock," 24 Feb., 1813. He was next transferred to the "President," of which he acted as executive at its capture by a British fleet, 15 Jan., 1813. He was carried a prisoner to Bermuda, but released at the end of the war. He received three silver medals and votes of thanks from congress for assisting in the capture of the "Guerrérie," "Java," and "Peacock," South Carolina gave him a vote of thanks and a sword. On 20 May, 1813, he sailed from Algiers, where he assisted at the capture of an Algerine frigate and brig, and in the demonstration by which Decatur obtained the treaty with Algiers. He was assigned to command the brig "Epervier," and sailed from Algiers early in July, 1815, with a copy of the treaty for ratification. The brig was lost at sea with all on board. "His brother, William Brandon, naval officer, b. on Bull's island, S. C., 31 Oct., 1790; d. in Washington, D. C., 27 May, 1874, entered the navy as midshipman, 19 Aug., 1806, was commissioned lieutenant, 5 Jan., 1813, commanded a gun-boat in Hampton Roads in 1848, and assisted in defending Norfolk against the British. He was 3d lieutenant of the "Constitution" at the capture of the "Cyane” and “Levant,” 23 Feb., 1813, and executive in her subsequent escape from a British fleet. He received a silver medal, and was included in the vote of thanks by congress to Stewart and his officers, and South Carolina gave him thanks and a sword for his services. He was commissioned master-commandant, 28 March, 1820, and captain, 21 Feb., 1851, commanding the West India squadron in 1838-40, and was chief of the bureau of provisions and clothing in 1846-6. On 22 Jan., 1847, he arrived on the coast of California, he held until the close of the war. He commanded the “Princeton” in 1853, with a small squadron, to protect the fisheries in a dispute with the British, who were armed against superior forces. He also took Guaymas, La Paz, and San Blas, which places together with other ports in Mexico and California, he held until the close of the war. SHUCK, John Lewis (shucks), missionary, b. in Alexandria, Va., 3 Sept., 1812; d. in Barnwell, S. C., 20 Aug., 1863. He was educated at the Virginia Baptist seminary (now Richmond college), and on 22 Sept., 1835, embarked with his bride for China. He began his labors in Macao, where he baptized the first Chinese converts, met with success also at Hong Kong, whither he removed in 1842, and subsequently settled at Canton. In 1844 he came to the United States with his Chinese assistant, and visited various parts of the country in the interest of the missions. He returned to China in 1846, and settled at Shanghai, where he preached for years with good results, having completely mastered the Chinese idioms. When the Chinese were attracted in considerable numbers to California after the discovery of gold, the missionary board selected Mr. Shuck for that field, and he labored there for seven years, retiring in 1861 to Barnwell, where he preached to the neighboring churches during the remainder of his life. He published “Portfolio Chinensis, or a Collection of Authentic Chinese State Papers” (Macao, 1840).—His wife, Henrietta Hall, b. in Killamrock, Va., 28 Oct., 1817, d. in Hong Kong, 27 Nov., 1844, was the daughter of a Baptist minister. She soon learned Chinese after arriving at the field of her intended labors, and was an earnest teacher of Christianity among the heathen till her death. She was the author of “Scenes in China, or Sketches of the Country, Religion, and Customs of the Chinese” (Philadelphia, 1852). Jeremiah B. Jeter published her “Life” (Boston, 1848).—Their son, Lewis Hall, clergyman, b. in Singapore, India, 3 Aug., 1836, was graduated at Wake Forest university, N. C., in 1856, taught for some years, studied theology, and since 1853 has been pastor of a Baptist church in Charleston, S. C.
SHURTLEFF, Robert Wilson, naval officer, b. in Red Hook, N. Y., 21 Feb., 1822; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 Nov., 1865. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1839, was attached to the naval command at Philadelphia, and became a passed midshipman in 1845. He was promoted to master, 21 Feb., 1853, and to lieutenant, 26 Oct., 1853, but resigned from the navy, 20 June, 1854, and was connected with the Collins line of Liverpool steamers as chief officer for two years. He then commanded the steamers "Black Warrior" and "Catawba," on the line between New York and other cities. Among the numerous eminent men that sat to him were Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and Prince Napoleon (afterward Napoleon III.), whose portraits he painted in 1838. He was for many years a captain in the New York 7th regiment and a member of the veteran corps.

SHURTLEFF, Ernest Warburton, poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 4 April, 1862. He was educated at Boston Latin school and Harvard, was graduated at Andover theological seminary in 1888, and became pastor of a Congregational church at Palmer, Mass. He began to write for newspapers and magazines at the age of fourteen, received a thorough musical education, and has published songs and other compositions and several volumes entitled "Poems" (Boston, 1882); "Easter Gleanings" (1884); "Song of Hope" (New York, 1885); "When I was a Child" (Boston, 1886); and "New Year's Pledge" (1887).

SHURTLEFF, Nathaniel Bradstreet, antiquary, b. in Boston, Mass., 29 June, 1810; d. there, 17 Oct., 1874. He was the son of Dr. Benjamin Shurtleff, whose donations to the college in Alton, Ill., caused that institution to assume his name. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1831, and at the medical department in 1834, but gave his attention to literary and scientific pursuits. His list of works is extensive. He labored for many years on the history of the Pilgrims of the "Mayflower," a number probably exceeding that of any of his contemporaries. For three terms he was mayor of Boston (1865–70), and he prided himself on the fact that he was the first to hold that office who had always belonged to the Democratic party. During his administration he obviated most of the necessary alterations, and made necessary by the rapid growth of South Boston, were effected in that district, and Dorchester became a part of Boston. His books include "Epitome of Phrenology" (Boston, 1853); "Perpetual Calendar for Old and New Style" (1845); "Passengers of the "Mayflower" in 1620" (1849); "Brief Notice of William Shurtleff, of Marshfield" (1850); "Genealogical Memoir of the Shurly of Elder Thomas Leavett, of Boston" (1850); "Thunder and Lightning, and Deaths in Marshfield in 1638 and 1666" (1850); "Records of the Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, 1628-1836" (5 vols, in 6, 1853-54); with David Pulsifer edited "Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England" (11 vols, 1853-61); "Decimal System for Libra ries" (1856); and "Memoir of the Inauguration of the Statue of Franklin" (1857).

SHURTEFF, Roswell Morse, artist, b. in Kin-dge, Cheshire co., N. H., 14 June, 1838. About 1857 he went to Buffalo, where for two years he studied drawing. In 1859 he studied at Buffalo school of fine arts; and in 1860 he went to New York city and studied at the Cooper Union institute, and drawing on wood for John Andrew. In 1861 he enlisted in the National army, and he afterward continued to furnish drawings to various periodicals and to the wood-engravers. About 1870 he began to devote himself entirely to painting. His animal paintings first gained him distinction, and of these the best known are "The Wolf at the Door" and "A Race for Life" (1878). Among his later works in oil, most of which are scenes in the Adirondacks, are "On the Alert" (1870); "Autumn Gold" (1880); "Gleams of Sunshine" (1881); and "A Song of Summer Woods" (1886). His water-colors include "Harvest Time," "Basin Harbor, Lake Champlain," and "The Morning Drought" (1879). In 1881 he had a solo exhibition at the American Academy of Design. In 1882 he was elected an associate of the National academy in 1880, and is a member of the Water-color society.

SHUTE, Samuel, colonial governor, b. in London, England, in 1662; d. in England, 15 April, 1742. He was brought up as a dissentor in religion, being a grandson of the Puritan divine, Joseph Caryl, and was educated at the University of Leiden, and afterwards took a tour in various parts of Europe. He entered the army, he served under the Prince of Orange, and afterward under the Duke of Marlborough in the Netherlands, attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1716 he obtained a commission as royal governor of Massachusetts, paying a bonus of £1,000 to Col. Elisha Burgess, the first appointee, and generously supplied him with the necessaries and comforts of life. When this engagement was begun he was engaged in a struggle with the assembly over the prerogative. The financial depression resulting from Indian wars he attempted to relieve by the emission of treasury bills, condemning a banking scheme that was favored by the legislature. He endeavored to make treaties with the eastern Indians, and wean them from the influence of Sebastien Basle, A controversy with Elisha Cooke with regard to the royal rights to ship timber in the forests of Maine and the conduct of the king's surveyor, led him to annul Cooke's election to the council in 1718. The assembly retaliated by choosing Cooke their speaker: but the governor refused to recognize the election. He had a dispute with the general court about the number of bills, and when he demanded a fixed salary the representatives reduced the amount voted to him in the form of a present to £500, and, on his insisting on an annual payment of £1,000, gave him that amount in currency, worth but £500. In 1723 he went to England to urge his charges against the general court, and was there met by the utmost demands. The points at issue were settled by an explanatory charter that was signed on 12 Aug., 1723, and adopted by the general court on 15 Jan., 1726, which denied the right of the legislature to adjourn at will for more than two days, and gave the governor a negative over the choice of speaker, but contained no injunction for fixing the sala ries of the crown officials. When Shute was about to take ship again for Massachusetts, in June, 1727, the king died, and the new cabinet that came into office appointed another governor.

SHUTE, Samuel Moore, educator, b. in Phila-delphia, Pa., 24 Jan., 1823. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1844, and studied theology in the seminary of the Reformed church, Philadelphia. He was pastor of a Baptist church in Pemberton, N. J., from 1853 till 1856, and then of one at Alexandria, Va., till 1859, when he became professor of the English language and literature in Columbian university, Washington, D. C. He is the author of a "Manual of Anglo-Saxon" (New York, 1867).

SIBIEL, Alexander, known as Fray Domingo, German antiquary, b. in Saarlouis in 1709; d. in Dussan in 1791. He studied at Mechlin, became a Jesuit, and was sent to New Spain in 1754. After being for several years a professor in the college of the order in Mexico, he was appointed vicar of a remote parish in the northern part of the country, where he discovered some half-buried monuments of the Aztec architecture covered with hieroglyphs. He devoted several years to their study, buying, meanwhile, Aztec antiquities whenever he could find them, and at last was enabled to read part of the inscriptions. Distinguished men of science, like Ventura and Botzani, became profoundly interested in his Aztec inscriptions. Toward 1770 Sibiel returned to Germany and was appointed chaplain at the court of Anhalt. His works include "De arte Hierogliphum Mexicanorum" (Dussan, 1783); "Reisen in Mexico" (2 vols., 1785); and "Litterae annue Societatis Jesu in provincia Mexicana" (5 vols., 1787).

SIBLEY, George Champion, soldier, b. in Granville, Massachusetts, in April, 1782; d. in Elma, St. Charles co., Mo., 31 Jan., 1863. He was the son of John Sibley, a surgeon in the Revolutionary army, and a daughter of Samuel Hopkins, of Newport, and was brought up in North Carolina. He went to St. Louis, Mo., during Jefferson's administration as an employee of the Indian bureau, and subsequently was agent of the government. Escorted by a band of Osage warriors, he explored the Grand Saline and Salt mountain, publishing an account of the expedition. After retiring from the Indian department, he was appointed a commissioner to survey a road from Missouri to New Mexico, and made several treaties with Indian tribes. He and his wife, Mary Easton, were the founders of Lindenwood college in St. Charles, Mo., giving the land on which it is built. He was interested in the scheme of African colonization and other philanthropic objects.—His nephew, Henry Hopkins, soldier, b. in Nachtoches, La., 25 May, 1816; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 28 Aug., 1890. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1838, and after lieuting as a 2d lieutenant of dragoons, was promoted 1st lieutenant on 8 March, 1840, took part in the expedition against the Seminoles in the Everglades, and served as adjutant of his regiment till 1846. He was engaged in the military occupation of Texas, was made a captain on 16 Feb., 1847, and took part in all the principal operations of the Mexican war, rising to the rank of major for gallantry in the affair at Medelin, near Vera Cruz. He served for several years on the Texas frontier against the Indians, was stationed in Kansas during the anti-slavery conflict, took part in the Utah expedition and in the Navajo expedition of 1860, and, while stationed in New Mexico, was promoted major, but resigned on the same day, 15 May, 1861, in order to join the Confederate army. He soon received a commission as brigadier-general, and on 5 July was assigned to the command of the Department of Mexico, and intrusted with the task of driving therefrom the National forces. He raised a brigade in northwestern Texas, left Fort Bliss in January, 1862, to effect the conquest of New Mexico, appeared before Fort Craig on 16 Feb., and on 21 Feb. fought with Col. Edward R. S. Canby the engagement of Valley Platte, which drew off the National troops. He occupied Albuquerque and Santa Fe, but in April was compelled to evacuate the territory. Subsequently he served with his brigade under Gen. Richard Taylor and Gen. E. Kirby Smith. In December, 1869, he entered the service of the khedive of Egypt with the rank of brigadier-general, and was assigned to the duty of policing the sea-coast and river defences. At the termination of his five years' contract he returned, with broken health, to the United States. He was the inventor of a tent for troops modelled after the wigwams of the Sioux and Co- manche Indians. He obtained letters-patent, and the U.S. government, while he was in its service, contracted for the use of the tent. At the close of the war he formed a company to carry out the terms of the contract, and after his death the claim was brought before congress in the interest of his family. He occasionally lectured on the condition of the Egyptian fellahen.

SIBLEY, John Langdon, librarian, b. in Union, Me., 29 Dec., 1804; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 9 Dec., 1883. He was graduated at Harvard in 1825, and entered the library-school. While he was in college much of his time was spent in working in the library, and he was assistant librarian in the divinity-school in 1825-6. In 1829 he was ordained pastor of the first church in Stow, Mass., where he remained four years. From 1833 till 1841 he was engaged in literary work in Cambridge, and during part of this period he was editor and proprietor of the "American Magazine of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge." When Gore hall, the present library building of Harvard, was opened in 1841, Mr. Sibley was appointed assistant librarian under Dr. Thaddeus William Harris. On the latter's death in 1850, Mr. Sibley was appointed librarian, which post he held for twenty-one years, until 1877, when, owing to his age and the failure of his memory, he was retired from active work, though librarian emeritus. Owing to his persistent requests for all kinds of printed matter, and his earnest appeals for pecuniary aid, the number of volumes increased from 41,000 in 1841 to 164,000 volumes, and almost as many pamphlets, in 1877, and its permanent fund from $3,000 to $170,000 in the same period. From 1839 till his retirement he was the editor of the triennial and quinquennial catalogues. He first inserted obituary dates in the triennial of 1845, and from 1849 solicited and preserved biographical notes of the graduates. After 1860 he inserted in the triennial his "Appeal to Graduates and Others," for biographical sketches, giving a list of questions for guidance in their preparation. From 1850 till 1879 he also edited this the compiler. He was indefatigable in his quest for biographical information and exact dates, and had the reverence of a Chinaman for scraps of paper, utilizing odds and ends, especially the blank insides of envelopes, upon which many of his most valuable memoranda were made. These notes, accumulated during more than half a century, together with the letter during the past forty years were chronologically arranged and bound, and his very large collection of newspaper-cuttings relating to graduates was carefully indexed and arranged in scrap-books. For thirty-seven years he led the singing of the 78th Psalm at the commencement dinner. Bowdoin conferred upon him the honorary degree of A.M. in 1856. He was a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences, and from 1846 an active member of the Massachusetts historical society, and he was also a member of other historical societies. He was a graduate of the college and received as a student from the charity fund of Phillips Exeter academy, he began in 1862 a series of gifts to that institution, which amounted at the time of his death to more than $39,000, the income from which is to be used for the support of meritorious and needy students. He was not known as the donor until the dedication of the new academy building in 1872. He published "Index to the Writings of George Washington" (Boston, 1837); "History of the Town of Union, Me." (1851); "Index to the Works of John Adams" (1853); and "Notices of the Triennial and Annual Catalogues of Harvard University, with a Reprint of the Catalogues of 1674, 1682, and 1700" (1865). His last and greatest work, upon which he had spent nearly all his life, in giving out the obituaries, is "Biographical Sketches of Graduates of Harvard University," three volumes of which have been published (1873-75). In the preface to his third volume, written nine months before his death, he says: "I have passed my eightieth birthday, and have expended such working power as remained to me in the volume most recently published. But the work will be continued by younger hands, into which will pass a large mass of materials—the accumulated collections of more than half a century."

SIBLEY, Mark Hopkins, jurist, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., in 1799; d. in Canandaigua, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1892, received a classical education, removed to Canandaigua in 1814, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and gained a high reputation as an advocate. He was a member of the New York legislature in 1834-5, and was elected as a Whig to congress, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1839. At the close of his term he was elected a state senator, and in 1846 became county judge. He was a member of a charming social circle in Canandaigua, including Gen. George G. Meigs, Col. Charles Greig, and Mr. Wood. His cousin, Hiram, financier, b. in North Adams, Mass., 6 Feb., 1807; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 12 July, 1888, received a common-school education. He practised the shoemaker's trade without preparatory training, and, emigrating to western New York at the age of sixteen, worked as a journeyman machinist, then as a carding-machines, in Lima, and mastered three other trades before he was twenty-one years old. He carried on the woollen business at Sparta and Mount Morris, next established a foundry and machine-shop at Mendon, and in 1843 removed to Rochester, on being elected sheriff of Monroe county. He was instrumental in obtaining from congress an appropriation in aid of the Manufactories of Monroe's experiments, and interested himself in telegraphy from the beginning. When the invention came into practical use, the business being divided between many companies, Mr. Sibley, who, with other citizens of Rochester, was interested in two of the largest—viz., the Atlantic, Lake, and Mississippi Valley and the New York, Albany, and Cleveland lines, was the plan of uniting the scattered plants and conflicting patents in the hands of a single corporation. Lines that had proved unprofitable were purchased at nominal prices, and the telegraphs that extended over parts of thirteen states were consolidated under the name of the Western Union telegraph company, of which Sibley was president for seventeen years, during which period the value of the property grew from $220,000 to $45,000,000. He was unable to interest his associates in a line to the Pacific coast, and constructed it alone in 1861, transferring it to the company after its completion. With the other managers, he practiced the practicability of submarine telegraphy, and entered into the project of telegraph communication with Europe by way of Bering Strait and Siberia. He visited St. Petersburg in 1864, and obtained a promise of co-operation from the Russian government. The Western Union company expended $3,000,000 in building 1,500 miles of the projected line, but abandoned the enterprise as soon as the first message was sent over the Atlantic cable. Mr. Sibley was the principal promoter of the Southern Michigan and Northern Indiana railroad. He purchased large tracts of land in Michigan, and was interested in the lumber and salt manufacturing business at Saginaw. After the civil war he engaged largely in railroad building and various industrial enterprises in the southern states, and did much to revive commercial activity. He had become the largest owner of improved lands in the United States, and had in recent years engaged in farming operations on a great scale. The Burr Oaks farm, of nearly 40,000 acres, in Illinois, the Howland island farm, comprising 3,500 acres, in Cayuga, N. Y., and many others, were mainly devoted to seed-culture. Mr. Sibley gave $100,000 for a building to hold a public library in the state university, and a like sum for the establishment of the Sibley college of mechanical engineering and the mechanic arts connected with Cornell university.

SIBLEY, Solomon, jurist, b. in Sutton, Mass., 7 Oct., 1769; d. in Detroit, Mich., 4 April, 1846. He studied law, and began practice in Marietta, Ohio, in 1795, removing in the following year to Cincinnati, and a year later to Detroit, Mich. He was elected to the first legislature of the Northwest territory in 1799, and was a delegate to congress from the territory of Michigan in 1820-3. He was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Michigan, and held that office until he was compelled by deafness to resign in 1836.—His son, Horatio Gates Sibley, b. in Mich., 29 May, 1811; d. in St. Paul, Minn., 18 Feb., 1891. He began the study of law, but abandoned it to engage in mercantile business at Sainte Marie, soon afterward entered the employment of the American fur company, became a partner, and on 7 Nov., 1834, during one of his trips, reached the mouth of the Minnesota river, and was so delighted with the site of the bay that he purchased the land at Mendota the first stone house within the present limits of the state of Minnesota. He devoted much of his time to the sports of the frontier, which he described in graphic style in the "Spirit of the Times" and "Turf, Field, and Farm," over the pen-name of "Hal, a Dacotah." When the state of Minnesota was admitted to the Union on 11 May, 1849, the western boundary was fixed at St. Croix river, leaving an area of about 25,000 square miles, on the east of Mississippi river, including some organized counties, without a government. The acting governor of the territory issued a proclamation providing for the election of a delegate to represent this district in congress, and Mr. Sibley was chosen in November, 1848. After much delay and discussion, he was admitted to his seat, 15 Jan., 1849, and secured the passage of an act creating the territory of Minnesota, which embraced the rest of Wisconsin and a vast area west of the Mississippi. He was elected a delegate to congress from Minnesota in 1849, and re-elected in 1851, when he declined longer to be a candidate. He was a member of the Democratic branch of the convention that framed in 1857 the state constitution that was adopted by the people in November of the same year. The state was admitted to the Union on 11 May, 1858, and he was inaugurated as governor in the same month. He opposed the loan of state credit to railroad companies, and, when a constitutional amendment was carried authorizing the issue of bonds, he refused to send them out except on security of trust deeds from the companies giving a priority of lien upon all their property. But this ruling was negatived by the decision of the supreme court, thus leaving the way open for the issue of an indefinite amount of first mortgage bonds, and resulting in the bankruptcy of the companies organizing the railroad companies, and the financial ruin of the people of Minnesota. When the great Sioux rising occurred on the Iowa and Minnesota frontier in 1862 (see Little Crow) he commanded the white forces composed of volunteer citizens. Notwithstanding the delay in procuring arms and ammunition, only five weeks elapsed before the decisive battle of Wood Lake, 28 Sept., broke the power of the savages. Their capture followed two days later. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and afterward brevetted major-general. He was appointed a member of the board of Indian commissioners during President Grant's administration, and in 1871 was elected to the legislature, where, during the ensuing session, he made a vigorous protest against the repudiation of the state railroad bonds, being thus instrumental in restoring the credit of Minnesota. He received the degree of LL.D. from Princeton in 1888. Gen. Sibley held the offices of president of the Chamber of commerce of St. Paul, where he resided, of the board of regents of the State university, and of the State historical society, to whose "Collections" he made many contributions.

SICKEL, Horatio Gates, soldier, b. in Belmont, Bucks co., Pa., 3 April, 1817; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 18 April, 1890. He was engaged in the business of coach-making, invented in 1848 a new method of producing artificial light, and became an extensive manufacturer of lamps. Besides the above, he was connected with various militia organizations. He entered the U. S. service on 17 June, 1861, as colonel of the 3rd regiment of the Pennsylvania reserve corps, and succeeded Gen. George G. Meade in the command of the brigade. He commanded a brigade in Gen. George Crook's Kanawha valley expedition of 1864, and afterward one in the 5th army corps till the close of the war. He participated in the principal battles of the Army of the Potomac, lost his left elbow-joint, be-
SICKLES, Daniel Edgar, soldier, b. in New York city, 20 Oct., 1828. He was educated at the University of the city of New York, but left to learn the printer’s trade, which he followed for several years. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1844, and began practice in New York city. In 1847 he was elected to the legislature, in which body he took rank as a leader of the Democrats. In 1853 he was appointed corporation counsel of New York city, and on 30 July of the same year he was commissioned as secretary of legation at London, and accompanied James Buchanan to England. He returned in 1855, was elected, after an energetic canvass, to the state senate in the autumn, and a year later was chosen a member of congress, taking his seat on 7 Dec., 1857. Discovering a guilty intimacy between his wife, who was the daughter of Antonio Bagioli, and Philip Haring, U. S. attorney for the District of Columbia, he shot the latter in the street on 2 Feb., 1859. He was indicted for murder, and after a trial of twenty days was acquitted. He had been elected for a second term in 1858, and served till 3 March, 1861. At the beginning of the civil war he raised the Excelsior brigade of U. S. volunteers in New York city, and was commissioned by the president as colonel of one of the five regiments. On 3 Sept., 1861, the president nominated him brigadier-general of volunteers. The senate rejected his name in March, 1862, but confirmed a second nomination. He commanded a brigade under General Joseph Hooker, and gained distinction at Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, and Malvern Hill. His brigade saw severe service in the seven days’ fight before Richmond and in the Maryland campaign, and bore a conspicuous part at Antietam. He succeeded General Hooker in the command of the division, and was very active at Fredericksburg.

On the reorganization of the Army of the Potomac he was assigned to the command of the 3d army corps, and was appointed major-general on 7 March, 1863, his commission dating from 29 Nov., 1862. At Chancellorsville he displayed galantry and energy, gaining the first day at the head of his corps without any serious opposition. On the second day by cutting off the route of retreat of the enemy he arrested general panic by rallying the retreating artillery, and withstanding the force of Stonewall Jackson’s attack with determination after the line was formed. At Gettysburg his corps was posted between Cemetery hill and Little Round Top. He advanced to an elevation which he thought desirable to hold, and in this position was assailed by Gen. James Longstreet’s column, while Gen. John B. Hood endeavored to gain the unoccupied slope of Little Round Top. In the 3d division, which followed, the corps effectively aid in preserving that important position from the enemy, but was deserted by the onset of overwhelming numbers. After the line was broken, Gen. Ambrose P. Hill followed the Confederate advantage with an attack on Sickles’s right, during which Gen. Sickles lost a leg. He continued in active service till in the beginning of 1865, and was recalled to headquarters and made a permanent officer in the United States Army and lost in office September 28, 1893. He was elected to the state senate in 1867, but was defeated in his re-election in 1871.
SIGEL, Franz, soldier, b. in Sinsheim, Baden, 18 Nov., 1824. After completing his studies at the gymnasion of Bruchsal, he entered the military school at Carlsruhe, and was graduated in 1843. While a lieutenant, stationed at Mannheim, he assailed the standing army in public writings, and thus became involved in quarrels with his brother officers. Toward the close of 1847, after a duel that terminated fatally for his antagonist, he resigned. When the Baden revolution began, in February, 1848, he raised a corps of volunteers, or-organized the Lake district at Constance, led a body of more than 4,000 volunteers against Freiburg, and was beaten in two encounters with the royal troops. He escaped across the French border, 28 April, and made his way into Switzerland. The insurrection of May, 1849, recalled him to Baden. He was made commandant of the Lake and Upper Rhine district, then placed in charge of the army of the Neckar, met the royal forces at Heppenheim on 30 May, became minister of war, and finally succeded to the chief command of the troops. He fought in several battles under Gen. Louis Mieroslawski, whom he succeeded, conducted the army of 15,000 men in retreat through three hostile army corps, and crossed the Rhine with the remnant into Switzerland on 11 July. While residing at Lugano he was arrested by the Federal authorities in the spring of 1851, and delivered over to the French police, who conducted him to Havre with the intention of placing him on a ship bound for the United States. He, however, went to England, lived in London and Brighton, and in May, 1852, sailed for New York. After his marriage to a daughter of Rudolf Dunon, he taught in the latter's school, at the same time serving as military secretary of arms into German, and conducting "Die Revue," a military magazine, till 1858, when he was called to St. Louis, Mo., as teacher of mathematics and history in the German institute. He was elected a director of the public schools of that city, edited a military journal, and during the secession crisis defended northern principles in newspaper articles. At the beginning of the civil war he organized a regiment of infantry and a battery, which rendered efficient service at the occupation of the arsenal and the capture of Camp Jackson. In June, 1861, he was sent with his regiment and two batteries to Rolla, whence he marched to Neosho, compelled the retreat of Gen. Sterling Price into Arkansas, then turned northward in order to confront Claiborne Jackson, at Carthage sustained a rough conflict on the open prairie with a force much greater than his own, and finally retreated in good order, with constant fighting, to Springfield and Mt. Vernon. He took part in the fight at Dug Springs, and after the battle of Wilson's Creek conducted the retreat of the army from Springfield toward Rolla. He was commissioned as brigadier general on 17 May, 1861. In the autumn campaign of Gen. John C. Frémont he had command of the advance-guard, and in the retreat from Springfield he commanded the rear-guard, consisting of two divisions. He took command of the right wing of the troops assembled under Gen. Samuel R. Curtis at Rolla, and gained the battle of Pea Ridge by a well-timed assault. He was thereupon made a major-general, dating from 21 March, 1862, and was ordered to the east and placed in command of the troops at Harper's Ferry. He co-operated in the movement against Gen. Thomas J. Jackson at Orange. Gen. John Pope, who was placed in command of the newly created army of Virginia, Sigel, in command of the 1st corps, took part in the engagements beginning with Cedar Creek and ending with Bull Run, where he commanded the right wing, and won in the first day's fight a decided advantage over Jackson. After the battle he continued the retreat to Culpeper. His corps held the advanced position at Fairfax Court-House and Centreville. He commanded the 4th grand reserve division until that organization was abolished, when he resumed command of the 11th corps, and took leave of absence on account of failing health, and was superseded by Gen. Oliver O. Howard. In June, 1863, he took command of the reserve army of Pennsylvania, and organized a corps of 10,000 men to aid in repelling Lee's invasion. In February, 1864, President Lincoln appointed him to the command of the Department and the Army of West Virginia. He fitted out an expedition that operated under Gen. George Crook in the Kanawha valley, and led a smaller one of 7,000 men through the Shenandoah valley against Lynchburg and sustained success. He was defeated at Palmyra, and captured the bridge at New Market. He was thereupon relieved, and in June, 1864, put in command of the division guarding Harper's Ferry. He repelled the attack of Gen. Jubal A. Early on Maryland Heights, but was relieved of his command soon afterward, and retired to Bethlehem, Pa., to recruit his health. He resigned his commission on 4 May, 1865, and became editor of the Building News. He removed to New York in September, 1867, he removed to New York city. In 1859 he was the Republican candidate for secretary of state in New York. He was appointed collector of internal revenue in May, 1857, and in October was elected register of the city of New York. After his three years' term expired he lectured, and edited a weekly paper. Since 1856 he has been an adherent of the Democratic party, and in 1888 was appointed pension-agent in New York city. He contributed a memoir of his part in the German revolution to Friedrich Hecker's "Erhebung des Volkes in Baden für die deutsche Republik" (Basel, 1848), and while in Switzerland published a republican brochure entitled "Fürstenstaat und Volkstaat" (St. Gall, 1848), the circulation of which was for-bidden in Germany, and the author was sentenced to 'contumacia' to four years' imprisonment.—His brother, Albert, soldier, b. in Sinsheim, Baden, 13 Nov., 1827; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 15 March, 1884, was graduated at the military academy at Carlsruhe in 1845, and served as an officer in the grand-ducal army. He was sentenced to a year's confinement in the fortress of Kaiserslautern for sympathy with the revolutionary movement, but was liberated in time to take part in the general uprising of the army and people in 1849 in command of a regiment of volunteers. He emigrated to England, and in 1852 came to the United States. Joining the 2d New Jersey volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, he was elected captain. After taking part in the battle of Bull Run, he assisted in organizing a New York regiment, and afterward organized and commanded a regiment of Missouri cavalry militia, and was stationed for some time at Waynesville, Mo., in command of a brigade. He was made U.S. land-recorder after the war, and was appointed adjutant-general of Missouri by Gov. Gratz Brown. He was connected with the press as editorial writer and correspondent, and published a volume of German poems (St. Louis, 1803; enlarged ed., 1885).

SIGOURNEY, Joseph (1770–1815), Canadian archbishop, b. in Quebec, 8 Nov., 1778; d. there, 3 Oct., 1815. He studied philosophy and theology in the Seminary of Quebec, was ordained priest in Longueil, 28 March, 1802, and was appointed assistant pastor at Chambly, and subsequently at Longueil. In 1804 he became parish priest of St. Constant, and he was transferred to Sainte-Marie-de-Ramsay in 1807. He wrote and translated to Lake Champlain in 1806, to take charge of the French Canadians that had settled in its neighborhood, but in 1814 he was appointed pastor of Quebec. He was chosen confessor to Bishop Panet in 1826, named bishop of Fussala by a bull of Leo XII. the same year, and consecrated under this title on 20 May, 1827. He became administrator of the dioce on 13 Oct., 1832, and on 14 Feb., 1833, succeeded to the bishopric of Quebec. Bishop Sigourney excited hostility among part of his flock by his efforts to prevent the Irish from building a church in Quebe, and, after it was erected, by his refusal to visit it. During the cholera epidemic of 1833 he displayed the utmost zeal and devotion. The same year he secured Pierre Flavien Turgeon as his coadjutor, but the latter sickness and death in 1843. He was nominated to the British ministry, praying them to sanction his choice, was considered by a large number of his flock to be humiliating and unnecessary, as the approval of the English authorities in the case of Canadian bishops was no longer required. In 1844 the dioceses of Upper and Lower Canada were erected into an ecclesiastical province, on the death of the archbishop, and the dioceses of Montreal, Kingston, and Toronto were placed under the metropolitan jurisdiction of Quebec, which was created an archbishopric. Although the title of archbishop had been given to his two predecessors, he was the first that was entitled to it officiously. Several months after his nomination he received the pallium, which was brought to him from Rome. He showed great activity and disinterestedness during the conflagration that destroyed part of Quebec in 1845, sharing his means with those that were ruined; and during the ship fever of 1847 and 1848 he rallied his priests in his personal sacrifices for the victims. In 1849 he found it necessary, from physical weakness, to confide the administration of the archdiocese to his coadjutor. The pastoral and other letters of Archbishop Sigourney are published in the 30th volume of the "Mandements des évêques de Québec," which also contains a biography.

SIGOURNEY, Lydia Huntley, author, b. in Norwich, Conn., 1 Sept., 1791; d. in Hartford, Conn., 10 June, 1865. She was the daughter of Ezekiel Huntley, a soldier of the Revolution. She resided at the age of three and a half years wrote simple verses. After receiving a superior education at Norwich and Hartford, she taught for five years a select class of young ladies in the latter city. In 1815, at the suggestion and under the patronage of Daniel Wadsworth, she published her first volume, "Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse." In 1819 she became the wife of Charles Sigourney, a Hartford writer. She wrote commonly of literary and artistic tastes. Without neglecting her domestic duties, she thereon devoted her leisure to literature, at first to gratify her own inclinations and subsequently, after her husband had lost the greater part of his fortune, to add to her income. She soon attained a reputation that secured for her books a ready sale. In her posthumous "Letters of Life" (1846) she enumerates forty-six distinct works, wholly or partially from her pen, besides more than 2,000 articles in prose and verse that she had contributed to nearly 300 periodicals. Several of her books also attained a wide circulation in England, and they were also much read on the continent. She received from the queen of the French a handsome diamond bracelet as a token of that sovereign's esteem. Her biography is not of the highest order. It portrays in graceful and often felicitous language the emotions and sympathies of the heart, rather than the higher conceptions of the intellect. Her prose is graceful and elegant, and is modelled to a great extent on that of Addison and the essayists who, in her youth, were regarded as the standards of polite literature. All her writings were penned in the interest of a pure morality, and many of them were decidedly religious. Perhaps no American writer has been more frequently called upon for gratuitions; occasional poems of all kinds. To these requests she generally acceded, and often greatly to her own inconvenience. But it was not only through her literary labors that Mrs. Sigourney became known. Her whole life was one of active and earnest philanthropy. The poor, the sick, the needy, the blind, the idiot, the slave and the convict were the objects of her constant care and benefaction. Her pensions were numerous, and not one of them was ever forgotten. During her early married life, she economized in her own wardrobe and personal luxuries that she might be able to relieve the needy, while later in her career she saved all that was not absolutely needed for home comforts and expenses for the same purpose. Her character and worth were highly appreciated in the city that for more than fifty years was her home. She never left it after her marriage, except when in 1840 she visited Europe, a record of which journey she published in "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands."
Sikes, William Wirt, author, b. in Watertown, Jefferson co., N. Y., in 1836; d. in London, England, 19 Aug., 1888. In childhood he was an invalid, and he was to a great extent self-educated. He learned type-setting in Watertown at the age of fourteen, and ever afterward was engaged in journalism or other literary occupations. He contributed largely to newspapers in Utica, working at the same time as a type-setter, thence went to Chicago, and was employed on the "Times" and "Evening Journal." At the age of twenty-four he was appointed state inspector of the Illinois. In 1867, he came to New York, was employed on various journals, and became an earnest student of the lower classes of city life. He wrote many poems, and published stories of adventure in the "Youth's Companion" and "Oliver Optic's Magazine. At one time he purchased an interest in a paper called "City and Country," published at Nyack, N. Y., which he edited and filed, to a considerable extent, with his own contributions in prose and poetry. He married Olive Logan (q. v.) on 19 Dec., 1871. Mr. Sikes was an incessant and conscientious worker. He was known by his intimate friends to have employed as many as thirty pen-names in contributing to the American press. He was the author of a series of historical and biographical works under a female signature. He was appointed U. S. consul to Cardiff, Wales, by President Grant in June, 1876, which post he held until his death. Shortly after his appointment he began a series of papers on Welsh history, archaeology, and social conditions, which attracted wide attention, and the works that he subsequently published in London, on these or kindred topics were as well received by the critics. He was an accomplished art critic, and his criticism of the Wiertz gallery of Brussels, which he contributed to "Harper's Magazine," has been selected by the authorities of that institution for printing with their catalogue. He was the author of "A Book for the Winter Evening Fireside" (Watertown, 1858); "One Poor Girl: the Story of Thousands" (Philadelphia, 1859); "British Goblins: Welsh Fairy Mythology" (London, 1860); "Rambles and Studies in Old South Wales" (1881); and "Studies of Assassination" (1881).

Sillman, James Bailey, lawyer, b. in Bedford, Westchester co., N. Y., 9 Oct., 1819; d. in New York city, 4 Feb., 1888. He was graduated at Yale in 1845, studied law, and after serving as a journalist in India, he returned to the United States in 1847 and afterward establishing a good practice. Prior to the civil war he caused much excitement by introducing resolutions against slavery in the New York diocesan convention of the Protestant Episcopal church. After the war he became greatly interested in religious matters, and was at one time identified with the prohibition movement. He was frequently engaged in the study of the law in the courts of his state. As an old man he frequently taught school. He was a member of the Old Yale Alumni Society. He was a great believer in the abolition of slavery.
everything he undertook, he was unusually successful, and a number were released at different times through his influence.
SILL, Edward Rowland, educator, b. in Windson, Conn., 29 April, 1841; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 27 Feb., 1887. He was graduated at Yale in 1861, and, owing to feeble health, resided on the Pacific coast till July, 1866, when he returned to the east, and, after studying theology at Harvard divinity-school for some time, devoted himself to literary work in New York city. After teaching for three years in a New York city boarding school, he was appointed principal of the high-school at Oakland, Cal., in 1871, and in 1874 was appointed professor of the English language and literature in the University of California, where he remained for eight years. He resigned his chair in 1882 to resume literary work, and returned to Curahoga Falls, where he remained until his death, which occurred in a hospital at Cleveland after he had undergone an operation. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps says: "He has left, I think, no volume but the 'Booklet,' as he used to call it, privately printed as a farewell to his friends in California. . . .
It contains some of the most delicate, most finished, and most musical poetic work that the country has produced. . . . He was personally beloved and esteemed, and his name has never since the day he was chosen has been in the mouths of men. The volume referred to is 'The Hermitage, and other Poems' " (New York, 1867).
SILL, John Mahelon Berry, educator, b. in Black Rock, Erie co., N. Y., 23 Nov., 1831. He was educated at Jonesville, and at the Michigan state normal school, of which he was the first male graduate, concluding his course of study in 1854.
He also received the honorary degree of A. M. from the University of Michigan in 1871. From his graduation until 30 June, 1863, he was professor of the English language and literature in the Michigan state normal school. He was then chosen superintendent of the public schools of Detroit, which office he held until 1865. In 1865-'75 he was principal of the Detroit female seminary, and from the latter year until his resignation in 1886 he was again superintendent of the public schools. Since that date he had been principal of the Michigan state normal school. He was president of the Michigan state teachers' association in 1891-'2, a member for two years of the Detroit board of education, and one of the board of examiners of the University of Michigan in 1897-'9. Mr. Sill has published "Synthesis of the English Sentence" (New York, 1856), and "Practical Lessons in English" (1880).
SILL, Joshua Woodrow, soldier, b. in Chilcothe, Ohio, 6 Dec., 1831; d. near Murfreesboro, Tenn., 31 Dec., 1862. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, assigned to the ordnance, and, after being on duty at Watervieet arsenal, ran for a short time at Fort Wisconsin, was a professor of geography, history, and ethics from 23 Sept., 1854, till 29 Aug., 1857. He was promoted
2d lieutenant in 1854, and 1st lieutenant in 1856.
He was engaged in routine duty at various arsenals and ordnance depots until 25 Jan., 1861, when he resigned to accept the professorship of mathematics, being one of the first to enter the newly organized Polytechnic school at the city of New York. In the spring of 1862 he went south with the 33d Ohio volunteers, after taking part in the battle of Rich Mountain on 11 July. From September, 1861, till September, 1862, he participated in the operations in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama, after 30 Nov., 1861, being in command of a brigade.
On 16 July, 1862, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and in the latter part of autumn and winter he took part in the battle of Perryville, the pursuit of Gen. Braxton Bragg's army, and the Tennessee campaign of the Army of the Cumberland. He was killed at the battle of Stone Rivner while endeavoring to rally his men.
SILLE, Nicasius de, lawyer, b. in Holland about 1690. He was commissioned by the Dutch West India Company for the exploration of the their provincial government of New Amsterdam, and arrived in that town on 24 July. He was a thorough statesman and an experienced lawyer, and, having built a large house on the corner of Broad street and Exchange place, entertained his friends in the same elegant manner as that to which he had been accustomed in the Hague. De Sille brought to this country more silver plate than any one before him, and took special pride in its exhibition. He built the first stone house in New Utrecht, resided there for many years, and left a brief history of the settlement of that town.
SILLERY, Noël Brulart de, French missionary, b. in France in December, 1577; d. there, 26
Sept., 1640. He belonged to a noble family in France, at an early age entered the country of Malta, and was afterward ambassador at Madrid and Rome. He finally renounced the world, became a priest, and devoted his large fortune to works of charity. The Jesuits having suggested to him the founding of a town in Canada for Indian converts, he was pleased with the idea, and in 1635 sent workmen to Quebec to execute the plan. The result was the establishment of the town that bears his name. In a few years it was filled with Algon-quins Christians, who cleared a large tract around it, and were taught the duties of civilized society.

art de Sillery, Chevalier de Malte, et Bailly Commandeur Grand' Croix dans l'Ordre" (Paris, 1643).
SILLIMAN, Gold Selleck, soldier, b. in Fairfield, Conn., 7 May, 1732; d. there, 21 July, 1790.
His father, Judge Ebenezer Silliman (1707-'75), was graduated at Yale in 1727, and there stud-
ed theology, but turned his attention to law.
In 1730 he was sent as deputy to the general assembly, and in 1739-'66 was a member of the house of assistants, after which he returned to the lower house, of which he was speaker for many years. He was annually chosen as a member of the superior court of the colony from 1743 to 1766, and held the rank of major in the 4th regiment of militia. His son, Gold, was graduated at Yale in 1752, and, after being educated as a lawyer, became attorney for the crown in Fairfield county during colonial times. He had interested himself in miliitary affairs, and at the beginning of the Revolutionary war was colonel of the militia. During the greater part of the war he held the rank of brigadier-general, and was charged with the defence of the southwestern frontier of Connecticut, which, owing to the long occupation of New York city by the British, was a duty that required much vigilance. He served at the head of his regiment in the battle of Long Island, and also in that of White Plains, and he was also located in the rear-guard. In 1777 he was active in repelling the raid on Danbury. In May, 1779, a party that was sent from Lloyd's neck by Sir Henry Clinton surprised him in his own house, and for a year he remained a prisoner on parole at Flatbush and Gravesend, Long Island. Subsequently he was exchanged.—His son, Gold Sel-Silliman, lawyer, b. in Fairfield, Conn., 26 Oct., 1777; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 3 June, 1866, was graduated at Yale in 1796, and then studied law. He entered upon the practice of his profession in Newport, R. I., where he had a large and successful business until 1813, when he came to New York city, where he engaged in commercial pursuits. On retiring from this occupation, he settled in Brooklyn, where for several years he held the office of postmaster.

—Another son, Benjamin, scientist, b. in North Stratford (now Trumbull), Conn., 8 Aug., 1779; d. in New Haven, Conn., 24 Nov., 1864, was graduated at Yale in 1796, and, after spending a year at home, taught at Wethersfield, Conn. In 1798 he returned to New Haven, where he began the study of law with Simeon Baldwin, and in 1799 was appointed tutor at Yale, which place he held until he was admitted to the bar in 1802. Natural science was at that time beginning to attract the attention of educators, and, at the solicitation of President Dwight, he abandoned the profession of law and devoted himself to science.

In September, 1802, he was chosen professor of chemistry and natural history at Yale, with permission to qualify himself for teaching these branches by reading a list of books from Prof. John MacLean (q. v.), of Princeton. He proceeded to Philadelphia, where, during two winters, he studied chemistry under Prof. James Woodhouse, then professor of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania. In 1804 he delivered a partial course of lectures on chemistry, and during the following year gave a complete course. He went abroad on leave of absence in March, 1805, to procure scientific books and apparatus, and spent about a year in study in Edinburgh and London, also visiting the continent and making the acquaintance of distinguished men of science. On his return he devoted himself to the duties of his chair, which included chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, until 1853, when he was made professor emeritus, but, at the special request of his colleagues, continued his lectures on geology until 1855, when he was succeeded by his son-in-law, James D. Dana. While in Edinburgh he became interested in the discussions, then at their height, between the Wernerians and Huttonians, and attended lectures on geology; and on his return he began a study of the mineralogical structure of the vicinity of New Haven. About 1808 he persuaded the corporation of Yale to purchase the cabinet of minerals of Benjamin D. Perkins, and a few years later he secured the loan of the magnificent collection of George Gibbs (q. v.), which in 1825 became the property of the college. His scientific work, which was extensive, began with the examination in 1807 of the meteor that fell near Weston, Conn. He procured fragments of, which he made a chemical analysis, and he wrote the earliest and best authenticated account of the fall of a meteor in America. In 1811 he began an extended course of experiments with the oxy-hydric or compound blow-pipe that was invented by Robert Hare, and he succeeded in melting many of the most refractory minerals, notably those containing alkalies and alkaline earths, the greater part of which had never been reduced before. After Sir Humphry Davy's discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalies, Prof. Silliman repeated the experiments and obtained for the first time in this country the metals sodium and potassium. In 1822, while engaged in a series of observations on the action of a powerful voltaic battery that he had made, similar to Dr. Hare's "deflagrator," he noticed that the charcoal points of the negative pole increased in size toward the positive pole, and, on further examination, he found that there was a surrounding cavity on the point of the latter. He inferred, therefore, that an actual transfer of the matter of the charcoal points from one to another took place, and, on careful examination, he found that the charcoal had been fused. This fact of the fusion of the carbon in the voltaic arc was long disputed in Europe, but is now universally accepted. In 1830 he explored Wyoming valley and its coal-formations, examining about one hundred mines and localities of mines; in 1832-3 he was engaged under a commission from the secretary of the treasury in a scientific examination on the subject of the culture and manufacture of sugar, and in 1836 he made a tour of investigation among the gold-mines of theignite region of Nevada

In 1808 in New Haven, where he delivered a course in chemistry. He delivered his first course in Hartford in 1834, and in Lowell, Mass., in the autumn of that year. During the years that followed he lectured in Salem, Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, St. Louis, New Orleans, and elsewhere in the United States. In 1836 he opened the Lowell institute with a course of lectures on geology, and for the three following years he lectured there on chemistry. This series was without doubt the most brilliant of the kind that was ever delivered in this country, and its influence in developing an interest in the growing science was very great. Many of the present leaders in science trace their first inspiration to these popular positions of Prof. Silliman. Through his influence in 1830 the historical paintings of Col. John Trumbull, and the building in which they were formerly deposited (now the college treasury), were procured for Yale. He opposed slavery in all its forms. Among the various colonies sent out from the eastern states during the Kansas troubles was one from New Haven, and, at a meeting held prior to its departure in April, 1856, the discovery was made that the party was unprovided with rifles. A subscription was proposed at once, and Prof. Silliman spoke in favor of it. This significant action was soon noised abroad, and, owing to the strong feeling between the partisans of slavery and those that would be followed by it, he was elected to the U. S. Senate. During the civil war he was a firm supporter of President Lincoln, and exerted his influence toward the abolition of slavery. The degree of M. D. was conferred on him by Bowdoin in 1818, and that of LL. D. by Middlebury in 1826. Prof. Silliman was chosen first president in 1849 of the American association for the advancement of science, which has since grown into the American association for the advancement of science, and he was one of the corporate members named by congress in the formation of the National academy of sciences in 1863. Besides his connection with other societies in this country and abroad, he was corresponding member of the Geological societies of Great Britain and France. In 1818 he founded the "American Journal of Science," which he conducted as sole editor until 1838, and as senior editor until 1846, when he transferred the journal to his son and to James D. Dana. This journal is now the oldest scientific periodical in the United States. Prof. Silliman edited three editions of William Henry's "Elements of Chemistry" (Boston, 1808-'14), also three editions of Robert Bakewell's "Introduction to Geology" (New Haven, 1829, 1833, and 1839), and was the author of "Journals of Travels in England, Holland, and Scotland" (New York, 1810); "A Short Tour between Hart- ford and Quebec in the Summer of 1809" (2 vols., New Haven, 1810); "Elements of Chemistry in the Order of Lectures given in Yale College" (2 vols., New Haven, 1830-1); "Consistency of Discoveries of Modern Geology with the Sacred History of the Creation and Deluge" (London, 1857); and "Narrative of a Visit to Europe in 1851" (2 vols., 1853). He was called by Edward Everett the "Nestor of American Science." Prof. Silliman was married twice. His first wife was Harriet Trumbull, the daughter of the second Gov. Jonathan Trumbull. One of his daughters married Prof. Oliver P. Hubbard, and another Prof. James D. Dana. A bronze statue of Prof. Silliman was erected on the Yale grounds in front of Farnam college in 1884. See "Life of Benjamin Silliman," by George P. Eaton (Boston, 3 vols., New York, 1868); "Benjamin's son, Benjamin Parry, Jr. (1816-1884), was graduated at Yale in 1837, and at once became assistant to his father, under whom he had served in a similar capacity during the explorations in the gold region of Virginia in 1836. Some of the lectures in the departments of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology were delivered by him, and he also devoted much of his time to the study of advanced science, and in consequence the School of applied chemistry was organized, with himself as its professor of chemistry, without salary. The movement was successful, and in 1847 the Yale scientific school was formed on the basis of this beginning, which, since 1890, in recognition of the gifts of Joseph E. Sheftel, has borne his name. Prof. Silliman continued a member of the faculty of the scientific school until 1869, except during the years 1849-'54, when he held the chair of medical chemistry and toxicology in the medical department of the University of Louisville, Ky. In 1854 he was called to give instruction in the academic and medical departments of Yale, in consequence of the resign- ing of Prof. Samuel Williston, and in general and applied chemistry in the college until 1870, but retained the appointment in the medical department until his death. On the invitation of citizens of New Orleans, he delivered in 1845-'6 what is believed to have been the first series of lectures on agricultural chemistry in the United States, and subsequently he gave popular lectures on scientific topics through the country. Prof. Silliman was a member of the common council of New Haven in 1843-9, and one of the trustees of the Peabody museum of natural history. His scientific work included many investigations in mineralogy, at first chiefly from the chemical side, including researches on meteorites as well as studies in geology and physical optics. Later he turned his attention more to applied science, including the examination of mines and the preparation of reports on questions connected with the chemical arts and manufactures: and he frequently appeared as an expert in the courts. In 1849 Prof. Silliman became one of the state chemists of Connecticut, and in that capacity was employed as a scientific witness in the courts. The collection of minerals that he accumulated during his expeditions over the country was sold in 1868 to Cornell university, where it bears the name of the Silliman cabinet. The mineralogical collections of Yale were indelibly to him the fruits of his personal solicitation of funds, the Baron Leder- er collector was secured in 1843 for the college. The honorary degree of M. D. was conferred on him by the University of South Carolina in 1849, and that of L.L. D. by Jefferson medical college in 1884. Prof. Silliman was a member of many scientific societies, and was secretary of the American association of geologists and naturalists in 1843-4. He was named as one of the original members of the National academy of sciences by act of congress in 1863, and served on several of its most important committees, notably that appointed in 1882 to report on the use of sorghum as a source of sugar. Prof. Silliman had charge of the chemical, mineralogical, and geological departments of the New York museum of natural history from 1853, and at that time edited with Charles R. Goodrich "World of Science, Art, and Industry" (New York, 1853), and "The Progress of Science and Mechanism" (1854), in which the chief results of the great exhibition were recorded. In 1884-'85 Prof. Silliman became associated in the editorship of the "American Journal of Science," and was a member of the executive committee from the latter year until his death. His scientific papers were nearly one hundred in number, of which over fifty were published in the "American Journal of Science," and they cover a wide range of topics. In addition, he published "First Principles of Chemistry" (Philadelphia, 1846; revised ed., 1856), of which more than 50,000 copies were sold; "Principles of Physics" (1848); revised ed., 1869); and "American Contributions to Chemistry" (1875).—The second Gold Selleck's son, Benjamin Douglas, lawyer, b. in Newport, R. I., 14 Sept., 1805, was graduated at Yale in 1824, and then studied law with James Kent and his son, William Kent, until 1829, when he was admitted to the bar. He opened an office in New York during that year, and has since been steadily engaged in the practice of his profession in that city, with his residence in Brooklyn. He has often served as a delegate from Kings county to National and state conventions of the Whig and Republican parties, including the one at Harrisburg in 1839, at which William Henry Harrison was nominated for the presidency. He was nominated for the Whig candidate for the presidency of the United States in 1888, and was nominated by the Whigs for congress in 1843, but failed of election, although he led the ticket of his party at the polls. In 1852 he received, but declined, the Whig nomination for the state senate. During the civil war he was an earnest supporter of the government, and in March, 1863, he was appointed by President Lincoln Gen. Lew. S., attorney for New Jersey. He held this office until September, 1866, and during that time argued in behalf of the government important questions that grew out of the civil war. In 1872 he was a member of the commission for revising the constitution of the state, and, as a chairman of one committee and a member of others, took an active part in the proceedings of that body. He was nominated in 1873 by the Republican party as their candidate for the office of attorney-general of New York, but failed of election. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Columbia in 1873, and by Yale in 1874. During his career in the state legislature he introduced the charter of Greenwood cemetery, and he is a trustee of that corporation. He has long been connected with the Long Island historical society, of which he is a director, and for more than twenty years he has been president of the Brooklyn club. Mr. Silliman was president of the New England society of Brooklyn from its beginning until 1876, when it was reorganized. He is also a member of the Yale alumni association of Long Island. He was one of the founders of the New York bar association, one of its vice-presidents, and a trustee of various charitable and benevolent associations.

Benjamin Douglass's brother, Augustus Eli, financier, b. in Newport, R. I., 11 April, 1807; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 30 May, 1884, early entered commercial life and became connected with the Merchants' bank of New York. He was its president from 1857 until 1868, when failing health compelled his retirement from active business. He took part in the establishment of the Clearing house association in 1833, and was one of the committee that during the first six years of its existence, held the patent for its machinery. He was a member of the Long Island historical society, and was in 1849-51 president of the New York mercantile library association. He published "A Gallop among American Scenery, or Sketches of American Scenes and Military Adventure" (New York, 1843; enlarged ed., 1881), and translated from the French "Péron's Conversations with Mr. Pike, the Truth of Our Religion with Letters on the Immortality of the Soul and the Freedom of the Will" (1869). In honor of the memory of his mother he bequeathed to Yale university nearly $100,000 for the foundation of an annual series of lectures in that university, "the general tendency of which may be such as will illustrate the presence and wisdom of God as manifested in the history of mankind."

SILLIMAN, Justus Mitchell, mining engineer, b. in New Canaan, Conn., 25 Jan., 1842; d. in Easton, Pa., 15 April, 1896. He studied at New Canaan academy, enlisted at the beginning of the civil war, and served for three years, being wounded at Gettysburg. At the close of the war he settled in Troy, N. Y., where he taught in an academy, and was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1870 with the degree of M. E. In September of that year he was called to the charge of the department of mining engineering and graphics in Lafayette college, which place he held till 1896. Prof. Silliman invented an instrument for orthographic, climograph, and crystallographic projection, also a water manometer and an aneroid barometer, all of which were patented. He was a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science and a member of the American institute of mining engineers, and has been president of the Lehigh valley microscopical society. His special work included various investigations, of which the examination of the Bessemer flame with cathode rays and the use of the microphotometer, and also a study of the profession, and the professional paper's man's writings were confined to transactions of societies that have been published in the transactions of societies that have been published in the Newberryport, Massasau William, architect, b. a good education, esp. 7 Aug., 1825. He received and devoted himself feitally in the arts of design, tectural plans for public the preparation of architect buildings, in which business he established himself at Boston, Mass., in 1851. In the course of the next twenty years more than 200 church edifices were built or repaired under his superintendence, besides other public buildings, including the capital at Montpelier, Vt. (1857), the Soldiers' monument at Cambridge, Mass. (1870), and Buchtel college, Akron, Ohio (1872). After the earthquake in Charleston, S. C., in 1886, he was called to that city professionally and restored six of the church edifices that had been partially destroyed. In 1892 he began to preach to Universalist congregations, and in 1896 he was ordained a clergyman of that faith. He has published "The Lectures and Sermon in the Eastern Sermon (Boston, 1856); "Text-Book of Modern Carpentry" (1858); "Warming and Ventilation" (1860); "Atkinson Memorial," a series of eighteen discourses (1861); "The Conference Melodist" (1863); "Cantica Sacra" (1865); "Service of the Church of the Redeemer," at Brighton, Mass. (1867); and, with Lee L. Powers, "Cathedral Towns of England, Ireland, and Scotland" (1883). He died, with George M. Harding, an improved edition of Shaw's "Civil Architecture" (1852).

SILSBEE, Joshua S., actor, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 4 Jan., 1815; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 22 Dec., 1855. He made his first appearance on the stage at Natchez, Miss., in the winter of 1834, and in the following summer he joined the "Odd Fellows Rose," at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia, in 1841. He appeared as a star soon afterward in Boston. Going to England in 1851, he was the first comedian to introduce Yankee characters on the stage in that country, opening at the Adelphi, London, in his favorite part of Jonathan Ploniboy. During his residence in England, Tom Taylor said to him, "I don't care for any man in the world, but if you give me this character for him the play that afterward became famous as "The American Cousin," though it is doubtful whether he ever appeared in it. After his death his widow brought the piece to the United States and sold it to Laura Keene. Soon afterward John Sleeper Clark brought out the play in Philadelphia, and from the disputed ownership arose a long and bitter litigation. Laura Keene subsequently sold, or gave, her copy to Edward A. Sothern. The Yankee part was thus probably first played not by Silsbee, but by Joseph Jefferson, under Miss Keene's management.

SILSBEE, Nathaniel, senator, b. in Essex county, Mass., in 1775; d. in Salem, Mass., 1 July, 1859. His father, Nathaniel, was a shipmaster in Salem. The son engaged in mercantile pursuits, and amassed a fortune. He served frequently in each branch of the Massachusetts legislature, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, to 3 March, 1821. He then declined a renomination. He was in the state senate in 1825-6, and was elected and re-elected to the united senate, serving from 1 Dec., 1826, to 3 March, 1835. He was a firm supporter of the administration of John Quincy Adams.

SILVA, Francis Augustus, artist, b. in New York city, 4 Oct., 1835; d. there, 31 March, 1866. He worked as a sign-painter until the opening of the civil war, when he entered the National army. At the close of the war he settled in New York and devoted himself to the painting of marine subjects. He was elected a member of the Watercolor society in 1872. Among his works are "Gray Day at Cape Ann"; "Sunrise in Boston Harbor"; "New London Light"; "September Day on the Coast" (1879); "Old Town by the Sea" (1880); "Old Connecticut Port" (1882); "Passing Showers" (1885); and "Near Atlantic City" (1886).
SILVA, José Laurencio, Venezuelan soldier, b. in Tucaco, 7 Sept., 1792; d. in Chirigua, 27 Feb., 1873. When the revolutionary junta of Caracas was installed, 19 April, 1810, Silva offered his services and was appointed sergeant in the forces sent against the royalists of Coro. He served under the orders of the Marquis del Toro, and on his return was made a lieutenant, taking part in the campaign of 1811-12 under Gen. Miranda, as part of the capitulation of the latter. Silva escaped to the plains of Guirico, where he gathered a guerilla force and continued to oppose the Spaniards till he joined Bolivar on the latter's invasion of Venezuela in 1813. Silva participated in the battles of Taguaumes, Aranare, Barbula, and Mosquito, and in the famous defense of La Victoria, 15 Feb., 1814, where his troop of 190 men was reduced to 20. After his recovery from his wounds he was assigned to another regiment, with which he participated in the defense of San Mateo and the first battle of Carabobo. After the defeat of La Puerta and the capitulation of Valencia, Silva retired to Guirico. He was captured by the Spanish under Vicente and condemned to death, but escaped and joined Paz in Apare, and in 1820, he served till 1821. On Bolivar's return from Colombia, Silva joined him and participated as lieutenant-colonel in the battle of Carabobo, 24 June, 1821. In 1822 he marched with Bolivar to southern Colombia, participated in the battle of Bomamba, 7 April, 1822, and went with the division, which returned in 1825, to aid the Peruvian patriots. In the battle of Junin he was at the head of the Hussars de Colombia, and was promoted colonel, and after the battle of Ayacucho he was made a brigadier of Peru and Colombia. On this occasion he was officially styled the hero of Junin. He continued to serve in Peru, accompanying Sucre in his entry into La Paz, after which he returned to Colombia, and in 1828 was sent to quell an insurrection in Guayana. On his return he was promoted major-general, and after the disintegration of Colombia he demanded a passport to Venezuela with the regiments of grenadiers and hussars of Apare, which refused to continue service in New Granada. As a defender of Bolivar, whose niece he had married in 1827, he was exiled in 1831 and in 1833 returned to Caracas in the revolution of 1835, but soon submitted to the government. In 1849 he commanded the government troops against Gen. Paz, with whom he signed a convention at Macapo, and, when the same was violated by President Monagas, he resigned and retired to his farm. In 1853 he was promoted lieutenant-general by congress, and was secretary of war; in the next year he was appointed to the government council, but soon resigned and retired to his country-seat.

SILVER, Thomas, inventor, b. in Greenwich, Cumberland co., N. J., 17 June, 1813; d. in New York city, 12 April, 1888. His parents were Quakers. As a boy he displayed unusual mechanical skill, and when he was only nine years old his toy went before him and made a turn of the wheel of the device. Among his inventions, upward of fifty in number, granted him, were those for a grain-dryer, a fuel-saving heat-chamber, a gas-consumer, a tension-regulator, a machine for paying out submarine cables, a machinery-lubricator, a rotary ascending-railway, and clockwork for mechanical lamps. Models of some of these are at the patent-office, Washington, D. C., the South Kensington museum, London, and the Paris conservatoire des arts. The loss of the steam-ship "San Francisco," bound to California with troops in 1854, suggested his best-known invention. That vessel was wrecked through her engines becoming disabled, and he designed such engines. Mr. Silver devised his "marine governor," which was adopted by the French navy in 1855. It is also applied to many stationary engines, notably to those in the press-rooms of the great dailies in large cities. It was adopted by the British admiralty in 1864, and the example has been followed by the navies of all the chief powers, except the United States. Mr. Silver also suggested a plan of channel transit for the carrying of coal by car direct from Wales to France, in which Napoleon III. was interested, but it was lost to that country by the surrender at Sedan. Mr. Silver was made a member of the Franklin institute of Philadelphia in 1855. He received the James Watt medal from the Royal polytechnic society of London in 1884, and was pronounced by his "régulateur marine." He published "A Trip to the North Pole, or the Theory of the Origin of Icebergs" (New York, 1887).

SIMCOE, John Graves, British soldier, b. in Cocketer, England, 25 Feb., 1732; d. in Exeter, 26 Oct., 1806. His father, a captain in the navy, was killed at Quebec during its siege by Wolfe. The son entered the army as ensign in 1771, and at the beginning of the American war purchased a captaincy in the 40th foot, which regiment he commanded at the battle of Brandywine, where he was wounded, as also at Monmouth. He raised a battalion called the Queen's rangers, which was drilled and disciplined in a superior manner for light and active service, and with which he did important service to the royal cause in the south. On 23 June, 1779, Sir Henry Clinton gave him the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In October, 1779, while on an expedition to destroy some boats, he was taken prisoner and narrowly escaped death. Col. Simcoe's corps was constantly in advance of the army, and performed a series of skilful and successful enterprises, and by his faithful service made a new town, and was included in the capitulation. After the war Simcoe's corps was disbanded, and the officers were placed on half-pay. He was governor of Upper Canada in 1791-4, and has been accused of promoting Indian hostilities against the United States in the northwestern territories. He was promoted colonel, 18 Nov., 1790, major-general, 3 Oct., 1794, lieutenant-general, 3 Oct., 1798, and was governor and commander-in-chief of Santo Domingo from December, 1796, till July, 1797, exerting himself successfully against the French, and to establish the financial and other interests of the colony. A lake of considerable size in Ontario and a county and town bear his name. He wrote and printed for private distribution a "History of the Operations of a Citizen, Governor, and Commander-in-chief of the United States, in the Northwest Territory" (Exeter, 1787; reprinted, with a memoir of the author, New York, 1844).

SIMITIÈRE, Pierre Eugène dn, artist, b. in Geneva, Switzerland; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Oct., 1874. He went to the West Indies about 1750, and, after spending nearly fifteen years there, to New York, and in 1766 to Philadelphia. Here he became well known as a collector of curiosities, and in 1768 was elected a member of the American philosophical society. His collection was so celebrated that in 1782 he opened it to the public under the name of the American museum. He was an artist of some ability, and painted numerous portraits, including one of Washington. His heads of thirteen notables—Washington, Baron Steuben, Silas Deane, Joseph Reed, Gouverneur Morris, Gen. Horatio Gates, John Jay, William H. Drayton, Henry Laurens, Charles Thomson, Samuel Huntington, John Dickinson, and Benedict Arnold—were introduced to public notice in a quarto volume (London, 1785). He painted also miniatures in water-color, and made some designs for publications. Soon after the Declaration of Independence he was employed by a committee of congress to furnish designs for a seal for the new republic. Subsequently he suggested another design, but neither was accepted. His valuable collection of manuscripts and broadsides, forming material for a history of the Revolution and comprising several volumes, is in the Philadelphia library. Princeton conferred upon him in 1781 the honorary degree of M. A.

SIMKINS, Arthur, legislator, b. on the eastern shore of Virginia about 1759; d. in Edgefield, S. C., in 1836. He emigrated to South Carolina early in his life, and, in order to support himself on Log creek, in Edgefield district. Having studied law and been admitted to the bar, he was made county court judge. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he took sides with the patriots, and his place, known as "Cedar Fields," was burned by the Tories. After the war he was chosen a member of the general assembly, and retained his seat for nearly twenty years. He was also a delegate to the convention that adopted the Federal constitution, and he voted against it on the ground that it took too much power from the states.

-His son, Eldred, lawyer, b. in Edgefield district, S. C., 29 Aug., 1799; d. there in 1832, was well educated at home, and subsequently attended the Litchfield, Conn., law-school, where he remained for more than three years. He then made himself thoroughly acquainted with the local laws of South Carolina, and was admitted to the bar, 7 May, 1805, beginning to practise at Edgefield courthouse in 1806, and soon winning a reputation. In 1812 he was elected lieutenant-governor, and five years later he was chosen a member of congress to represent South Carolina. While in congress, he had the honor of being a member of President Monroe's cabinet. He was re-elected and served from 8 Feb., 1818, till 3 March, 1821, but declined a second re-election, and retired in favor of his law-partner, George McDuffie. He was repeatedly a member of the legislature, and in 1825 prepared an act, which was passed, giving jurisdiction to certain courts to order the sale or division of the real estate of intestates not exceeding $1,000 in value. He was employed in many important cases, but was always of feeble health, and in later years unable to confine himself closely to his profession.

SIMMONS, Franklin, sculptor, b. in Webster, Me., 11 Jan., 1842. His boyhood was spent in Bath and Lewiston, and his love for sculpture was early developed. Having a facility for portraiture, he made his first attempts in that line. During the last two years of the civil war he was in Washington, where the members of the cabinet and officers of the army and navy sat to him for life-size medallions. They were cast in bronze, and many of them were purchased by the Union league of Philadelphia. In 1868 he went to Rome, Italy, where he has since resided. He visited his native land in 1888. His more important works are the statues of Roger Williams, in Washington and Providence; William King, for the state of Maine; Oliver P. Morton, in Indianapolis; Henry W. Longfellow (1883), in Portland; "Medusa" (1882); "Jochesbed with the Infant Moses"; "Grief and History," the group that surmounts the naval monument at Washington; "Galatea" (1884); "Penelope"; "Miriam"; "Washington at Valley Forge"; and "The Seraph Ab tidy," from "Paradise Lost" (1886). Among his portrait busts are those of Brooklynn, Thomas M. Sherman, David D. Porter, James G. Blaine, Frances Wayland, and Ulysses S. Grant (1886). The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by Bates college and also by Colby university.

SIMMONS, George Frederick, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 March, 1814; d. in Concord, Mass., 5 Sept., 1855. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and, after being employed as a tutor, prepared for the ministry at Cambridge divinity-school, where he completed his course in 1838. He was ordained the same year as an evangelist of the Unitarian denomination, and at once went to Mobile, Ala., where he began his ministry. Owing to his decided opposition to slavery, he remained there only until 1840, when he was obliged to fly from the city for a few months. On his return, in November, 1841, he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church at Waltham, Mass. Mean time he had become deeply interested in certain theological questions which he felt he could not solve while engaged in pastoral work, and so resigned in the spring of 1843 and sailed for Europe, where he remained until October, 1843, spending most of the time in France and Germany, and being brought much in contact with the German historian, Neander. In February, 1848, he was called to Springfield, Mass., as the successor of Dr. William B. O. Peabody. Here, while he was greatly admired by part of his congregation, others regarded him with less favor, and in 1851 he was compelled to resign, after preaching two sermons on a riotous assault that had been made in the town on George Thompson, the English anti-slavery apostle. In January, 1854, he was installed pastor of a church at Albany, N. Y., but in the summer of 1855 he was attacked by typhus fever, from the effects of which he never rallied. Mr. Simmons was distinguished by an acutely philosophical mind. He was a deep, thoughtful and reverent spirit. "I knew him well," said his classmate, Samuel Osgood, "loved him much, and respected him even more." He was retiring in his habits, and his somewhat unsocial nature was no doubt an obstacle in the way of his exercising a proper influence on his flock. He published "Who was Jesus Christ?" a tract (Boston, 1830); "Two Sermons on the Kind Treatment and on the Emancipation of Slaves, preached at Mobile, with a Prefatory Statement" (1849); "A Letter to the So-called 'Boston Churches'" (1840); "The Trinity," a lecture (1849); "Public Spirit and Mobs," two sermons delivered at Springfield on the Sunday after the Thompson riot (1851); and "Faith in Christ the Condition of Salvation" (1854). Six of his sermons were published in one volume soon after his death (Boston, 1855).

SIMMONS, James, law-reporter, b. in Middlebury, Vt., 11 June, 1821. He was graduated at Middlebury college in 1841, removed to Wisconsin, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Walworth county in 1843. Besides filing several minor causes, he was clerk of the county circuit court from 1861 till 1871. Mr. Simmons has published "Simmons's Wisconsin Digest" (Albany, 1868); "Supplements" to the same (1874-99); "Supplement to Wait's Digest, New York Reports" (1873-7 and 1882); and "Simmons's New Wisconsin Digest" (1886). He has also published several local histories, is the author of various articles in Wait's "Actions and Defences" (1878-9), and has edited "Digest of English Reports" (2 vols., Chicago, 1879). He was elected to the U. S. senate, and served from 31 May of the latter year till 3 March, 1847. Ten years later he was again elected to the senate as a Whig for the full term from 4 March, 1857, but he resigned in 1862.

SIMMONS, James Fowler, senator, b. in Little Compton, Newport co., R. I., 10 Sept., 1795; d. in Johnson, R. L., 10 July, 1864. He received a good English education, and was first a farmer, and subsequently a manufacturer. He was a member of the state house of representatives from 1828 till 1831, when he was chosen to the U. S. senate, and served from 31 May of the latter year till 3 March, 1847. Ten years later he was again elected to the senate as a Whig for the full term from 4 March, 1857, but he resigned in 1862.

SIMMONS, Joseph Edward, banker, b. in Troy, N. Y., 9 Sept., 1841. He was graduated at Williams in 1862, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1863. After practising in Troy until the close of 1865, he abandoned the profession and removed to New York city, where he has since engaged in banking. He became a member of the Stock exchange in 1872, and was elected its president in 1884. He was re-elected in 1885, but declined a renomination in 1886. He was appointed a commissioner of education in 1881, reappointed in 1885, and re-appointed in 1887, when he was elected president of the board of education in 1886, and re-elected in 1887-8. In the latter year he was also made president of the Fourth national bank of New York city. Mr. Simmons received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Norwich, Northfield, Vt., in 1885.

SIMMONS, William Hayne, poet, b. in South Carolina, March 3, 1832. He studied medicine in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, where he was graduated in 1866. He never practised his profession, but resided for some time in Charleston, S. C., whence he removed to East Florida. While in Charleston he published, anonymously, an Indian poem entitled "Onem." He is also the author of "A History of the Seminole Indians" (Baltimore, 1859), and "The Old Camp," (Baton Rouge, 1892). A series of metrical tales, "Wood-Notes from the West," remain in manuscript. Verses by both the brothers may be found in Davockick's "Cyclopedia of American Literature."

SIMMONS, William Johnson, educator, b. in Charleston, S. C., 29 June, 1849; d. 30 Oct., 1890. He was of African descent. After studying in Madison and Rochester universities, he was graduated at Howard university in 1873, taught in Washington and in Ocala, Fla., and in 1879 entered the ministry of the Baptist church. In that year he was elected to a chair in Lexington, Ky., and in 1880 he was elected president of the State university. He became editor of the "American Baptist" in 1882, called together and organized the American Baptist national convention in 1886, and was president of the colored National press convention in the same year. He was appointed district secretary of the American Baptist home mission society for the south in 1887. Wilberforce university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1885. Dr. Simmons published "Men of Mark" (Cleveland, Ohio, 1877), and a pamphlet on "Industrial Education" (1886), and also wrote a "History of the Colored Baptists of Kentucky."

SIMMS, Jeptha Root, author, b. in Canterbury, Conn., 31 Dec., 1807; d. in Port Plain, N. Y., 31 May, 1883. His father was a hat-manufacturer. The son was educated at an academy in a neighboring town. In 1829 he began the retail dry-goods business in that city, but, his health failing after three years, he removed to Schoharie county, N. Y., and entered into business there in 1832, but failed in 1834. For a few years after 1842 he filled the office of toll-collector for the New York and Erie canal at Fultonville, and for nine years he was ticket-agent for the New York Central railway at Port Plain. His spare hours were employed in writing historical and miscellaneous works, besides which he collected and labelled a large assortment of fossils, many of them rare, and sold them for $5,000 to the state of New York for the Geological museum at Albany. He was a corresponding member of the Oneida historical society, and rendered it much aid in collecting funds for the erection of the monument on the battle-field of Oriskany. He was a rapid writer and a voluminous contributor to the popular press throughout the state. He published "History of Schoharie County, N. Y." (Albany, 1845); "The American Spy, Nathan Hale" (1846); "Trappers of New York" (1850); and "The Frontiersmen" (2 vols., 1882-3). He also composed several poems, Fourth-of-July orations, and lectures on different topics, which were largely republished in the central counties of New York.—His nephew, Joseph, physiognomist, b. in Plainfield Centre, Otsego co., N. Y., 3 Sept., 1853, attended the academy at West Winfield, Herkimer co., N. Y., several terms. During four more he was employed in teaching, and in 1854 he began to lecture on physiognomy and physiology. From childhood the bent of his mind was toward the study of characteristics and external signs had shown itself in scanning and measuring the features of his companions. He studied medicine at the Universities of New York and Columbia, and was graduated in New York in 1871, then devoted himself to making and promulgating new discoveries in physiognomy. In pursuit of his study he afterward explored the United States, and in Europe, in March and April, 1873, continued his observations in Europe, Egypt, Nubia, Algiers, Morocco, Syria, Arabia, and Palestine. He has lectured with success in this country and abroad. From 1881 to 1884 he delivered scientific lectures in Melbourne, in Sydney, and in the Australasian colonies. In 1884 he gave up lecturing and visited Europe again, collecting new facts and preparing material for works on physiognomy and physiology. He has published a "Physiognomical Chart" for recording and reading character (Glasgow, 1873); "Nature's Revelations of Character" (London, 1874; several eds. in New York); a "Book of Scientific Lectures" on physiology and physiognomy (London, 1875); "Health and Character" (San Francisco, 1879); and "Practical and Scientific Photography" (1874).

SIMMS, William Gilmore, author, b. in Charleston, S. C., 17 April, 1806; d. there, 11 June, 1870. He was a precocious child, and his passion for writing, which continued unabated till his death, manifested itself as early as his seventh year. His whole academic education was received in the school of his native city, where he was for a time a clerk in a drug and chemical house. Though his first aspirations were for medicine, he studied law at eighteen, but never practised to any extent. In 1827 he published in Charleston a volume of "Lyrical and other Poems"—his first attempt in literature. In 1829 he became editor and partial owner of the "Charleston City Gazette," which took the Union side in politics in nullification days. In 1829 he brought out another volume of poems, "The Vision of Cortez," and in 1830 "The Tricolor." His paper proved a bad investment, and through its failure, in 1833, he was left in poverty. Thenceforth he determined to devote himself to literature, and he began that long series of volumes which did not end till within three years of his death. Accordingly, he published a poem entitled "Atlantis, a Tale of the Sea" (New York, 1832), the best and longest of all his poetic works. But Mr. Simms is mainly known as a writer of fiction. His pen was never idle. The scene of his novels is almost wholly southern, and marked invariably with local color: many of them are historical, but for the most part they aim to reproduce the various types of southern and southwestern life. He spent half of the year on his plantation, "Woodlands," near Midway, S. C., seen in the illustration, where he had a beautiful home, and the "live-oaks" and "long-leaved pines" peculiar to his native state. Here he dispensed a wide hospitality, and wrote most of his works. He was for many years a member of the legislature, and in 1846 was elected for lieutenant-governor by only one vote. Mr. Simms had immense fertility, a vivid imagination, and a true realistic handling of whatever he touched. But he was not a finished scholar, and, although Edgar A. Poe pronounced him the best novelist America had produced after Cooper, his style lacked finished elegance and accuracy. Yet he has done much in preserving the early history and traditions and local coloring of his native state. "The Yemassee" is considered his best novel. A fine bronze bust of Simms by Ward was unveiled at White Point garden, Charleston, 11 June, 1859, but he rests in an unmarked grave in Magnolia cemetery near the same city. Besides the works already mentioned, he published "Martin Faber" (New York, 1833); "The Book of My Lady, a Melange" (Philadelphia, 1838); "Guy Rivers" (2 vols., New York, 1834); "The Yemassee" (2 vols., 1835); "The Parisian" (3 vols., 1835); "Mellichampe" (2 vols., 1836); "Richard Hurdis" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1838); "Palayo" (New York, 1839); "Carl Werner, and other Tales" (2 vols., 1839); "Southern Passages and Pictures," poems (1839); "Border Beagles" (2 vols., 1840); "The Kinsman" (Philadelphia, 1841, republished as "The Scout," New York, 1854); "Confession, or the Wiggins of Georgia" (2 vols., 1842); "Beauchamp" (2 vols., 1842); "Helen Halsey" (1843); "Castle Dismal" (1845); "Count Julian" (2 vols., 1845); "Grouped Thoughts and Scattered Fancies," poems (Richmond, 1845); "The Wigwam and the Cabin, or Tales of the South" (2 vols., series, Charleston, 1845-6); "Arytos, or Songs and Ballads of the South" (1846); "Lays of the Palmetto" (1849); "Katherine Walton" (New York, 1851); "The Golden Christmas" (1852); "Marie de Berniere" (1853); "Father Abbott, or the Home Tourist" (1854); "Poems" (2 vols., 1854); "The Foragers" (1855); "The Maroon, and other Tales" (1855); "Charlemont" (1856); "Utah" (1856); and "The Cassique of Kiawah" (1860). In 1867 he edited "War Poetry of the South." He wrote a "History of South Carolina" (Charleston, 1840) and "South Carolina in the Revolution" (1854), and Lives of Francis Marion (New York, 1844), Capt. John Smith (1846), Chevalier Bayard (1848), and Gen. Nathanael Greene (1849). He wrote two dramas, "Nineteenth Century," and "Michael Bonhun, or the Fall of the Alama," which was acted in Charleston. He also wrote a "Geography of South Carolina" (1843). He edited "Seven Dramas ascribed to Shakespeare," with notes and introductions (1848), and contributed many reviews to periodicals, two volumes of which were afterwards collected (New York, 1845-6). A collected edition of part of his works has been published (19 vols., New York, 1859). His life has been written by Prof. William P. Trent in the "American Men of Letters" series (Boston, 1892).

SIMON, Etienne. Flemish explorer, b. in Bruges in 1747; d. in Geneva in 1808. He followed the sea for several years, and afterward fixed his residence in Rio Janeiro as a merchant. In 1792 he was granted a tract of land in the province of Espirito Santo, and sailed for Holland in search of colonists, but failed in the scheme, owing to the war that then raged on the continent, and, returning to Brazil in 1795, began to travel. After spending nine years thus he returned to Europe in 1804, and, settling in Switzerland, devoted the remainder of his life to arranging his notes. His work includes "Voyage à travers les provinces de Saint-Paul et d'Espirito Santo" (1805); "La domination Portugaise au Brésil" (1806); "Belem Para et Rio de Janeiro" (1807); and "Coup d'oeil historique sur les missions établies par les Jésuites dans le Paraguay" (1808).

SIMON, Pedro Antonio. Flemish historian, b. in Cambrai about 1560; d. in Colobnin, South America, about 1630. He entered the Franciscan order, and was sent, about 1590, as a missionary to New Granada, where he resided successively in Guacheta, Bogota, Serrezuela, Zipaquirá, and Menqueta, on the river, about fifteen miles north from the present city of Bogota. Father Simon became the historian of the Muscos or Chibcha Indians, among whom he lived for many years. His most interesting work contains a summary history of all the tribes that lived in the ancient empire of Cundinamarca, and describes their civilization, their arts, their monuments, and their manners. It contains also an analysis of the Puna dialect, which is altogether unknown today, and of which the only monument left is Simon himself. The "Histoire de la Nueva Granada," a dialect, which has nearly superseded the other dialects at the time of the Spanish conquest. Simon's work is the only one that gives details concerning the early history and condition of the tribes living in Cundinamarca before the conquest, as all other works that relate to that country have been lost, except a few books written among the Chibcha Indians by the missionaries Medrano and Aguado, and the part of the "Ellosos de Varones ilustres de Indias" of Castellanos that is devoted to Cundinamarca. The only one left referring to Cundinamarca is the incomplete relation of Lucas Fernandez de Pedrahiba (q. v.). Simon's work relating to Venezuela was published under the title "Noticias historiales de las Conquistas de Tierra firme" (Madrid, 1827).
The two other parts relating to Cundinamarca are yet in manuscript, the second in the library of the Royal historical society, and the third in the National Library of Madrid. Henri Ternaux-Colombina, although he says he never was an Indian, only have obtained copies, which he used for his "Essai sur l'ancien Cundinamarca" (Paris, 1842).

SIMOND, Alfred, South American botanist, b. in the province of São Paulo in 1740; d. in Rome, Italy, in 1801. His father, who was a Frenchman by birth, served in the Portuguese army, and obtained with his discharge a land-grant in the province of São Paulo; his mother was an Indian. The son was destined for the church, and was about to enter the Jesuit order when it was expelled from Brazil. Returning to his father's farm, he began there the study of agriculture and natural history, which he finished at Paris under the direction of Buffon, who induced him in 1776 to accompany Baron Malouet to Guiana. Here he was employed in draining marches, and established a model farm for the improvement of agricultural methods. After Malouet's withdrawal in 1780, Simond remained in the colony without government support, and for several years tried vainly to establish a settlement east of Essequibo river. Returning to France at the beginning of the revolution, he was instructed by the Constituent assembly's committee on foreign affairs to extend his mission to the disputed border-line between the French and Portuguese possessions in South America, and in 1795 he was sent to Guiana to draw a map of the basin of the Orinoco river. Simond's works include "Mémoire sur les limites véritables de la Guiane Française" (Paris, 1791); "Enumeratio plantarum in Guiana crescentum" (2 vols., 1793); "Conspicuum plantarum in Guiana et Americae occidentalis" (Lyon, 1797); and "Flora Brasiliensis exhibens characteres generum et specierum plantarum in provincia Sancti Pauli crescentium" (2 vols., 1800).

SIMONDS, William, author, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 30 Oct., 1823; d. in Winchester, Mass., 7 July, 1859. After attending school at Salem and spending some time in learning the jewelry business at Lynn, Mass., he was apprenticed to a Boston printer in 1837. While thus engaged he wrote his first book, "The Pleasant Way" (1841), which was published by the Massachusetts Sabbath-school society. This was followed in 1845 by "The Sinner's Friend," which was also well received. In December, 1845, he left the printing-office where he had spent nearly nine years, and early in 1846 began the publication of "The Boston Saturday Rambler," of which, after the first six months, he became the sole editor. In November, 1850, "The Rambler" was merged in the "New England Farmer," of which Simonds was general editor until his death. In 1848 he began the publication of a monthly entitled "The Pictorial National Library," but was unable to issue it longer than eighteen months. Mr. Simonds was convinced that he had a mission for the poor, as well as for the young, and he employed every means in his power to render his tales natural and attractive, and to make them accurate reflections of life. His chief work is "The Amwell Stories," written under the pen-name of Walter Airmall. These stories deal chiefly with New England farm-life. The first, "Catching Apple-blossoms," appeared in 1848 and extend the series to twelve volumes, but lived to complete only six. The last one, "Jerry," was left unfinished, and to it is added a memoir of the author. Besides the books already mentioned, he published "Thoughts for the Thoughtless" (Boston, 1851); "The Boy's Own Guide" (1852); and "The Boy's Book of Morals and Manners" (1853).

SIMONIN, Louis Laurent (so-mo-nang), French geologist, b. in Marseilles, 22 Aug., 1830. He studied at the School of mines at Saint Etienne, was graduated as engineer in 1852, and held afterward various professorships in chemistry and mineralogy in Italy and France. He made several voyages for the United States by order of the French government, visited Cuba, the West Indies, Central America, the Isthmus of Panama, and Mexico, and travelled extensively through California and most of the United States. In 1867 he was placed at the head of a French commission charged to study the laying out of the Pacific railroad and the preliminary surveys, and in his report greatly praised the work. In 1876 he was made a member of the international jury for the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia, and before returning to France he made a special study of the mines in Pennsylvania and in the Reading valley. Simonin is an admirer of American institutions. He has been several times a candidate for the chamber of deputies, promising that if he were elected he would support free democratic institutions as they are understood on this side of the Atlantic, and he has been called the American candidate. Since 1890 he has contributed articles to French magazines describing his travels and American scenery. Since 1877 he has been scientific editor of "La France." He has also greatly interested himself in the international mineralogical congresses, and has contributed to the authorization by the government of a lottery loan in its behalf. His works include "Le grand ouest des États-Unis" (Paris, 1869); "L'homme Américain" (1870); "À travers les États-Unis" (1875); "Le monde Américain, souvenirs de mes voyages aux États-Unis" (1876); "L'orchest l'argent," a study of gold and silver-mines in both America (1872); and "Résumé d'une conférence sur le Caño de Panama."
cure local self-government and the creation of a Union reform party in South Carolina.

SIMONSON, John Smith, soldier, b. in Uniontown, Pa., 2 June, 1796; d. in New Albany, Ind., 5 Dec., 1881. His father, Adam Smith Simonson, was a well-known physician of western Pennsylvania. When but seventeen years old he enlisted in the New York volunteers and served as sergeant through the campaign on the Niagara frontier, receiving an honorable discharge in November, 1814.

Three years later he settled in Charlestown, Ind. He was a member of the state senate in 1828-30, and in 1841-'6 of the lower house, serving as speaker during the last year. In 1846 he was appointed captain of U. S. mounted rifles, and served through the Mexican war under Gen. Scott, engaging in the capture of Vera Cruz and the battles that followed. He was brevetted major in 1847 for gallant service at Chapultepec, where he commanded his regiment after the fall of its colonel, and he also took a creditable part in the attack on the Belen gate. The succeeding years were spent on duty in Texas and New Mexico, commanding expeditions against the Indians and in making explorations. In May, 1861, he was called to serve in the heavy artillery, and he was retired in the following September. At the opening of the civil war he was made superintendent of the volunteer recruiting service at Indianapolis, Ind., and he continued on active military duty till 1869. In 1865, on the recommendation of Gen. Grant, he was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for long and faithful service.

SIMONTON, James William, journalist, b. in Columbia county, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1823; d. in Napa, Cal., 2 Nov., 1882. He went as a lad to New York city, and was educated at the public schools there. At twenty years of age he was engaged as local reporter on the "Courier and Enquirer. Within a year or two he was sent, with Henry J. Raymond, to Washington as congressional correspondent, and he continued as such until 1850, winning, by his ability and conscientiousness, the confidence and esteem of Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Thomas H. Benton, and other statesmen. In the autumn of 1851, when the New York "Times" was founded, he was one of the original proprietors with George Jones, Henry J. Raymond, and one or two others. He was also the unanimous correspondent, as well as the correspondent of New Orleans, San Francisco, and Detroit journals. His letters, entitled "The History of Legislation," were really a record of the times, and drew wide attention. He became part owner in 1859 of the "Evening Bulletin" in San Francisco, where he lived for years, and subsequently of the "Morning Call," of the same city, retaining his interest throughout his life. Having returned to New York, he was chosen in 1867 general agent of the associated press there, and discharged the duties of the office for fourteen years, when he resigned on account of delicate health. He then retired to his Calhoun vineyard, and died there suddenly of heart disease.

SIMPSON, Edmund, theatre-manager, b. in England, 17 Aug., New York city, 31 July, 1818. He made his theatrical début at the Towers theatre in England in May, 1806, as Baron Steinfort in Kotzebue's "Stranger." In this country Simpson first appeared at the New York Park theatre on 22 Oct., 1809, as Harry Darnton in "The Road to Ruin." In 1828, when playing the part of Faustus in "The Devil's Doctor," one of his legs was broken by an accident to the stage-machinery, and he was crippled for life. His last performance was Dazzle in "London Assurance." As a comedian, Simpson was studious and painstaking, and in his delineations intelligent and respectable, but there was ever attached to his representations a hardness of manner that interfered with his popularity. In 1810 he became stage-manager, and remained permanently connected with the one playhouse as actor, stage-manager, and manager for thirty-eight years. It was his privilege to introduce nearly all the noted British players of his day to American audiences. From 1831 until 1840 Simpson was working-manager to Stephen Price, the lessee of the theatre, but on the death of Price he assumed the sole management. During his career he went through several trials of adversity, and finally retired, 6 June, 1848, under discouragement and in reduced circumstances. Under Simpson's direction the old Park theatre, or "The Theatre," as the show-bills named it, was noted for its well-drilled and efficient stock-company. The scenery of this noted resort was made up of flats and drops of the simplest construction, the properties were cheap, warm, and few in number, the costumes flimsy and tinselled, and the auditorium, before the rising of the curtain, usually filled with the stifling leakage of gas. The boxes were painted in white and gold, with the first and second tiers divided into a series of screened lock-boxes. A separate stairway led to the third tier and the gallery. This third tier was an assemblage-place for the dissolute of both sexes; one half the gallery was patronized by boys, servants, and sailors, and the remainder was devoted to the accommodation of negroes. What is now known as the mezzanine gallery was called the "pit." It was fitted with hard wooden benches, and the admission to it was half-price. Here the bachelors, critics, and wits of the day found their places. Drinking-bars, united with apple-, pie-, and peanut-stands, were connected with the pit and the upper tier of boxes. As Mrs. Trollope has truly pictured, it was not an uncommon thing to see men rise on the front rows of the dress-circle in their shirt-sleeves, and between the acts turn their backs to the audience, while their better halves sat munching apples and peeling oranges. Not seldom the entertainments of an evening comprised a five-act tragedy, a comedy, and an olio diversion, that terminated at twelve or one o'clock. The old Park theatre, represented in the illustration, was a quaint little structure, fronting about eighty feet on Park row, and rising to the height of sixty or seventy feet, painted in imitation of blocks of granite.

SIMPSON, Edward, naval officer, b. in New York city, 3 March, 1824; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 Dec., 1888. He entered the navy as midshipman, 11 Feb., 1840, and was in the first class at the naval academy in 1843-4, and was graduated in the latter year. During the Mexican war he was attached to the steamer "Vixen," in which he participated in various engagements, including the bombardment. and capture of Vera Cruz. He served on the coast survey, 1845-'50, in the brig "Washington" and steamers "Vixen" and "Legare." In 1850-'52 he cruised in the frigate "Congress" off the Brazilian station, as acting master, and in 1853-'4 he was attached to the naval academy as assistant instructor in naval gunnery and infantry tactics. He was promoted to master, 10 July, 1854, and to lieutenant, 18 April, 1855, and served in the sloop "Portsmouth" in the East India squadron, 1856-'8, participating in the capture of the Barrier forts near Canton, China. He went to the naval academy upon his return, and was in charge of the department of naval gunnery in 1858-'62, and commandant of midshipmen in 1862-'3. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and in the monitor "Passaic," off Charleston, in 1863-'4, participated in various engagements. He was commissioned commander, 3 March, 1865, and served as fleet-captain of the consolidated Gulf squadron, being present at the fall of Mobile and receiving the surrender of the Confederate fleet on Tombigbee river. He was commissioned captain, 15 Aug., 1870, and went on a special naval mission to Europe in 1870-'2. He was in charge of the torpedo station at Newport, R. I., in 1877-'9, was commandant of the New London naval station in 1878-'90, and of the Philadelphia Navy Yard in 1880-'9. He was promoted to commodore, 26 April, 1878, and to rear-admiral, 9 Feb., 1884, and placed on the retired list, 3 March, 1886. Admiral Simpson was president of the U. S. naval institute in 1885-'8, and was the senior member of the Naval academy graduates association. He had devoted himself to the scientific development of the navy, especially in the science of gunnery and torpedoes. Besides articles in magazines on naval subjects, he published "Ordnance and Naval Gunnery," which was the text-book at the naval academy until 1868 (New York, 1862); "The Naval Mission to Europe" (2 vols., Washington, 1873); and "Report of the Gun-Foundry Board" (1885). Several of his articles are reprinted in "Modern Ships of War" (New York, 1887).

SIMPSON, Sir George, British traveller, b. in Loch Broom, Ross-shire, Scotland, in 1792; d. in Luchine, near Montreal, 7 Sept., 1860. From 1809 till 1820 he was in the employ of a London firm engaged in the West India trade, of which his uncle was a member. His energy and active business habits attracted the attention of the Earl of Selkirk, then at the head of the Hudson bay company, and Andrew Colville, the quaker brother-law, a large stockholder, and in February, 1820, he was selected to superintend the affairs of the company in America. In May he left Montreal for the northwest, and in 1821 he succeeded in terminating the long rivalry that had existed between the Hudson bay company and the Northwest company by their union. He was soon afterward appointed governor of the northern department, and subsequently became governor-in-chief of Rupert's land, and general superintendent of all the Hudson bay company's affairs in North America. In that capacity he planned the successful expedition under his cousin, Thomas Simpson (1836-'9), and greatly aided other travellers in their explorations. In 1841-'2 he made the overland journey round the world, going from London to Montreal, thence to Vancouver and Sitka, thence by New Archangel and the Aleutian islands to Ochotsk, across Russian Asia to Moscow and St. Petersburg, and home by the Baltic. He claimed to be the first traveller to make the overland journey. For many years preceding his death he resided at Luchine, entered by the Prince of Wales during his visit in 1860, and was a director of the Bank of British North America and of the Bank of Montreal. In 1841 he was knighted for his services in connection with the cause of arctic exploration. He published "Narrative of an Overland Journey round the World during the Years 1841-'2" (2 vols., London, 1847).—His cousin, Thomas, British explorer, b. in Dingwall, Ross-shire, Scotland, 2 July, 1806; d. near Tartle river, British America, 14 June, 1849, was graduated in 1828 at the University of Aberdeen, where he won the Huttonian prize. In 1829 he entered the service of the Hudson Bay company as secretary to his cousin, Gov. Simpson, and soon afterward accompanied the latter on a tour through the southeastern part of the Hudson bay territory. In 1836 an expedition was arranged by Gov. Simpson to connect the discoveries of Sir John Ross and Sir George Back, and it was placed under the command of Thomas Simpson. After passing the winter at Fort Chipewyan, on Great Slave lake, Simpson and his party reached Mackenzie river in July, 1837, and a few days afterward arrived at Foggy Island bay, the farthest point that had been attained by Sir John Franklin. They then traced the arctic coast of North America from the mouth of Mackenzie river to Point Barrow, and from the mouth of Coppermine river to the Gulf of Boothia. The expedition was occupied in this service about three years, and, as it was claimed at the time, resulted in solving the problem of the existence of a passage by water between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. While returning with the valuable results of his discoveries, Simpson was either killed or met his death by suicide, as was asserted by some of the members of his party. The weight of evidence is in favor of the former assumption. See "The Life and Travels of Thomas Simpson, the Arctic Discoverer, by his brother, Alexander Simpson (London, 1855).—Thomas's brother, Alexander, author, b. in Ross-shire in 1811, was educated at the University of Aberdeen. He spent several years in the service of the Hudson bay company, and was afterward British consul at the Sandown islands. He published "The Sandwich Islands (London, 1843); "Life and Travels of Thomas Simpson, the Arctic Discoverer" (1843); and "Oregon Territory Consid-
SIMPSON, George Semmes, pioneer, b. in St. Louis, Mo., 7 May, 1818; d. in Trinidad, Col., 4 Sept., 1883. He received a college education and studied law, afterwards entering upon the practice of his calling, and set out for the far west. After various experiences in Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, he built the old fort in 1842 where the city of Pueblo, Col., now stands. In November of that year he married a Spanish beauty, Juana Sano, travelling with her on horseback through a wild country infested by hostile Indians to Taos, N. M., where the services of a priest were secured. Their daughter, Isabel, now Mrs. Jacob Beard, of Trinidad, was the first white child that was born in the Rocky mountain region of Colorado. Indians came in large numbers from the plains and mountains to see the white child. They brought her presents and held a great war-dance in her honor. Subsequently Mr. Simpson lived in various parts of New Mexico using his contributions in laying the groundwork for the present state, and in 1849 returned to Colorado by way of the isthmus in 1852. In 1860 he settled in Trinidad, Col., and there spent the last years of his life. He contributed both prose and verse to magazines and journals, and the first information that gold was found in the sands of Cherry creek, Col., was sent to newspapers in the east by him. He left a compilation of his contributions, not preserving the exact form of his life, with the request that they be published. He was buried in a tomb cut out of the solid rock on the summit of a mountain known as Simpson's Nest, where he had once found shelter from the Indians. A monument marks the spot.

SIMPSON, Henry, author, b. in 1799; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 March, 1869. He was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, an appraiser of the port of Philadelphia, and at one time an alderman of the city. He was a member of the Historical society of Pennsylvania and published "The Lives of Eminent Philadelphians" (Philadelphia, 1869).

SIMPSON, James Hurvey, soldier, b. in New Jersey, 16 Mar., 1813; d. in St. Paul, Minn., 2 March, 1883. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1832, and assigned to the artillery. During the Florida war he was aide to Gen. Abraham Eustis. He was made 1st lieutenant in the corps of topographical engineers on 7 July, 1838, engaged in surveying the northern lakes and the western plains, was promoted captain on 3 March, 1839, and assigned to the artillery. During the Florida war he was aide to Gen. Abraham Eustis. He was made 1st lieutenant in the corps of topographical engineers on 7 July, 1838, engaged in surveying the northern lakes and the western plains, was promoted captain on 3 March, 1839, and assigned to the artillery. During the Mexican war he was aide to Gen. Thomas Lanier Clingman, being engaged at West Point and at Gaines' Mills, where he was taken prisoner. After his exchange in August, 1862, he resigned his volunteer commission in order to act as chief topographical engineer, and afterward as chief engineer of the Department of the Ohio, where he was employed in the construction and maintenance of the forts in the Ohio, and in repairs and extensions of the fortifications in Kentucky from that time till the close of the war. He was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general in March, 1863, and was chief engineer of the interior department, having charge of the inspection of the Union Pacific railroad, till 1867. He afterward superintended defensive works at Key West, Mobile, and other places, surveys of rivers and harbors, the improvement of navigation in the Mississippi and other western rivers, and the construction of bridges at Little Rock, Ark., St. Louis, Mo., Clinton, Iowa, and other places. Gen. Simpson was the author of "Shortest Route to California across the Great Basin of Utah" (Philadelphia, 1869), and "Essay on Coronado's March in Search of the Seven Cities of Cibola" (1869). He was retired in March, 1889.

SIMPSON, John, Canadian senator, b. in Rothes, Scotland, in May, 1812; d. in Bowmanville, Ont., 21 March, 1885. He came in childhood with his parents to Upper Canada, where they settled at Perth. He entered mercantile life in 1825 as a clerk at Dalrington, rose to be his employer's partner, and was for many years engaged in milling and as a general merchant. In 1848 he opened a branch of the Bank of Montreal at Bowmanville, and later he established one at Whitby. He was a member of the legislative council of Canada, and was its president until a few years before his death. In 1856 Mr. Simpson was elected to the legislative council of Canada for Queen's division, and he represented it in that body till 1867, when he became a member of the Dominion senate. He was a Liberal in politics.

SIMPSON, Josiah, surgeon, b. in New Brunswick, N. B., 3 March, 1813; d. in Baltimore, Md., 3 March, 1874. He was graduated at Princeton in 1833, and in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. The following year, being made assistant surgeon, U. S. army, he served through the Florida war, receiving honorable mention by Gen. Zachary Taylor for his services at the battle of Olustee. He was also commended by Gen. Winfield Scott and Gen. William J. Worth, under whom he served in the Mexican war at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. In 1848-55 he was attending surgeon with headquarters at New York, acting also as post-surgeon at Bedlow's island. He was then promoted surgeon and was medical director of the Department of the West. He was appointed surgeon-in-chief of the United States navy in 1862-6, and of the Department of the Tennessee till 1867, when he was transferred to Baltimore.

SIMPSON, Marcus de Lafayette, soldier, b. in Esperance, Schoharie co., N. Y., 28 Aug., 1824. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, and, serving the same year in the war with Mexico, was brevetted lst lieutenant in 1847; for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, and captain for the battle of Chapultepec. From 1848 till 1861 he was quarter master at various posts, and assistant in the office of the commissary-general, acting as chief commissary of the Department of the Pacific in 1859-61. During the civil war he served in the commissary-general's office, and was brevetted colonel, brevetted brigadier-general, and major-general on 13 March, 1865. In 1867 he was chief commissary of subistence of the Division of the Pacific, till 1870 or the battle of the Atlantic, and in 1870 he assumed the charge of the same office in the Division of the Missouri, at Chicago.

SIMPSON, Matthew, M. E., bishop, b. in Canad. Ohion, 1811; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 18 June, 1884. He received the best education that the town afforded, and his father dying when the boy was two years old, he was instructed and encouraged by his uncle, Matthew Simpson, after whom he was named. The latter was a thorough scholar, generally informed, was in the state senate ten years, and for seven years a judge of the county court. He was familiar with Greek and Hebrew, and conferred upon his nephew many advantages that boys usually did not have at that early day in the way of education. When he was about sixteen years of age Matthew left home and became a student in Madison college, Pa., which has since been incorporated with Alleghany college at Meadville. His progress was rapid and he became a tutor before he was nineteen years of age. He soon began the study of medicine, and in 1833 entered upon its practice, but was drawn to the ministry and entered the Pittsburg conference of the Methodist Episcopal church on trial in 1834. He was made third preacher of St. Clairsville circuit in 1842.

Here his success was marked, and the following year he was removed to Pittsburg. In 1857 he was transferred to Williamsport, and the same year elected vice-president and professor of natural science in Alleghany college. He was chosen president of Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw) university, Greencastle, Ind., in 1859. This post he filled with great popularity for nine years, during which time he made him in great demand in the pulpit and on the platform. His personal qualifications gave him an extraordinary influence over students, and made him efficient in raising money for the endowment of the college. In 1844 he was elected to the general conference, and in 1848 he was re-elected. He appeared in 1852 in the conference as the leader of his delegation, and at this conference he was named bishop. In 1857 he was sent abroad as a delegate to the English and Irish conference of the Wesleyan connection, and was also a delegate to the World's evangelical alliance which met in Berlin. His preaching and addresses upon this tour attracted great attention, particularly his sermon before the alliance, which extended his fame as a pulpit orator throughout the world. After its adjournment he travelled through Turkey, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece. In 1859 he removed from Pittsburg to Evanston, Ill., and became nominally president of Garrett biblical institute. Subsequently he removed to Philadelphia. His powers as an orator were displayed during the civil war in a manner that commanded the admiration and gratitude of the people. President Lincoln regarded him as the greatest orator he ever heard, and at his funeral in Springfield Bishop Simpson officiated. He made many addresses in behalf of the Christian commission, and delivered a series of lectures that had much to do with raising the spirit of the people. His official duties took him abroad in 1870 and in 1875. In 1874 he visited Lebanon. At the Eumenical council of Methodists in London he was selected by the representatives of all branches to deliver the opening sermon. After the news of the death of President Garfield he delivered an address at Exeter hall. He was selected by the faculty of Yale to deliver a series of addresses before the students of the theological department, which were published as "Lectures on Preaching" (New York, 1879). In later years his appearance was patriarchal. His eloquence was simple and natural, but increasing in power from the beginning of his life. It was peculiar to the-orator to be self and equally attractive to the learned and the ignorant. When he was at his best few could resist his pathetic appeals. Though his eloquence is the principal element of his fame, he was a man of unusual soundness of judgment, a parliamentarian of remarkable accuracy and promptitude, and one of the best presiding officers and safest of counselors. He was present in the general conference in Philadelphia in 1884. Though broken in health so as not to be able to sit through the sessions, his mind was clear and his farewell address made a profound impression. Bishop Simpson published "Hundred Years of Methodism" (New York, 1879), and "Cyclopedia of Methodism" (Philadelphia, 1878; 3d ed., revised, 1889). After his death a volume of his "Sermons" was edited by Rev. George R. Crooks, D. D. (1885). A window in his memory is to be placed by American admirers in City Road chapel, London, where John Wesley preached.

SIMPSON, Michael, soldier, b. in Paxtang, Lancaster county, Pa., 10 May, 1740; d. in York county, Pa., 1 June, 1813. He received a good education, and was a farmer. After the defeat of Braddock he entered the Continental army, and was appointed aide-de-camp to the commander-in-chief, and was in the expeditions of Forbes and Bouquet to the Ohio. At the beginning of the Revolution he was appointed lieutenant in the 1st Pennsylvania battalion, and was attached to the Quebec expedition under Arnold in 1775. He was promoted captain, commanded a company at the battle of Long Island, and also participated in the battles of Monmouth and Trenton. SIMS, Alexander Drumboole, congressman, b. in Brunswick county, Va., 11 June, 1812; d. in Kingstown, S. C., 11 Nov., 1841. He was educated at the University of North Carolina, and was graduated at Union in 1823, studied law, and after practising in his native county, removed to Darlington, S. C., where he taught for five years, and afterward practised law with success. He was a member of the legislature in 1840-4, and was elected to Congress as a state-right Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till his death. He published a controversial paper on slavery and a novel entitled "Bevil Farceon." (1842).—His brother, Edward Drumboole, educator, b. in Brunswick county, Va., 24 March, 1805; d. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., 12 April, 1845, was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1824, became principal of an academy at La Grange, Ala., was afterward professor of mathematics in La Grange college, entered the Tennessee conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1831, and, after serving for two years as an itinerant preacher, became professor of ancient languages at Randolph-Macon college, Va., in 1835. He was connected with the English department of the University of Berlin in 1836, studied Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic and Syriac for two years at the University of Halle, spent a year in travel, and on his return to the United States assumed the chair of English literature at Randolph-Macon. From 1841 till his death he taught the same subject in the University of Alabama. He was the first to teach Anglo-Saxon in connection with English literature in the south, and was preparing grammars of English and Anglo-Saxon at the time of his death.

SIMS, Charles N., clergyman, b. in Union county, Ind., 18 May, 1835. He entered the Methodist ministry in 1857 and was graduated at Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw) university in 1859. In 1860 he became president of Valparaiso college, Ind., and in 1863 was appointed to a pastoral charge in Richmond, Ind. He was subsequently pastor at Wabash, Evansville, and Indianapolis, Ind., Baltimore, Md., Newark, N. J., and Brooklyn, N. Y. Since 17 Nov., 1880, he has been chancellor of Syracuse university. In 1882 and 1883 he was appointed commissioner to the Onondaga Indian reservation as a delegate to the general conference of his church in 1884 and 1888. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by De Pauw university in 1870, and that of L.L. D. in 1882. Dr. Sims has done much literary work for periodicals, and is the author of a "Life of Thomas M. Eddy" (New York, 1879).

SIMS, Henry Augustus, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Dec., 1832; d. there, 10 July, 1875. He was educated at the Philadelphia high-school, studied civil engineering, and followed that profession in Canada, Georgia, and Minnesota. Subsequently he studied architecture, and practised that art in Canada from 1860 till 1866, and afterward in Philadelphia till his death. He was long the secretary for foreign correspondence of the American institute of architects. He designed many city and country residences and, among other public buildings, the Columbia avenue and 24 Presbyterian churches in Philadelphia, the chapel at Mercersburg, Pa., the court-house at Hagerstown, Md., and the almshouse of Montgomery county, Pa. His brother, Clifford Stanley, author, b. in Delaware county, Pa., 17 Feb., 1839; d. in Trenton, N. J., 3 March, 1896, was educated at the academy of the Episcopal church in Philadelphia, and was admitted to the bar in 1860, but never practised. He served as acting assistant paymaster in the U. S. navy in 1863, and was chosen lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Arkansas infantry in 1864, but was taken prisoner before he could be mustered in. He was judge-advocate-general of Arkansas in 1864-9, a delegate to the Arkansas constitutional convention in 1867-8, a commissioner to digest the statutes of Arkansas in 1868, and a representative in the legislature in 1868-9. For the next 30 years he was U. S. consul for the district of Prescott, Canada, Mr. Sims had published "The Origin and Signification of Scottish Surnames, with a Vocabulary of Christian Names" (Albany, 1862); "The Institution of the Society of the Cincinnati in the State of New Jersey" (1866); and an edition of William Noyce's "Maxims of the Laws of England," with a memoir of the author (1870).—Another brother, James Peacock, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Nov., 1849; d. there, 20 May, 1882, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1868, and studied architecture with his brother Henry. He designed, besides many private residences, the building of the Royal insurance company, Christ church and Holy Trinity memorial chapels, Philadelphia, and Christ church in Philadelphia. The Simses were originally from England.

SIMS, James Marion, surgeon, b. in Lancaster county, S. C., 25 Jan., 1813; d. in New York city, 13 Nov., 1883. He was graduated at South Carolina college in 1832, began the study of medicine with a physician of his neighborhood, entered Charleston medical school when it was opened in November, 1833, and completed his course at Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, in 1835. He began practice in Lancaster, where his parents resided, but became discouraged at the loss of his first patients, and removed to Mount Meigs, Montgomery co., Ala., and established himself in 1856, and was married in December, 1836, to Macon county. He was successful there, but severe attacks of malarial fever impelled him to change his residence. Near the close of 1840 he settled in Montgomery, where in a short time he gained a good reputation as a surgeon. He was the first practitioner in the south to operate for strabismus or to treat club-foot successfully. In 1845 he published a paper on the cause and the proper mode of treatment of trismus nascentium, in which he attributed the disease to mechanical pressure on the base of the brain, and affirmed that it could be prevented by not placing new-born infants in a constrained posture, and often cured by simply laying them on their side. He explained his hypothesis in the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences" in 1816 and 1848, and subsequently in an "Essay on the Pathology and Treatment of Trismus Nascentium, or Look-jaw of Infants" (Philadelphia, 1864). His view was generally received by the profession, although a few doctors used his method with success, and the doctrine was confirmed more than thirty years ago.
after its announcement by the investigation of a tong series of cases in Washington, D. C. In 1845
Dr. Sims conceived a method of treating vesico-vaginal fistula, an affecion for which the physicians of various countries had vainly sought a cure.
He fitted up a hospital beside his house, into which he collected cases from the neighboring country, maintaining them at his own expense. After experimenting for three years and a half, he finally devised and silver suture, which has now become employed in many branches of surgery, and with which he effected a perfect cure. He invented various instruments during his experiments, chief of which was the duck-bill speculum, commonly called the Sims speculum. This revealed the seat of other serious complaints, and rendered them amenable to surgical treatment. He had before paid no attention to gynecology, but the possession of this instrument, which has raised that branch from the level of empirical experiment to that of certain knowledge, induced him to devote his attention henceforth to the study and treatment of diseases of women. Soon after his first successful operations on fistula of the bladder he was seized with cholera morbus, and, after combating the disease for three months, it terminated in his death. In 1853 he removed to New York city. He demonstrated to prominent surgeons the success of the silver suture in vesico-vaginal fistula and lacer-ated perineum, and his methods came into use in the hospitals; yet their author met with a cold reception, and his proposition to open a hospital for the treatment of women's diseases was opposed by the other doctors until it was auspiciously presented before the public. The project was welcomed by influential women, and in 1855 a temporary hospital was opened. The necessity for a larger institution was soon recognized. In 1857 the legislature granted a charter for the Woman's hospital of the state of New York, and in the following year appropriated $50,000 for the purpose, while the common council of the city gave as a site
the old Potter's field between Fourth and Lexington avenues. In 1861 Dr. Sims went to Europe to study hospital architecture, and, having convinced himself of the advantages of the pavilion system, returned in 1862 and persuaded the governors to adopt that plan. While he was in Europe the civil war was raging in the United States, and London, Paris, and Berlin invited him to perform the operations for vesico-vaginal fistula in the hospitals. His successes in Paris led to his being invited to Brussels to demonstrate the operation before the faculty.
He took his family to Europe in July, 1862, intending to return to New York to earn the means of supporting them there, but, through his professional friends and the fame of his operation, obtained a remunerative practice in Paris, and deided to remain abroad until the civil war came to an end. He removed to London about 1864 for the education of his children. His "Clinical Notes on Uterine Surgery," which was published simultaneously in English, French, and German (London, Paris, and Berlin, 1865), described novel methods of professional friends, and the fame of his operation professed in the United States and England, and described in medical journals new operations and instruments, and advanced theories of pathology and practice that attracted the universal attention of medical men. He published also a short treatise on "Ovariotomy" (New York, 1875). Not long before his death he wrote "The Story of My Life" (New York, 1884). See also a "Memoir" by Dr. Thomas

ply electricity for the propulsion and guidance of movable torpedoes for harbor and coast defence. His torpedo is a submarine boat, with a cylindrical hull of copper and conical ends, supplied with a screw propeller and rudder. The power is electricity generated by a dynamo-electric machine on shore or on ship-board, and by its means the torpedo is propelled, guided, and exploded. During 1818-19 he served as an engineer officer in the United States Navy, and in 1819 he was appointed by Gen. Henry L. Abbot, of the U. S. engineer corps, at Willett's point, and since that time the U. S. government has purchased ten of these boats having a speed of ten to eleven and a half miles an hour. These boats carry from 400 to 450 pounds of dynamite. Mr. Sims has now in course of construction a boat, to have a speed of eighteen miles an hour, which is to carry a 250-pound charge of dynamite.

SIMSON, Sampson, philanthropist, b. in New York city in 1790; d. there, 7 Jan., 1857. He studied law at Columbia, but after a few years practice returned to his farm in Yonkers, and devoted himself to charitable and benevolent work. He was founder of the Mount Sinai hospital, and bequeathed large sums to public institutions, including $50,000 that, after the death of a nephew, should be paid "to any responsible corporation in this city whose permanent fund is established by its charter for the purpose of alleviating the condition of the Jews in Jerusalem, Palestine." By decision of the state supreme court on 29 May, 1888, this amount, with thirty years' interest, was paid to the North American relief society for indigent Jews in Jerusalem.

SINCLAIR, Carrie Bell, poet, b. in Millcreekville, Ga., 22 May, 1839. Her father, Elijah, a nephew of Robert Fulton, was a Methodist clergyman who at the time of his death conducted a seminary for girls at Georgetown, S. C. The family removed to Augusta, Ga., where she contributed poetry to the "Georgia Gazette." She published a volume of "Poems" (Augusta, 1869), and during the civil war wrote lyrics commemorating incidents of the battle-field and praising the Confederate cause, some of which were set to music, while devoting herself to supplying the wants and alleviating the sufferings of southern soldiers in Savannah. After the war she made Philadelphia her residence, and wrote the "Hesperides." Her poetical productions were collected in "Heart Whispers, or Echoes of Song" (1872).

SINCLAIR, Peter, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Argyllshire, Scotland, in 1825. He was educated in his native place, emigrated to Prince Edward Island, engaged in farming, and was elected to the house of assembly in 1867. He was a member of the executive council from 1869 till 1871, and again in 1872, when he acted as government leader, and was a member of the board of works. He was elected to the Dominion parliament in September, 1873, and re-elected by acclamation in 1874, but defeated in 1878. He was chosen to the legislature of Prince Edward Island in 1892, and again in 1898. He is a Liberal, and in favor of reciprocal trade with the United States.

SINGER, Isaac Merritt, inventor, b. in Oswego, N. Y., 27 Oct., 1811; d. in Torquay, England, 23 July, 1875. He was a machinist, and devoted himself entirely to the study of improving sewing-machines. After years of close application he succeeded in completing a single-thread, chain-stitching machine for which he received a patent. In the early part of his career he was assisted by Edward Clark, a wealthy lawyer, by whose aid he was enabled to establish a factory in New York. The Howe sewing-machine company sued him for infringing on their patents, but the matter was finally compromised. He then had some difficulty with Mr. Clark, in consequence of which, while each retained an equal interest in the machine, its manufacture was placed in the hands of a company. Mr. Singer soon became wealthy, and, leaving this country, resided for some time in Paris, but later removed to England, where he lived in a curiously constructed house that he built in Torquay.

SINGERLY, William Miskey, journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Dec., 1832; d. in Philadelphia, 27 Feb., 1898. He was educated in the Philadelphia high-school, and trained to business. From 1859 till 1881 he was connected with the city railways, and in 1877 he was the publisher of the Philadelphia "Record." His newspaper was the instrument for correcting various abuses. In 1884 he effected arrangements by which the people of Philadelphia obtained fuel for one quarter less than they had paid. He built 700 dwellings in a previously unimproved suburb of Philadelphia. Besides his finely appointed printing-office, he conducted a printing-press, 400 feet long, in New York, Md., and devoted much attention to breeding beef and dairy cattle and trotting-horses on model farms in Pennsylvania and Kentucky.

SINNICKSON, Thomas, patriot, b. in Salem county, N. J.; d. in Salem, N. J., 15 May, 1817. He received a classical education and became a merchant. For many years he sat in the provincial council of New Jersey, and in 1774 he was a delegate to the Provincial congress. He was a correspondent of the committee of safety, and served as a captain during the Revolutionary war, being present at the battles of Trenton and Princeton. After the peace he was a member of the legislature, and on the adoption of the constitution of the United States was elected to the Senate, serving from 4 March, 1789, till 3 March, 1791. He was elected again in 1796, and served from 15 May, 1797, till 3 March, 1799. He was presiding judge of the court of common pleas for many years.

SISTIAGA, Sebastian (sis-teah'-zah'), Mexican missionary, b. in Teposcolula, about 1600; d. in Puebla in 1756. He became a Jesuit in 1754, and, after finishing his studies, was sent to the mission of Lower California. In 1721 he explored to the northeast coast of the peninsula, and, leaving Loreto, he followed the coast up to latitude 31° N., discovering three good ports, with plenty of spring-water and an abundance of hard woods, and also founding the mission of San Ignacio. After many years of successful missionary labor he returned to Mexico, dying in the college of the order in Puebla. He wrote "Relación de un viaje a la Baja California y de los descubrimientos hechos, con planos de los puertos, remitida al Virey de México" and "Noticia de la Misión de San Ignacio con sus ocho pueblos," the manuscripts of which were used by H. H. Bancroft, the historian of California.

SITGREAVES, John, journalist, b. in New Berne, N. C., about 1740; d. in Halifax, N. C., 4 March, 1892. He studied and practised law in New Berne, was appointed an officer in Richard Caswell’s regiment of militia, in 1776, and served as his aide-de-camp at the battle of Camden in 1780. In 1784-5 he represented North Carolina in the Continental congress, and in 1786-7 he was a member of the North Carolina legislature, leaving that body on being appointed United States district judge for North Carolina.

Buena Ventura (see-har), Spanish missionary, b. in the island of Majorca, 9 Dec., 1739; d. in San Antonio, Cal., 3 Sept., 1808. He was a member of the Franciscan order, came as a missionary to America, and founded in 1771 the mission of San Antonio, and in 1777 those of San Miguel. With the assistance of Father Miguel Pieras, he composed a vocabulary of the Telamé or Sextay language. This work forms the seventh volume of John G. Sheas "Library of American Linguistics" (New York, 1861), and was published separately under the title of "Vocabulary of the Language of the San Antonio Missions" (1869).

MAGDALENA (San), b. in the Calchaqui Valley, Dec. 15, 1890. He was a chief of the Dakota Sioux, who were driven from their reservation in the Black Hills by miners in 1876, and took up arms against the whites and friendly Indians, refusing to be transported to the Indian territory. In June, 1876, they defeated and massacred Gen. George A. Custer's advance party of Gen. Alfred H. Terry's column, which was sent against them, on Little Big Horn river, and were pursued northward by Gen. Terry. Sitting Bull, with a part of his band, made his escape into British territory, and, through the mediation of Dominion officials, surrendered on a promise of pardon in 1878. In 1888, in a conference at Standing Rock, Dak.—where he was afterward killed—he influenced his tribe to that of relinquishing Indian raids. See Johnson's Life (1892).

SKEAD, James, Canadian senator, b. at Calder Hall, Moreshy, Cumberland, England, 31 Dec., 1817; d. in Ottawa, Canada, 5 July, 1884. He was educated in his native town, and, coming to Canada with his family in 1832, settled at Bytown (now Ottawa). Mr. Skead afterward engaged in the timber trade, and also in manufacturing. At the time of confederation in 1867, he was called to the senate. Early in 1881 he resigned, but he was reappointed on 24 Dec. of the same year. He represented Rideau division from 1882 till 1887 in the legislative council of Canada, and was an unsuccessful candidate for Carleton for the Ontario assembly in 1867. He was president of the Ottawa board of trade, of the Ottawa Liberal-Conservative association, of the Liberal-Conservative convention that met in Toronto, 23 Sept., 1874, of the Dominion board of trade, and of the Agricultural and arts association of Ontario, and was connected with various other financial or industrial institutions.

SKENANDO, Oneida chief, b. in 1706; d. in 1816. During the war of the Revolution he had command of 250 warriors of the Oneida and Tuscarora tribes of Indians, and rendered important services to the American cause. Skenando was tall and commanding in person, and his face displayed unusual expression. He was a great warrior, and one of the noblest and wisest counselors of the Six Nations. The first mention of his name is by Rev. Samuel Kirkland, who became acquainted with him when he first went into the Indian country in 1764. Skenando formed so strong an attachment for Mr. Kirkland that he expressed a desire to be buried by the side of his friend, which was done. He was one of the Indians as the "white man's friend."

SKENE, Alexander Johnston Chalmers, physician, b. in Fyvie, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 17 June, 1837. He was educated chiefly in the schools of Aberdeen, and studied medicine at King's college, Scotland, at the University of Michigan, and at Long Island college, where he was graduated in 1863. From July, 1863, till June, 1864, he was acting assistant surgeon in the U. S. army. In 1864 he settled in Brooklyn, where he has since been engaged in successful practice. Dr. Skene was adjunct physician in Long Island college hospital in 1864, appointed professor of gynecology there in 1872, and dean of the faculty in 1896. He was professor of gynecology in the Post-graduate medical school of New York in 1884, and is president of the American gynecological society. He performed the first successful operation of gastro-lytrotony that is recorded, and also that of cromatony, using Sim's speculum. He has invented about twelve surgical instruments, has written numerous articles for the medical journals, has published "Medicine in Women" (New York, 1877), and "Treatise on Diseases of Women, for the Use of Students and Practitioners" (1888).

SKENE, Philip, soldier, b. in London, England, in February, 1725; d. near Stoke Goldington, England, 10 June, 1810. He was heir-male (after 1749) of Sir Andrew Skene, of Hailyards, Fife, and entered the first royal regiment in 1739, under the auspices of his uncle, Capt. Andrew Skene, was at the taking of Carthage and Porto Bello, and at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Culoden. He left the royal regiment in 1750, and was afterward captain in the 37th and 10th foot, and major of brigade. In the same year he married Katherine, heiress of the Heyders, of Mt. Heyden, County West, the 1st royal regiment in 1739, William Johnson. In 1756 he came again to this country, and was engaged under Lord Howe at the attack on Ticonderoga, and afterward under Lord Amherst at its capture, with that of Crown Point. Thence he went to the attack on Martinitque and Havana under Lord Albermarle, and was one of the West India troops at the breach at the storming of Moro Castle. In 1759, by the desire of Lord Amherst and with a view to strengthening the British hold on Canada, he received a large grant of land on Lake Champlain, which he increased by purchases to the extent of about 60,000

1818, 10 Philip, of York was attainted of his rank, the British militia, and was medical director of cavalry department of the southwest in 1864—5. In 1869 he was appointed U. S. consul at the city of Mexico, and in 1872 he was promoted to be consul-general, holding the office until 1878. He received the degree of A. B. from Wesleyan university in 1833. Besides his an- number of the assembly in 1874. He is a representa- tive in congress in 1881—3, as a Republican. In congress he was the author of the bill providing for the special delivery stamp, and he introduced a bill reducing the postage on letters from three to two cents. He was appointed deputy superintendent of public instruction of the state of New York, 7 April, 1886, and is now (1899) superintendent.

SKINNER, Ezekiel, clergyman, b. in Glastonbury, Conn., 27 June, 1777; d. in Greenport, L. I., 23 Dec., 1855. He was apprenticed to a blacksmith, but, abandoning his trade in 1797, he studied medi- cine, was licensed to practise in 1801, and settled at Granville, Mass., as a physician. He was a deist, but, changing his views, he removed to Lebanon, Conn., in 1807, and united with the Baptist church. He served in the war of 1812 as a surgeon, in 1819 was licensed to preach, and in 1822 was ordained pastor of the Baptist church in Ashford, Conn. On the death of his son, Rev. Benjamin Rush Skinner, a missionary in Liberia, the father in 1834 went to retrieve and spent four years in that colony as its governor and as preacher. After his return he resumed his pastoral duties and medical practice. He published a series of essays on the prophecies, in the "Christian Secretary" (1842).

SKINNER, George Ure, botanist, b. in Scotland in 1803; d. in Aspinwall, Panama, 9 Jan., 1869. he was the son of John Skinner, a merchant in Klee, Skinner and Co., Guatemala. He pursued his researches into the botany of western Mexico and Guatemala more thoroughly than any preceding botanist, and gave attention to the Orchidaceae. The genus Uroserinxia was named for him, and also the Catleya Skinneri among the orchids.

SKINNER, James Atcherson, Canadian lumber merchant, was born in Scotland in 1816; d. in Woodstock, Canada, 24 Dec, 1894. He was educated in his native place, went to Canada in 1843, and engaged in business in Hamilton. He became a lieutenant-colonel of militia, was at Ridgeway during the Fenian invasion, and in 1871 organized and commanded the first Canadian team to compete at Wimbledon in the rifle matches. He served in the Dominion parliament in 1874-8.

SKINNER, John, British soldier, b. in New Jersey about 1750; d. in England, 10 Oct, 1827. He entered the service of the crown as an ensign in the 16th regiment of foot, was in the actions of Beaufort and Stone Ferry and at the sieges of Savannah and Charleston, and commanded a troop in Charleston's legion in the battles of Blackstocks, Cowpens, and Guilford. In 1785 he reduced the Maroons of Jamaica to submission, and in 1801 he commanded the 16th regiment in the expedition against Surinam. He became a major-general, was successively governor of several of the West India islands, and commanded a brigade at the capture of Guadeloupe in 1809.

SKINNER, John Stuart, editor, b. in Maryland, 22 Feb., 1780; d. in Baltimore, 23 March, 1851. At the age of twenty-one he began practice as a counsel and attorney. In 1812 he was a government agent "to receive and forward the ocean mails, to furnish the vessels with necessary supplies, and to see that nothing transpired prejudicial to the interests of the republic or offensive to enemies thus admitted under the guardianship of a flag of truce." For this responsible trust President Madison framed a special commission and selected Mr. Skinner to execute it. To this duty was soon after added that of agent for prisoners of war. In 1813 he was ordered to remove his offices from Annapolis to Baltimore, and a little later he accepted a purses's commission in the navy. This post he held during the war that was afterward. When the British forces moved toward Washington, Mr. Skinner rode ninety miles in the night, and first announced their approach. The British retaliated by burning the buildings on his St. Leonard's creek estate, for which loss he never sought remuneration from the government. He was with Francis S. Key and the mission that suggested the lastet's song, "The Star-Spangled Banner." From 1816 till 1849 he was postmaster of Baltimore. Having much practical knowledge of agriculture and rural sports, in April, 1819, he established "The American Farmer," the first agricultural journal in this country. This periodical was warmly supported by Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Timothy Pickering, and others of recognized ability. When Gen. Lafayette revisited the United States in 1824 he was the guest of Mr. Skinner during his sojourn in Baltimore, and selected the latter as agent to manage the 212,000 acres of land that was bestowed upon the king by congress. In August, 1829, Mr. Skinner published the first number of the "American Turf Register and Sporting Magazine," a monthly periodical. His devotion to this work induced him to dispose of the "American Farmer" the same year. After conducting the "Turf Register" successfully for ten years, he sold the magazine, and in 1844, began to edit his "Farmer's Library and Monthly Journal of Agriculture," published by Greeley and McLain, which was succeeded in 1848 by the "Plough, the Loom, and the Anvil," which he conducted until his death. These periodicals gave a new stimulus to agricultural pursuits, and added to the general popularity of 212-door sports, of various times he edited for publication in this country several standard foreign works, including Alexander Petzold's "Lectures on Agricultural Chemistry," Henry Stephenson's "Book of the Farm," and Albrecht Daniel Thilor's "Principles of Agriculture," in the "Farmer's Library and Monthly Journal of Agriculture" (New York, 1849-8); "Yonatt on the Horse" (1844); "Ferry McFerrin's Book on Tumul Construction," (1849); "Goonen on Milk Cows," with an introduction; and he wrote "Christmas Gift to Young Agriculturists" (Washington, 1841); "Letter on Nautical Education" (1841); and "The Dog and Sportsman" (1845).—His son, Frederick Gustavus, b. in Annapolis, Md., 17 March, 1814; d. in Charlottesville, Va., 21 May, 1894. He went to France with Lafayette, and received his early education there. On returning to this country, he entered West Point. When Gen. Lafayette died, congress passed complimentary resolutions upon his life and services, and Mr. Skinner was selected by President Jackson to convey these resolutions to Lafayette's family. After remaining two years in France, as working attaché of the American legation, he made a tour of the continent and exhibited a very wide range of field sports. At the opening of the civil war he was given command of the 1st Virginia infantry, and he was colonel of that regiment until disabled by wounds. After the war he went to Egypt, and, refusing a commission in the Egyptian army, devoted his attention to the field sports of that country. Upon returning to his native land, he joined the staff of the "Turf, Field, and Farm," in New York, and, as field editor of that journal, was instrumental in bringing about the first field trial, the first bench-book of dogs, and the first international gun-trial that was ever held in the United States. He was at one time chief of the agricultural bureau of the U. S. patent-office, and published "Elements of Agricultural Chemistry," from the French of"Turf", 1874.

SKINNER, Otis Ainsworth, author, b. in Royalton, Vt., 3 July, 1807; d. in Napierville Ill., 18 Sept., 1861. He taught for some time, and in 1826 became a Universalist minister. He was settled as pastor in Baltimore in 1831, in Haverhill in 1836, in Boston in 1837, and in New York City in 1846. He returned to his former charge in Boston in 1849, and remained till April, 1857, when he settled in Elgin, 11. In August of the same year he was chosen president of Lombard university, Galesburg, Ill., and in October, 1858, he became pastor at Joliet, Ill. He edited the "South-
SKINNER, Richard, jurist, b. in Litchfield, Conn., May 17, 1775; d. in Manchester, Vt., 23 May, 1833. He was educated at Litchfield law-school, admitted to the bar in 1800, and in that year removed to Manchester, Vt., where he was elected state's attorney for Bennington county in 1801, and probate judge in 1806. He was a member of congress in 1813-15, and in 1817 became justice of the state supreme court, of which he had been an associate since 1816. He was speaker of the lower house of the legislature in 1818, governor of the state in 1820-4, and again chief justice in 1824-9. He was an officer of various local benevolent associations, president of the northeastern branch of the American education society, and a trustee of Middlebury college, from which he resigned in 1830. He was chosen a delegate to the national convention at Mark, b. in Manchester, Vt., 13 Sept., 1813; d. there, 16 Sept., 1887, was graduated at Middlebury in 1833, and studied law at Saratoga Springs, Albany, and New Haven. He settled at Chicago in 1836, was elected city attorney in 1839, appointed U. S. district attorney for Illinois in 1844, and chosen to the legislature in 1846. He became judge of the circuit court of Cook county in 1851. In 1842 he was made school-inspector for Chicago, and gave much time and labor to the cause of education. The city in 1859 honored his services by naming its new school-building "the Skinner school." He was president of the Illinois general hospital of the lake in 1852, of the Chicago home for the friendless in 1850, first president of the Chicago Horticultural society, and one of the first patrons of the Chicago historical society, a founder of the New England society of Chicago, and delivered an address before it in 1848, entitled "A Vindication of the Character of the Pilgrim Fathers" (1849). He was an elder in the Presbyterian church, and a liberal contributor to all church charities. Judge Skinner was chairman of the meeting in November, 1846, to make arrangements for the river and harbor convention of 1847, and was a delegate to that convention. He took an active part in building the Galena and Chicago railroad, and was for years one of its directors, and a director in the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy railroad. He was originally a Democrat, one of the founders of the Anti-Nebraska party in 1854, a member of the Republican party from its organization in 1856. In October, 1861, he was elected president of the Northwestern sanitary commission, and he continued such until 1864. Judge Skinner owned a valuable collection of books relating to America, which was burned in 1871, and after that time devoted his library to the public. He was buried in Manchester, where a daughter erected in 1897 the beautiful "Mark Skinner Library." See a memoir by E. W. Blatchford (Chicago, 1888).

SKINNER, Thomas Harvey, author, b. in Harvey's Neck, N. C., 7 March, 1791; d. in New York city, 1 Feb., 1871. He was graduated at Princeton in 1809, and studied law, but, abandoning it for theology, was licensed to preach in 1812. In 1813 he became assistant in a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, and in 1816 he was settled as a pastor in that city. In 1832 he became professor of sacred rhetoric in Andover theological seminary, and in 1835 he was appointed pastor of the Mercer street Presbyterian church, New York. From 1848 till his death he was professor of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology in Union theological seminary. Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1836, and that of LL. D. in 1855. Dr. Skinner was an eloquent pulpit orator and an able teacher. He published "Religion of the Bible" (New York, 1830); "Aids to Preaching and Hearing" (Philadelphia, 1831); "Universalism" (1841); "Vinet's Pastoral Theology" (1854); "Vinet's Homiletics" (1854), two translations; "Discussions in Theology" (New York, 1865); "Thoughts on Evangelizing the World" (1870); and occasional sermons. He also contributed to the religious press.

SLADE, Daniel Denison, physician, b. in Boston, 10 May, 1829; d. in Chestnut Hill, Mass., 11 Feb., 1896. He was graduated at Harvard, and was at the medical department, with the appointment of house surgeon to the Massachusetts hospital. He went abroad for the purpose of higher studies, and on his return in 1852 he settled in practice in Boston, where he continued until 1863. Dr. Slade then gradually relinquished his profession for literary and public purposes, and in 1870 he was chosen professor of applied zoology in Harvard, which chair he held for twelve years. In 1884 he was appointed assistant in the Museum of comparative zoology and lecturer on comparative osteology in Harvard. During the civil war he was appointed one of the inspectors of hospitals under the U. S. sanitary commission, and for some time he was surgeon of the Boston dispensary. He was a member of the Massachusetts medical society and of the Boston society of medical improvement. Dr. Slade was the Fiske prize by his essays on "Diphtheria" in 1850 and "Anemurism" in 1852, the Bayston prize by one on "Spermatomachia" in 1857, and the Massachusetts medical prize by one on "Bronchitis" in 1859. In addition to his contributions on medical, agricultural, and horticultural journals, he published "Diphtheria, its Nature and Treatment" (Philadelphia, 1861).

SLADE, William, governor of Vermont, b. in Cornwall, Vt., 9 May, 1789; d. in Middlebury, Vt., 18 Jan., 1869. He was graduated at Middlebury college in 1807, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and began practice at Middlebury. He was a presidential elector in 1812, and in 1814-15 published and edited the "Columbian Patriot" in connection with bookselling and job-printing, but was not successful. In 1815 he was elected secretary of state, which office he held eight years, and in 1816-22 he was judge of the Addison county court. He was afterward state's attorney for Addison county. In 1823 Slade was elected in the state department at Washington from 1823 to 1829, when he resumed the practice of law in Middlebury. He was a member of congress in 1831-33, in 1844 was reporter of the supreme court of Vermont, and in 1844-6 served as governor of that state. In 1846-56 he was secretary of the national board of popular education. He published "Vermont Advocate Papers" (Middlebury, 1823); "The Laws of Vermont to 1824" (Windsor, 1825); "Reports of the supreme court of Vermont, Vol. XV." (Burlington, 1844); and pamphlets and congressional speeches.

SLAFTER, Edmund Farwell, author, b. in Norwich, Vt., 30 May, 1816. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1840, studied at Andover theological seminary, and in 1844 was ordained a minister of the Protestant Episcopal church. The same year he became rector of St. Peter's church, Cambridge, Mass., where he remained till the autumn of 1846, when he was appointed rector of St. John's church, Jamaica Plain. Here he continued eight years, and then became assistant rector of St. Paul's church, Boston. In 1857 Mr. Slafter was appointed an agent to engage an emigrant in the same place he resigned in 1857, and he has since given his leisure time to historical studies. He is a member of many learned societies in America and Europe. He has published, among other works, "The Assassination Plot in New York in 1776: a Letter of Dr. William Eustis, Surgeon in the Revolutionary Army and late Governor of Massachusetts, with Notes" (Boston, 1868); "Memorial of John Slafter, with Genealogical Account of his Descendants" (1868); "The Charter of Norwich, Vermont, and Names of the Original Proprietors: with Brief Historical Notes" (1869); "The Vermont Coinage," Vermont historical society collection (Montpeller, 1870); "Sir William Alexander and American Colonization," in the series of the Life, Letters, and Journals of Sir John Stuart" (1873); "The Copper Coinage of the Earl of Stirling, 1632" (1874); "Voyages of the Northmen to America," edited, with an introduction (1877); "Voyages of Samuel de Champlain," translated from the French by Charles Pomery Otis, with historical illustrations and a memoir (3 vols., 1878, 1880, 1882); and "History and Description of Interst Erudites as recorded in the Journals of the Early Writers, Navigators, and explorers relating to the Atlantic Coast of North America, 1533-1740" (1889).

SLATER, Samuel, manufacturer, b. in Belper, Derbyshire, England, 9 June, 1784; d. in Webster, Mass., 21 April, 1855. He was the son of a respectable yeoman, received a good education, and served an apprenticeship at cotton-spinning with Jedidiah Strutt, the partner of Richard Arkwright. He was a favorite with Mr. Strutt, aided him in making improvements in his mills, and gained a thorough mastery of the theory and practice of the new manufacture. In 1789 congress passed his first act for the encouragement of manufactures, and the legislature of Pennsylvania offered a bounty for the introduction of the Arkwright patent. Young Slater became cognizant of these circumstances, and determined to introduce the invention in the United States; but, as the laws of England did not admit of his taking drawings or models with him, he had to trust to his memory to enable him to construct the most complicated machinery. He landed in New York in November, 1790, and having ascertained that Moses Brown had made some attempts at cotton-spinning in Rhode Island, wrote to him and told him what he could do. Mr. Brown, in replying to him, wrote: "If thou canst do this thing, I invite thee to come to Rhode Island, and have the credit of introducing cotton-manufacture into America." Slater proceeded to Pawtucket, R. I., in January, 1790, and immediately entered into articles of agreement with William Almy and Smith Brown to construct and operate the new cotton-spinning machinery. On 24 Dec., 1790, he started at Pawtucket three 18-inch carding-machines, the necessary drawing-heads with two rolls and four processes, the roving and winders for the same, and throttle spinning-frames of model English manufacture. In a short time reeds were made for putting the yarn into skeins, in which form it was at that time placed upon the market. In doing this Mr. Slater was compelled to prepare all the plans in the several departments of manufacturing, and to construct with his own hands the different kinds of machinery, or else teach others how to do it. The first yarn made on his machinery was equal to the best quality made in England. About 1800 the second cotton-mill went into operation in Rhode Island. In 1806 Mr. Slater was joined by his brother John, from England, and soon afterward a cotton-mill was erected in a locality now known as Slater'sville, R. I. In 1812 Mr. Slater began the erection of mills in Oxford (now Webster). Mass., adding in 1816-16 the manufacture of woollen cloth. He was also interested in iron-manufactures, and acquired great wealth. In 1796 he established a Sunday-school for the improvement of his work-people, which was the first, or among the first, in the United States. See a memoir of him by George S. White (Philadelphia, 1836).—His nephew, John Fox, philanthropist, b. in Slatersville, R. I., 4 March, 1813; d. in Norwich, Conn., 7 May, 1884, was the son of John Slater. He was early trained for the manufacturing business, and in 1832 became sole owner of the mill.
property he was then conducting. He made excellent investments, and in a few years acquired great wealth. Mr. Slater was early interested in the cause of education, and gave liberally for the establishment of the Norwich free academy and other objects. In April, 1882, he placed in the hands of trustees $1,000,000, the interest of which is to be used for the education of freedmen in the south. — His son, William Albert, in November, 1886, transferred to the Free academy, Norwich, a building costing $150,000, which he erected in memory of his father.

SLAUGHTER, Gabriel, governor of Kentucky, b. in Virginia about 1757; d. in Mercer county, Ky., Oct. 1874. As a boy he entered an early age, was a skilful and successful farmer, and frequently chosen to the legislature. At the battle of New Orleans he was colonel of a Kentucky regiment, and he received the thanks of the legislature for his gallant services on that occasion. In 1816 he was elected lieutenant-governor of Kentucky, and on the death of the governor, George Madison, soon after, he served as acting governor for the four years of Madison's term.

SLAUGHTER, William Banks, lawyer, b. in Culpeper county, Va., 10 April, 1788; d. in Madison, Wis., 21 July, 1879. He was educated at William and Mary, and admitted to the bar, practised first in Bardstown, Ky., and then in Bedford, Ind., and Madison, Wis. He was elected and continued as a representative of his district in the state legislature. While in that body he introduced a set of resolutions strongly sustaining President Andrew Jackson's proclamation to the South Carolina nullifiers. He was appointed register of the land-office at Indianapolis in 1833, and at Green Bay in 1835, and in the latter year was elected a member of the legislative council of Michigan, and in 1837 he was appointed territorial governor of that territory to the west of Lake Michigan he organized into a new territory to be named Wisconsin. After residing in Wisconsin and in his native place, he returned in 1861 to Middleton, Wis., and in 1862 was appointed commissary of subsistence and quartermaster. He wrote for periodicals and encyclopaedias, and published several religious tracts and a work on the Missouri Met (Milwaukee, 1878).

— His cousin, Philip, clergyman, b. in Springfield, Va., 26 Oct., 1808; d. 12 June, 1890. He was a son of Capt. Philip Slaughter, of the 11th continental regiment in the army of the Revolution. His education was obtained partly at home and partly in a classical academy at Winchester, Va. He entered the University of Virginia in 1823, and, after studying law, was admitted to the bar in 1828. Five years later, having resolved to enter the ministry, he went to the Episcopal theological seminary, Alexandria, Va. He was ordained deacon in Trinity church, Staunton, 25 May, 1834, by Bishop Meade, and priest in St. Paul's church, Alexandria, in July, 1835, by Bishop Richard C. Microsoft. His first charge was in Dettngen parish, Va. In 1836 he accepted a call to Christ church, Georgetown, D. C., in 1840 he assumed charge of Meade and Johns parishes, and in 1843 he became rector of St. Paul's church, Petersburg, Va. Health failing, he spent 1848-9 in Europe. On returning home he established in 1850, and edited, "The Virginia Colonizationist" at Richmond, Va. Six years later he built a church on his farm in Culpeper county, and officiated gratuitously for his neighbors and servants until his church was destroyed by the National army in 1862. He then edited in Petersburg "The Army and Navy Messenger," a religious paper for soldiers, and also preached and visited in camp and hospitals. When peace returned in 1865 he was for a time associate editor of the "Southern Churchman." Then he went back to his old home, where, as the churches were destroyed, he fitted up a recess-chancel in his own house for church services. Emmanuel church in Slaughter parish having been rebuilt, he accepted charge of it, and served there while health and strength sufficed. He received the degree of D. D. from William and Mary in 1874. Of late years he had held the office of historiographer of the diocese of Virginia, which was tendered to him by the convention. Dr. Slaughter had made large contributions to religious and general literature, not only in publishing special sermons, orations, addresses, and tracts, but had also assisted, in bringing out various volumes from his pen during the last forty years. Among these are "St. George's Parish History" (Richmond, 1847); "Man and Woman" (1860); "Life of Randolph Fairfax" (1862): "Life of Colonel Joshua Fry, Sometime Professor in William and Mary College, Va., and Washington's Senior in Command of Virginia Forces, in 1774" (New York, 1880); "History of the Churches of Virginia," in Bishop Perry's "Centennial History" (1882); "A Life of Hon. William Green, Jurist and Scholar" (Richmond, 1883); "Views from Cedar Mountains, in Fiftieth Year of Ministry and Marriage" (New York, 1884); "The Colonial Church of Virginia" (1886); "Christianity the Key to the National Character," and a number of addresses before the ladies of Mount Vernon association, in Pohick church (1886); and "Address to the Minute-Men of Culpeper" (1887).

SLEEPER, John Sherburne, author, b. in Tyngsboro, Mass., 21 Sept., 1794; d. in Boston Highlands, Mass., 14 Nov., 1878. He was during twenty-two years a sailor and a shipmaster in the merchant service of the United States. Engaged in journalism, was connected with the New Hampshire "News Letter" at Exeter in 1813-15, and the Lowell "Daily Journal" in 1833, and was editor of the Boston "Journal" in 1834-54. He was mayor of Roxbury, Mass., in 1836-8, and published "Tales of the Ocean" (Boston, 1843); "Salt-Water Black Dick in the Forecasts" (1850); "Mark Rowland, a Max" (Boston, by Hawser Martingale (1857); and various addresses.

SL Emm er, Adam Jacoby, soldier, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., in 1825; d. in Fort Laramie, Kan., 7 Oct., 1868. He was graduated at the United States military academy in July, 1850, and assigned to the 1st artillery. After a short campaign against the Seminole Indians in Florida, in which he took a creditable part, he was for four years on frontier service in California, and in 1855-9 was assistant professor of mathematics at the U. S. military academy. He afterward returned to garrison duty at Fort Moultrie, S. C., and in 1860 was transferred to Florida, where in 1861 he commanded a small body of U. S. soldiers in Pensacola harbor, opposing the forces of the Confederates at Fort Barrancas: but when intelligence of the surrender of Pensacola navy-yard reached him, he transferred his troops on 10 Jan., to Fort Pickens, opposite, which he successfully held until he was relieved by Col. Harvey Brown, thus preserving the key to the Gulf of Mexico. He was promoted major of the 10th infantry in May, 1861, for a short time inspector-general of the Department of the Ohio, returned to active duty in May, 1862, and participated in the siege of Corinth and the subsequent movement to Louisville, Ky., and to the relief of Nashville, Tenn. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and took part in the battle of Stone River, 31 Dec, 1862, where he was so severely wounded as to be incapacitated for further active service in the field. On 8 Feb., 1864, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 4th infantry, and in March, 1865, he was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for his meritorious services. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in August, 1865, and was afterward sent to command Fort Larimer, which he afterward died of heart disease.

SLENKER, Elmina Drake, author, b. in La Grange, N. Y., 23 Dec., 1827. She is a daughter of Thomas Drake, was educated at district schools, and then alternated between teaching and studying at higher schools. She married Isaac Slenker in 1856, and has long resided in Snowville, Va. Mrs. Slenker has contributed to various journals, and was in 1880-1 assistant editor of the New York "Physiologist and Family Physician." The "Children's Corner" in the "Boston Investigator," and "Elmina Column" in "The South Land," have been under her charge for several years, and she has published "Studying the Bible" (Boston, 1870); "John's Way" (New York, 1878); "The Durwins" (1879); and "Mary Jones" (Nashville, 1887). She was a clergyman's daughter, b. in Annapolis, Md., in 1801; d. in Baltimore, 23 April, 1874. He received a good education, worked for a time as a furniture-painter, studying theology at the same time, and in 1821 was licensed as a preacher of the Methodist Episcopal church. After serving on the Hartford and Redstone circuits, he was transferred in 1824 to the navy-yard at Washington. In 1832 he was appointed presiding elder of the Potomac district, and in 1837 he was elected chaplain of the U. S. senate, being twice re-elected. In 1846 he was stationed at Carlisle, Pa., was again elected chaplain of the U. S. senate, and held the office till 1850. In the following nineteen years he was stationed at Baltimore and Frederick city, was again chaplain of the senate, and a presiding elder for eight years. From 1862 till 1870 he was chaplain of the Seaman's chapel at Baltimore, and in 1870 he was again presiding elder of the Baltimore district. He had been a member of seven quadrennial general conferences. He received the degree of D. D. from Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1869. While chaplain of the senate he delivered a sermon against duelling, which provoked the adverse criticism of the act making duels illegal (New York, 1838). His other works are "Appeal on Christian Baptism" (New York, 1835), and "A Further Appeal" (1836).

SLIDELL John, statesman, b. in New York city about 1793; d. in London, England, 29 July, 1871. He was graduated at Columbia in 1810, and engaged unsuccessfully in commerce. He then studied law, and in 1816 removed to New Orleans, where, making a specialty of commercial law, he soon acquired a large practice. In 1828 he was a defeated Democratic candidate for congress, and actively canvassed the state for Andrew Jackson, who appointed him U. S. district attorney for Louisiana, but after a year in office he resigned. Mr. Slidell was a candidate for the U. S. senate in 1834, but Chapple's candidate was chosen. He disposed of his practice in 1835 and continued as a leader in Louisiana politics until 1842, when he was elected to congress as a state-rights Democrat, and served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 10 Nov., 1845. In November, 1843, he was sent as minister to Mexico by President Polk, to adjust the difficulty caused by the war between the United States and Mexico, but that government refused to receive him, and he returned in January, 1847, when he resigned. He was again a candidate for the U. S. senate in 1849; but his party were in the minority, and in the canvass of 1852 he was active in behalf of Franklin Pierce. On the inauguration of the latter he refused a diplomatic appointment to Central America, but, on the acceptance by Pierre Soulé of the French mission, he was sent to the U. S. senate and served, with re-election, from 6 Dec., 1861, to 4 Feb., 1861. He rarely spoke, but was a member of important committees, and exerted great influence. Preferring to remain in the senate, he declined a cabinet appointment from President Buchanan, but continued a confidential friend of the latter throughout his administration. Mr. Slidell was a strenuous supporter of the doctrines of state-rights, and, when Louisiana passed the ordinance of secession, he withdrew from the senate with his colleague, after making a defiant speech. In September, 1861, he was appointed Confederate commissioner to France, and set out with James M. Mason for Southampton from Havana in November. He was seized on the high-seas by Capt. Charles Wilkes, and brought to the United States. After imprisonment in Fort Warren he was released and sailed for England on 1 Jan., 1862.

From England he went at once to Paris, where, in February, 1862, he paid his first visit to the French minister of foreign affairs. His mission, which had for its object the recognition of the Confederate states by the French government, was a failure, but the well-known sympathy of Napoleon III., who at that time was deeply interested in the project of a Mexican empire under Maximilian, did much to favor the Confederate cause. In order to secure an understanding, he proposed a commercial convention, by which France should enjoy valuable export and import privileges for a long period, and which, if carried into effect speedily, on the basis of breaking the blockade, because of its legal insufficiency, would give France control of southern cotton, and in return furnish the Confederacy with ample supplies, including arms and munitions of war. This was not accepted, on account of the emperor's refusal to recognize the Confederate states unless the British authorities should co-operate. But the sympathy of Napoleon III. proved of great value, for by his secret influence Mr. Slidell was able to begin the negotiation of the $15,000,000 Confederate loan. Early in 1863 the emperor permitted him to make proposals for the construction of four steam corvettes and two iron-clad rams at private ship-yards in Bordeaux and Nantes; but later in the year, information of this fact coming to the knowledge of the U. S. representative in Paris, imperial orders were issued that the vessels should be sold to foreign powers. One of them was transferred to the Confederate navy in January, 1863, after being purchased by Denmark, as is claimed by the Confederates, though it is asserted on the other side that the purchase was fictitious. This vessel, the "Stonewall," set out for the United States, but did not reach Ha-

SLOAN, Samuel, railroad president, b. in Lisburn, near Belfast, Ireland, 25 Dec., 1817. He came to this country in infancy, was graduated at Columbia college graduated for-sword 1840, and entered the business as a clerk and afterward became a merchant. He was supervisor of Kings county in 1850, and state senator in 1858-'9, and was elected president of the Hudson River railroad, 13 Feb., 1855, which office he retained till 1862. Subsequently for two years he was commissioner of the trunk lines of railroad to the west, as general arbitrator of railroads dispute. Mr. Sloan was elected president of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad company in 1867, which post he now (1899) holds. He is also president of the Oswego and Syracuse: Syracuse, Binghamton, and New York; Utica, Chenango, and Susquehanna Valley; Fort Wayne and Jackson; Green Bay, Wisconsin, and St. Pauli and other roads.

SLOANE, P., bar., British naturalist, b. in Killyleagh, County Down, Ireland, 16 April, 1660; d. in London, 11 Jan., 1753. He studied medicine in London, in 1685 was elected a fellow of the Royal society, and afterward spent some time in Jamaica and other West India islands, where he collected a great number of plants. He became physician-general to the army in 1716, president of the College of physicians in 1719, and physician to the king in 1727, and about the same time succeeded Sir Isaac Newton as president of the Royal society. His library and natural history collection were purchased by the British government after his death, and formed the beginning of the British museum. Besides numerous contributions to the "Philosophical Transactions," he publishes the "Natural History of Jamaica" (2 vols., London, 1707-'25).

SLOANE, James Renwick Wilson, educator, b. in Topsham, Orange co., Vt., 29 May, 1823; d. in Allegheny City, Pa., 6 March, 1886. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1847, and studied theology at the Reformed Presbyterian seminary in northeastern Ohio, where he was graduated in 1853. In 1854 he became pastor at Rushsylvania, Ohio, and in 1856-'68 he held a charge in New York city. He was president of Richmond college, Ohio, in 1848-'50, of Geneva college, in the same state, in 1851-'6, and professor of systematic theology and homiletics in Allegheny theological seminary from 1865 till his death. He was also pastor of the 1st Reformed Presbyterian church in Alleghany. He published numerous sermons and literary addresses. See his "Life and Work," edited by his son, William (New York, 1888).—His son, William Milligan, educator, b. in Rich- mond, Ohio, 12 Nov., 1850, was graduated at Columbia in 1878. He was instructor in classics in Newell institute, Pittsburg, in 1866-'72, studied in Berlin and Leipsic in 1872-'6, and in 1873-'5, in addition, was also private secretary of George Bancroft, then minister at Berlin, and worked under his direction on the tenth volume of the "History of the United States." He is an assistant and professor of Latin in Princeton, and professor of history in that institution. In 1897 he accepted the professorship of history in Columbia. He edited the "New Princeton Review" and his father's "Life and Work" (New York, 1888), and has published "French War and the Revolution" (1890) and "Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" (4 vols., 1896-'7).

SLOANE, John, statesman, b. in York, Pa., in 1779; d. in Wooster, Ohio, 15 May, 1856. He removed to Ohio at an early age, was a member of the state assembly in 1804-'6, and served the last two years as speaker. He was U. S. receiver of public moneys at Canton in 1806-'16, and at Wooster in 1816-'19, was elected to congress from Ohio, and served seven years; he was elected sheriff of Stark county, 1819, till 3 March, 1829. He was clerk of the court of common pleas for seven years, secretary of the state of Ohio three years, and was appointed treasurer of the United States, serving from 27 Nov., 1850, till 1 April, 1853. During the war of 1812 he was a colonel of militia.

SLOANE, Rush Richard, lawyer, b. in Sandusky, Erie co., Ohio, 8 Sept., 1828. He was educated at Wesleyan academy, Norwalk, Ohio, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was city clerk of Sandusky, Ohio, in 1853-'7, was elected judge of the probate court for Erie county in 1857, and re-elected in 1860, was appointed by President Lincoln to the general agency of the post-office department, serving from 1861 till 1866, and was mayor of Sandusky in 1870, 1880, and 1881. Mr. Sloane was an ardent anti-slavery man, and was instrumental in the escape of seven slaves in Sandusky, on 20 Oct., 1859, where they had been arrested by their masters. He was prosecuted, and paid over $4,000 damages and costs, being the first victim of the fugitive-slaw law of 1850.

SLOANE, Thomas Cowperthwait, b. in New York city, 24 Nov., 1851. He is a nephew of Charles O'Conor. After graduation at St. Francis Xavier's college in 1870, and at the School of mines of Columbia in 1872, with the degree of E. M., he received the degree of Ph. D. in 1876 from the latter institution. His scientific work has included a method for the determination of sulphur in illuminating gas, and processes for the estimation of constituents in gas analysis. Dr. Sloane has invented the thermopile, which is the only apparatus ever devised for registering automatically and mechanically the illuminating power of gas. He has lectured extensively in schools and before public audiences, and since 1883 has been lecturer in chemistry and physics of the Hall pub. His services have been frequently called for as an expert in patent suits, and he is regularly retained by law firms in New York city. In 1878-'80 he was one of the department editors of the "Sanitary Engineer," and since 1886 has been one of the staff of the "Scientific American." He has contributed largely to technical journals in this country and abroad, and is a member of scientific societies. From 1882.

SLOCUM, John Drake, naval officer, b. in New York city in 1789; d. in New Brighton, Staten island, N. Y., 28 Nov., 1867. He entered the navy as midshipman, 12 Feb., 1800, and was honorably discharged by the peace-establishment act, 21 May, 1801. He re-entered the navy as a sailing-master, 10 Jan., 1812, and served in the frigate United States in 1812-13. He was promoted to captain, 25 Oct., 1812 he participated in the capture of the British frigate "Macedonian," and was subsequently blockaded in Thames river, Conn., by the British fleet until the end of the war. He received a vote of thanks and silver medal for the victory over the " Macedonian," and was promoted to lieutenant, 24 July, 1813. After the war he was on leave until 1817. In 1823-5 he cruised in the schooner " Grampus," suppressing piracy in the West Indies, and participated in the capture of the pirate brig " Palmyra " near Campeachy. He succeeded to the command of the " Grampus " in 1824, and assisted at the capture and destruction of the town of Foxhardo, the headquarters of the pirates on Porto Rico. In the spring of 1837 he cruised in a piratical brig near St. Thomas, W. I., with the pirate chief Colofreina, who was subsequently executed by the Spaniards. He was promoted to master-commandant, 21 March, 1826, and to captain, 9 Feb., 1837, and was commandant of the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1840-4. In 1844-5 he had command of the Pacific squadron, during which he occupied Monterey California, took the mission of Captain Vancouver, English admiral, and when the Mexican war began he secured possession of San Francisco and other points in California until he was relieved by Com. Robert E. Stockton, when he returned to Norfolk, 27 April, 1847. He had command of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1847-51, after which he was superin- tendent of the construction of the Stevens battery until 1855. He was placed on the reserved list, 27 Sept., 1855, and retired, 21 Dec., 1861, but was promoted to commodore, 16 July, 1862, and to rear-admiral, 25 July, 1866.

SLOCUM, Frances, captive among the Indians, b. in Wyoming valley, Pa., in 1753; d. near Logansport, Ind., in 1851. She was taken captive by Delaware Indians on 2 Nov. 1778, and no intelligence was received regarding her till the summer of 1837, when the surviving members of her family heard that she was residing near Logansport, Ind. Her brother, Joseph Slocum, and her sister proceed thither, and, obtaining an interview with their long-lost sister, had no difficulty in establishing her identity. She had entirely forgotten her native language and all knowledge of Christianity, and was absolutely unable to care for herself, the yield of her skin and the color of her hair. She had a distinct recollection of her capture by the savages, who, after taking her to a rocky cave in the mountains, departed for the Indian country. She was treated kindly and adopted by an Indian family, who brought her up as their daughter. For years she led a roving life, and became an expert in all the ceremonies of savage existence, and when grown to womanhood married a young chief of the nation, and removed with him to Ohio. She was so happy in her domestic relations that she dreaded being discovered and compelled to reside among the whites. After the death of her first husband she married one of the Miami tribe, and at the time of her discovery had been many years a widow, and had children and grandchildren around her. She was known among the Indians as Maconqua (young bear), was regarded by them as a queen, and was happy and in comfortable circumstances. When the Miamis were removed from Indiana, John Quincy Adams pleaded the cause of"Maconqua so eloquently in congress that she and her Indian relatives were exempted. Congress gave her a tract of land a mile square, to be held in perpetuity by her descendants.

SLOCUM, Henry Warner, soldier, b. in Delphi, N. Y., 24 Sept., 1827; d. in Brooklyn, 14 April, 1894. He was educated at the U. S. military academy, appointed 24 lieutenant in the artillery, and ordered to the same number. He was promoted 1st lieutenant in 1855, but resigned in October, 1856, and, returning to New York, engaged in the practice of law at Syracuse, and was a member of the legislature in 1859. At the opening of the civil war he entered the army with his services, and on 21 May, 1861, was appointed col-

Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1866 he declined the appointment of colonel of infantry in the regular army. In 1865 he was the unsuccessful candidate of the Democrats for secretary of state of New York, in 1868 he was chosen a presidential elector, and he was elected to congress the same year, and re-elected in 1870. In 1876 he was elected president of the board of city works, Brooklyn, which post he afterward resigned, and in 1884 he was again elected to congress. He was one of the commissioners of the Brooklyn bridge, and was in favor of its construction.

SLOCUMB, Ezekiel, soldier, b. in Craven county, N. C., about 1750; d. near Dudley, N. C., 4 July, 1840. His father, Joseph, was at one time a merchant in Atlanta, Ga. The son entered the Revolutionary army at an early age, and served through the war. As aLeutenant he fought at the battle of Moore's Creek, N. C., 27 Feb., 1776, and he attained the rank of colonel before the close of the war. After the battle of Guilford, in 1781, his farm was ravaged by the British troops while on their march from Wilmington to Virginia, and, aided by Maj. Williams, he raised a troop of about 200 men, and, following the royal army, succeeded in cutting off their foraging parties and harassed them greatly until they crossed the Cape Fear. He joined Gen. Lafayette in his march to Yorktown, and he was at Yorktown on 19 Oct., 1781. After the war he returned to his home on a plantation near Dudley, N. C., held many offices of honor and trust, and was a member of the North Carolina house of commons from 1812 till 1818.—His wife, Mary Hooks, at the battle of Moore's Creek, fearing for her husband's safety, went to the scene of the battle alone, and, having been assured that he was unhurt, dressed the wounds of the injured and returned to her home forty hours after she had left it, having ridden 125 miles on horseback.—Their son Jesse, b. in Dudley, N. C., 20 Aug., 1780; d. in Washington, D. C., 20 Dec., 1820, was elected to congress from North Carolina for two successive terms, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till his death.

SLough, John P. (s/o) soldier, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1829; d. in Santa Fe, N. M., 16 Dec., 1867. He became a lawyer in his native city, and in 1850 was elected to the legislature of Ohio, from which he was expelled for striking a member. In 1852 he became a secretary of the central Democratic committee of Ohio, the son afterwar went to Kansas and entered the 1st Kansas volunteer, and afterward became colonel of the 1st Colorado regiment, forming part of Gen. Edward R. S. Canby's expedition to New Mexico. He fought there, in opposition to orders, the battle of Pigeon's Roost, gaining a distinction. After his return to Sibley, who was forced to retire into Texas. Immediately after this he gave up his commission as colonel and proceeded to Washington, where he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers and military governor of Alexandria. At the close of the war he was appointed chief justice of New Mexico by President Johnson; but his manner and influence were so strong that many bills and resolutions of resolutions were passed in the legislature advocating his removal from the chief justiceship, which so incensed him against William D. Ryerson, the member who had introduced them, that a personal encounter took place between the two men, resulting in Gen. Slocumb's death.

Sluter, George Ludewig, clergyman, b. in Rodenberg, Hesse-Cassel, Germany, 5 May, 1837. In 1847 he settled with his parents in St. Louis, Mo. He was graduated at Westminster college, Fulton, Mo., in 1860, in 1863 at Princeton theological seminary, and was licensed as a preacher by the presbytery of New Brunswick the same year. He has been settled as pastor in Rensselaer, and St. Louis, Mo., Duluth, Minn., and Shelbyville, Ind., and since 1881 at Arlington, N. J. From 1866 till 1870 he was secretary of home missions of the synod of Missouri. He was assistant editor of the "Missouri Presbyterian" in 1866–70, but in 1873 returned the work correspondant of the Cincinnati "Herald and Free-Byter." He has published "Life and Character of Joseph Hamilton" (Shelbyville, Ind., 1872); "Memorial of Jane Major" (1874); "History of our Beloved Church" (1876); "Historical and Critical Investigations of the Acta Pilati (Indianapolis, 1879); "Illustrated Historical Atlas of Shelby County, Indiana" (Chicago, 1880); "The Religion of Politics" (Shelbyville, 1888); "Life of the Emperor Tiburion" (New York, 1881); and minor works.

SMALL, Alvin Edmund, physician, b. in Maine, 4 March, 1811; d. in Chicago, Ill., 29 Dec., 1886. He began the study of medicine at Bath in 1831, and subsequently continued it in the University of Pennsylvania. He settled in Delaware county, Pa., but in 1838 moved to Philadelphia. He returned to St. Louis in 1846. He then opened practice in St. Louis, and was highly successful in his profession. Here he became converted to the homœopathic school of medicine. In 1849 Dr. Small was appointed professor of physiology and pathology in the Homœopathic medical college of Pennsylvania, where he remained for seven years, during which time he wrote several medical works and was editor of the "Philadelphia Journal." In 1856 he removed to Chicago and entered at once into an extensive practice, which he continued till his death. Soon after his arrival in that city he was called to the chair of theory and practice in Hahnemann college, where he held for life.

SMALL, Henry Beaumont, Canadian naturalist, b. in Market Bosworth, Leicestershire, England, 31 Oct., 1831. He was educated at King's college, London, and Lincoln college, Oxford, where he was graduated in 1853, afterward emigrated to Canada, and in 1858 removed to the state of New York, where he was a teacher of classics in a military school at Sing Sing in 1860–2. He afterward taught for a time in New York city, served in the U. S. sanitory commission in Virginia during part of the civil war. In 1868 he entered the army, and during the war was in Europe. He entered the civil service of Canada in 1878, and became chief clerk of emigration and quarantine in 1883. Mr. Small has contributed extensively to the British, American, and Canadian press and to magazines, and among other works has published "Animals of North America, Mammals" (Montreal, 1860); "Fresh-Water Fish" (1866); "Chronology of Canadian History" (Montreal, 1865); "The Squirrel in the Canadian Valley" (Ottawa, 1872); "Mineral Resources of Canada" (1880); and "Canadian Forests" (Montreal, 1885).

SMALL, John, British soldier, b. in Strachardlie, Athole, Scotland, in 1726; d. in the island of Guernsey, 17 March, 1796. After serving in the Scotch brigade in the Dutch war, his name is mentioned in an order for the 49th Highlanders, 29 Aug., 1747, and was appointed a lieutenant on the eve of the departure of that regiment for this country, to join the force under London. He served under Abercrombie in the attack on Ticonderoga in 1758, accompanied Sir Jeffrey Amherst the following year in his expedition, went to Montreal in 1759, was on service in the West Indies in 1763, and the same year was made captain. On 14
June, 1755, he received a commission as major to raise a corps of Highlanders in Nova Scotia in aid of the crown. He was in the battle of Banker Hill, and is a prominent figure in Col. Trumbull's picture. He was appointed major commanding the 2d battalion of the 8th regiments, with part of which he joined the army under Sir Henry Clinton at New York in 1779, and in 1780 he became lieutenant-colonel. He was appointed colonel, 18 Nov., 1790, became lieutenant-governor of Guernsey in 1793, and major-general, 3 Oct., 1794.

SMALL, Michael Peter, soldier, b. in Harrisburg, Pa., 9 Aug., 1834; d. on Governor's island, N. Y., 1 Aug., 1868. He was made an ensign, assigned to the artillery, served against the Seminole Indians, and was promoted 1st lieutenant, 27 April, 1861. He served as chief commissary and quartermaster at Rolla, Mo., from 4 Sept., 1861, till 31 Jan., 1863; as chief commissary of the 13th army corps, and of the army during the field, in the Teleca campaign in the Department of the Gulf from 15 Sept. till 9 Nov., 1863; and was supervising commissary of the states of Illinois and Indiana from December, 1863, till February, 1864. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel on the staff, 15 Sept., 1863, became chief commissary of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina at Fortress Monroe, supplied the armies operating against Richmond, and acted in a similar capacity in the armies of the military districts till the close of the war. He became brevet colonel of U. S. volunteers, 1 Jan., 1865, and brevet brigadier-general, 9 April, 1865, for meritorious services in the subsistence department during the war. At the time of his death Gen. Small was assistant commissary general.

SMALLEY, Eugene Virgil, journalist, b. in Richmond, Indiana, 17 July, 1841; d. in St. Paul, 29 Dec., 1899. He was educated in the public schools, and passed a year in New York central college at McCombville. He enlisted at the beginning of the civil war in the 7th Ohio infantry, and frequently sent letters about different engagements to the newspapers, for which descriptions he had short of a considerable distance. He served until nearly the close of the struggle, when he was discharged on account of wounds, and as soon as he was able he went to Washington, D. C., where, in 1865, he was appointed clerk of the military committee of the house of representatives. He retained the post until 1873, at the same time corresponding at intervals for different journals. He then formed a connection with a New York journal, continuing to be its correspondent and editorial writer for nine years. During his residence in Washington he had formed an intimate acquaintance with public men and measures, which aided him greatly as a journalist. In 1882 he entered the employ of the Northern Pacific railroad, and in 1884 established the "Northwest," an illustrated magazine, in St. Paul, Minn., of which he continued to be the editor and publisher. He is a frequent contributor to periodicals, mainly on subjects relating to the resources and development of the region in which he has made his home. He has published "History of the Northern Pacific Railroad" (New York, 1883), and "History of the Rutland Railroad" (1884).

SMALLEY, George Washburn, journalist, b. in Franklin, Norfolk co., Mass., 2 June, 1836. He was graduated at Yale in 1853, read law with George F. Hoar at Worcester in 1853-4, and in Harvard law-school in 1854-5, and in 1856 was admitted to the Boston bar. He practised law in Boston until the opening of the civil war, when, in the service of the New York "Tribune," he accompanied the National troops to Port Royal, afterward going with Gen. John C. Frémont into Virginia. Remaining with the Army of the Potomac, he witnessed the battle of Antietam. Immediately upon its close, Smalley rode thirty miles, found a train, and, going direct to New York, wrote his narrative of the engagement on the cars. This vivid description, with the energy that had been shown in its transmission and publication, gave him rank among the best-known war correspondents. In 1863 he was a member of the editorial staff of the "Tribune." At the surrender of Prussia and Austria in 1866 Mr. Smalley was sent on a day's notice to Europe. At the close of the war he returned for a few months to New York, but was sent to England in May, 1867, by the "Tribune," with instructions to organize a London bureau for that journal. This he did, and the success that has attended the European department of the "Tribune" is largely due to his efforts. In 1870, at the opening of the Franco-German war, the "Tribune" devised a new system of news-gathering. Mr. Smalley, as the agent of this policy, showed an energy and foresight which gave him an eminent rank in journalism. The English writer Kinglake, in his "History of the Crimean War," says: "The success of that partnership for the purpose of war news was largely due to the competition between London newspapers and the New York "Tribune," was an era in the journalism of Europe." Mr. Smalley in 1897 became New York correspondent of the London "Times." He has written "London Letters and Some Others" (New York, 1891) and "Studies of Men" (1896).

SMALLEY, John, clergyman, b. in Lebanon (now Centreville), Conn., 4 July, 1784; d. in New Britain, Conn., 1 June, 1829. After his graduation at Yale in 1756 he studied theology under Rev. Joseph Bellamy, and on 19 April, 1758, was ordained and installed pastor over a newly organized church at New Britain, Conn., sustaining the relation, with slight interruption, a little more than fifty years. In 1800 he received the degree of D. D. from Princeton, and in 1811 was given a colleague, preaching afterward occasionally and devoting himself to the preparation of a second volume of discourses for publication. Dr. Smalley's sermons, which he always read in the pulpit, have seldom been surpassed in logical accuracy, clearness, and strength. The Rev. Royal Robbins says in 1856: "Dr. Smalley, in referring to his treatise on 'Natural and Moral Inability' (1785), seemed to think that no one previously had drawn the proper distinctions on this subject—not even Edwards had made the matter clear. Admitting the correctness of this opinion, he is to be regarded as the father of New England theology in that branch of it." He published two sermons on "Natural and Moral Inability" (1785); popular essays (London) : one on "The Perfection of Divine Law" (1787); and an "Election Sermon" (1800). Two volumes of his sermons were issued in 1803-14.

SMALLS, Robert, member of congress, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 5 April, 1839. Being a slave, he was debarred from attending school, and was altogether self-educated. He returned to South Carolina in 1851, taking up the negro's trade, afterward led a seafaring life, and in 1861 was employed as a pilot on "The Planter," a steamer that plied in Charleston harbor as a transport. In May, 1862, he took this vessel over Charleston bar, and delivered her to the commander of the U. S. blockading squadron. After serving for some time as pilot in the U. S. navy, he was promoted captain for gallant and meritorious conduct, 1 Dec., 1863, and placed in command of "The Planter," serving until she was put out of commission in 1866. He returned to Beaufort after the war, was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1868, was elected a member of the state house of representatives the same year, and of the state senate in 1870, and was re-elected in 1872. He was elected to the 44th congress from South Carolina, has been re-elected to every succeeding congress except the 46th, for which he was defeated, and served, with this exception, from 6 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1888. He has been major-general of state troops.

SMALLWOOD, Charles, Canadian meteorologist, b. in Birmingham, England, in 1812; d. in Montreal, 22 Dec., 1873. He became a physician, and, emigrating to Canada in 1853, settled at St. Martin's, Isle Jews, Canada East, and acquired a large practice. He soon afterward established his meteorological and electrical observatory, a description of which was given in the "Smithsonian Reports." He discovered the effects of atmospheric electricity on the formation of snow crystals, and investigated the action of ozone in connection with light, and that of electricity in the germination of seeds. In 1858 Dr. Smallwood received the honorary degree of LL. D. from McGill college, and was appointed professor of meteorology in that institution, to which was subsequently added the chair of astronomy. In 1860 the Canadian government made him a grant for the purchase of magnetic instruments, and, in August, 1861, he began making observations. When the U. S. signal-service system was established, Dr. Smallwood arranged for stations in connection with his observatory in other Canadian cities. He was one of the governors of the College of physicians and surgeons of Lower Canada, and was a member of many scientific and literary societies in America and Europe. He was the author of numerous articles in scientific periodicals and the "Smithsonian Reports," and of contributions to Canadian meteorology furnished to various magazines for more than twenty years.

SMALLWOOD, William, soldier, b. in Kent county, Md., in 1732; d. in Prince George county, Md., 14 Feb., 1792. On 2 Jan., 1776, he was elected colonel of the Maryland battalion, and on 10 July, with nine companies, he joined Washington in New York. On 20 Aug., his troops took an active part in the battle of Brooklyn Heights, being hotly engaged from sunrise till sunset, the last gun was fired, and losing nearly half their number. At White Plains, on 18 Oct., the Maryland line again bore the brunt of the fight, and Smallwood was wounded. For his gallantry on this occasion congress appointed him a brigadier-general, 23 Oct., 1776. In the battle of Fort Washington, 16 Nov., 1776, his command again suffered severely, and at Germantown, 4 Oct., 1777, the Maryland line retrieved the day and captured part of the enemy's camp. In the winter of 1777-8 he was stationed at Wilmington, and captured a British brig in the Delaware laden with stores and provisions. He won new laurels in the battle of Camden, and received the thanks of congress for his gallant conduct. In September, 1780, he was appointed major-general, but, after the removal of Gates he refused to serve under Baron Steuben, who was his senior officer, declaring his intention to leave the army unless congress should antedate his commission two years. This claim was not allowed, being regarded as absurd, but Gen. Smallwood remained in the army until 15 Nov., 1783. In 1788 he was elected to congress, and the same year he was chosen governor of Maryland, which was the last public post that he held.

SMARIUS, Cornelius Francis, clergyman, b. in Telburg, North Brabant, Holland, 3 March, 1823; d. in Detroit, Mich., 2 March, 1870. After completing his studies at the University of North Brabant, he came to the United States and joined the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Mo., 13 Nov., 1841. In 1843 he went to Cincinnati, where he pursued theological studies, and was assistant professor of poetry and rhetoric in a school there until 1848. During this period he published anonymously many poems of much beauty. He was ordained priest in 1849, afterward studied in Fordham, N. Y., and was titular of the diocese of St. Francis Xavier in St. Louis in 1859-60. Here he displayed such powers as a pulpit orator that he became very popular. In 1861 he was detailed for missionary work, with a large field of operations, and in 1865 he visited Europe for his health. He was vice-president of the University of St. Louis in 1880-2, and again in 1887-8. He published "Notes of a General's Tour," 1860.

SMEDES, Susan Dabney, author, b. in Raymond, Miss., 10 Aug., 1840. She is the daughter of Thomas S. Dabney, a rich planter, and was educated at home, at New Orleans, and at Jackson, Miss. When twenty years of age she married Lyell Smedes, but was left a widow about three months afterward. With her sisters she originated and supported the Bishop Green training-school at Drew. Green was a law professor and teacher in the Government Indian school in Rosebud agency, Dakota territory. She has published "Memorials of a Southern Planter," which conveys a graphic picture of southern plantation life at its best, and of slavery in its least repulsive aspect (Baltimore, 1887).

SMILIE, John, member of congress, b. in Ireland in 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 Dec., 1812. He came to Pennsylvania in 1769, settled in Lancaster county, and served during the war of the Revolution in both military and civil capacities. He was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, served in congress, as a Democrat, in 1793-5 and in 1799-1813, and was chairman of the committee on foreign relations. He was a presidential elector in 1796.
SMILLIE, James (smily), engraver, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 28 Nov., 1801; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 4 Dec., 1885. He was at first apprenticed to James Johnston, a silver-engraver, after whose death, ten months later, he worked for a time with an engraver of pictures, Edward Mitchell. In 1821 he came with his family to Canada, settling in Quebec, where his father and eldest brother established themselves as bank-note engravers. Smillie worked with them for some time as a general engraver, until Lord Dalhousie, struck with his evident talent, gave him free passage to London and letters of introduction in 1827. This did not prove of much assistance to the young artist, as the London engravers, regarding him as the governor's protegé, asked most exorbitant premiums. Smillie thereupon went to Edinburgh, where he worked for about five months, after which he returned to Quebec. He went in 1829 to New York, where he settled permanently in the following year. His engraving after Robert W. Weir's "Convent Gate" first brought him into notice, and during 1832-6 he engraved a series of plates, mostly after paintings by Weir, for the New York Art-Union. In 1842 he was elected a member of the National academy, and he became an academian in 1851. From the first his name became connected with the art of bank-note engraving, and he has been called the pioneer in this line. From 1861 till his death his time was devoted to that branch of engraving. He is best known, however, as a landscape-engraver, in which branch of art he probably had no equal in this country. Among his more important plates, all executed in the line manner, are "Dream of Arcadia," after Cole; and "Dover Plains," after Asher B. Durand (1850), and "Mount Washington," after John F. Kensett, and "American Harvesting," after Jasper F. Cropsey (1851)—all engraved for the American art union; the series "The Voyage of Life," after Thomas Cole (1853-4), and "The Rocky Mountains," after Albert Bierstadt (1855-6).—His brother, William Cumming, engraver, b. in Edinburgh, 23 Sept., 1813, emigrated with his parents to Canada in 1821. He first worked at silver-engraving, but, after coming to New York in 1839, soon turned his attention to bank-note engraving. He was connected as partner with his brother in the last end of Edward Jones and Smillie, was eventually absorbed by the American bank-note company. In 1866 he established a bank-note engraving company at Ottawa, Canada, having secured a contract to furnish the Canadian government with all its paper currency, bonds, etc. In 1874 he retired from this business, but eight years later he again established a company in Canada. In this business he is still (1889) engaged.—James's son, James David, artist, b. in New York city, 16 Jan., 1833, was educated by his father as an engraver on steel. He produced some excellent work, notably the illustrations for Cooper's novels after Felix O. C. Darley's designs, but his principal work was on bank-note vignettes. In 1864, after his first visit to Europe, he turned his attention to painting but without success. The same year he first exhibited at the Academy of design, New York, and was elected an associate of the academy in 1865, and an academian in 1876. His work in oil includes "The Lifting of the Clouds, White Mountains" (1868); "Dark against Day's Golden Death, Catskills" (1870); "A工作任务的Success," \\

SMITH, Sir Albert James, Canadian statesman, b. in Westmoreland county, New Brunswick, in 1820. He was educated in his native county, studied law, was called to the bar of New Brunswick in 1847, and was afterward appointed queen's counsel. He was a member of the New Brunswick legislature from 1832 till the union of the province with Canada in 1867, when he was elected to the Dominion parliament. He was re-elected by acclamation in 1872, on his appointment to office, and again at the general election in 1878. He was a member of the executive council of New Brunswick from 1836 till 1863 and for a short period in 1866; attorney-general from 1862 till 1863, when he retired from the government and held the same office in his own administration in 1865. He was a delegate to London in 1858 on the subject of the intercolonial railway, and on public business in 1865, and to Washington with Mr. Galt (now Sir Alexander T. Galt) and others on the subject of reciprocal trade, in January, 1896. He declined the chief justiceship of New Brunswick in 1866, the lieutenant-governorship of the same province in 1873, and the chancellorship in 1876. He was created a baronet, of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, in 1874. He became a member of the privy council, and was appointed minister of marine and fisheries, 7 Nov., 1873. He represented the Dominion government before the fisheries commission at Halifax in 1877, and was created a knight commander of the order of St. Michael and St. George in 1878.

SMITH, Alfred Baker, soldier, b. in Massena, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., 17 Nov., 1825; d. in Poughkeepsie, 28 Jan., 1896. He was graduated at Union college, was admitted to the bar in 1853, and practised in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He entered the National army in October, 1862, as major of the 150th New York volunteers, and was brigadier-general in every march and action from Gettysburg till the close of the war, succeeding to the command as senior officer at Atlanta. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel and colonel, and was made brigadier-general of volunteers by brevet for meritorious services in the campaign of Georgia and the Carolinas. Gen. Smith was a member of the Loyal Legion and of the Poughkeepsie board of education, of which he was president for several years, and in 1867-75 was postmaster of that city.

SMITH, Andrew Jackson, soldier, b. in Bucks county, Pa., 28 April, 1815; d. in St. Louis, 30 Jan., 1897. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, became 1st lieutenant in 1845 and captain in 1847, and was engaged on the frontier against hostile Indians. He became major in May, 1861, colonel of the 2d California cavalry on 2 Oct. of that year, from 11 Feb. to 11 March, 1862, was placed in command of the Department of the Missouri, and in March and July of the Department of the Mississippi. He became brigadier-general of volunteers in March, 1862, engaged in the advance upon Corinth and siege of that place, was transferred to the Department of the Ohio, and subsequently to the Army of the Tennessee, which he accompanied on the Yazoo river expedition, and participated in the assaults on Vicksburg, 27-29 Oct., 1862, and of Arkansas Post, 11 Jan., 1863. During the Vicksburg campaign he led a division in the 13th army corps. He was then assigned to the command of a division of the 16th army corps, which captured Fort De Russy, engaged in the battle of Pleasant Hill, and in almost constant skirmishing during the Red River campaign, in April, 1864, receiving the brevet of colonel, U. S. army, for "gallant and meritorious service at Pleasant Hill."! He became lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, in May, 1864, and major-general of volunteers on the 12th of that month, was ordered to Missouri, aided in driving Gen. Sterling Price from the state, and was then called to reinforce Gen. George H. Thomas at Nashville, and to aid in pursuit of Gen. John B. Hood's army, being engaged at Nashville. He received the brevets of brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865, for gallant service at the battles of Tupelo, Miss., and Nashville, Tenn. From February till June of that year he commanded the 16th army corps in the reduction and capture of Mobile. He was mustered out of volunteer service in January, 1866, and on 28 July became colonel of the 7th U. S. cavalry. He then commanded the Department of the Missouri from 14 Sept., 1867, to 2 March, 1868, and was on leave of absence till 6 May, 1869, when he resigned. On 3 April of that year he became postmaster of St. Louis.

SMITH, Archibald Cary, naval archtect, b. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1837. He was educated at the University grammar-school, New York city, learned the trade of boat-building, and in 1860 built the "Comet," a sail-boat that defeated all rivals for several years. He studied painting under Maurice F. L. de Hulhe, frequently painted pictures of many noted yachts. He designed for Robert Centre, of New York city, in 1871, the cutter "Vindex," which was the first iron yacht that was built in Chester, Pa., and attracted much attention as a departure from the usual type. His success in this business induced him to abandon painting, and he has devoted himself to designing and altering yachts of all kinds, among which are the schooners "Intrepid," "Fortuna," "Norma," "Harbinger," "Carlotta," "Iroquois," "Oriole," "Dream," "Whim." the sloops "Mischief," "Rover," "Kestrel," "Priscilla," "Cinderella," "Banshee," "Katrina," and "Meteore." The "Mischief" defended the "American" cup in 1870. He designed the yacht "Albatross," of New York. He delivered a course of lectures on naval architecture before the Seawanhaka yacht club, New York city, in 1878, and for many years was measurer of the New York yacht club.

SMITH, Asa Dodge, clergyman, b. in Amherst, N. H., 21 Sept., 1804; d. in Hanover, N. H., 16 Aug., 1877. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1826, and at Andover theological seminary in 1834, serving in 1830-1 as principal of Limerick academy, Me. He was pastor of the 14th street Presbyterian church in New York city from 1834 till 1863, lectured on pastoral theology in Union theological seminary in 1843-4, and president of Dartmouth from 1863 until his death. Williams gave him the degree of D.D. in 1849, and the University of New York city that of LL.D. in 1864. He published a large number of addresses and sermons, and "Letters to a Young Student" (Boston, 1832); "Memoir of Mrs. Louisa Adams Leavitt" (New York, 1843); "Discourse on the Life and Character of Rev. Charles Hall" (1854); "The Puritan Character," an address (1857); "Home Missions and Slavery," a pamphlet (1857); "Christian Stewart," an address (1863); "Inauguration Address" (Hanover, N. H., 1863).

SMITH, Ashbel, diplomatist, b. in Hartford, Conn., 13 Aug., 1805; d. in Harris county, Tex., 21 Jan., 1886. He was graduated at Yale in 1824, and at the medical department in 1828, after studying law in the interval. He also attended the Paris hospitals in 1829-32, and practised in North Carolina till 1836, when he removed to Texas, and was appointed in the same year surgeon-general of the new republic. He was joint commissioner in making the first treaty with the Comanches in 1837, Texan minister to the United States, Great Britain, France, and Spain, during the administration of President Samuel Houston and President Anson Jones, was recalled in 1845, and became secretary of state under the latter, which office he held until the annexation of Texas to the United States in 1845. He was a member of the legislature from Harris county for several years, and served throughout the Mexican war. In the early part of the civil war he raised the 2d Texas volunteers for the Confederate service, leading that regiment in several campaigns east of Missouri river. He retired to his plantation on Galveston bay in 1865, and while taking an active part in state politics as a Democrat was also occupied in the preparation of papers on scientific and agric-cultural topics. In his profession his services were rendered gratuitously, and in every yellow-fever epidemic he went to Houston or Galveston and devoted himself to the sufferers. He was instrumental in the establishment of the state university, and president of its board of regents. His publications included "Account of the Yellow Fever in Galveston, in 1859." (Galveston, 1860); "Account of the Geographic of Texas" (1851); and "Permanent Identity of the Human Race" (1860).

SMITH, Augustus William, educator, b. in Newport, Herkimer co., N. Y., 12 May, 1802; d. in Annapolis, Md., 36 March, 1866. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1825, became a teacher in Oneida conference seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., was professor of mathematics and astronomy in Wesleyan in 1834-51, and at the latter date became its president. From 1859 until his death he was professor of natural philosophy in the U. S. naval academy. Hanilton gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1850. In 1860 he was one of the corps of astronomers that were sent by the U. S. government to Labrador to observe the annular eclipse of the sun. He was one of the eminent mathematicians, and the author of several text-books, including an "Elementary Treatise on Mechanics" (New York, 1846).

SMITH, Azariah, missionary, b. in Manlius, N. Y., 16 Feb., 1817; d. in Aintab, Asia Minor, 5 June, 1851. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, studied medicine and theology, and in 1842 embarked for western Asia as a missionary. He arrived in Smyrna in 1843, made numerous journeys into the interior, and was the travelling companion of Sir Austin Henry Layard. Subsequently, when Asiatic cholera raged there, he successfully practised among the sufferers. He settled at Aintab in 1848, and taught and preached there until his death. He wrote several valuable papers on meteorology and Syrian antiquities for the "American Journal of Science."

SMITH, Benjamin, governor of North Carolina, b. in Brunswick county, N. C., in 1750; d. in Smithville, N. C., 10 Feb., 1829. He became aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington in 1766, was with him in the retreat from Long Island, participated in the defense of Fort Monticello, and served during the British invasion of South Carolina. In 1778 he enrolled 8000 acres of land to the University of North Carolina, whose trustees named a hall in that institution in his honor. He was fifteen times a member of the state senate from Brunswick county, served as major-general of militia in 1794-1810, and, when with war in France was threatened in 1796, raised a regiment of North Carolina volunteers in his county. He was governor of the state in 1810-12. A town and an island of North Carolina are named in his honor.

SMITH, Benjamin Bosworth, P. E. bishop, b. in Bristol, R. I., 13 June, 1794; d. in New York city, 31 May, 1884. He entered Brown university, Providence, R. I., and was graduated in 1816. Although of Congregational parentage, he studied for the ministry in the Episcopal church, ordained deacon in St. Michael's church, Bristol, 23 April, 1817, by Bishop Griswold, and priest in St. Michael's church, Marblehead, Mass., 24 June, 1818, by the same bishop. His earliest work in the ministry was in Marblehead for two years, after which he became rector of St. George's church, Accomack county, Va., and two years later rector of Zion church, Charleston, with charge of the church in Shepherdstown. In 1823 he removed to Vermont and became rector of St. Stephen's church, Middlebury, in 1828 he assumed charge of Grace church mission, Philadelphia, and in 1830 he accepted the rectorship of Christ church, Lexington, Ky. This last post he held until 1837. While in Vermont he was editor of "The Episcopal Register," and subsequently in Philadelphia he conducted "The Episcopal Recorder." He received the degree of S. T. D. from Geneva (now Hobart) college in 1832, and that of LL.D. from Griswold college, Iowa, in 1870, and from Brown university in 1872. He was elected first bishop of Kentucky, and was consecrated in St. Paul's chapel, New York city, 31 Oct., 1832. On the death of Bishop Hopkins in 1868 he became the presiding bishop. From 1872 onward, owing to advanced age and accompanying infirmities, he was allowed to reside out of the limits of his diocese, and he was furnished with an assistant in January, 1873. In addition to his contributions as editor to church journals, Bishop Smith published "Five Charges to the Clergy" of his diocese: "Saturday Evening, or Thoughts on the Progress of the Plan of Salvation" (New York, 1876); and "Apostolic Succession, Facts which prove that a Ministry appointed by Christ Himself involves this Position" (1877).

SMITH, Benjamin Hosby, clergyman, b. in Powhatan county, Va., 30 June, 1811. He was graduated at Hampden Sidney in 1832, and at the Virginia union theological seminary in 1833. He was tutor in Hebrew and introductory studies from that date till 1836, and was successively pastor of Presbyterian churches in Danville and Augusta county, Va., from 1840 till his appointment in 1854 to the chair of Oriental and Biblical literature in Union seminary, which office he still (1889) holds. In 1885-77 he was pastor of Hampden Sidney college church, and he was moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in 1876. Hampden Sidney gave him the degree of D. D. in 1847. Dr. Smith exercises much influence in the affairs of his church in Virginia. He has published numerous sermons and addresses, "A Commentary on the Psalms and Proverbs," (Glasgow, 1859; Knoxville, 1883), and "Questions on the Gospels" (Richmond, Va., 1888).

SMITH, Buckingham, antiquarian, b. on Cumberland island, Ga., 31 Oct., 1810; d. in New York city, 5 Jan., 1871. He was graduated at Harvard law-school in 1836, and practised his profession in Maine, but soon returned to his family estate in Florida, where he was a member of the territorial legislature. He was U. S. secretary of legation in Mexico in 1850-2, acting as chargé d'affaires in 1851. During his residence there he made a thorough study of Mexican history and antiquities and Indian philology, and collected many books and manuscripts. He was secretary of legation at Madrid in 1853-5, made important researches in the Spanish libraries and archives respecting the colonial history of Florida and Louisiana, and rendered valuable services to George Bancroft, Jared Sparks, and Francis Parkman. He settled in Florida in 1859, became a judge, and served several terms in the state senate. A part of his library was bought by the New York historical society after his death. He edited translations of the "Narrative of Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca" (Washington, D. C., 1851; improved ed., New York, 1875); "The Letter of Hernando de Soto" and "Memoir of Hernando de Escalante Fontaneda," of each of which 100 copies were printed (Washington, 1854; collected and published in Spanish under the title of "Colección de Varios Documentos para la Historia de la Florida y Zonas Adyacentes," Madrid, 1857); "A Grammatical Sketch of the Heve Language" (New York, 1861); a "Grammar of the Pima or Növome: A Language of Sonora, from a Manuscript of the 17th Century" (St. Augustine, 1867); "An Enquiry into the Authenticity of Documents concerning a Discovery of North America claimed to have been made by Verrazzano" (1864); and a volume of translations of "Narratives of the Career of Hernando de Soto in the Conquest of Florida" (1866). He also wrote for the magazines concerning the early history and writers of Florida.

SMITH, Caleb Blood, secretary of the interior, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 April, 1808; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 7 Jan., 1864. He emigrated with his parents to Ohio in 1814, was educated at Cincinnati and Miami colleges, studied law in Cincinnati and in New Orleans, and was admitted to the bar in 1828. He began practice at the latter place, established and edited the "Sentinel" in 1832, served several terms in the Indiana legislature, and was in congress in 1843-49, having been elected as a Whig. During his congressional career he was one of the Mexican claims commissioners. He returned to the practice of law in 1850, residing at Cincinnati and afterward in New Orleans. He was influential in securing the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for the presidency at the Chicago Republican convention in 1860, and was appointed by him secretary of the interior in 1861, which post he resigned in December, 1862, to become U. S. circuit judge for Indiana.

SMITH, Charles, bookseller, b. in New York city, 1786; d. in New York, 1868. He was a bookseller in New York city, translated plays for the stage from the German of Kotzebue and Schiller, and edited the "Monthly Military Repository" in 1796-7. The Revolutionary descriptions in which were said to have been supplied by Baron Steuben and Gen. Horatio Gates. He also published a "Political Pocket Almanac" (New York, 1797).

SMITH, Charles Adam, clergyman, b. in New York city, 35 June, 1809; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Feb., 1879. His parents were German. Charles was educated at Hartwick seminary, ordained to the ministry of the Lutheran church in 1830, and was pastor successively in Palatine, N. Y., and in Baltimore, Md., where he was also an editor of the "Lutheran Centinel." He was called to the Warnemberg church in Rhinebeck, N. Y., in 1842, and remained there till 1853, when he became pastor in Easton, Pa. He afterward had charge of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, and then of a parish in East Orange, N. J., after which he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He originated and published in 1852 a monthly religious journal entitled "The Evangelical Magazine," which, after adopting several names, is now published as the "Lutheran and Missionary." He translated many works from the German, including "Krummacher's Parables" (New York, 1833); and is the author of "The Catechumen's Guide" (Albany, 1837); "Popular Exposition of the Gospels," with Rev. John G. Morris (Baltimore, 1840); "Illustrations of Faith" (Albany, 1850); "Men of the Olden Time" (Philadelphia, 1858); "Before the Flood and After" (1859); "Among the Lillies" (1872); "Inlets and Outlets" (1873); and "Stoneridge," a series of pastoral sketches (1873).

SMITH, Charles Emory, journalist, b. in Mansfield, Conn., 18 Feb., 1842. He was graduated at Union college in 1861, became editor of the Albany "Express" in 1865, and of the "Albany Journal" in 1870, and after 1880 conducted the Philadelphia "Press" until 1898, when he entered McKinley's cabinet. He was president of the New York state universities association, and delivered the annual address at its meeting. Mr. Smith was a regent of the University of the state of New York, and a delegate to the national Republican conventions in 1876 and in 1888. President Harrison appointed him ambassador to Russia.

SMITH, Charles Henry, humorist, b. in Lawrenceville, Ga., 15 June, 1826. He was graduated at Franklin college, Ga., and in 1848 became a lawyer in Rome, Ga. He served in the Confederate army, and after the war settled as a planter near Cartersville, Ga., was state senator in 1866, and mayor of Rome, Ga., in 1868-9. He began his literary career in 1861 in a series of newspaper letters under the signature of "Bill Arp." They enjoyed a wide popularity, being valuable for homely humor and shrewd philosophy. A southern writer says of his widely read and quoted letter to Artemus Ward in July, 1865, that "it was the first chimp of any bird after the surrender, and gave relief and hope to thousands of drooping hearts." He is also a successful lecturer. His publications include "Bill Arp's Letters" (New York, 1868), "The Adventures of Bill Arp" (New York, 1880); and many humorous and philosophical sketches that he has contributed to the press.

SMITH, Charles Henry, soldier, b. in Hollis, York co., Me., 1 Nov., 1827. He was graduated at Colby university in 1856, entered the National army in 1861 as captain in the 1st Maine cavalry, was attached with his regiment to the Army of the Potomac, and served in various campaigns, participating in numerous battles. He became major of volunteers in 1862, lieutenant-colonel in March, 1863, and colonel of the 1st Maine cavalry, commanding that regiment at Upperville, Gettysburg, Shepherdstown, and through the movements southward to the Rapidan. In the Mine run campaign, in November, he conducted the rear-guard of the left column of the army from Mine run to and across the Rapidan. During Gen. Philip H. Sheridan's cavalry campaign in May and June, 1864, he fought at Todd's Tavern and South Anna, at Trevillian Station, and on 1 Aug., 1864, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious conduct at St. Mary's church, where he was shot when a horse was killed in the attack. He commanded a cavalry brigade and was wounded at Reams' Station, and the 3d brigade of Gen. David M. Gregg's division from October, 1864, till the operations that ended in the surrender of Lee's army. During the Appomattox campaign he was wounded, and a horse was killed under him at Dinwiddie Court-House, and he participated in the battles of Sailor's Creek, Brier Creek, and Farmville. In May and July, 1865, he was in command of a sub-district of the Appomattox, comprising five counties. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious service during the civil war, and in March, 1867, brigadier-general, U.S. army, for Sailor's Creek, and majorgeneral for gallant service during the civil war. He became colonel of the 28th infantry on the reorganization of the U.S. army in 1866, was transferred in 1869 to the 19th infantry, and was retired in 1891. He received the medal of honor.

SMITH, Charles Ferris, genealogist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Jan., 1802; d. in Trenton, N. J., 27 Jan., 1883. On attaining his majority he became proprietor and editor of "The National Standard" in Salem, N. J., and conducted it for eleven years. He served in the legislature of 1852, and was clerk of the supreme court of New Jersey in 1857-72. He was early identified with the old Whig party, and during the Harrison campaign traveled extensively through the west and northwest, publishing a graphic account of his journey in a series of letters. During the civil war he was a secret agent of the state of New Jersey. Mr. Smith was a corresponding member of the Philadelphia numismatic and antiquarian society. He was the author of "Lineage of the Lloyd and Carpenter Families" (printed privately, Camden, N. J., 1885) and of the "History of Solomon Mathraval Castle, with a Genealogical Chart of the Descent of Thomas Lloyd" (1857). See a memoir of him by Charles Hart in the "Necrology of the Philadelphia Numismatic and Antiquarian Society for 1883."

SMITH, Charles Shaler, engineer, b. in Pittsburgh, Pa., 16 Jan., 1839; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 19 Dec., 1899. He attended a private school in Pittsburgh, but at the age of thirteen entered on the study of his profession by securing an appointment as rodman on the Mine Hill and Schuylkill Haven railroad. After various services he became in 1856 engineer in charge of the Tennessee division of the Louisville and Nashville railroad. Subsequently he became chief engineer of bridges and buildings of the Wilmington, Charlotte, and Durham railroad in North Carolina, where he remained until the beginning of the civil war. He then entered the Confederate army as captain of engineers, and continued so until 1865, during which time, as chief engineer of government works in the Augusta district, he constructed the Confederate states powder-works, with a daily capacity of 17,000 lbs. of powder, and one of the largest bridges that had then been built. Mr. Smith continued in the south as engineer of bridges, and constructed the Catawba and Congaree bridges on the Charlotte and South Carolina railroad. In 1866, with Benjamin H. Latrobe, he organized the engineering firm of Smith, Latrobe and Co., which in 1869 became the Baltimore bridge company, with Mr. Smith as president and chief engineer. This company continued in business until 1877, and did a large amount of work. He removed to St. Charles, Mo., in 1888, to take charge of the railroad bridge then just begun across Missouri river, and in 1871 he went to St. Louis, where he remained until the end of his life, mainly occupied as a consulting engineer. His name will ever be connected with great bridges that were built under his supervision. They are hundreds in number and include four over the Mississippi, one over the Missouri, and one over the St. Lawrence. His most important work was the practical demonstration of the uses and value of the cantilever, beginning in 1869 with the 300-foot draw-span over Sault-Dalhousie, and the Elgin and Bay railroad, and including the Kentucky river bridge on the Cincinnati Southern railroad, that over the Mississippi near St. Paul, and finally his last great bridge across the St. Lawrence river a short distance above the Lachine Rapids. Mr. Smith was elected a member of the American society of civil engineers in 1873, and was a director of that organization in 1877-8. His publications are confined to a few professional papers, notably "A Comparative Analysis of the Fink, Murphy, Bolster, and Triangle Trusses" (1868), "Proposing Heads, and Pins as determined by Experiment" (1877); and "Wind-Pressure upon Bridges" (1880).

SMITH, Cotton Mather, clergyman, b. in Suffield, Conn., 26 Oct., 1751; d. in Sharon, Conn., 27 Nov., 1806. He was descended from Rev. Henry Smith, who came to this country in 1636, and was first pastor at Wethersfield, Conn. His mother was the granddaughter of Increase Mather. Cotton was graduated at Yale in 1771, taught the Stockbridge Indians while studying theology, and in 1753 was licensed to preach. From 1755 until his death he was pastor of the Congregational church in Sharon. During the Revolution he served as chaplain under Gen. Philip Schuyler in 1775-6. During his ministry he delivered more than 4,000 sermons. He published three sermons (Hartford, 1779, 1771, 1783). He was distinguished for force of character, tact, tenderness of heart, fine scholarship, and grace of manner. His views were of advanced liberality, and he was an effective and persuasive preacher, whose influence long survived.

—His son, John Cotton, statesman, b. in Sharon, Conn., 12 Feb., 1776; d. there, 7 Dec., 1843, was graduated at Yale in 1793, admitted to the bar in 1786, and served several terms in the legislature, during which time, as chief engineer of government works in the Augusta district, he constructed the Confederate states powder-works, with a daily capacity of 17,000 lbs. of powder, and one of the largest bridges that had then been built. promise on any moral question, he was yet a man of broad views and enlightened statesmanship. Though belonging to a defeated party, he was ever held in high respect by his opponents as an able, unflinching, and generous foe. See his “Correspondence and Miscellanies,” edited with a preface by Rev. William W. Andrews (New York, 1847).—JoHN COTTON, diplomatist, b. in Tivoli, N. Y., in 1810; d. in Sharon, Conn., 21 Nov., 1879, was graduated at Yale in 1830, elected to the legislature at twenty-one years of age, and served for many terms. He was an active member of the Democratic party, and in 1856—60 was U. S. minister to Bolivia. He was an eloquent speaker and possessed of wide information on political questions.—Cotton Mather’s grandson, THomas MATHER, clergyman, b. in Stamford, Conn., 7 March, 1797; d. in Portland, Me., 6 Sept., 1864, was the son of Cotton Mather’s daughter, who married Rev. Daniel Smith, pastor of the church at Stamford from 1769 until his death in 1841. Thomas was graduated at Yale in 1815, and at Andover theological seminary in 1829. He was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church in 1822, was successively pastor in Portland, Me., Fall River, Catskill, N. Y., and New Bedford, Mass., in 1826—42, and in 1844, having changed his theological views, was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal church. He was professor of theology in the Gambier (Ohio) seminary from 1845—50, and rector of St. John’s church, Bangor, Me., assistant on the Green foundation at Trinity church, Boston, and from 1860 until his death was rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York city. During his pastorate there he was active in mission work, the church contributing under him $1,000,000 to charity. He organized the first successful attempt to establish improved schools for colored children, and was instrumental in creating two blocks of such homes that are under the care of an association in Ascension church. He built the Mission chapel on the corner of Jane and Greenwich streets, and that on West 43d street, which number 3,000 pupils, and was also active in foreign mission work. He was a member of the American Bible society, and one of a committee of three to revise the received Greek text. Columbia gave him the degree of D. D. in 1850.—Thomas Mather’s son, JoHN COTTON, clergyman, b. in Andover, Mass., 4 Aug., 1826; d. in New York city, 10 Jan., 1882, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1847, studied theology at the Gambier (Ohio) seminary, was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1849, and priest in 1850. He was a member of the Congregational church. In 1854 he married Miss Green, assistant on the Green foundation at Trinity church, Boston, and from 1860 until his death was rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York city. During his pastorate there he was active in mission work, the church contributing under him $1,000,000 to charity. He was a member of the American Bible society, and one of a committee of three to revise the received Greek text. Columbia gave him the degree of D. D. in 1862. Dr. Smith was a strong and effective preacher, a profound scholar, and of wide and Catholic views. For several years he edited the “Church and State,” a paper established as the representative of the liberal branch of the church. He discussed scientific, literary, and social subjects in it and in his pulpit, and aided largely in the gathering of the church congress in New York in 1874. Dr. Smith published an “Artillery Election Sermon” (Boston, 1858), and numerous other occasional sermons and tractates; “Limits of Legislation as to Doctrine and Ritual” (New York, 1874); “Miscellanea Old and New” (1876); “Brier Hill Lectures: Certain Aspects of the Church” (1880); “The Church’s Mission of Reconciliation” (1881); and “The Liturgy as a Basis of Union” (1881).

SMITH, Daniel, senator, b. in Franklin county, Va., about 1740; d. in Sumner county, Tenn., 16 June, 1818. He emigrated to Tennessee at an early age, being one of the first settlers of that state, and filled many public offices. He was a major-general of militia, was appointed by Gen. Washington secretary of the territory south of Ohio river in 1799, sat in the convention that formed the constitution of Tennessee, and was U. S. senator from that state in 1798—9, in place of Andrew Jackson, who had resigned, and again from 1805 till his own resignation in 1809. He published the first map of Tennessee and a geography of the state (Philadelphia, 1799).

SMITH, Daniel, clergyman, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 16 Sept., 1806; d. in Kingston, N. Y., 23 June, 1887. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1822, under Rev. Wilbur Fisk, ordained to the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1831, and was a pastor in Connecticut and New York for the subsequent twenty-one years. He was active in Sunday-school and temperance work, lectured extensively in the latter cause, and wrote more than fifty religious books for the young. Throughout his ministry he gave all his salary to benevolent objects. His publications include: “Anecdotes for the Young” (New York, 1840); “Teacher’s Assistant” (1847); “Lady’s Book of Anecdotes” (1851); “Proverbs” (1851); and “Lectures to Young Men” (1859).

SMITH, Daniel B., educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 July, 1792; d. in Germantown, Pa., 29 March, 1883. He was educated under Jonathan Basset, from whom he acquired a fondness for scientific studies. On leaving school, he was apprenticed to the drug business, and on completing his term was admitted to partnership. In 1819 he opened a drug-store, and continued thereafter in active mercantile pursuits until within a few years of his death. He was one of the founders of the Apprentices’ library and active in many philanthropic enterprises. In 1822 he became secretary of the preliminary organization, which office he then held until his election as vice-president in 1828, and from 1829 till 1834 he was its president, also serving as chairman of the committee on publication that in 1826 issued the first number of the “American Journal of PHarmacology.” In 1833, he became professor of moral philosophy, English literature, and chemistry in Haverford school (now college), and continued in that place until 1846. He was influential in organizing the House of refuge in 1828, and the American pharmaceutical association in 1832, and presided over its first meeting in Philadelphia. Prof. Smith was a member of the Franklin institute from its inception in 1824, of the Historical society from its organization in 1835, and was its first corresponding secretary. He was also a member of the American philosophical society and of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences. He published “The Principles of Chemistry” (Philadelphia, 1843).

SMITH, David M., inventor, b. in Hartland, Vt., in 1831. He attended Springfield, Vt., 10 Nov., 1841. He began to learn the carpenter’s trade in Gilsam, N. H., when he was twelve years old, and seven years later taught in a school. Subsequently he began the manufacture of “awls on the half,” for which he obtained a patent in 1832. The awl-half, manufactured by him was similar if not identical with the one now known as the Allen awl. In 1840—1 he represented the town of Gilsam in the New Hampshire legislature, after which he removed to Springfield, Vt. He patented a combination-lock in 1849, of which an English expert named Hobbs, who had opened all the locks that were brought to him in London, said: “It cannot be picked." This lock he also patented in England, and about this time he invented an improvement on the first iron safe that is now in common use. He also devised a peg-splitting machine, and two sewing-machines, after which he produced a patent for folding newspapers. In 1860 he began the manufacture of a spring book and eye, for which he also devised the machinery. Mr. Smith showed great ingenuity in inventing the machinery by which his original articles were made. In addition to perfecting the ideas of other people that secured patents, he took out for himself nearly sixty, among which was that for the machinery that bore his name.

SMITH, Sir David William, bart., Canadian statesman, b. in England, 4 Sept., 1764; d. in Alnwick, Northumberland, England, 9 May, 1837. His father, who was lieutenant-colonel of the 5th foot, died while commandant of Fort Niagara, Canada West, in 1795. At an early age the son was appointed an ensign in his father's regiment, in which he subsequently attained the rank of captain. He afterward studied law and was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada, was appointed surveys-general of lands, one of the trustees for the Six Nations, a member of the executive council, and of the committee for administering the government during the governor's absence. He was a member of the three first Canadian parliaments, and a speaker of the assembly for the last twenty years in England for many years preceding his death, and administered the affairs of the Duke of Northumberland. For his public services he was created a baronet by patent, 30 Aug., 1821.

SMITH, Delazon, senator, b. in Berlin, N. Y., in 1816; d. in Portland, Oregon, 18 Nov., 1889. He was graduated at Oberlin college in 1835, and was for some years a minister, but adopted journalism as his profession, and became editor of the "True Jeffersonian" in Rochester, N. Y., and subsequently of the "Western Empire" at Dayton, Ohio. He was appointed by President Tyler special commissioner to Quito, Ecuador, in 1842, removed to Iowa in 1846, and was licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1855. He was a member of the territorial legislature in 1854-5, a delegate to the convention that framed the state constitution in 1857, and served in the U. S. senate from 4 Feb., 1859, to 3 March of the same year, having been chosen as a Democrat. From 1859 until his death he edited the "Oregon Democrat."

SMITH, Sir Donald Alexander, Canadian legislator, b. in Morayshire, Scotland, in 1821. After completing his course of education he came to Canada, and early in life entered the service of the Hudson bay company, of which he became a director, and later resident governor and chief commissioner. He was appointed in 1870 a member of the executive council of the Northwest territories, and in December, 1870, was special commissioner to inquire into the causes, nature, and extent of the obstructions that were offered in the Northwest territories to the peaceful entrance of the lieutenant-governor, William McDougall, during the Riots and the Service. For the important services that he rendered on this occasion he received the thanks of the governor-general in council. He represented Winnipeg and St. John in the Manitoba assembly from 1871 till January, 1874, when he resigned, and was elected to the Dominion parliament for Selkirk, Manitoba, in 1871, being re-elected in 1872, 1874, and 1878, but upon petition the last election was declared void. He was an unsuccessful candidate in 1890, but was elected for Montreal, west, in February, 1887. In 1880 he became a director of the Canadian Pacific railway company, was largely instrumental in securing the successful completion of the road, and in 1886 was knighted for his services in connection with this undertaking. He is a governor of McGill university, and gave $129,000 to constitute a special course or college for women in connection with that institution. With Sir George Stephen, bart., he founded in 1885 the Montreal scholarship of the Royal college of music, London, for residents of Montreal and its neighborhood. Sir Donald has one of the finest private residences in the Dominion at Montreal, a seat at Pictou, Nova Scotia, and another at Silver Heights, near Winnipeg. In 1897 he was created Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal.

SMITH, Edward Delafield, lawyer, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 8 May, 1820; d. in Shrewsbury, N. J., 13 April, 1878. He was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1846, was admitted to the bar in 1848, and practised in New York city. He was U. S. district attorney for the southern district of New York in 1861-5, returned to practice in the latter year, and from 1874 till 1878 was corporation counsel of New York city. He was an active member of the Republican party, and a member of the law committee of the University of the city of New York. Among his many cases of importance was that of the People against Moline & Allis, in which he represented the corporation of the city of Chicago, whose actions were restrained by an injunction from a Hawaiian corporation, from which he brought to the scaffold in 1862, and that against John Andrews, a leader of the draft riots in New York city in 1863. At the time of his death he was attorney of record in the Eliza B. Jumel estate case. Mr. Smith also attained success in private practice, and was widely known for his legal ability. He published "Avida," a poem (1860); "Tracings," a poem (1846); "Reports of Cases in the New York Court of Common Pleas" (4 vols., 1850-9); and "Addresses to Juries in Slave-Trade Trials" (1861).

SMITH, Edward Parmelie, clergyman, b. in South Britain, Conn., 3 June, 1827; d. in Accra, West Africa, 15 June, 1876. He was graduated at Yale in 1849, and at Andover theological seminary in 1856. He was ordained in 1855, and was pastor of the Methodist church in Brooklyn, and superintendent of the Congregational church in Peppermill, Mass. He was superintendent of the western department of the Christian mission in 1863-5, field secretary in 1866-7, and at the same time general field agent of the American missionary association. He became U. S. commissioner of Indian affairs in 1870, and president of Howard university, Washington, D. C., in 1876. Mr. Smith died on a visit to the coast of Africa in the interests of the American missionary association. He published "Incidents of the United States Christian Mission" (Philadelphia, Pa., 1869).

SMITH, Eli, missionary, b. in Northford, Conn., 13 Sept., 1801; d. in Beirut, Syria, 11 Jan., 1857. He graduated at Yale in 1821, and at Andover theological seminary in 1826, ordained the same year, and went to Malta as superintendent of a missionary printing establishment. He was subsequently transferred to the Syrian mission, travelled through Greece in 1829, and with Dr. Harrison G. O. Dwight in Armenia, Georgia, and Persia in 1830-1, which journey resulted in the establishment of the American Home for Armenian missions at the American board. He settled in Beirut in 1833, and in 1835 and again in 1852 was the companion and coadjutor of Prof. Edward Robinson in his extensive exploration of Palestine. His intimate knowledge of Arabic enabled him to render important service in the production of a new and improved form and font of Arabic type, which was cast under his supervision at Leipzig in 1839. He published with Harrison G. O. Dwight "Missionary Researches in Armenia" (2 vols., Boston, 1835), and from 1847 until his death was engaged in translating the Bible into the Arabic, which work was subsequently completed by Dr. Cornelius V. W. Dyke (New York, 1866-7).—His wife, Sarah Lannan, missionary, b. in Norwich, Conn., 18 June, 1802; d. in Boojah, near Smyrna, Asia, 30 Sept., 1836, was the daughter of Jabez Huntington. She married Dr. Smith in 1833, accompanied him to Beirut, and, having learned Arabic, assisted him in his translations into that language, and wrote in a native style a work which was published. See "Memoir, Journal, and Letters," edited by the Rev. Edward Hooker (London, 1839).

SMITH, Elias, author, b. in Lyme, Conn., 17 June, 1769; d. in Lynn, Mass., 29 June, 1846. His early education was scanty, but he became a teacher, and in 1792 was ordained to the ministry of the Christian Denomination. He was pastor at Woburn, Mass., in 1798-1801, and afterward supplied various vacant pulpits. He edited the "Christian Magazine," a quarterly, in 1805-7, and in 1808 began the publication of the "Herald of Gospel Liberty," the first religious newspaper that was ever printed, it having preceded the "Religious Remembrance" of Philadelphia by five years and the "B schönepost" of Amsterdam, even by four years. His other publications include "The Chromyan's Looking-Glass" (Woburn, 1803); "The History of Anti-Christ" (1803); "Twenty-two Sermons on the Prophecies" (1809); "New Testament Dictionary" (Philadelphia, 1812); "The Fall of Angels and Men" (1813); "Life, Conversion, Preaching, Travels, and Sufferings of Elias Smith" (Portsmouth, N. H., 1815); "The Church and the World" (New Haven, N. Y., 1825); "The Family Physician and Family Assistant" (Boston, 1832); and the "People's Book." (1836).—His son, Matthew Hale, author, b. in Portland, Me., in 1816; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 Nov., 1879, was educated in the public schools, and at seventeen years of age ordained to the ministry of the Universalist church, from which he withdrew in 1840. He was a Unitarian and was ordained in the Congregational ministry, and for the subsequent ten years preached in Boston, Nashua, and other churches in Massachusetts. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1850, removed to New York city, added journalism to his two other professions, and as correspondent of the "Boston Journal," under the pen-name of "Burleigh," attained reputation for brilliancy of style and humor. He was also a successful lecturer, and made several extensive tours in that capacity throughout the United States. His publications include "Text-Book of Universalism" (Boston, 1836); "Universalism Examined, Reviewed, and Exposed" (1842); "Universalism not of God" (New York, 1847); "Sabbath Evenings" (1849); "Mount Calvary" (1860); and "Sunshine and Shadow in New York" (Hartford, 1868-9).

SMITH, Elihu Hubbard, physician, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 4 Sept., 1771; d. at New York city, 19 Sept., 1838. He was graduated at Yale in 1796, subsequently followed a classical course under Dr. Timothy Dwight, and studied medicine in Philadelphia. He then settled in Wethersfield, Conn., where he wrote as well as practised, and, removing to New York city in 1794, soon established a reputation both in literature and in his profession. His house was the headquarters of the Friendly club, and a centre of the literary society of that city. He became a physician to the New York hoscargo of coolies, was wrecked off the coast of Japan, and, under Mr. Smith's advice, the 230 wrecked Chinamen were detained by the Japanese government. The case was submitted to the arbitration of the emperor of Russia, and, under his decision, Mr. Smith representing the Japanese government, the coolies were sent back to China, with the result of breaking up the trade. Mr. Smith published a "Manual of Political Economy" (New York, 1858), in refutation of the theories of Ricardo and Malthus. It is an attempt to construct a skeleton of political economy on the basis of purely physical laws, and thus to obtain for its conclusions that absolute certainty that belongs to the physical sciences. In this regard the work is wholly original, and has largely affected the work of later economists. It has been translated into French. Mr. Smith contributed a word to the English language in suggesting, through the Albany "Evening Journal," the use of "telegraph in place of cumbersome phrases, such as "telegraphic message" and "telegraphic despatch." He returned from Japan in 1857.

SMITH, Erminnie Adelle, scientist, b. in Marcellus, N. Y., 26 April, 1836; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 9 June, 1886. Her maiden name was Platt. She was educated at Mrs. Willard's seminary in Troy, N. Y., and in 1855 married Simeon H. Smith, of Jersey City, N. J. She early devoted herself to geology, and made one of the largest private collections in the country. She spent four years in Europe with her sons, studying science and language, during which period she was graduated at the School of Mines, Freiberg, Saxony, and after her return gave frequent courses of lectures. She organized and became president of the Æsthetic Society of Jersey City, whose monthly receptions from 1879 to 1880 were widely known. In 1874 she was made a member of the American Geographical Society, and in 1880 of the first lady fellow of the New York academy of sciences. At the meeting of the American association for the advancement of science in 1885 she was secretary of the section on geology and geography. Her Iroquois-English dictionary was in course of printing at the time of her death. A volume of essays and poems by the Æsthetic society, written and delivered under her direction, was issued in 1883. In 1888 a geological prize was founded at Vassar college in her honor.

SMITH, Ethan, clergyman, b. in Belchertown, Mass., 10 Dec., 1762; d. in Pompey, N. Y., 29 Aug., 1819. He was apprenticed to the leather trade in his boyhood, was a private in the Continental army in 1780-1, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1799, and the same year was licensed to preach. From 1791 till 1832 he was pastor of Congregational churches in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont, and he served as city missionary in Boston from ten years before the latter date until his death. He was a founder of the New Hampshire missionary society, its secretary for sixteen years, and the author of numerous sermons; he was also on the "Prophecy Committee" (Concord, N. H., 1809); "Key to the Figurative Language of the Prophecies" (1814); "A View of the Trinity" (1824); "A View of the Hebrews," designed to prove that the aborigines of America are descended from the twelve tribes of Israel (Poultney, Vt., 1825); "A Key to the Revelation" (New York, 1833); and "A Prophetic Catechism" (1839).

SMITH, Eugène Allen, geologist, b. in Alabama, 27 Oct., 1841. He was graduated at the University of Alabama in 1862, when he was assistant in mathematics and Latin in 1863-5, and then spent three years at the universities of Berlin, Göttingen, and Heidelberg, receiving in 1868 the degree of Ph. D. from the last-named institution. In 1868 he became assistant state geologist of Mississippi, and he held that office until 1871, and in 1878 he was made state geologist of Alabama, which appointment he has since filled. Dr. Smith was called to the chair of mineralogy and geology in the University of Alabama in 1871, and in 1874 the title of his chair was changed to that of chemistry, geology, and natural history, which he still fills. He was honorary commissioner to the World's fair in Paris in 1878, and during 1880-2 was special census agent engaged in the preparation of reports on cotton-production in Alabama and Florida. In 1895-6 he was commissioner for selecting lands that had been given to the University of Alabama. Dr. Smith is a member of various scientific societies, has been secretary of the section on geology and geography of the American association for the advancement of science, and is a member of the American committee of the International geological congress at Paris in 1889, and of the American congress in Washington in 1890-8. Besides geological memoirs, his publications include annual "Geological Reports of the Alabama State Survey" (Montgomery, 1874 et seq.), also special reports to the U. S. geological survey, the U. S. entomological commission, and the U. S. census bureau.

SMITH, Ezekiel Ezra, educator, b. in Duplin county, N. C., 13 May, 1822. He is of African descent and was born a slave, but enjoyed early educational advantages, studied in the public schools, and became a teacher in 1870. In 1873-4 he was one of the Jubilee singers that raised $20,000 for Shaw university, at which he was graduated in 1878, and in the next year he was licensed to preach. He was principal of the graded school at Goldsboro, N. C., from 1879 till 1882, when he became principal of the State colored normal school at Fayetteville, N. C. He was secretary of the State colored Baptist convention in 1876-83, commissioner major of the 4th battalion of the North Carolina guards in 1889, and in 1888 was appointed U. S. minister and consul-general to Liberia, Africa. He was a founder of the North Carolina industrial association, and established and edited the "Carolina Enterprise."

SMITH, Francis, British soldier, b. in England about 1729; d. there, 17 Nov., 1791. He became captain of the 10th foot in 1747, major in 1758, lieutenant-colonel in 1762, colonel and aide-de-camp to the king in 1775, and the same year commanded the troops that were sent to destroy the American stores at Concord, Mass. He was wounded in the fight at Lexington, became brigadier-general in 1776, and commanded a brigade in the battles on Long Island in August of that year, and at Quaker Hill in 1778. He was promoted to the grade of major-general in 1779, and lieutenant-general in 1780.

SMITH, Francis, soldier, b. in Norfolk, Va., 18 Oct., 1812; d. in Lexington, Va., 21 March, 1890. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1833, and was assistant professor there; also professor of mathematics at Hampden Sidney in 1837-9, and, on the organization of the Virginia military institute in the latter year, became its superintendent, and professor of mathematics and moral and political philosophy, in which office he continued. He was appointed colonel of a Virginia regiment soon after the beginning of the civil war, and was stationed at Norfolk and in command of the fort at Craney Island. During the campaigns against Richmond in 1864, with his corps of cadets he aided in its defence, and was subsequently transferred to Lynchburg to protect that city against the National forces under Gen. David Hunter. The institute buildings having been destroyed by fire during the war, he took active measures to reconstruct them when he returned to his duties there in 1865, and subsequently he successfully administered its affairs. William and Mary gave him the degree of L.L.D. in 1878. He published, with Robert M. T. Duke, a series of arithmetics (New York, 1845); a series of algebras (1845); and was the author of "The Best Methods of conducting Common Schools" (1849); "College Reform" (1856); and a "Report to the Legislature of Virginia on Scientific Education in Europe" (1859). He translated Biot's "Analytical Geometry" from the French (1840).

SMITH, Francis Hopkinson, artist, b. in Baltimore, Md., 23 Oct., 1838. He is by profession an engineer, and has built a large number of public works, many of them under contract with the U.S. government. In 1871 he was the Rock Light-house on the New London harbor, Long Island sound (1871-7); Block Island breakwater (1879). He is well known as an artist, and has produced some very effective work in water-colors and charcoal. Among his water-colors are "In the Darkening Wood" (1876); "Pogotthy on the Harlem" (1881); "Under the Towers, Brooklyn Bridge" (1883); "In the Future Home of Bunker Hill" (1887). He has been occupied also in book and magazine illustration, and he is known as an author by his books "Well-worn Roads" (Boston, 1896); "Old Lines in New Black and White" (1886); and "A Book of the Tile Club" (1887), partly illustrated by himself. His latest work is "Gondola Days in Venice" (Philadelphia, 1897).

SMITH, Francis Osbaldston, b. in Brewood, N. H., 23 Nov., 1806; d. in Deer, Me., 14 Oct., 1876. He was educated at Phillips Exeter academy, admitted to the bar, and practised in Portland. He was a member of the legislature in 1832, president of the state senate in 1833, and sat in congress from December of the latter year till 1838, having been chosen as a Whig. During his later life he was connected with many local and national improvements, was instrumental in establishing the Portland gas company, and the York and Cumberland and Portland and Oxford Central railroads, the latter having been mainly built by him. But his greatest public service was the introduction of the Morse electric telegraph, which owes much to his enthusiasm. He published "Reports of Decisions in the Circuit Courts-Martial of Maine" (Portland, 1831); "Laws of the State of Maine" (2 vols., 1834); and "Secret Corresponding Vocabulary: Adopted for Use to Morse's Electro-Magnetic Telegraph" (1845).

SMITH, Frank, Canadian senator, b. in Rich Hill, Arnpugh, Ireland, in 1812. He came to this country in 1832, and settled near Toronto. He was engaged in business in London, Ont., from 1849 till 1867, when he removed to Toronto, and there continued the business of a wholesale grocer. He was mayor of the city of London in 1869, and is president or director of several financial or industrial institutions. Mr. Smith became a member of the Canadian senate in February, 1871, and of the Dominion cabinet, without a portfolio, from 1882 to 1896, when he resigned. He was knighted in 1895.

SMITH, Frank Hill, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Oct., 1842. He studied architecture in his native city with Hannatt Billings, later became a pupil at the Atelier Suisse, Paris, and studied painting also under Léon Bonnat. His work in oil includes portraits, figure-pieces, and landscapes. Some of his Venetian pictures belong to the Somerset club, Boston. In the course of his studies in Europe he gave much attention to interior decoration, making many sketches of famous interiors. In the late years he has devoted himself especially to this branch of art. He has decorated the Windsor hotel and the opera-house at Holyoke, Mass., and numerous public and private buildings in Boston and Cambridge and other cities. Mr. Smith has been a director of the school of the Boston museum of fine arts.

SMITH, George, historian, b. in Delaware county, Pa., 12 Feb., 1894; d. in Upper Darby, Delaware co., Pa., 10 March, 1892. His father, Benjamin, was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature in 1890-92, and held several minor offices of trust in his county. George was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1826, but retired from practice after five years. He was professor of English at Delaware college from 1832 to 1849. He was an associate judge of the court of common pleas of Delaware county from the latter date till 1857, and was re-elected in 1861 for a term of five years. He was chosen the first superintendent of the Delaware county common schools in 1864, and for the subsequent twenty-five years was president of the school board of Upper Darby school district. He continued as a member of that body until 1893. He was a founder of the Delaware county institute of science, and its president from 1853 until his death, presenting it with his valuable herbarium about 1875. He was also a member of the Pennsylvania historical society, and a contributor to historical and scientific subjects to the press. He published several essays and some history of Delaware county, Pa., from the Discovery of the Territory included within its Limits to the Present Time (Philadelphia, 1869).—His son, Clement Lawrence, educator, b. in Delaware county, Pa., 13 April, 1844, was graduated at Haverford college, Pa., in 1869, and at Harvard in 1863. He was assistant professor of classics and mathematics at Haverford in 1863-5, student of classical philology at Göttingen for one year in 1865-6, travelled a year (1866-7) in and on the continent, about half of the time being spent in study and travel in Italy and Greece; then, after two years' study at home, assisted in the organization of Swarthmore college in 1869-70, filling the chair of Greek and Latin, which he held at Swarthmore college when a student at Harvard in 1870, in 1873 assistant professor, and in 1883 professor of the same, and since 1882 he has been dean of the college faculty. He has published several papers on philological and educational matters, and later was engaged, with Prof. Tracy Peck, of Yale, in editing a "College Series of the Works of Mill"; the first volumes of which have been published (Boston, 1899-98).

SMITH, George, banker, b. in Old Deer, Scotland, 8 March, 1808; d. in London, 7 Oct., 1899. He passed two years in Aberdeen college with the intention of studying medicine, but, his eyesight failing, he turned to farming. In 1838 he came to this country, and in 1834 settled in Chicago, where he invested in city lots. He also bought land where the city of Milwaukee now stands, but sold his real estate in 1836 for one quarter in cash and the balance in notes, and returned to Scotland. The financial depression of 1837 made it necessary for him to return to Chicago and take back the land he had sold. In 1837 he obtained a charter for the Wisconsin marine and fire insurance company, which enabled him to receive deposits and issue policies therefor to the amount of $1,500,000. Alexander Mitchell was made secretary of the company, with headquarters at Milwaukee. The insurance company's certificates circulated freely, and were for many years the most popular currency in the northwest. In 1839 Mr. Smith, under the firm-name of George Smith and Co., founded the first banking-house in the city of Chicago. When, in 1854, the Wisconsin legislature suppressed the circulation of the Wisconsin marine and fire insurance company's certificates, Mr. Smith sold the insurance company, of which he had become sole owner, to Alexander Mitchell, and bought the charters of two banks in Georgia, which together had the right to issue notes to the extent of $2,000,000. These notes were duly issued in Georgia, sent to Chicago, and there circulated by George Smith and Co. Mr. Smith began to close up his business affairs in 1857, and in 1858 he returned to Great Britain, residing chiefly in London.

SMITH, George Williamson, clergyman, b. in Catskill, N. Y., 21 Nov., 1836. He was graduated at Hobart in 1857, was principal of Bladensburg academy, Md., in 1858-9, and served as a clerk in the U. S. navy department in 1861-4, at the same time studying theology. He was ordained deacon in 1860, and priest in 1862, in the Protestant Episcopal church, and was an assistant at various churches in Washington, D. C. He was acting professor of mathematics in the U. S. naval academy at Newport, R. I., in 1864-5, chaplain at the Annapolis academy in 1865-6, and chaplain on the U. S. steamship "Franklin" in 1865-71. He was rector of Grace church, Jamaica, L. I., in 1872-'81, of the Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1880-3, and since the latter date has been president of Trinity college, a position of which he is shown in the accompanying illustration. He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart in 1889, and from Columbia in 1887. Trinity gave him the degree of LL. D. in the latter year. He has published occasional sermons, and is the author of a "Memoir of Rev. John H. Van Ingen" (printed privately, Rochester, N. Y., 1879).

SMITH, Goldwin, English author, b. in Reading, Berkshire, England, 13 Aug., 1823. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, where he was graduated in 1843. In 1847 he was elected a fellow of University college, London, where he acted for some time as a tutor, and in the same year he was admitted to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but he has never practised. In 1850 he was appointed assistant secretary of the royal commission that was charged with the duty of making an inquiry into the condition of Oxford university, and he was secretary to the second Oxford commission, which effected many salutary changes in the constitution and government of that institution. He was appointed a member of the Popular education commission in 1858, and the same year was made regius professor of modern history at Oxford, which chair he held till 1866. He was an active champion of the U. S. government during the civil war, when he wrote "Does the Bible Suction American Slavery?" (London, 1863); "On the Morality of the Emancipation Proclamation" (1863), and other pamphlets that influenced public opinion on this subject. In 1864 he visited this country and gave a series of lectures, receiving an enthusiastic welcome and the degree of LL. D. from Brown university. He returned to the United States in 1868, when he was appointed professor of English and constitutional history in Cornell university, and resided at Ithaca till 1871, when he exchanged his chair for that of a non-resident professor, and removed to Toronto, where he has resided ever since. Prof. Smith was appointed a member of the senate of Toronto 1866, was elected first president of the council of public instruction, and was for two years president of the Provincial teachers' association. He edited the "Canadian Monthly" in 1872-4, founded the "Nation" in 1874, the "Bystander" in 1880, and the "Toronto "Week," the principal literary and political journal in Canada, in 1884. In his writings and lectures he has advocated annexation of that country to the United States, which he regards as the manifest destiny of the Dominion, and he has also favored the project of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity with this country, which was adopted as a plank in the political platform of the Canadian Liberals in 1888. He has written much for the English reviews, and, among other works, has published "Irish History and Irish Character" (London, 1861); "Lectures on Modern History" (1861); "The Empire" (1863); "Three English Statesmen" (1867); "Cowper" (1888); "A Trip to England," "Jane Austen," and "Bay Leaves," "translations from Latin poets" (1890); "Canada and the Canadian Question" (1892); "The United States and an Outline of Political History," and "Essays on Questions of the Day" (1893); "Specimens of Greek Tragedy," "translations" (1894); "Oxford and Her Colleges" (1895); "Guesses at the Riddle of Existence" (1897); "The United Kingdom," a political history of England, and "Shakespeare: the Man" (1899).
SMITH, Gustavus Woodson, soldier, b. in Scott county, Ky., 1 Jan., 1822; d. in New York city, 23 June, 1896. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy, appointed to the engineer corps, and was engaged in constructing fortifications in New London harbor, Conn. He was assistant professor of engineering in the U.S. military academy in 1844-6, commanded the sappers, miners, and pontoniers during the siege of Vera Cruz and in the subsequent operations of the war with Mexico, and in 1847 was brevetted 1st lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Cerro Gordo, and captain, for Contreras. He was recalled to the U.S. military academy as principal assistant professor of engineering in 1849, became 1st lieutenant in 1853, and resigned from the army the next year. He was subsequently employed in the construction of various government buildings, and in the iron-works of Cooper and Hewitt, Trenton, N. J. He was street commissioner of New York city in 1859-61, and a member of the board to revise the programme of instruction at the U.S. military academy in 1860. He returned to Kentucky at the beginning of the civil war, entered the Confederate service, and in September, 1861, was appointed major-general. He succeeded Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in temporary command of the Army of Northern Virginia on 31 May, 1862, and subsequently command at Richmond and was in charge of the state forces of Georgia in 1864-5, and was taken prisoner at Macon on 20 April of the latter year. He was superintendent in charge of the Southwest iron-works at Chatanooga, Tenn., in 1866-9, was insurance commissioner of the state of Kentucky in 1870-6, and since that time had resided in New York city.

SMITH, Hamilton Langdon, b. in New London, Conn., 5 Nov., 1819. He was graduated at Yale in 1839, and, while a student there, constructed what was then the largest telescope in this country, and, in connection with Ebenezer P. Mason, made an extended series of observations on various nebula, the results of which were published in the proceedings of the American Academy of arts and sciences of Philadelphia, 1840. He was professor of natural philosophy and astronomy at Kenyon college, Gambier, Ohio, in 1853-8, and since the latter date has held the same chairs at Hobart. Trinity gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1871. He is president of the American society of microscopists and a member of several foreign and domestic learned societies. His publications include "Natural Philosophy" (Cleveland, Ohio, 1847); "First Lessons in Astronomy and Geology" (1848); "Species Typica Diatomacearum," 750 specimens in thirty cases (1885-7); and addresses before the American society of microscopists.

SMITH, Sir Henry, Canadian statesman, b. in London, England, 23 April, 1812; d. in Kingston, Ont., 18 Sept., 1870. When he was eighteen years old, he accompanied his parents to Canada. He was educated at Montreal and Kingston, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1836, and in 1846 became queen's counsel. Soon after the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1841 he was elected a member of the Canadian parliament for Frontenac, and he represented it till 1861, when he lost his seat. He became a member of the MacNab-Morin administration as solicitor-general, west, in 1854, and held this portfolio in successive administrations till 1858, when he was appointed speaker. In this capacity he went to London in 1859 and invited the queen, in behalf of the Canadian parliament, to visit Canada and open the Victoria bridge. During the visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada in 1860 he was knighted, and soon afterward left the Conservative party and was defeated as a candidate for parliament.

SMITH, Henry, police commissioner, b. in Amsterdam, Montgomery co., N. Y., 20 Oct., 1829; d. in New York city, 23 Feb., 1874. Early in life he engaged in trade in New York city, and for twenty-five years he was one of the most active politicians in the Whig and Republican parties. He was a member of the New York board of councilmen in 1854-7, supervisor in 1862-8, and president of the New York board of police in 1868-74.

SMITH, Henry Boynton, clergyman, b. in Portland, Me., 21 Nov., 1815; d. in New York city, 7 Feb., 1876. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1834, was tutor there for several years, and studied at Andover and Bangor theological seminaries, and subsequently at Halle and Berlin. He was pastor of the West Amesbury, Mass., Congregational church in 1842-7, professor of mental and moral philosophy at Amherst in 1847-50, of church history in Union theological seminary, New York, in 1850-1, for the subsequent five years, and of systematic theology there from 1855 till his resignation in 1873. He was moderator of the assembly of the new-school Presbyterian church in 1863, and at the general assembly of the next year delivered a discourse, which was published under the title of the "Reunion of the Presbyterian Churches" (New York, 1864). He was subsequently a member of the general assembly's committee on reunion with the old-school branch of the church, and presented a report on a doctrinal basis of reunion (1867). He read a "Report on the State of Religion in the United States" before the Evangelical alliance which met in Amsterdam in 1867, to which body he was a delegate. He founded the American Theological Review," and was its editor from 1859 to 1862, when it was consolidated with the "Presbyterian Review," which he edited till 1871. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1859, and Princeton that of D.D. in 1869. His principal works are "The Relations of Faith and Philosophy" (New York, 1849); "The Nature and Worth of the Science of Church History" (1853); "The Precession of the Phenomena of History" (1853); "The Idea of Christian Theology as a System" (1857); "An Argument for Christian Churches" (1857); "History of the Church of Christ in Chronological Tables" (1859); a new edition of the Edinburgh translation of Gesner's "Church History," volumes iv. and v. of which he chiefly translated (1858); a revision and translation of Haugenbach's "History of Christian Doctrine" (2 vols., 1861-2); a new edition of Stier's "Words of the Lord Jesus," with James Strong (1864 et seq.); and, with Roswell D. Hitchcock, "The Life, Writings, and Character of Edward Robinson" (1864).
Pennsylvania in 1837, and at the medical department in 1839, spent a year in study abroad, and on his return settled in practice in Philadelphia. He became a surgeon to St. Joseph's hospital in 1849, surgeon to the Episcopal hospital soon afterward, one of the surgeons to the Lankenau hospital in 1854, and was professor of surgery in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania from 1855 till 1871, when he became professor emeritus. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed to organize the hospital department of Pennsylvania, and at the same time made surgeon-general of Pennsylvania. In his efforts he contributed much to the efficiency of the medical services of the Pennsylvania reserves and other state regiments. At the first battle at Winchester, Va., he originated the plan of removing the wounded from the battle-field to large hospitals in Reading, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, and other cities, and established the custom of embalming the dead on the battle-ground. He organized and directed a corps of surgeons, with steamers as floating hospitals, at the siege of Yorktown, and served the wounded after the battles of Williamsburg, West Point, Fair Oaks, and Cold Harbor. After thoroughly organizing the department of which he was in charge, he resigned his commission in 1862, and continued actively engaged in the practice of his profession until 1871, when he gave himself to medical authorship. His publications include "An Anatomical Atlas," to illustrate William E. Horner's "Special Anatomy" (Philadelphia, 1843); "Minor Surgery" (1846); "System of Operative Surgery," with a biographical index to the writings and operations of American surgeons for 234 years (2 vols., 1852); "The Treatment of Fractures and Dislocations," (1855); "Professional Visit to London and Paris" (1855); "Practice of Surgery" 2 vols., 1857-58); and numerous surgical articles in medical journals; and he translated from the French Civiale's "Treatise on the Medical and Prophylactic Treatment of Stone and Gravel" (Philadelphia, 1841), and edited the "United States Dissector" (1844), and Spooner's "Domestic Surgery" (1833).—His cousin, Francis Gurney, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 March, 1818; d. there, 6 April, 1878, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1837, and at its medical department in 1840, and became a resident physician to the Pennsylvania hospital for the insane in 1841, lecturer on physiology in the Philadelphia medical association in 1843, and in 1850 professor of the same branch in the Pennsylvania medical college. He was professor of the institutes of medicine in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania from 1863 till 1877, was one of the first medical staff of the Episcopal hospital, and for six years an attending physician and clinical lecturer in the Pennsylvania hospital. During the Civil War he was physician in charge of a military hospital. He founded and established the first laboratory in which physiology was taught experimentally and by demonstration in the University of Pennsylvania, was the first president of the Philadelphia obstetrical society, and vice-president of the American medical association in 1870. For nine years he was certified surgeon to the U. S. Navy. He was physician in charge of a military hospital. He contributed frequently to medical literature, translated and edited Barth and Roger's "Manual of Auscultation and Percussion" (Philadelphia, 1849); edited Daniel Drake's "Systematic Treatise," with H. Hanbury Smith, on the "Diseases of the Interior Valley of North America" (1854); William B. Carpenter's "Principles of Human Physiology" (1856); his "Microscope and its Revelations and Uses" (1856); and William S. Kirke and James Paget's "Physiology" (1856); and was the author of "Domestic Medico-surgical Practice," (1852), and, with John Neill, an "Analytical Compendium of Medicine" (1857).

SMITH, Hezekiah, clergyman, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 21 April, 1757; d. in Haverhill, Mass., 22 Jan., 1805. He was graduated at Princeton in 1762, and soon afterward was ordained to the ministry at Charleston, S. C. In 1764 he visited New England, and settled in Haverhill, Mass. In 1765 a baptist church was organized in this place, and Mr. Smith became its pastor. He maintained this relation to the end of his life, a period of forty years. Under his ministry the church grew into commanding strength and influence. Meanwhile he performed extensive missionary tours through destitute regions of New Hampshire and Maine. In 1776-80 he filled the office of chaplain in the American army. In this service he became acquainted with Washington, besides possessing the confidence and esteem of the whole army. In encouraging the soldiers and ministering to the wounded, he repeatedly exposed his life in battle. He was an ardent friend of education, and was especially active in establishing religious hopitals. In 1803 Smith joined the church of fellow members of the Independent, and from this university he received in 1797 the degree of D. D. See his life, entitled "Chaplain Smith and the Baptists," by Reuben A. Guild (Philadelphia, 1885).

SMITH, Hezekiah Bradley, inventor, b. in Bridgewater, Vt., 24 July, 1810; d. in Smithville, Burlington co., N. J., 3 Nov., 1857. He learned the trade of a engraver and manufacturer of wooden machinery. He settled in Woodbury, Mass., about 1860, engaged in the manufacture of window-blinds, and invented a machine that cut and cleansing forty mortises a minute, for which the Massachusetts mechanical association presented him with a gold medal. He subsequently took out more than forty patents for improvements in machinery. He established a wood-manufacturing factory in Smithville, N. J., in 1871, which settlement was named in his honor, and spent large sums in building model houses, halls, and places of amusement for his workmen. He was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1878, served one term, and in 1882 was elected state senator, declining renomination.

SMITH, Hezekiah Wright, engraver, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1828. He came to New York with his family in 1833, and entered the establishment of an engraver, where he remained until his majority. He then passed two years with Thomas Donay, a mezzotint engraver, and in 1850 went to Boston and began to practise his profession, engraving a large number of plates for the applications of Ticknor and Field, and later with Brown and Co. His most important plates are a full-length of Daniel Webster, by Chester Harding; a three-quarter length Edward Everett, after Moses Wright; and Washington, after Gilbert Stu- art's Atheneum head, this last being the best rendering of the picture that has yet been produced by the engraver. It was a labor of love for Mr. Smith, and when it was finished he devoted all his leisure he could secure from his regular work during several years. His plates are executed in the dotted style, improperly called stipple, and most of his smaller portraits have considerable roulette work, giving them a mezzotint appearance. In 1870 he returned to New York, and in 1877 he removed to Philadelphia, where he remained until the beginning of April, 1879. He then suddenly expressed a determination to give up engraving, disposed of all his effects, left the city, and nothing has since been heard of him. During the last year of his residence in Philadelphia he essayed etching in the style of Henry B. Hall, and produced ten plates in this manner, his last being a portrait of James L. Clagborn, president of the Pennsylvania academy of the fine arts.

SMITH, Isaac, patriot, b. in Trenton, N. J., in 1756; d. there, 29 Aug., 1807. He was graduated at Princeton in 1773, was a tutor there, studied law, and subsequently practised that profession, and early espoused the patriot cause, commanding a regiment in 1776. He was judge of the supreme court of New Jersey from 1783 till 1801, served in congress in 1785-7, and in the latter year was appointed by President Washington to treat with the Seneca Indians. At the time of his death he was president of the Bank of Trenton.

SMITH, Isaac Townsend, consul-general, b. in Boston, Mass., 12 March, 1813. He was educated at the Latin and the English high-schools in Boston, and at Capt. Alden Partridge's military academy at Middletown, Conn. He entered commercial life, and as supercargo made several voyages to the East Indies, China, Manila, Singapore, Java, and Georgia, in New York, where as a merchant and ship-owner he conducted business for several years. He was an incorporator and for many years president of the Metropolitan savings-bank, and was a commissioner of emigration for the state of New York for several years. Mr. Smith was a presidential elector at the election of Abraham Lincoln in 1864, and is Siamese consul-general in the United States. He has been a contributor to the "Magazine of American History" and other periodicals.

SMITH, Israel, senator, b. in Suffield, Conn., 4 April, 1759; d. in Rutland, Vt., 2 Dec., 1810. He was graduated at Yale in 1781, and settled as a lawyer in Rutland, Vt., but removed afterward to Rutland. He was a boundary commissioner in 1789, and took an active part in the organization of Vermont into the Union. He was a delegate to the convention that adopted the Federal constitution in 1791, a member of Congress from that year till 1797, having been chosen as a Democratic, and was U. S. senator from 1803 till 1807, when he resigned to become governor of Vermont. In 1809 he was a presidential elector.

SMITH, James, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Ireland about 1720; d. in York, Pa., 11 July, 1786. The date of his birth is uncertain, for he never told it. His father emigrated with his family to this country in 1729, and engaged in farming on Susquehanna river. James was educated at the College of Philadelphia, studied law, and settled first in Shippensburgh as a lawyer and surveyor, and afterward in York. In 1751-2, when for many years he was the sole practitioner at the bar. During this period of his life he was as widely known for his humorous stories, his wit, and vivacity as for his learning and success in practice, his drollery being heightened by an awkwardness of gesture, a ludicrous cast of countenance, and a drawing utterance. He also successfully engaged in extensive iron-manufactures on Codorus creek, and at the beginning of the Revolution possessed considerable property. In 1774 he raised the first volunteer company in the state for the purpose of resisting Great Britain, and was a member of the convention to consider the expediency of abstaining from importing any goods from England, and also of assembling a general congress. At this meeting he was one of a committee of three to prepare instructions for the representatives, and these instructions, together with Smith's essay "On the Constitution of Great Britain over the Colonies in America," gave the first strong impulse to the patriot cause in that region. He was a member of the Pennsylvania convention in January, 1776, and of the provincial conference that assembled on 18 June of the same year to form a new government for Pennsylvania, and seconded the resolution that was offered by Dr. Benjamin Rush in favor of a declaration of independence. This, having been unanimously adopted, was signed by the members, and presented to congress a few days before the Declaration. On the day of the adoption of the resolution Smith was appointed, with Col. John Bovard and others, to organize a volunteer camp of Pennsylvania militia for the protection of Philadelphia. He was a member of the convention of 15 July, 1776, that assembled in Philadelphia for the purpose of forming a new constitution for the state, and on the 29th of the same month was elected to congress, remaining in that body till 1783. He served in the general assembly of Pennsylvania. In 1780 he was commissioned judge of the high court of appeals. In 1782 he was appointed brigadier-general of Pennsylvania militia. He was appointed a councillor on the part of Pennsylvania in the controversy between that state and Connecticut in 1784, and in the following year was chosen to congress in the place of Matthew Clark, who had died, but his advanced age compelled him to decline a re-election. After the peace, having lost his fortune during the war, he resumed the practice of his profession, in which he continued till 1801. He was the personal and political friend of Washington and an ardent Federalist.

SMITH, James, pioneer, b. in Franklin county, Pa., in 1737; d. in Washington county, Ky., in 1812. He was captured by the Indians when he was eighteen years of age, and adopted into one of their tribes, but escaped in 1759, was a leader of the "black boys" in 1763-5, and a lieutenant in Gen. Henry Bouquet's expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764. He was one of an exploring party into Kentucky in 1766, settled in Westmoreland county in 1768, and during Lord Dunmore's war was captured as a foraging party, and in 1775 major of the Associated battalion of Westmoreland county. He served in the Pennsylvania convention in 1776, and in the assembly in 1776-7. In the latter year he commanded a scouting party in the Jerseys, and in 1777 was commissioned colonel in command on the frontiers, doing good service in frustrating the marauders of the Indians. He settled in Cane Ridge, near Paris, Ky., in 1788, was a member of the Danville convention, and represented Bourbon county for many years in the legislature. He published two tracts entitled "Shakerism Developed" and "Shakerism Detected," "Remarkable Adventures in the Life and Travels of Col. James Smith" (Lexington, 1789; edited by Will-
SMITH, James, Canadian jurist, b. in Montreal in 1808; d. there in 1890. He was educated in his native city and in Scotland, was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1839, and in 1849 was elected a member of the House of Assembly for the county of Mississauga. He held office as attorney-general, etc., in the Viger-Drapier administration till 22 April, 1847, when he resigned, and was appointed a judge of the court of queen's bench of Lower Canada. He afterward became one of the judges of the superior court.

SMITH, James Milton, governor of Georgia, b. in Georgia, 24 Oct., 1823; d. 25 Nov., 1890. He was educated at Calloden academy, Ga., became a lawyer, entered the Confederate army in 1861 as major in the 13th Georgia regiment, became colonel in 1862, and was a member of the Confederate congress from that year until the close of the civil war. He served in the legislature in 1871-2, was speaker, and in 1872 was chosen governor to fill the unexpired term of Rufus B. Bullock, which office he held by re-election till 1874.

SMITH, James Wheaton, clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., 26 June, 1823. He was graduated at Brown in 1848, and at Newton theological seminary in 1851. In 1853 he became pastor of the Spruce street Baptist church in Philadelphia, Pa., and held that position until 1870, when he went out from it with a colony which established the Beth Eden church. He held the pastoral charge of this body until 1880. Impaired health obliging him to resign, he was thereupon elected pastor emeritus. He is the author of a "Life of John P. Croser" (Philadelphia, 1868). In 1869 he received from Lewisburg (Bucknell) university the degree of D.D.

SMITH, James Youngs, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Groton, Conn., 15 Sept., 1809; d. in Providence, R. I., 26 March, 1876. He removed to Providence in 1826, engaged in the lumber business, and in 1833 in the manufacture of cotton goods in Williamantic, Conn., and Woosocket, R. I., acquiring a fortune. He served several terms in the Rhode Island legislature, was mayor of Providence, in 1855-'7, and governor of Rhode Island in 1863-'5. During his service he efficiently supported the National cause, and largely contributed to it with his private fortune. He controlled extensive manufacturing enterprises, and occupied many posts of trust in banking and other corporations. He was a Republican from the organization of that party.

SMITH, Jeremiah, jurist, b. in Peterborough, N. H., 29 Nov., 1759; d. in Dover, N. H., 21 Sept., 1842. He enlisted in the patriot army about 1775, and was wounded at the battle of Bennington, Vt. He then renewed his studies, was graduated at Rutgers in 1780, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Dover, N. H., early attaining to eminence as a lawyer and a scholar. He served in congress to 1807, but afterward occupied no public office. He was a Federalist, and ably supported the measures of Washington. He was U. S. district attorney in 1798-1800, a judge of the U. S. circuit court of New Hampshire in 1801-2, and then became chief justice, but resigned in 1809 to become governor, in which office he served one term. He then returned to practice, and was again chief justice in 1813-'16. He was president of the Exeter bank for thirty-nine years, trustee and treasurer of Phillips Academy, and a member of the State historical society. His extraordinary mental endowments were unimpaired by age, and were retained until his death. For many years he was the patron and close friend of Daniel Webster. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1807. He published a sketch of Judge Caleb Ellis (Haverhill, 1819). See his Life, by John H. Kent (2 vol., 1846-7). His home was at Dover, N. H.

SMITH, Jerome and Crownshields, physician, b. in Conway, N. H., 20 July, 1800; d. in New York city, 21 Aug., 1879. He was graduated at the medical department of Brown in 1818, and at Berkshire medical school in 1825, becoming its first professor of anatomy and physiology. He settled in Boston in 1825, edited the "Weekly News-Letter" for two years, was made physician in 1826-49, and moved to Boston in 1844. He subsequently occupied the chair of anatomy and physiology, and afterward of anatomy alone, in New York medical college. He established in 1823, and edited for many years, the "Boston Medical Intelligence," conducted the "Boston Medical and Surgical Journal" in 1828-36, and the "Medical World" in 1837-9. His publications include "The Class-Book of Anatomy" (Boston, 1830); "Life of Andrew Jackson" (1832); "Natural History of the Fishes of Massachusetts" (1833); "Pilgrimage to Palestine" (1851); "Pilgrimage to Egypt" (1852); "Turkey and the Turks" (1854); and a "Prize Essay on the Physical Indications of Longevity" (New York, 1869). He also edited "Scientific Tracts," 4 vols., 1833-'43; and "The American Medical Attainments" (3 vols., 1839-'41).

SMITH, Jesse C., soldier, b. in Butternuts, Otsego co., N. Y., 18 July, 1808; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 July, 1888. He was graduated at Union in 1832, and studied law in New York city, under Alva Clark. He took much interest in military affairs, became adjutant, and subsequently major, of the 75th regiment of New York militia and afterward colonel of the 14th regiment. While commanding the latter, he suppressed the "Angel Gabriel" riots, which were caused by the preaching of a lunatic who gave himself that appellation. Gen. Smith was surrogate of Kings county in 1830-5, and state senator in 1842. At the beginning of the civil war he was instrumental in the reorganization of the National guard, and in raising a regular army in the state. He was governor of his state. He commanded the 11th brigade of the National guard at the battle of Gettysburg. After the war he practiced law in Brooklyn.

SMITH, Job Lewis, physician, b. in Spafford, N. Y., 15 Oct., 1827; d. in New York city, 11 June, 1897. He was graduated at Yale in 1849 and at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1854, after which he settled in New York city, and was a successful practitioner there, making a specialty of the diseases of children. He was clinical professor of that branch in Bellevue medical college and physician to the New York charity hospital and the New York foundling and infant asylums. His publications include a "Treatise on Diseases of Children" (Philadelphia, 1876; 8th ed., 1896), and "Arthritis" (Philadelphia, 1879). His home was at Willoughby, Lincolnshire, England, in January, 1880; d. in London, 21 June, 1864. Biographies of Smith are generally based on Smith's own accounts of his life and services, which are not trustworthy. He was the eldest son of George and Alice Smith, poor tenants of Peregrine Bertie, Lord Willoughby, and was baptized in the parish church at Willoughby, 21 Jan., 1520, O. S. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a trade, but ran away from his master and served under Lord Willoughby in the Netherlands and other countries. Smith represents himself as one of the train of Peregrine Bertie, a young son of Lord Willoughby, but, on a list recently discovered of the members of that company, Smith's name appears as a servant. He went abroad again to fight against the Turks under Baron Kiesel, became a captain, and, he says, distinguished himself by daring exploits in Hungary and Transylvania, a patent of nobility and a pension, receiving from Sigismund Bathori, prince of Transylvania, a patent of nobility and a pension, but after engaging in many bloody battles he was left for dead on the field in a fight three leagues from Rothethurm, and, having fallen into the enemy's hands, was sent as a slave to Constantinople.

The heretofore remarkable career of Smith had gained the affection of his mistress, a young woman of noble birth, who sent him with a letter, in which she confessed her feelings for him, to her brother, a pacha on the Sea of Azov. The prince maltreated Smith, until at length he beat out his master's brains with a flail, put on the deadman's clothes, and finally reached a Russian garrison.

Smith also says that he was authorized to wear three Turks' heads in his arms, in token of three Turks killed by him in a series of remarkable combats this time, and that "Sigismundus Bathor, Duke of Transylvania, etc.," afterward, in December, 1603, gave him a patent to that effect; but the Turks were Sigismund's allies in 1599-1602, and he was not duke of Transylvania in December, 1603; neither was he king of Hungary, as "writ in the table" over Smith's tomb. Other accounts of these wars do not mention Smith, and the accounts furnished by himself are evidently untrustworthy.

After travelling throughout Europe and attempting to take part in a war in Barbary, Smith returned to England, probably about 1605, and was persuaded by Capt. Bartholomew Gosnold, who had already visited the coasts of America, to engage in the founding of a colony in Virginia. The expedition, which set sail, 19 Dec., 1606, consisted of 3 vessels and 105 men. The ships were commanded by Capt. Christopher Newport in the "Susan Constant," Capt. Gosnold in the "God-Speed," and Capt. John Ratcliffe in the "Discovery."

Smith is described in the list of passengers as a planter. By the charter no local councillors were named for the colony, but nostr idiocies were delivered to Newport, Gosnold, and Ratcliffe, which were to be opened within twenty-four hours of their arrival in Virginia, wherein would be found the names of the persons who had been designated for the council. On the voyage disensions sprang up among the colonists. Smith says that he was accused of intending to usurp the government, murder the council, and make himself king. When they reached the Canaries he was kept a prisoner for the rest of the voyage. But no mention of this quarrel is made by any contemporary writers, and Smith omits it in his "True Relation," although he describes it in his "General Historic." It is probable that his vanity, his presumption, his previous adventurous career, and the fact that he had the interest of the colony at heart and was a born leader of men, excited the suspicion of his fellow-adventurers that he had designs against the expedition. The box of sealed instructions was opened on the night of their arrival at Old Point Comfort, Va., 26 April, 1607. Smith was named a councillor, but, as he was under arrest, he was not sworn in. On 22 May, with Newport and 22 others, he set out to discover the source of James river, and made a league of friendship with Powhatan and other great Indian chiefs. On their return they found the settlers embroiled in difficulties with Smith's with the Indians, and necessitating defences and obtaining a proper supply of food so far obtained recognition that on 10 June he was admitted into the council. His enemies had urged that he return to England with Capt. Newport, who was going home, but Smith demanded to be tried by the colony, and was acquitted. Scanty food began to reduce their numbers. President Wingfield was accused of embezzling the stores and deposited, and Ratcliffe became his successor, but Smith, by his energy and fertile resources, became the real head. He at once set about procuring food by trading with the neighboring Indians, and built up and fortified Jamestown against their depredations. He explored the Chickahominy in November, discovered and visited many villages, and procured supplies from the Indians. While on a visit to James, he was taken prisoner by Powhatan, who, after a six-weeks' captivity, sent him back to Jamestown. Smith makes no allusion to the legend of his rescue by the chief's daughter Pocahontas (q. c.) till 1616 when, about the time of Pocahontas' arrival in England as the wife of John Rolfe, he wrote an account of it in a letter addressed to his kinsman, Sir Thomas Smith.

The Indian princess by that time had become a person of some importance, and her substantial friendship to the colony had been acknowledged by Smith in his "True Relation," in which he referred to her as the "Nonpareil" of Virginia. In this letter he says of the heroic act: "At the minute of my execution she hazarded the beating out of her own brains to save mine, and not only that, but so prevailed upon her father that I was safely conveyed to Jamestown. This is all that was said of it, except a brief reference in his "New England Trials" (London, 1622), till the appearance of his "General Historie" (London, 1634). It may be that, while the story as given by Smith is false as to detail, Pocahontas, who was at that time or thirty years of age, was touched with compassion for the captive and induced her father to treat him kindly. When Smith returned to Jamestown he found the colony reduced to forty men, many of whom had determined to return to England, but his entreaties and the arrival of Capt. Nelson with 140 emigrants revived their spirits. In June, a council was instructed to explore the Chesapeake as far as the mouth of the Patapesc, and on 24 July set out on another expedition, and explored the head of the Chesapeake, returning to Jamestown on 7 Sept. On these two voyages Capt. Smith sailed, by his own computation about 3,000 miles, and from his surveys constructed a map of the bay and the country lying upon it. In all this exploration he showed himself as skilful as he was vigorous and adventurous. In his encounters with the savages he lost not a man, traded squarely with them, kept his promises, and punished them when they deserved it.

In consequence, they feared and respected him.

On 10 Sept., 1608, by the election of the council and the request of the company, Smith became was doubtless the His His the April his others. New and Ratecliffè conceived to depose Smith, several exploring expeditions proved fruitless, and great discontent followed. In the next year there were indentures and indentation among the settlers, and evil accounts of Smith's administration were carried to England by Newport and Capt. Samuel Argall. The company at home were disgusted that the returning ships were not freighted with the products of the country; the promoters had received no profits from their ventures, and no gold had been found. A new charter was granted, and the powers that were previously reserved to the king were transferred to the company. Lord Delaware was made governor, and three commissioners—Newport, Sir Thomas Gates, and Sir George Somers—were empowered to manage the affairs of the colony until his arrival.

In May, 1609, they set sail with more than 500 people and nine ships; but one vessel was sunk on the way. People in Virginia, the new commissions, bills of lading, all sorts of instructions, and much provision, was wrecked on the Bermudas. (This incident furnished the basis for Shakespeare's play, "The Tempest.") Seven vessels reached Jamestown in August, bringing several gentlemen of good means and a crowd of the riff-raff of London, "dissolute gallants, broken tradesmen, gentlemen impoverished in spirit and in fortune, rakes and libertines, men more fitted to corrupt than to found a commonwealth." Disorder quickly ensued, and the newcomers would have deposed Smith on report of the new commission, but they could show no warrant, the state papers having been sent over in the wrecked "Sea-Venture." He therefore held on to his authority and enforced it to save the whole colony from anarchy. But at the expiration of his year he resigned, and Capt. Martin was elected president. But, knowing his inability, he too resigned after holding office three hours, and Smith again became president.

Having subdued the refractory, he set out on new explorations, and endeavored to establish new settlements. On one of these he met with the accident that saved him from a similar fate to others. In Virginia. While he was sleeping in his boat his powder-bag exploded, severely wounding him. To quench the flames, he leaped into the river, and before he was rescued was nearly drowned. When he returned to the fort, the rebels Ratecliffè, Archer, and others, who were awaiting trial for conspiracy, united against him, and he would probably have been murdered had not two days later a turn to England. He arrived in London in the autumn of 1609. Failing to obtain employment in the Virginia company in 1614, he persuaded some London merchants to fit him out for a private-sailing adventure to the coast of New England. With two ships he arrived in April within the territory appropriated to the Plymouth company, and received a royce or a map of "such portion as he saw." This is the first fair approach to the real contour of the New England coast. Having examined the shore from Penobscot to Cape Cod, and secured 40,000 codfish, he returned to England within six months of his departure. This was his whole experience in New England, which he ever afterward regarded as particularly his discovery, and spoke of as one of his children, Virginia being the other. In January, 1615, he again sailed from Plymouth with two ships. His instructions after the voyage was over, to return in New England with fifteen men and begin a colony. Within 130 leagues out a storm compelled him to return. On 24 June he again set out with a vessel of sixty tons and thirty-eight men, but his ship was captured by a French man-of-war, and he was carried to La Rochelle. He escaped, and on his return home wrote an account of his adventures in New England which he published (1616). He then set himself resolving only to obtain means to establish a colony in New England, devoting the remainder of his life to that project, everywhere beseeching a hearing for his scheme, and so far succeeding that he obtained the promise of twenty ships of sail to go with him the next year (1617), the title of admiral during his life, and half the profits of the enterprise to be divided between himself and his companions. But nothing came of this fair beginning except the title of "Admiral of New England," which he at once assumed and wore all his life, styling himself on the title-page of all that he printed "Some-time governor of Virginia and admiral of New England." After this he remained in England devoted himself to his works, which are largely eulogistic of himself.

Smith was a product of his adventurous and boastful age. His low origin may have hindered his advancement, but it doubtless embittered his spirit toward those better born. He had, no doubt, courage, immense energy, and a great deal of tact. His reputation rests almost wholly upon his own writings, and he is the most entertaining of the travel-writers of his day. He had a much better comprehension of colonization than most of his Virginia associates, and the "sticking" of the settlement for two and a half years was largely due to his courage and good sense. But he has doubtless appropriated credit to himself in Virginia that was due to others. Smith's romantic appearance in history is chiefly due to his facility as a writer of romance. He was not known in England, although it has been said that he was. His arms were not granted for services in America. William Segar, "the King of Arms of England," in August, 1625 (nearly a generation after the services are said to have been rendered), certified that he had seen Sigismund's patent, and had copied thereof recorded in the herald's office all that is recorded on the patent; but Segar must have been imposed upon (in the patent itself), as he was when he granted "the royal arms of Arragon, with a canton of Brabant, to George Brandon, the common hangman of London." Smith owes his exalted position in our history to the Oxford Tract of 1612, and to his own "Generall Historie," a work which is thus perfectly described by a letter to the Earl of Northumberland: "The Author has not spared to appropriate many deserts to himself which he never performed, and has stuffed his relations with many falseties and malicious detractories." He was buried in St. Sepulchre's church, London. His works are "A True Relation," the first tract ever published relating to the colony at Jamestown; London, printed with introduction and notes, by Charles Dode, Boston, 1867; "The History of Virginia" (1612); "A Description of New England" (1616; reprinted in 1792, 1836, and 1865, also a German version, 1828); "New England's Trials" (1620; 2d ed., 1622; reprints, 1867 and 1875); "The Generall Historie of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles" (1624), and was republished with Smith's "True Travels" (Richmond, Va., 1819; "An Accidence for Young Seamen" (1826); "The True Travels" (1830); and "Advertisements for the Inexperienced Planters of New England" (1831; new ed., Boston, 1865). His life has been written by Mrs. Edward Robinson (London, 1845); William Gilmore Simms (New York, 1846); Charles Deane, in his "Notes on Colonel Isaac Tracy. In Discourse on Virginia" (Boston, 1850); George Channing Hill (1858); George S. Hillard, in Jared Sparks's "American Biography"; Charles Dudley Warner in the series of "American Worthies" (New York, 1881); and Charles Kittredge True (1882).

SMITH, John, senator, b. in Hamilton county, Ohio, in 1793; d. there, 16 Dec., 1856. He first entered the army by personal effort acquired a respectable education, and, possessing much natural ability, was one of the most conspicuous of the early politicians in Ohio. He was also a popular Baptist preacher, and in 1790 organized at Columbus the first church of that denomination in the state. He was a member of the first territorial legislature in 1798, and in 1802-5 was U. S. senator from Ohio, having been chosen as a Jeffersonian Democrat. During the early part of his service he enjoyed the close friendship of President Jefferson, who in 1804 sent him on a confidential mission to Louisiana and Florida to discover the attitude toward the United States of the Spanish officers that were stationed in these states, that it might be known how far their friendship was to be depended on in the event of a war between this country and France. Smith's intimacy with Jefferson was interrupted by the charge of his implication in the Aaron Burr treason. Smith and Burr were personal friends, and appearances were so much against him that a motion was made in the U. S. Senate to expel him; but it failed by one vote, and he held all connection with that affair, and was believed to be innocent by his constituents. See "Notes on the Northwestern Territories," by Jacob Burnet (New York, 1847).

SMITH, John, senator, b. in Mastic, near Brookhaven, N. Y., 12 Feb., 1792; d. there, 12 Aug., 1816. He was carefully educated, served in the legislature 1815, and was made colonel of the latter year till 1804, when he took his seat in the U. S. Senate in place of De Witt Clinton, who had resigned, holding office till 1813. He had been chosen as a Democrat. After the close of his term he became U. S. Marshal for the district of New York, and he was also a major-general of militia for many years.

SMITH, John, clergyman, b. in Newbury, Mass., 21 Dec., 1752; d. in Hanover, N. H., 30 April, 1809. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1773, and served as tutor there from 1774 till 1778, when he became professor of languages in the college, holding that office and that of college pastor until his death. Brown gave him the degree of D. D. in 1803. He was college librarian for thirty years, delivered lectures on systematic theology for two years, and published "Hebrew Grammar" (Hanover, 1772); "Latin Grammar" (1802); "Hebrew Grammar" (1806); an edition of "Cicero de Oratore, with Notes and a Brief Memoir of Cicero in English" (1804); a "Greek Grammar" (1809); and several sermons. His wife, Susan Mason, b. in Boston in 1755; d. in 1845, was the daughter of Col. David Mason. In her eighth year she wrote a "Memoir" of her husband (Boston, 1846).

SMITH, John, congressman, b. in Barre, Mass., 14 Aug., 1789; d. in St. Albans, Vt., 26 Nov., 1878. He removed to St. Albans in boyhood, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and established a practice. He was state's attorney for Franklin county in 1826-32, a member of congress in 1830-41, resumed practice at the latter date, became chancellor of Vermont, and was subsequently interested in railroad enterprises. His son, John Gregory, governor of Vermont, b. in St. Albans, Vt., 22 July, 1818, was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1838, and at the law department of Yale in 1841. He began practice with his father, whom he succeeded as chancellor in 1858, became active in railroad interests in Vermont, was a member of the state senate in 1858-9, and of the house of representatives in 1861-2, becoming speaker in the latter year. He was governor of Vermont in 1863-5, and strongly supported the National cause during the civil war. He became president of the Northern Pacific railroad in 1866, and subsequently was president of the Central Vermont railroad. The University of Vermont gave Gov. Smith the degree of LL. D. in 1871.

SMITH, John Eugene, soldier, b. in the county of Berne, Switzerland, 5 Aug., 1816; d. in Chicago, 29 Jan., 1867. His father was an officer under Napoleon, and after the emperor's downfall emigrated to Philadelphia, where the son received an academic education and became a jeweler. He entered the National army in 1861 as colonel of the 9th Illinois infantry, engaged in the capture of Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, and in the battle of Shiloh and siege of Corinth, became brigadier general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, commanded the 8th division of the 16th army corps in December, 1862, engaged in the Vicksburg campaign, leading the 3d division of the 17th corps in June, 1863, and was transferred to the 15th corps in September, taking part in the capture of Mission Ridge, and in the Atlanta and Carolina campaigns in 1864-5. In December, 1870, he was assigned to the 14th U. S. infantry. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in April, 1866, and became colonel of the 27th U. S. infantry in July of that year. He received the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 12 Jan., 1865, for faithful services and gallantry in action, and the brevets of brigadier and major-general, U. S. army, on 2 March, 1867, for his conduct at the siege of Vicksburg and in action at Savannah. In May, 1881, he was retired, and afterward resided in Chicago.—His son, Alfred T., b. in Missouri, 1889, and a graduate of the U. S. military academy, which he entered in 1885, served through the civil war, and since March, 1894, has been colonel of the 13th infantry. He commanded the regiment in Cuba during the war with Spain, taking part in the battles around Santiago.

SMITH, John Hyatt, clergyman, b. in Saratoga, N. Y., 10 April, 1824; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 Dec., 1866. His father, a Presbyterian clergyman, gave him a thorough education, and he then engaged in business in Detroit, Mich. Deciding to study for the ministry, he removed to Albany, N. Y., and while preparing for that profession worked in a bank. He was licensed to preach in
The occupation of the last charge his advocacy of open communion caused the exclusion of Mr. Smith and his congregation from the Long Island Baptist association. He was elected to Congress in 1880, as an Independent, receiving 22,053 votes, against 20,826 votes for Simeon B. Chittenden, Republican. For a time he did double duty in his church and in Congress, but resigned his pulpit in September, 1881, and on the expiration of his congressional term became pastor of the East Congregational church, Brooklyn, N. Y. His publications include "Gilead" (New York, 1863), and "The Open Door" (1870).

SMITH, John Lawrence, chemist, b. near Charleston, S. C., 17 Dec., 1818; d. in Louisville, Ky., 12 Oct., 1883. He entered the University of Virginia in 1836, and devoted two years to the study of chemistry, natural philosophy, and civil engineering; after which for a year he was assistant engineer in the construction of a railroad line between Charleston and Cincinnati. Abandoning civil engineering, he studied medicine, and graduated at the Medical college of the state of South Carolina in 1840. After studying in Paris, he determined in 1841 to devote himself to chemistry, and thereafter he spent his summers in Giessen with Baron Justus von Liebig and his winters in Paris with Théophile J. Pelouze. He returned to Charleston in 1844, began the practice of medicine, delivered a course of lectures on toxicology at the Medical college, and in 1846 established the "Medical and Surgical Journal of South Carolina." Meanwhile he had published in the "American Journal of Science" several papers, including one "On the Means of detecting Arsenic in the Animal Body and of counteracting its Effects" (1841), in which certain of the conclusions of Orfila were shown to be erroneous, and one on "The Composition and Products of Distillation of Spermaceti" (1842), which was the most elaborate investigation on organic chemistry published by an American up to that time. Dr. Smith's fondness for chemistry led to his appointment by the state of South Carolina to assay the bullion that came into commerce from the gold-fields of Georgia and the Carolinas. About this time his attention was directed to the marbles in the vicinity of Charleston, and his investigations of the value of these deposits for agricultural purposes were among the earliest scientific contributions on this subject. He also investigated the meteorological conditions, soils, and modes of culture that affect the growth of cotton, and made a report on these subjects. In 1846 he was invited by the sultan of Turkey, on the recommendation of James Buchanan, to teach Turkish agriculturists the proper method of cotton-culture in Asia Minor. On reaching the East, he found the proposed scheme to be impracticable, and was then appointed by the Turkish government to explore its mineral resources. For four years he devoted his energies to the work, but the Turkish government still derives part of its income from his discoveries. Besides the chrome-ore and coal that he made known, his discovery of the emery-deposits of Asia Minor was of great value, for the island of Naxos was at that time the only source of supply, and, in consequence of the opening of new deposits, the use of the substance was extended. The subsequent discovery and utilization of emery in this country is due to his publications on the subject. In 1850 he severed his relations with the Turkish authorities, spent some time in Paris, and projected there the inverted microscope, which he completed after his return to the United States in October. Dr. Smith then made New Orleans his home, and was elected to a chair in the scientific department of the university of that city, but in 1852 he succeeded Robert E. Rogers in the professorship of chemistry in the University of Virginia. While filling this chair, with his assistant, George J. Brush, he undertook the "Re-examination of American Minerals," which at the time of its completion was the most important contribution to mineral chemistry by any American chemist. He resigned this appointment in 1854, and settled in Louisville, Ky., where he married Sarah Julita Guthrie, daughter of James Guthrie, secretary of the treasury in 1834-7. Dr. Smith filled the chair of chemistry in the medical department of the University of Louisville till 1866, and was superintendent of the gas-works in that city, of which he also acted as president for several years. He established a laboratory for the production of chemical reagents and of the newer pharmaceutical preparations, in which he associated himself with Dr. Edward R. Squibb. From the time of his settlement in Louisville he devoted attention to meteorites, and his collection, begun by the purchase of that of Dr. Gerald Troost, became the finest in the United States. It is inferior only to those of London and Paris, and is now owned by Harvard. His interest in this subject led to the study of similar minerals with the separation of their constituents, and while investigating smaragdite, a mineral rich in the rare earths, he announced his discovery of what he considered a new element, to which he gave the name of mosandrum. Dr. Smith was exceeding ingenious in devising and applying the apparatus for its analysis. He was a chevalier of the Legion of Honor, received the order of Nichan Ittabar and that of the Medjidije from the Turkish government, and that of St. Stanislas from Russia. In 1874 he was president of the American association for the advancement of science, and he was president of the American chemical society in 1877. In addition to membership in many foreign and American scientific bodies, he was one of the original members of the National academy of sciences, and in 1879 was elected corresponding member of the Academy of sciences of the institute of France, to succeed Sir Charles Lyell. The Baptist orphan home of Louisville was founded and largely endowed by him. In 1867 he was one of the commissioners to the World's fair in Paris. This association report an able contribution on "The Progress and Condition of Several Departments of Industrial Chemistry," and he represented the United States at Vienna in 1873, where his report on "Chemicals and Chemical Industries" supplements his excellent work at the earlier exhibition. At the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia in 1876 he was one of the judges in the department relating to chemical arts, and contributed a valuable paper on...
"Petroleum" to the official reports. His published papers were about 150 in number. The more important of them were collected and published by him under the title of "Mineralogy and Chemistry, Original Researches" (Louisville, 1875; enlarged, with biographical sketches, 1884). Mrs. Smith transferred to the National academy of sciences $8,000, the sum that was paid by Harvard university for the bequest of Mr. Smith, of one-quarter of which is to be expended in a Lawrence Smith medal valued at $200 and presented not oftener than once in two years to any person that shall make satisfactory original investigations of meteoric bodies. The first presentation of this medal was on 18 April, 1888, to Prof. Hubert A. Newton (q. v.).

SMITH, John Speed, congressman, b. in Jessamine county, Ky., 10 July, 1792; d. in Madison county, Ky., 6 June, 1834. He received a public-school education, became a skilled Indian fighter, served under Gen. William H. Harrison at the battle of Tippecanoe, and was aide in the battle of the Thames, 5 Oct., 1813. He was frequently in the legislature, its speaker in 1827, and a member of congress in 1821-5, having been elected as a Democrat. He wrote an interesting account of the death of John Quincy Adams he was secretary of the delegation that was sent by the United States to the South American congress which met at Tacubaya. In 1829-32 he was U. S. district attorney for Kentucky. In 1839 he was appointed, with James T. Morehead, a commissioner to Ohio to obtain the passage of a law for protecting slave property in Kentucky. In 1838-39 he was a member of the Kentucky senate.—His son, Green Clay, soldier, b. in Richmond, Ky., 2 July, 1832; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 June, 1895, was named for his grandfather, Gen. Green Clay. After serving a year in the Mexican war, he entered Transylvania university, where he was graduated in 1850, and at Lexington law-school in 1853, and practised in partnership with his father. In 1858 he removed to Covington. In 1853-7 he served as school commissioner. In 1860 he was a member of the Kentucky legislature, where he earnestly upheld the National government, and in 1861 he entered the army as a private. In 1862 he was elected a professor of the university of Kentucky, and in February, 1862, served under Gen. Ebenezer Dumont, and was wounded at Lebanon, Tenn. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 11 June, 1862, but, having been chosen a member of congress, resigned his commission on 1 Dec., 1863, after taking part in numerous engagements. He served till 1866, when he resigned on being appointed by President Johnson governor of Montana, where he remained till 1869. He was a delegate to the Baltimore Republican convention in 1864, and on 13 March, 1865, was given the brevet of major-general of volunteers. On his retirement from the governorship of Montana he entered the Christian ministry, was ordained in 1869, and became in the same year pastor of the Baptist church in Frankfort, Ky. Much of his later ministry had been employed in evangelistic service. Gen. Smith had also taken an active part in furthering the temperance reform, and in 1876 was the candidate of the Prohibition party for the presidency of the United States, receiving a popular vote of 9,352.

SMITH, John Talbot, clergyman and author, b. in Sparta, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1823. He was educated at the Christian Brothers' schools, Albany, and at St. Michael's college, Toronto, Canada, was ordained a priest in 1851, and appointed curate of Watertown, N. Y. He was made pastor of House's Point in 1883, and subsequently appointed proctor-fiscal of the diocese of Ogdensburg. He is a regular contributor to the "Catholic World" and other magazines and journals, and makes a specialty of questions connected with labor. He has written "Woman of Culture," a novel (New York, 1882); "History of Ogdensburg Diocese" (1885); "Solitary Island," a novel (1888); and "Prairie Days," a novel (1891).

SMITH, Jonathan Bayard, member of the Continental congress, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 Feb., 1742; d. there, 16 June, 1812. His father, Samuel, a native of Portsmouth, N. H., settled in Philadelphia, where he became a well-known merchant. The son was graduated at Princeton in 1760, and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was among the earliest of those who espoused the cause of independence, and he was active in the Revolutionary struggle. In 1775 he was chosen secretary of the committee of safety, and in February, 1777, he was elected by the assembly a delegate to the Continental congress. He was a second time chosen to this post, serving in the congresses of 1777-8. From 4 April, 1777, till 19 Nov., 1782, he represented the state of Pennsylvania. On 1 Dec., 1777, he presided at the public meeting, in Philadelphia, of "Real Whigs," by whom it was resolved "That it be recommended to the council of safety that in this great emergency... every person between the age of sixteen and fifty years be ordered out under arms." During this year he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of a battalion of "Associators" under Col. John Bayard, who was Col. Smith's brother-in-law, and the latter subsequently commanded a battalion. In 1778 he was appointed a justice of the court of common pleas, quarter sessions, and orphans court, which post he held many years. He was appointed in 1781 one of the auditors of the accounts of Pennsylvania troops in the service of the United States. In 1792, and subsequently, he was chosen an alderman of the city, which was an office of great dignity in his day, and in 1794 he was elected auditor-general of Pennsylvania. He became in 1779 one of the founders and a member of the first board of trustees of the University of the state of Pennsylvania, and when in 1791 this institution united with the university of Philadelphia, he was a member of the committee which voted to remove the seat of government to the latter university. In 1827 he was elected a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, he was chosen a trustee, which place he held until his death, and was also from 1779 till 1808 a trustee of Princeton. He was a vice-president of the Sons of Washington, and grand-master of Masons in Philadelphia, and for forty years was a member of the American philosophical society. His son, Samuel Harrison, editor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1772; d. in Washington, D. C., 1 Nov., 1845, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1787, edited the "New World" in 1796-1800, and on the removal of the seat of government to Washington, D. C., on 31 Oct. of the latter year, founded the "National Intelligencer," which he edited till 1819. He was commissioner of revenue from 1813 till the office was abolished. He published "Remarks on Education" (Philadelphia, 1798); "Trial of Samuel Chase, Impeached before the U. S. Senate," with Thomas Lloyd (2 vols., Washington, 1805); and an "Oration" (1813).—His wife, Margaret Bayard, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1775; d. in Washington, D. C., in 1844, was the daughter of Col. John Bayard, of Philadelphia. She was educated at the Moravian seminary, Bethlehem, Pa., married Mr. Smith in 1800, and removed with him to Washington, D. C., where she was for many years a popular leader of society, her house being the resort of several of the early presidents and of Henry Clay. She engaged in many religious and charitable enterpises. Mrs. Smith wrote with facility, and published several tales and biographical sketches, including "A Winter in Washington" (2 vols. Wash-ington, 1837) and "What is Gentility?" (1839).

SMITH, Joseph, naval officer, b. in Boston, Mass., 30 March, 1799; d. in Washington, D.C., 17 Jan., 1877. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 16 July, 1809, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 24 July, 1813. He was the 1st incoming of the ships "Eagle" in the victory on Lake Champlain, 11 Sept., 1814, and was severely wounded in the battle, but continued at his post. With other officers, he received the thanks of congress and a silver medal for his services. In the frigate "Constellation," in the Mediterranean in 1815-17, he co-operated in the capture of Algerine vessels, and was carried again to the Mediterranean in 1819, returning in 1822. He was commissioned commander 3 March, 1837, and captain, 9 Feb., 1839. His son was killed on board the "Congress" when he was attacked by the "Merrimac," 8 March, 1862. When the admiral heard of this he surrendered, and exclaimed: "Then Joe is dead."

SMITH, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Westmoreland county, Pa., 15 July, 1799; d. in Greensburg, Pa., 4 Dec., 1868. He was graduated at Jefferson college in 1815, studied at Princeton theological seminary, was licensed to preach in 1819, and became a missionary in Culpeper, Madison, and Orange counties, Va. He was principal of the Williamsburg academy, Staunton, Va., for several years, removed to Frederic city, Md., about 1832, and was pastor of the Presbyterian church there and principal of an academy. He was pastor of a church in Clairsville, Ohio, in 1840, and became president of Franklin college, New Athens, Ohio, in 1844, but resigned on account of his conservative views regarding slavery, resigned his conservative charges in Frederic city, Md., and was president of the newly organized college there. He became general agent of the synods of the Presbyterian church for the territory embracing western Pennsylvania, northwestern Virginia, and eastern Ohio. He subsequently held charges in Round Hill and Greensburg, Pa. He received the degree of D.D. from Jefferson college. His publications include "Old Redstone, or Historical Sketches of Western Presby-terianism" (Philadelphia, 1854), and "History of Jefferson College."

SMITH, Joseph, Mormon prophet, b. in Sharon, Vt., 23 Dec., 1805; d. in Carthage, Ill., 27 June, 1844. His parents were poor, and when he was ten years of age they moved to Palmyra, N. Y., and four years later to Manchester, a few miles distant. In the spring of 1829, in the midst of great religious excitement, four of his father's family having claimed the gift, he and his brother went into the woods to pray, when he had a vision in some respects similar to St. Paul's, but was told by his religious advisers that "it is all of the devil," and he was ridiculed by the public. On the evening of 21 Sept., 1829, after going to bed, he claimed to have had another vision. According to his story, an angel named Moroni visited him and told him of a book written upon golden plates, in which was a history of the former inhabitants of this country and "the fulness of the everlasting gospel," and indicated to him where the book was deposited in the earth. He subsequently went to the spot that he had seen in his vision, found the plates of gold, but an unseen power prevented him from removing them. Moroni, with whom Smith claimed to have had dealings, told him that he had not kept the Lord's command, that he valued the golden plates more than the records upon them, and not till his love for gold had abated and he was willing to give his time to the Lord and translate the inscriptions upon the plates would they ever be delivered to him. It is claimed that this was done by the angel on 22 Sept., 1827. Smith told of his visions from time to time, and, to escape the jeers and ridicule of the people of Manchester, he went to reside with his wife's family in Susquehanna county, Pa., where, according to his own account, he began to copy the characters on the plates and by the aid of "Urim and Thummim," a pair of magic spectacles, translated them from behind a curtain, dictating the "Book of Mormon" to Martin Harris and later to Oliver Cowdery, who joined him in April, 1829. These two frequently went into the woods to pray for divine instruction, and on 15 May, 1829, they claimed that they were addressed by the materialized spirit of John the Baptist, who conferred upon them the priesthood of Aaron and commanded that they baptize each other by immersion for the remission of sins. Each claimed that he had received the gift of the Holy Ghost, and from that time had the spirit of prophecy. The "Book of Mormon" was printed in Palmyra, N. Y., by Egbert B. Grandin in 1830. The Mormon church was organized, 6 April, 1830, by six "saints," at the house of Peter Whitmer, in Fayette, N. Y., and Oliver Cowdery preached the first sermon. The following Sunday at the request of Mr. Whitmer, when several were baptized. The first conference of the church was held in June, 1830, at which thirty members were present, and thereafter the "prophet" claimed supernatural powers. Numerous miracles were performed by him, of which the casting the devil out of Newell Knight, of Coleville, N. Y., was the most celebrated. The membership increased rapidly, and Kirtland, Ohio, was declared to be the promised land of the Mormons. In February, Smith and the leaders of the church settled in that place, and almost at once missionaries were sent to make converts. Early in June, Missouri was an-ounced by Smith to be the chosen land, and in July he located the new city of Zion. Soon afterward he returned to Kirtland, and during a visit

1837. During two years, until December, 1835, he commanded the Mediterranean squadron, with the frigate "Cumberland" as flag-ship. Upon his return home he was appointed chief of the bureau of yards and docks, which post he filled until the spring of 1869. He was then president of the examining board for the promotion of officers until September, 1871. He had been retired, 21 Dec., 1861, and promoted to rear-admiral, 10 July, 1862. He resided at Washington after his service with the examining board until his death, at which time he was the senior officer in the navy on the retired list. He was highly esteemed by Com. Isaac Hull, whose flag-ship "Ohio," he commanded in 1839. His son was killed on board the "Congress" when he was attacked by the "Merrimac," 8 March, 1862. When the admiral heard of this he surrendered, and exclaimed: "Then Joe is dead."
to Hiram, Ohio, with Sidney Rigdon, he was tarred and feathered. (See Rigdon, Sidney, for the subsequent events of this period.) Meanwhile the building of the first "temple" in Kirtland was decided upon, and each Mormon was compelled to give one year of his time in labor for its completion in addition to the tithes that were paid into the treasury. It was 80 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 50 feet high, and was dedicated on 27 March, 1836. At a conference of the elders, held 3 May, 1834, the name of "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" was adopted, and on 14 Feb., 1836, a quorum of the twelve apostles was organized. Two separate and distinct organizations arose in the church, owing to the financial difficulties of the time, and many of the members left it. Smith was charged with having recommended two of his followers to take the life of Grandison Newell, an opponent of Mormonism, but, although he was brought before the courts, he was discharged, owing to the lack of evidence. The failure of the bank, charges of fraud, and other difficulties occurred, and on 13 Jan., 1838, he made his escape to Illinois, ultimately reaching Far West, Mo. "Toward the close of the year the conflict between the Mormons and Missourians, who had previously insisted that the former should leave their territory, assumed the proportions of civil war. The Mormons armed themselves, and, assembling in large bodies, fortified their settlements. The militia of the state was called out by the governor. Smith and many of his associates were lodged in jail, having been indicted for "murder, treason, burglary, arson, and larceny," but on 16 April, 1839, during their removal to Boone county, made their escape to Illinois, whither their families had fled. After this the leaders of the church were frequently arrested and occasionally imprisoned, on the ground of being in custody nearly fifty times. Most of the refugees met in Hancock county, Ill., and on the site of the town of Commerce the city of the saints, Nauvoo, was founded and a charter obtained, signed by the governor, 16 Dec., 1840. The municipal election was held on 1 Feb., 1841, Smith was elected mayor, and on his inauguration was chosen scribe of the town, or secretary of the church, with unlimited powers. The charter of the city granted the right to form a military organization, called the Nauvoo legion, which at one time contained about 1,500 men, and on 4 Feb., 1841, Smith was elected lieutenant-general. The erection of a new temple was begun, missionaries were sent to England, through whom large accretions were made to the church, and in 1842 Smith was at the height of his prosperity. Not only was his fame known from one end of the land to the other, but his favor was sought eagerly by the leaders of the two great political parties, who flattered and praised him that they might win his support. Jealousies soon arose among the leaders, some of whom were driven from the church, and by 1843, authorizing him to take spiritual wives, he antagonized certain of his followers, among whom were Dr. Robert D. Foster and William Law, whose wives he had solicited to enter into the married state with him. In 1844, with other apostate Mormons, Foster and Law decided upon the establishment of a newspaper in Nauvoo, for the purpose of destroying the beliefs of Mornonism. This was the "Nauvoo Expositor," the first and only number of which contained what purported to be affidavits from sixteen women who insisted that Smith and Sidney Rigdon were guilty of moral impurity and were in favor of the "spiritual-wife" system, which they openly denounced. These accusations greatly incensed the "prophet," and the city council declared the paper a nuisance, and ordered that it should be abated. Under cover of this ordinance the followers of Smith attacked the building, destroyed the presses, and made a bonfire of the paper and furniture. Foster and Law fled to Carthage, and a warrant was issued for the arrest of Joseph Smith, the mayor of Nauvoo, and seventeen of his adherents. He refused to acknowledge the validity of the warrant, and the constable who served it was marched out of Nauvoo by the city marshal. The militia was called out, and the Mormons gave up their public arms. Joseph and Hyrum Smith were placed on a charge of treason and taken to Carthage jail. The governor visited the Smiths in jail, made a promise of protection to them, and had a guard placed over the building. On the evening of 27 June, 1844, a band of more than 100 men, with blackened faces, rushed into the jail and fired upon the brothers, killing Hyrum first, while Joseph was pierced with four bullets and fell dead. See "Mormonism and the Mormons," by Daniel P. Kiddler (New York, 1842); "The Mormons: or Latter-Day Saints, with Memoirs of Joseph Smith" (London, 1851); and the "Early Days of Mormonism," by J. H. Kennedy (New York, 1888).—His son, Joseph b, in Kirkland, Ohio, 6 Nov., 1839, after the death of his father in 1844 remained in Nauvoo. The new law of 1841 did not permit him to acknowledge the authority of Brigham Young. For years she kept a hotel, in which her son assisted.

He also was clerk in a store, worked on a farm, was sub-contractor on a railroad, and studied law. After standing abd from the Mormon church till he was about twenty-four years of age, he resolved to put himself in "organized" "business" of it, which he did in 1860. In 1866 he left Nauvoo and took up his abode as editor and manager of "The Saints' Herald" at Plano, Ill. He then went abroad and preached frequently for about fifteen years, and then removed to Lamonic, Iowa, continuing to reside there as the acknowledged head of the reorganized church of the Latter-day Saints Church, and adherent to the doctrine and practices of the polygamists of Utah.

SMITH, Joseph Lee, jurist, b. in New Britain, Conn., 28 May, 1776; d. in St. Augustine, Fla., 27 May, 1846. His father, Nathaniel, was an officer in the old French war, and a major in the commissary department of the Revolution. Joseph was educated at Yale, studied law in Hartford, and practised in his native county until the second war with Great Britain, when he was appointed major in the 25th infantry, participating in the invasion of Canada. In the battle of Stony Creek, 6 June, 1813, in which Gen. William H. Winder was taken prisoner, he saved his regiment by a judicious movement. Joseph was promoted and brevetted colonel, U. S. army, for that action, and became colonel of the 34th U. S. infantry in 1818. He resigned from the army in that year, removed to Florida in 1821, and was U. S. judge of the superior court in 1823-37. Of the 1,000 cases that he decided previous to 1836, not one was reversed. Judge Smith was remarkable for his great physical strength and imposing appearance. He married Frances Marvin, daughter of Euphran Kirby.—His son, Euphran Kirby, soldier, b. in Litchfield, Conn., in 1807; d. near the city of Mexico, 11 Sept., 1847, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1826, served on frontier duty in 1828-9, and was dismissed from the army in October, 1839, for inflicting corporal punishment.
on mutinous soldiers, but was reinstated in 1832. He became 1st lieutenant in 1833, captain in 1838, and during the war with Mexico was engaged in numerous battles, including Molino del Rey, where he was mortally wounded in leading the light infantry battalion under his command in an assault on one of the enemy’s batteries.—Another son, Edmund Kirby, soldier, b. in St. Augustine, Fla., 16 May, 1824; d. in Sewanee, Tenn., 28 March, 1893, was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and entered the infantry. In the war with Mexico he was twice brevetted, for gallantry at Cerro Gordo and Contreras. He was assistant professor of mathematics at West Point in 1849–52, became captain in the 2d cavalry in 1855, served on the frontier, and was wounded, 13 May, 1859, in an engagement with Comanche Indians near old Fort Atchison, Tex. In 1861 he was commissioned a major by the Texas legislature for his services against the Indians. He was promoted major in January, 1861, but resigned on 6 April, on thecession in Florida, and was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the corps of cavalry of the Confederate army. He became brigadier-general, 17 June, 1861, major-general, 11 Oct., 1861, lieutenant-general, 9 Oct., 1862, and general, 19 Feb., 1864. At the battle of Bull Run, 21 July, 1861, he was severely wounded in the beginning of the engagement. In 1862 he was placed in command of the Department of East Tennessee, Kentucky, North Georgia, and Western North Carolina. He led the advance of Gen. Braxton Bragg’s army in the Kentucky campaign and defeated the National forces under Gen. William Nelson at Richmond, Ky., 30 Aug., 1862. In February, 1863, he was assigned to the command of the Trans-Mississippi department, including Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Indian territory, and was ordered to organize a government, which he did. He made his communications with Richmond by running the blockade at Galveston, Tex., and Wilmingon, N. C., sent large quantities of cotton to Confederate agents abroad, and, introducing machinery from Europe, established factories and furnaces, opened mines, made powder and castings, and had made the district self-supporting when the war closed, at which time his forces were the last to surrender. In 1864 he opposed and defeated Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks in his Red river campaign. Gen. Smith was president of the Atlantic and Pacific telegraph company in 1866–8, and chancellor of the University of Nashville in 1870–5, and was professor of mathematics in the University of the South, Sewanee, for eighteen years.

—Ephraim Kirby’s son, Joseph Lee Kirby, soldier, b. in New York city in 1839; d. at Corinth, Miss., 12 Oct., 1862, was graduated at the C. military academy in 1857, served as assistant topographical engineer in the office of the Mississippi delta survey in Washington, D.C., in 1857–8, on the Utah expedition, the survey of the northern lakes in 1859–61, and then became 1st lieutenant of topographical engineers. During the civil war he served on Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks’s staff in July and August, 1861, received the brevet of captain, U. S. army, in the latter month “for gallant and meritorious service in the Shenandoah valley, Va.,” became colonel of the 43d Ohio volunteers in September, and was in command of a brigade of the Army of the Mississippi in the capture of New Orleans, La., in March, 1862. He was brevetted major, U. S. army, for the capture of Island No. 10, 7 April, 1862, served on the expedition to Fort Pillow, fought at the siege of Corinth in May of that year, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel in the U. S. army for repelling a Confederate sortie from that city. He was in command of regiment in operations in northern Mississippi in September and October, was engaged at the battle of Iuka, and mortally wounded at Corinth, 4 Oct., while charging “front forward” to repel a desperate attack on Battery Robinett. For this service he was brevetted colonel in the regular army, his commission dated 4 Oct., 1862.

SMITH, Joseph Matthew, physician, b. in New Rochelle, Westchester co., N. Y., 14 March, 1789; d. in New York city, 22 April, 1866. His father, Dr. Matson Smith, was a well-known physician in Westchester county, N. Y., and his mother was a descendant of the Mather family of Massachusetts. Joseph was educated in the academy of his native town, attended medical lectures at Columbia in 1811–12, was licensed to practice in 1818, and in 1813 was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons. He then settled in practice in that city, and about that time was a founder of the Medico-physiological society, and edited the first volume of its transactions, to which he contributed a paper entitled, the “Efficacy of Emetics in Spasmodic Diseases ” (1817), which won him reputation. He was physician to the New York state prison in 1820–3, became in 1821 a fellow of the New York college of physicians and surgeons, in which he was appointed professor of the theory and practice of physic in 1826, held office for more than thirty years, and in 1855 was transferred to the chair of materia medica, which he held until his death. He became an editor of the New York Medical and Physiological Journal, 1822–5, and a visiting physician to the New York hospital in 1829, president of the Academy of medicine in 1834, vice-president of the National quarantine and sanitary convention in 1859, and president of the Citizens’ association of New York on the organization of the council of hygiene in 1864. During the cholera epidemic of 1849 he was one of the medical council of the sanitary committee of New York city, and performed arduous and excessive labors throughout the pestilence. He contributed largely to professional literature. His publications include “Elements of the Etiology and Philosophy of Epidemics,” of which an eminent English authority said: “It is fifty years in advance of the medical literature of the day on that subject ” (New York, 1824); “Discussion on Cholera Morbus” (N. Y., 1831); “Public Duties of Medical Men” (1846); “Influence of Diseases on Intellectual and Moral Powers” (1848); “Report on Public Hygiene” (1850); “Illustrations of Medical Phenomena in Military Life” (1850); “Puerperal Fever” (1857); “Therapeutics of Albuminuria ” (1862); and several addresses that were so well received and published, and include that on the “Epidemic Cholera in Asia and Europe” (1831), and an admirable “Report on the Medical Topography and Epidemics of the State of New York,” delivered before the American medical association. In the meteorological portions of this work he introduced several new and appropriate scientific terms, which have since been adopted by scientific writers, and he illustrated the climate of the state in an original and ingenious manner by maps, plates, and tables (1859).

SMITH, Joseph Rowe, soldier, b. in Stillwater, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1802: d. in Monroe, Mich., 3 Sept., 1889. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1833, became 1st lieutenant in 1832 and captain in 1838, and served in the Florida war in 1836. During the Mexican war he was brevetted major for gallantry at Cerro Gordo, and lieutenant-colonel for Contreras and Churubusco, receiving in the latter engagement a wound that ever afterward disabled his left arm. He became major of the 7th infantry in 1851, and in 1861 was retired on account of his wounds, but in the following year was appointed mustering and disbursing officer for Michigan, with headquarters on the lakes. He became chief mustering officer of Michigan in 1862, military commissary of musters in 1863, and in 1865 was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for "long and honorable service.

SMITH, Joshua Toulmin, British author, b. in Birmingham, England, 29 May, 1816: d. in Lancaster, Sussex, England, 28 April, 1889. He was educated in the schools of his native town, and became an eminent publicist, constitutional lawyer, and scholar, being especially learned in the Scandinavian languages and literature. He resided in this country in 1837-42, and while here published his "Discovery of America by the Northmen in the 10th Century" (Boston, 1839). This work is accompanied by maps and plates, and has since been reprinted as the standard authority on that subject. The most eminent American historians have quoted it, and it was the ground of his election as a corresponding member of the Society of northern antiquaries, Copenhagen, Denmark. On his return to Europe he devoted himself to constitutional and old Saxon law, was admitted to the bar in 1849, for eight years edited the "Parliamentary Remembrancer," and gave much time and study to antiquarian researches, physical science, geology, and mineralogy. His publications include "The Popular View of the Progress of Philosophy among the Ancients" (London, 1836); "Parallels between the Constitution and the Constitutional History of England and Hungary" (1849); "The Pennsylvania Constitution, the United States Constitution, and the Laws of Nuisance and Sewage Works" (1855); "The Right Holding of the Coroner's Court" (1859); and "History of the English Guilds" (1870).

SMITH, Josiah, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1704; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in October, 1781. His grandfather, Thomas, was a landgrave and governor of the province of South Carolina. Josiah was graduated at Harvard in 1723, being the first native of South Carolina to receive a college degree. He was ordained in 1726, returned to Charleston, and was successively pastor of Presbyterian churches in Bermuda, Cainhoy, and Charleston, S. C. He maintained a learned disputation with Hugh Fisher in 1730 on the subject of the right of private judgment, and in 1740 espoused the cause of the Scotch dissenters, whom he invited to occupy his pulpit. He was an earnest friend of American independence, and on the surrender of Charleston became a prisoner of war. He was taken to Philadelphia, and died there while in confinement. He published numerous discourses, and a volume of sermons (Charleston, 1752).
ducted a prosperous business for many years. He began the project of navigating the Atlantic ocean with steamships in 1832, published a prospectus of the enterprise in 1835, in 1836 established the British and American steam navigation company, and in the spring of 1838 proved the feasibility of the scheme by the crossing of the steamer “Sirius.” Capt. Moses Rogers had crossed in the “Savannah,” using both sails and steam, in 1819. Mr. Smith’s anticipation of the pecuniary advantages of the project were not realized, and he abandoned it, engaging in the introduction of the tea-plant into South Carolina, and in 1843, during the cholera epidemic near Greenville, and was endeavoring to prosecute the industry at the time of his death. Yale gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1840.

SMITH, Justin Almerin, clergyman, b. in Ticonderoga, N. Y., 29 Dec., 1819; d. in Chicago, 4 Feb., 1896. He was graduated at Union college, and was principal of Union academy, East Bennington, Vt. Having been ordained to the ministry, he was pastor of a Baptist church at North Bennington, Vt., from 1845 till 1849, and at Rochester, N. Y., from 1849 till 1853. In the last-named year he became editor of “The Christian Times,” now “The Standard,” in Chicago, Ill., and he had continued in that relation ever since. “The Standard” is issued chiefly as a journal and extended publication, and its prosperity is largely due to the ability and tact that have marked its editorial management. From 1861 to 1866 he united with his journalistic labors the pastoral care of the Indiana avenue Baptist church, Chicago. Shurtleff college, Ill., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1858. Dr. Smith was a member of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago, and of the board of managers of the high school seminary. His publications include “The Martyr of Vilvorde,” a sketch of William Tyndale, for children (New York, 1850); “Sinclair Thompson, the Shetland Apostle” (Chicago, 1867); “The Spirit in the Word” (1869); “Memoir of Nathaniel Colver” (Boston, 1871); “Uncle John upon his Travels,” a book for children (1871); “Patmos, or the Kingdom of John,” by the author of “Mysteries of John Bates” (Toronto, 1877); “Commentary on the Revelation” (Philadelphia, 1884); and “Modern Church History” (New Haven, 1887).

SMITH, Lucius Edwin, educator, b. in Williamstown, Mass., 29 Jun., 1822. He was graduated at Williams college in 1843, studied law in Williams, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. He served during 1847-8 as associate editor of the Hartford “Courant,” and in 1849 as associate editor, with Henry Wilson, of the “Boston Republican.” From 1849 till 1854 he was assistant corresponding secretary of the American Baptist missionary union, Boston. The next three years he spent in Newton theological seminary, where he was admitted and became in 1856 pastor of the Baptist church in Groton, Mass. In 1858 he was called in 1863 to the professorship of rhetoric, homiletics, and pastoral theology in Bucknell university, at Lewisburg, Pa. From 1868 till 1875 he was literary editor of the New York “Examiner.” In 1875 he became editor of the “Watchman,” Boston, of which journal since 1891 he has remained associate editor. While he was at Bucknell university he edited the “Baptist Quarterly.” He received from Williams the degree of D. D. in 1889. Besides contributing numerous articles to periodicals, Prof. Smith has edited “Heroes and Martyrs of the Modern Missionary Enterprise” (Hartford, Conn., 1892).

SMITH, Luella Dowd, author, b. in Sheffield, Berkshire co., Mass., 10 June, 1847. She was graduated at the State normal school in Westfield, Mass., in 1865, and at Temple Grove seminary, Saratoga, N. Y., in 1868. Since the latter date she has been a principal of public schools in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York. She married J. Halden Smith in 1873. Mrs. Smith has written numerous newspaper articles and published “Wayside Leaves” under the pen-name of “J. Luella Dowd” (Boston, 1879), and “Wind-Flowers” (1887).

SMITH, Martin Luther, soldier, b. in New York city in 1819; d. in Rome, Ga., 29 July, 1866. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1842, served in the Mexican war as lieutenant of topographical engineers, became 1st lieutenant in 1853 and captain in 1856, and resigned 1 April, 1861. He then entered the Confederate service, became a brigadier-general, commanded a brigade in defence of New Orleans, was at the head of the engineer corps of the army, and planned and constructed the defences of Vicksburg, where he was taken prisoner. He subsequently attained the rank of major-general. After the war he became chief engineer of the Selma, Rome, and Dayton railroad.

SMITH, Mary Louise Riley, author, b. in Brighton, Monroe co., N. Y., 27 May, 1842. Her maiden name was Riley. She was educated at Brockport (N. Y.) collegiate institute, and in 1869 married J. L. Smith, of Springfield, Ill., with whom she afterward moved to Illinois. She has published “A Gift of Gentians, and other Verses” (New York, 1882), and “The Inn of Rest” (1888). Some of her short poems, notably “Tired Mothers,” have been widely popular, and several of them, including “His Name” and “Sometime,” have been published separately as booklets, and had a large circulation.

SMITH, Mary Prudence Wells, author, b. in Attica, N. Y., 30 July, 1849. She was graduated at the Greenville, Mass., high-school in 1857, and at Hartford female seminary in 1859, taught in Greenville in 1859-61, and in 1864-72 was a clerk in Franklin savings institution, being the first woman employed in a bank in Massachusetts. She was secretary of the Greenville freedmen’s aid society in 1865-70, and school principal 1874. She married Judge Fayette Smith, of Cincinnati, in the latter year, and since 1881 has been president of the Cincinnati branch of the Woman’s auxiliary conference of the Unitarian church. She has published many magazine articles under the pen-name of “P. Thorne,” and “Jolly Good Times, or Child Life on a Farm” (Boston, 1879); “Jolly Good Times at School” (1877); “The Browns” (1884); and “Miss Ellis’s Mission” (1886).

SMITH, Melancton, Continental congressman, b. in Jamaica, L. I., in 1724; d. in New York city, 29 July, 1798. He was educated at home, settled in business in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1744, became sheriff of Dutchess county in 1777, and, says Thanesford, was particularly noted for his love of reading, tenacious memory, powerful intellect, and for the metaphysical and logical discussions of which he was a master. He was a member of the first Provincial congress that met in New York city, 23 May, 1775, and a commissioner in 1777 for detecting and disabling all conspiracies formed in the state, served in the Continental congress in 1783-8, and in the latter year represented Dutchess county in the convention that met at Poughkeepsie to consider the ratification of the Federal constitution of 1787. In the deliberations of that body he exhibited talents of a high order, and ably supported the proposed Federal constitution of 1787. same time taking a conspicuous part as an anti-Federalist leader. He was in the legislature in 1791, in which year a commission—consisting of Gov. Clinton, State Secretary Lewis L. Scott, Attorney-General Aaron Burr, State Treasurer Gerard Banceur, and Auditor Peter Y. Curtenius—sold 530,000 acres of land belonging to New York state, at the sum of eighteen cents per acre, to Alexander McComb, James Calhoun, John Nicholas Roosevelt, and others. When the transaction became public, resolutions of censure were moved in the legislature; but Jabez D. Hammond, the historian of New York, says: “After a long and acrimonious discussion of the resolutions of censure, they were finally rejected, and Melaneton Smith, as pure a man as ever lived, introduced a resolution approving of the conduct of the commissioners, which was adopted in the assembly by a vote of thirty-five to twenty.” He canvassed the state for the re-election of Gov. Clinton in 1792, and was subsequently circuit judge. He died of yellow fever, his being the first fatal case in the epidemic of 1798. His son, Melaneton, soldier, b. in New York city in 1799; d. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 26 Aug., 1818, received a military education at Plattsburg Academy, and at the beginning of the second war with Great Britain, joined the U.S. army, became major of the 29th infantry, 20 Feb., 1813, and colonel of that regiment the next month, which office he held until the end of the war, serving throughout the frontier campaign of that year, and commanding the principal fort at the battle of Plattsburg in September, 1814. The second Melaneton’s son, Melaneton, naval officer, b. in New York city, 24 May, 1810; d. in Green Bay, Wis., 19 July, 1893, entered the navy, attended the naval school in New York, and became a passed midshipman, 28 April, 1832. He was commissioned lieutenant, 8 March, 1837, served in the steamer “Pomsett” until 1840, and in 1839, on this cruise, he commanded a fort during engagements with the Seminoles in Florida. He made a full cruise in the frigate “Constitution” on the Mediterranean sea in 1848-51, and, after being warrant officer, for several years, was commissioned commodore, 14 Sept., 1855, after which he was light-house inspector. On 9 July, 1861, while in command of the “Massachusetts” off Ship Island, he had an engagement with a Confederate fort and three Confederate steamers, and on 31 Dec., 1861, the fort at Biloxi, La., surrendered, cutting off all regular communication between North Carolina and Mobile, and getting possession of the sound. When in command of the “Mississippi” he passed Forts Jackson and St. Philip with Farragut, and destroyed the Confederate ram “Manassas,” for which he was highly commended by the admiral. He participated in the attack on Port Hudson. In an attempt to run the batteries the “Mississippi” grounded, and he set his ship on fire to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. This course was approved by the navy department. He was promoted to captain, 16 July, 1862 (under orders to return north), but was assigned to the temporary command of the “Mongahela,” on which vessel the admiral hoisted his flag on his passage from New Orleans to Port Hudson. In 1864 he had command of the monitor “Onondaga,” and appointed divisional officer on James river, and subsequently he had charge of the squadron in Albenarue sound, N. C., and recaptured the surrendered Federal ironclad. He participated in the attacks on Fort Fisher in the fleet frigate “Wabash.” He was commissioned commodore, 25 July, 1866, and served as chief of the bureau of equipment and recruiting in the navy department until 1870. He was commissioned rear-admiral, 1 July, 1870, had charge of the New York navy-yard in 1870-72, and was retired, 24 May, 1874. After he was retired, he was appointed governor of the Naval asylum at Philadelphia.

SMITH, Meriwether, statesman, b. at the family seat, Bathurst, Essex co., Va., in 1730; d. 25 Jan., 1790. He was a signer of the articles of the Westmoreland county association in opposition to the stamp act, 27 Feb., 1768, and also of the resolutions of the Williamsburg association, a member of the convention of Virginia in 1776, of the Virginia convention in 1778, and of the Virginia convention of 1779, which ratified the constitution of the United States. The belief is held by his descendants that he was the author of the Virginia bill of rights. He was a member of the select committee to which the draft of George Mason was submitted, and appears to have submitted a draft for the state constitution. He twice married; first, about 1760, to Alice, daughter of Philip Lee, and secondly, 29 Sept., 1769, to Elizabeth, daughter of Col. William Daingerfield. Of his issue by the first marriage was George WILLIAM, lawyer and governor of Virginia, who perished, with fifty-nine others, in the burning of the Richmond theatre, 26 Dec., 1811.

SMITH, Morgan Lewis, soldier, b. in Oswego county, N. Y., 8 March, 1822; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 29 Dec., 1874. He settled in New Albany, Ind., about 1843, and enlisted as a private in the U. S. army in 1846, rising to the rank of orderly sergeant. He was assigned to, and engaged in, the civil war was engaged in the steamboat business. He then re-entered the service, having raised the 8th Missouri infantry, a regiment whose members were bound by an oath never to surrender. He was chosen its colonel in July, 1861, took part in the advance of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant’s army to Fort Henry, commanded the 9th brigade of the 3d division of the Army of the Tennessee at Fort Donelson, and successfully stormed a strong position of the enemy. He led the 1st brigade of the same army at Shiloh, was engaged at Corinth and Russell House, accompanied Gen. William T. Sherman to Moscow, Tenn., and was subsequently in charge of an expedition to Holly Springs, Miss., and Memphis, Tenn. He was appointed brigadier-general at Missionary Ridge in the movements for the relief of Knoxville and in the Atlanta campaign. He was then placed in charge of Vicksburg, and, by his stern adherence to military law, brought that city into peace and order. He was subse-
Smith, Nathan Virginian, b. in Rehoboth, Mass., 13 Sept., 1762; d. in New Haven, Conn., 26 July, 1828. He enlisted in the Vermont militia during the last eighteen months of the Revolutionary war, and, having accompanied his father to an unsettled part of Vermont, subsequently led the life of a pioneer and hunter, having no education and no advantages. He decided to become a physician when he was twenty-four years of age, studied under Dr. Josiah Goodhue, and practised for several years in Cornish, N. H., when he entered the medical department of Harvard and received the degree of M. B. in 1790, being the only graduate of that year and the third of the department. At that time the practice of medicine was a low estate, and few physicians were poorly educated and unskilful. To secure better advantages for them, he established the medical department of Dartmouth in 1798, was appointed its professor of medicine, and for many years taught all, or nearly all, the branches of the profession unaided. He held the chair of anatomy and surgery till 1810, and that of the theory and practice of medicine in 1818, when he was given the degree of A. M. by Dartmouth in 1798, and that of M. D. by that college in 1801 and by Harvard in 1811. He went to Great Britain about 1803, attended lectures in Edinburgh for one year, and on his return resumed his duties. He was elected professor of the theory and practice of physics and surgery in the medical department of Yale in 1813, and held the chair from that date until his death, also delivering courses of lectures on medicine and surgery at the University of Vermont in 1822-5, and at Bowdoin on the theory and practice of medicine in 1820-5. His practice extended over four states, and while he was conservative in his methods, he was more than ordinarily successful as an operator. It has been asserted that he was the first in this country to perform the operation of extirpating an ovarian tumor, and that of staphyloraphy. He devised and introduced a mode of amputating the thigh which, although resembling methods that had previously been employed, is sufficiently original to bear a separate name. He developed important scientific principles in relation to the pathology of necrosis, on which he founded a new and successful mode of practice. He invented an apparatus for the treatment of fractures, and a mode of reducing dislocations of the hip.

He published Practical Essays on Typhus Fever (New York, 1824), and Medical and Surgical Memoirs, edited, with addenda, by his son, Nathan Ryno Smith (Baltimore, Md., 1834).—His son, Nathan Ryno, surgeon, b. in Concord, N. H., 21 May, 1797; d. in Baltimore, Md., 3 July, 1877, was graduated at Yale in 1817, and studied medicine under his father there, receiving his degree in 1820. In 1824 he began the practice of surgery in Burlington, Vt., and in 1863 he was appointed professor of surgery and anatomy in the University of Vermont. In 1827 he was called to the chair of surgery in the medical department of the University of Maryland, but he resigned in 1828 and became professor of the practice of medicine in Transylvania university, Lexington, Ky. In 1840 he resumed his chair in the University of Maryland, which he held until 1870. He invented an instrument for the elevation and safety of the patient during the operation of lithotomy, and also Smith's anterior splint for treatment of fractures of the thigh. In addition to articles in the “American Journal of Medicine,” Dr. Smith published “Physiological Essay on Digestion” (New York, 1825); “Address to Medical Graduates of the University of Maryland” (Baltimore, 1828); “Diseases of the Internal Ear,” from the French of Paul Broca, with a supplement (1829); “Surgical Anatomy of the Arteries” (1832-5); “Treatment of Fractures of the Lower Extremities by the Use of the Anterior Suspensory Apparatus” (1867); and a small volume entitled “Legends of the South,” under the pen-name Vistor.—Nathan Ryno's son, Alan Penneman, physician, b. in Baltimore, Md., 3 Feb., 1810; d. there, 18 July, 1898. He received his instruction from private tutors, and was graduated in 1861 at the school of medicine of the University of Maryland. In 1868 he was elected adjunct professor of surgery in that university, and in 1875 professor of surgery. He was connected with nearly all the hospitals of Baltimore as consulting physician, and experimented on the relation of lithotomy more than 100 times successfully in every instance. He was one of the original trustees of Johns Hopkins university, and was a member of many foreign and American medical societies.

Smith, Nathaniel, jurist, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 6 Jan., 1762; d. there, 9 March, 1822. He studied law under Judge Tapping Reeve at Litchfield, Conn., and in 1785 was a member of the legislature, in whose deliberations he took an energetic part in abolishing slavery, founding the public-school system, and settling the public lands belonging to Connecticut. From 1795 till 1799 he was a member of Congress, and assisted in ratifying the Jay treaty with Great Britain, which closed the century. Mr. Smith declined a re-election to congress in 1790, and, after six years in the state senate, was raised to the supreme bench of Connecticut, where, from 1806 till 1819, he formulated decisions, many of which are still quoted. He was one of the leaders of the famous Hartford convention in 1814, to which his own great character helped to give weight, and the pure patriotism of whose purpose he strenuously defended in company with William Prescott, Stephen Longfellow, Chauncey Goodrich, James Hillhouse, and Roger Minot Sherman. "Judge Smith," says Goodrich (Peter Parley), in his "Recollections of a Lifetime," "was regarded by Connecticut as one of the intellectual giants of his time. Gideon H. Hollister, in his "History of Connecticut," describes him as "one whom the God of nations chartered to be great by the divine prerogative of genius."—Her brother Nathan, senator, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 8 Jan., 1769; d. in Washington, D. C., 6 Dec., 1835, also studied law with Judge Reeves, of Litchfield, and, moving to New Haven, became one of the most distinguished advocates in New England. He was a member of the legislature for many years, and took an active part in dissolving the connection between church and state in Connecticut, and d. there, 13 June, 1837. In the same and following years, he advocated successfully her claims to an equal recognition with all other religious bodies, and was one of the founders and incorporators of Washington (now Trinity) college. He was for several years U. S. district attorney, and in 1825 the opponent of Oliver Wolcott, a man determined to succeed to his father's position, but was defeated. In May, 1835, he was elected senator to succeed Samuel A. Foote. He at once took an active part in the debates of the senate, and at his death, which took place suddenly, was even more conspicuous for his private virtues than for his public services. It was said that at his funeral in the senate chamber every prominent public man of the day, including President Jackson and his cabinet, was present.—Truman, senator, a nephew of Nathaniel and Nathan Smith, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 27 Nov., 1791; d. in Stamford, Conn., 3 May, 1884, was graduated at Yale in 1813, studied law, and was a member of the legislature in 1831-'4, of congress in 1839-'40, and U. S. senator from Connecticut in 1849-'51, when he suddenly resigned from weariness of public life. He was remarkable for his wide, though silent, influence in national politics, having taken a decisive part in the nomination of Gen. Zachary Taylor for president in 1848. He conducted that presidential campaign as chairman of the Whig national committee, and was offered a post in President Taylor's cabinet, which he declined. He was, in conjunction with Daniel Webster, the foremost opponent of the "spoils system" in congress. He strenuously combated the views of Stephen A. Douglas in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. After resigning from the senate, Mr. Smith practised law in New York until he was appointed by President Lincoln in 1862 judge of the court of arbitration, and afterward of the court of claims. He was also legal adviser to the government in many questions arising out of the civil war. He wrote one book, "An Examination of the Question of Anesthesia" (Boston, 1859), which is still regarded as the leading work on "Modern Anesthesia" (Hartford, 1867), and published many separate speeches. Mr. Smith was a man of giant frame, and lived to be nearly ninety-three years old.—Perry, senator, of the same ancestry, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 12 May, 1783; d. in New Milford, Conn., 8 June, 1823, studied law, and made his residence in New Milford, where he lived during the Revolution. He was the author of the "History of Connecticut," in which he is known in his profession, he was chosen a member of the legislature in 1812-'4, and again in 1833-'6, and in the mean time was judge of the probate court. In 1837 he was elected U. S. senator from Connecticut, serving till 1843. He resigned the practice of his profession on going to Washington, and never resumed it. He published a "Speech on Bank Depositories" (1828).—Of Nathan's descendants, the Rev. Cornelius Bishop Smith D. D., had been rector of St. James church, New York city, since 1869, and his younger brother, the Rev. Alexander MacKay-Smith (q. v.), was first archdeacon of the diocese of New York.

SMITH, Oliver, philanthropist, b. at Hatfield, Mass., in 1766, and d. there, 1833. He engaged in farming at an early age, and acquired large wealth by stock-raising. He was a magistrate for forty years, twice a representative to the legislature, and in 1829 a member of the State constitutional convention. He amassed a large fortune, which he bequeathed to establish the "Smith Charities," a unique system of benevolence now holding $1,000,000, the interest of which is expended in marriage-portions to poor and worthy young couples. His niece, Sophia, founder of Smith college, b. in Hatfield, Mass., 27 Aug., 1796; d. there, 12 June, 1870, received few early advantages, and led a life of retirement in her native village until, at the age of sixty-five, she inherited a large fortune from her brother Smith. She devoted the remainder of her life to the higher education of women, and passed the remainder of her life in perfecting plans for its organization. By the terms of her will the institution was established at Northampton, Mass, and endowed with $387,465. It was opened in the autumn of 1855, and its charter was the first that was ever issued by the state of Massachusetts to an institution for the education of women. Miss Smith also bequeathed $75,000 to the town of Hatfield for the endowment of a school preparatory to Smith college.

SMITH, Oliver Hampton, senator, b. on Smith's island, near Trenton, N. J., 23 Oct., 1794; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 19 March, 1859. He received scanty early education; emigrated to Indiana in 1817, and was licensed to practice law in 1820. He was a member of the legislature in 1822, prosecuting attorney for the 3d judicial district of Indiana in 1824, and served in congress in 1827-'3, having been chosen as a Jackson Democrat. He then resumed the practice of his profession, in which he took high rank, was chosen U. S. senator as a Whig in 1836, served one term, and was chairman of the committee on public lands. He was defeated in the next senatorial canvass, settled in Indianapolis, largely engaged in railroad enterprises, and was the chief constructor of the Indianapolis and Bellefontaine road. He published

SMITH, Persifor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in November, 1798; d. in Fort Leavenworth, Kan., 17 May, 1855. His grandfather, Col. Robert Smith, was an officer in the Revolutionary army; his maternal grandfather, Persifor Frazer, was a lieutenant-colonel in the same army. Persifor was graduated at Princeton in 1815, studied law under Charles Chauncey, and settled in New Orleans, La. At the beginning of the Florida war, being adjutant-general of the state, he volunteered under Gen. Edmund P. Gaines as colonel of Louisiana volunteers. In the campaigns of 1838 and 1839. He was appointed colonel of a rifle regiment in May, 1846, commanded a brigade of infantry from September of that year till the close of the war with Mexico, and received the brevet of brigadier-general, U. S. army, for his service at Monterey, and major-general in the same for Churubusco and Contreras, 20 Aug., 1847. The official report of the latter battle records that he "closely directed the whole attack in front with his habitual coolness and ability." He also fought at Chapultepe and at the Belen gate, and in the latter battle is described by Gen. Winfield Scott as "cool, unembarrassed, and ready." He was commissioner of armistice with Mexico in October, 1847, afterward commanded the 2d division of the U. S. Volunteers in the campaign against Vera Cruz in May, 1848, and subsequently had charge of the departments of California and Texas. He was brevetted major-general, U. S. army, in 1849, appointed to the full rank of brigadier-general, 30 Dec., 1856, and ordered to Kansas. Just before his death he was placed in command of the Utah expedition.—His cousin, Persifor Frazer, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1808, government of Chester, Pa., 17 May, 1812, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1823, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1829, became clerk of the orphan's court of Chester county, Pa., in 1833, prosecuting attorney for Delaware county in 1839, served in the Pennsylvania legislature in 1862-4, and became state treasurer in 1865. He published "Forms of Procedure" (Philadelphia, 1868), and "Reports of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania" (32 vols., 1855-82).

SMITH, Peter, merchant, b. in Greenbush, Rockland co., N. Y., 15 Nov., 1764; d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 18 April, 1837. His ancestors came from Holland. At the age of sixteen he became a clerk in an importing-house in New York city, and afterward he was a partner of John Jacob Astor in the fur business. They bought the furs of Indians in the northern part of the state, and Smith, who spoke the Indian language, established a trading-post on what is known as the Bleeker property at Utica. When the partnership was dissolved, and Mr. Astor bought real estate in New York city, Mr. Smith purchased large tracts in Oneida, Chenango, Madison, and other counties. In some cases these included whole townships, and the total amount was nearly a million acres. His first wife, whom he married in 1792, was Elizabeth, daughter of Col. James Livingston. His manuscript journals, still in existence, contain interesting descriptions of his journeys among the Indians. In his later years he was deeply interested in religion, and spent considerable sums for the distribution of tracts.—His son, Gerrit, philanthropist, b. in Utica, N. Y., 6 March, 1797; d. in New York city, 28 Dec., 1874, was graduated at Hamilton college in 1818, and devoted himself to the care of his father's estate, a large part of which was given to him when he attained his majority. At the age of fifty-six he studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was elected to congress as an independent candidate in 1852, but resigned after serving through one session. During his boyhood slavery still existed in the state of New York, and his father was a slave-holder. One of the earliest forms of the philanthropy that marked his long life appeared in his opposition to the institution of slavery, and his friendship for the oppressed race. He acted for ten years with the American colonization society, contributing largely to its funds, until he became convinced that it was merely a scheme of the slave-holders for getting the colored people out of the country. Thenceforth he gave his support to the Anti-slavery society, not only writing for the cause and contributing money, but taking part in conventions, and personally assisting fugitives. He was temperate in all the discussion, holding that the north was a partner in the guilt, and in the event of emancipation without war should bear a portion of the expense: but the attempt to force slavery upon Kansas convinced him that the day for peaceful emancipation was past, and he then advocated whatever measure of force might be necessary. He gave large sums of money to send free-soil settlers to Kansas, and was a personal friend of John Brown, to whom he had given a farm in Essex county, N. Y., that he might instigate the colony of colored people, to whom Mr. Smith had given farms in the same neighborhood. He was supposed to be implicated in the Harper's Ferry affair, but it was shown that he had only given pecuniary aid to Brown as he had to scores of other men, and so far as he knew Brown's plans had tried to dissuade him from them. Mr. Smith was deeply interested in the cause of temperance, and organized an anti-drums party in February, 1842. In the village of Peterboro, Madison co., where he had his home, he built a good hotel, and gave it rent-free to a tenant who agreed that no liquor should be sold there. This is believed to have been the first temperance hotel ever established. But it was not pecuniarily successful. He had been nominated for president by an industrial congress at Philadelphia in 1848, and by the land-reformers in 1856, but declined. In 1849, and again in 1858, he was nominated for governor of New York. The last nomination, on a platform of abolition and prohibition, he accepted, and canvassed the state. In the election he received 5,446 votes. Among the other reforms in which he was interested were those relating to the property-rights of married women and female suffrage and abstention from tobacco. In religion he was originally a Presbyterian, but became very liberal in his views, and built a non-sectarian church in Peterboro, in which he often occupied the pulpit himself. He could not conceive of religion as anything apart from the affairs of daily life, and in one of his published letters he wrote: "No man's religion is better than his politics; his religion is pure whose politics are pure; whilst his religion is rascally whose politics are rascally." He disbelieved in the right of men to monopolize land, and gave away thousands of acres of that which he had inherited, some of it to colleges and charitable institutions, and some in the form of small farms to men who would settle upon them. He also gave away by far the greater part of his income, for charitable purposes, to institutions and individuals. In the financial crisis of 1857 he borrowed of John Jacob Amsden, and paid it all back with interest. Smith also, by verbal agreement to give Mr. Astor mortgages to that amount on real estate. The mortgages were executed as soon as Mr. Smith reached his home, but through the carelessness of a clerk they were not delivered, and Mr. Astor waited six months before inquiring for them. Mr. Smith had for many years anticipated that the system of slavery would be brought to an end only through violence, and when the civil war began he hastened to the support of the government with his money and his influence. At a war-meeting in April, 1861, he made a speech in which he said: "The end of American slavery is at hand. The first gun fired at Fort Sumter announced the fact that the last fugitive slave had been removed... The armed men of Virginia and Tennessee would fight in anger. The sad necessity should be their only excuse for going. They must still love the south; we must all still love her. As her chiefs shall, one after another, fall into our hands, let us be restrained from dealing revengefully, and moved to deal tenderly with them, by our remembrance of them, the large share which the north has had in blindlessly laying the foundation of our national greatness years after the war. He united with Horace Greeley and Cornelius Vanderbilt in signing the bail-bond of Jefferson Davis. At the outset he offered to equip a regiment of colored men, if the government would accept them. Mr. Smith left an estate of about $1,000,000, having given away eight times that amount during his life. He created a great debt, and, upon his death, it was repaid only partially. His published works included a variety of pamphlets and broadsides, printed on his own press in Peterboro. His publications in book-form were "Speeches in Congress" (1855); "Sermons and Speeches" (1861); "The Religion of Reason" (1864); "Speeches and Letters" (1855); "The Theologues" (2d ed., 1866); "Nature the Base of a Free Theology" (1867); and "Correspondence with Albert Barines" (1868). His authorized biography has been written by Octavious B. Frothingham (New York, 1878).

SMITH, Preston, soldier, b. in Giles county, Tenn., 25 Dec., 1823; d. in Georgia, 20 Sept., 1863. He received his early education at a country school, and at Jackson college, Columbia, Tenn. He studied law in Columbia, and after practicing there for several years removed to Warvesboro, Tenn., and subsequently to Memphis. He became colonel of the 15th Tennessee regiment of militia, which was afterward mustered into the service of the Confederacy, and he was promoted to brigadier-general, 27 Oct., 1862. He was severely wounded at the battle of Shiloh, and commanded his brigade under Gen. E. Kirby Smith at Richmond Ky. He was killed, with nearly all his staff, by a sudden volley during a night attack at Chickamauga, Ga.

SMITH, Richard, journalist, b. in the south of Ireland, 30 Jan., 1823. His father, a farmer of Scottish ancestry, died when Richard was seventeen years old, and the widow and her son emigrated to this country and settled in 1844 in Cincinnati, Ohio. Richard apprenticed himself to a carpenter and builder until he could secure a better opening. On reaching his majority, he gained employment on the "Price Current," of which he soon became proprietor, and greatly improved it, making it virtually a new publication. He accepted also the agency of the newly organized Associated press, and was the first man in Ohio to transmit a presidential message over the wires. About 1854 he purchased an interest in the Cincinnati "Gazette," the oldest daily in the city, which was then in a languishing condition from lack of proper management. Smith, by editing the "Price Current," he concentrated all his energy on the "Gazette," which became prosperous under his direction, especially during the civil war. But in 1880 its interests and those of the Cincinnati "Commercial" indicated the financial and political wisdom of their union, and accordingly the first of the following year they were consolidated under the name of the "Commercial Gazette." Richard Smith is the vice-president of the new company. He exercises much influence, journalistic and political, throughout Ohio. Though he is often pugnaciously referred to as "Deacon," he is only a lay member of the Presbyterian church.

SMITH, Richard Somers, educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Oct., 1819; d. in Annapolis, Md., 23 Oct., 1893. He was graduated from the U. S. military academy in 1834, but resigned from the army in 1836, was assistant engineer of the Philadelphia and Columbia railroad company in 1836-7, of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal in 1838-40, and projected several other important railroads. He was reappointed in the U. S. army in the latter year with the rank of 2d lieutenant, was assistant professor of mathematics, and was professor of mathematics and engineering at the U. S. military academy in 1846-32, and was then transferred to the 4th artillery, becoming quartermaster and treasurer, but in 1856 he again resigned. He was professor of mathematics, engineering, and drawing in Brooklyn collegiate and polytechnic institute in 1855-9, director of Cooper institute, New York city, for a time, inspector of the 12th U. S. infantry in 1861, and served as mustering and disbursing officer in Maryland and Wisconsin in 1861-2. He then took part in the Rappahannock campaign with the Army of the Potomac, participating in the battle of Chancellorville, Va., 2-4 May, 1863. He resigned in the same month to become president of Girard college, Pa., which post he held till 1868. For the next two years he was professor of engineering in the Polytechnic college of Pennsylvania, and from 1879 till his death he was at the head of the department of drawing at the U. S. naval academy. Columbia gave him the degree of A. M. in 1855. He published a Manual of Topographical Drawing (Philadelphia, 1853) and a work on "Linear Perspective Drawing" (1857).

SMITH, Robert, clergyman, b. in Londonderry, Ireland, in 1723; d. in Rockville, Pa., 15 April, 1793. His father emigrated to this country when the son was seven years of age, settling in Chester county, Pa. Robert received a classical education from Rev. Samuel Blair at Pogg's Manor school, Chester county, Pa., was licensed to preach in 1749, and from 1751 till his death was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Pequea, Pa., a part of the time supplying the church at Leacock. Shortly after his settlement in Pequea he founded a classical and theological seminary, which enjoyed a high reputation, and was one of the most popular schools in Pennsylvania and Maryland. He received the degree of D.D. from Princeton in 1769, was an overseer of that college from 1772 till his death, and in 1791 was second moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States. In 1739 he married Elizabeth, sister of Rev. Samuel Blair. — Their son, Samuel Stanhope, clergyman, b. in Pequea, Pa., 16 March, 1739; d. in Princeton, N.J., 21 Aug. 1810, was graduated at Princeton in 1790, became an assistant in his father's school, was tutor at Princeton in 1792-3, while studying law there, and in 1774 was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church. He labored as a missionary in western Virginia for the next year, became first president of Hampden Sidney college in 1775, and held office till 1780, when he accepted the chair of moral philosophy at Princeton.

At that date the college was in a deplorable condition from the ravages of the Revolution; the students were dispersed and the buildings were burned. Dr. Smith made great exertions and many penurious sacrifices to restore it to prosperity. He accepted in 1783 the additional chair of theology, and in 1786 the office of vice-president of the college. He was a member of the committee to draw up a system of government for the Presbyterian church in 1786, and in 1795 succeeded Dr. John Witherspoon (one of whose daughters he had married) as president of the college, holding office till 1812. Yale gave him the degree of D.D. in 1783, and Harvard that of LL.D. in 1810. As a preacher Dr. Smith was popular and eloquent. He published "Essay on the Causes of the Variety of Complexion and Figure of the Human Species" (Philadelphia, 1787); "Sermons" (Newark, 1799); "Lectures on the Evidences of Christian Religion" (Philadelphia, 1809); "Lectures on Moral and Political Philosophy" (2 vols., Trenton, N. J., 1812); and "Comprehensive Views of Natural and Revealed Religion" (New Brunswick, N. J., 1815). After his death appeared six of his sermons with a brief memoir (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1821). — Another son of Robert, John Blair, clergyman, b. in Pequea, Pa., 12 June, 1756; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Aug., 1799, was graduated at Princeton in 1773, studied theology under his brother, Samuel S., at Hampden Sidney, Va., and in 1778 succeeded him as president of that college. He soon became celebrated for his pulpit oratory. Dr. Addison Alexander says of him: "In person he was about the middle size, his hair was uncommonly black, divided at the top and fell on each side of his face. His large blue eye, of open expression, was so piercing that it was common to say, 'Dr. Smith looked you through.'" He was called to the 3d Presbyterian church of Philadelphia in 1791, and thence to the presidency of Union college upon its foundation in 1795, but in 1799 returned to his former charge in Philadelphia, where he died of the epidemic that was then raging. He published "The Enlargement of Christ's Kingdom," a sermon (Albany, N. Y., 1797). — John Blair's grandson, Charles Ferguson, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 April, 1807; d. in Savannah, Tenn., 25 April, 1862, was the son of Dr. Samuel Blair Smith, assistant surgeon, U.S. army. His maternal grandfather, Ebenezer Ferguson, of Pennsylvania, was colonel of the Continental army. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1823, became 24th lieutenant in the 24th artillery, and was promoted 1st lieutenant, 30 May, 1832, and captain, 7 July, 1838, in the same regiment. He served at the military academy from 1829 till 1842, as assistant instructor of infantry tactics in 1829-31, adjutant in 1831-32, and as commandant of cadets and instructor of infantry tactics till 1 Sept., 1842. He was with the army of Gen. Zachary Taylor in the military occupation of Texas in 1845-6, and was placed in command of four companies of artillery, acting as infantry, which throughout the war that followed was famous as "Smith's light battalion." When in March, 1846, Gen. Taylor crossed the Rio Grande, the passage of which, it was believed, would be disputed by the Mexicans, this battalion formed the advance. He was present at the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and for "gallant and distinguished conduct" in these two affairs he received the brevet of major. At the battle of Monterrey, Maj. Smith was in command of the storming party on Federation hill, which, in the words of Gen. Worth, was "most gallantly carried." For his conduct in the several conflicts at Monterrey he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel. He was present at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, San Antonio, and Churubusco, and in these operations he commanded and directed his light battalion with characteristic gallantry and ability. For his conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco he received the brevet of colonel, 29 Aug., 1847. He was present at the storming of Chapultepec and the assault and capture of the city of Mexico, and was again honorably mentioned in despatches. In 1849-51 he was a member of a board of officers to devise a complete system of instruction for siege, garrison, sea-coast, and mountain artillery, which was adopted, 10 May, 1851, for the service of the United States. He was promoted major of the 1st artillery, 25 Nov., 1854, and in 1855, on the organization of the new 10th regiment of infantry, he was made its first lieutenant-colonel. He commanded the Red river expedition in 1856, engaged in the Utah expedition in 1857-91, and for a time was in command of the Department of Utah. At the beginning of the disturbances that preceded the civil war he was placed in charge of the city and department of Washington, D.C. On 1 Aug., 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and ordered to Kentucky. The next month he became colonel of the 3d U. S. infantry, and was placed in command of the National forces then at Paducah. He acquired reputation as an adroit tactician and skilful commander in the operations about Fort Henry and Fort Donelson. In the severe fight for the possession of Fort Donelson he commanded the division that held the left of the National investing lines, and, leading it in person, he stormed and captured all the high ground on the Confederate right that commanded the fort. He was then ordered to conduct the new movement up Tennessee river, arrived at Savannah, about 13 March, with a large fleet, took command of the forces there, and commenced operations against Sherbro. On 22 March, 1862, he was promoted major-general of volunteers, but the exposure to which he had already subjected aggravated a chronic disease, which ended his life soon after his arrival in Savannah. Gen. William T. Sherman says of him in his "Memoirs": "He was adjutant of the military academy during the early part of my career there, and afterward commandant of cadets. He was a very handsome and soldierly man, of great experience, and at the battle of Donelson he had acted with so much personal bravery that to him many attributed the success of the assault."

SMITH, Robert, P. E., bishop, b. in the county of Norfolk, England, 25 June, 1752; d. in Charleton, York Co., Va., 21 Dec., 1848. Educated at King's College, Cambridge, was graduated in 1753, and was elected a fellow of the university. He was ordained deacon, 7 March, 1756, by the bishop of Ely, and priest, 21 Dec., 1756, by the same bishop. He came to this country in 1757, was assistant minister of St. Philip's church, Charleston, for two years, and became rector in 1759. Though he adhered to the Church of England, he became an ardent patriot, and at one time joined the ranks of the Continental army as a private. On the capture of Charleston by the British in 1780, Mr. Smith was banished to Philadelphia. For a brief period he had charge of St. Paul's parish, Queen Anne county, Md., but he returned to Charleston in 1783 and opened an academy, which was conducted on a large scale as St. Andrew's. Of this institution he was president until 1798. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1789. He was unanimously elected in 1795 to be the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in South Carolina, and was consecrated in Christ church, Philadelphia, 14 Sept., 1795. Bishop Smith, though an excellent scholar and very acceptable preacher, made no contributions in print to church literature or otherwise. He was one of the earliest members of the Society of the Cincinnati.

SMITH, Roswell, publisher, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 30 March, 1829; d. in New York city, 19 April, 1892. He was educated at Brown, in 1859 married Miss Ellsworth, and daughter of Chief Justice Oliver Ellsworth, and for nearly twenty years practised in Lafayette, Ind. Mr. Smith came in 1870 to New York city, where, in connection with Dr. Josiah G. Holland and Charles Scribner, he established "Scribner's Monthly" (now the "Century Magazine"). In 1875 he began the publication of "St. Nicholas," a magazine for children. The first organization was under the firm-name of Scribner and Co., which subsequently became the Century company, with Mr. Smith as president. Under his direction these magazines enjoyed an extensive circulation on both sides of the Atlantic. The Century company engaged in the publication of miscellaneous books, and the "Century Dictionary," edited by Prof. William C. Whitney, was completed before his death, in six quarto volumes of about 6,000 pages.

SMITH, Russell, artist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 26 April, 1812; d. in Glenclay, Pa., 7 Nov., 1896. His name was William T. Russell, but for many years has used only the latter. In 1819 he came to the United States with his parents, and later he studied painting with James R. Lambdin. He began to devote himself to scene-painting, and went in 1834 to Philadelphia, where he worked at the Walnut and the old Chestnut street theatres for six years. After his marriage he abandoned scene- and landscape-painting; meeting with great success as a portraitt Painter, he specialized in draughtsmen, being employed in that capacity by Sir Charles Lyell and others, and also in the geological surveys of Pennsylvania and Virginia. In 1850 he went abroad, and after his return to Philadelphia he painted many landscapes until 1856. At that time the Academy of music was building, and Smith was employed to paint its scenery. The handsome landscape-drapery curtain that he produced brought him many commissions for similar work. One of his latest productions of this kind was the curtain for the Grand opera-house, Philadelphia. Among Mr. Smith's numerous landscapes are "Chocorua Peak" and "Cave at Chelton Hills," which were at the Philadelphia exhibition of 1876. Smith was a member of the American art circle, and of the society and the Pennsylvania academy of the fine arts, where he had contributed regularly to the exhibitions for the past fifty years. —His wife, Mary P., and his daughter, MARY, were artists of some ability. —His son, Xanthus, b. in Philadelphia, 26 Feb., 1839, is known as a marine and landscape-painter. He served during the civil war under the command of the U. S. Navy, and has painted many of the naval engagements of the war.

SMITH, Samuel, historian, b. in Burlington, N. J., in 1721; d. there in 1776. He was educated at home, early took part in local politics, was a member of the council and the assembly, and in 1768 was commissioned, with his brother John and Charles Read, to take charge of the seals and great seals, a West from Franklin in England, and affix his name to official documents. He was subsequently treasurer of West Jersey. Mr. Smith's valuable manuscripts were used by Robert Proud in his "History of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1797-8), and he published a "History of New Jersey from its Settlement to 1721" (1765). His brother, John, provincial councillor, b. in Burlington, N. J., 29 March, 1722; d. there, 26 March, 1771, engaged in the West Indian trade in Philadelphia, and was so successful in business that he occupied one of the finest houses in the city, and entertained the most eminent persons of the time. He was a Quaker in religion, but did much to ameliorate the severities of the sect by founding one of the first social clubs that was ever formed for young men of that denomination. He organized the Philadelphia Contributionship, which was one of the first fire insurance companies in this country, and was a founder of the Philadelphia hospital. He served in the Pennsylvania assembly in 1750-1, was active in the Friends' councils, and occupied many offices of trust and dignity. His granddaughter, Hannah, daughter of his first wife, was a member of the governor's council, and, with her brother Samuel and Charles Read, was a member of the party that secured the seal in 1768. In 1769 he was a commissioner to try pirates. Many anecdotes are told of him. On one occasion, his health being impaired, he was disturbed in his morning slumber by a bellman going about soliciting that Gov. William Franklin's park and a hundred deer were to be sold that day. Mr. Smith put his head out of the window and said to the bellman: "Put up your bell and go home; I will buy the property at the owner's price." He then closed the window and resumed his interrupted sleep.—Another brother, Richard, meant a merchant. He resided in Burlington, N. J., 22 March, 1739; died near Natchez, Miss., in 1803, was carefully educated, and devoted much time to literary pursuits. Part of his correspondence with Dr. Tobias Smollett at the beginning of the Revolution was published in the "Atlantic Monthly." He was chosen to the Continental congress in 1774, and served till 1776, when he resigned on account of the failure of his health, and a probable reluctance to take further part against Great Britain. He died while on a journey through the southern states.

—John's grandson, John Jay, librarian, b. in Burlington, N. J., 16 June, 1798; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Sept., 1881, was educated at home, and from 1829 till 1831 was librarian of the Philadelphia and Logandroid Library in Pennsylvania. In 1830-2, the "Daily Express" in 1832, "Littell's Museum" for one year, Walsh's "National Gazette," and Andrew J. Downing's "Horticulturist" in 1855-60. He superintended more than 100 volumes that do not bear his name, edited Walter Scott's "Life of Napoleon" (1827); "Celebrated Trials" (1853); "Animal Magnetism; Reports of Dr. Franklin with Additions" (1837); "Guide to Workers in Metals and Stones," with Thomas U. Walter (1846); "Designs for Monuments and Mural Tablets" (New York, 1846); "Letters of Dr. Richard Hill" (1854); and "North American Synva" (6 vols., Philadelphia, 1857); and was the author of "Notes for a History of the Library Company of Philadelphia" (1851); "A Summer's Jaunt Across the Water" (1842); and, with John F. Watkins, "Historical and Literary Curiosities" (1846).

—John Jay's son, Lloyd Pearsall, librarian, b. in Philadelphia, 6 Feb., 1822; d. in Germantown, Pa., 2 July, 1866, was graduated at Haverford college, Pa., in 1836, became hereditary assistant and treasurer in the library company in Philadelphia, and in 1851 succeeded his father as librarian. He edited "Publishers' Weekly" in 1862-70; compiled vol. iii. of the catalogue of books belonging to the Library company of Philadelphia, including the index to the first three volumes, and, besides numerous magazine articles and pamphlets, was the author of "Report to the Contributors of the Pennsylvania Relief Association for East Tennessee of a Commission of the Executive Committee sent to examine under a conspiracy" (New York, 1863); "Remarks on the Existing Materials for forming a Just Estimate of Napoleon I." (New York, 1863); "Remarks on the Apology for Imperial Usurpation contained in Napoleon's "Life of Caesar"" (1863); "Address delivered at Haverford College before the Alumni" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Symbolism and Science" (1855); and was the bibliographer of the "Smithsonian Reports" (q. v.). His grandson, Samuel Joseph, poet, b. in Moorestown, N. J. in 1771; d. near Burlington, N. J., 14 Nov., 1855, was liberally educated, and, having inherited large wealth, lived on his estate, dividing his time between his farm, literature, and public benefactions. Two of his lyrics are in "Lyra Sacra Americana," and his "Miscellanies," with a memoir, were published (Philadelphia, 1896).
Lee's queries, "political and military," which reflected on Gen. Washington, and for which the editor "Adress'd to the People of the United States" (1811).—His son, Samuel William, b. in Baltimore, 14 Aug., 1800; d. there, 16 Dec., 1887. He served in the city council of Baltimore, was president of the Baltimore and the Maryland clubs, a director in the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and a trustee of the Peabody institute and of Washington university.

SMITH, Samuel Emerson, jurist, b. in Hollis, N. H., 12 March, 1788; d. in Wiscasset, Me., 4 March, 1890. His father, Manasseh, was a chaplain in the Revolution, and subsequently a lawyer in Wiscasset. Samuel was graduated at Harvard in 1808, a director in the Boston bar, settled in Wiscasset in 1812, and was in the legislature in 1819-20. He was chief justice of the court of common pleas in Maine in 1821, a justice of the state court of common pleas in 1822-30, governor in 1831-34, again a judge of common pleas in 1837-7, and a commissioner to revise the statutes of Maine in the latter year.

SMITH, Samuel Francis, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 21 Oct., 1808: d. there, 16 Nov., 1835. He attended the Boston Latin-school, and was graduated at Harvard and at Andover theological seminary. He was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist church at Waterville, Me., in 1834, occupied pastorate at Waterville in 1834-42, and at Newton, Mass., 1842-44. He was professor of modern languages in Waterville college (now Colby university) while residing in that city. He was editor of "The Christian Review" in Boston in 1842-8, and editor of the various publications of the Baptist missionary union in 1854-69. In 1875-6 and 1880-2 he visited the chief missionary stations in Europe and Asia. He received the degree of D.D. from Wesley college in 1854. Dr. Smith had done a large amount of literary work, mainly in the line of hymnology, his most noted composition being the national hymn, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," which was written while he was a theological student and first sung at a children's celebration in the Park street church, Boston, 4 July, 1832. The missionary hymn, "The Morning Light Is Breaking," was written at the same place and time. He translated from the German most of the pieces in the "Juvenile Lyre" (Boston, 1862), and from the "Conversations-Lexicon" nearly enough articles to fill an entire volume of the "Encyclopaedia Americana" (1828-32). His collections of original hymns and poetry and poetical translations have been published in "Poetry in Prose" (Boston, 1843): "The Psalmist," a noted Baptist hymn-book (1843); and "Rock of Ages" (1866; new ed., 1877). He had also published a "Life of Rev. Joseph Grafton" (1848); "Missionary Sketches" (1871; 2d ed., 1883); "History of Newton, Mass." (1880); "Rambles in Mission-Fields" (1884); and contributions to numerous periodicals. His classmate, Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his reaper poem entitled "The Boys," thus refers to him:

"And there's a nice youngster of excellent pith, Fate tried to conceal him by naming him Smith!
But he chanted a song for the brave and the free—"

Just read on his medal: 'My country, of thee!"

SMITH, Sarah Louisa Hickman, poet, b. in Detroit, Mich., 30 June, 1811; d. in New York city, 12 Feb., 1832. She wrote verses at an early age, was liberally educated at her home in Newton, Mass., and in 1829 married Samuel Jenks Smith, of Providence, R. I. They removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, in the same year, where she was a contributor to the "Gazette." Her poems evince a graceful fancy and poetical feeling, and many of her works on "White Roses" are included in many collections. She published "Poems" (Providence, R. I., 1829)."
SMITH, Abba, journalist, b. in Buckingham, Me., 11 Sept., 1792; d. in Portland, Me., 12 July, 1868. He was educated at Bowdoin in 1818, and subsequently settled in Portland, Me., as a journalist, where he edited the "Eastern Argus," the "Family Recorder," and the "Portland Daily Courier." During the administration of President Jackson he wrote a series of humorous and satirical letters under the pen-name of "Major J. S. D. Downing," which he discarded with reluctance. They were subsequently collected and published (Portland, 1853), and passed through several editions. He removed to New York city in 1842, where he continued his profession of journalism until shortly before his death. His other publications include "Powhatan, a metrical romance" (New York, 1841); "New Elements of Geometry," an ingenious but paradoxical attempt to overthrow the common definitions of geometry (1859); and "Way Down East, or Portraits of Yankee Life" (1855).—His wife, Elizabeth Oakes, author, b. in Yarmouth, Me., 12 Aug., 1806; d. in Hollywood, N. C., 15 Nov., 1893, was educated in her native town, married Mr. Smith, and aided him in the editorship of several papers. She wrote a series of "Letters of the Mandarin," an annual published in Boston, Mass. She removed with her husband to New York city in 1842, and engaged in literary pursuits. She was the first woman in this country that ever appeared as a public lecturer. She also preached in several churches, and at one time was pastor of an independent congregation in Canastota, Madison co., N. Y. Her books include "Riches without Wings" (Boston, 1838); "The Sinless Child" (New York, 1841); "Stories for Children" (Boston, 1847); "Woman and her Needs" (1851); "Hints on Dress and Beauty" (1852); "Bald Eagle, or the Last of the Rama-paughs" (London, 1867); "The Roman Tribute," a tragedy (1860); and, "Old New York, or Jacob Leiser," a tragedy (1853).

SMITH, Sidney, Canadian statesman, b. in Port Hope, Upper Canada, 16 Oct., 1823. His grandfather, Elias, adhered to the cause of the crown during the American Revolution, and, removing to Canada, founded what is now the town of Port Hope. Sidney was educated at Cobourg and Port Hope, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. He married Emma Smith, of Battersea, Upper Canada, in 1853; was elected warden of the united counties of Northumberland and Durham, in 1854; was elected to the legislative assembly for the west riding of Northumberland, and was twice re-elected for this constituency. Till 1856 he supported the coalition of which Sir Allan MacNab was the head, but he then went into opposition. He afterward travelled in Germany, for his health, and in 1858, was appointed postmaster-general with a seat in the cabinet, which office he held till the resignation of the government in 1863, with the exception of the period of the ministerial crisis in 1859, when he became president of the council and minister of agriculture. From 1858 till 1862 Mr. Smith was a member of the board of railways on the Grand Trunk railway. In 1858 he secured the abolition of Sunday labor in the post-offices in Upper Canada. In 1881 he was elected to the legislative council, but he resigned in 1883, and unsuccessfully contested Victoria for the house of assembly. In 1886 he was appointed inspector of registry offices for Upper Canada, which post he still holds.

SMITH, Sidney Irving, biologist, b. in Norway, Me., 18 Feb., 1843. He was graduated at the Sheffield scientific school of Columbia College in 1866, assistant zoologist in the U. S. Fish Commission from that time till 1876, when he was chosen professor of comparative anatomy. He had charge of the deep-water dredging that was carried on in Lake Superior by the U. S. lake survey in 1871, and by the U. S. coast survey in the region of St. George's banks in 1872. Prof. Smith has also been associated in the biological work of the U. S. Fish Commission on the New England coast since 1871. He is a member of various scientific societies, and in 1884 was elected to the National academy of sciences. His papers have been published in the "Reports of the U. S. Fish Commission," "Reports of Progress of the Geological Survey of Canada," and other government reports, and he has also contributed numerous papers on the actions of scientific societies of which he is a member, and to technical journals.

SMITH, Solomon Franklin, actor, b. in Norwich, Chenango co., N. Y., 20 April, 1801; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 29 April, 1869. After spending three years as a clerk in Albany, N. Y., he was apprenticed to a printing establishment in Louisville, Ky. He joined Alexander Drake's dramatic company in 1829, withdrew at the end of the season, studied law in Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1822 became the editor of the "Independent Press," a Jacksonian Democratic organ, and at the same time a manager of the Globe theatre. The latter enterprise proved unsuccessful: but he travelled with his company the next year and gained wide reputation as a low comedian, his principal roles being Mawworm in "The Hypocrite," Sheepface in "The Village Lawyer," and Billy Lackaday in "Sweethearts and Wives." He abandoned theatrical management and the stage in 1853, settled as a lawyer in St. Louis, and was a member of the Missouri state convention in 1861. He was an unconditional Union man, and bore an active part in forming a provisional government for the state. He was elected "Theodore's Apprentice" (Philadelphia, Pa., 1845); "Theatrical Journey Work" (1854); and an "Autobiography" (New York, 1858).—His son, Marcus, actor, b. in New Orleans, La., 7 Jan., 1829; d. in Paris, France, 11 Aug., 1874, made his debut in New Orleans in 1849 as Digory in "Family Jars." He then connected himself with Wallack's theatre, New York city, where he became widely popular, subsequently playing successful star engagements in the principal cities in this country. He visited England in 1869, where he was favorably received.

SMITH, Stephen, physician, b. in Onondaga county, N. Y., 19 Feb, 1823. He was educated in the public schools and at Cortland academy. Homer, N. Y., and, after attending lectures at Geneva and Buffalo, N. Y., medical college, was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1850, became a resident physician at Bellevue hospital, and afterward settled in New York city. He became an attending surgeon to Bellevue in 1854, was professor of surgery there in SMITH, Theophilus Washington, jurist, b. in New York city, 28 Sept., 1784; d. in Chicago, Ill., 6 May, 1846. After serving in the U.S. navy, he was admitted to the bar in his native city, 11 Dec., 1805, having been a law-student in the office of Aaron Burr, and a fellow-student with Washington Irving. On 26 Oct., 1808, he was commissioned a lawyer by Gov. Morgan Lewis. In 1816 he visited the west in the interest of his father-in-law, who had a large estate in Ohio, and proceeding as far as Edwardsville, Ill., settled there. In 1828 he was elected state senator, introduced and supported the original bill for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan canal, and was appointed one of the commissioners. In 1829 he was elected judge of the supreme court of the state. In 1836 he removed to Chicago, and in April, 1831, he was appointed the judge of the 7th circuit of the state in addition to his duties as judge of the supreme court. Failing health compelled him to resign his office, 26 Dec., 1842.

SMITH, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., March 12, 1819; d. in Portland, Me., 25 May, 1879. He was the son of Thomas Smith, a well-known merchant of Boston, and was graduated at Harvard in 1840. After leaving college he at once entered upon theological studies, and began to preach on 19 April, 1841. In June, 1842, he came for the first time to Falmouth (now Portland), then the extreme western town in Maine, and preached for several months to the great satisfaction of the people, who extended to him a call to become their pastor, 26 April, 1842. This he did not accept until 23 Jan., 1847, and he was publicly ordained on 8 March of the same year. His salary was $70 money the first year besides his board.

Mr. Smith continued pastor of the 1st church in Portland more than sixty-eight years, and officiated in part of the services till within two years of his death. He kept an historical and personal diary from 1720 till 1788, a greater length of time probably than that during which any similar record has been kept within the limits of the state. It was edited by the Rev. Samuel Freeman (Portland, 1821), and a new edition, with notes and a memoir by William Willis, former president of the Maine historical society, was issued in 1849.

SMITH, Thomas Church Haskell, soldier, b. in Acushnet, Mass., 24 March, 1819; d. in Norristown, Cal., 8 April, 1897. He was graduated at Harvard, was admitted to the bar, engaged in the establishment of the New Orleans and Ohio telegraph company, and was president of the New Orleans and Ohio telegraph company. At the beginning of the civil war he became lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Ohio cavalry, served under Gen. John Pope in Virginia, and became brigadier-general of volunteers in September, 1862. He was placed in command of the district of Wisconsin in 1863 to quell the draft riots, became inspector-general of the Department of the Missouri in 1864, and while commanding that district dealt with the disturbances that arose from the return of 1,800 Confederate soldiers to their homes after the surrender. He carried out Gen. Pope's policy of withdrawing government troops from Missouri, and restored the state to its constitutional condition. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in 1866, and in 1878 entered the regular army as major and paymaster. In 1883 he was retired, and removed to California.

SMITH, Thomas Kilby, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Sept., 1820; d. in New York city, 14 Dec., 1887. His father, George, was a captain in the East India Company for ten years, and lived in Ohio about 1828, and settled on a farm in Hamilton county. Thomas was graduated at Cincinnati college in 1837, read law with Salmon P. Chase, was admitted to the bar in 1845, and practised till 1853, when he became bureau and special agent in the post-office department in Washington, D. C. He was a member of the Ohio legislature in 1855-6, and subsequently deputy clerk of Hamilton county, Ohio. He became lieutenant-colonel in the 54th Ohio infantry in September, 1861, was promoted its colonel in October, and commanded the regiment at Pittsburg Landing, the advance on Corinth, and the Vicksburg campaign. He was assigned to the 2d brigade, 2d division of the 15th army corps, in January, 1863, was on a court of inquiry, and on staff duty with Gen. Ulysses S. Grant from May till September, 1864, and was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers in August of that year. He commanded brigades in the 17th army corps, and led a division of artillery, cavalry, and infantry in the Red river expedition. His special duty being to protect the gun-boats on the Mobile main and the armies on Sabine river road, he marched by the bayou road, down the river. He accomplished the task in the face of opposing armies on both banks of the stream. Subsequently he commanded the 3d division detachment of the army of the Tennessee and had charge of the district of southern Alabama and Florida and the district and port of Mobile. He was compelled to resign field duty in July, 1864, on account of the failure of his health, was brevetted major-general of volunteers, 5 March, 1865, and in 1866 became U. S. consul at Panama.
He removed to Torraseda, Pa., in 1865, and resided there until his death. In the spring of 1867 he became a member of the New York bar, and opened a law office in the city.

SMITH, Thomas Lochlan, artist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 2 Dec., 1833; d. in New York, 5 Nov., 1884. He came to the United States at an early age, and was for a time the pupil of George Henry Harle, at New York, N. Y., where he opened a studio in 1859. Three years later he removed to New York, and in 1869 was elected an associate of the National Academy. He devoted himself chiefly to painting winter scenes. His "Deserted House" and "Eve of St. Agnes" were at the Centennial exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876.

SMITH, William, jurist, b. in Newport-Pagnell, Buckinghamshire, England, 8 Oct., 1797; d. in New York city, 22 Nov., 1769. His father, Thomas, a tailor-chandler, came to this country on account of his religious opinions in 1715, accompanied by his three sons. William was brought up as a Calvinist and a republican, was graduated at Yale in 1719, served as tutor there for five years, and in 1724 returned to New York city and was admitted to the bar. The following year he was made solicitor general in the New York city and vicinity, and shortly afterwards he was appointed judge of the New York city court, and was the leading lawyer in the city for nearly twenty years. He became a member of the provincial council of the New York city assembly from its establishment in 1733, and was a member of the New York committee of correspondence, and was one of the members who drew up the plan for the massacre of the Mohican Indians in 1764. He was appointed attorney-general and advocate-general by Gov. George Clinton in 1751, succeeding Richard Bradley, and served one year, but was not confirmed by the royal authorities. He became a member of the government's council in 1753, and held the office until 1757, when he was succeeded by his son William. He served in New York city as a captain of the city guard, and was a delegate to the congress of the colonies that was held in Albany, N. Y., in June, 1754, and was the member from New York of the committee to draft the plan of union, which he earnestly favored. In the same month he was a commissioner to fix the boundary lines between New York and Massachusetts. He declined the office of chief justice of New York in 1760, became the associate justice of the state court in 1763, and held office until his death. The "New York Gazette" of the next week described him as "a gentleman of great erudition, the most eloquent speaker in the province, and a zealous and inflexible friend to the cause of religion and liberty."—His son, William, historian, b. in New York city, 22 Dec., 1769; d. in Quebec, Canada, 17 Dec., 1784, was educated for the law, and practised it in New York until his death. He became successively clerk of the provincial parliament, master in chancery, and in 1814 secretary of state for the colonies and a member of the executive council. He published a "History of Canada from its Discovery" (2 vols., Quebec, 1815).—Another son of the first William, Joshua Hett, lawyer, b. in New York city in 1796; d. there in 1818, was educated for the law and practised it with success. During the Revolution he was a Tory in politics, and in Benedict Arnold's treason in 1780 figured as his tool or accomplice. When Andre went up the Hudson river to meet Arnold, the two conspirators passed the night of 22 Sept. at Smith's house. When the plot was complete Andre was ready to return, but, for some reason that Smith never explained, the latter prevailed upon him to board the "Waltham," but accompanied him by land to a place of supposed safety, exchanging coats before they parted, for the better protection of Andre. Smith was subsequently tried by a military court for his connection with the affair, and was acquitted, but taken into custody by the civil authorities and committed to jail. After several months' imprisonment he escaped in woman's dress and made his way to New York, where he was protected by the loyal population. He went to England at the close of the war, but subsequently returned to the United States. He published "An Authentic Narrative of the Causes that led to the Death of Major Andrè," of which Jared Sparks says: "The volume is not worthy of the least credit except when the statements are corroborated by other authorities" (London, 1808; New York, 1809).

SMITH, William, clergyman, b. near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1757; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 May, 1803. He entered the college in his native city, and was graduated in 1774. After spending several years in teaching he embarked for the country, and in 1758 was invited to take charge of the seminary in Philadelphia, which subsequently became the University of Pennsylvania. He went to England in 1758, received orders in the Church of England, and on his return the next year entered upon the educational work. He revisited England in 1779, received the degree of D. D. from the University of Oxford, and was honored subsequently with the same degree in Cambridge college, and from Trinity college, Dublin. In addition to his work as an instructor, Dr. Smith engaged actively in missionary duty as one of the Propaganda society's workers in Pennsylvania from 1766 till the opening of the Revolution. He favored the American view of the differences with England, and delivered a sermon in June, 1775, by request of the officers of Col. Cadwalader's regiment, which produced a sensation both here and in the mother country. Subsequently he lost popularity in this respect, and was looked on as giving doubtful support to patriotic measures, the charge of disloyalty being partially owing to his marriage with Rebecca, daughter of Gov. William Moore. The charter of the College of Philadelphia was taken away by the legislature of Pennsylvania in 1779, whereupon Dr. Smith removed to Chestertown, Md., and became rector of Chestertown parish. He established a classical seminary, which was chartered as a college by the general assembly of Maryland in June, 1782. It was named Washington college, and Dr. Smith became its president. In May, 1783, a convention of the clergy of Maryland was held for organization of the American Protestant Episcopal church in that state, and Dr. Smith was chosen president. At a convention in June of the same year he was elected bishop of Maryland, but, as the election was not approved by many, and the general convention of 1786 refused to recommend him for consecration, he was not elevated to the episcopate. He was several times elected delegate to the general convention, and was uniformly chosen president of that body. He was appointed in 1785 on the committee to propose alterations in the liturgy, which resulted in what is known in ecclesiastical literature as the "Proposed Book." In the preparation of this he had the chief part, and the book was published in 1786, but the alterations were never sanctioned by any action of the church. In 1789 the charter was restored by the legislature to the college in Philadelphia, and Dr. Smith, on being invited to return, resumed his office as provost. He spent the last four years of his life at his residence at Falls of Schuylkill, near Philadelphia, and engaged largely in secular pursuits, especially land speculations. He was much given to scientific research, was a man of more than ordinary ability and broad culture, and was regarded as an eloquent and effective preacher. Besides separate sermons and various addresses and orations, he published a collection of "Discourses, near Philadelphia, and engaged largely in secular pursuits, especially land speculations. He was much given to scientific research, was a man of more than ordinary ability and broad culture, and was regarded as an eloquent and effective preacher. Besides separate sermons and various addresses and orations, he published a collection of "Discourses, near Philadelphia," which embraced the following subjects: "The Merchants of the Revolution," "The Hermit," in the "American Magazine," at Philadelphia (1757-8); an account of "A Bouquet's Expedition against the Western Indians" (1769); new ed., with preface by Francis Parkman. Cincinnati, 1855; and an edition of the poems of Nathaniel Evans, with a memoir (1752). Shortly before his death he made a collection of his printed sermons, addresses, etc., for publication. Bishop White furnished a preface, and added other sermons from manuscripts of Dr. Smith's, which were published in two vols. (Philadelphia, 1809). See "Life and Correspondence of Rev. Dr. William Smith," by his son, William Moore, and Wemyss Smith (2 vols., 1879). Dr. Smith's vignette is from the portrait painted in 1800 by Gilbert Stuart. His daughter, Mrs. Bledget, was also painted by the same artist.—His son, William Moore, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 June, 1797; d. at Falls of Schuylkill, Pa., 12 March, 1821, was graduated at the College of Philadelphia in 1815, studied law in the same city, and was admitted to the bar of Pennsylvania in 1816. He was appointed an agent for the settlement of claims that were provided for in the 6th article of John Jay's treaty, and visited England in 1803 to close his commission, after which he returned to Pennsylvania and devoted the remainder of his life to scholarly pursuits. His publications include several political pamphlets on the same subject, and a volume of "Amer. State Jour. of Commerce," (Philadelphia, Pa., 1874; London, 1876).—William Moore's son, William Rudolph, politician, b. in La Trappe, Montgomery co., Pa., 31 Aug., 1847; d. in Quincy, Ill., 22 Aug., 1868, was carefully educated by his grandfather, Rev. William Smith, until 1803, when he accompanied his father as private secretary to England, studied law in the Middle Temple, and on his return was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1808. He removed to Huntington county, Pa., the following year, became deputy attorney-general for Cambria county in 1811, and during the second war with Great Britain, having previously been major-general of state militia, was appointed colonel of the 43d Pennsylvania reserves. He commanded this regiment in the movement on Canada under Gen. Winningfield Scott, and participated in the battle of Lundy's Lane. He subsequently served many terms in both branches of the legislature, and in 1837 was appointed, with Gov. Henry Dodge, U. S. commissioner to treat with the Chippewa Indians for the purchase of their pines, a large part of the territory that is now the state of Wisconsin. After successfully negotiating that enterprise he settled at Mineral Point, Wis., where he passed the remainder of his life. He was adjutant-general of the territory of Wisconsin in 1839-52, and district attorney of Iowa county for many years, presided over the first Democratic convention in Wisconsin in 1840, and... was clerk of the territorial council in 1846. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of that year, took an active part in its proceedings, and was chairman of the committee on militia. Mr. Smith was chief clerk of the state senate in 1849-50, and attorney-general in 1856-8. For many years he was president of the literary and historical society. He published "Observations on Wisconsin Territory" (Philadelphia, 1826); "Discourse before the State Historical Society" (Madison, Wis., 1850); and "History of Wisconsin," compiled by direction of the legislature (1st and 3d vols., 1854; 2d and 4th vols., 1866).—Another son of William Moore, Richard Penn, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 March, 1799; d. in Fair Hill, Pa., 12 Aug. 1845. He succeeded his father for a time in the keepership of the office of the university for literary pursuits and was the author of several poems and many plays, fifteen of which were produced on the Philadelphia stage, and in London, England, in most instances with decided success. Of these the best known are the tragedy of "Catus Matrus," written for Edwin Forrest and performed by his company in 1831, and the farces and comedies "Quite Correct," "The Disowned," "The Deformed," "A Wife at a Venture," "The Sentinels," "William Penn," "The Water-Witch," "Is She a Brigand?" "My Uncle's Wedding," "The Daughter," "The Actress of Padua," and a five-act drama entitled the "Venetians." He possessed brilliant social qualities and a trenchant wit. Besides his plays he wrote "The Forsaken," a novel (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1831); "Life of David Crockett" (1836); "Life of Martin Van Buren" (1836); and many tales. A selection of his miscellanies, with his memoir by Morton McMichael, was collected and published by his son, Horace Wynn Smith (1856), and his "Complete Works," embodied in his Life and Correspondence, also published, was also issued in two volumes, 1888.—His son, Horace Wynn, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Aug., 1835; d. there, 9 Dec., 1891, was educated in his native city, and studied dentistry, but never practiced, being early inclined to literary pursuits. He entered the National army in 1861, but soon returned to journalism, in which he had previously engaged, and has since devoted himself to literature. He collected the "Miscellanies" of his father that are referred to above, and is the author of "Nuts for Future Historians to Crack" (Philadelphia, 1856); "Yorktown Orderly-Book" (1863); "Life of Rev. William Smith" (2 vols., 1890); and "History of the German-town Academy" (1882).—Another son of Richard Penn, Richard Penn, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 May, 1831; on Staten island, N. Y., 27 Nov., 1887, was educated at West Chester college, Pa. Immediately after leaving college he settled in Kansas, and successfully engaged in business there, but returned to Philadelphia in 1860, became lieutenant in the 71st Pennsylvania volunteers, and rose to the rank of colonel. He was engaged in the battles of Yorktown, Fair Oaks, White Oak Swamp, and Malvern Hill, covered the retreat at second Bull Run, was wounded at Antietam, and at Gettysburg did good service by bringing guns into use against Gen. George E. Pickett's charge. He was mustered out of service in 1864, and engaged in business in New York city. On 3 July, 1887, he delivered an address at Gettysburg on the unveiling of the monument erected in honor of Lieut. Alonzo H. Cushing and the 4th U. S. artillery by the 71st Pennsylvania volunteers.—Another son of William, Charles, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 March, 1820; there, 18 March, 1836, was graduated at Washington college, Md., in 1853, studied law with his brother, William Moore Smith, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1856. He practised in Sunbury, Pa., for several years, was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1875, settled in Lancaster, Pa., and attained eminence as a land lawyer. He became judge of the district composed of the counties of Cumberland, Franklin, and Adams, and in 1879 of the newly formed district court of Lancaster city and county. His later life was spent in Philadelphia. He was a member of the American philosophical society, and in 1819 received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was appointed by the legislature in 1819 to revise the laws of the state, and to frame a compilation of them, which he published with a "Treatise on the Land Laws of Pennsylvania" (5 vols., Philadelphia, 1810-12).—William's half-brother, Thomas, member of the Continental congress, b. near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1745; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 June, 1809, emigrated to this country at an early age, and became judge of the courts of the counties of Pennsylvania, and, establishing himself in Bedford county, became prothonotary clerk, judge of the sessions, and recorder. He early joined the patriot cause, was a colonel of militia during the Revolution, and a member of the State constitutional convention in 1776, served several terms in the legislature, and was in congress in 1780-2. He became judge of the courts of the counties of Cumberland, Huntington, Bedford, and Franklin, in 1787, and from 1794 until his death was a judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. He was a devoted adherent of the Federal party.—Thomas's son, George Washington, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Aug., 1800; d. there, 22 April, 1876, was graduated at Princeton in 1818, studied law under his brother, William Moore Smith, was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1823, but did not practise, and spent several years in Europe and Asia exploring the antiquities of those countries. He was a founder of the Pennsylvania historical society, for many years one of its councilors, and at his death senior vice-president. Mr. Smith possessed a large estate, of which he gave liberally to benevolent objects. He was a member of the vestry of Christ church, Philadelphia, for more than thirty years, and annually deposited $5,000 in its orefory for the benefit of the Episcopal hospital. He was a member of the American philosophical society in 1840-75. He published "Facts and Arguments in Favor of adopting Railroads in Preference to Canals" (Philadelphia, 1824); "Defence of the Pennsylvania System in the Interest of Solitary Confine-ment of Prisoners" (1829); and several pamphlets on similar subjects, and edited Nicholas Wood's treatise on "Railroads" (1832).—William's nephew, William, clergyman, b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1734; d. in New York city, 6 April, 1821, was educated at one of the Scotch universities (probably Aberdeen). He studied for the ministry, and was admitted to orders in the Church of England about 1759. He came to the United States in 1785, was minister of Stepney parish, Md., for two years, then became rector of St. Paul's church, Narragansett, R. I., for a year and a half, after which he accepted the rectorship of Trinity church, Newport, in 1790. This post he held for seven years. He aided in organizing the Episcopal church in Rhode Island, and delivered the sermon at its first convention in November, 1790. He next was rector of St. Paul's church, Norwalk, Conn., in 1797–1800, then removed to New York city, opened a grammar-school, and acquired a high reputation as a teacher. In 1802 he accepted the principalship of the Episcopal academy, Cheshire, Conn., and gave instruction to candidates for orders in connection, with his other duties. In 1806 he returned to New York city, where he resumed teaching the classics, mostly to private scholars. He performed clerical duty to some extent, but was never again settled in any place with the view of making his principal occupation. In 1819 he was chosen a delegate to the Continental congress in 1777–8, served in the 1st Congress in 1789–91, having been chosen as a Federalist, was appointed by Gen. Washington auditor of the treasury in July of the latter year, served three months, and was a presidential elector in 1792, casting his vote for John Adams, the Federalist candidate.

SMITH, William, member of the Continental congress, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1750; d. there, 27 March, 1814. He was the third son of Rev. Dr. John Smith, of Newport, R. I., and his wife, Hannah (the daughter of Dr. William Winthrop, of Norwalk, Conn.). He was graduated at Yale College in 1770. In 1775 he was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1777–8, served in the 1st Congress in 1789–91, having been chosen as a Federalist, was appointed by Gen. Washington auditor of the treasury in July of the latter year, served three months, and was a presidential elector in 1792, casting his vote for John Adams, the Federalist candidate.

SMITH, William, statesman, b. in North Carolina in 1762; d. in Huntsville, Ala., 10 June, 1840. Nothing is known of his ancestry. He emigrated to South Carolina when he was very young and poor, but obtained means to procure an education, and in 1789 was graduated at Mount Zion college, Winnsborough, S. C. He was admitted to the bar of Charleston, S. C., in 1784, served in the legislature for several years and in the state senate in 1806–8, at the latter date, while president of the senate, becoming circuit judge. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1796, served one term, returned to the bench, and occupied it till 1816, when he was elected to the U. S. senate to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of John Taylor, serving in 1817–23. He was a Unionist candidate for re-election in 1822, but was defeated by Robert Y. Hayne. He was then chosen to the state house of representatives, and in 1825 led the party that reversed John C. Calhoun's previous policy in South Carolina. In December, 1826, he was returned to the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of John Gaillard. He was defeated in the next canvass, but during his senatorial service was twice president pro tempore, and declined the appointment of judge of the supreme court of the United States. In 1829 he received the seven electoral votes of Georgia for the vice-presidency. In 1831 he signed the appeal to the Union party of South Carolina, served a third term in the state senate, but, differing in politics from John C. Calhoun, removed to Alabama, that he might not reside where the latter's policy prevailed. He served several sessions in the legislature of that state, and declined in 1836 the appointment of justice of the U. S. supreme court, which was offered him by President Jackson. Having bought large tracts of land in Louisiana and Alabama during his first term in the U. S. senate, he accumulated a large fortune, built a costly residence in Huntsville, and died a millionaire. He was an able though tyrannical judge, an implacable opponent, and an ardent friend. He was a state-rights advocate of the strictest sort, but opposed nullification as a new doctrine, a protectionist tariff, and the annexation of Texas. He was a friend of both Calhoun and Jackson, and was a great admirer of Andrew Jackson.

SMITH, William, governor of Virginia, b. in King George county, Va., 6 Sept., 1796; d. in Warrenton, Va., 18 May, 1887. He was educated at classical schools in Virginia and Connecticut, began to practice law in Culpeper county, Va., in 1818, and engaged in politics. After serving the Democratic party in a dozen canvasses as a politician, he was elected governor of Virginia in 1829, served five years, and in 1840 was elected to congress, but was defeated in the next canvass, his district having become strongly Whig. He then removed to Fauquier county, where, in December, 1843, he was one day addressed as Governor Smith. He then heard for the first time that, without consulting him, the legislature had chosen him governor for the term beginning 1 Jan., 1846. He removed to California in 1850, was president of the first Democratic convention that was held in that state, returned to Virginia the same year, and in 1855–61 was a member of congress, during which service he was chairman of the committee on the laws of public printing. In June, 1861, he became colonel of the 19th Virginia infantry, and he was chosen soon afterward to the Confederate congress, but he resigned in 1862 for active duty in the field. He was promoted brigadier-general the same year, and severely wounded at Antietam. He was re-elected governor in 1863, served till the close of the war, and subsequently sat for one term in the state house of delegates, though he had not been a member for several years. Though he was a marvellously adroit politician, and few members of the Democratic party were furnished with so large a number of ingenuities pleas. As a soldier he was noted, on the contrary, for valor rather than tactical skill. Throughout his long career he was a familiar figure in many legislative bodies, and his eccentricities of habit and humor endeared him to his constituents. In early manhood he established a line of post-coaches through Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, on which he contracted to carry the U. S. mail. His sobriquet of "Extra Billy," which clung to him throughout his life, grew out of his demands for extra compensation for that service. — His cousin, William Waugh, educator, b. in Warrenton, Fauquier co., Va., 12 March, 1845, was educated at the University of Virginia and at Randolph Macon college, entered the Confederate service at seventeen years of age, fought through the war in the ranks, twice refusing commissions, and was wounded at the battles of Fair Oaks and Gettysburg. He was principal of Bethel academy in 1871–7, when he became professor of languages in Randolph Macon, held office till 1886, and since that time has been president of that college. He has published "Outlines of Psychology" (New York, 1883), and "Chart of Comparative Syntax of Latin, Greek, French, German, and English" (1885).
SMITH. William, naval officer, b. in Washington, Ky., 9 Jan., 1803; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 1 May, 1879. He entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman in 1823, was attached to the "Sea-Gull," and served in Com. David Porter's squadron against the West Indian pirates. He became lieutenant in 1834, co-operated in the "Vandallia" with the army in several expeditions against the Seminole Indians in Florida in 1835-7, and during the Mexican war assisted at the capture of Tuspan and Tobasco. He became commander in 1854, was in charge of the "Levant," of the East Indian squadron, and participated in the capture of the barrier forts at Canton, China, in 1856. During the civil war he was in the frigate "Congress" when she was sunk by the "Merrimac," became commodore, 16 July, 1862, commanded the "Waubensett" and gun-boats co-operating with Gen. George B. McClelen's army in that year, and was subsequently in command of the Pensacola naval station till 9 Jan., 1865, when he was retired.

SMITH, William Andrew, clergyman, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 29 Nov., 1802; d. in Richmond, Va., 1 March, 1879. He was admitted to the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1825, became agent of Randolph Macon college in 1833, and was subsequently pastor of Methodist churches in Peters burg, Richmond, Norfolk, and Lynchburg, Va. He was a member of every Methodist general conference from 1832 till 1844, of the Louisville, Ky., convention, at which the Methodist Episcopal church, south, was organized in the latter year, and of every general conference of that body till his death. In 1846-66 he was president of Randolph Macon college, and during his occupation of that office he also filled the chair of moral science there, and lectured in Virginia and North Carolina. He was transferred to the St. Louis conference in 1866, and was appointed by the general conference one of the commissioners on the part of the southern church to settle the property question with the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1869 he became president of Central university, Mo. He edited the "Christian Advocate" at Richmond, Va., for several years, and published "Lectures on the Philosophy of Slavery," a defence of that institution as it existed in the southern states (Richmond, Va., 1860). He settled in the Hebrides, Scotland, 18 June, 1884; d. in Milwaukee, 13 Feb., 1883. He came to this country, and spent his youth in New York and Michigan, and finally settled at Fox Lake, Wis., where he engaged in business. He was elected a member of the Legislature in 1861 and re-elected in 1871, when he was made speaker of the house. Besides holding many other offices, he was elected governor of Wisconsin, in 1877 and 1879, on the latter occasion receiving the largest majority that was ever given to a governor in that state. He was earnestly engaged in all philanthropic and Christian enterprises, especially those connected with the Baptist denomination.

SMITH, William Ernest, assistant secretary of the treasury, b. in Baltimore, Ill., 8 June, 1892; d. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 30 March, 1888. He was graduated at Lafayette in 1872 with the degree of mining engineer, admitted to the bar of Plattsburg, N. Y., in 1875, and was its mayor in 1877-8. He was in the legislature in 1884, and became a leader of the supporters of Samuel J. Tilden. During this service he inserted in the supply bill what is known as the "Freedom of worship clause," by which an appropriation of $1,500 is paid to Roman Catholic priests for their services to prisoners in the three parishes where the New York state pris-
Smith should be accorded great praise for the ingenuity which conceived, and the ability which executed, the movement at Brown's ferry. When the bridge was thrown at Brown's ferry, on the morning of the 27th Oct., 1863, the surprise was as great to the army within Chattanooga as it was to the army besieging it from without. "The house committee on military affairs, in April, 1863, unanimously recommended that Gen. William F. Smith had saved the Army of the Cumberland from capture, and afterward directed it to victory." He was confirmed as major-general of volunteers in March, 1864, and in May assigned to the 15th corps, which he commanded at Cold Harbor and at Petersburg till July, when he was placed on special duty. On 15 March, 1865, he received the brevets of brigadier-general, U.S. army, for "gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Chattanooga, Tenn.," and that of major-general for services in the field during the civil war. He resigned his volunteer commission in 1865, and that in the U.S. army in 1867. He became president of the International telegraph company in 1862, and in 1875 and subsequently president of the board. Since 1881 he has been a civil engineer. He was known in the army as "Baldy" Smith.

SMITH, William Henry, journalist, b. in Austertitz, N. Y., 1 Dec., 1833; d. in Lake Forest, Ill., 27 July, 1896. In 1856 his parents emigrated to Ohio, where he received an English education. He was tutor in a western college, and then assistant editor of a weekly paper in Cincinnati, of which, at the age of twenty-two, he became editor, doing also editorial work on the "Literary Review." At the opening of the civil war he was on the editorial staff of the Cincinnati "Gazette," and during the war he took an active part in raising troops and forwarding sanitary supplies, and in political work for strengthening the government. He was largely instrumental in bringing Gov. John Brough to the front as the candidate of the united Republicans and War Democrats; and at Brough's election, in 1863, he became the latter's private secretary. The next year he was elected secretary of state of Ohio, and he was re-elected in 1866. He retired from public life in 1868 and began to practise law at Cincinnati, but, his health giving way, he was forced to withdraw from all active work. In 1870 he took charge of the affairs of the Western associated press, with headquarters at Chicago. In 1877 he was appointed by President Hayes collector of the port at that city, and was instrumental in bringing about important reforms in customs methods in harmony with the civil-service policy of the administration. In January, 1884, he effectually united the New York associated press with the Western associated press, and became general manager of the consolidated association. Mr. Smith was a student of historical subjects. He was author of "The St. Clair Papers" (2 vols., Cincinnati, 1892), a biography of Charles Hamilton, and many articles on American and international topics. He was also the author of "A Political History of the United States." By investigations in the British museum he brought to light many unpublished letters of Washington to Col. Henry Bouquet, and had shown that those that were published by Jared Sparks were not given correctly.

SMITH, William Lougton, diplomatist, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1758; d. there in 1812. He was educated in England, and in Geneva, Switzerland, studied law in the Middle Temple, and returned to Charleston in 1783, after an absence of thirteen years. He was twice chosen to the legislature, and was one of the governor's council. In 1788 he was elected to the first congress, and his was the first contested election case before that body, his opponent being Dr. David Ramsay, the historian. Mr. Smith was sustained with only one negative vote. He was an able and frequent debater, advocating, among other measures, a commercial treaty with England instead of France. When Jay's treaty was before the senate, he was burnt in effigy in Charleston, in the outbreak of public feeling against it. He became charged with affairs to Portugal in 1797. In 1800 he was transferred to the Spanish mission, which he held till 1801. He supported the administrations of Washington and Adams, but was a vehement opponent of Jefferson, against whose pretensions to the presidency he published a pamphlet. His contributions include "Speeches in the House of Representatives of the United States" (London, 1794); "Address to his Constituents" (1794); "Fourth-of-July Oration" (1796); "Comparative View of the Constitution of the States" (Philadelphia, 1796); and several essays, published under the signature of "American Arguments for British Rights." (London, 1806).

SMITH, William Nathan Harrell, jurist, b. in Murfreesboro, N. C., 24 Sept., 1812; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 14 Nov., 1889. He was graduated at Yale in 1834, studied at the law department there, and was admitted to practice in his native state in 1840, and took high rank at the bar. He served in the legislature in 1842, and in the following year, in 1848, in which year he was chosen solicitor for the 1st judicial circuit, and held office for two terms of eight years. He was defeated as a Whig candidate for congress in 1856, returned to the legislature, was chosen to congress in 1858, and served one term. He declared himself for secession at the beginning of the civil war, was a member of the Confederate congress in 1861-3, and of the North Carolina legislature in the latter year. During the administration of President Johnson he aided in the reconstruction of the state according to the policy that he suggested. He practised his profession in Norfolk, Va., in 1860-72, returned to North Carolina in the latter year, and settled in Raleigh. He was U.S. attorney, and was appointed judge of the superior court, succeeding Richmond W. Pearson in 1878, and continued to serve by re-election after that date.

SMITH, William Russell, congressman, b. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., 8 Aug., 1813; d. 26 Feb., 1866. He was educated at the University of Alabama, but was not graduated, and began the practice of law in Greensborough, Ala. He served in the Creek war in 1836 as a captain of volunteer infantry, removed to Tuscaloosa in 1838, founded the "Monitor" in that city, and was mayor in 1839. He was a circuit judge and major-general of state militia in 1850-1, and in the former year was chosen to congress as a Whig, serving by re-election till 1857. During his last term in that office he delivered a notable speech denouncing the policy of Louis Kossuth. He was a member of the Alabama convention in 1861, opposed secession, but after the opening of hostilities sat in the Confederate congress till 1863. He was president of the University of Alabama for several years after the war, but resigned to devote himself to his profession and to literary pursuits. He had published "The Alabama Justiciary" (New York, 1841); "The Uses of Solitude," a poem (Albany, N. Y., 1849); "As It Is," a novel (Tuscaloosa, 1869); "Confederate Alabama Reports" (1862); and several poems and legal pamphlets.

SMITH, William Sooy, civil engineer, b. in Tarlton, Ohio, 22 July, 1850. He was graduated at Ohio university in 1849, and at the U. S. military academy in 1853. He resigned in 1854 and became assistant to Lieut.-Col. James D. Graham, of the U. S. topographical engineers, then in charge of the government improvements in the great lakes. In 1855 he settled in Buffalo, N. Y., and was principal of a high-school. In 1857 he made the first surveys for the international bridge across Niagara river, and was employed by the city of Buffalo as an expert to examine the bridge plans that were submitted. He was then elected engineer and secretary of the Trenton locomotive-works, N. J., which was at that time the chief iron-bridge manufacturing-school; and he continued so until 1861. While serving in this capacity he was sent to Cuba by the company, and he also constructed an iron bridge across Savannah river, where he introduced improvements in sinking cylinders pneumatically. The beginning of the civil war stopped this work, and he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of Ohio volunteers and assigned to duty as assistant adjutant-general at Camp Denison. On 26 June, 1861, he was commissioned colonel of the 13th Ohio regiment and participated in the West Virginia campaigns, after which he joined the Army of the Ohio, and was present at Shiloh and Perryville. He was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers on 15 April, 1862, and commanded successively the 2d and 3d divisions of the Army of the Ohio. He was brevetted major-general in 1862, after which he joined the army under Gen. Grant and took part in the Vicksburg campaign as commander of the 1st division of the 16th corps. Subsequently he was made chief of cavalry of the Department of the Tennessee, and as such was attached to the staffs of Gen. Grant and Gen. William T. Sherman until, owing to impaired health, he resigned on September 30, 1864. Returning to his profession, he built the Wagooshance light-house at the western entrance of the Straits of Mackinaw, where in 1867 he sank the first pneumatic caisson. He aided in opening the harbor of Green Bay, Wis., and has been largely engaged in building bridges. He built the first great all-steel bridge in the world, across Missouri river at Georiga, Minn., and as director of the construction of the Omaha and the Leavenworth bridges, as well as many others, including that over Missouri river at Plattsburg, Neb. Gen. Smith has served on numerous engineering commissions, both for the government and for private corporations. He is a member of the American society of civil engineers, and was president of the Civil engineers' club of the northwest in 1880. His writings have been confined to reports and professional papers.

SMITH, William Stephens, soldier, b. in New York city in 1755; d. in Lebanon, N. Y., 10 June, 1816. He was graduated at Princeton in 1774, studied law, but entered the revolutionary army as aide to Gen. John Sullivan, was lieutenant-colonel of the 18th Massachusetts regiment from November, 1778, till March, 1779, and received several wounds while holding this command. He subsequently served for a short time on Gen. Lafayette's staff, and was aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington from 1781 till the close of the war. He married the only daughter of John Adams, and in 1783 accompanied him on his mission to England as secretary. He was appointed by Gen. Washington marshal of the district of New York in 1789, and afterward surveyor of the port of New York, for three years was a member of the assembly, and sat in congress in 1813-15. He became secretary of the New York state society of the Cincinnati in 1790, and its president in 1795.

SMITH, Worthington, educator, b. in Hadley, Mass., in 1793; d. in St. Albans, Vt., 13 Feb., 1856. He was graduated at Williams in 1816, studied at Andover theological seminary, and was licensed to preach in 1819. He was pastor of a Congregational church in St. Albans, Vt., from 1823 till 1849, and from 1849 till his death president of the University of Vermont, which gave him the degree of D. D. in 1845. He published "Sermon on Popular Instruction" (St. Albans, Vt., 1846), and "Inaugural Discourse" (1849). His "Select Sermons" were edited, with a memoir, by the Rev. Joseph Torrey (Andover, 1861).

SMITH, Zachariah Frederick, author, b. in Henry county, Ky., 7 Jan., 1827. He was partially educated at Bacon college, Ky., engaged in farming, and during the civil war was president of Henry college, Newcastle, Ky. He served four years as superintendent of public instruction for Kentucky, was the originator and for four years president of the Cumberland and Ohio railroad company, became interested in the construction of railroads in Texas, and was four years manager for a department of the publishing-house of D. Appleton and Co., of New York. He was a founder, and for twelve years president, of the Kentucky Christian education society. He has published a "History of Kentucky" (Louisville, Ky., 1886).

SMITH, Hrisari, Antonio, South American artist, b. in Santiago, Chili, in 1822; d. there, 24 May, 1877. He was educated in the National institute, and in 1849 entered the academy of painting in the University of Chili. He served as a conscript in 1853-7, but returned afterward to his art, and in 1858 was employed as a caricaturist on the "Correo Literario." In 1859 he went to Europe and studied in Florence under Charles Laver. On his return to Chili in 1866 he opened a studio, devoted himself to landscape-painting, and soon acquired fame as an artist, obtaining the grand premium in the national exposition of 1872. His principal pictures are "The Valley of Santiago," "A Moonlight Night," "A Waterfall," "Wood Scenery in the Mountains," "A Sunset in the Andes," "Surrounding of a Mountain Lake." He was first president of the Chili academy of arts.

SMITHSON, James, philanthropist, b. in France about 1765; d. in Genoa, Italy, 27 June, 1829. He was a natural son of Sir Hugh Smithson, the first Duke of Northumberland, and Mrs. Elizabeth Maice, heiress of the Hungerfords, of Studley, and niece to Charles, Duke of Somerset. For some time he bore the name James Lewis (or Louis) Maice, but after 1791 he changed it to James Smithson. He was graduated at Oxford in 1786, and had the reputation of excelling all other resident members of the university in the knowledge of chemistry. In 1787, as a gentleman well versed in various branches of natural philosophy and particularly in chemistry and mineralogy, he was recommended for election to the Royal society, of which body in later years he was a vice-president. His first paper, presented to the society in 1791, was "An Account of some Chemical Experiments on Tabasco," and was followed from that time until 1817 with eight other memoirs treating for the most part of chemical analyses of various substances, principally minerals. He lived chiefly abroad, engaged in extensive tours in various parts of Europe, making minute observations wherever he went on the climate, physical features, and geological structure of the locality visited, the characteristics of its minerals, the methods employed in mining or smelting ores, and in all kinds of manufactures. Desirous of bringing to the practical test of actual experiment everything that came to his notice, he fitted up and carried with him a portable laboratory. He collected also a cabinet of minerals, composed of thousands of minute specimens, including all the rarest gems, so that immediate comparison could be made of a novel or undetermined specimen with an accurately arranged and labelled collection. Among the minerals that he examined was a carbonate of zine that he discovered among some ores from Somersetshire and Derbyshire, England, that was named Smithsonite in his honor by the great French mineralogist, Boudant. From 1819 till his death his scientific memoirs were contributed to Thomson's "Annals of Philosophy." Besides his connection with the Royal society, he was long a member of the French institute. He died in Genoa, where he had been residing temporarily, and a monument was erected to his memory in the Protestant cemetery. His illegitimate birth seems to have induced a strong desire for posthumous fame, although his scientific reputation was of the best, and at one time he writes: "The best blood of England flows in my veins; on my father's side I am a Northumberland, on my mother's I am related to kings: but it avails me not. My name shall live in the memory of man when the titles of congress, but in August, 1846, the Smithsonian Institution was founded, and an act of congress was passed directing the formation of a library, a museum (for which it granted the collections belonging to the United States), and a gallery of art, while it left to the regents the power of adopting such other parts of an organization as they may deem best suited to promote the objects of the bequest. Joseph Henry was chosen its executive officer, and under his wise management the institution has developed until it has grown to be one of the most important scientific bodies in the world. A portion of the institution, of which the cornerstone was laid 1 May, 1847, is seen in the accompanying illustration. On 24 Jan., 1863, a part of it was destroyed by fire. See "The Scientific Writings of James Smithson" (Washington, 1879); "The Smithsonian Institution: Documents relative to its Origin and History," by William J. Rhee (1879); and "Smithson and his Bequest," by William J. Rhee (1890).

SMYBERT, or SMIBERT, John, artist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1684; d. in Boston, Mass., in 1751. He had had instruction in Edinburgh, and subsequently studied in Sir James Thornhill's academy in London. Then followed a three years' sojourn in Italy, where he was commissioned by the grand-duke of Tuscany to paint the portraits of some Siberian Tartars. After his return to London, Bishop Berkeley engaged him as professor of the fine arts in his projected college in Bermuda, and he accompanied Berkeley to this country, arriving at Newport in 1729. The Bermuda project proving a failure, Smybert went to Boston, where he established himself as a portrait-painter, and married in 1739, Gulian C. Verplanck of Albion, New York. He has recently issued, from the New York state museum of natural history, Bulletin No. 3, "On Building-Stones in New York," and the "Report on Clay Deposits" (1878). He has recently issued, from the New York state museum of natural history, Bulletin No. 3, "On Building-Stones in New York." (Albany, 1888).

SMIBERT, John, artist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1684; d. in Boston, Mass., in 1751. He had had instruction in Edinburgh, and subsequently studied in Sir James Thornhill's academy in London. Then followed a three years' sojourn in Italy, where he was commissioned by the grand-duke of Tuscany to paint the portraits of some Siberian Tartars. After his return to London, Bishop Berkeley engaged him as professor of the fine arts in his projected college in Bermuda, and he accompanied Berkeley to this country, arriving at Newport in 1729. The Bermuda project proving a failure, Smybert went to Boston, where he established himself as a portrait-painter, and married in 1739, Gulian C. Verplanck. Smybert was not an artist of the first rank, for the arts were then at a very low ebb in England, but the best portraits which we have of the eminent magistrates and divines of New England and New York who lived between 1729 and 1751 are from his pencil." His most important work is the painting of Bishop Berkeley and his family, executed in 1731, and presented to Yale college in 1808. Other portraits from his hand, including those of Jonathan Edwards, Judge Edmund Quincy, Gov. John Endicott, and Peter Faneuil, are in the possession of the Boston museum of fine arts, the Massachussets historical society, the New England historic-geological society, and Bowdoin college, and in various private collections. The Berkshire group is said to have been sketched at sea during the voyage from England, although the child in the arms of its mother must have been added later, as it was born in America. This was the first painting of more than a single figure that the artist attempted in the United States. In another of his "Anecdotes of Painting" (Strawberry Hill, 1762-71), calls Smybert "a silent and modest man, who abhorred the finesse of some of his profession, and was enchanted with a plan that he thought promised him tranquillity and an honest subsistence in a healthful elysian climate." Walpole and George Vertue spelled the name "Smy Bert." His works are said to have had much influence on Copley, Trumbull, and Allston. The last has spoken of the instruction he gained from a copy after Vandyke, by Smybert.

His son, Nathaniel, b. in Boston, 20 Jan., 1734; d. there, 8 Nov., 1756, showed great talent for portraiture. Judge Cranch, of Quincy, Mass., wrote of him: "Had his life been spared, he would probably have been in after years the first that has ever been the honor of America in imitative art." His portrait of John Lovell is owned by Harvard.

SMYTH, Alexander, lawyer, b. on the island of Rathlin, Ireland, in 1765; d. in Washington, D. C. 26 Apr., 1839. He came to this country in 1775, settled in Botetourt county, Va., and, after receiving an academic education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1792, and began practice in Abingdon, but removed to Wythe county in 1792. For many years he was a member of the Virginia house of representatives, and he was appointed by President Jefferson, on 8 July, 1808, colonel of a U. S. rifle regiment, which he commanded in the southwest until 1811, when he was ordered to Washington to prepare a system of discipline for the army. On 6 July, 1812, he was appointed inspector-general, and ordered to the Canadian frontier, where he failed in an invasion of Canada, was removed from the army, and resumed his profession. He was made a member of the Virginia board of public works, served in the house of representatives, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1819, and again, from 17 April, 1839. Gen. Smyth was the author of "Regulations for the Infantry" (Philadelphia, 1812) and "An Explanation of the Apocalypse, or Revelation of St. John." (Washington, 1825.)

SMYTH, Andrew Woods, physician, b. near Londonberry, Ireland, 15 Feb., 1833. He settled in New Orleans in 1849, was graduated at the medical department of the University of Louisi-ana in 1858, and was house-surgeon of the Charity hospital in New Orleans from 1858 till 1878. Here he performed, on 15 May, 1864, the first and only recorded operation of tying successfully the arteria innominate for subclavian aneurism. All previous attempts had failed, and his success was attributed to ligating, where secondary hemorrhage had occurred, the chief and principal efferent hemorrhage. Dr. Valentine Mott, who was the first to perform this operation in New York, in 1818, and who never doubted its ultimate success, said that Dr. Smyth's operation had afforded him more consolation than all others of a similar nature. He also made the first successful reduction of a dislocation of the femur, performed in eight months' duration, in 1866, and performed the operation of extirpation of the kidney in 1879, that almost unknown to the profession (nephrotomy), and in 1885 that of nephorrhaphy, attaching a floating kidney to the wound to retain the organ in place instead of extirpation. From 1862 till 1877 he was a member of the board of health of Louisiana, and in 1881-5 was superintendent of the U. S. mint in New Orleans, and now (1898) practices his profession in that city. Dr. Smyth has published a brochure on the "Circulation in the Arteries" (New Orleans, 1876; 2d 1877), and a paper on "The Structure and Function of the Kidney," giving original views on the anatomical and physiological construction and action of the Malpighian bodies, contending that a communica tion between the interior of the capsule of these bodies and the uriniferous tubules could not exist, and that excretion in the organ is carried on by systolic pressure and diastolic relaxation, which are correlative, and effected by constriction of the efferent artery of the glomerule.

SMYTH, Clement, R. C. bishop, b. in Fине, County Clare, Ireland, 24 Jan., 1810; d. in Dubuque, Iowa, 22 Sept., 1865. He received his early education in his native village and in a college in Limerick, and afterward was graduated at Trinity university, Dublin, in 1830. He was made a Trappist in the monastery of Mount Mellerary, Waterford. He established a college in connection with the monastery, which is still one of the chief educational institutions in Ireland. Having completed his ecclesiastical studies, he was ordained a priest in 1844. He was sent by his brethren at the head of a mission of Trappists and taught in the United States during the Irish famine, and also to select a suitable place for a Trappist monastery. He landed in New York in the spring of 1849, and travelled extensively through the country, finally reaching Dubuque. Here he was offered by Bishop Loras a grant of land in Dubuque county, Iowa, which he increased by purchase to more than 1,000 acres. By good management and the manual labor of himself and his companions, he brought this farm into a state of great productiveness, and then founded on it the monastery of New Melleray, of which he was elected prior. He built a church for the congregation that he had organized in the neighborhood, and established a free school, which was largely attended by children of other denominations. Having increased the number of his monks to forty-seven, and placed the different institutions he had founded on a basis of great prosperity, he set out for St. Paul in 1856. In the following year he was appointed coadjutor to Bishop Loras, of Dubuque, and he was consecrated on 3 May, with the title of Bishop of Thanasis in paroxysm. He succeeded to the bishopric in February, 1858. He at once essayed to finish the cathedral, which had been begun some time before, and soon had it ready for service. He visited every part of the diocese, and made successful efforts to furnish priests and churches for the congregations that were springing up in every part of Iowa. During his episcopate the number of churches increased from 50 to 84, with 867 priests and deacons, the number of priests from 37 to 63, and that of Roman Catholics from 45,000 to over 90,000. The Sisters of Charity largely increased the number of their institutions, and the Society of St. Vincent de Paul was established in every parish.

SMYTH, John Ferdinand D., British soldier, lived in the eighteenth century. He came to Vir ginia in America, and after travelling in the west and south, settled in Maryland, where he cultivated a farm for several years. During a visit to the sons of Col. Andrew Lewis in Virginia he joined the troops that were ordered out by Gov. Dunmore, and accompanied Maj. Thomas Lewis to the Kanawha, participating in the action against the Indians in which Maj. Lewis was killed. On his return he found Maryland agitated by the beginning of the Revolution. He supported the British government so earnestly that his house was surrounded by armed troops, which threatened his capture. Escaping twice, he fled to Virginia, hiding in the Dissal Swamp, passed the guards at Suffolk, and enlisted in the Queen's royal regiment in Norfolk. The officers were seized by a company of riflemen at Hagerstown and taken to Frederick, Md. Smyth escaped, and travelled across the Alleghenies, but was recaptured and imprisoned in Philadelphia, and after some time released. He then travelled with difficulty a British ship off Cape May, N. J., and visited New York and New England. Subsequently he published "A Tour in the United States of America" (2 vols., London and Dublin, 1781; in French, Paris, 1791). John Randolph of Roanoke said: "This book, although replete with falsehood and calumny, contains the truest picture of the state of society and manners in Virginia (such as it was a half a century ago) extant."

SMYTH, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Belfast, Ireland, 14 July, 1784; d. in Charleston, S. C., 20 Aug., 1873. He was educated in Belfast and London, and in 1830 came with his parents to New York. He entered Princeton theological seminary in the same year, was ordained in 1831, and from 1832 until his death was pastor of the Presbyterian church of Charleston, S. C. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1843. He collected a valuable theological library of about 12,000 volumes, and was the author of a large number of books, among which are "Lectures on the Prelatic Doctrine of Apostolic Succession" (Boston, 1830); "Confession of the Presbyterian Church" (1841); "Prefatory of the fiftieth anniversary of the Presbyterian Church" (Glasgow, 1844); "History, etc., of the Westminster Assembly" (New York, 1844); "Olvin and his Enemies" (Philadelphia, 1844); "Prelatical Rite of Confirmation Examined" (New York, 1845); "The Name, Nature, and Functions of Ruling Elders in the Church of Scotland" (Edinburgh, 1846); "The Unity of the Human Races proved to be the Doctrine of Scripture, Reason, and Science" (New York, 1850; Edinburgh, 1851); "Nature and Claims of Young Men's Christian Associations" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Faith the Principle of Missions" (1857); "Why Do I Live?" (1857); "Well in the Valley" (1857), and "Obedience, the Life of Missions" (1860).

SMYTH, Thomas Alfred, soldier, b. in Ireland; d. in Petersburg, Va., 9 April, 1863. In his youth he emigrated to this country, settling in Wilmington, Del., where he engaged in coach-making. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a company in Wilmington and joined a three months' regiment in Philadelphia, serving in the Shenandoah valley. On his return he was made major of a Delaware regiment, rose to the ranks of lieutenant-colonel and colonel, and commanded a brigade, winning a high reputation for bravery and skill. For gallant conduct at Cold Harbor, Va., he was appointed brigadier-general, U. S. volunteers, on 1 Oct., 1864. He was mortally wounded by a sharpshooter near Farmville, Va., on 6 April, 1865. He received a common-school education, afterward taught a school at Wissasset, and at the same time prepared himself for college. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1822, studied theology at Andover, and in 1825 was made adjunct professor of mathematics at Bowdoin, being appointed in 1828 to the full chair, which he held until his death. In 1845 he became adjunct professor of natural philosophy. He was the author of numerous valuable text-books, which had an extensive sale. These include: "Elements of Algebra" (Brunswick, Me., 1834); "Elementary Algebra for Schools" (1850); "Treatise on Algebra" (1852); "Trigonometry, Surveying, and Navigation" (1855); "Elements of Analytical Geometry" (1855); "Elements of the Differential and Integral Calculus" (1856; 2d ed., 1859); and "Lectures on Modern History," edited by Jared Sparks (Boston. 1849). SMYTH, Thomas Alfred, soldier, b. in Brunswick, Me., 21 Aug., 1829, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1848 and at Bangor theological seminary in 1853. He was professor of rhetoric at Bowdoin in 1854-'6, and of natural and revealed religion from 1856 till 1863, since which time he has been professor of ecclesiastical history at Andover theological seminary. Since 1878 he has been also president of the faculty. Bowdoin gave him the degree of D. D. in 1866, and Harvard the same in 1886. He has edited the "Andover Review" since its foundation in 1834, and, in addition to pamphlet sermons and a lecture on the "Value of the Study of Church History in Ministerial Education" (1874), has published, with Prof. William L. Ropes, a translation of Gerhard Uhlhorn's "Conflict of Christianity with the World." Another son, Samuel Phillips Newman, clergyman, b. in Brunswick, Me., 25 June, 1843, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1863, and began to study theology at Bangor. He then taught in the naval academy at Newport, R. I., entered the military service as 1st lieutenant of a Maine regiment, became acting quartermaster, and commanded his company in the advance on the New Madrid, Mo., Va. At the close of the war he resumed his theological studies, and after graduation at Andover in 1867 was pastor of a mission chapel in Providence, R. I. He was pastor of the 1st Congregational church in Bangor, Me., in 1870-3, and of the 1st Presbyterian church in Quincy, Ill., in 1873-'82. He has also pastored the 1st Congregational church in New Haven, Conn. The University of the city of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1881, and elected him professor of intellectual and moral philosophy, which chair he declined. He is the author of "The Religious Feeling: a Study for Faith" (New York, 1877); "Old Faiths in New Light" (1879); "The Orthodox Theology of To-Day" (1881); and a volume of sermons entitled "The Reality of Faith" (1884).

SMYTH, Sir James Carmichael, bart., British soldier, b. in London, 22 Feb., 1779; d. in Georgetown, Demerara, 4 March, 1838. His father, James Carmichael Smyth, was physician extraordinary to George III. The son entered the British army, served in Canada in 1825-26, and became a major-general in 1826. He was made a baronet in 1821, and was governor of British Guiana from June, 1833, till his death. He prepared for the private use of the Duke of Wellington "A Précis of the Wars in Canada from 1755 till the Treaty of Ghent in 1814" (London, 1826; 2d ed., 1829).

SNEAD, Thomas Lowndes, soldier, b. in Henrico county, Va., 10 May, 1823; d. in New York city, 17 Oct., 1890. He was graduated at Richmond and at the University of Virginia, was admitted to the bar, and removed to St. Louis, where he was editor and proprietor of the "Bulletin" in 1860-'1. He was aide-de-camp of Gov. Claiborne F. Jackson, and adjutant-general of the Missouri state guard may I return and be married?" Gen. Hull gave his consent, and the wedding took place on the same evening. At the surrender of Detroit he refused to raise the white flag. He was taken as a prisoner to Montreal, and while being marched through the streets was ordered by a British officer to take off his hat to Nelson's monument. This he refused to do in spite of the efforts of the soldiers to remove it, and finally Gen. Isaac Brock ordered them to "respect the scrubables of a brave man."

He was appointed colonel of the 5th infantry on 1 June, 1819, was ordered to Council Bluffs, Mo., and thence to the confluence of the Mississippi and the Minnesota. The location of the fort was moved to the present site of Fort Snelling, which he completed in 1824, after succeeding to the command. He gave it the name of Fort St. Anthony, which was changed by Gen. Winfield Scott in honor of its builder and commander. Maj. Snelling always carried the sword of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, which was presented to him. He was a witness against Gen. William Hull at the latter's trial, and wrote "Remarks on Gen. William Hull's Memoirs of the Campaign of the Northwestern Army, 1812." (Detroit, 1825.)—His son, William Joseph, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 Dec., 1804; d. in Chelsea, Mass., 24 Dec., 1848, was educated at the U. S. military academy, became a fur-trapper in Missouri, and subsequently was employed at the Galena lead-mines. About 1828 he became connected with several journals, and for a few years before his death he was editor of the Boston "Herald." He contributed to periodicals, and published "The Polar Regions of the Western Continent Explored" (Boston, 1831), and "Truth, a New-Year's Gift for Scribblers: A Satirical Poem" (1832). He wrote for William Apts, the Pequot Indian preacher a small book on "Indian Nullification" (1835).—Another son, Henry Hunt, editor, b. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 8 Nov., 1817, was taken by his father to Council Bluffs, Mo., in infancy, and in early life suffered many hardships. He was educated at a military academy in Georgetown, D. C., and in Detroit, after which he entered business, and for a time was librarian of the New York Athenæum. On account of his impaired health he removed to the country, and settling in Cornwall, N. Y., in 1871, published and edited until 1887 the "Reflector of Cornwall," which he relinquished owing to blindness. He devoted much time to photography, and edited "The Photographic Art Journal," in New York in 1851-3, and from 1854 till 1860 the "Photographer and Fine Art Journal." He is the author of "Photographic Theory and Practice of Photography" (New York, 1849), and has also published a "Dictionary of the Photographic Art" (1853).
SNIDER, Denton Jaques, author, b. in Mt. Gilead, Ohio, 9 Jan., 1841. After graduation at Oberlin in 1862, he engaged in teaching, and is now (1898) a lecturer on general literature. He is the author of "A System of Shakespeare's Dramas (8 vols., London, 1896); his "Voyage to Hellas" (Boston, 1898); "Argammon's Daughter" (1885); "Epigrammatic Voyage" (1886); "Commentary on Goethe's Faust" (1886); and "Commentary on Shakespeare's Tragedies" (1887).

SNODGRASS, William Davis, clergyman, b. in West Hanover, Pa., 30 June, 1796; d. in Goshen, N. Y., 28 May, 1883. He was the son of the Rev. Benjamin Snodgrass, who from 1784 until his death in 1846 was pastor of the Presbyterian church in West Hanover. After graduation at Washington college, Pa., in 1815, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1818, he held Presbyterian pastorates in the south till 1823, when he was called to New York city. From 1834 till 1844 he was pastor of a Presbyterian church in Troy, N. Y. In 1836 he published a work on the death of Rev. John M. Mason (New York, 1836); "Perfectionism, Lectures on Apostolic Succession" (1844); and several other discourses.

SNOW, Caleb Hopkins, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 April, 1796; d. there, 6 July, 1835. He was the son of Prince Snow, who for several years was deputy-sheriff of Suffolk county. After graduation at Brown in 1813 he was librarian there in 1814-18, received his medical degree from that university in 1821, and acquired a large practice in his native city. He was the author of a "History of Boston, with Some Account of its Environs" (Boston, 1825), and a "Geography of Boston and Adjacent Towns" (1830).

SNOW, Marshall Solomon, educator, b. in Hyannis, Mass., 17 Aug., 1842. He was graduated at Harvard in 1865, in 1865-6 was sub-master of high-schools in Worcester, Mass., in 1866-7 principal of a high-school in Nashville, Tenn., in 1867-8 professor of mathematics in the University of Nashville, after which he taught Latin and principal of Montgomery bell academy in that university, in 1870-4 professor of belles-lettres in Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., and since 1874 has occupied the chair of history in that institution. He was appointed registrar in 1871, dean of the faculty in 1877, and since January, 1887, has been acting chancellor of the university. Besides articles upon historical subjects, he has published an excellent monograph upon the "City Government of St. Louis" in the 5th series of "Johns Hopkins University Studies" (Baltimore, 1887).

SNOW, William Dunham, lawyer, b. in Webster, Worcester co., Mass., 2 Feb., 1832. He settled in Rochester, N. Y., where he published "The Tribune" in 1832-4. Afterward he removed to Baltimore, Md., where he was editor of the "New Era" from 1843 that made Arkansas a free state, and was elected U. S. senator in 1864 under the proclamation of President Johnson, but was not admitted to a seat. He was largely instrumental in raising a brigade of Arkansas troops for the Union army in 1865, and declined the commission of brigadier-general. Since his graduation at Columbia he has had a successful lawyer's practice in New York city and in the Federal courts. He has invented a successful carburetter, a gas-regulator, a thermostatic apparatus for the maintenance of equal heat for furnaces and steam apparatus, and a system for facsimile telegraphy. Mr. Snow is the author of several anti-slavery poems, and has composed several songs.

SNOW, William Parker, English explorer, b. in Poole, 27 Nov., 1817; d. 12 March, 1895. Capt. Snow endeavored to enlist interest in behalf of an expedition to search for the companions of Sir John Franklin. He had published "Voyage of the Prince Albert" in search of Sir John Franklin, a Narrative of Every-Day Life in the Arctic regions" (London, 1851); "A Two-Years' Cruise off Tierra del Fuego, the Falkland Islands, and the Seaboard of Patagonia" (2 vols., 1857); "Catalogue of the Arctic Collection in the British Museum" (1858); "The Patagonian Missionary Society" (1858); "British Columbia Emigration," etc. (1858); and "Southern Generals" (New York, 1866).

SNOW, William S., numismatist, b. in Old Chester, Pa., 9 Dec., 1809; d. in Hillsville, Bucks co., Pa., 21 March, 1878. His great-grandfather, Nathanael Fitz Randolph, served in the Revolutionary war, being known as "Fighting Nat," and was presented with a sword by the legislature of New Jersey. He also started the first subscription paper for Princeton college, and gave the ground upon which Nassau hall, the first edifice of that college, was built. This received its name in honor of William H., of the illustrious house of Nassau. It has been twice burned down. His father, Rev. Nathanael Randolph Snowden, was curator of Dickinson college from 1791 till 1827, where the son was educated. Subsequently he studied law, and, settling in Franklin, Pa., was made deputy attorney-general, elected to the legislature, and served as speaker in 1842-4. He was state treasurer from 1845 till 1847, treasurer of the U. S. mint from 1847 till 1850, and its director from 1853 till 1861. In addition to numerous articles on numismatics and currency, seven annual mint reports, and contributions to journals, he published "Descriptions of Coin in the U. S. Mint" (Philadelphia, 1860); "Description of the Medals of Washington, of National and Miscellaneous Medals, and of other Objects of Interest in the Museum of the Mint, with Biographical Notices of the Directors, from 1792 to 1857" (1861); "The Mint at Philadelphia" (1861); "The Coins of the Bible, and its Money Terms" (1864); and "The Comptroller Monument" (Harrisburg, 1867); and contributed articles on the coin of the United States to the National almanac of 1853, and articles on numismatics to Bonnier's "Law Dictionary" (12th ed., Philadelphia, 1868).

His nephew, Archibald Loudon, b. in Cumberland county, Pa., 11 Aug., 1837, after graduation at Jefferson college in 1856 was made register of the U. S. mint on 7 May, 1857, became chief coiner on 1 Oct., 1866, and in 1877-9 was postmaster of Philadelphia. In 1879-85 he was superintendent of the mint, and in 1878 he declined the office of general director of all the mints in the United States. He has made inventions relating to coinage machinery, and has written articles on subjects relating to coinage, the great seal of the United States, and other subjects. Mr. Snowden was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of Pennsylvania volunteers in 1861, and was subsequently elected captain of the 1st city troop of Philadelphia, which is the oldest military organization in the United States. He served in Washington during the Revolution, and bore a conspicuous part in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, and the Brandywine. He has been identified with railroads, insurance companies, and other business interests.

Snyder, Christopher, called "the first martyr of the Revolution," b. about 1735; d. in Boston, Mass., 23 Feb., 1770. During the excitement in 1774-6, the fourth period of non-importation a few merchants continued to sell articles that had been proscribed, and one, Theophilus Lillie, incurred such displeasure that, in order to mark his shop as one to be shunned, a mob, consisting chiefly of half-grown boys, erected near his door a wooden head on a tall pole, upon which were written the names of the other importers, and a hand pointing to Lillie's shop was also attached. One of his friends, Ebenezer Richardson, attempted to remove this figure, but was pelted and driven into Lillie's house by the mob. Greatly exasperated, he appeared with a musket and fired a random shot into the crowd, which mortally wounded a young lad, Christopher Snyder, the son of a poor widow. Snyder died on that evening, and his body was buried with all the solemnity of the day and burial practices in the country. His funeral, on the 26th, was the occasion of a solemn pageant. A procession of 500 children walked before the bier, and the coffin was taken to Liberty tree, where an assemblage of nearly 1,500 persons had gathered. The bells of the city and of neighboring towns were tolled. The newspapers were filled with accounts of the story of the funeral and Christopher Snyder was called the first martyr in the cause of American liberty. The mob seized Richardson and an associate named Wilmot and took them to Faneuil hall, where they were examined and committed for trial. Richardson was declared guilty of murder, but Lieut.-Gov. Thomas Hutchinson refused to sign his death-warrant, and after two years' imprisonment he was pardoned by the king.

Snyder, Samuel, Governor of Pennsylvania, b. at Langhorne, Pa., 5 Nov., 1739; d. near Selingsgrove, Pa., 9 Nov., 1819. His father, Anthony, a mechanic, emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1758. After his death in 1774 the son apprenticed himself to a tanner in York, Pa., and employed his leisure in study. In 1784 he removed to Selingsgrove, opened a store, became the owner of a mill, and was justice of the peace for seven years. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1790, and in 1797 was elected a member of the house of representatives, of which he was chosen speaker in 1802, serving in this capacity for six successive terms. With him originated the "hundred-dollar act," which embodied the arbitration principle and provided for the trial of causes where the amount in question was less than one hundred dollars. In 1808 he was made governor of Pennsylvania and served three terms. Upon his retirement in 1817 he was elected to the state senate, and died while a member of that body. Snyder county, Pa., was named for him.

Soissons, Charles de Bourbon, Count de, viceroy of New France, b. in France in 1565; d. there, 1 Nov., 1613. The death of Henry IV. extinguished Champlain's chances of successfully colonizing New France, and, by the advice of De Monts, he sought a protector in the person of the Count de Soissons, who accepted the proposal to become the "father of New France," obtained from the queen regent the authority necessary to preserve and advance all that had been already done, and appointed Champlain his lieutenant with unlimited powers. The book, which he caused to be sent to Champlain, he styles himself "lieutenant-general of New France," but he died soon after issuing it.

Sojourner Truth, lecturer, b. in Ulster county, N. Y., about 1775; d. at Battle Creek, Mich., 20 Nov., 1883. Her parents were owned by Col. Charles Ardinburgh, of Ulster county, and she was sold at the age of ten to John J. Dumont, a Quaker, by the act of New York which set at liberty in 1817 all slaves over the age of forty, she does not appear to have obtained her freedom until 1827, when she escaped and went to New York city. Subsequently she lived in Northampton, Mass., and in 1831 began to lecture in western New York, accompanied by George Thompson, of England, and other abolitionists, making her headquarters in Rochester, N. Y. Subsequently she travelled in various parts of the United States, lecturing on politics, temperance, and women's rights, and for the welfare of her race. She could neither read nor write, but, being nearly six feet in height and possessing a deep and powerful voice, she proved an effective lecturer. She carried with her the "Book of Life," containing the autographs of many distinguished persons that were identified with the anti-slavery movement. Her name was Isabella, but she called herself "Sojourner," claiming to have heard this name whispered to her from the Lord. She added the application of Truth to signify that she should preach nothing but truth to all men. She spent much time in Washington, D. C., during the civil war, and passed her last years in Battle Creek, Mich., where a small monument was erected near her grave, by subscription. See "Narrative of Sojourner Truth," drawn from her "Book of Life," with Memorial Chapter," by Mrs. Francis W. Titus (Battle Creek, 1884).
SOLANA, Alonso de (so-lah'-nah), Spanish missionary, b. in Solana, Toledo, about 1539; d. in Merida, Yucatan, in 1600. He studied in Salamanca, and was graduated in law, but resolved to enter the church, and united with the Franciscans in Toledo. Afterward he retired to the convent of Sevilete, but in 1560 he came with Diego Landa (q. v.), whom he accompanied in the conversion of the Mayan Indians. He was much loved by the natives, and several times refused dignities that were offered him to remain with his flock. He wrote "Dicionario Maya y Español," "Sermone en Lengua Maya," and "Noticias sagradas y profanas de las Antiguiedades y Conversión de los Indios de Yucatan," the manuscript of which was found in the Franciscan convent of Merida, but have been lost.

SOLANO, Juan, Peruvian R. C. bishop, b. in Spain about 1504; d. in Rome, Italy, in 1580. He became a member of the Dominican order and entered the convent of Salamanca. He was nominated for the bishopric of Cuzco, Peru, by Charles V. in 1545, and consecrated in February, 1544, but found it impossible to enter Cuzco after his arrival, as Gonzalo Pizarro, who had just revolted, held that city. Solano joined the royal army, and was present at the defeat of Huaranas, 29 Oct., 1547, where he escaped only by the swiftness of his horse. After this defeat Solano joined Pedro de la Gasca (q. v.), accompanied him in his march against the Inca, and was present at the battle of Sacsahuamana, 9 April, 1548, in which the insurgents were defeated. He was now enabled to exercise pastoral functions in Cuzco, and showed much zeal in defending the rights of the Indians, as well as in converting them to Christianity. As the number of sick and poor among them had largely increased in consequence of the civil war, he insisted upon the ground was expended at the battle of Sacsahuamana, 9 April, 1548, in which the insurgents were defeated. He was now enabled to exercise pastoral functions in Cuzco, and showed much zeal in defending the rights of the Indians, as well as in converting them to Christianity. As the number of sick and poor among them had largely increased in consequence of the civil war, he insisted upon the need of exerting himself to relieve the prevailing distress. With the money that he thus obtained he built a hospital in 1552, the first of the kind in Peru. He then endeavored to recall to habits of order the old Spanish veterans, whose excesses and turbulence interfered with his plans for the benefit of the Indians. Not succeeding in his effort he determined to obtain the aid of the sovereign in reducing these adventurers to obedience. He also wished to obtain a division of his diocese, which he considered too large for the care of a single bishop. After arriving in Spain he laid the reasons for his journey before the court and the council of the Indies, but met with no success. He then went to Rome with the object of obtaining Pope Pius IV. in the matter. There he was received in chief of the order of Gen. Portales, which was published in 1837 in "El Araucano." Soon her poems were widely known, and she and Salvador Sanfuentes (q. v.) may be called the first Chilian poets after the establishment of independence. She contributed seven poems to the papers, of which the best are "Plegaria" and "Al pie de la Cruz," and published "Canto Fúmebre a la muerte del General Portales" (Santiago, 1837); a biography of her father (1845); and "Canto a la Patria" (1857). A collection of her poems was published in a volume (Santiago, 1874). See her "Líricas," by M. L. Amunátegui (1867).

Her children, Amelia de Clarío and Enrique inherited her poetic talent. The latter, b. in Santiago in 1844, studied in the Jesuit college, and in 1870 was elected to congress for the departments of Ramuca and Curico. He has published poems in "El Independiente," "Estrella de Chile," "Revista de San Sebastian," "Posesión Orígenes" (Santiago, 1867), and "Leyendas y Tradiciones" (1868).

SOLCHAHA, Miguel (sole-chah'-gah), Mexican dergymen, b. in Queretaro in 1674; d. in Durango in 1718. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1689, and, after finishing his studies, was sent as professor of theology to the College of Durango. When he died, while in charge of his charge in 1715, to subdue the Indians of the Navarit mission, the government of New Biscay and New Galicia, Bishop Tapiz appointed Solchaga spiritual director of the expedition, and as such the latter brought it about that the cacique Tonatihu, of Navarit, went in 1718 to Mexico to make a treaty with the viceroy. But on account of sickness Solchaga returned in the same year to Durango, where death overtook him before he could publish his description of the expedition. It was afterward printed in Spain under the title "Carta Relación de la entrada de la Expedición Española en el Nayarit." (Barcelona, 1754).

SOLEY, James Russell, author, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 1 Oct., 1890. He was graduated at Harvard in 1870, became assistant professor of English in the U. S. navy, and in 1878 he was on special duty at the Paris exposition. He also examined the systems of education in European naval colleges, and on his return made an extensive report. In 1892 he was transferred to Richmond, where he collected and arranged the navy department library, and since 1883 he has superintended the publication of the naval records of the civil war. He has been lecturer on international law at the Naval war college at Newport since 1885, and has also delivered courses before the Lowell institute, Boston, on "American Naval History" (1885) and "European Naval History" (1887) and "European Naval History" (1888). Prof. Soley has published "History of the Naval Academy" (Washington, 1876); "Foreign Systems of Naval Education," the report mentioned above (1880); "The Blockade and the Cruisers" (New York, 1883); "The Rescue of Greely," with Com. Winfield S. Schley (1885); and "The Boys of 1812" (Boston, 1887). He has edited the "Autobiography of Commodore Morris" (Annapolis, 1880), and contributed to the "Battles and Leaders of the Civil War," and to Justin Winsor's "Narrative and Critical History of America."
SOLORZANO Y PEREIRA, Juan de (so-jor-thahl-no), Spanish author, b. in Madrid, 30 Nov., 1575; d. there in 1654. He studied in the University of Salamanca, and was a pupil of Roman and common law in the same university. In 1609 he was appointed by Philip III. judge of the audience of Lima, where he organized the tribunals, introduced improvements in the administration, and promoted the working of the mercury mines of Huancavelica. In 1627 he returned to Spain, and was successively member of the treasury board, of the council of the Indies, and of the supreme council of Castile. He wrote several valuable juridical works, of which the principal one is De Indiarum jure disputatwn (Madrid, 1633).

SOMERBY, Horatio Gates, genealogist, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 24 Dec., 1805; d. in London, England, 14 Nov., 1872. His ancestor, Anthony, came from England to Newbury, Mass., in 1639. He received a public-school education in his native town, studied art in Boston, and had studio in Troy, N. Y., for several years, but in 1832 returned to Boston, where he was a fancy painter and japanner. After 1845 he resided chiefly in London as a professional genealogist, and was the first American to devote himself exclusively to such work. He became very skilful, and many families in this country availed themselves of his services in tracing their English ancestry. Mr. Somerby was on confidential terms with George Peabody, and became secretary to the board of trustees of the Peabody fund. He was a member of the New England historic-genealogical society, to whose publications he contributed valuable papers, and a large quantity of his unpublished material is in the possession of that distinguished society, with which he had been connected since 1839. He was the originator of systematic research for the purpose of connecting New England families with their ancestors in Great Britain. — His brother, Frederic Thomas, author, b. in Newburyport, 4 Jan., 1814; d. in Worcester, Mass., 18 Jan., 1871, was educated in his native place, and became an ornamental painter. He was for many years a correspondent of the Boston "Post," and the "Spirit of the Times," and published, under the name of "Cynon," "Hits and Dashes," or a Medley of Sketches and Scraps touching People and Things" (Boston, 1852).

SOMERS, Richard, naval officer, b. on Somers point, Great Egg harbor, N. J., in 1778; d. near Tripoli, Africa, 4 Sept., 1804. His grandfather emigrated from England about 1730 and settled at Somers point, and his father was colonel of militia, judge of the county court, and an active Whig in the Revolution. The son entered the navy as midshipman, 30 April, 1798, after some experience at sea in small coasting vessels. He sailed from Philadelphia in the frigate "United States," on her second cruise to Cadiz, and thence to the coast of Africa and the West Indies in search of French cruisers during that brief war with France. He was commissioned lieutenant, 21 May, 1799, sailed in the "United States" with the embassy to France on 3 Nov., 1799, and in 1801 again went to France as 1st lieutenant of the sloop "Boston," with Chancellor Livingston on board as passenger. He was appointed to command the schooner "Nautilus," fitted out to form a part of Preble's squadron in the war with Tripoli, and he was the first to receive at Cadiz the intelligence of the outbreak and capture of a French frigate and a handsome prize. He acted in the attack on Tripoli in 1803. In the first attack he commanded a division of gun-boats, and at one time fought five Tripolitan vessels at close quarters. On 7 Aug., 1804, he led the 1st division of three gun-boats in the second attack, and successfully fought superior forces for three hours. He was promoted commander, 16 Feb., 1804, and was sent with Preble for duty in the attacks on 28 Aug., and 3 Sept., 1804. As he was a seaman and not a commissioned officer, he could not be given command or promotion to a commissioned officer, which he had long desired and was denied. After the attack on Tripoli, he served in the coasting ships, Blockade vessels, and others; but was never again to hold any position of great responsibility.

SOMERVILLE, Alexander, Canadian journalist, b. in Springfield, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, 15 March, 1794; d. in York township, Upper Canada, 1858. He was educated in the parish school, enter the army, and served for several years in the Scots greys. He was with his regiment at Birmingham, England, in 1832, at the time of the first reform-bill agitation, and for some act of supposed insubordination was sentenced to receive 200 lashes on the bare back, half of which were inflicted. The whole matter, which has been described by him in his "Diligent Life" (Montreal, 1859), was made the subject of discussion in parliament at the time, and resulted in mitigating the injustice and severity of military discipline. During 1833-7 Mr. Somerville served in a Highland regiment in Spain, and soon afterward he left the service. From 1838 till 1858 he wrote for several of the chief British newspapers, under the pen-name of "Whistler at the Plough," his graphic descriptive sketches attracting attention. In 1858 he came to Canada, and from that time till his death was engaged in journalism. He edited the "Canadian Illustrated News," and among other works wrote "Autobiography of a Workman" (London, 1849); "The Canadian Ploughman" (Liverpool, 1850); "Whistler at the Plough" (Manchester, 1853); "The Conservative Science of Nations" (Montreal, 1860); and "A Narrative of the Fenian Invasion of 1866" (Toronto, 1867).
SOMERVILLE, William Clarke, author, b. in St. Mary's county, Md., 23 March, 1790; d. in Auvergne, France, 5 Jan., 1826. In early life he took part in the struggle of the South American states for independence, attaining the rank of major, and receiving a grant of three square leagues of land from the Venezuelan government for his services. He travelled in Europe in 1817-18, and on his return to his country took an active part in politics as a Whig and a personal friend of John Quincy Adams. He purchased Stratford House, the former seat of Gen. Henry Lee (see Lee, Richard), and lived with great elegance. Mr. Somerville was appointed minister to Sweden by John Quincy Adams, and sailed on the ship that carried Lafayette to Europe after his visit to this country, but he died shortly afterward, and, in accordance with his own wishes, was buried at La Grange, Lafayette's residence. He provided in his will for the ultimate emancipation of all his slaves, Mr. Somerville possessed varied accomplishments, and was striking in personal appearance. At the time of his death he was engaged to be married to Corsa, daughter of Edward Livingston. He was the author of 'The Influence of French Cobweb Fiction and Consequences of the French Revolution' (Baltimore, 1823); "Extracts of a Letter on the Mode of choosing the President" (1825); and several poetical pieces.

SOMERS, Charles George, clergyman, b. in London, England, 4 March, 1789: d. in New York city, 10 Dec., 1808. His father was a Norwegian, and the rest of the son's life was spent in Denmark, where, after attending school, he entered a mercantile house at Elsinore. He came to this country in 1806, and in 1811 entered the employ of John Jacob Astor, for whom he went to Canada on a difficult mission during the war of 1812, but he abandoned business soon afterward for the Baptist ministry. After a six years' pastorate in Troy, N.Y., he was called to the charge of the South Baptist church in New York city, where he remained till his retirement in 1856. He was an active worker in connection with the tract and Bible societies, and a founder of the American Baptist home mission society. In 1852 he received the degree of D. D. from Madison university, Dr. Somers was the author of numerous contributions to the defence of Baptist doctrines, edited a volume of "Psalms and Hymns" (Philadelphia, 1833) and "The Baptist Library" (3 vols., Prattsville, N. Y., 1843), and was the author of a "Memoir of John Stanford, D. D., with Selections from his Correspondence" (New York, 1853).

SONNINI DE MANOUCOURT, Charles Nicolas Sigisbert, French traveller, b. in Luneville, France, 1 Feb., 1751: d. in Paris, France, 9 May, 1812. Although, from deference to his father's wishes, he studied law, his fondness for natural history and his passion for travel led him to enter the navy in 1774, shortly after he had been called to the bar at Nancy. He went to Cayenne in 1775, and soon acquired a reputation for his daring journeys into the interior. The government employed him several times in expeditions that were of the greatest advantage to the colony. In 1774 he traversed Guiana in its entire breadth as far as Peru. In another expedition he discovered, after wandering through immense marshes, a water route through which he reached the Gabrielle mountain. He made a valuable collection of rare birds, which he presented to the Paris cabinet of natural history. An attack of fever obliged him to return to France, and he selected Montbard as his residence, near the home of Buffon, by whose direction he described twenty-six species of American birds, comprising those belonging to the gallicorous order, and the water-fowl. He afterward served in the French navy, travelled extensively in Asia and Africa, and wrote numerous books of travel and agriculture and natural history, among others "Histoire naturelle des reptiles" (4 vols., Paris, 1892-96), and "Histoire naturelle des poissons et des cétacés" (14 vols., 1894). Sonnini, "Édouard Thibaud de Bernand" (1812).

SONNITAG, George, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1789; d. in Odessa, Russia, 23 March, 1841. His father, William Louis Sonntag, a French officer, came to this country during the Revolution, and at its close established a mercantile house in Philadelphia. The son went to Russia in 1815, entered the military service, and with the allied army entered Paris. He became a general in the Russian army and an admiral in the navy.

SONNITAG, William Louis, painter, b. near Pittsburg, Pa., 2 March, 1822: d. in New York city, 22 Jan., 1900. He began in Cincinnati to study art as a profession in 1848. Six years later he settled in New York where he resided and practised until 1861, when he was abroad, spending most of the time in Italy. He has devoted himself to the delineation of American landscape, strongly idealized. His principal works are "View on Licking River, Ky." (1846); four pictures on the "Progress of Civilization," illustrating William Cullen Bryant's poem (1848); "Spirit of Solitude" (1851); "Ingres" (1852); "A Dream of Italy" (1859); "A Morning in the Alleghanies" (1855); "Sunset in the Wilderness"; "Spirit of the Alleghanies"; and "Fog rising off Mount Adams" (about 1855). He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1860, and an academician the following year, and is also a member of the Water-color society and the Architectural society.

SONTAG, Henriette, German singer, b. in Coblenz, 13 May, 1805: d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, 18 June, 1854. Her parents belonged to the theatrical profession, and carefully cultivated her vocal and dramatic powers, which were naturally great. Before she was six years old she sang on the stage in children's parts at Danzig, Berlin, and Prague, and during her studies was engaged in art-dealing work at Prague, where, in her fifteenth year, with marked success, she took the leading part in Boieldieu's "Joan of Paris." She then went to Vienna, and before she was nineteen she was prima donna of the Berlin stage. Shortly afterward she left for Paris, where she competed successfully with Malibran, Pasta, and Catalani. In 1829 she made her debut in London, but at the close of the season she married Count Rossi, a Piedmontese nobleman, and after a triumphant operatic career in the great capitals of Europe retired to private life. She still retained her great love of art for its own sake, and continued to study while mingling in the highest circles of society. In 1848 her husband became involved in political troubles, and lost his fortune. For his sake and for his family, she soon resolved to resort again to her art, and accepted an engagement at London for the season of 1849. In 1853, encouraged by the successful career of Jenny Lind, she decided to visit the United States, and in the autumn of that year arrived in New York. Her tour through the chief cities of the Union was brilliant, remunerative, and exceeded her expectations. In 1854 she accepted an engagement from the manager of the principal theatre of Mexico, at Vera Cruz; but she was suddenly stricken down by cholera while preparing for her first appearance.
SOTHDONAX. Léger Félicité, French commissioner, b. in Oyonnax, Ain, 17 March, 1763; d. there, 28 July, 1813. He practised law at Bourg, and going to Paris at the beginning of the French revolution, became a member of the noted club, "1838". Among his first and best pamphlets in advocacy of the enfranchisement of the slaves in the French dominions, the negroes having rebelled in Santo Domingo, Sonthonax, Étienne Polverel, and Jean Ailhaud were appointed high commissioners to the Leeward islands. They sailed from La Rochelle in July, 1791, with an army of 6,000 men, and landed at Cape Français on 19 Sept. Ailhaud soon returned to France, and Sonthonax and Polverel, after a brilliant campaign, divided the colony into two governments. Gen. Galbaud arrived from France in June, 1793, to assume the command of the French forces, but was opposed by Sonthonax and removed from office. Galbaud then attacked Cape Français, and, securing possession of the arsenal, compelled Sonthonax to take refuge in the interior. But the latter made his junction with Polverel, and, returning, issued his famous decree of 29 Aug., 1793, which enfranchised the slaves forever. Through the help of the negroes Galbaud was finally defeated, and sailed for the United States. Sonthonax's opposition to the whites continued meanwhile, and they asked succor from the authorities at Jamesport. A French expedition landed at Male-de-Saint Nicholas, and soon occupied the principal parts of the colony; Sonthonax retired to Jacmel, and sailed in 1794 for France, where he had been indicted for his conduct. But he easily justified himself before the convention, and was again appointed in 1796 high commissioner to Santo Domingo. After removing Gen. Rochambau he was compelled to appoint Thos. S. Top, commander-in-chief, and finally left the island in July, 1797, having been elected a deputy to the assembly of the five hundred by the colony. He was exiled after the coup d'état of 1799, and again in 1803 for having criticised the appointment of Gen. Rochambeau as commander-in-chief in Santo Domingo. Napoleon forbade him to remain in Paris after 1815, and Sonthonax settled in Thessaly.

SOPHOCLES, Evangelimn Apostoloides, scholar, b. in Tsangaruda, near Mount Pelion, Thessaly, Greece, 8 March, 1807; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 17 Dec., 1883. He resided in Egypt during the Greek revolution, studied in the convent of the Greek church on Mount Sinai, and in 1829 came to this country under the patronage of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. After studying in Monson, Mass., he entered Amherst, but did not complete his course. He then taught in schools in Amherst, Hartford, and New Haven, and in 1840-5 and 1847-9 was tutor in Harvard. In the last year he became assistant professor, and in 1860 he was given the chair of ancient, modern, and Byzantine Greek, which he retained till his death. He removed to N. M. from Yale in 1837 and from Harvard in 1847, and that of L.L.D. from Western Reserve in 1862 and from Harvard in 1868. He made two voyages to his native country, returning each time with valuable books. Prof. Sophocles published "Greek Grammar for the Use of Learners" (Hartford, Conn., 1838); "Greek Grammar for the Use of Schools and Colleges" (1847); "First Lessons in Greek" (1839); "Greek Exercises" (1841); "Romaic Grammar" (1842; 2d ed., Boston, 1857; London, 1866); "Greek Lessons for Beginners" (Hartford, 1843); "Catalogue of Greek Verbs" (1844); "History of the Greek Alphabet, with Remarks on Greek Orthography and Pronunciation" (Cambridge, 1848); "Glossary of Later and Byzantine Greek" (Boston, 1869, forming vol. vii., new series, of "Memoirs of the American Academy"); and "Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Period," his chief work (Boston, 1870).

SORIN, Edward, clergyman, b. near Paris, France, 6 Feb., 1814; d. in Notre Dame, Ind., 31 Oct., 1893. He was graduated at the University of Paris, afterward studied for the priesthood, and was ordained, 9 June, 1838. At the end of a year he felt a desire to become a missionary among the Indians of America, and, with the view of preparing himself for this work, he entered the newly founded order of the Holy Cross. He was shortly afterward appointed bishop of Bengal, but declined. He sailed from Havre, 5 Aug., 1841, reached New York on 14 Sept., and at once set out for Indiana. There he began his labors among the Indians. He was forced to abandon this field by the superior of his order, who directed him to establish schools wherever an opportunity occurred. He arrived at the present site of Notre Dame on 24 Nov., 1842, with only five dollars to begin the work of erecting a school. The waste was covered with snow, and the only building for miles around was a dilapidated log-hut. He began with energy, and spent five days in repairing the log-cabin and in fitting it up so that one half served as a chapel and the other as a dwelling for himself and six catechumens. He then began to build a college, which was chartered as a university in 1844 by the legislature of Indiana. From that day the University of Notre Dame progressed under his guidance until it is to-day the largest and most important Roman Catholic educational establishment in the United States. In 1857 he was appointed provincial superior of the houses of the order of the Holy Cross in the United States, and in 1868 he was elected superior-general for life. He crossed the Atlantic forty-three times, and it has been computed that his journeys and voyages together would more than equal eight times the circumference of the earth. Besides the University of Notre Dame, he established flourishing colleges and schools in every part of the United States and Canada. He was likewise the founder and superior-general of the Sisters of the Holy Cross in the United States, of whom there are more than eight hundred, chiefly engaged in conducting academies and schools.

SOTHERAN, Charles, bibliographer, b. in Stoke Newington, Surrey, England, 8 July, 1847. He was educated at private schools, and in 1862 was apprenticed to a bookseller at Rugby by his uncle, Henry Sotheran, the London publisher. After making a reputation as a bibliographer and antiquary, he came to this country in 1874, and became editor and proprietor of the New York "Echo" in 1878, and literary editor of the "Star" in 1879. He has
Taylor's comedy "Our American Cousin," at Laura Keene's theatre, New York, where he had been playing for some time. The part consisted of only a few lines, and Sothern assumed it under protest, but made such a hit in it that it was enlarged, and became the great attraction of the play, which ran for one hundred and forty consecutive nights. It is said that he filled his box with gold, which was one of the most amusing of Sothern's absurdities of manner in this part was at first accidental, and was caused by the actor's stumbling over some "properties" as he made his first entrance on the stage. This skip, with a peculiar lip and drawl, never failed to win the applause of his audiences. Dundreary's part became virtually a series of monologues, which were interspersed in various parts of the original play. On Nov. 11, 1861, he appeared in the part at the Haymarket theatre, London, where the play ran four hundred and ninety-six consecutive nights. He afterward acted in it continually till his death, always with success, except in Paris in 1897, where he was not well received. Besides playing this part, the details of which he constantly changed, Sothern was successful as David Garrick in Robertson's comedy of that name, and in many pieces that were written for him by English playwrights. Though he was very popular in England, where he remained till 1871, he preferred the American stage. He also played in his native country in 1874-5. His last appearance in the United States was at New York on 27 Dec. 1879. Sothern's acting was marked by perfect refinement, even in the most farcical touches of his "Dundreary." He wrote well, though slowly, and but little. The part of Dundreary was almost entirely his own, and he composed the best part of the love scenes in Robertson's comedy of "Home." He was also part author of "Trade," a comedy, which has not yet been acted. The illustration represents him in the character of Dundreary.

SOTO, Bernardo, president of Costa Rica, b. in San José, Costa Rica, in 1853. From his youth he served in the army, and had attained the rank of major, when, on April 22, 1871, he was elected president. He was re-elected in 1882. The new president, Prospero Fernandez, called him to his cabinet as secretary of the treasury, and he also had temporary charge of the portfolio of war. In February, 1884, Soto's proposition for the adoption of radical measures of economy caused a cabinet crisis, and the secretaries of war and the interior, Miguel and Victor Guardia, resigned. The president, with the sanction of Congress, assembly, resolved to reduce the cabinet to two secretaries, and Soto was charged with the portfolios of the interior, commerce, and agriculture, being at the same time elected first vice-president, and promoted brigadier. When Gen. Rufino Barrios issued his decree of 28 Feb., 1883, declaring the forcible union of the five Central American republics, Costa Rica and Guatemala, and demanding the latter declared war upon Guatemala on 10 March. On the next day President Fernandez died suddenly, and Soto, who was preparing the army to march against Barrios, was called to the executive. Leaving the second vice-president in charge, he marched with his contingent to Nicaragua, and, together with the army of that country, invaded Honduras, the ally of Barrios. There he heard of the death of Barrios at Chalchuma and the collapse of the scheme of unification, and returned with his little army to Costa Rica. On the expiration of Fernandez's term, 10 Aug., 1886, Soto was re-elected as constitutional president for the term of four years. During his administration great improvements have been introduced, the finances have been put on a sound basis, and Costa Rica, which had always opposed Central American union, as it was formerly advanced to favor an ambitions leader, has taken the initiative. Delegates of the five republics assembled in Guatemala and concluded, 15 Aug., 1887, a treaty of mutual union with a proviso for the possible establishment of a joint American continental navy. Also, in July, 1887, a treaty with Nicaragua, in a personal interview with the president in Granada, for the submission of the dispute regarding the boundary and the interoceanic canal to the arbitration of President Cleveland. He also made an arrangement with an English company for the administration of the different sections of a railroad and the completion of the same from ocean to ocean.

SOTO, Marco Anselmo, president of Honduras, b. in Tegucigalpa, 13 Nov., 1846. He studied in the University of Guatemala, where he received the degree of LL. D. in 1866, and began the practice of law. President Barrios soon called him to his cabinet as secretary of foreign affairs, and public instructing and, worship, which place he held till February, 1876. After this time hostilities between Guatemala and Honduras began, President Ponciano Leiva, of the latter republic, was deposed, and, by agreement of the contending parties, President Barrios was sent as commissioner, to his native country, and in August was appointed provisional president. In May, 1877, he was elected constitutional president, and, assisted by his general secretary, Dr. Ramon Rosa, he created resources, fostered the mining industry, encouraged the exportation of cattle, built telegraphic lines, and pushed forward the construction of the interoceanic railway.
In 1881 he was re-elected for a second term, but in 1883, when President Barrios brought forward again the scheme of a Central American confederacy, with a view of becoming its leader, Soto, out of personal jealousy, opposed the idea strenuously, and retired in May to Panama, where he attacked Barrios in several pamphlets. A triumvirate had meanwhile taken charge of the executive, and after Soto's formal resignation, 15 Oct., 1883, Gen. Bogran, Barrios's intimate friend and follower, was elected president. Soto came later to New York, where he schemed against Bogran, and in February, 1886, an alleged filibustering expedition for Honduran independence, with the sobriquet "City of Mexico" by the U. S. sloop "Galeana" and brought to Key West. Soto then left New York for Costa Rica, and thence despatched in August of the same year an expedition of seventy-seven men, under the leadership of the officers that had been captured in the "City of Mexico," to stir up a revolutionary movement. But in Honduras hope seemed inclined to join the enterprise, the expedition was defeated and captured near Convagaya, and the four leaders were shot in that city on 18 Oct., 1886. Soto then left Costa Rica, and returned to the United States.

SOTOMAYOR, Cristobal de (so-to-mah-yohr), Spanish officer, b. in Spain in the last quarter of the 15th century; d. in Guanica, Porto Rico, 23 July, 1554. In 1518 he was one of the promoters of the expedition of Diego Columbus in August, 1509, and the same year went to Porto Rico with the expedition of Juan Cerón, who had been appointed governor. In 1510, when Ponce de Leon obtained from King Ferdinand the appointment of governor of Porto Rico, Sotomayor entered his service and became his lieutenant, assisting in the foundation of Caguana and the conquest of the island. Toward the end of 1510 he discovered on the southwest of the island a great bay, on the coast of which he founded the city of Guanica, from which that bay afterward took its name. One year afterward he founded on the north coast another town, which was called after his name, Sotomayor. In 1511, when the cacique Agucayaba, aided by the Caribes of the greater part of the island, surprised and took possession of the town of Guanica, the chief of which was killed by the capture of the town, Sotomayor, after a brave resistance, met his death with the greater part of the garrison.

SOTOMAYOR, Pedro de, Central American linguist, b. in Guatemala in 1594; d. there in 1631. He was the son of the Spanish post-commander of his native city, but in 1591 entered the order of St. Francis, and soon became professor of theology and learned in the language of the natives. He was elected in 1612 provincial of his order. He wrote "Arte, Vocabulario, y Sermones Guatemaltecos" and "Historia de los Varones ilustres del Orden de San Francisco, del Reino de Guatemala," which are preserved in manuscript in the Franciscan convent of Guatemala.

SOUBLETTE, Charles (soo-bay), French buccaneer, b. in Marseilles about 1625; d. at sea near Cuba in 1676. He served on a Dutch merchant vessel, and, being captured in Cuban waters by a Spanish man-of-war, was compelled to enlist among the crew, but in 1632 deserted, joined the buccaneers in Tortugas, and soon rose to be a leader. After 1653, in association with other chiefs, he participated in the pillaging of Puerto Caballo, San Antonio de Gibraltar, and of the Isthmus of Darien. Afterward, joining Sir Henry Morgan, he was placed at the head of a division and led the assault on Puerto del Principe, but, as Morgan kept the larger share of the booty, Soubine left him in disgust. In 1671 he participated in the expedition to Panama, served in the first division, and led the assault on the fortress of San Lorenzo, on Chagres river. Joining Moyse Van Vin in 1672, he ravaged the coast of Cuba, the west coast of Maranaka, which paid them a ransom, pillaged the pearl-fisheries near Rio Hacha, and continued the war against the Spaniards till his death.

SOUHETTE, Carlos, Venezuelan soldier, b. in Caracas in 1799; d. there, 11 Feb., 1870. He received an excellent education, and, on the proclamation of independence in 1810, entered the patriot service. In 1813 he became secretary to Gen. Francisco Miranda, and, after the capitulation of the latter in 1812, retired to his property in the interior. Afterward he joined Bolivar in the western provinces, and entered Caracas with him, 7 Aug., 1813, but after the defeat of La Puerta on 15 June, 1814, he fled to Barcelona and Margarita. When that island fell into the hands of Morillo, Soublette went to Cartagena, where he participated in the memorable defence of that fortress against Morillo. He then went to Haiti and joined Bolivar's expedition in 1816, being second in command of a division during the campaign of 1816. When Mariño pronounced against Bolivar, Soublette joined the latter, and as his chief of staff occupied Angostura, 17 July, 1817, and was a member of the Congress of Angostura. He was elected governor of the Isthmus in 1825, in which place he showed great talent as an administrator. In 1825 he was appointed intendant of the department of Magdalena, and in 1826 Colombian secretary of war under the vice-president of Santander. In 1829 he was sent by Bolivar to Venezuela to try to prevent the separation of the Colombian republic, but when he saw the imposibility of reconciling the two countries, he retired from the service of Venezuela, and as president of that body was one of the chief promoters of a liberal Constitution. Gen. Paez called him to his cabinet as secretary of war, and in 1834 he was sent by President Vargas as minister to England, France, and Spain. He was about to conclude with the last-named a power a treaty for the recognition of the independence of Venezuela, when, in 1836, he was recalled by his election as provisional president, on the resignation of Dr. Vargas. From 1839 till 1842 he was again secretary of war under Gen. Paez, and in the latter year he was elected constitutional president. In 1847 he retired to his estate, but, after the forcible dissolution of congress in 1848, he protested against Monagas's unconstitutional proceedings and was obliged to emigrate to New Granada, where he lived till 1858. By a special act of congress he received his pay as general of Colombia. He took no part in the political commotions of his country, and after the fall of Monagas in 1858 he was recalled and ordered to put down the revolution in the western provinces, but when his measures were not approved he resigned, retiring to his farm. Under the short administration of Paez in 1862 he was again a member of the cabinet, and several times was elected to congress. He was more than a party-leader, and is regarded as among the most honorable statesmen of Venezuela.
SOUER, Casper (sow'-er), journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Nov. 1819; d. there, 21 Oct., 1868. He supplemented a common-school education by private study; and in 1850-54 was connected with the Philadelphia "Dispens," devoting himself specially to local antiquities. In 1853 he also became associated with the "Evening Bulletin," of which he was afterward an editor and part proprietor till his death. Mr. Souer was an active supporter of the administration during the civil war. His "History of Chestnut Street," which was published serially, has been praised for trustworthy accuracy and the choice of topics.

SOULABIE, Louis Ferdinand (soo-lah-bee), explorer, b. in Pierre-fitte-Lestatas, Bornn, in 1857; d. in Bahia in 1856. He became a Jesuit and was sent to labor among the Indians of Brazil, and was attached for years to the Amazon missions. His travels in the country, which extended to Napo river, gave him opportunities to make hydrographical observations, and he prepared a valuable chart of the basin of the Amazon, with which he became thoroughly familiar. In 1857 he became assistant of Father Cristobal Acuna and accompanied Texeira's expedition, which sailed down the Amazon from Peru to its mouth. The maps and geographical observations in Acuna's narrative, "Descubrimiento del Rio de Amazonas," are based on Soulie's work. Soulalie was afterward professor of theology in the college of the Jesuits at Bahia. He left in manuscript "Historia del descubrimiento de la conquista de la America meridional," which was afterward published (Rome, 1832).

SOULE, Caroline Augusta (soo-lay), author, b. in Albany, N. Y., 3 Sept., 1824. Her father's name was Soule. She was graduated at Albany female academy in 1841, and on 28 Aug., 1843, married Rev. Henry B. Soule, a Universalist clergyman, who died in 1851, leaving her with five children to support. "Since that time she has devoted herself to teaching and to literature. She was corresponding editor of the "Ladies Repository" in Boston from 1855 till 1863, and for eleven years edited and published "The Guiding Star," a Sunday-school fortnightly, in New York. Afterward she was ordained as a minister of the Universalist church, and in 1879 became its first foreign missionary. She is now (1898) pastor of a congregation in Glasgow, Scotland. In a recent letter Mrs. Soule says: "I have written everything from a sermon to a song, and delivered addresses in a log-cabin on a prairie to preaching three times a Sunday in the city of London." Besides numerous contributions to current literature, she has published "Memoir of Rev. H. B. Soule" (New York, 1852); "Home Life" (Boston, 1855); "The Pet of the Settlement" (1859); and "Wine or Water" (1861); and edited for two years "The American Universalist," to which she contributed many articles (1854-5).

SOULE, George, educator, b. in Barrington, Yates co., N. Y., 14 May, 1834. After the death of his father in 1838 he was taken to Illinois by his mother. He was graduated at Sycamore academy, Ill., in 1852, and during the next three years studied medicine, law, and the commercial sciences in his father's store. He entered the schools and college of commercial and literary college in New Orleans, La., of which he is still (1898) president. He was an officer in the Confederate army from 1862 to the close of the war, attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was captured at Shiloh, and afterward was chief of the labor bureau of Gen. Kirby Smith's army. Col. Soule is engaged in lecturing and writing on educational and social topics, and has held many offices in benevolent and civic societies. He has published "Practical Mathematic" (New Orleans, 1875); a series of "Philosophic Arithmetics" on a new system (1884); and "Science and Practice of Accounts" (1887).

SOULE, Joshua, M. E. bishop, b. in Bristol, Me., 1 Aug., 1781; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 6 March, 1867. His father was a man of great local influence, went by the name of "Captain Soule," and was one of the select-men of Bristol. When Joshua was sixteen he united with the Methodist church, and at fifteen or later became a Methodist presiding elder and asked that he might travel with him. Consent being given, he began his career as "boy preacher," but, though young, he was tall, dignified, and able, and acquired not as an opponent of Calvinism, Unitarianism, and Universalism. He studied hard and made great progress. When he was but twenty-three he was placed in charge of the state of Maine as presiding elder. He was on the committee to draft the constitution of the delegated general conference, which, since 1813, has been the fundamental law of the church. He was a delegate to the general conference of 1812, and also to that of 1816. At the latter he was elected book-agent and editor of the Methodist Magazine." He did not like these facts, and entered the ministry as an earnest man. He was elected a re-election; but in 1820, before that question was raised, he was elected a bishop. A great debate had occurred on whether presiding elders should be elected or, as before, appointed by the bishops. Mr. Soule was opposed to their election, but the majority of the conference voted in favor of it. Having full confidence in his sincerity, they elected him bishop, but it did not make him what he believed to be an unconstitutional law, re-entered the pastorate, and was stationed first in New York and then in Baltimore. In 1824 the general conference reversed its action and re-elected him bishop. These circumstances have no parallel in the history of the denomination, and are indisputable proofs of his great ability and influence. Up to 1842 he continued in the duties of the office, and then visited Great Britain as a delegate from the general conference of the United States to the British Wesleyan conference. In 1844 the general conference was held in New York. Bishop James O. Andrew had become complicated with slavery, and the conference passed a resolution abrogating this bishop's right to perform any of his functions until this encumbrance should be removed. It was Bishop Soule's opinion that the conference had no right to pass such a resolution. Bishop Andrew declined the proposition, and the result was a division of the church. Bishop Soule adhered to the southern members, and when the Methodist Episcopal church, south, was established he went with them and became their presiding elder. In 1848 he visited the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church at Pittsburg, but was not recognized as a bishop or a delegate, though he was courteously received as a visitor. At the age of seventy-two he retired from public life. Bishop Soule was a great man intellectually, of remarkable personal appearance, dignified and even immemorial in his qualities. He had been thoroughly educated, and in early life brought into close relations with educated men, his infirmities, if not eradicated, would have been concealed. As it was, few men in church or state have exerted greater influence over their contemporaries.

SOULE, Pierre, statesman, b. in Castillon, in the French Pyrenees, 3 September, 1802; d. in New Orleans, 26 March, 1870. His father held the inherited post of a magistrate when the French revolution began. He then entered the army of the new republic, and rose to high rank, but finally returned to the bench. Pursuing his youthful career, he was sent to the Jesuits' college at Toulose, to be prepared for ecclesiastical orders; but the rigid discipline was repugnant to him, and he returned home in disgust. The following year he was sent to the city of Bordeaux to complete his education; but he took part in a plot against Louis XVIII., was detected, and fled from the city to the mountains of the ancient Bearn country, where, disguised as a shepherd, he remained a year. The government pardoned him and he returned to Bordeaux, where he taught in an academy, and he then removed to Paris, where he earned support as a private correspondent and student. In 1824 Soulé's pen found access to the Paris Liberal journals, and introduced him to the intimacy of the Liberal leaders. In 1825 he was an editor of "Le Nain jaune," a paper noted for its extreme liberal ideas and the bitterness of its attacks upon the ministers of Charles X. One of the severest of these articles was traced to Soulé, and he was arrested and tried before the court correctionnelle. Soulé's lawyer sought rather to soften the severity of the impending sentence than to defend his client's cause, whereupon Soulé, indignant at this surrender of his honest convictions, rose in court and defended them boldly, frankly, and eloquently. His sentence was only the more severe—close confinement in the prison of St. Peters and a fine of 10,000 francs. The only escape from this was self-exile. Soulé left Paris, with the passport of his friend, the poet Barthelemy, who closely resembled him. He had an offer from the president of Chili to become his private secretary, and he intended to sail from England with the Chilian charge d'affaires, but when he had crossed the channel the ship on which he was to embark had departed. Soulé now was reduced to such a strait that he returned to France, prepared to face the dungeon. At Havre, just as he landed, he was met by a friend, afterward a French admiral, who persuaded him to embark for Hayti, where he arrived in September, 1836. He was kindly received by President Boyer, to whom he bore letters of introduction, but, finding no opening for his services, he followed the War of 1812, and thence went to New Orleans toward the close of the year. He found a knowledge of English indispensable, and went to Tennessee to study it, becoming for a while a guest of Gen. Andrew Jackson. Afterward he went to Bardstown, Ky., where, falling sick and being without funds, he obtained employment as a gardener, and while engaged in this capacity learned English and studied the elements of American law. On his return to New Orleans, Soulé studied Louisiana law in the office of Morice Lislet, speedily passed his examination in English, and then became Lislet's partner. He rose rapidly in his profession, and for many years he was associated in the conduct of most of the celebrated civil and criminal cases in the Louisiana courts; but he was more distinguished for originality, vigor, and brilliancy as an advocate than for profundity as a jurist. He entered politics, in the first presidential campaign after he began his legal career, as a public speaker on the Democratic side. Under the new constitution of 1845 Mr. Soulé was elected to the state senate. In 1847 Gov. Isaac Johnson appointed him to the U. S. Senate to fill a vacancy, and in 1849 he was elected to fill that body by the people. In all public measures affecting the south he espoused the extreme southern view. He took an active part in the long debates upon Henry Clay's compromise bill of 1850, and led his party in opposition to that measure. He frequently challenged Clay and Webster in debate, and advocated secession without delay, foreseeing, as he claimed, that from compromise to compromise the sovereignty of the states would speedily surrender to the supremacy of a central government. In March, 1858, President Pierce offered Soulé the mission to Spain, with the special object in view of the acquisition of Cuba. This news preceded him to Madrid, and he was received there very coldly. At a ball in Madrid a remark by the Duke of Arenberg was made to the effect that Mr. Soulé resembled a tutor to his family, and, though the duke denied any such intention, a duel with swords was the result. Mr. Soulé then challenged the French ambassador, the Marquis de Turgot, as responsible for what had taken place under his roof, and crippled him for life. On 28 Aug., 1854, a revolutionary outbreak took place in the streets of Madrid. It soon was charged that Mr. Soulé favored this with all his power; but there is no evidence to show it, though he doubtless sympathized, as was natural, with the Spanish Liberal party. In 1854, Mr. Soulé was one of the members that framed the celebrated "Ostend manifesto" (see Pierce, Franklin), and it was understood that he was the moving spirit in its preparation. At some previous period he had violently attacked Napoleon III., and when on his way to Ostend he was stopped by the authorities at the southern frontier of France; but as soon as the officials at Paris were informed of this they sent him authority to pursue his journey. At the same time French spies followed him to Ostend. Mr. Soulé was naturally deeply disappointed by his government's non-action upon the manifesto. He resigned in June, 1855, and returned to New Orleans, where he resumed the practice of law without abandoning politics. In 1850, and again in 1860, he warmly advocated the nomination of Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency. After the election of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Soulé, to the surprise of his friends, opposed secession and the "compromise" of the southern states to secure what they considered their rights. With this view, when Gov. Thomas O. Moore called a state convention in January, 1861, Mr. Soulé was a candidate for delegate, but was not elected. During the canvass he depicted in the darkest colors the calamities secession would bring, and predicted the decay of the government, and hinted that it would abide by the decision of his state. On the passage of the ordinances of secession he tendered his services to the Confederate government, but, being in failing health, he soon returned to New Orleans, and remained there until the city fell into the hands of the National forces in April, 1862. Shortly afterward he was arrested and taken to Fort Lafayette, New York harbor, where he was imprisoned for several months. Finally he was released and went to Nassau, whence, in the autumn of 1862, he ran the blockade at Charleston and tendered his services to Gen. Beauregard. After serving on his staff for some time as an honorary member, Mr. Soule went to Richmond in 1865, and was commissioned a brigadier-general to raise a foreign legion; but the plan was not carried out. Mr. Soule then returned to New Orleans, where in the latter's scheme for settling Sonora, in Mexico, with immigrants from California. This was a project patronized by Napoleon III.; the Confederate government had no connection with it. It failed through disagreement between Maximilian and Dr. Gwin. When, at the close of the war, Mr. Soule returned to New Orleans, though his health was broken and his fortune was gone, he resumed the practice of his profession, but in 1868 he had to give up all work. Soule's remarkable powers of eloquence were acknowledged by Henry Clay and Daniel Webster. The effect of his glowing periods was deepened by a strong, clear, and mellow voice and by a massive and imposing form, a noble head, glistening black eyes, and an olive-tinted face, which was cast in the mould of the great Napoleon's and was full of expression.

SOULE, Richard (sole), lexicographer, b. in Duxbury, Mass., 8 June, 1812; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 35 Dec., 1877. He was descended in the sixth generation from George Soule, who was one of the signers of the compact on the "Mayflower." Richard graduated at Harvard in 1832 and was a civil engineer till 1838. From 1840 till 1853 he engaged in sugar-refining, and after 1855 he devoted himself to literary pursuits. Most of his life was spent in Boston. He was a member of the school committee of that city in 1848 and 1849, and of the legislature in the latter year. From 1855 till 1859 Mr. Soule had supervision of the corps of editors that assisted Dr. Joseph E. Worcester in the preparation of his quarto dictionary. He published "Memorial of the Sprague Family," a poem, with genealogical and biographical notes (Boston, 1847); "Manual of English Pronunciation and Spelling, with a Preliminary Exposition of English Orthoepy," with James A. Wheeler (1861); "Dictionary of English Synonyms" (1871); and "Pronouncing Hand-Book," with Loomis J. Campbell (1879).

SOULOUQUE, Faustin Elie (soo-loo-kay), Hay- tian emperor under the name of Faustin I., b. in Petit Goave in 1785; d. there 6 Aug., 1867. He was a negro slave of the Mandingo race, but was freed by the decree of Felicite Southonax, issued 29 Aug., 1793, and took part in the civil war that raged in the island, and in 1803 in the negro insurrection against the French. He became in 1810 a lieutenant in the horse-guards of President Alexandre Petion, and was promoted captain by President Jean Boyer, but in 1845 joined the party of Riviere-Herard, who made him a colonel. He was freed by the favor of President Guerin and lieutenant-general by President Jean Riché, and, after the death of the latter in February, 1847, while rival aspirants were disputing and plotting for the succession, the leaders of the senate agreed to elect an old and incapable negro general. Senators Arlaun and Dupuy nominated Soulouque, urging in his favor that he was unable to read or write, and he was unexpectedly elected on 1 March, 1847; but, instead of proving a tool in the hands of the senators, he showed a strong will, and, although by his antecedents belonging to the multati-
SOUTHGATE

SOUTHAMPTON, Henry Wriothesley, Earl of. English statesman, b. 6 Oct., 1573; d. in Holland, 10 Nov., 1624. In 1596 he served in the expedition of the Earl of Essex to Cadiz, and in 1599 he was general of horse under Essex in Ireland. After seeing further service in Holland, he took part in the insurrection that his former chief headed in London, and was sentenced to death, but pardoned by the queen. He took part in the colonization of this country under Sir Walter Raleigh, scouring out the expedition in the "Concord," under Baltimore in 1672, at his own expense, and also interested many others in schemes for developing the New World, including his brother-in-law, Lord Arundel, and the latter's son-in-law, Cecil Calvert, afterward Lord Baltimore. In 1695, with Lord Arundel he despatched an expedition to New England. Though his name does not appear on the chart of the Lords of the Company of Virginia, he is credited with the chief part in obtaining it, and in the second charter his name stands next to those of the high officers of state. When his friend, Sir Edwin Sandys, who had converted him to Protestantism, retired from the treasurership of the company (its chief office), Southampton was unanimously named in his stead, and he maintained the liberal policy of Sandys, retaining office till the company's charter was taken away. Southampton was a firm supporter of religious liberty, and was imprisoned by the king's order for some time in 1621 on a charge of corresponding with the Independents. After the Virginia company had been suppressed, he commanded a regiment in the Netherlands in the struggle for Dutch freedom, and in the winter-quarters of Rozenberg he and his son were wintered with fever. The latter died, and the earl followed him after recovering sufficiently to reach Bergen-op-Zoom on his way home. Shakespeare dedicated to him his "Venus and Adonis" in 1593, and the "Rape of Lucrece" in 1594, and he is the only man from whom the poet acknowledges receiving a benefit.

SOUTHD, Henry (south'ard), congressman, b. on Long Island, N. Y., in October, 1749; d. in Baskingridge, N. J., 2 June, 1842. The family name was formerly Southworth. His father, Abraham, removed to Baskingridge in 1757. The son was brought up on a farm and earned money as a day-laborer to purchase land for himself. He was an active patriot during the Revolution, served in the state house of representatives for nine years, and sat in congress in 1801-11 and 1813-21, having been chosen as a Democrat. Mr. Southard was a man of superior talents and possessed a remarkable memory. Until he had passed ninety years he neither wore glasses nor used a staff.—His son, Samuel Lewis, senator, b. in Baskingridge, N. J., 9 June, 1767; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 26 June, 1842, was graduated at Princeton in 1804, taught in his native state, and then went to Virginia as tutor in the family of John Taliaferro. After studying law and being admitted to the bar in that state, he returned to New Jersey and settled at Flemington. He was appointed law-reporter by the legislature in 1811, became associate justice of the state supreme court in 1815, was a presidential elector in 1820, and was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Whig in place of James J. Wilson, who had resigned, serving from 16 Feb., 1831, till 3 March, 1833. In the latter year he met his father on a joint committee, and they voted together on the Missouri compromise. In September, 1823, he became secretary of the navy, and he served till 3 March, 1829, acting also as secretary of the treasury from 7 March till 1 July, 1823, and taking charge of the portfolio of war for a time. When he was dining with Chief-Justice Kirkpatrick, of New Jersey, soon after his appointment to the navy, the judge, aware of his ignorance of nautical affairs, said: "Now, Mr. Southard, do you honestly assert that you know the bow from the stern of a frigate?" On his retirement from the secretarialship of the navy in 1829 he became attorney-general of New Jersey, and in 1832 he was elected governor of the state. He was chosen U. S. senator again in 1833, and served till his resignation on 3 May, 1842. In 1841, on the death of President Harrison and the consequent accession of John Tyler, he became president of the senate. He was a trustee of Princeton in 1822, and in 1833 the University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of LL.D.

Mr. Southard published "Reports of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1816-20" (2 vols., Trenton, 1819-20), and numerous addresses, including a "Centennial Address" (1832), and "Discourse on William Wright" (Washington, 1834).—Samuel Lewis's son, Samuel E., b. (1819-50), was graduated at Princeton in 1836, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. He published "The Mystery of Godliness," a series of sermons (New York, 1848), and single discourses.

SOUTHGATE, Horatio, P. F., bishop, b. in Portland, Me., 5 July, 1812; d. in Astoria, O., 13 April, 1894. He was graduated at Bowdoin, and went to the Andover seminary intending to enter the ministry. Two years later he accepted for orders in the Episcopal church, and was confirmed in October, 1834. He was ordained deacon in Trinity church, Boston, Mass., 12 July, 1835, by Bishop Gris-wald, and soon afterward was appointed by the foreign committee of the board of missions to make an investigation of the state of Mahomedanism in Turkey and Persia. He sailed from New York in April, 1836, and was occupied for five years in this field of research. On his returning to the United States he was ordained priest in St. Paul's chapel, New York city, 3 Oct., 1839, by Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk. He was appointed missionary to Constantinople in 1840, and served for four years in that capacity during which time he made a tour through Mesopotamia. The Episcopal church having resolved henceforth to send bishops into the foreign missionary field, Dr. Southgate was consecrated bishop for the dominions and dependencies of the sultan of Turkey, in St. Peter's church, Philadelphia, Pa., 28 Oct., 1844. In the following year he returned to Constantinople, and was occupied in the duties of his office until 1846. He then came back to the United States and offered his resignation, which was accepted by the house of bishops in October, 1850. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1845, and the same from Trinity in 1846. He was elected bishop of California in 1850 and of Haiti in 1850, but declined. In 1851 he went to Portland, Me., and organized the diocese of Maine, which he held until the close of 1858. In the autumn of 1859 he became rector of Zion church, New York city, and discharged the duties of that post for thirteen years, resigning in September, 1872. Since that date he had lived in retirement in Rensselaerswyck, N. Y. Bishop Southgate's chief publications are "Narrative of a Tour through Armenia, Kurdistan, Persia, and Mesopotamia" (2 vols., New York, 1840); "Narrative of a Visit to the Syrian (Jacobite) Church of Mesopotamia" (1844); "A Treatise on the Antiquity, Doctrine, Ministry, and Worship of the Anglican Church," in the Papers of the American Anti-Critical Association for the Observance of Lent (New York, 1850); "The War in the East" (1855); "Parochial Sermons" (1859); and "The Cross above the Crescent, a Romance of Constantinople" (Philadelphia, 1877). He had also contributed freely to church and other literature in magazines and reviews.

SOUTHWICK, Solomon, journalist, b. in New Lebanon, R. I., 23 Dec., 1772; d. in Albany, N. Y., 18 Nov., 1859. His father was editor of the Newport "Mercury," and an active patriot. After engaging in several humble employments the son entered a printing-office in New York city, and in 1792 removed to Albany, where he was employed by his brother-in-law, John Barber, the owner of the Albany Register. He soon became Barber's partner, and on the latter's death in 1808 succeeded to his interest in the paper and became its sole editor. Under his management it attained great influence in the Democratic party. Mr. Southwick held many local offices at this time, including those of sheriff of the county and postmaster of Albany, and in 1812 he became a regent of the state university. But he quarrelled with his party, his journal was discontinued, and he was dismissed. In 1819 he established "The Ploughboy," the first agricultural paper in the state, conducting it for a time under the pen-name of "Henry Homespun," and then in his own name. About this period he also conducted the "Christian Vindicator," a religious periodical. Subsequently he edited the "National Democrat," in opposition to the views of a majority of his party, and presented himself as a candidate for governor. He was afterward nominated by the anti-Masons for the same office, and conducted for several years the "National Observer," which he had established in the interest of that party. Shortly after this he retired from political life, and between 1831 and 1837 delivered courses of lectures on "The Bible," "The History of Education," "Self-Education," which were very popular. For the last two years of his life he was connected with the "Family Newspaper," which was published by his son Alfred. Just before his death, which came suddenly, he had projected a literary and scientific institute, under his personal supervision, to aid young men in pursuing a course of self-education. Mr. Southwick published many addresses and pamphlets, including "The Pleasures of Poverty," a poem (Albany, 1823); "A Solemn Warning against Free-Masonry" (1821); "A Layman's Apology for the Appointment of Clerical Chaplains" (1828); "Letters to Thomas Herttell," under the pen-name of "Sherlock" (1834); and "Five Lessons for Young Men" (1837).

SOUTHWORTH, Constant, colonist, b. in Leyden, Holland, in 1614; d. in Duxbury, Mass., about 1685. His father, Edward, a merchant and business agent for the Leyden Pilgrims, died in 1621, and his mother, a woman of great worth and ability, ran the estate until, on the 25th of March, 1623, to become the second wife of Gov. William Bradford, whom she had formerly known. The son was educated by his step-father, and in 1633 was one of the early settlers of Duxbury, which he represented in the legislature, becoming also commissioner for the united colonies, governor of the Kennebec plantation, and assistant governor of Plymouth. He was the supposed author of the supplement to "New England's Memorial," by his cousin, Nathaniel Morton (Cambridge, 1699). He bequeathed to one of his daughters two beds and furniture, "provided she do not marry William Fobbes: but if she do, then to have five shillings." The daughter preferred the latter alternative.

SOUTHWORTH, Emma Dorothy Eliza Neiville, author, b. in Washington, D. C., 26 Dec., 1819; d. there, 30 June, 1899. She was educated by her step father, Joshua L. Henshaw, at whose school she was graduated, and married Frederick H. Southworth, of Utica. She taught in a public school in Washington in 1840, and while so occupied began to write stories, the first of which, "The Irish Refugee," appeared in "The Baltimore Saturday Visiter," and subsequently she wrote for the "National Era," and became one of its regular contributors. In its columns appeared her first novel, "Evelina," in 1841. "It originally was intended to be a short story, but grew into a long novel, and was afterward issued in book-form (New York, 1849). With unusual rapidity she wrote her succeeding stories, issuing sometimes three in a year, and they have attained great popularity. Her works display strong dramatic power and contain many excellent descriptive passages of southern life and scenery, to which they are chiefly devoted. In 1853 she settled in a villa on the Potomac heights, near Washington, where she lived until 1876, when she removed to Yonkers, N. Y. Mrs. Southworth claims to have invented for her own use the envelope box that was afterward patented by others. Her published novels are now (1898) about fifty-six in number. A uniform edition, beginning with "Retribution" and ending with "The Fatal Secret," was issued in Philadelphia in 1872. It includes forty-two stories. Since 1874 her stories comprise "Unknown" (1874); "The Hand that Made the Map" (1877); "The Magic Ring of Serpent" (1879); "Nearest and Dearest" (1881); "The Mother's Secret" (1883); and "An Exile's Bride" (1887); and others were issued serially in..."

South American
explorer,
b. near Berbice, Dutch Guiana, in 1686; d.
in Harlem, Holland, in 1731, and returned to Guiana after the death of his father to assume the management of his estate.
The general peace of 1713 afforded him facilities to follow his natural tastes, and he explored
the three Guianas, crossed to Brazil, and was making botanical researches on the banks of the Oyapock river when an uprising of the negroes compelled him to flee, abandoning his papers, which were lost in the shipwreck he was in the Omonari
by his pursuers, and, although he was rescued from the stake by a party of friendly Indians, he never afterward completely recovered from the injuries that he had suffered. In 1733 he visited Batavia and the Sunda archipelago, doubled
Cape Horn, visited Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, Saint Eustatius, and several of the West India islands, and collected a large collection of medicinal plants. From 1732 till 1739 he was deputy governor of Surinam. Failing health decided him to reside in England, and he settled in Harlem, devoting his last years to the culture of tulips and endeavoring to naturalize his fine garden tropical and medical plants from Guiana. His works include: Beschryving carnoyen en Surinamse planten op diet vaste landt van Guaya in Amerika" (The Hague, 1729); "Beschryving eener Reis in Zuid-Amerika, bevattende verschillende beschouwingen en trent medicinale planten in Brazilie en Guyanay" (Amsterdam, 1729); "Reis naar Cayenne en
in het binnenland van Guya en Brazilie" (1732); "Beschryving van Batavien en de Eilanden van in West-Indien," and "Geschiedenis der plante van Guya, in orde gebracht volgens de seconde methode" (Harlem, 1746).

SOUVESTRE, Henry Victurnien, Chevalier
de,
French naval officer, b. near Rochefort in 1759;
d. at sea, 12 April, 1782. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1774, and fought at Louisbourg and in the campaign in Canada in 1756-9. After the conclusion of peace he was sent to the station of North America, and made a cruise in 1771 to Halifax and Newfoundland to determine the longitude of several points. When France declared war against England in 1778 he commanded a frigate and was ordered to the West Indies, where he captured several English privateers. Joining afterward Vaureuil's division, he was employed to convy troops to Martinique, and took part in the large expeditions under De Guichen in the enlargements of 17 April and 15 and 19 May, 1780. When Comt de Grasse left for Chesapeake bay, 5 July, 1781, Souvestre assumed command of the few frigates that were left at the disposal of the Marquis de Bouillé, and successfully opposed the English forces in the West Indies, repelled their landing in Martine, and captured Martinique, and conveyed the French troops that captured St. Eustatius, Saba, and St. Martin in 1781. Joining Vaureuil's division early in 1782, he assisted at the battle off Dominica, 12 April, 1782, and through his suggestion Vaudreuil, when he saw the perilous position of De Grasse, assumed command of the whole fleet.
While carrying Vaureuil's orders to the other divisions Souvestre was killed.

SOUZA, Martim Affonso de, Portuguese governor, b. in Coimbra near the end of the 15th century;
d. at Goa in January 1530. Over the Brazil part of America, of which Cabral had taken possession for the crown of Portugal in 1500, had been visited only occasionally by Portuguese vessels, but when King John III. heard that many French vessels came to the coast of Brazil he resolved to colonize the country. In December, 1530, he despatched from Lisbon a fleet of five sail and four hundred men, of which he was himself the master and at the age of forty-three, as a young officer, with the title of governor of New Lusitania, and extraordinary powers to distribute land and execute civil and criminal jurisdiction.
Catching three French vessels loaded with Brazil-wood, he touched the American coast at Cape St.
Augustine, whence he despatched Diego Leite with ten ships to explore the coast northward to Amazon river, while he continued to the south, entering Babia and Rio de Janeiro, where he remained for some time to construct two brigantines and take fresh water. Continuing his voyage to the south, he anchored, on 12 Aug., 1531, at the island of Ab-riago, where from some Spanish settlers he obtained reports of rich mines. He landed near Cananea, and sent into the interior an expedition of eighty men, who found the largest distances of the Rio Uruguay. On 26 Sept. he continued to the south, but his flagship was wrecked in the mouth of the river Chuy, and he despatched his brother to explore the river Plate. On 22 Jan., 1532, he founded the first Portuguese colony in Brazil on an island to which he gave the name of San Vicente. The Indians of the locality showed signs of hostility, but Souza recieved the unexpected assistance of Joao Ramallo, who had been shipwrecked long ago on the coast,
and had received aid and protection from the savages. He arrived with the chief Tybirica at San Vicente, and made a treaty between the hostile Indians and Souza, who thenceforward always received assistance and support from the savages.
Besides this colony, Souza, by the advice of Ra-cello, a young officer he had on board, took Piratinga on the bank of the river of that name. He sent his brother with a report of his discoveries to Portugal, and established in the neighborhood of the colony the first sugar-mill in the country, having brought cane-plants from the island of Madeira. In 1533 he was recalled to his native country to consult about the partition of the newly erected hereditary captaincies, but, although he was given the richest one that of San Vicente, he did not return, but in 1534 sailed for India, where he acquired great military fame and died. His brother, Pero Lopes, b. in Coimbra about 1500; d. on the coast of Madgascar in 1539, had served in the navy against the Mediterranean corsairs, when, in 1535, he was appointed by his brother commander of one of the crues of the expedition to Brazil. He took an principal part in the capture of the French ships, and the command of the largest prize was awarded to him. After saving Martim Affonso from the shipwreck at Chuy, he was sent with his two vessels to explore the river Plate, with orders to rally at the island of Palmas. He sailed on 23 Nov., to the estuary of the Plate, and beyond the confine of the Uruguay explored the Parana for a considerable distance above 30° S., returning on 27
Dec., 1531. Having joined his brother at Palmas, he participated in the foundation of San Vicente, and in May, 1532, was sent with despatches to Portugal, being also commissioned to give a detailed report to King John. On the division of the land into captaincies on 28 Sept., 1532, he was awarded two tracts of twenty-five leagues, and sailed in 1533 with a party of colonists to occupy the northern division between Parahiba and Pernambuco, but, meeting with opposition from a neighboring tribe, the Potiguaraes, he went to Europe to collect more substantial means for colonization. He was offered the command of a fleet to the East Indies, and, hoping to obtain funds from his brother, he accepted, but perished on his return voyage by shipwreck on the coast of Madagascar. The manuscript of his report to King John III. lay in the royal archives till it was published by Adolfo de Varnhagen und Pires in 1849 under the title "Diário de navigação da Armada, que foi a terra do Brasil em 1530" (Lisbon, 1849).

SOUZA, Thomé de, first governor-general of Brazil, b. in Souza, Beira, early in the 16th century; d. in Lisbon about 1560. In the hereditary captaincies that had been established in Brazil abuses soon became general, so that King John III., on 7 Jan., 1549, ordered the organization of a general government. The choice fell upon Thomé de Souza, a natural son of one of the first families, a prudent and enlightened officer and statesman, who had achieved renown in the wars of Africa and India. He sailed from Lisbon on 2 Feb., 1549, with a squadron of six vessels, having commissioned four hundred volunteers, four hundred pardoned convicts, several families as colonists, some artillery officers, engineers, mechanics, and six Jesuits under the lead of Father Manoel de Nobrega. On 29 March he entered the harbor of Todos os Santos. The aged Diogo Alvares Carramur (see PARAGUASSU) hastened to welcome the governor-general, and his allies, the Tupinambas, offered their services. There Souza founded a city, naming it São Salvador, which was afterward changed to Bahia de todos os Santos. The assistance that he received from the Tupinambas hastened the progress of building, and soon the cathedral, the governor's palace, a Jesuit college, and one hundred houses had been completed. He organized the administration by appointing a chief justice and other authorities. The colony flourished under Souza's prudent administration, and numerous emigrants arrived, founding new villages. In 1551 a bishopric was established in Bahia, with jurisdiction over the whole Portuguese colony. Souza, weakened by the fatigues of his responsible office, solicited relief, and on 19 July, 1553, his successor, Duarte da Costa, arrived, to whom he delivered the government and sailed for Portugal.

SOWARDS, Joseph, scout, b. in eastern Kentucky about 1840; d. there about 1863. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and at the beginning of the Civil war occupied, with his aged father, a small farm in the upper part of Johnson county, Ky. He was a decided Unionist. The threats of his neighbors caused him to seek refuge in the woods. While he was thus in hiding a party demanded of his father his place of concealment, and, on the latter's refusal to disclose it, Judge Cecil, one of the number, shot the old man dead before his own doorway. Sowards now enlisted in the 3rd Kentucky regiment in the National army, and in December, 1861, was captured by Gen. James A. Garfield as a scout. Sowards rendered important services, among others going, at imminent risk, into Marshall's camp on the eve of the battle of Middle Creek and reporting to Garfield an ambuscade into which he would doubtless have fallen but for this timely information. On Marshall's retreat from that battle, Judge Cecil was captured, and Sowards upbraided him with the death of his aged father. A taunting reply caused Sowards to lose his self-control, and he shot Cecil as Cecil had shot his father. A court-martial sentenced Sowards to death; but Garfield was careful to enjoin upon his colonel to select as his guard only such men as were especially friendly to the prisoner, who naturally was allowed to escape. After this he performed the most important services, hanging about Garfield's camp and giving constant information as to the movements of the enemy. No one knew how he lived or where he could be found, but he was sure to appear whenever he was wanted. Through him Garfield was enabled to drive the last organized body of Gen. Humphrey Marshall's men from Kentucky. They had strongly intrenched themselves at Pound Gap, and were fast receiving re-enforcements from Virginia, when Sowards penetrated their camp, learned their strength and position, and then returned to Garfield's lines with the suggestion that he should fall upon and destroy them. The result was the Pound Gap expedition, which Sowards guided over a hundred miles of rough road and through a blinding snow-storm. He was so thoroughly disguised that Garfield, though he knew Sowards was with the troop, did not recognize him until he disclosed himself on the eve of the battle. This is the last that is certainly known of Sowards, but he is reported to have been killed in the following year by a band of Confederate guerrillas.

SOWER, Christopher, printer, b. in Laushe, near Marburg, Germany, in 1693; d. in Germantown, Pa., 23 Sept., 1739. He wrote his name Christophe Saur on his German publications. He was a graduate of a German university, and studied medicine at Halle. He came to Philadelphia in 1724 and settled in Lancaster county as a farmer, but removed in 1731 to Germantown, where, in the same year, he built a large dwelling (see engraving) for his residence. In order to supply the needs of his countrymen who were liberally educated, especially in theology, he first supplied them with Bibles and religious works from Germany. In 1739, when the first printing press and materials, he issued an almanac, in German, of twenty-four pages, which was continued by his descendants till 1799. In 1739 he brought out the first number of "Der Hoch-Deutsch Pen-sylvanische Geschichte-Schreiber," a religious and secular journal, a small folio, nine by thirteen inches, which attained a circulation of nearly ten thousand, and had great influence among his countrymen. It was the first of its kind that was published in a foreign language in Pennsylvania. This was followed by a number of larger works and in 1742 by a quarto edition of the Bible in German, Luther's translation, which was limited to 1,200 copies of 1,284 pages. It was three years in press, the largest work as yet issued in the colonies, and was the first Bible printed in this country, with the exception of Eliot's Indian Bible. Thereafter his publications were very numerous, both in English and German. In 1766, after being established in Philadelphia, he began printing, he practised his profession without a break and night or day. He was also active in all public measures, and frequently represented his countrymen in their intercourse with the government. Upon his death, his business and his estate were inherited by his son, Christopher, b. in Laasphe, Germany, 29 Sept., 1721; d. in Methacton, Pa., 4 Aug., 1784. He was liberally educated, and when he was twenty-six years old became a merchant, and was associated with the Rev. Sanders Mack in Germantown, in the oldest Dunker church in this country. Five years later he was chosen overseer, or bishop, and continued the duties of his office in connection with his secular business until his death. Upon taking charge of the business, he so increased it that for many years it was the largest tobacco-manufactory in the world. In 1763 he published a second edition of the great quarto Bible, in 1766 a third, all in German. These editions were issued previous to the publication of an English Bible in the American colonies. A part of the unbound sheets of the edition of 1766 was seized by the British during their occupation of Germantown and used for littering horses. Copies of all the editions are in the Epen library, New York city, the Library company of Philadelphia, and the Historical society of Pennsylvania. He did his own type-founding, wood-engraving, paper- and ink-making, and binding, carrying on also a large business in his father's medical preparations, which he sent to various parts of the country. He was one of the founders of the Academy of Philadelphia, to which he largely contributed. He was also an opponent of slavery, and his advocacy of the doctrines of universal peace caused him to be misunderstood, so that during the Revolution, though he did not espouse the British cause, he was arrested and imprisoned. On a second arrest for not conforming to an edict, of which he seems to have been ignorant, he was taken from his bed, maltreated in various ways, and led before the provost as a spy. His large property was confiscated, but, instead of having recourse to the law, he said: "I made them to understand that I should permit everything to happen to me that the Lord should ordain." The remainder of his old age was spent, except when visiting churches within his jurisdiction, at Methacton, where, assisted by a faithful daughter, he supported himself at binding and selling remants of his publications. He died in poverty. No one in his denomination has been held in higher veneration, and his benevolence to the poor families of the soldiers earned him the title of the "bread father." He was an eloquent speaker, and his reputation as a writer extended throughout the United States. His son, Christopher, b. in Germantown, Pa., 3 Jul., 1754; d. in Baltimore, Md., 3 July, 1799, was engaged in business in Philadelphia during the war, and afterward led an unsettled life.—The second Christopher's great-grandson, Charles Gilbert, b. in Norristown, Pa., 21 Nov., 1821, removed the establishment to Philadelphia in 1844, where he continued publishing, first in his own name, then successively as Sower and Barnes, Sower, Barnes, and Potts, and Sower, Potts and Co. In 1887, one of the old-time founders, Christopher Sower, the house was incorporated as the Christopher Sower company by a charter granted by the state. Charles G. Sower remains as president of the company. SPAETH, Adolph (spate), theologian, b. in Esslingen, Wurtemburg, Germany, 29 Oct., 1839. He received his classical and theological education in the University of Tubingen, where he was graduated in 1861. He was ordained to the ministry of the Lutheran church in October, 1861, came to the United States in 1863, and has been pastor of St. John's German Lutheran congregation in Philadelphia since 1867. He became professor in the Lutheran theological seminary, Philadelphia, in 1876, president of the general council of the Evangelical Lutheran church in North America in 1883, and was a delegate of the general council to the general conference of Lutheran ministers at Hamburg, Germany, in 1887. Although a German by birth and education, he has become thoroughly identified with American interests, both ecclesiastical and political. He has acquired the English language and speaks it with ease. The Lutheran church consists of the degree of D. D. in 1875. Dr. Spaeith is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church in this country and in Europe. He has been editor of the "Jugend-Freund," a German monthly, since 1877. Among his published works are "Die Evangulien des Kirchenjahrs," (Philadelphia, 1870); "Brosamen von dem Herrn Tische," (1871); "Sonntagstibuch der Martin Luther," (1876); "Phyletische Beleuchtung des General-Concils," edited (1877); "Americankische Beleuchtung" (1882); "Luther im Lied seiner Zeitgenossen." (Reading, Pa., 1888); "The Luther Jubilee in Philadelphia," (Philadelphia, 1884); "The General Council," in English and German (1885); "Pheobe, the Deaconess," in English and German (1889); "Faith and Life as represented by Martin Luther," (Philadelphia, 1887); and a large number of sermons and addresses. He has for several years been engaged in the preparation of a complete "Life, Correspondence, and Works" of Charles P. Krauth, the Lutheran theologian. SPAIGHT, Richard Dobbs, governor of North Carolina, b. in New Bern, N. C., 25 March, 1753; d. there, 6 Sept., 1802. His father, Richard, was a member of the king's council in 1757, and secretary of North Carolina under the crown in 1762. His mother was the sister of Arthur Dobbs, governor of the colony in 1753-54. The son lost his parents at eight years of age and received his education abroad, being graduated at the University of Glasgow. He returned home in 1778, and at twenty years of age was elected to Gen. Richard Caswell, and was present at the battle of Camden. His kinsman, Capt. William Spaight, of the 65th regiment, had already been engaged at the battle of Bunker Hill on the British side. In 1781 he was elected to the North Carolina legislature, and again in 1782 and 1783. In the last year he became a member of congress and was placed on the committee to devise a plan for the government of the western territory. He was a delegate to the convention to frame the constitution of the United States in 1787, and was active in the proceedings. In the Hillsboro', N. C., convention in July, 1788, though afterward a Jeffersonian Republican, he earnestly advocated the adoption of the U.S. constitution, but in vain. He had been in correspondence with Gen. Washington on the subject, and the following interesting paragraph occurs in an unpublished letter to Gov. Spaight, dated Mt. Vernon, May 25, 1788: "I am sorry to find by your letter that the state of North Carolina is so much opposed to the proposed government. If a better could be agreed on, it might be well to reject this; but without such a prospect (and I confess none appears to me), policy I think must recommend the one that is submitted." On the invitation of Gen. Spaight, Washington visited North Carolina, and, in consequence of their united counsels, North Carolina ratified the constitution, 31 Nov., 1789. Owing to feeble health Gov. Spaight retired during four years from public life. In 1799 he was elected to the legislature, and he was immediately chosen governor by that body, being the first native of the state that was chief magistr. In 1793 and 1797, he was a presidential elector. He was a member of congress again from 1799 till 1801, and in the latter year sat in the North Carolina senate. He died of a wound that he had received in a duel with John Stanly, his successor in congress.—His eldest son, Richard Dobbs, governor of North Carolina, b. in New Bern, N. C., in 1796; d. there in 1883. His second son, Lemuel Spaight, was governor of the University of North Carolina in 1815, and was a member of the legislature in 1819, and of the state senate in 1829–30. He sat in congress in 1830–33, was again state senator in 1835–36, and governor of the state in 1836–37, being the last governor that was elected by the legislature. Gov. Spaight was a member of the Constitutional convention of 1837, which transferred the election to the popular vote.

SPALDING, Henry Harmon, missionary, b. in Bath, N. Y., in 1804; d. in Lapwai, Idaho, 3 Aug., 1874. He was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1833, and entered the class of 1837 in Lane theological seminary, but left, without graduation, upon his appointment in 1836 by the American board as missionary to the Nez Perce Indians of Idaho. He remained at Lapwai till 1847, when he fled with his family to the Willamette valley upon the murder of his associate, and all those that were attached to his post at Walla-Walla, by the Indians. After this he labored fourteen years among the savages, using his translations of the Scriptures, and acting also in 1843 as an agent of the American Board. He returned to Lapwai in 1852, combining with his mission work that of superintendent of education for the Nez Perce Indians till 1871. His labors thereafter were under the auspices of the Presbyterian board of missions, and were in northwestern Idaho and northeastern Washington territories. Several thousands of Indians were civilized and converted during his pastorate, and many became Christians. Mr. Spalding translated parts of the Bible into the Nez Perce language, which he had reduced to writing.

SPALDING, James Reed, journalist, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 15 Nov., 1821; d. in Dover, N. H., 10 Oct., 1872. His father was for nearly half of a century a well-known physician in Vermont. The son was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1840, and was a private tutor in Georgia, at the same time studying law. On his return to Montpelier he was admitted to the bar, but his literary tastes led him to give up his profession, and he spent several years in travel through Europe and into Asia as a student of manners, morals, and politics. He was a witness of the events of the French revolution of 1848. His letters to the New York "Courier and Enquirer" during his sojourn abroad won great admiration by their philosophical grasp of events and persons and brilliancy of style. On his return to the United States in the spring of 1850 he became attached to the "Courier and Enquirer" as its leading writer. His reputation led in 1859 to the establishment of the New York "Times," and many of its patriotic editorials were from his pen. He was stricken with paralysis when in the full vigor of his powers, and died after years of sickness. Richard Grant White, who was associated with him both in the "Courier and Enquirer" and the "World," wrote of Mr. Spalding: "With a theme congenial and an occasion to arouse him, his vigor and elegance have never been excelled by a writer upon the city press." His published addresses are "Spiritual Philosophy and Material Politics" (1854), and "The True Idea of the Nation and the People of the United States" (1853).

Burley, clergyman, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 11 Aug., 1833, was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1856, studied law at Tallahassee, Fla., spent two years at Union theological seminary, New York city, and was graduated at Andover seminary in 1861. He was ordained at Vergennes, Vt., the same year, and after holding Congregational pastorate in Haddam, Conn., became pastor of the Presbyterian church at Manchester, N. H., took charge in 1885 of the 1st Presbyterian church in Syracuse, N. Y., which place he now holds. Dr. Spalding has done much editorial work on the New York "World," the "Times," the "Watchman," Boston, and the "New Hampshire Journal," which was established by him in 1881. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of New Hampshire in 1837, and of the legislature of the same year. He received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth in 1878. Dr. Spalding has travelled extensively in the Old World. His published sermons and addresses include "Sermon Commemorative of Gen. Samuel P. Strong" (1854); "Scriptural Policy," a political address (1856); "Address to the Englishmen, John Park and Itali" (1874); and "The Idea and Necessity of Normal-School Training" (1878).

SPALDING, John Franklin, P. E. bishop, b. in Belgrade, Me., 25 Aug., 1828. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1843, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, in 1857, and was ordained deacon in Portland, Me., 9 July, 1857, and in New York City, 10 Apr., 1858, and was ordained priest in Portland, Me., 14 July, 1858, by the same bishop. He did missionary duty in Off Town, Me., for two years, was rector of St. George's church, Lee, Mass., in 1859–60 assistant minister in Grace church, Providence, R. I., in 1860–1, officiated for a short time in St. John's church, Providence, and in April 1862, became rector of St. Mark's church, Erie, Pa. This post he held for nearly twelve years. Having been elected missionary bishop of Colorado, with jurisdiction in the territory of Wyoming, he was consecrated in St. Paul's church, Erie, 31 Dec., 1873. Trinity gave him the degree of D. D. in 1874. Bishop Spalding is author of "A Devotional Manual," several tracts, and numerous occasional sermons and addresses. His latest publication is entitled "The Church and its
SPALDING, Lyman, physician, b. in Cornish, N. H., 5 June, 1775; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 30 Oct., 1851. He was graduated at Harvard medical school, with the degree of M. B., in 1797. In 1798, while still a student, he assisted Prof. Nathan Smith in establishing the medical school at Dartmouth, and he afterward prepared chemical apparatus, delivered the first course of lectures at the opening of the institution, and published "A New Nomenclature of Chemistry, proposed by Messrs. De Mervau, Lavoisier, Berthollet and Fourerov, with Additions and Improvements" (1799). His medical studies were afterward continued at Cambridge and Philadelphia, and he entered upon the practice of medicine at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1799. He was given the degree of M. D. by Dartmouth in 1804 and Harvard in 1811. He devoted much attention to the study of the human structure, was a skilful anatomist, and his preparations, particularly of the lymphatics, were highly praised. In 1812 the College of physicians and surgeons of the western district of the state of New York, at Fairfield, Herkimer co., was incorporated. Dr. Spalding being elected president and professor of anatomy, and he made annual visits to this school. In 1813 he removed to New York city and, a few years later, resigned his position at the college. With Dr. Spalding originated the plan for the formation of the "Pharmacopoeia of the United States," by the authority of all the medical societies and medical schools in the Union. In January, 1817, he submitted the project to the New York county medical society. In February, 1818, it was adopted by the Medical society of the state of New York and ordered to be carried into execution by their committee, Dr. Spalding being one of the number. The first edition of the work was published in 1820, and a new one is issued every ten years. Dr. Spalding was a contributor to medical and philosophical journals, and, besides several lectures and addresses, published "Reflections on Fever, and particularly on the Inflammatory Character of Fever" (1817); "Reflections on Yellow-Fever Periods" (1819); and "A History of the Introduction and Use of Scutellaria Lateriflora as a Remedy for preventing and curing Hydrophobia" (1819). Dr. Spalding always thought that in the United States the practice of vaccination as a preventive of the small-pox. He was a trustee of the only free schools that New York then possessed, and aided in the establishment of the first Sunday schools in that city.

SPALDING, Martin John, archbishop, b. near Lebanon, Marion co., Ky., 20 May, 1797; d. in Baltimore, Md., 7 Feb., 1872. He was graduated at the University of St. Mary's seminary in Marion county, where he was graduated in 1826. He then studied theology in St. Joseph's seminary, Bardstown, for four years, and then in the Urban college of the propa- ganda, Rome, where he won his doctor's diploma by defending for seven hours in Latin 250 theological propositions as one of the ablest theologians. He was ordained priest on 13 Aug., 1834, and on his return to Kentucky was charged with the pastorship of the cathedral at Bardstown and with the professorship of philosophy in the diocesan seminary. He was instrumental in founding the "Catholic Advocate," and his articles in this journal attracted wide attention among Roman Catholics in the United States. In 1828 he was appointed president of St. Joseph's college. After holding this post two years he was transferred to the pastorship of St. Peter's church in Lexington. Upon the removal of the see from Bardstown to Louisville in 1841 he returned to the former city, where his presence was thought necessary to reconcile the Roman Catholic inhabitants to the change. In 1844 he was recalled to Louis- ville and appointed vicar-general. The age of Bishop Flaget and the illness of his coadjutor to a great extent threw the administration of the diocese into the hands of Dr. Spalding, yet he was frequently engaged in giving lectures in Louisville and other cities, and at the same time prepared some of his works for the press. In February, 1848, he was appointed coadjutor bishop of Louisville, and he was consecrated bishop of Lengone in partibus on 10 Sept. following. He provided for the establishment of parochial schools, built an orphan asylum for boys at St. Thomas and one for boys and girls of German parentage in Louisville, and laid the foundation of a cathedral. He recalled the Jesuits into his diocese, and the Trappist abbey at Gethsemane was established under his auspices. After taking steps to have his diocese divided and the see of Covington created, he visited Europe in 1853-54 to obtain assistants. He then set about establishing the St. Vincent de Paul society, which soon had conferences in the principal towns. In 1857 he founded the American college in Louvain, which up to 1854 has sent 301 priests to the missions of the United States. At the beginning of the Know-Nothing movement he became involved in a controversy with George D. Prentice, and during the riots in Louisville in 1855 he showed great prudence, his influence probably preventing the disturbances from assuming larger proportions. Bishop Spalding did much to secure hospital accommodations for the sick of the National troops that were encamped around Louisville in the first year of the civil war. On the death of Archbishop Kenrick in June, 1864, Bishop Spalding was transferred to the see of Baltimore and installed as archbishop on 31 July. He founded the House of the Good Shepherd in Baltimore, and began a boys' seminary, which he placed in charge of the Xaverian Brothers. In 1865 he was appointed administrator of the diocese of Charleston, the bishop of which was unable to return, and made successful appeals to the Roman Catholics of the north in aid of their southern brethren. He also secured important contributions for the American college at Rome. In 1866 he presided over the second plenary council of Baltimore, the largest assembly of the kind since the general council of Trent. The work that this body performed was entirely planned by Archbishop Spalding. In 1867 he was present in Rome at the 15th centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, and again in 1869-70 as a member of the occasional council of the Vatican. He was at first opposed to the definition of the dogma of the pope's infallibility on the ground that it was inopportune, but gradually became convinced of its necessity. During the deliberations of the council his scholarship and theological ability produced a marked impression.

After his return to Baltimore in 1870 he made a visitation of his diocese, delivered lectures for the benefit of local charities, built fine parochial schools near his cathedral, and began the Church of St. Pius. Archbishop Spalding acquired great reputation as a lecturer and pulpit orator. He contributed largely to the Roman Catholic literature of the country, and takes high rank as a reviewer. He was for some time one of the editors of the "United States Catholic Magazine." His principal works are "De Ambigne's History of the Reformation Reviewed" (Baltimore, 1844; Dublin, 1846); "Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions in Kentucky 1787-1836-7" (Louisville, 1846); "Lectures on the General Evidence of Christianity" (1847; 4th ed., Baltimore, 1869); "Laws, Times, and Character of the Rev. B. J. Flagget" (Louisville, 1852); "Miscellanea: comprising Reviews, Lectures, and Essays on Historical, Theological, and Miscellaneous Subjects" (1855); and "History of the Protestant Reformation in Germany and Switzerland, and in England, Ireland, Scotland, the Netherlands, France, and Northern Europe" (2 vols., 1860). He also edited, with an introduction and notes, Abbé Darrais's "General History of the Catholic Church" (4 vols., New York, 1848). A memorial history of Archbishop Spalding was written by his nephew, John Lancaster Spalding, bishop of Peoria (New York, 1872).—His brother, Benedict Joseph, clergyman, b. in Marion county, Ky., 15 April, 1813; d. in Louisville, Ky., 4 Aug., 1868, studied at St. Mary's college, and entered the diocesan seminary in Bardstown, Ky. In 1832 he went to the College of the propugnaculum where he was among three who were then and then entered the priesthood of the Roman Catholic church. On his return to the United States in 1837 he taught for a time in the theological seminary of St. Thomas, and was afterward made agent of St. Joseph's college. In 1840, with the Rev. John Hutchins, he established a seminary for boys in Breckinridge county, which they carried on for ten years, when they returned to Bardstown in 1842 to accept the vice-presidency of St. Joseph's college, and continued in that place until 1844, when he was made pastor of the church of St. Joseph, in Bardstown. In 1847 he was called to the charge of the cathedral church in Louisville, and was appointed vicar-general of the diocese. These offices he held until his death, with two exceptions, when during the vacancy of the see he was invested by his superiors with the administration of the bishopric. He received no salary beyond his food and clothing, but gave largely of his own private fortune to those that were in need. Father Spalding was greatly beloved by both Roman Catholics and Protestants for his blameless life, his liberality to the poor, and his unselfishness during the Church of St. Augustine, of which he was appointed pastor.

—his nephew, John Lancaster, R. C., bishop, b. in Lebanon, Ky., 2 June, 1840, was educated in the United States and in Europe, ordained in 1863, and attached to the cathedral of Louisville as assistant. In 1869 he organized a congregation of colored people and built for their use the Church of St. Augustine, of which he was appointed pastor. He was soon afterward made chancellor of the diocese and secretary to the bishop. He left Louisville in 1873 and came to New York, where he did missionary work in the parish of St. Michael's, becoming noted as an eloquent preacher and lecturer. When the diocese of Peoria was created in 1877 his appointment was recommended to the pope, and he was accordingly consecrated bishop of the new see on 1 May by Cardinal MclCloskey in the cathedral of New York. His administration has been marked by energy, and he has had signal success in developing the resources of his diocese. In 1877 it contained 75 churches, 51 priests, and about 45,000 Roman Catholics.

In 1887 there were 163 churches, 113 priests, 12 clerical students, 32 religious institutions, 9 academies, 41 parochial schools, an orphan asylum, and 5 hospitals. Bishop Spalding has given much attention to the question of emigration, and his efforts have attracted numerous emigrants to the west. He has also labored successfully to establish a Roman Catholic periodical. Plans for carrying out this enterprise were adopted by the council of Baltimore in 1884. He is a contributor to Roman Catholic periodicals and reviews and the author of a "Life of Archbishop Spalding" (New York, 1872); "Essays and Reviews" (1876); "Religious Mission of the Irish People" (1880); and "Lectures and Discourses" (1882).

His widow, Catherine, first sister of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, b. in Charles county, Md., 23 Dec., 1793; d. in Louisville, Ky., 20 March, 1858, was left an orphan at the age of four, and was brought up by an aunt in Kentucky. In 1813 she became a member of a new society of Sisters of Charity, which had been instituted by the Rev. John Spalding. She was made superior, and, under the patronage of the bishop, opened the convent of Nazareth. In 1814 she established a boarding and day school near the convent, which increased rapidly in numbers and reputation. In 1816 the order was regularly organized, and Mother Spalding and two of her associates were allowed to take the ordinary vows. In 1819 John, bishop of Bardstown, who established the Bethlehem day school, and in 1829 St. Vincent convent was founded in Union county. She opened St. Catherine's school in Scott county in 1828. It was afterward removed to Lexington, where it still exists, and is regarded as one of the community's most flourishing establishments. The Academy of the Presentation was opened in 1847, and in 1858 that of St. Matthew. Mother Spalding took personal charge. She also began the founding of St. Vincent's orphan asylum, in which afterward provision was made for 200 orphan girls, and opened an infirmary. The rest of her life was spent principally in caring for the wants of orphan children, or in visiting the poor and sick of the city. The illness of which she died was contracted while she was hastening through the snow to aid a poor family that lived at some distance from the asylum. Mother Spalding belonged to a family that is distinguished in the annals of the Roman Catholic church in the United States. She was nearly related to Archbishop Spalding and Archbishop Holder.
1852 he entered political life as a Free-soiler, and he was one of the organizers of the Republican party. He was a member of congress in 1863-’9, where he served on important committees, but he subsequently declined all political honors. Judge Spalding exercised an important influence in restoring the Masonic order to its former footing and in the appointment of William M. Morehouse, governor of Pennsylvania, Brooklyn signing vols... followed 24 twenty-three (Boston, militia, large Brooklyn, the June. After the conclusion of the war he resumed those visits to the Indian country in which he had always taken a particular delight, and baptized several converts. In 1760 Zinzendorf died, and Spangenberg was called to Europe in order to assist in the government of the Unitas Fratrum according to the new constitution. He took his seat in the chief executive board, of which body he was the president, for twenty-three years. He lived to be eighty-eight years of age, and his episcopate continued for forty-eight years. Span-enberg was a large man, a great soldier, and a great power, and yet as a Christian humble as a little child. His presence was commanding; his countenance showed the nobility of his character and the love of an overflowing heart. Among his numerous works the most important are “Idea Fidei Fratrum” (Barby, 1782; translated into English by La Trobe under the title “Exposition of Christian Doctrine,” London, 1784); “Darlegung richtiger Antworten” (Leipsic, 1751), and “Schluss-Schrift.” (1758); two polemical works in defence of Zinzendorf; and “Leben des Grafen von Zinzen- dorf” (3 vols, Barby, 1772-4; abridged English translation, London, 1885). There are two biogra-phies of Spangenberg, Jeremiah Risler’s “Leben Spangenbergs” (Barby, 1794), and Carl F. Leder- rope’s “Leben A. G. Spangenberg, Bischofs der Brüdergemeinde” (Heidelberg, 1846; French trans-lation, Toulonse, 1850; English, London, 1855).

SPARHAWK, Frances Campbell, author, b. in Amesbury, Mass., about 1858. Her education was received in private schools. The poet Whittier was an early and intimate friend of her father, Dr. Thomas Sparhawk. She has published a large number of poems, of which “A Lazy Man’s Work” (New York, 1881); “Little Polly Blatchley” (Boston, 1887); and “Miss West’s Class in Geography” (1887).

SPARKMAN, James Truslow, reformer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 27 Sept., 1842. He was educated at Brooklyn polytechnic institute and at Tarrytown institute, after which he followed a special course of commercial training. In 1861 he entered into business with his father, James D. Sparkman, who was a large importing merchant, with whom he continued in business throughout the Civil war. Mr. Sparkman has been active in politics, although not holding office, and his opinion and counsel are valued by the leaders of the Democratic party. In recent years he has advocated various measures of reform, notably the labor-day bill, the half-holiday bill, the small-parks bill, and the tenement-house reform bill, and has been highly successful in preparing the passage of measures of reformatory legislation. He secured the commutation of the sentence of the Thieß hoyscotters, who were imprisoned for a long period at a time when public feeling was bitter against them. Mr. Sparks had contributed to various periodicals.

SPARKS, Jared, historian, b. in Wilmington, Conn., 10 May, 1789; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 14 March, 1866. He obtained in 1809 a scholarship in Phillips Exeter academy, through the influence of Rev. Abiel Abbott, and, after remaining two years, entered Harvard, where he also began a scholarship, which he supplemented by teaching during a part of the year. While employed in a private school at Havre de Grace, Md., in 1813, he served in the militia against the British, who captured and burned the town. After his graduation in 1815 he taught a classical school at Lancaster, Mass., but he returned to the university in 1817 to study divinity, and for the two years that he was there he was tutor in mathematics and natural philosophy in the college and editing the "North American Review." In May, 1819, after the completion of his theological studies, he was ordained pastor of a new Unitarian church in Baltimore, Md. He took part in the doctrinal controversy with orthodox theologians. In 1821 he was chosen chaplain of the National house of representatives. He edited in 1821-3 a monthly periodical called the "Unitarian Miscellany and Christian Monitor," in which he printed letters addressed to Rev. Samuel Miller on the "Comparative Moral Tendency of Unitarian and Unitarian Doctrines" that were afterward expanded and republished in a volume (Boston, 1823). He resigned his pastorate in Baltimore in 1823 on account of impaired health, and, after a journey in the western states, returned to Boston and purchased the "North American Review," in which he published a series of articles from January, 1824, till April, 1831. He undertook in 1825 the task of collecting and editing the writings of George Washington, and, after examining the papers in the public archives of the thirteen states of the continental federation, he secured possession, through an arrangement with Bushrod Washington and Chief-Justice John Marshall, of the papers of Gen. Washington that were preserved at Mount Vernon. In 1828 he went to Europe for the purpose of transcribing documents in the government archives at London and at Paris. Several years later he made a second journey to Europe, and, in his renewed researches among the French archives, discovered the map with the red line marked upon it, concerning which, and the use made of it in settling the question of the northeastern boundary in 1842, there was much debate, both in this country and in England. Mr. Sparks was the originator and first editor of the "American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge" (Boston, 1830-61). He was professor of ancient and modern history at Harvard from 1839 till 1849, and president of the college from February, 1849, till February, 1853, when he resigned on account of failing health. He devoted his last years to a work on the "History of the American Revolution," which he left unfinished. He received the degree of L.L.D. from Harvard in 1843, and was a member of many learned societies. The first volume that Dr. Sparks published was "Letters on the Ministry, Ritual, and Doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church," in reply to a sermon of Rev. William E. Watt directed against Unitarian doctrines (Baltimore, 1820). His sermon before the house of representatives on the death of William Pinkney was printed (Washington, 1829) and he returned in Baltimore, and continued in Boston, the publication of a "Collection of Essays and Tracts in Theology from Various Authors," with biographical and critical notices (6 vols., 1823-6). In 1837 he published, in the form of two letters to Judge Joseph Story, an account of the Washington papers at Mount Vernon, with a plan for their publication. His "Preface to John Ledyard" (Cambridge, 1828), which was translated into German (Leipsic, 1829). While engaged in collecting the public and private writings of President Washington, Sparks, by authority of congress, gathered and edited "The Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, being the Letters of Benjamin Franklin, Silas Deane, John Adams, and Henry Laurens, from the French, to the American ministers in Europe, ..." recast by the editor, Francis Dana, William Carmichael, Henry Laurens, John Laurens, and others, concerning the Foreign Relations of the United States during the Whole Revolution; together with the Letters in Reply from the Secret Committee of Congress and the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; also the Correspondence of the French ministers, in Letter and Correspondence with Congress (12 vols., Boston, 1829-30). He also wrote at this time "The Life of Gouverneur Morris" (3 vols., 1832). After nine years of preparatory labor he began the publication of "The Writings of George Washington, being his Correspondence, Addresses, Messages, and other Papers, Official and Private, selected and published from the Original Manuscripts, with a Life of the Author, Notes, and Illustrations" (12 vols., 1834-5). The first volume, containing the "Life of Washington," appeared in 1837, and was reissued separately (Boston, 1839). An abridgment by the author was also published (2 vols., Boston, 1843). Those parts of the correspondence that were of interest to the French public, with the biography in French, were published in more condensed form as "Vie et correspondance, écrits de Washington," with an introductory discourse by François P. G. Guizot on the influence and character of Washington in the American Revolution (6 vols. and atlas, Paris, 1839-40). The first volume of the correspondence was reprinted in London, but found no sale. An English publisher issued the "Personal Memoirs and Diaries of George Washington," with the name of Jared Sparks on the title-page, though without his authorization (2 vols., London, 1839). Friedrich von Raumer made a German translation of the biography, with extracts from the writings (Leipsic, 1839). Historians and critics generally accorded praise to Sparks for the thoroughness and accuracy of his work; yet his manner of refining and language were objected to by many, his digressions and suppressing objectionable words and passages drew upon him the unfriendly criticism of Lord Mahon, who charged the editor not only with omissions, but with substituting and interpolating passages, afterward withdrawing the latter part of the charge. Mr. Sparks, in a reply to Lord Mahon and others (1832), defended his mode of editing from Sparks: "Remarks on a Reprint of Washington's Letters" (1853). Sparks was the editor of "The Library of American Biography" (10 vols., Boston, 1834–7), containing twenty-six lives, to which a second series of thirty-four lives was added (15 vols., 1844–7). This work passed through many editions. Of the lives he wrote those of Ethan Allen, Benedict Arnold, Father Marquette, La Salle, John Adams, John Jay, and Eli Ledyard, the latter being reprinted from his previously published work. He edited also the "Works of Benjamin Franklin, with Notes and a Life of the Author" (10 vols., 1836–40). The first volume, containing Franklin's "Autobiography," with notes and a continuation by Mr. Sparks, was issued separately (1844). Besides his Remarks on American History (Boston, 1857), additions to William Smyth's "Lectures on Modern History" (Boston, 1841), and other minor works, his only other publication was "Correspondence of the American Revolution, being Letters of Eminent Men to George Washington from the Time of his taking Command of the Army to the End of his Presidency" (4 vols., 1853). He left manuscript journals, containing communications from Roman, James Madison, and other eminent men, and recorded conversations with many of them. His manuscript collection of original materials for American diplomatic history was given to Harvard college. See a "Memoir of Jared Sparks," by Brantz Mayer (Baltimore, 1857), and one by George E. Ellis (Cambridge, 1860).

SPAULDING, William Henry, author, b. on St. Simons' island, Ga., 16 Jan., 1800; d. in Marietta, Ga., 13 Jan., 1882. He was taken in infancy to his father's plantation in Greene county, and in his eighteenth year was sent to complete his education in Litchfield, Conn., where he subsequently studied law. On his return to Georgia he practised his profession and was a member of the legislature. In 1830 he removed to Natchez, Miss., engaged largely in sugar-planting, and about 1850 entered into a law partnership with Judah P. Benjamin in New Orleans, which was dissolved ten years later. He declined many public offices, once only accepting the nomination for U. S. senator from Louisiana, but withdrawing in favor of his friend, Alexander Barrow. He contributed largely to southern periodicals, and among other verses wrote "Somebody's Darling," "The Dying Year," and "The Old Church-Bell." He published "The Memories of Fifty Years" (Philadelphia, 1870; 4th ed., 1882), and left ready for the press a second volume; also "Father Anselmo's Ward," "Chilecuh," "The Woman with the Iron-Gray Hair," and other manuscripts.

SPARR ow, William, clergyman, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 12 March, 1801; d. in Alexandria, Va., 17 Jan., 1874. He was taken by his father to Ireland in 1803, where he remained until 1817. His education was obtained partly in that country, and was completed in his native land. He entered Columbia in 1819, and remained for three years, but was not graduated with his class. In 1822 he rejoined his family in Ohio. He engaged in teaching, first in Worthington, Ohio, then in Cincinnati, in Miami university as professor of ancient languages, and in 1825 as professor in the same department in Kenyon college, Ohio. He was ordained deacon in Columbus, Ohio, 7 June, 1826, by Bishop Philander Chase, and priest, 11 June, 1829, in Worthington, Ohio, by the same bishop. From this date onward he was occupied in parochial work in different parishes in Ohio, in editing a church paper, and in the duties of theological professor in Kenyon college. In 1840 he removed to Virginia and became professor in the Episcopal theological seminary at Alexandria, which post he held during the remainder of his life. He received the degree of D. D. from Kenyon college in 1838. Dr. Sparrow was evangelical after the pattern of Charles Simeon, Bishops Meade and Melvyn, and Dr. Bell. "He was an able and successful teacher and was a sermonizer of rare excellence. He published numerous addresses, sermons on special occasions, tracts on important topics, and the like. Two years after his death a volume was published containing his "Life and Correspondence," (Philadelphia, 1876), together with "Fragments," selected from his manuscript.

SPALDING, Edward, inventor, b. in Milf ord, N. H., 3 Sept., 1824. He was educated at the public school of his native town, and has since followed the trade of a blacksmith and machinist. Mr. Spalding has invented a graduated elliptic spring for carrying heavy loads that is applicable to horse-cars or to freight-cars for which he received in 1850 a medal of excellence at the American institute fair in New York city. He has also patented a wrought-iron shackle which is used in conjunction with his spring, and a magnetic and electric ear telephone for enabling the deaf to hear more readily. Among his other inventions is a process for keeping cider sweet in any climate without bottling or preserving in a cool place. He has taken out about ten patents in the United States and eleven in foreign countries.

SPALDING, Elbridge Gerry, banker, b. in Summer Hill, N. Y., 24 Feb., 1809; d. in Buffalo, May, 1897. He was a lineal descendant in the seventh generation of Edward Spalding, who came from England to Massachusetts soon after the arrival of the Puritans in the "Mayflower." His father, Edward, was a pioneer from New England to central New York. The son studied law in Batavia and Attica, N. Y., was admitted to practice in Genesee county, and soon afterward removed to Buffalo, N. Y. He was associated in practice with Heman B. Potter, George R. Babcock, and John Ganson. After accumulating a fortune in the practice of the law he gave his attention to banking, in which he had been equally successful. In causing the removal of the Farmers and Mechanics' bank of Batavia to Buffalo, and soon thereafter became its president. Upon the passage of the Federal banking-law the bank was reorganized under its provisions with the name of the Farmers and Mechanics' national bank, and Mr. Spalding as president and principal owner. He was largely identified with public affairs. He was mayor in 1847 and assemblyman in 1848, was a representative in congress in 1849–51, having been chosen as a Whig, was state treasurer in 1853, and again elected to congress as a Republican in 1858, serving till 1863. During his last term in congress Mr. Spalding achieved a wide reputation. He was a member of the ways and means committee, and chairman of the sub-committee that was intrusted with the duty of preparing legislative measures. The result was the presentation and passage of the Greenback or Legal-Tender act, and the National currency bank bill. Both of these were drawn by Mr. Spalding. They were offered and urged as war measures, and are claimed to be the best financial system that was ever conceived of or adopted. Mr. Spalding is entitled to the credit of formulating these measures and securing their adoption. By reason of his connection with this important legislation he has been called the "Father of Green-
Spaulding, Levi, missionary, b. in Jaffrey, N. H., 22 Aug., 1791; d. in Ceylon, 18 June, 1873. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1815, finished his theological course at Andover seminary three years later, and soon afterward was ordained at Salem, Mass. In 1829 he arrived as a missionary of the American board at Jaffna, Ceylon, where he labored fifty-four years, making but one visit to the United States during that period. In addition to his missionary labors, he superintended the Oodoo-ville boarding-school for girls and prepared tracts, hymns, and school-books in the Tamil language, many of the best lyrics in the vernacular hymn-book being from his pen. Among his principal works are a translation of "Pilgrim's Progress," a "Scripture History," a Tamil dictionary (Madras, 1844), an enlarged edition of an English and Tamil dictionary, "Notes on the Bible," and a revision of the Scriptures in Tamil. He was one of the most accurate Tamil scholars in southern India, using the language with great facility and power. Though he was very poor, he was called, celebrated the fifty-fourth anniversary of his embarkation at Boston for Ceylon, at which time he was the oldest missionary of the American board.

Spaulding, Nathan Weston, inventor, b. in the town of North Anson, Me., 24 Sept., 1829. At the age of thirteen he was taught the trade of a carpenter by his father, who was both a school-teacher and a practical mechanic. Afterward learning the trade of a millwright from an uncle and spending a year in a saw-factory, he had become at twenty the chief mechanic of his neighborhood. Going to California in 1851, he went at once to the mines, but did not succeed, and returned to the construction of one of the first quartz-mills in the state. Its success led to the erection of a second on the same stream—Mokelumne river. In 1859 he opened a saw-manufactory in Sacramento, where he began to develop an inventive talent in the line of his business and devised the adjustable saw-tooth that has made him widely known. The demand for these teeth became so great that Mr. Spaulding, finding it difficult to supply them in sufficient quantities, was compelled to contrive other devices, and finally brought out the chisel-bit saw-tooth. He has also completed and published a scale for the measurement of logs, which has been adopted as the legal standard in California and other states, as also in several territories. It is known as the Spaulding log-scale. In 1861 he removed his factory to San Francisco, and he has since taken part in the industrial development of California. In 1881 he was appointed by President Garfield to be assistant U. S. treasurer at San Francisco, which office he held until 29 Aug., 1885. During that period he received and disbursed, or safely kept, more than $290,000,000 without loss. He has twice served as mayor of Oakland, where he resides, and had been selected by Leland Stanford as a trustee of the Leland Stanford, Jr., university.

Spaulding, Solomon, clergyman, b. in Ashford, Conn., in 1761; d. in Amity, Washington co., Pa., 20 Oct., 1816. After serving in his youth in the Revolutionary army, and beginning to study law, he was graduated at Dartmouth in 1785, studied for the ministry, and preached in New England. In 1795 he settled in Cherry Valley, N. Y., where he entered into business with his brother, and four years later in Richfield, N. Y. In 1800 he removed to New Salem (now Connett), Ohio, and established an iron-foundry with Henry Lake. This enterprise proving unprofitable, on account of the war with Great Britain, he went to Pittsburg, and afterward to Amity, Pa., where he died. While residing at Connett, he wrote a romance entitled "The Manuscript Found," purporting to be an account of the original people of this continent, their customs, and conflicts between the different tribes. It pretended to be taken from a manuscript that had been discovered in an ancient mound. Mr. Spaulding read his manuscript to some of his friends in 1811-'12, and tried to get it published, but without success. In 1830 Mormon elders preached in northeastern Ohio, and their account of how the golden plates, from which the "Book of Mormon" was made, had been found, brought to mind the story written by Spaulding twenty years before. A suspicion was raised that the "Book of Mormon" might have been an outgrowth from the latter. This suspicion ripened into a general belief, and in time became the accepted theory of the origin of the Book of Mormon. It is alleged that Mr. Spaulding read Joseph Smith, Jr., his book, Rigdon's "History of the Church," and "Book of Mormon" from Spaulding's manuscript story, Rigdon having stolen it, or a copy of it, from a printing-office in which he worked in Pittsburg. In 1843 Dr. P. Hurlbut, who had been expelled from the Mormon church, obtained from the widow of Solomon Spaulding, Mrs. Matilda Davison, of Monson, Me., a manuscript that was otherwise known as the Rigdon copy of the Spaulding story, and the story was later Eber D. Howe, editor of the Painesville "Telegraph," compiled a book entitled "Mormonism Unveiled," which was a severe criticism on the "Book of Mormon" and its believers. This book was reproduced in 1840. Upon the title-page and in the last chapter is suggested the "probability that the historical account of the "Golden Book" narrated by the Reverend Mr. Spaulding." From the time Mr. Hurlbut obtained the manuscript story in 1834 up to 1884 its whereabouts was unknown to the world. In 1884 President James H. Fairchild, of Oberlin college, visited his old anti-slavery friend, Lewis L. Rice, of Honolulu, Hawaiian islands. Mr. Rice in 1839-40 succeeded Mr. Howe in the office of the Painesville "Telegraph," and the books and manuscripts came into his possession. President Fairchild asked Mr. Rice if he had among his old papers anything relating to the early anti-slavery movement which he would contribute to the Oberlin library. When examining for these he came upon "an old worn and faded manuscript of about 175 pages of small quarto," which proved to be the long-lost manuscript of Solomon Spaulding, containing the original manuscript made with the "Book of Mormon," and President Fairchild says: "The manuscript has no resemblance to the Book of Mormon" except in some very general features. There is not a name or an incident common to the two." A verbal copy of the manuscript has been issued by Mr. Fairchild at Lebanon, Ohio, and by E. B. Carpenter (Pittsburg, 1889); "New Light on Mormonism," by Ellen E. Dickinson (New York, 1885); and "Early Days of Mormonism," by J. H. Kennedy (New York, 1888).
and was settled over societies in Breverster and Rockport, Mass., but afterward removed to Boston, where he devoted many years to prison-reform, urging upon legislatures the adoption of measures for the benefit and reformation of convicts. He also visited prisons and took discharged convicts to his own home, sometimes six at a time, keeping them till they found employment. During the last epoch of the war, he contracted a disease which resulted in his death. His second wife, Catharine Swan Brown, is now (1896) writing his life. He published "Names and Titles of Christ" (Boston, 1842); "Essays on the Punishment of Death" (1844); "Plea for Discharged Convicts" (1844); and "Voices from Prison," a sequence of poems (1849). He edited "The Prisoner's Friend" (Boston, 1849-54), a monthly periodical, and was connected with several religious newspapers. His brother, John M., also devoted himself to the cause of prison-reform near Boston, and wrote "Labors for the Prisoner" (Boston, 1848); "Messages from the Superior State" (1852); "Twelve Discourses on Government" (1853); and "The Kingdom of God on Earth" (1857).

SPEAR, Ellis, commissioner of patents, b. in Warren, Knox co., Me., 10 Oct., 1834. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1858, entered the National army in August, 1863, as a captain of Maine volunteers, was promoted through the intermediate grades to colonel, and from October, 1863, till February, 1865, commanded a regiment in the Army of the Potomac. He was brevetted for his services at Peebles Farm, where he was in command of a brigade while holding the rank of major, subsequently received the brevet of colonel for gallantry in action, and on 9 April, 1865, that of brigadier-general. He served for a short time as inspector of division, and at the close of the war was in command of a brigade. He was mustered out in July, 1865. In November of that year he became an assistant examiner of railway and civil engineering in the U. S. patent-office. He was appointed examiner in 1868, examiner-in-chief in the same bureau in 1872, and assistant commissioner of patents in 1874. In 1876 he resigned and engaged in private business till January, 1877, when he was appointed commissioner of patents. He held his office till November, 1878, when he again resigned. He has since been in practice as an attorney and solicitor in patent cases.

SPEAR, Samuel Perkins, soldier, b. in Boston in 1815; d. in New York city, 5 May, 1875. He enlisted in the U. S. army in 1833, and served in the 2d dragoons in the Seminole war and through the Mexican campaign, in which he was wounded at Cerro Gordo. Subsequently he served on the plains against hostile Indians and in the Utah expedition, and was long sergeant-major of his regiment. In the beginning of the civil war he entered the volunteer army as lieutenant-colonel of the 11th Pennsylvania cavalry, his commission dating from 25 Sept., 1861. The regiment was raised as an independent body for scouting services, and was the result of the secretary of war, but in November, 1861, was incorporated in the Pennsylvania state organization. Spear became its colonel on 23 Aug., 1862. He commanded several expeditions during the war, was brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1863, received severe wounds at Five Forks, and resigned on 9 May, 1865.

SPEAR, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Dallas, Mass., 4 March, 1812; d. in Brooklyn, 1 April, 1891. He was graduated at a medical college in 1833, then studied for the ministry in Troy, N. Y., and was ordained in 1835. In the following year he was installed over the 2d Presbyterian church of Lansingburg, N. Y., from which he was called in 1843 to the South Presbyterian church of Brooklyn, N. Y., holding that pastorate till 1871, since which time he had been connected editorially with the "Independent." He has published several pamphlets: "Prison, New York, 1846; "Religion and State" (1874); "Constitutionality of the Legal Tender Acts" (revised ed., 1877); "The Law of the Federal Judiciary" (1853); "The Law of Extradition" (revised ed., 1884); and "The Bible Heaven" (1886). He also published in pamphlet-form eighteen sermons on the rebellion, delivered during the civil war, and ten essays contributed to periodicals. He had received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1851.

SPEECE, Conrad, clergyman, b. in New London, Va., 7 Nov., 1776; d. in Staunton, Va., 15 Feb., 1836. He labored on his father's farm till he was sixteen years old, then attended a grammar-school near his home, and finished his education at Liberty Hall (afterward Washington college). He studied law, entered practice, and while a taiper in Hampden Sidney college in 1799 became a Baptist preacher, but he was licensed in 1801 by the presbytery of Hanover. He was appointed to missionary work, with occasional pastoral charges, in eastern Virginia and Maryland and in the valley west of the Blue Ridge till 1813, when he became pastor of Augusta church, near Staunton, Va. Here Dr. Speece spent the remaining twenty-two years of his life. He was among the eminent preachers of the day, and of great influence in his denomination. He was also noted for his benefactions, and especially for his strenuous efforts to promote the temperance-reform. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1829. He published "The Mountaineer," a volume of essays written in 1813-16 after the manner of "The Spectator," single sermons (1810-32); and hymns, the most important of which is "The Cross of Christ," in the general assembly's collection.

SPEED, James, lawyer, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., 11 March, 1812; d. there, 25 June, 1857. He was graduated at St. Joseph's college, Bardstown, Ky., in 1829, studied law at Transylvania, and began practice at Louisville. His ancestors were identified with that state from pioneer days, and were active participants in the best political life of the young commonwealth. Inheriting a repugnance to every form of oppression and injustice, he was naturally opposed to slavery, and his well-known opinions on that subject prevented his taking any prominent part in political activities until the opening of the civil war. He was then nearly fifty years old, but he had established his reputation as a jurist, and was recognized even by those wholly opposed to him on the issues of the time as able, consistent, and upright. He also held at this time a chair in the law department of the University of Louisville. A powerful element in Kentucky strove to commit the state to the disunion cause, and against that element he exercised all his tal-

He was a Unionist state senator in 1861—3, mustering officer of U. S. volunteers in 1861 for the first call for 75,000 men, and U. S. attorney-general from 1864 till 1866, when he resigned from opposition to Andrew Johnson's administration. He was also a delegate to the Republican conventions of 1872 and 1876. His last appearance in public was in delivering an address on Lincoln before the Loyal league of Cincinnati, 4 May, 1857. In 1853 he returned to his law professorship.—His brother, Joshua Fry, merchant, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., 14 Nov., 1814; d. in Louisville, Ky., 29 May, 1882, was educated at the local schools and at St. Joseph's college, Bardstown. After leaving college he commenced business as a clerk in a mercantile house in Louisville. He next went to Springfield, Ill., where he kept a country store for seven years, and formed a close and lasting friendship with Abraham Lincoln, then a young man. He took a warm interest in public affairs, and for a time assisted in editing a newspaper, and had intimate association with men of widely different pursuits. He resigned in 1842 and engaged in farming in Jefferson county. In 1848 he was elected to the legislature, but was never again willing, though often solicited, to hold office. In 1851 he removed to Louisville, gaining a handsome fortune in the real-estate business. In 1861 he embraced with ardor the National cause, and was intrusted with many delicate and important missions by Mr. Lincoln. He was frequently visited in Washington.—His nephew, John Gilmer, b. in 1852, was educated as a civil engineer, and held the office of assistant city engineer of Louisville. In 1876 he became connected with the transportation bureau of the United States at the world's fair held in Philadelphia, and later he went to New York city, where he joined the staff of the "World," and was successively its managing editor and publisher. Mr. Speed was commissioner-general of the Louisville American exhibition, and in 1885 became its secretary. He has contributed to periodicals.

SPEER, William, missionary, b. in New Alexandria, Pa., 24 April, 1822. He was graduated at Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1844, and received the degree of A.B. from the University of Pittsburgh, Pa., and divinity at the Presbyterian theological seminary, Alleghany City. He was licensed to preach in 1846, and in the same year was sent with two colleagues by the Presbyterian board of foreign missions to establish their first mission in Canton, China. He devoted himself specially to hospital work and tract under his father, a 90, having lost his wife and child, and with failing health, he returned home. In 1852 he was sent on a mission to the Chinese in California, as the first preacher in their own tongue. He soon established a Chinese school, opened a dispensary, lectured on the Chinese in various towns, and largely from the funds thus obtained built a brick mission-house. He organized the first Chinese Christian church in the New World. He founded, and maintained for two years, "The Oriental," a religious and secular paper in Chinese and English devoted to the interests of the emigrants. He greatly influenced religious bodies and thinking people toward throwing open to the Chinese the benefits of Christian civilization. His efforts led to the repeal of the legislative act of 1854—5, designed to exclude the Chinese from the mines. After devoting five years to this mission he was again obliged to go in quest of health. In 1865 he was called to Philadelphia, to be corresponding secretary of the board of education, which he aided in reorganizing, a measure which resulted from the reunion of the two branches of the church, which took place in 1869. In connection with his duties on the board of education he prepared a series of publications, some of which are of permanent value. Reinquishing his educational labors in 1876, Dr. Speer travelled in Japan and China, and has since served the cause of missions on both continents. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him in 1866. His works include "China and the United States" (Hartford, Conn., 1870); "The Great Revival of 1860" (Philadelphia, 1872); "God's Rule for Christian Giving" (1875); and sermons, pamphlets, and reviews.

SPEIGHT, Jesse, senator, b. in Greene county, N. Y., 23 June, 1829; d. in New York city, 10 February, 1847. He received a public-school education, was a member of the lower house of the legislature in 1822, and in 1823—7 of the senate, presiding over both bodies. In 1829—37 he sat in congress, having been chosen as a Democrat, also serving in 1835 as a member of the convention to revise the constitution of North Carolina. Having moved to Alabama, in 1844, he was elected, as a Whig, to the legislature of that county in the legislature in 1839, serving as speaker, and in the senate in 1844, of which he was made president. In the latter year he was elected U. S. senator, serving until his death.

SPEIR, Samuel Fleet, surgeon, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 9 April, 1838; d. there, 19 Dec., 1895. He was educated at the Brooklyn polytechnic institute and at the medical department of the University of the city of New York, where he graduated in 1860, with three prizes. He received the prize essay gold medal from the American medical association in 1864. After spending two years in study abroad, chiefly in Paris, he settled in his native city, where he practised his profession. Dr. Speir was connected with various hospitals and dispensaries, and during the civil war served under the U. S. sanitary commission. He had contributed to professional literature and was the inventor of a new method of arresting surgical hemorrhage by artery-constriction, for which he received a prize from the State medical society in 1871, and a new method for the differential diagnosis of diseases of the stomach, based on the examination of minute specimens.

SPELMAN, Henry, colonist, b. in England about 1595; d. in Virginia in 1628. He was a son of Sir Henry Speelman, the antiquary, and came to Virginia in 1609. About 1614 he was one of a party under Capt. Ratcliff, a councillor for Jamestown, who were sent in search of provisions for the colony. Deceived by the treachery of Powhatan, Ratcliff and his party were slain, two only escaping. Henry, who was saved by Pocahontas, lived several years among the Indians, when he was rescued from Jopasus, the brother of Powhatan, by another party that had sailed up the Potomac for corn. Having acquired the Indian language during his captivity, he was of great use to his countrymen as interpreter till he was killed by the savages in 1622. He left in manuscript a "Relation of Virginia." It was first owned by Dawson Turner, and bought by Lilly, the bookseller, in whose hands it remained ten years. Henry Stevens then bought it for James F. Hunnewell, of Charlestown, Mass., who had a small edition printed privately (London, 1873).

SPENCER, John, b. in Scotland in 1769; d. in Dumfries, Va., 15 May, 1829. He was educated by private tuition, and in 1785 he came to this country, settling in Dumfries, Va., as a private tutor, and, having regained his health, entered upon the practice of medicine in 1791. He was active in introducing vaccination into the United States, and acquired distinction in his profession. The University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of M. D. in 1828. His correspondence with Dr. Benjamin Rush in 1806 was published in the "Medical Museum of Philadelphia." He also contributed to the "Medical Repository" and the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences," and left several manuscripts on medical subjects.

SPENCER, John Selby, senator, b. near Snow Hill, Worcester co., Md., 29 Feb., 1788; d. near Berlin, Worcester co., Md., 24 Oct., 1840. His ancestors came to Snow Hill from Scotland about 1680. He was educated at district schools in Worcester and Somerset counties, received his medical degree from the University of Pennsylvania about 1809, and practised his profession in Maryland until his death. After serving in the legislature he was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 3 March, 1825, and again from 5 Dec., 1831, till 2 March, 1833. He was elected U. S. senator to succeed Robert H. Goldsborough, serving from 1 Jan., 1837, till his death, which occurred at the country-seat of his family near Berlin.—His brother A. S. served in the legislature, and was chief justice of the 4th judicial circuit of Maryland, comprising the lower counties; and another brother, living, was the author of "Early History of the Presbyterian Church" (Philadelphia, 1839).—His nephew, Thomas Adam, lawyer, b. in Accomac county, Va., 20 Feb., 1819; d. in Washington, D. C., 10 Nov., 1877, was graduated at the University of the United States, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Snow Hill, Md. He was elected a representative to congress as a Whig and served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1845. In 1872-7 he was assistant attorney-general for the U. S. post-office department.

SPENCE, Robert Traill, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., about 1785; d. near Baltimore, Md., 26 Sept., 1827. He became a midshipman in the U. S. navy in 1800, and was serving under Decatur on the captured Tripolitan gun-boat, "No. 8," when, on 7 Aug., 1804, she was blown up by a hot shot that was sent through her magazine. After the explosion, with her stern blown to pieces and under water, Spence kept on loading the long 29-pounder gun forward, fired it, and, with his sword in one hand, was led astride his piece and waving his cap, went down into the water, but was rescued. His father, Kieth Spence, purser of the U. S. frigate "Philadelphia" when she grounded and was captured, as a prisoner in Tripoli was witness of his son's valor. Robert was made a lieutenant in 1807 and master-commandant in 1813. He was highly commended for his conduct in the defense of the Seneca and the incumbrance in laying obstructions in the way of the British fleet off Baltimore, 30 Sept., 1814, and was made a post-captain in 1815 at the age of twenty-seven. In 1822, on the "Cyan," as the senior American naval officer in the West Indies, he issued a protest against Francisco Morales, who had threatened death to Americans in the Spanish Main—an act as much applauded at home as it was effective at the time and place of danger. In Africa he built the first fort for the British in the country, and was ordered to command the West India fleet in 1826, but died before sailing.—Capt. Spence's sons, Carroll and Charles Lowell Stewart, were afterward in the diplomatic service of the United States, the former being minister to Turkey under President Pierce, and the other secretary of legation, and afterward envoy to Persia. His sister became the mother of John R. Lowell.

SPENCER, Asa, soldier, b. in Salisbury, Conn., in September, 1747; d. in Fort Covington, N. Y., 1828. The first ancestor of the Spencer family, William, came from England to Cambridge, Mass., in 1631, and again in 1633 with his brothers, Thomas and Jared. William and Thomas were among the first settlers of Hartford, Conn., the former being a land proprietor, a select-man of the town, and in 1639 a deputy to the General Court of Connecticut. He prepared the first revision of the laws of that colony, and died in Hartford in 1640. His descendant in the fifth generation, Asa, served throughout the war of the Revolution. and was under Gen. Anthony Wayne at the storming of Stony Point. He early espoused the principles of Democracy under Thomas Jefferson.—His son, James Bradley, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 26 April, 1781; d. in Fort Covington, N. Y., 26 March, 1848, was an early settler of Franklin county, N. Y., raised a company for the war of 1812, and served as captain in the 29th U. S. infantry at Plattsburg. Subsequently he was county judge and surrogate, and held other local offices in Fort Covington, served in the legislature in 1851-2, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1839. Another son, Amher Peck, settled with his father and brother at Fort Covington, was captain in the 29th U. S. infantry in 1812, and, remaining in the army, was appointed military governor of Arkansas.—James Bradley's son, James Clark, jurist, b. in Fort Covington, Franklin co., N. Y., 10 May, 1815; d. in Ogdensburg, N. Y., 1848, and practised in his native town and in Ogdensburg until 1865, serving as U. S. district attorney for four years. He then removed to New York and entered into partnership with Charles A. Rapallo. From 1809 till 1872 he was a judge of the superior court of New York, afterward practising law until 1883, when he was appointed an associate justice of the court of appeals of New York. After the death of his father he was his successor in his seat in the legislature, and in 1872, when he was re-elected for four years. He was the author of a bill, which became a law, to abolish capital punishment in all cases except those of treason and murder, substituting imprisonment and hard labor. He also secured the erection of a state prison near New York city. In 1796 he was appointed assistant attorney-general of the Columbia and the adjoining counties, and in 1892-4 he was attorney-general of the state. In 1804 he became a justice of the supreme court, of which he was chief justice from 1819 till 1823. In 1808 he was chosen by the legislature, with Peter J. Munro, to prepare and report such reforms in the chancery
system of the state as they should deem expedient.
Judge Spencer possessed energy, resolution, and high legal attainments, and was a master of equity jurisprudence. He served as a presidential elector in 1809. He was the warm friend of De Witt Clinton, but separated from him on the question of the war of 1812, and in that year was active in the struggle to prevent the charter of the six-million bank. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1821. After he resumed the practice of law in Albany he held various local offices, and was mayor of the city. In 1822 he was then elected to congress, serving from 7 Dec., 1829, till 3 March, 1831, and during his term unit-ized with William Wirt and other philanthropists in devoting to arrest the injustice of the government toward the Cherokees. In 1839 he removed to Lyons, N. Y., where he engaged in agriculture.
He was president of the Whig national convention in Baltimore in 1844. The University of Pennsyl-svania gave him the degree of L.D. in 1849 and Harvard the same in 1851. His last public act was to address a letter to his fellow-citizens in opposition to a proposed amendment to the constitution providing for an elective judiciary with brief terms of office. His decisions are contained in the "New York Supreme Court Reports," 1811-9, edited by William Johnson (3 vols., New York, 1808-12), and "New York Chancery Reports" (1814-23). See
"Memorial" of Ambrose Spencer (Albany, 1849).

—His son, John Canfield, lawyer, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 8 Jan., 1788; d. in Albany, N. Y., 18 May, 1853, was graduated at Union college in 1806, and in 1807 became private secretary to Gov. Daniel D. Tompkins. He was admitted to the bar at Canandaigua in 1809, became master in chancery in 1811, judge-advocate general in the army on the northern frontier in 1812, district
ner of Canandaigua in 1814, and assistant atty-general for western New York in 1815. In that year he was also made district attorney. He was then elected to congress as a Demo-ocrat, serving from 1
Dec., 1817, till 3
March, 1819, and during his term was one of a committee to examine the affairs of the U. S. bank, and drew up its report. Fifteen years afterward, when Gen. Andrew Jackson was using this report against the bank, Mr. Spencer was found among its friends. In 1829-'3, he was a member of the state house of representatives, serving in the first year as speaker, and in 1824-'8 he was a member of the state senate, being a leader of the Clinton faction. In 1827 he was appointed by gov. De Witt Clinton one of the board to revise the statutes of New York, and took an important part in that task. Joining the anti-Masonic party, he was appointed special attorney-general to prosecute those that were connected with the abduction of William Morgan, but resigned in May, 1830, having involved himself in a controversy with Gov. Enos T. Throop. In 1832 he was again elected to the legislature, and in 1839-'40 he was secretary of state and superintendent of common schools. He was appointed U. S. secretary of war on 12 Oct., 1841, and on 3 March, 1845, was transferred to the treasury department, but, opposing the annexation of Texas, resigned on 2 May, 1844, and resumed the practice of law. He served on many state commissions and aided in the organization of the State asylum for idiots. In 1840 he was made a regent of Union college, which gave him the degree of L.L.D. in 1849. He published an edition of Henry Reeve's translation of De Toqueville's "Democracy in America," contributing a preface and notes (2 vols., New York, 1838), and also, with Asa Clapp, "Revision of the Statutes (New York, 1886).

pointed midshipman in the U. S. navy, 15 Nov., 1811, became lieutenant on 7 Dec., 1814, commander on 3 March, 1813, and captain, 22 Jan., 1841, and resigned on 9 Dec., 1843. He was acting lieutenant in Com. Thomas Macdonough's victory on Lake Champlain, 11 Sept., 1814. Another son of Ambrose, Theodore, clergymen, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 24 April, 1800; d. in Utica, N. Y., 14
June, 1870. He entered the U. S. military academy, but left it to study law, and began to practice in Auburn, N. Y., became district attorney for Canada county. Afterward he studied theology, was pastor of the 24 Congregational church in Rome, and preached also in Utica. retiring from active work, owing to impaired health, he was made secretary of the American home missionary society for central and northern New York. He was the author of "Studies in Law, and Theological Process Practically Delineated" (New York, 1854), and other theological works. —Thomas's descendant in the sixth generation, Ichabod Smith, clergymen,
b. in Rupert, Vt., 23 Feb., 1798; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 25 Nov., 1854, was graduated at Union in 1829 and was principal of the grammar-school in Connecticut during the migrations of 1832-3. He was professor of theology in Canandaigua, N. Y., until 1828. After studying theology he was licensed by the presbytery of Geneva in 1826, and on 11 Sept., 1828, was appointed colleague pastor, with the Rev. Solomon Williams, of the Congregational church in Northampton, Mass., remaining until 1832. He then became past-tor of the 21 Presbyterian church of Brooklyn, N. Y., which charge he held until his death. From 1836 till 1840 he was professor extraordinary of biblical history in Union theological seminary,
New York, of which institution he was a founder.
In 1830 he was offered the presidency of the University of Alabama and in 1842 that of Hamilton.
The latter college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1841. His best-known publication is his "Pastor's Sketches," which passed through many editions, and was republished in England and France (2 series, New York, 1850-73. After his death appeared "Sermons," with a memoir by the Rev.
James M. Sherwood (2 vols., 1856); "Sacramental Discourses" (1861); and "Evidences of Divine Revelation" (1866). Jared's descendant in the fourth generation, Joseph Crandall, son of Joshed, Conn., in 1714; d. there, 13 Jan., 1789, joined the northern army in 1778, and was major in the 21 Connecticut regiment under Col. Nathaniel Whiting. He served as lieutenant-colonel in the two following campaigns, rose to the rank of colonel, and was one of the eight brigadier-generals appointed by congress at the instance of Gen. Washington on 23 June, 1778. Taking offence when Gen. Israel Putnam, a younger officer, was appointed over him, he was about to retire from the army, but, deciding to remain, served near Boston until its evacuation, and then marched with his division to the defence of New York. On 9 Aug., 1778, he was appointed major-general, and opposed the evacuation of New York. In 1780, he commanded at Yorktown, and in 1781 took command at Rhode Island, which was surrounded by Admiral Sir Peter Parker. The British army having taken possession of Newport, Gen. Spencer assembled a large force at Providence, but the enterprise proved a failure, and, after remaining in the vicinity for several weeks, the militia was dismissed. Gen. Spencer was censured for the failure of this expedition, but a court of inquiry attributed the result to forces beyond his control. He resigned on 14 June, 1778, in consequence of an order of congress to inquire into the reasons for his failure, and afterwards appeared but little in public life.—His brother, Ephraim, clergyman, b. in East Haddam, Conn., 12 Feb., 1721; d. in Trenton, N. J., 37 Dec., 1784, was graduated at Yale in 1746, and, with a view to becoming connected with the Indians of the Six Nations, studied their dialect and prepared himself for this office under the Rev. John Brainerd and Jonathan Edwards, accompanying the latter to the Indian conference in Albany in 1748. He was ordained on 14 Sept., 1748, and, after laboring in western New York, was appointed pastor of the Presbyterian church in Elizabeth, N. J., in 1750, holding this charge until 1756, when he was transferred to the Presbyterian church of Jamaica, L. I. About 1758 he was appointed by Gov. James De Lancey chaplain of the New York troops that were forming for service in the French war, after which he labored in the contiguous congregations of Shrewsbury, Middletown Point, Shark River, and Amboy, N. J. In 1754 he was sent by the synod of New York and Philadelphia with the Rev. Alexander McWhorter on a mission to organize the irregular congregations of North Carolina, which district they again visited in 1757 at the request of the Provincial congress of that colony. As he had contributed to the cause of independence, the Tories were embittered toward him, and on one occasion burned books and papers of his that had a disputed title. On his death, which occurred in 1767, it was reported that at his death he was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Trenton, N. J. He was frequently called "Ready money Spencer," from his facility in extempore address. From 1752 until his death he was a guardian of Princeton college. The University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of D. D. in 1782. In 1759 he wrote a letter to the Rev. Edward Kidder, president of Yale College, "The State of the Dissenting Interest in the Middle Colonies of America," which was published and attracted attention.

SPENCER, Aubrey George, colonial Anglican bishop, b. in London, England, 12 Feb., 1705; d. in Torquay, England, 24 Feb., 1782. He was the eldest son of William Reresby, who was born in England as a member of a county family, and his brother, George Trevor, was bishop of Madras in 1837-49, and chancellor of St. Paul's cathedral, London, in 1860. After receiving his education at Oxford he held several curacies in England, and was appointed archdeacon of Bermuda in 1824, bishop of Newfoundland in 1839, and bishop of Jamaica, 1843. He published a volume of "Sermons on Various Subjects" (London, 1827), and numerous fugitive poems.

SPENCER, Cornelia Phillips, author, b. in Harlem, N. Y., 20 March, 1827. She is the daughter of the Rev. James Phillips (q. v.), who was professor of mathematics in the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. She was educated there, and married James M. Spencer, of Alabama, who died in 1861. Mrs. Spencer has contributed to current literature, and is the author of "The Last Night of the Confederacy," 1865, "Rainbow Days" (1884), and now (1898) writing a "History of North Carolina."

SPENCER, Francis Elias, jurist, b. in Ticonderoga, Essex co., N. Y., 25 Sept., 1834. When he was twelve years of age his parents removed to Plainfield, Ill. Hearing exciting accounts of the wealth that was to be acquired in California, he removed to that state in 1852 and located at San Jose, where he has since resided. Soon after his arrival he began the study of the law, was admitted to the bar in 1858, and soon secured an extensive practice. In 1861 he was elected district attorney of Santa Clara county, which office he filled until March, 1866. Desiring to make a specialty of land practice, he studied the Spanish language and made himself thoroughly familiar with the legislation of Spain and Mexico, and acquired a large and valuable practice. In 1867 he was elected to the lower branch of the legislature as a Republican, and was made chairman of the judiciary committee. In that capacity he was of great assistance to his colleagues in shaping the code legislation of the session. At its close he retired from political life. In 1879 he was elected to the bench of the superior court of Santa Clara county, where he still (1898) remains. For a number of years he was a member of the board of fund commissioners of the city of San Jose, and was mainly instrumental in settling its title to the large body of its Pueblo lands. He has recently been appointed a trustee of the Leland Stanford, Jr., university, California.

SPENCER, Frederick R., artist, b. in London, Madison co., N. Y., 27 Jan., 1806; d. in Wampsville, N. Y., 3 April, 1875. He had some instruction at the American academy, New York, and about 1830 settled in that city. In 1837 he was elected an associate of the National academy, and in 1846 he became an academicians. His portraits were generally successful, and he had many well-known sitters, among them Robert E. Linnitz, Thomas Thompson, and Zadock Pratt. He was a member of the National academy, and died 8 July, 1875.

SPENCER, George Eliiphaz, senator, b. in Jefferson county, N. Y., 1 Nov., 1836; d. in Washington, 19 Feb., 1893. He was educated in Montev, and was admitted to the Iowa bar in 1856. Two years later he was secretary of the Iowa senate, and in October, 1862, he entered the National army as assistant adjutant-general, with the rank of captain. In the autumn of 1863 he recruited the 1st Alabama cavalry, of which he became colonel, and during Gen. William T. Sherman's march to the sea he commanded a brigade of cavalry under Gen. Judson Kilpatrick in the Army of the Tennessee. He received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1863, and resigned from the army on adjutant-general, with the rank of captain. He published a volume of "The Personal Property of Bankrupts" (New York, 1873), and was appointed register in bankruptcy for the 4th district of Alabama, and he was also chosen U. S. senator from that state as a Republican, serving with re-election from 23 July, 1868, till 3 March, 1879. After he had left the senate he was active in the prosecution that led to the exposure of the star-route frauds, and in furthering the legislation that resulted therefrom. In 1879 he published a volume of "Great Cest, and numerous fugitive poems.

Spencer in 1862. She published "Our, the Lost Wife" (Philadelphia, 1884); "Tried and True, a Story of the Rebellion" (Springfield, 1867); and "Spice and Shadow, 1838-1863," Gelett Burgess. His wife, William Loring, b. in St. Augustine, Fla., is a niece of Gen. William W. Loring, and daughter of Albert A. Nunez. She is said to have been "Major," perhaps because of her masculine name. She married Gen. Spencer in 1877. She has published "Salt-Lake Fruit" (Boston, 1883); "Story of Mary" (New York, 1884; republished as "Dennis Day, Carpet-Bagger," New York, Platt & Seymour, 1885); and "Plucky Olive, or the Story of Gretchen Jane" (1887).

SPENCER, Jesse Ames, clergyman, b. in Hyde Park, N. Y., 17 June, 1816; d. in Passaic, N. J., 2 Sept., 1898. His family removed to New York, where he entered a printing-office in 1839, and in two and a half years mastered the compositor's art. For several years he was assistant to his father, who was a city surveyor. He was graduated at Columbia in 1857, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in 1849. While a student he was actively engaged in Sunday-school work in what was then a new part of the city. He was ordained deacon, 28 June, 1840, by Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk, and priest, 28 July, 1841 by the same bishop. He was elected rector of the church in Independence and Trinity, and was in his parish his health failed, and he spent a winter in Nice, on the Mediterranean. On returning he was occupied in educational and various literary pursuits. A return of illness led to his going abroad again, and in 1848-9 he travelled in Europe, Egypt, and the Holy Land. He was chosen to be secretary and editor of the General Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Society in 1851, and served in that capacity until 1857. He accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's church, Flatbush, N. Y., 1853, which post he held for two years. He was elected professor of the Greek language and literature in the College of the city of New York in 1859, and discharged the duties of this department for ten years of active service, with two recesses. He was in 1866 the first point custodian of the Standard Bible, and has devoted his time to authorship, editing, and teaching. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1852, and from Trinity in 1872. Dr. Spencer has published "The Christian instruction in the Ways of the Gospel and the Church" (New York, 1844); "History of the Reformation in England" (1845); "The East: Sketches of Travel in Egypt and the Holy Land" (1850); "History of the United States from the Earliest Period to the Death of President Lincoln" (4 vols., 1856-69); "Greek Praxis" (1870); "The Young Ruler who had Great Possessions, and other Discourses" (1871); "A Course of English Reading" (1873); "Sketch of the History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States" (1878); and "Five Last Things, Studies in Eschatology" (1887). He edited "The New Testament in Greek, with Critical and Exegetical Notes on the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles" (New York, 1847); "Caesar's Commentaries, with Copious Notes and Lexicon" (1818); the "Arnold Series of Greek and Latin Books" (1846-59); "Richard Chevix's Troubles, the Poems of" (1850); "Xenophon's Anabasis," from the manuscripts of Alphons Crosby (1855); and "Origen's Works," vol. iv. in "Ante-Nicene Library" (Buffalo, 1885).

SPENCER, Sara Andrews, reformer, b. in Savona, Steuben co., N. Y., 21 Oct., 1837. Her maiden name was Andrews. After graduation at the normal school of St. Louis, Mo., in 1856, she taught until she married Henry C. Spencer, a son of Platt R. Spencer, in 1864 and removed to Washington, D. C. On 14 April, 1869, she and seventy-two other women of Washington attempted to register and vote, but were refused. She then brought suit in the supreme court of the District, and Judge David K. Carter's decision that "women are citizens but have not the right to vote without local legislation" was reaffirmed by the U. S. supreme court in 1874. In 1871-2 Mrs. Spencer defeated the pending bill in Congress, and in 1876 she secured a bill from the District of Columbia legislature for the reform of outcast girls, and she was also the author of a bill in congress for a girls' reform-school (1876). From 1874 till 1881 she was secretary of the National woman suffrage association, which she represented at the Republican presidential convention in Cincinnati in 1876, and delivered an address. She also engrossed and signed the woman's declaration of rights, presented at the Centennial celebration in Philadelphia. In 1871-6 she was president of the District of Columbia woman franchise association, and is general secretary of the Charity organization society of the District of Columbia. She has published "Problems on the Woman Question" (Washington, 1871), and "Thirty Lessons in the English Language" (1873).

SPENCER, Thomas, physician, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., in 1793; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 May, 1857. From 1833 till 1850 he was professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Geneva (now Hobart) college, N. Y., and subsequently he held chairs in medical colleges in Chicago and Philadelphia. Dr. Spencer served as surgeon in the American navy. He was a strong advocate of the presidential election in 1800, and was a member of the board of trustees of the New York medical association, and was the author of "Practical Observations on Epidemic diarrhoea known as cholera" (Utica, 1832); "Introductory Lecture at Medical Institute of Geneva College" (1842); "Lectures on Vital Chemistry, or Animal Heat" (Geneva, 1844-5); and a paper on "The Atomic Theory of Life and Vital Heat," in "Memoir of Dr. Spengel," by Sylvester D. Willard, M. D. (Albany, 1858).

SPIKER, William Francis, naval officer, b. in New York city, 7 Feb., 1829; d. in the Boston navy-yard, 29 Nov., 1878. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 21 June, 1839, attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1843-5, and became a passed midshipman, 2 July, 1845. He cruised in the Mediterranean, 1845-56, as "Memorandum of Dr. Spengel," on the Mexican war in 1846-8, participating in the capture of Tuxpan, and was promoted to master, 26 June, 1853, and, lieutenant, 25 Feb., 1854. His first service during the civil war was in the steam frigate "Niagara" in 1861. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and commander, 2 Jan., 1863, served in the North Atlantic blockade squadron in command of the steamer "Cambridge," and took part in the attacks on Fort Fisher in 1863-5. He was commissioned captain, 22 April, 1870, and commanded the monitor "Dictator" in 1874-5 during the threatened war with Spain on account of the "Virginiss" affair, after which he was at the rendezvous at Boston in 1875-6. He was made commodore, 25 April, 1877, and was commandant of the Boston navy-yard until his death. He was well known as a poet and musician, and was the author of the several of valuable tracts, among which are "Absent Friends and You, Mary," "The Gale," "Manhattan's Dear Isle," "Ah, who can tell?" "The Commodore's Return," "Death at Sea," "Coming Home," "All Hands, up Anchor," "The Old Relief," "Off Selly's Isles," "Adeline," "Maurice," "The Norfolk Girls," "The Date of 39," and "The Vixen" (1868).

SPIELBERGEN, George Frederick, theologian, b. in Elk Ridge Landing, Howard co., Md., 17 Nov., 1844. He was graduated at Baltimore city college in 1863, and studied in Gettysburg theological seminary and in the Lutheran seminary in Philadelphia, where he was graduated in 1867. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry by the ministerium of Pennsylvania. He received the degree of D. D. in 1887, from Rochester Seminary, Salem, Va. In 1864 he was called to the professorship of German in the Philadelphia theological seminary, which post he occupied till 1866. Immediately after his graduation there he was called to the professorship of German in the Keystone state normal school, Kutztown, where he remained in 1867-8. On his removal thither he became pastor of the Lutheran congregation in and near Kutztown, which he served till 1888. Since October, 1888, he has been the pastor of St. Michael's Lutheran congregation, Allentown, Pa. He has been professor of Hebrew in Muhlenberg college, Allentown, since 1887, president of his board of trustees since 1886, and examiner in doctrinal theology of the ministerium of Pennsylvania since 1882. He is an occasional contributor to periodicals, and was associate editor of the "Lutheran Church Review," Philadelphia, in 1883-5. He has published "Hutter's Compend of Lutheran Theology," translated, with Dr. Henry E. Jacobs (Philadelphia, 1869), and "Wildenhahn's Martin Luther," translated from the German (1888).

SPIELBERGEN, George (speel-bar-geen). Dutch navigator, b. in Muiden, in 1557; d. in Amsterdam, 23 Jan., 1621. He had acquired reputation as a pilot, and commanded in 1601 an expedition to explore the coast of Africa and the Indies, and in 1614 he was given charge of a fleet of seven vessels, with orders to reach the Indies by the Strait of Magellan. Sailing from Texel, 8 Aug., 1614, he ravaged the coast of Brazil, and, after several engagements with the Portuguese, he wintered upon the Patagonian coast. On 7 March, 1615, he sighted the Cape of the Virgins, but was driven back by winds and currents, and entered the Strait of Magellan, 1 April, and the Pacific on 6 May, after the loss of a vessel. After touching at Chiloé, he landed on the island of Santa María, where he destroyed the Spanish establishments. He attacked engagements with the Portuguese, and was joined by a fleet of six vessels near Callao on 17 July, and entered that port on 21 July, but went to the island of San Lorenzo for repairs. After trying to burn the city of Paita in December, he sailed for the Asiatic coast. He visited the Ladrones archipelago, and, after being defeated in the Philippine islands by Admiral Ronquillo, he arrived in Batavia, where he purchased the vessel Lemaire (q. v.), returning safely to Texel in August, 1618. SPIES, August Vincent Theodore, anarchist, b. in New York, N. Y., 7th of April, 1847; d. in Chicago, Ill., 11 Nov., 1887. In 1871 he came to the United States and learned the upholsterer's trade in Chicago. In 1876 he became interested in the labor movement, and the next year joined the Socialists. He became in 1880 publisher of the "Arbeiter-Zeitung," and in 1884 its editor and business manager. He was a ready writer and speaker, of good moral character, and had great influence with those of socialist tendencies. He first became well known by his connection with the labor troubles in Chicago in the spring of 1886. His paper advocated anarchism, and his speeches, when referring to the government and the customs of his adopted country, were bitter, denunciatory, and defamatory. After the Haymarket affair, the Labor Congress, which had closed most of the machine-shops and manufactories in Chicago, a crowd, estimated to contain 12,000 men, carrying the national flag reversed, assembled to wreak vengeance upon those that continued to work. An attack was made upon the latter. They were defended by the police, who shot five rioters, arrested eleven, and dispersed the mob, which an hour before was addressed by Spies from the top of a freight-car. Spies went to his office, incited a "Revenge Circular," which was printed and circulated, summoning the workmen to arms to destroy the police. Another one, calling a meeting for the next day at Haymarket square, urged workmen to come armed and in full force. In the evening a large crowd assembled, and were addressed by Spies and others, when 180 policemen advanced and the crowd was ordered to disperse, whereupon a bomb was thrown into the midst of the police and exploded. Sixty-two policemen were wounded, one was killed on the spot, some others died of their wounds, and many were maimed for life. Great excitement prevailed in the city, and many streets were barricaded. The Thirteenth Street papers were represented to be instigators of the Haymarket massacre. All were discharged but seven—Spies; George Engel, a native of Hesse, Germany (b. 15 April, 1836); Oscar Neebe, a tinner (b. 2 July, 1850, and educated in Germany); Adolph Fischer, a printer, and native of Bremen, Germany (b. in 1811); Louis Langg, a carpenter (b. 9 Sept., 1848, at Carlsruhe, Germany); George W. Fields (b. in Bavaria, 9 Aug., 1853); and Samuel Fielden (b. in Throckmorton, England, 25 Feb., 1847). These were indicted by the grand jury, and arraigned in court for murder on 21 June. Albert H. Parsons, a native of Montgomery, Ala. (b. 24 June, 1848), who had been indicted but had escaped arrest, gave himself up to be tried with his associates. The trial continued till 29 Aug. All were found guilty and all sentenced to death except Oscar Neebe, who was sent to the state-prison. They remained in Cook county jail till November, 1887. Louis Langg committed suicide by exploding a dynamite bomb in his mouth on the 9th. The death-sentence of Schwab and Fielden was commuted to imprisonment for life on the 10th, and the remaining four were hanged on 11 Nov., 1887.

SPINNER, Francis Elias, financier, b. in German Flats (now Mowlau), N. Y., 21 Jan., 1802; d. in Jacksonville, Fla., 31 Dec., 1886. His father, John Peter (b. in Wurtsch, Baden, 18 Jan., 1728; d. in German Flats, 27 May, 1848), was a Catholic priest, then embraced Protestantism, married, emigrated to the United States in 1801, and was pastor of Reformed churches at Herkimer and German Flats until his death, preaching at first in German alone, and afterward alternately in German and English. The son was educated carefully by his father, who required him to learn a trade, and apprenticed him at first to a confectioner in Albany, and afterward to a saddler in Amsterdam, N. Y. He engaged in trade at Herkimer in 1824, and became deputy sheriff of the county in 1829. He was active in the militia organization, and by 1834 had reached the grade of major-general. In 1835-7 he was sheriff, and in 1838-9 commissioner for building the state lunatic asylum at Utica. When he was removed from this post, on political grounds alone, he became cashier of a bank at Mohawk, of which he was afterward president for many years. He held various local offices, was auditor and deputy naval officer in the naval office at New York in 1845-9, and in 1854 was elected to congress from an assembly district. He formed a committee on privileges and elections, on a special committee to investigate the assault made by Preston Brooks on Charles Sumner, and on a conference committee of both houses on the army appropriation bill, which the senate had rejected on account of a clause that forbade the use of the military against Kansas settlers. Gen. Spinner was an active Republican from the formation of the party. He was twice re-elected to congress, serving altogether from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1861. During his last term he was the chairman of the committee on accounts. When the Lincoln administration was organized, Sec. Salmon P. Chase selected him for the post of treasurer, which he filled, under successive presidents, from 16 March, 1861, till 20 June, 1863. When, during the war, many of the clerks joined the army, Gen. Spinner suggested to Sec. Chase the advisability of employing women in the government offices, and carried into effect this innovation, though not without much opposition. He signed the different series of paper money in a singular handwriting, which he cultivated in order to prevent anyone else from being able to counterfeit his signature. He received his office the money in the treasury was counted, and when the result showed a very small discrepancy, many days were spent in recounting and examining the books of accounts, until finally the mistake was discovered. On retiring from office he went to the south for the benefit of his health, and for some years he resided in Daytona, Fla., and in Charleston, S. C. In 1862 he raised the Empire brigade of New York state volunteers, and on 1 Oct., 1862, was commissioned as brigadier-general. He served in the National army till the close of the war, resigning on 8 June, 1865. He was subsequently connected with banking and insurance companies in New York City, and in 1886 was elected to congress for the term ending 3 March, 1889. He was re-elected.

SPINOLA, Francis B., soldier, b. in Stony Brook, Long Island, N. Y., 19 March, 1821; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 April, 1891. After an English education he began business in New York city, where he was elected alderman and supervisor. He subsequently served as a member of the assembly and as a state senator, in 1868 as delegate to the Democratic National convention at Charleston, S. C. In 1862 he raised the Empire brigade of New York state volunteers, and on 1 Oct., 1862, was commissioned as brigadier-general. He served in the National army till the close of the war, resigning on 8 June, 1865. He was subsequently connected with banking and insurance companies in New York City, and in 1886 was elected to congress for the term ending 3 March, 1889. He was re-elected.
SPIRE, or SPITTER, Georg von, governor of Venezuela, b. in Spire, Germany, about 1496; d. in Coro, Venezuela, in 1590. He entered as a boy the banking-house of the famous Weissers, of Augsburg, and worked his way up as their confidential agent, accompanying in the latter capacity the fleet that was armed by the Weissers in 1528, and sent under Ambrosins von Alfinger to conquer Venezuela. Returning to Europe after Alfinger's death, Spire obtained from Charles V. the appointment of a representative in the Netherlands. He described the nations of Nicholas Federmann, who had been Alfinger's lieutenant. He armed a new expedition in Spain and the Canary islands, and on 22 Feb., 1534, landed at Coro. Against Weisler's advice, Spire had appointed Federmann his lieutenant. In the following year, accompanied by 450 regular troops and 1500 friendly Indians, they set out on a journey of exploration to the interior. After marching together for about 200 miles, they divided into two parties, agreeing to meet afterward. Spire experienced great hardships from hostile Indians, and the soldiers, unaccustomed to March under a burning sun, mutilated several times. When at last they reached the appointed place of meeting without finding any trace of Federmann, the soldiers were discouraged, but Spire continued the march with the aid of the native Indians, overcoming the riches of the "El Dorado," of which the survivors of Alfinger's expedition had brought the first reports. They continued the march to the south, but, when the rainy season set in, the overflow of the rivers impeded progress, and the consequent fevers decimated their ranks. Spire persevered for a long time in his search for the El Dorado, until at last his party was destroyed by a mighty river, probably the Orinoco, or its confluent, the Apure, and early in 1539 he returned to Coro with only eighty ragged and sickly men out of the host he had led forth more than four years before. He set out immediately for Europe to lay his complaint against Federmann before the Weislers, but heard in Santo Domingo of the former's return to Spain, and was persuaded by the audacity to return to his government, where he died soon afterward. Spire's narrative to Charles V., which he sent from Santo Domingo, is said to have been published, but no copy of it is known to exist. It is hoped that the manuscript may be among the papers in the archives at Simancas, of which the Spanish government has not undertaken the publication.

SPITZKA, Edward Charles, physician, b. in New York city, 10 Nov., 1852. He was educated at the College of the city of New York, and graduated at the medical department of the University of New York in 1875, after which he studied at the medical schools in Leipsic and Vienna, serving in the latter as assistant in the laboratory of embryology and histology. On his return he settled in New York, with a specialty in the treatment of internal diseases, particularly of the nervous system. In 1880-3 he was professor of medical jurisprudence and the anatomy and physiology of the nervous system in the New York post-graduate medical school. He has been consulting physician of the Northeastern dispensary since 1884. Dr. Spitza has made original investigations in the nervous system, and has discovered the interoptic lobes of saurians, the absence of pyramid tracts in the cerebellum, and numerous facts in the anatomy of the human brain. He has been frequently consulted as a medical expert in cases where insanity or injury to the brain or spinal cord was a subject of litigation. Conspicuous among these was his attitude in the trial of President Garfield's assassin, where both prosecution and defense endeavored to retain his services, but, failing, secured his attendance through an attachment. He then testified to the prisoner's insanity, and was the only expert that did so. Dr. Spitza is a member of various societies, has been secretary of the Society of medical jurisprudence and medicine since 1886, and was vice-president of the section in neurology at the Ninth international medical congress in 1887. In June, 1887, the claims of the son of insanity gained the W. and S. Tuke prize, which is given in international competition by the British medicophysiological association, and in 1878, by his paper on the action of strychnine, he won the William A. Hammond prize, which is awarded by the American neurological association. He is the author of numerous contributions to medical journals, and was one of the editors of the "American Journal of Neurology" in 1884-4. The sections on diseases of the spinal cord and on inflammation, anaemia, and hyperemia of the brain in William Pepper's "System of Medicine" (Philadelphia, 1857) were written by him, and he has published "Treatise on Insanity" (New York, 1888).

SPOFFORD, Harriet Prescott, author, b. in Carlsbad, Nov. 2, 1833. She is the daughter of Joseph N. Prescott and elder sister of Mary N. Prescott. She was taken in youth by her parents to Newburyport, Mass., which has ever since been her home, though she has spent many of her winters in Boston and Washington. She attended the Putnam free school in her adopted city, and later the Pinkerton academy at Derby, N. H., where she was graduated at seventeen years of age. At Newburyport her prize essay on Hamlet drew the attention of Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who soon became her friend, and gave her the encouragement and counsel her writing life. Her father was attacked with slow paralysis about 1850, which rendered him incapable of exertion during the remainder of his life. This misfortune preyed upon the mind of her mother, and rendered her a confirmed invalid. As Harriet was the eldest child, she felt the need of making her talents available, and began courageously to work, contributing to the success of her brother's casino in Boston, earning small pay with a great deal of labor. She once wrote fifteen hours a day, and continued her toil for years. These early stories have never been acknowledged or collected. In the "Atlantic Monthly," in 1859, appeared a sparkling story of Parisian life, bearing the title "In a Cellar." James Russell Lowell, then editor of the magazine, admired it, but refrained from publishing it, under the belief that it must be a translation from the French, until he was assured that it was written by Harriet Prescott. The story made her reputation, and she became from that day a welcome contributor, both of prose and poetry, to the chief periodicals of the country. Her fiction has very little in common with what is regarded as representative of the New England mind. It is ideal, intense in feeling, and luxuriant in expression. In her descriptions and fancies she revels in sensual delights and every variety of splendor. In 1863 she married Richard S. Spofford, a lawyer of Boston, cousin of her former MI. Spofford’s home is now on Deer island, in Merrimack river, in the suburbs of Newburyport. Mrs. Spofford’s books are “Sir Rohan’s Ghost” (Boston, 1859): “The Amber Gods, and other Stories” (Boston, 1863); “Azarian” (1864); “New England Legends” (1871); “The Thief in the Night” (1873); “Art Decoration applied to Furniture” (New York, 1881); “Marquis of Carabas” (Boston, 1882); “Poems” (1883); “Hester Stanley at St. Mark’s” (1883); “The Servant-Girl Question” (1884); and “Ballads about Authors” (1888).

SPOFFORD, Henry Martyn, jurist, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 8 Sept., 1821; d. in Red Sulphur Springs, W. Va., 20 Aug., 1880. He was graduated at Amherst, at the head of his class, in 1840, was tutor there in 1842-4, and after removing to Louisiana, where he taught and at the same time studied law, was admitted to the bar of that state at Monroe in 1846, and practiced in Shreveport. He rose rapidly in his profession, was elected a district judge in 1852, and from 1854 till his resignation in 1859 sat on the supreme bench of the state. He then practised in New Orleans, which position he held later to his death, with John A. Campbell. After 1870 he spent much of his time in Pullaski, Tenn., engaged in administering the estate of his father-in-law. In 1877 he was elected U. S. senator from Louisiana by the “Nicholls” legislature, but the senate admitted William P. Kellogg, who had been chosen by the rival, or “Paickard” legislature. Judge Spofford was an ardent supporter of health at Red Sulphur Springs at the time of his death. Amherst gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1877. His judicial decisions are contained in vols. ix.-xiii. of the Louisiana reports. He was co-author of “The Louisiana Magistrate and Parish Official Guide” (1847).—His brother, Ainsworth Rand, librarian, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 12 Sept., 1829, received a classical education and, from 1848-50 was about to enter college his health failed, and he emigrated to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he established himself as a bookseller and publisher. In 1859 he became associate editor of the Cincinnati “Daily Commercial,” and in 1861 he was appointed first assistant librarian in the library of congress at Washington. Three years later he was made librarian-in-chief. During his administration the National library has grown from 70,000 to about 800,000 volumes. The change in the law of copyright that was effected in 1870 has made the position of the librarian an onerous and important one, as all American copyrights are issued from his office, and all copyright publications are required to be deposited with the congressional library. As a librarian, Mr. Spofford is known for his munificent knowledge of books and their contents. He is a member of many historical and philosophical societies, and received the degree of L. L. D. from Amherst in 1884. He has written largely for the periodical press on historical, economic, and literary topics, and has published, besides catalogues of the library, a work entitled “The American Balance and Treasury of Facts, Statistical, Financial, and Political” (annually since 1878); and has edited with others a “Library of Choice Literature” (10 vols., Philadelphia, 1881-9); “Library of Wit and Humor” (5 vols., 1884); and “A Practical Manual of Parliamentary Rules” (1884).

SPONER, Alden Jeremiah, historian, b. in Sag Harbor, Long Island, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1810; d. in Hempstead, Long Island, 2 Aug., 1881. His father, Alden, was the founder of the “Long Island City Star,” which the son and his brother carried on for many years afterward. He studied law and practised in Brooklyn, but devoted himself largely to local history, and wrote many articles on that subject for periodicals. He was the originator in 1863 of the Long Island historical society, and gave more than 1,000 books and pamphlets as a nucleus for its library. Mr. Sponer edited, with notes and memoirs of the authors, Gabriel Furman’s “Notes,” Packard’s “Deer Island,” and Silas Wood’s “Sketch of the First Settlement of the Several Towns on Long Island” (1865).

SPONER, Benjamin F., soldier, b. in Mansfield, Ohio, 27 Oct., 1828; d. in Lawrenceburg, Ind., 3 April, 1881. At the beginning of the Mexican war he enlisted in the 3d Indiana regiment, and was chosen 2d lieutenant. After serving in Gen. Zachary Taylor’s campaign he returned home, studied law, and practised in Lawrenceburg, holding the office of prosecuting attorney of Dearborn county for several years. At the beginning of the civil war he became lieutenant-colonel of the 7th Indiana regiment, with which he fought at Philippi and Laurel Hill, and he afterward held the same position in the 4th Indiana, with which he was present at Shiloh and the siege of Corinth. He then resigned and returned home, but was soon made colonel of the 83d Indiana, and took part in the engagements around Vicksburg, the battle of Mission Ridge, and the Atlanta campaign, receiving a wound at Kenesaw mountain that necessitated the amputation of his left arm. He then enlisted on a lifetime commission till his resignation in April, 1865, and on 13 March of that year was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers. He was U. S. marshal of the district of Indiana till 1879, when failing health compelled him to resign.

SPONER, John Colt, senator, b. in Lawrenceburg, Ind., 6 Jan., 1843. His father, Judge Philip L. Sponer, was a prominent real estate. The family removed to Madison, Wis., in June, 1859, and the son was graduated at the state university in 1864, when he enlisted as a private in the 40th Wisconsin infantry. He subsequently returned and served as assistant state librarian, but entered the army again as captain in the 50th Wisconsin regiment. After he was mustered out in July, 1866, with the brevet of major, he studied law with his father, was admitted to the bar in 1867, became Gov. Lucas Fairchild’s private secretary, and was then assistant in the attorney-general’s office till 1870, when he removed to Hudson, Wis., and began the general practice of his profession. He was elected a member of the legislature in 1872, and was active in his support of the state university, and in 1882-3. In 1885 he took his seat in the United States senate, and in 1897 was re-elected as a Republican. In 1892 he was nominated for governor.

SPONER, Lysander, lawyer, b. in Athol, Mass., 19 Jan., 1808; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 May, 1887. He studied law in Worcester, Mass., but on completing his course of reading found that admission to the bar was permitted only to those who had studied for three years, except in the case of college graduates. This objectionless condition at once engaged his attention and he succeeded in having it removed from the statute-books. In 1844 the letter postage from Boston to New York was twelve and a half cents and to Washington twenty-five cents. Mr. Spooner, believing that the U.S. government had no constitutional right to a monopoly of the mails, established an independent service from Boston to New York, carrying letters at the uniform rate of five cents. His business grew rapidly, but the government soon overwhelmed him with prosecutions, so that he was compelled to retire from the undertaking, but not until he had shown the possibility of supporting a postal system by a lower rate of postage. His efforts resulted in an act of congress that reduced the rates, followed in 1851 and subsequent years by still further reductions. Mr. Spooner was an active Abolitionist, and contributed largely to the literature of the subject, notably by his "Unconstitutionality of Slavery" (1843), the tenets of which were supported by Gerrit Smith, Elizur Wright, and others of the Liberty party, but were opposed by the Garrisonians. He defended Thomas Dwin, who in 1870 declined to take his oath as a witness before a legislative committee on the ground that in the matter it was investigating it had no authority to compel him to testify. The case was adversely decided on the ground of precedent, but the principles of Mr. Spooner's argument were afterwards recognized by the U.S. supreme court. His writings include "A Deistic Reply to the Alleged Supernatural Evidences of Christianity" and "The Deistic Immortality, and an Essay on Man's Accountability for his Belief" (1836); "Credit, Currency, and Banking" (1843); "Poverty, Causes and Cure" (1846); "A Defence for Fugitive Slaves" (1836); "A New System of Paper Currency" (1861); "Our Finances" (1877); "The Law of Prices" (1877); "Gold and Silver as Standards of Value" (1878); and "Letter to Grover Cleveland on his False Inaugural Address" (1886).

SPOONER, Shearshahub, author, b. in Brandon, Vt., in 1809; d. in Plainfield, N. J., in March, 1859. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1830, and at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York city, in 1833, and became a dentist in New York, attaining eminence in his profession. In 1858 he retired from business. Dr. Spooner was the author of "Guide to Sound Teeth" (New York, 1836); "Art of Manufacturing Mineral Teeth" (1857); "A Treatise on Surgical and Mechanical Dentistry" (1838); "Ancecdotes of Painters, Engravers, Sculptors, and Architects of the Ancien and Modern Times" (1835); "Biographical and Critical Dictionary of Painters, Engravers, Sculptors, and Architects" (1853; new ed., 2 vols., 1865). He purchased, restored, and reinscribed the plates of John Boydell's "Shakespeare Gallery," and bought those of the "Musee Francais," but as the government refused to remit the heavy imposts, they were returned to England with the approval of the people, while the burgesses voted $2,000 to build him a "palace." In the second year of his administration the house of burgesses refused to provide the means that he asked for repelling the invasion of the French from Canada, and he therefore requested the home government for assistance. Virginia also refused to concur with Massachusetts in a subscription for the discharge of the public debt, but, notwithstanding these differences, his popularity was undiminished for years. He exerted himself in behalf of William and Mary college, assisted in raising a large fund for its support and in restoring the building that had been burned. Several years before his arrival, established a school for the education of Indian children, insisted on rigid economy in the offices under his control, and supported every measure that was conducive to the general prosperity. He was the first to explore the Appalachian mountains. His expedition, which lasted from 17 August till 29 Sept., 1746, consisted of a company of his friends, well mounted and armed, and also rangers, Indian guides, and servants, leading horses laden with provisions. No savage dared attack so well-appointed a party, and there was no lack of merry-making, as they hunted by day or cooked the spoils by their camp-fires and drank of "white and red wine, usquebaugh, brandy shrub, two kinds of rum, champagne, canary, cherry punch, and cider," which were among their stores. The most elevated summits they named Mount George, for the king, and Mount Spotswood or Mount Alexander, in honor of the governor. He also took measures to mark the valley of Virginia for the English king, and John Fontaine, who was one of the party, says in his journal: "The governor had graving gems by a Swiss goldsmith and grave anything; the stones were so hard. The governor buried a bottle with a paper enclosed, on which he wrote that he took possession of the place, and in the name of and for King George the First of England." They returned to Williamsburg, preceded by trumpeters, and, to commemorate the event, Gov. Spotswood instituted the order of Tramontane to encourage future expeditions. He gave to each of his companions a small golden horseshoe, to be worn as a badge, and the members of the expedition were known afterward as the "Knights of the golden horseshoe." As early as 1710 he sought to extend the line of the Virginia settlements to interrupt the chain of communication between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico, and favored the incorporation of a Virginia company, which, from the monopolies of the monopoly of the traffic, should sustain forts in the western country; but this act was repealed. He secured a treaty with the Six Nations in 1722, who bound themselves to abandon the region east of the Blue Ridge and south of the Potomac, presented the tributary Indians from joining the Tuscaroras in their forays in Carolina, and sought to renew an alliance with this tribe, which he succeeded in dividing. He was the author of an act to improve the staple of tobacco and make tobacco-notes the medium of ordinary circulation. Although the welfare of Virginia was his constant aim, he was often imperious and contemptuous. On one occasion he remarked to the house of burgesses that the people had made a mistake in choosing "a set of representatives whom heaven has not generally endowed with the ordinary qualifications requisite to legislators," and in placing at the head of standing committees men who could neither "spell English nor write common sense." The most bitter conflict in which he was involved was that of church patronage. Like his predecessors, the governor claimed that the presentation to church livings was a privilege of his office, which admitted no interference of the vestries. With the aid of this controversy, his enemies prevailed against him, and he was removed from his post in 1722. He lived eighteen years longer in Virginia, and from 1730 till 1739 was deputy postmaster-general of the colonies. In this capacity he arranged the transfer of mails with much energy, bringing Philadelphia and Williamsburg within eight or ten days of each other, and through his influence Benjamin Franklin was appointed postmaster of Pennsylvania. On his domain of 40,000 acres he found beds of iron-ore, and, establishing a furnace, thus gave to Virginia a vocation. He was also interested in the mining vine-culture. At his houses on the Rapidan and at Yorktown he maintained the county state of the time and of his rank. In 1740 he was made a major-general to command an expedition to the West Indies, and died while attending to the embarkation at Annapolis. He bequeathed his books, maps, and mathematical instruments to the college of William and Mary, college. Gov. Spotswood's official account of his conflict with the burgesses is printed in the "Virginia Historical Register," and he is best described in William Byrd's "Progress to the Mines," included in "The Westover Manuscripts, containing the History of the Dividing-Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina," written from 1729 to 1750 and published by E. and W. Ruffin (Petersburg, 1844). The vignette is from a portrait now in the Virginia state library. His letters were used by George Bancroft, and then were lost sight of until 1873, having been taken to England by George W. Featherstonehaugh. They were bought from the latter's widow by the Virginia historical society in 1882, and published as "The Official Letters of Alexander Spotswood, Lieutenant-Governor of Virginia in 1710-1722," in the collections of the Virginia historical society, with an introduction and notes by Robert A. Broek (2 vols., Richmond, 1882-85). His speeches to the assembly in 1714-18 are preserved in William Maxwell's "Virginia Historical Register" (vol. iv.).—His son, Robert, was killed by the Indians in 1757.—His grandson, Alexander, soldier, b. in Virginia; d. in Nottingam, Va., 20 Dec., 1818, served in the Revolutionary army, and was appointed major of the 2d Virginia regiment. He married Eliza, the daughter of Gen. William Augustine Washington and the niece of Gen. George Washington.—The second Alexander's brother, John, served also in the army and was severely at Germantown.

SPOTTS, James Hanna, major, s. in Fort Johnson, Wilmington harbor, N. C., 11 March, 1822; d. at Port Stanley, Falkland islands, 9 March, 1882. His father was an officer in the U. S. army, and commanded the artillery under Gen. Andrew Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. In acknowledgment of his bravery, Gen. Jackson presented Maj. Spotts with a sword. The son entered the navy as a midshipman, 2 Aug., 1837, and made a cruise around the world in the sloop "John Adams" in 1837-40, in which he participated in two battles on the island of Sumatra with the natives, who had committedpiratical acts against American merchant ships. He attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1842-3. During the Mexican war he served in the "Lexington" on the Pacific coast in 1846-9, participated in the engagements that resulted in the conquest of California, on the blockade of the Mexican Pacific ports, and at the capture of Guaymas, San Bias, and La Paz. He was promoted to master, 8 April, 1851, and to lieutenant, 25 Nov., 1851. Though a native of the south, he promptly announced his devotion to the Union, taking command of the schooner "Wanderer" in June, 1861, and acted as captain of the port of Key West. In July, 1862, he took charge of the steamer "Magnolia" on the Eastern Gulf blockade. He was promoted to command, 5 Aug., 1862, and had the steamer "South Carolina" on the South Atlantic blockade in 1863-4. He was transferred to the steamer "Paw- tattoo," in which he participated in both attacks on Fort Fisher. In June, 1865, he was detached and ordered to the Mare island navy-yard, where he served until October, 1867. His duties had taken him to California so often that he made his home in San Francisco, and was one of the first naval officers to identify himself with the interests and development of California. He was promoted to captain, 6 Aug., 1866, commanded the steamers "Sara- nac" and "Pensa- cola" in the Pacific squadron in 1870-2, and served as light-house inspec- tor on the Pacific coast in 1872-4, being commis- sioned commodore, 25 Sept., 1873. He served as president of the board of inspection on the Pacific coast until 1880. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 28 May, 1881, and took command of the U. S. naval force on the South Atlantic station in July. He was on a cruise to visit the ports of that station when he was stricken with apoplexy while receiving the farewell visit of the British colonial governor at Port Stanley. After his death the authorities gave a lot in the cemetery for his burial, and every honor was paid to the American admiral.

SPRAGUE, Alfred White, author, b. in Honolulu, 17 June, 1821; d. in Wollaston, Mass., 7 Dec., 1891. His father, Daniel Chamberlain, was the first missionary to the Sandwich islands in 1819, and built the first frame house there, and his mother was the first white woman to land on those islands, which he was graduated at Amherst, and in 1849 changed his name to Sprague by an act of the legislature of Massachusetts. He was professor of natural philosophy and chemistry in Washington university, St. Louis, and from 1859 till 1863 he was experimental lecturer on these subjects in private schools in Boston. In 1863 he applied the SPRAGUE, John Titcomb, soldier, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 3 July, 1810; d. in New York city, 6 Sept., 1878. In 1834 he became 2d lieutenant in the marine corps, and served in the Florida war, being twice promoted for meritorious conduct, and brevetted captain on 15 March, 1842. He was appointed full captain in 1846, and brevetted major on 30 May, 1848. He was made major of the 1st infantry, 14 May, 1861, and, when stationed with that regiment in Texas, was taken prisoner 12 May, 1865, by David E. Twiggs, but was released on parole, and became mustering and disbursing officer at Albany, N. Y., and adjutant-general of the state, with the rank of brigadier-general, holding this post until 1866. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 11th infantry in March, 1863, and colonel of the 7th infantry on 12 June, 1865, and in that year served in Florida and was made military governor, but retired from the army on 13 July, 1870. He was the author of "Origin, Progress, and Conclusion of the Florida War" (New York, 1848).

SPRAGUE, John Wilson, soldier, b. in White Creek, Washington co., N. Y., 4 April, 1817; d. 4 Dec., 1863. He was educated in common schools, and entered Rensselaer polytechnic institute, Troy, but was not graduated. He then became a merchant, and in 1851-2 was treasurer of Erie county, Ohio. He was made a captain in the 7th Ohio volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, became colonel of the 63rd Ohio in 1862, and was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 20 July, 1864, receiving the brevet of major-general, U. S. volunteers, on 13 March, 1865. He also de-}
Y. Hayne served. As a judge and lawyer he was much esteemed, and he was regarded as a fine debater. Harvard gave him the degree of L.L. D. in 1847. He published "Speeches and Addresses" (Boston, 1858), and his "Decisions in Admiralty and Maritime Cases in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, 1841-1861," were edited by Francis E. Parker (Philadelphia, 1861). In this work "Two Charges to the Grand Jury," 1851 and 1861, are included.

SPRAGUE, William, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Cranston, R. I., 3 Nov., 1799; d. in Providence, R. I., 19 Oct., 1836. He received a good education at an early age, became a member of the assembly, and in 1832 was chosen speaker of the house. He was then elected to congress as a Democrat, served from 7 Dec., 1835, till 3 March, 1837, and, declining a re-election, became governor of Rhode Island in 1839-41. He was elected to the U. S. senate in place of Nathan F. Dixon, serving from 18 Feb., 1842, till 17 Jan., 1844, when he resigned, and was subsequently a member of the Rhode Island legislature. In 1848 he was an elector on the Taylor and Fillmore ticket. He was largely engaged in the manufacture of cotton, and was president of the Hartford, Providence, and Fishkill railroad, and of two banks.—His nephew, William, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Cranston, R. I., 12 Sept., 1830, received his education in common schools, served in his regiment, and was engaged in making calico-prints. Subsequently he became a manufacturer of linen, woollen goods, and iron, a builder of locomotives and an owner of railroads and steamships. In 1860 he was governor of Rhode Island. He had served as colonel in the state militia, offered a regiment and a battery of light-horsemen for service in the civil war, and with this regiment participated in the battle of Bull Run, where his horse was shot under him. He received a commission as brigadier-general of volunteers, which he declined. He also served in other actions during the peninsular campaign, including Williamsburg and the siege of Yorktown. He was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Republican, was a member of the committee on manufactures, and chairman of that on public lands, his term extending from 4 March, 1863, till 3 March, 1865, when he resigned, and he resumed the direction of his manufacturing establishments. He operated the first rotary machine for making hosiery, perfected a turning-machine, and also various processes in calico-printing, especially that of direct printing on a large scale with the extract of madder without a chemical bath. Gov. Sprague claims to have discovered what he calls the "principle of the orb" as inherent in calico prints. He asserts that money is endowed with two tendencies, the distributive and the aggregative, and that when the latter predominates, as before the civil war, decadence results; but that when the former is in the ascendency, as was until recently the case, there is progress. He received the degree of A. M. from Brown in 1861, of which university he has been a trustee since 1866.

SPRAGUE, William Buel, clergyman, b. in Andover, Conn., 16 Oct., 1795; d. in Flushing, L. I., 7 May, 1876. He was the son of Benjamin Sprague, a farmer. After graduation at Yale in 1815 he was a private tutor, studied two years at Princeton theological seminary, and in 1819 was ordained pastor of the 1st Congregational church in West Springfield, Mass., as a colleague of Rev. Joseph Lathrop, D. D., remaining there until 1829, when he was installed as pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church in Albany. N. Y. In 1829 he left this charge till 1831, when he removed to Flushing. In 1829 and 1830 he visited Europe. He received the degrees of A. M. from Yale in 1819; S. T. D. from Columbia in 1828, and Harvard in 1848; and LL. D. from Princeton in 1869. Dr. Sprague made extensive collections of religious pamphlets and autographs, and presented the former to the state library at Albany, to which he also gave a manuscript volume of the "Letters of Gen. Sir Jeffrey Amherst." Dr. Sprague also presented to the library of Harvard the papers of Gen. Thomas Gage. His autographs, numbering nearly 100,000, probably the largest private collection in the world, are now in possession of his son. He was the author of more than 100 published sermons, memoirs, and works on the introduction of books. His principal work is "Annals of the American Pulpit" (9 vols., New York, 1857-'69). His other books are "Letters to a Daughter" (1829); "Letters from Europe" (1829); "Letters to Young People" (1830); "Lectures on Revivals" (1832); "Hints designed to regulate the Intercourse of Christians with Heathens" (1834); "Leaves from a Manuscript of the Contrast between True Christianity and various other Systems" (1837); "Life of Rev. Edward Dorr Griffin" (1838); "Letters to Young Men, founded on the Life of Joseph" (2d ed., 1845); "Aids to Early Religion" (1847); "Words to a Young Man's Conscience" (1848); "Women of the Bible" (1850); "Visits to European Nobility" (1855); "Lectures on the Life of Benjamin Diodotus in Sparta's"; "American Biography" (1845); and "Memoirs" of Rev. John and William A. McDowell" (1864).

SPRANGER, Daniel Guerin, Hebrew colonist, b. in Holland about 1610; d. in Cayenne, South America, in 1664. He accompanied Maurice de Nassau in the conquest of Brazil, as he had a contract for furnishing supplies to the invading Spanish. During sixteen years he lived in Brazil occupied in colonization schemes, and opened an extensive trade between that country and Amsterdam. When the Portuguese army recovered possession of Brazil in 1654 all Hebrews living in the country were expelled, and Spranger sought refuge in the island of Cayenne, which had been abandoned by its former possessors the French. Of the twelve lords. Although he was opposed at first by the Galibi Indians, he gained their favor with presents and made a treaty with their principal chief, who granted to him the absolute possession of the island. Being joined by several parties of Hebrews from Brazil, he undertook to colonize the island, and succeeded. This is the more remarkable as it is the only instance in which a Hebrew colony has exclusively devoted itself to agriculture. Spranger introduced the culture of the sugar-cane and indigo-plant, which so prospered that, according to Jacques Dutertre in his "Histoire générale des Antilles," "under Spranger's administration, the island of Cayenne was reputed an El Dorado." The population of the island at that time was about 600—all Hebrews. In 1659 the Dutch company, organized in Amsterdam for the colonization of Guiana, sent a party of 250 Jewish emigrants, and 150 more from Leghorn followed in the next year. The colony was destroyed in 1664 by Le Père de la Barre, who retook Cayenne, and again expelled all Hebrews. Spranger was killed while he was defending his dominion.

SPRINGER, Julius, b. in Kinsale, Ireland, 21 Oct., 1814; d. in Chicago, 3 Sept., 1890. He began the study of art at the South Kensington schools, and later studied with William Riviere and Henry Warren. In 1833 he went to Brussels and became the pupil of Ernest Shimginer. The following year he went to Australia, settling in Melbourne, and painted numerous portraits. In 1857 he came to the United States, spent a short time in New York, and then removed to Chicago, where he afterward resided. He was elected an academician of the Chicago academy of design in 1871, and became its professor of drawing and painting. This post he held for about twelve years, during which time the name of the institution was twice changed, first to Academy of fine arts, then to the Art Institute, and finally the institute made a two years' tour in Italy, and on his return founded Spranger's art academy. He was also instrumental in organizing the Chicago society of artists, of which he was the president. Among his works are "Chicago rising from her Ashes" and "Sad News."

SPRECHER, Samuel, clergyman, b. near Hagerstown, Md., 28 Dec., 1809. He was educated at Pennsylvania college and theological seminary, Gettysburg, Pa., in 1830-36, licensed by the Lateran synod, and was pastor of churches of that denomination in Harrisburg, Pa., Martinsburg, Va., and Chambersburg, Pa., from 1836 till 1849, after which he was president of Wittenburg college, Springfield, Ohio, until 1874. Since that year he has been professor of systematic theology there. Washington college, Pa., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1850, and Pennsylvania college that of LL. D. in 1874. Dr. Sprecher is the author of "The Providential Position of the Evangelical Churches of this Country at this Time" (Solins-grove, 1864); "Groundwork of a System of Evangelical Lutheran Theology" (Philadelphia, 1870); and a"Vogelgesang," which addresses himself to young people.

SPRINGER, Edward Adolphus, sculptor, b. in New York city, 26 Aug., 1837. He studied with Henry K. Brown, John Q. A. Ward, and William Rimmer, and spent several years in study abroad. In 1868 he discovered at Englewood, N. J., a fine modelling clay, peculiarly suited to terra-cotta work, and in 1877 he established at Perth Amboy the "Englewood Art Pottery." At the National academy he exhibited a bust of Giuseppe Mazzini in 1873, and several terra-cotta pieces in 1878. He has given lectures on clay modelling in various cities in the United States, and since 1880 has been director of the Chautauqua school of sculpture.

SPRINT, Robert, forger, b. in England in 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Dec., 1876. He gained a reputation in the fabrication of autograph letters of Washington, Franklin, and Lord Nelson. Of his life prior to the time when he came to the United States nothing is known. Settling in Philadelphia about 1838, he began to deal in a small way in books relating to America, autographs, and prints, frequently obtaining literary rarities. Finding himself unable to supply the demand for genuine autograph letters of eminent men of the Revolution, he began to make and sell counterfeits. Being an expert penman, he soon acquired great facility in imitating the handwriting of Washington, Franklin, and others. These counterfeits were written on paper of the period, with ink prepared so as to give the appearance of age to the writing, and readily deceived those who were not experts. He was frequently arrested by the civil authorities for obtaining money under false pretences, but always escaped punishment by confessing his guilt and expressing contrition for his offence. Most of his counterfeits were sold at the sale of Franklin, and Nelson were sold in Canada and England. To sell his forgeries he resorted to various devices, finally pretending in his letters that he was a daughter of Gen. Thomas J. Jackson, who was compelled by poverty to part with family papers. By these means he sold many counterfeit autographs to Confederate bond-holders in England. At the time of his death he was an inmate of a hospital and in poverty. See "The American Antiquarian" for May, 1888.

SPRING, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Northbridge, Mass., 10 March, 1746; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 4 March, 1819. After graduation at Princeton in 1771 he studied theology there and under Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Samuel Hopkins, and Stephen Gage, and became pastor in New England, and was licensed to preach in 1774. In 1777 he joined the volunteer corps of 1,100 men under Col. Benedict Arnold as chaplain, marched with them to Canada, participated in the attack on Quebec, and saw Burr attempt to carry Montgomery from the field. At the close of 1776 he left the army, and in February, 1777, he preached to the congregation in New-buryport, of which he became pastor, serving from 1777 until his death. He possessed great influence and weight of character, was a leader of the Hopkinsian party (see HOPKINS, SAMUEL), and was active in promoting the union of the two parties in the Congregational churches by the establishment of the Andover theological seminary, of which he was a founder. He was also an originator of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. Dartmouth gave him the degree of A. M. in 1789, and Williams that of S. T. D. in 1806. He published several controversial works and about twenty-five miscellaneous discourses, including one on the death of Washington and one on the duel between Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton.—His son, Gardiner, clergyman, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 24 Feb., 1788; d. in New York city, 18 Aug., 1873, was graduated at Yale in 1805, taught in Bermuda for two years, and on his return studied law and was admis-

sed to the bar in 1808, but abandoned his profession, studied at An-dovery theological seminary, and on 10 Aug., 1810, was ordained pastor of the Brick Presbyterian church in New York city, where he continued until his death, although he was offered the presidency of Hamilton and Dartmouth colleges. In 1836 he removed with his congregation to the new church on Murray hill. During the last years of his life Dr. Spring seldom preached, his pulpit being filled by an assistant. Hamilton gave him the degree of S. T. D.

in 1819, and Lafayette that of D. D., in 1833. In addition to many pamphlets he published "Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character" (New York, 1813); "Fragments from the Study of a Pastor" (1838); "Obligations of the Prophet to the Bible" (1844); "The Attraction of the Cross" (1845); "The Bible not of Man" (1847); "Discourses to Seamen" (1847); "The Power of the Pulpit" (1848); "The Mercy-Seat" (1849); "First Things" (2 vols., 1851); "The Glory of Christ" (2 vols., 1852); "Memoirs of the Rev. Samuel J. Mills" (1854); "Contrast between Good and Bad Men" (2 vols., 1859); and "Pulpit Ministra-tions," or Sabbath Readings, a Series of Discourses (2 vols., 1864); and "Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardiner Spring" (2 vols., 1866). He also published several occasional sermons, the last of which are contained in the "Brick Church Memorial" (New York, 1861). Many of his books were translated into French and other languages, and republished in Great Britain. A collective edition of his earlier works was published (9 vols., New York, 1853).

SPRINGER, Reuben Ruyman, philanthropist, b. in Frankfort, Ky., 16 Nov., 1800; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 10 Dec., 1884. The family, originally from Sweden, settled in Delaware in the 17th century. Reuben's father, Charles, a native of West Virginia, moved to Kentucky, was a soldier during the War of 1812, was the first sheriff in Kentucky, and afterward postmaster at Frankfort. At thirteen his son became a clerk in the post-office, and in three years succeeded his father as postmaster. He was next a clerk on a steamboat that ran between Cincinnati and New Orleans, soon acquired an interest in the boat, and thus laid the foundation of his fortune. Later he became a partner in a steamboat business, accumulating immense wealth, but retired in 1840 on account of his health, and never resumed active business. He went abroad repeatedly, buying many fine works of art, most of which are now the property of the Cincinnati art museum. He gave to the Music hall, the Exposition building, the Oleon theatre, and the Art museum in that city, in all $200,000, to private charitable institutions, $400,000, and $200,000 annually in the way of benevolence, besides contributing liberally and regularly to various charities and public enterprises. He left about $3,000,000 to his nearest of kin, having no children; also annuities to the College of music, the Music hall and the Art museum, and nearly $400,000 to various Roman Catholic charitable institutions, among these, $40,000 to the cathedral schools, $50,000 to St. Peter's benevolent society, and $100,000 for the education of priests.

SPRINGER, William McKendree, lawyer, b. in New Lebanon, Sullivan co., Ind., 30 May, 1836. His family removed to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1850. He was educated in the Illinois college, where he was graduated at Indiana university in 1858, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1858, and practised in Springfield, Ill., where he still resides. He was secretary of the State constitutional convention of 1852, served in the legislature in 1871-2, which was engaged in revising the laws of the state, and was elected to the state senate in 1873. On 13 Dec., 1873, he introduced in the house his resolution declaring the precedent of retiring from the presidential office after the second term has become a part of our republican system, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, un patriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions, which was adopted—yeas, 233, nays, 18. This large affirmative vote contributed materially to the defeat of President Grant for renomination in 1876 for a third term. In 1875 he was appointed chairman of the committee on expenditures in the state department, and has been a member of other important committees, including the Potter committee, which investigated the presidential election of 1876, and of the joint committee which reported the electoral commission bill of 1876-7, and in 1882-4 delivered numerous and exhaustive speeches in congress on the establishment of the tariff commission and the revision of the tariff. He has also been an important committee, including the Potter committee, which investigated the presidential election of 1876, and of the joint committee which reported the electoral commission bill of 1876-7, and in 1882-4 delivered numerous and exhaustive speeches in congress on the establishment of the tariff commission and the revision of the tariff. He has also been an important committee, including the Potter committee, which investigated the presidential election of 1876, and of the joint committee which reported the electoral commission bill of 1876-7, and in 1882-4 delivered numerous and exhaustive speeches in congress on the establishment of the tariff commission and the revision of the tariff. He has also been an important committee, including the Potter committee, which investigated the presidential election of 1876, and of the joint committee which reported the electoral commission bill of 1876-7, and in 1882-4 delivered numerous and exhaustive speeches in congress on the establishment of the tariff commission and the revision of the tariff.
pamphlets, he has published "Prelections on Theology" (Pittsburg, Pa., 1882).

SPRUCE, Presley, senator, b. in Delaware in 1783; d. in Smyrna, Del., 13 Feb., 1863. He was for some time a resident of the latter place, where he was engaged in business. He was sent to the state senate, of which body he was elected president, and also represented Delaware in the U. S. senate from 6 Dec., 1847, till 3 March, 1853. He belonged to the Whig party in politics.

SPRY, William, jurist, b. in England; d. in Barbadoes, W. I., in September, 1772. He married a niece of the Earl of Chatham, and in 1764, arrived with his family at Halifax, Nova Scotia, having been appointed judge of the vice-admiralty court over all America, which had been recently constituted by act of parliament. In the proclamation that announces the opening of the court he is styled "The Right Worshipful William Spry, Doctor of Laws." The other officers of the new court were: vice-admiral, the Earl of Northumberland; registrar, the Hon. Spencer Perival; marshal, Charles Howard, gent. These officers probably expected to fulfill their duties by deputies. Judge Spry opened his court at Halifax on 9 Oct., 1764. Its creation had been opposed in the colonies, and the passage of the stamp-act the next year, with the accompanying disturbances, probably prevented its extension to other provinces.

Judge Spry was appointed governor of Barbadoes in June, 1767, and died in office.

SQUIER, Ephraim George, author, b. in Bethlehem, N. Y., 17 June, 1821; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 April, 1888. In early youth he worked on a farm, attended and taught school, studied engineering, and became interested in American antiquities. He was associated in the publication of the "New York State Mechanic," at Albany, in 1841-2, and engaged in journalism in Hartford, Conn., and Chillicothe, Ohio, in 1843-8, during which period he also investigated the ancient monuments of the Mississippi valley in conjunction with Dr. Edwin Hamilton Davis (q. v.), and prepared the narrative that was published in vol. i. of the "Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge" (Washington, 1849). He also made an examination of the ancient remains of New York state under the auspices of the New York historical society in 1849. He was appointed special chargé d'affaires to all the Central American states in 1849, and negotiated treaties with Nicaragua, Honduras, and San Salvador. In 1853 he made a second visit to Central America to examine a line for a projected interoceanic railroad, and to make further study of the archaeology of the country. In 1856 he received the medal of the French geographical society for this work. In 1863 Mr. Squier was appointed U. S. commissioner to Peru, where he made an exhaustive investigation of Inca remains and took numerous photographs of them. In 1868 he was appointed consul-general of Honduras at New York, and in 1871 he was elected the first president of the Anthropological Institute of New York. In 1874 his health became so seriously impaired as to preclude further original research, and though he subsequently recovered sufficiently to direct the final preparation and original MS. of his work on Peru for publication, the affection resulted in his death. He was a member of numerous historical, archaeological, and scientific societies, and several years chief editor of Frank Leslie's publishing-hause. Besides many official reports, scientific papers, magazine articles, and contributions to the "Encyclopedia Britannica" and foreign periodicals, his works include the "Americal Discoveries of the State of New York" ("Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge," 1849; Buffalo, 1851); "Serpent Symbols" (1852); "Nicaragua: its People, Scenery, and Monuments" (New York, 1852); "Notes on Central America" (1854); "Wafina, or Adventures on the Mosquito Shore" (1855); "The States of Central America" (1857; revised ed., 1870); "Monographs of Authors who have written on the Aborigine Languages of Central America" (1869); "Tropical Fibres and their Economic Extraction" (1861); and "Peru: Incidents and Explorations in the Land of the Incas" (1877).

SQUIER, Miles Powell, clergyman, b. in Cornwall, Vt., 4 May, 1792; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 22 June, 1866. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1811, and at Andover seminary in 1812, and was licensed to preach by a Congregational association. After laboring at Oxford, Mass., and Vergennes, Vt., and doing missionary work for a year in western New York, he was ordained on 3 May, 1816, the first pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church of Buffalo, N. Y., which relation he maintained until 1824. In 1824-6 he acted as financial agent of the Auburn theological seminary, and from 1826 till 1834 he was secretary of the Geneva agency of the American home missionary society. In 1831 he founded the Geneva lyceum, and was occupied in superintending its affairs until 1841. The next eight years he resided at Geneva, but supplied the pulpits of various neighboring churches. From 1849 till 1863 he was professor of intellectual and moral philosophy at Beloit, Wis. The remaining three years of his life were spent in Geneva. Dr. Squier was an earnest student and fearless in the expression of opinion, but genial in manner. Besides contributing to the periodical press, he published "The Problem Solved, or Sin not of God" (New York, 1853); "The Reason and the Bible, or the Truth of Religion" (1860); "Miscellaneous Writings, with an Autobiography, edited and supplemented by the Rev. James R. Boyd, of Geneva, N. Y." (1867).

STACY, James, clergyman, b. in Liberty county, Ga., 2 June, 1830. He was graduated at Oglethorpe university, Ga., in 1849, studied theology at Columbia, S. C., and in 1853 was ordained by the Georgia presbytery. After preaching as a supply until 1857, he was elected to the faculty of the Newnan, Ga., Presbyterian church, where he still remains. He has been stated clerk of the presbytery of Atlanta from its organization in 1867 to the present time, and has held the same office in the synod of Georgia since 1876. He is president of the board of directors of the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C. He received the honorary de- gree of D. D. from the university in 1876. Dr. Stacy has published a prize essay on the "Holy Sabbath" (Richmond, 1877); "Water Baptism" (1882); and "Day of Rest" (1885).

STADEN, Hans (Stah-don), German traveller, b. in Hesse-Homburg in 1529; d. there about 1565. He had received a good education and was in vol. v.—41
October 1884, at sixteen years of age, he entered the army, where he remained for two years and six months, and in 1885, after two years in the army, he entered the civil service. He was posted to the position of the minister of foreign affairs in 1886, and was later posted to the position of the minister of foreign affairs in 1887.

He was appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1888, and was later appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1889.

He was appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1890, and was later appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1891.

He was appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1892, and was later appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1893.

He was appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1894, and was later appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1895.

He was appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1896, and was later appointed as the minister of foreign affairs in 1897.
New York city till 1847, studied law, and was a judge of the Cincinnati court of common pleas in 1853–5. He took part in the Liberal Republican movement of 1872, and was appointed minister to Italy in 1874. He is the author of "Central Principles of the Philosophy of Nature" (Boston, 1848) and "Concepts and Theories of Modern Physics" (New York, 1882).

STANBERY, Henry, attorney-general, b. in New York city, 20 Feb., 1803; d. there 26 June, 1881. He was the son of Jonas Stanbery, a physician, who removed to Zanesville, Ohio, in 1814. Henry was graduated at Washington college, Pa., in 1829 and began the study of law in that year, but could not be admitted to the bar until he was of age, in 1824. Then, at the invitation of Thomas Ewing, he began practice in Lancaster county, Ohio, and rode the circuit with him. Mr. Stanbery remained for many years at Lancaster. In 1846 the office of attorney-general of Ohio was created by the general assembly, and he was elected to be its first occupant. He accordingly removed to Columbus, where he resided for about five years. At that time the U.S. courts were held there, and Judge Stanbery established a large and valuable practice in them as well as in the supreme court of Ohio. In 1850 he was elected a delegate to the convention that framed the present state constitution. In 1853 he removed to Cincinnati, and in 1854 was appointed solicitor of the United States by President Johnson. This office he accepted, after consultation with his friends, solely from a desire to assist in carrying the government safely through the perilous period that followed the war, and resigned it at the request of the executive to become one of his counsel on the impeachment trial. His health at the time was so delicate that most of his arguments were submitted in writing. On the termination of the trial he was nominated by the president to the office of justice of the U.S. supreme court; but the senate refused to confirm him. He then returned to Cincinnati, where he was president of the Law association of that city, but held no other public office. He wrote occasionally on political questions, and sometimes made addresses. As a lawyer, although he was learned in technicalities and skilled in applying the nice rules of evidence and practice, he especially delighted in the discussion of general principles. As a practitioner he was quick to perceive the slightest weakness in his opponent's case. He never attempted to browbeat or mislead a witness, but knew how to secure full and true answers even from those who had come upon the stand with hostile intentions.

STANISH, Myles, soldier, b. in Lancashire, England, about 1584; d. in Duxbury, Mass., 3 Oct., 1636. It is supposed that he was a scion of the Standish family of Duxbury Hall in Lancashire, and that his name was erased from the family register to deprive him of a share in the estate. The name is ancient, and Frome, the district containing the manor between Richard II. and Wat Tyler, relates how the latter was killed by a "squier of the kynges called John Standysdyse," who was knighted for this act. Later another Sir John Standish participated in the battle of Agincourt. While still a youth, Myles entered the English forces on the continent, and in 1593, having joined the Leyden the colony that sailed in the "Mayflower" from Plymouth, England, on 16 Sept. 1620. The vessel anchored in the Bay of Cape Cod on 21 Nov., 1620, and on 25 Nov. sixteen armed men, "every one his Musket, Sword, and Corset, Under the command of Captain Myles Standish," were sent ashore for a second exploration. They marched in single file through what is now Provincetown, where they saw several Indians, followed their tracks about ten miles, and spent the night in the woods. Three subsequent expeditions were sent out. On the third, after landing in the vicinity of Eastham, they went toward Wellfleet, found the Indian burying-place and Indian houses, and encamped before nightfall at Nankeket. On the following day they were surprised by the Indians, upon whom Standish fired, but the skirmish was slight. On 29 Sept., 1621, after the founding of Plymouth, a party of ten men, with three savages as guides, under command of Standish, who had been appointed military captain in February, 1621, explored Massachussets bay. They anchored off what is now Thomson's island, which Standish explored and named Trevere. This party also explored the broad plain known as "Massachusetts fields," the gathering-place of the tribes, which comprised a part of what is now Quincy. In 1622 Thomas Weston sent out immigrants to plant a new colony, which they did at Wessagusset (now Weymouth). They incurred the enmity of the Massachusetts Indians, who formed a plot to destroy them; but, fearing that such an act would be avenged by the Plymouth colony, they decided to exterminate the English. Before this plan was executed, Massasoit revealed the plot, and the Plymouth colonists determined to send out an expedition to Wessagusset. Fearful of exciting the suspicion of the Indians by an armed body, Myles Standish selected eight men to march to the relief of that colony, which he found in a wretched condition. By Massasoit's advice, Standish, with a few of his men, enticed the chiefs Peesquot and Witwunnat, with a half-brother of the latter, into a room, and, closing the door, killed the Indians after a desperate fight. This was the first Indian blood that was shed by the Pilgrims. A general battle ensued in the open field, from which the Indians fled and in which no lives were lost. This victory of Standish spread terror among the savages, and, as a warning to further depredations, the head of Witwunnat was exposed to view at Plymouth. When the news of Standish's exploit reached the pins John Robin- son, the pastor at Leyden, he wrote to the govern- nor of Plymouth on 19 Dec., 1623, "to consider the disposition of their captain, who was of a warm temper," and concluded with the remark: "O how happy a thing had it been that you had converted some before you had killed any!" In the summer of 1625 the colony was in great trouble, owing to its unhappy relation with its partners, the so-called "merchant adventurers" in London, and Capt. Standish was sent to England to seek relief, bearing a letter from Gov. William Bradford to the council of New England urging their intervention in behalf of the colony; but Bradford says that, on account of the plague in London, Standish could accomplish nothing. In 1628 Standish captured Thomas Morton, of Merry Mount (q. v.). In retaliation for an attack of D'Aulnay (see CHARLES, AUBREY DE), who drove away in 1631 a party of Plymouth men at Penobscot, Plymouth despatched a vessel and a force under Standish to compel the surrender of the French at that post; but this expedition failed. In addition to being the military leader of every exploit of importance in the colony, his counsel was often required in civil affairs, and for many years he was also treasurer of the colony. He was not a member of the Plymouth communion, but was a dissenter from the dissenters. He was resolute, stern, bold, and of ineradicable integrity, "an iron-nerved Puritan who could hew down forests and live on crumbs." A portrait, painted on an old panel, was found in 1877 in a picture-shop in School street, Boston, bearing the date 1625, and "Etatis Sae. 38," on which the name of M. Standish was discovered after removing the frame. It now hangs in Pilgrim hall, Plymouth, and is reproduced in the accompanying vignette. His first wife, Rose, died on 29 Jan., 1621, and his second courtship has been made the subject of a romance by Henry W. Longfellow, in which there are several anachronisms. Although his envoy, John Alden, won his choice bride, Priscilla Mullens, they remained close friends until death, and later generations of the Standish and Alden families intermarried. A tradition says that his second wife, Barbara, was the younger sister of Rose Standish. In his will, dated 7 March, 1653, he left his property to "his wife, Barbara, and their four sons, Alexander, Myles, Josias, and Charles. His goods and chattels, worth £350, were exhibited in the court that was held in Plymouth on 4 May, 1657. One of his swords is preserved in the cabinet of the Massachusetts historical society, and another is in Pilgrim hall, Plymouth. Several other relics are in the possession of the Pilgrim society. Among the many pieces of ingenious embroidery made by his daughter, Lora, in 1632 several of the "Mayflower" families settled in Duxbury, Mass. Standish established himself on "Captain's Hill," so named from his military office, and it is probable that he was buried there. He possessed his house stood unoccupied until about 1698, and that it was then enlarged by his son Alexander, who it is thought was a trader and possibly town-clerk of Duxbury. The present house was built by this son. A granite monument is now being erected to his memory on Captain's Hill, Duxbury, as seen in the accompanying illustration. The shaft is one hundred feet high, and upon it stands a statue of Standish looking eastward. His right hand, holding the charter of the colony, is extended toward Plymouth, while his left rests upon his sheathed sword.

STANFORD, Leland, senator, b. in Watervliet, Albany co., N. Y., 9 March, 1824; d. in Palo Alto, Cal., 21 June, 1866. His ancestors settled in the valley of the Mohawk, N. Y., about 1720. When twenty years old he began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1849, and the same year began to practise at Port Washington, Wis. In 1852, having lost his law library and other property here, he removed to California and began mining for gold at Michigan bluff, Placer co., subsequently becoming associated in business with his three brothers, who had preceded him to the Pacific coast. In 1856 he removed to San Francisco and engaged in mercantile pursuits on a large scale, laying the foundation of a fortune that had recently been estimated at more than $39,000,000. In 1860 Mr. Stanford to California, subsequently becoming a delegate to the Chicago convention. He was an earnest advocate of a Pacific railroad, and was elected president of the Central Pacific company when it was organized in 1861. The same year he was elected governor of California, and served from December, 1861, till December, 1863. As president of the Pacific road he superintended its construction over the mountains, building 530 miles in 293 days, and on 10 May, 1869, drove the last spike at Promontory point, Utah. He also became interested in other roads on the Pacific slope, and in the development of the agriculture and manufactures of California. In 1885 he was elected to the U. S. Senate, to fill the term of six years from 4 March, 1886. In November, 1886, Mr. Stanford gave the state of California $20,000,000 to be used in founding at Palo Alto a university whose curriculum shall not only include the usual collegiate studies, but comprise instruction in telegraphy, type-setting, writing journalism, book-keeping, farming, civil engineering, and other practical subjects; the first block of the corner-stone was laid on 14 May, 1887, and the various structures were completed within three years, and the institution in successful operation. Ex-President Harrison delivered a course of law lectures there in 1894. Included in the trust fund for the maintenance of the university is Mr. Stanford's estate at Vina, Tehama co., Cal., which is said to be the largest vineyard in the world. It comprises 30,000 acres, 2,500 of which are planted with bearing vines. Mr. Stanford died suddenly at Menlo Park, his magnificent residence.

STANLEY, Anthony Dunomd, mathematician, b. in East Hartford, Conn., 2 April, 1810; d. there, 16 March, 1863. He was graduated at Yale in 1830, was appointed tutor in 1833, andAlden, successor to the same office in 1836, which office he held until his death. He published an "Elementary Treatise of Spherical Geometry and Trigonometry" (New Haven, 1848), and "Tables of Logarithms of Numbers, and of Logarithmic Sines, Tangents, and Secants to Seven Places of Decimals, together with Other Tables" (1849). He also edited an edition of "Day's Algebra," assisted in the revision of "Webster's Quarto Dictionary" (1847), and left several unfinished works in manuscript.

STANLEY, David Sloan, soldier, b. in Cedar Valley, Ohio, 1 June, 1828. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1852, and in 1853 was detailed with Lieut. Amiel W. Whipple to accompany the officers and men of the 3d parallel. As lieutenant of cavalry from 1855 till his promotion to a captaincy in 1861, he spent the greater part of his time in the saddle. Among other Indian engagements he took part in one with the Cheyennes on Solomon's Fork, and one with the Comanches near Fort Arbaudle. At the beginning of the civil war he refused high rank in the Confederate army. In the early part of the war he fought at Independence, Forsyth, Dug Springs, Wilson's Creek, Rolla, and other places, and was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 Sept., 1861. He led a division at New Madrid, and the commanding general reported that he was "especially indebted" to Gen. Stanley for his "efficient aid and uniform zeal." Subsequently he was complimented for his "untiring activity and skill" in the battle of Island No. 10. He took part in most of the skirmishes in and around Corinth and in the battle of Shiloh. In the fight near the White House, or Bridge Creek, he repelled the enemy's attack with severe loss, and he was especially commended by Gen. William S. Rosecran at Luka. At Corinth he occupied the line between batteries Robinson and Williams, and was thus exposed to the severest part of the attack of the enemy, and, although other parts of the line gave way, his was never broken. Gen. Stanley was appointed major-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862. He bore an active part in most of the battles of the Atlanta campaign, and as commander of the 4th army corps he took part in the battle of Jonesboro. After Gen. George H. Thomas was ordered to Nashville, Gen. Stanley was directed on 6 Oct. to command the Army of the Cumberland in his absence. Until he was severely wounded at Franklin, he took an active part in the operations and battles in defense of Nashville. His disposition of the troops at Spring Hill enabled him to repel the assault of the enemy's cavalry and afterward two assaults of the infantry. A few days afterward, at Franklin, he fought a desperate hand-to-hand conflict. Placing himself at the head of a reserve brigade, he regained the part of the line that the enemy had broken. Although severely wounded, he did not leave the field until long after dark. When he recovered he rejoined his regiment, and, after the war closed, took it to Texas. He had received the brevets of lieutenant-colonel for Stone River, Tenn., colonel for Resaca, Ga., brigadier-general for Ruff's Station, Ga., and major-general for Franklin, Tenn., all in the regular army. He was appointed colonel of the 22d infantry, and spent a greater part of the time up to 1874 in Dakota. In command of the Yellowstone expedition of 1873, he successfully conducted his troops through the unknown wilderness of Dakota and Montana, and his favorable reports on the country led to the subsequent emigration thither. In 1874 he went with his regiment to the lake stations, and in 1879 moved it to the newly opened Indian trails in the western part of the state. He also restored the confidence of the Mexicans, which had been disturbed by the raid that the U. S. troops made across the boundary in 1878. He was ordered to Santa Fé, N. M., in 1882, and placed in command of the district of New Mexico. While he was stationed there, and subsequently at Fort Lewis, compliance with the promise made him to the Arapahoes, Utes, and Jicarillas, all of which he quieted without bloodshed. The greater part of his service has been on the Indian frontier, and he has had to deal with nearly every tribe that occupies the Mississippi and Rio Grande valley, thus becoming perfectly acquainted with the Indian character. In March, 1884, he was appointed a brigadier-general in the regular army, and served as commander of Texas. Gen. Stanley was retired in June, 1892.

STANLEY, Frederick Arthur, Lord, governor of Canada, b. in London, England, 15 Jan., 1841. He is the youngest son of the fourteenth Earl of Derby, and brother of the late earl. After receiving his education at Eton, he entered the Grenadier guards in 1859, became lieutenant and captain in 1863, and retired from the army in 1865. He represented Preston in parliament, as a Conservative, from July, 1863, till December, 1868, when he was elected for North Lancashire. He was lord of the admiralty from August till December, 1868, and financial secretary for war from February, 1874, till August, 1877, when he became financial secretary to the treasury. On April 15, 1878, he was appointed secretary of state for war, which portfolio he held till he went out of office with his party in April, 1880. In the government of Lord Salisbury he was secretary of state for the colonies from June, 1885, till February, 1886, and in the cabinet of August, 1886, he was appointed president of the board of trade, and raised to the peerage with the title of Lord Stanley of Preston. In June, 1888, he was appointed governor-general of Canada, in succession to the Marquis of Lansdowne, who had been appointed governor-general of India. In 1894 Lord Stanley married Lady Constance, eldest daughter of the fourth Earl of Clarendon. His older brother being childless, he in 1893 succeeded to the earldom of Derby, and returned to England.

STANLEY, Henry Morton, explorer, b. near Denbigh, Wales, in 1840. His name was originally John Rowlands. He was placed in the poor-house at St. Asaph when he was three years old, remaining there and being educated for ten years. In 1855 he sailed as a cabin-boy to New Orleans, where he was adopted by a merchant, whose name he took instead of his own. This merchant died without leaving a will, and young Stanley enlisted in the Confederate army, was taken prisoner, and subsequently volunteered in the U. S. navy, serving as acting ensign on the iron-clad "Ticonderoga." At the close of the war, he went as a newspaper correspondent to Turkey. In 1868 he accompanied the British army to Abyssinia, as correspondent of the New York "Herald." When he was in Spain in the service of the same paper he was asked by its proprietor, in October, 1869, to go and find Dr. David Livingstone, the African explorer, of whom nothing definite had been heard for more than two years. After attending the opening of the Suez canal, visiting Constantinople, the Crimea, Palestine, the Valley of the Nile, Euphrates, Persia, and India, Stanley sailed from Bombay, 12 Oct., 1870, and reached Zanzibar, on the eastern coast of Africa, early in January, 1871. There he organized his search expedition and set out for the interior on 21 March with 192 followers. On 10 Nov. he found Dr. Livingstone at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, where he had just arrived from the southwest. Stanley furnished Dr. Livingstone with supplies, explored the northern part of Lake Tanganyika with him, and remained till February, 1872, when Livingstone set out on that journey from which he never returned, while Stanley made his way back to the coast, sailing thence on 14 March, 1872, and reaching England late in July. The British association entertained him at Brighton, where, on 10 Aug., he gave an account of his expedition.
queen sent him a gold snuff-box set with diamonds, and on 21 Oct., a banquet was given him by the Royal geographical society. In 1879 he received the patron's gold medal of the Royal geographical society. The New York "Herald," and the London "Daily Telegraph" again sent Stanley to explore the lake region of equatorial Africa. He reached Zanzibar in the month of July, 1874. There learning that Livingstone had died in central Africa, he determined to shape his course north-west and explore the region of Lake Victoria N'yanza. Leaving at the head of 300 men, after many hardships and severe encounters with the natives, he reached it in February, 1875, having lost on the way 104 men by death or desertion. He circumnavigated the lake, sailing about 1,000 miles and minutely examining all the inlets, in a boat that he had brought with him in pieces, and found it to be a single large lake, instead of a series of lagoons, as had been supposed by Richard F. Burton and Livingstone, so that the opinion of the explorers Speke and Grant was confirmed. Thus was Lake Victoria N'yanza proved to be the largest body of fresh water in the world, having an area of 60,000 square miles. On 17 April, 1875, continuing his explorations, he set out westward toward Lake Albert N'yanza, and found that it was not, as had been supposed, connected with Lake Tanganyika. The hostility of the natives barred his further advance, and, forced to return to Ujiji, he resolved to reach the coast by descending the great river that had been discovered by Livingstone and named the Lualaba, but which Stanley had called the Livingstone in honor of its discoverer. The latter had thought that it might be identical with the Nile; others supposed it to be part of the Congo, and Stanley, by his descent of it, proved that these last were correct. The descent, chiefly by canoes, took eight months, and accomplished under very great difficulties and privations, and cost him the lives of thirty-five men. On his reaching a west-coast settlement, a Portuguese man-of-war took him to St. Paul de Loanda, whence an English vessel conveyed the party to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to Zanzibar, where what remained of the men who had joined his expedition were left at their own homes. Stanley reached England in February, 1878. On 28 June, 1878, at the Sorbonne, Paris, he was presented with the cross of chevalier of the Legion of honor by the president of the French geographical society. In 1879-'82 he was again in Africa, sent out by the Brussels African international association with a view to develop the great basin of the river Congo. The king of the Belgians devoted $20,000 a year from his own private means toward this enterprise. In 1884 Stanley completed the work, establishing trading-stations along the Congo from its mouth to Stanley pool, a distance by the river of 1,400 miles, and founding the free state of the Congo, but he declined to be its first governor. On 13 Jan., 1887, he was presented with the freedom of the city of London. Later he went on an African expedition to the Soudan, sent out for the relief of Emin Pasha. He has published "How I Found Livingstone" (New York, 1872); "Through the Dark Continent," an account of his second expedition (1878); "The Congo and the Congo Free State" (1885); "In Darkest Africa" (1890); and "Through South Africa" (1898).

STANLEY, Edward, statesman, b. in New Berne, N. C, about 1811: d. in San Francisco, Cal., 12 July, 1872. He was the son of John Stanley, who was several times speaker of the North Carolina legislature and twice a member of Congress. The son was educated at Capt. Allen Partridge's military academy in Middletown, Conn., studied and practised law, and was elected to congress as a Whig in 1836, and re-elected for the two succeeding terms. Having left congress in 1843, he represented Beaufort in the state house of commons from 1844 till 1849, serving during his last term as speaker. In 1847 he was elected attorney-general of the state. He was re-elected to congress in 1848 and returned for the succeeding term, at the close of which, in 1853, he removed to California, where he practised his profession, and in 1857, was the unsuccessful Republican candidate for governor. After the capture of New Berne on 14 March, 1862, and the occupation of other points in North Carolina by National troops, President Lincoln appointed Stanley military governor of his native state. The people were embittered by this, and, after vainly endeavoring to consolidate and give effect to the Unionist sentiment in North Carolina, he resigned and returned to California.

—His brother, Fabius, naval officer, b. in New Berne, N. C, 15 Dec., 1815: d. in Washington, D. C, 5 Sept., 1882, entered the navy as a midshipman, 20 Dec., 1831, was promoted to lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and during the Mexican war was attached to the Pacific squadron, where he did good service, participating in the capture and defence of San Francisco and other California ports. He assisted at the capture of Guaymas, where he led the storming party, and commanded a night expedition to the death of Commissary Partridge, where with thirty men he passed through the enemy's lines, spiked the guns, and returned in safety. He was also present at the capture of Mazatlan, commanded the outposts, and had frequent skirmishes with the enemy, in one of which he had a hand-to-hand contest, and received a lance wound in the breast. He was highly commended for his zeal and ability, and received the thanks of two secretaries of the navy for his services in the Mexican war. He commanded steamers of the Pacific mail company in 1850-1. During the Paraguay expedition he commanded the store-ship "Supply," and in 1859-'60 he had the steamer "Wyandotte" on the south side of Cuba. While he was at Key West he prevented what he supposed to be an attempt by the secessionists to seize Fort Taylor in December, 1860; but the rumor was contradicted, and he was relieved from his command for his excessive zeal, and sent to command the receiving-ship "Independence" in California. He was commissioned commander, 19 May, 1861, and was in the steamer "Narragansett" in the Pacific in 1862-4. He received the thanks of the state department for his diplomatic services in Mexico during this period. He commanded the "State of Georgia" on the coast of South Carolina in 1864-5, co-operated in the expedition up the Santee, and had charge of the expedition of Bull's bay. He was commissioned captain, 25 July, 1806; commodore, 1 July, 1820, and rear-admiral, 12 Feb., 1824. He was retired on 4 June, 1874, on his own application.

STANNOYD, George Jerrold, soldier, b. in Georgia, Oct. 20, 1829; d. in Washington, D. C., 31 May, 1886. He received an academic education, worked on his father's farm, teaching in winter, and was a clerk in a drug store from 1845 to 1847. He left the business, was a collector for half a year, and in 1848 commenced the manufacture of silk, which he conducted successfully until his death. He was a colonel of militia when the civil war began, and was the first man in Vermont to offer his services after the president's call for volunteers. He was commissioned as lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Vermont regiment, which was mustered into the service in May, 1861. He was at the first battle of Bull Run, and while stationed near the Chain bridge in the following autumn frequently led scouting parties into the enemy's territory. In May, 1862, he was commissioned colonel of the 9th Vermont infantry, which was stationed at Harper's Ferry when Col. Dixon S. Miles surrendered that post, and on being paroled went into camp at Chicago. On 11 March, 1863, he was commissioned as brigadier-general. His brigade of Vermont troops came up at close of the first day's battle at Gettysburg. On the second day he held the left slope of Cemetery hill till he was ordered farther to the left in the afternoon to oppose Gen. James Longstreet's assault after the rout of the 3d corps. His brigade closed the gap quickly, saving two batteries, retaking another, and capturing two Confederate guns. On the third day it opposed a solid front to Gen. George E. Pickett's division, and, when the Confederate column turned slightly to the left, threw the assailants into confusion by a flanking fire. Gen. Stan-nard was wounded in the action, and could not return to the field till May, 1864. At Cold Harbor he was struck by a rifle-ball, but brought off the remnant of his command. He led the advance on Petersburg, and was assigned to the command of a division, but was again wounded and, moreover, disabled by sickness. When he rejoined the army after a few weeks of absence he led the advance upon the defences of Richmond north of James river, and captured Fort Harrison, for which he was brevetted major-general on 28 Oct., 1864, but when the enemy attempted to storm the works the day following the leading bullet shattered his arm, necessitating amputation. He returned to his home, and in December, 1864, after the raid on St. Albans, was placed in charge of the defence of the northern frontier of Vermont. He resigned on 27 June, 1866, and was appointed collector of customs for the district of Vermont, which office he held till 1872.

STANNOYD, Arthur,l author, b. in New York city in 1781; d. about 1855. He was graduated at Columbia in 1799, and licensed to preach in 1810. Besides contributing to periodicals, he published several sermons and addresses, and was the author of "Elementary Catechism on the Constitution of the United States" (Boston, 1828) and a "Report of the Trial of Judge James H. Peck, or an Account of the Proceedings of the Judges and Representatives of the United States" (1833). His reports of the debates in congress for twenty years are embodied in Joseph Gales's and William W. Seaton's "Register of Debates" (14 vols., Washington, 1825-37). He also wrote and illustrated books for children.

STANNOYD, Howard, explorer, b. in New York city, 8 Feb., 1818; d. in Madison, Wis., 17 April, 1863. Early in life he became a civil engineer, and in October, 1828, he was placed in charge of the survey of proposed canals to unite Lake Erie and Lake Michigan with the Wabash river, and was also engaged in other surveys of western rivers. In 1830 he had charge of numerous public works in Indiana, in 1836 he made a survey of James river with a view toward improving the harbor of Richmond, and in 1837 he surveyed Illinois and Kaskaskia rivers, being afterward engaged upon the survey for a railroad from Milwaukee to Dubuque, and on the survey of the line of road from Milwaukee to Mississippi river. He became 1st lieutenant of U. S. topographical engineers on 7 July, 1838, captain in 1840, and in 1841 was engaged in a survey of the lakes. In 1842-5 he was in charge of the survey of the harbor of Portsmouth, N. H., a work which for minute accuracy of detail is unsurpassed in this country. In 1847 he was charged with the construction of an iron light-house on Cape-fort reef, Florida, which is the largest light-house on our coast. From 1849 till 1851 he was engaged in the Great Salt Lake expedition, his report of which gave him a wide reputation. In 1852-3 he was engaged upon the lake harbors, and in 1856 he was assigned to the charge of the military roads in Minnesota. He was appointed major on 28 Sept., 1859, and at the time of his death he was mustering and disbursing officer at Madison. Maj. Stansbury published "An Expedition to the Valley of the Great Salt Lake of Utah" (Philadelphia, 1852; 2d ed., 1855).

STANNOYD, Joseph, merchant, b. in England in 1790; d. in New York city in 1809. He emigrated to Philadelphia, where he became an importing merchant, and was generally respected for his integrity. In 1767 it was reported that he "sung 'God save the King' in his house, and that a number of persons present bore him the chorus," and before the close of that year he was imprisoned in Burlington, N. J. In 1777 he was appointed by Sir William Howe a commissioner for selecting and governing the city watch of Philadelphia, and in 1788 he was a manager of that officer's lottery for the relief of the poor. In 1789 the Whigs were again in possession of Philadelphia, and again imprisoned him, and the agent of the loyalists' estates was directed by the council of Philadelphia to make an inventory of his properties. His request for permission to live within the British lines was granted on the condition that he should promise to make no return to his property, which was then on Long Island, and that he would do nothing injurious to the Whig cause. He was liberated, his property was restored, and with his family he resided in New York during the remainder of the war, and afterward removed to Nova Scotia, but returned to Philadelphia in 1785, intending to resume his former occupation, but, threatened with violence, removed to New York, where he became secretary of an insurance company. He wrote in support of the crown, and his verses were edited by Winthrop Sargent under the title of Stansbury's and Oddell's "Loyal Verses" (Albany, 1800).

—His son, Philip, traveller, b. in New York city about 1802; d. about 1850, was the author of "A Pedestrian Tour of Two Thousand Three Hundred Miles in the Provinces of Upper Canada, and the New England States, performed in the Autumn of 1821" (New York, 1822). This work, which is exceedingly rare, is characterized by great keenness of observation, and contains one of the best descriptions extant of the important battle-fields included in the conquest of Canada in 1759-63, its invasion during the war of 1812, the wars with the Indians in the New England states, the Revolutionary contest in Massachusetts, and the disastrous expedition of Gen. Burgoyne. As a comparison between the customs, habits of living, modes of thought and educational interests of New England and New York, of eighty years since and to-day, Stansbury's work is valuable.

STANSEL (styled by Spanish and Portuguese writers STANCHEL, ESTANSEL, and ESTANSEL), Valentine, German astronomer, b. in Moravia in 1631; d. in Bahia, Brazil, 18 Dec., 1703. He became a Jesuit in 1637, and taught rhetoric and mathematics in the colleges of Olmertz and Prague. He was in Brazil in 1664, and made observations on the comets that appeared in that and the following year. He was appointed professor of theology in the Jesuit college of San Salvador, and continued to make astronomical observations, the results of which he sent to Europe. There is a full list of his works in Backer's "Bibliotheca de Tavrawis de la Companie de Jesus" (5th series), in which it is also shown that the dates of his death given in the "Biographie universelle" and other biographical dictionaries are incorrect. His principal writings are "Orbis Alphonseus" (Evora, 1658); "Legatus uranicus ex orbe novo in veterem; hoc est. Observations Americanae commentum factae conscriptae ac in Europam missae" (Prague, 1658); "Uranophi- lus coelestis peregrinus, sive Culi et salis anti-gratis ecstases" (Antwerp and Ghent, 1658); and "Mercurius Brasilius, sive Culi et salis brasiliensis economica." STANTON, Daniel, Quaker preacher, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1768; d. there, 28 June, 1779. He began to preach in 1728, travelled in New England and the West Indies, went to Europe in 1748, and visited the southern colonies in 1750, preaching zealously against slavery as well as worldliness and the vices of society. See "Journal of his Life, Travels, and Gospel Labors" (Philadelphia, 1772).

STANTON, Edwin McMasters, statesman, b. in Steubenville, Ohio, 19 Dec., 1814; d. in Washington, D. C., 24 Dec., 1869. His father, a physician, died while Edwin was a child. After acting for three years as a clerk in a book-store, he entered Kenyon college in 1831, but left in 1833 to study law. He was admitted to the bar in 1836, and, beginning his practice in Cadiz, was in 1837 elected prosecuting attorney. He returned to Steubenville in 1839, and was supreme court reporter in 1842-5, preparing vols. xii., xiii., and xiv. of the Ohio reports. In 1848 he removed to Pittsburg, Pa., and in 1857, on account of his large business, was made a U. S. supreme court judge. In supreme court of the three armies operating in the southwest, directed him to relieve Gen. William S. Rosecrans before his army at Chattanooga could be forced to surrender. President Lincoln said that he never took an important step without consulting his secretary of war. It has been asserted that, on the eve of Mr. Lincoln's first inauguration, he presented the following to Grant to make terms of peace with Gen. Lee, and that Mr. Stanton dissuaded him from such action.
According to a bulletin of Mr. Stanton that was issued at the time, the president wrote the despatch directing the general of the army to confer with the Confederate commander on none save purely military questions without previously consulting the members of the cabinet. At a cabinet council that was held in consultation with Gen. Grant, the terms on which Gen. William T. Sherman proposed the surrender of Gen. Johnston were disapproved by all who were present. To announce the telegram that was sent to Gen. Sherman, which directed him to guide his actions by the despatch that had previously been sent to Gen. Grant, forbidding military interference in the political settlement, a statement of the reasons for disapproving Sherman's arrangement was appended, obviously by the direction of Sec. Stanton. These were: (1) that it was unauthorized; (2) that it was an acknowledgment of the Confederate government; (3) that it re-established rebel state governments; (4) that it would enable rebel state authorities to restore slavery; (5) that it involved the question of the Confederate states debt; (6) that it placed the state of West Virginia in a different position from the state of Virginia; (7) that it abolished confiscation, and relieved rebels of all penalties; (8) that it gave terms that had been rejected by President Lincoln; (9) that it formed no basis for peace, but relieved rebels from the pressure of defeat, and left them free to renew the war. Gen. Sherman defended his course on the ground that he had before him the public examples of Gen. Grant. Terms to Gen. Lee's army, and Gen. Weitzel's invitation to the Virginia legislature to assemble at Richmond. His central motive, in giving terms that would be cheerfully accepted, he declared to be the peaceful disbandment of all the Confederate armies, and the prevention of guerrilla warfare. He had never seen President Lincoln's telegram to Gen. Grant of 3 March, 1865, above quoted, nor did he know that Gen. Weitzel's permission for the Virginia legislature to assemble had been rescinded.

A few days before the president's death Sec. Stanton tendered his resignation because his task was completed, but was persuaded by Mr. Lincoln to remain. After the assassination of Lincoln a strong movement of men began to demand the resignation of President Andrew Johnson, the Republican party, and Mr. Stanton took sides against the former on the subject of reconstruction. On 5 Aug., 1865, the president demanded his resignation; but he refused to give up his office before the next meeting of congress, following the urgent counsels of leading men of the Republican party. He was suspended by the president on 12 Aug. On 13 Jan., 1868, he was restored by the action of the senate, and resumed his office. On 21 Feb., 1868, the president informed the senate that he had removed Sec. Stanton, and designated a secretary ad interim. Mr. Stanton refused to surrender the office pending the action of the senate on the president's message. At a late hour of the same day the senate resolved that the president had not the power to remove the secretary, Mr. Stanton, thus sustained by the senate, refused to surrender the office. The impeachment of the president followed, and on 26 May, the vote of the senate being "guilty," 53, "not guilty," 19, he was acquitted—two thirds not voting for conviction. After Mr. Stanton's retirement from office he resumed the practice of law. On 9 Dec., 1869, he was appointed by President Grant a justice of the supreme court, and he was with the court confirmed by the senate. Four days later he expired.

The value to the country of his services during the civil war cannot be overestimated. His energy, inflexible integrity, systematized industry, comprehensive view of the situation in its military, political, and international aspects, his power to command and supervise the best services of others, and his unyielding will and invincible courage, made him at once the stay of the president, the hope of the country, and an oracle to dishonesty and weakness. Hodges the vastness of his labors led to brouse ness in repelling importunities, which made him many enemies. But none ever questioned his honesty, his patriotism, or his capability. A "Memoir" of Mr. Stanton is at present in preparation by his son, Lewis M. Stanton.

STANTON, Henry, soldier, b. in Vermont about 1790; d. in Fort Hamilton, N. Y., 1 Aug., 1836. He was appointed a lieutenant in the light artillery, 29 June, 1813, assistant deputy quartermaster-general in July, 1813, military secretary to Gen. George Izard in 1814, deputy quartermaster-general, with the rank of major, 13 May, 1829, acting adjutant-general under Gen. Thomas J. Jesup, in Florida; assistant quartermaster-general, with the rank of colonel, 7 July, 1838, and was brevetted brigadier-general for meritorious conduct in the Mexican war, 1 Jan., 1847.

STANTON, Henry Brewster, journalist, b. in Griswold, New London co., Conn., 29 June, 1805; d. in New York city, 14 Jan., 1857. His ancestor, Thomas, came to this country from England in 1635 and was crowned interpreter-general of the Indian dialects, and subsequently judge of the New London county court. His father was a manufacturer of wools and a trader with the West Indies. After receiving his education the son went in 1826 to Rochester, N. Y., to write for Thurlow Weed's newspaper, "The Monroe Telegraph," which was advocating the election of Henry Clay to the presidency. He then began to make political speeches. He removed to Cincinnati to complete his studies in Lane theological seminary, but left it to become an advocate of the anti-slavery cause. At the anniversary of the American anti-slavery society in New York city in 1834 he faced the first of the many mobs that he encountered in his tours throughout the country. In 1837-40 he was active in the movement among abolitionists into a compact political party, which was resisted by William Lloyd Garrison and others, and which resulted in lasting dissension. In 1840 he married Elizabeth Cady, and on 12 May of that year sailed with her to London, having been elected to represent the American anti-slavery society at a convention for the promotion of the cause. At its close they traveled through Great Britain and France, working for the relief of the slaves. On his return he studied law with Daniel Cady, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Boston, where he gained a reputation especially in patent cases, but he abandoned his profession to enter political life, and removing to Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1847, represented that district in the state senate. He was a member of the Free-soil party previous to the formation of the Republican party, of which he was a founder. Before this he had been a Democrat. For nearly half a century he was actively connected with the daily press, his contributions consisting chiefly of articles on current political topics and elaborate biographies of public men. Mr. Stanton contributed to Garrison's "Anti-Slavery Standard" "Liberator," wrote for the New York "Tribune," and from 1868 until his death was an editor of the New York "Sun." Henry Ward Beecher said of him: "I think Stanton has all the elements of old John Adams; able, stanch, patriotic, full of principle, and always unpopular. He had about the recesses of the people's opinion which keeps a man from running against them." Mr. Stanton was the author of "Sketches of Reforms and Reformers in Great Britain and Ireland" (New York, 1849), and "Random Recollections" (1886).—His wife, Elizabeth Cady, reformer, b. in Johnstown, N. Y., 12 Nov. 1815, is the daughter of Judge Daniel Cady, and, after receiving her first education, was graduated at Mrs. Emma Willard's seminary in Troy, N. Y., in 1832. While attending the World's anti-slavery convention in London in 1840 she met Lucretia Mott, with whom she was in sympathy, and with whom she signed the call for the first Woman's rights convention. This was held at her home in Seneca Falls, on 19 and 20 July, 1848, on which occasion the first formal claim of suffrage for women was made. She addressed the New York legislature on the rights of married women in 1854, and in advocacy of divorce for drunkenness in 1860, and in 1867 spoke before the legislature and the constitutional convention, maintaining that during the revision of the constitution the state was required to establish equal rights for citizens of both sexes; a right to vote for members of that convention. She canvassed Kansas in 1867 and Michigan in 1874, when the question of woman suffrage was submitted to the people of those states, and since 1869 she has addressed congressional committees and state constitutional conventions upon this subject, besides giving numerous lectures. She was present at the Women's Rights Convention in 1851 till 1865 of the national committee of her party, of the Woman's lyal league in 1863, and of the National woman suffrage association until 1873. In 1868 she was a candidate for congress. She has written many calls to conventions and addresses, and was an editor with Susan B. Anthony and Parker Pillsbury of "Of The Revolution," which was founded in 1868, and is joint author of "History of Woman's Suffrage" (vol.s i. and ii. New York, 1890; vol. iii. Rochester, 1886).—Their son, Theodore, journalist, b. in Seneca Falls, N. Y., 10 Feb., 1851, was graduated at Cornell in 1870. In 1878 he was the Berlin correspondent of the New York "Tribune," and he afterward engaged in journalism in The Christian Register, the Centennial Review, translated and edited Le Goût's "Life of Thiers" (New York, 1879), and is the author of "The Woman Question in Europe" (1884).

STANTON, Joseph, senator, b. in Charlestown, K. I., 19 July, 1739; d. there, 15 Dec., 1821. He served as 2d lieutenant in the Rhode Island regiment that was raised for the expedition against Canada in 1759, was a member of the general assembly of Rhode Island from 1763 till 1774 and of the committee of safety in 1776, and a delegate to the State convention that adopted the constitution of the United States in 1780. He was elected a U. S. senator, as a Democrat, serving from 25 June, 1790, till 3 March, 1793, was again a member of the same legislature in 1793, served as a member of the council of representatives, and was afterward chosen to congress, serving from 7 Dec., 1801, till 3 March, 1807.

STANTON, Oscar Fitzalan, naval officer, b. in Sag Harbor, N. Y., 18 July, 1834. He entered the navy as acting midshipman, 29 Dec., 1849, and was warranted midshipman from the same date. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy at Annapolis in 1853, promoted to master, 10 Sept., 1853, and commissioned lieutenant, 2 April, 1856, serving in the steamer "Mephisto," on the Paraguay expedition, in 1854-5, on the coast of Africa in 1859-60, and in the sloop "St. Mary's," of the Pacific squadron, from December, 1860, till April, 1862. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, commanded the steamer "Tiego" in the special West India squadron, in 1862-3, and the steamer "Panola," on the Western Gulf blockading squadron, in 1863-4. In 1865 he was on ordinance duty at New York, after which he served at the naval academy until May, 1867. He was promoted to commander, 2 Dec., 1867, and had charge of a sloop of war. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 Oct., 1868, and advanced to commander, in 1872, where he remained until November, 1884, when he took command of the steam frigate "Tennessee," flag-ship of the North Atlantic station. He was made commodore in 1893, rear-admiral, 1894, and was retired the same year.

STANTON, Richard Henry, jurist, b. in Alexandria, Va., 9 Sept., 1812. He received an academic education, studied law at the bar, and practised in Maysville, Ky. Being elected to congress as a Democrat, he served from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1853, and he was presidential elector on the Buchanan ticket in 1856, state attorney for his judicial district in 1858, a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1860, and district judge in 1862-74. He has edited the "Maysville Monitor and Maysville Express," and published a "Code of Practice in Civil and Criminal Cases in Kentucky" (Cincinnati, 1855); "Practical Treatises for Justices of the Peace, etc., of Kentucky" (1861); and a "Practical Manual for Executors, etc., in Kentucky" (1862).—His brother, Frederic Perry, lawyer, b. in Alexandria, Va., 1814; d. near Ocala, Fla., 4 June, 1894, obtained a good education, and was graduated at Columbian college in 1833. He studied law, was admitted to the bar of Alexandria in 1834, and removed to Memphis, Tenn., where he practised his profession. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1855, and in 1855-56 was chairman of the judiciary committee, in 1856-57 was a member of the committee on military affairs, was received into the Confederate army, and was governor of Kansas from 1858 till 1861. In 1863-4 he edited with Robert J. Mather the "Continental Monthly," and he had published numerous speeches in pamphlet form.—Richard Henry's son, Henry Thompson, poet, b. in Alexandria, 30 June, 1834; d. in Frankfort, Ky., 8 May, 1898, was educated in Kentucky and at the U. S. military academy, but was not graduated. He served as captain and major in the Confederate army. For several years he had been connected with the U. S. Indian commissioners in selecting lands for Indian reservations. He had invented an iron tie for binding cotton-bales, and is the author of "The Moneyless Man, and Other Papers" (Philadelphia, 1874). From 1855 till 1886 he edited the "Kentucky Yeoman."
from 1862 till 1866 he was professor of pastoral theology and homiletics in Danville theological seminary, and from 1866 till 1871 he was president of Miami university. In 1871-2 he engaged in literary work in New York, and subsequently he was an editor of the "Herald and Presbytery" in Cincinnati. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Princeton, and by Washington college, Va., in 1852. Dr. Stanton is the author of "The Church and the Rebellion" (New York, 1864).

STANTON, Silas Trumbull, journalist, b. in Stowington, Conn., 30 Dec., 1840; d. in New York city, 27 Feb., 1890. At Gen. William H. Russell's collegiate and commercial institute, New Haven, Conn. In 1875-8 he was appointed aide on the brigade staff of the national guard. During the canvass of 1880 he served as secretary of the Republican state central committee, and was an alternate delegate to the Republican national convention at Chicago in that year. He was executive secretary of state in Connecticut in 1879-'80, and was a member of the house of representatives in 1881-'2, and served in the state senate in 1884-'6, being president pro tempore in 1885-'6. He was defeated for secretary of state on the Republican ticket in 1882, and in that year declined the post of secretary of legation in Paris. Early in life he devoted himself to journalism, being connected with the Norwich, Conn., "Bulletin" and the Worcester, Mass., "Puss," achieving a reputation as a humorist.

STANWIX, John, British soldier, b. in England about 1690; d. at sea in December, 1766. His uncle served with reputation in the wars of Queen Anne as a brigadier-general. Entering the army in 1709, John became a captain of the grenadiers in 1719, major of marines in 1741, and lieutenant-colonel in 1745, and was appointed equerry to Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1749. In 1752 he was promoted to the government of Carlisle, which city he represented in parliament. In 1754 he became deputy quartermaster-general of the forces, and on 1 Jan., 1756, he was made colonel-commandant of the Ist battalion of the 60th or Royal American Fusiliers, and till his death he was the commandant of the southern district. During 1757 his headquarters were at Carlisle, Pa., and he was appointed brigadier-general on 27 Dec. of that year. After his relief by Gen. John Forbes in 1758, Gen. Stanwix went to Albany, whence he was ordered to the Onondaga carrying-place, to secure that important position by the erection of a work which was called Fort Stanwix in his honor. A map of this fort, with an account of its history, is contained in the "Documentary History of New York" (vol. iv.), and the Harvard college library possesses a copy of the manuscript journal of Ensign Moses Dorr, which includes an account of the building of Fort Stanwix. In 1759 he returned to Pennsylvania, repaired the 5th foot, and was a member of parliament for Appleby. He was lost at sea while crossing from Dublin to Holyhead in "The Eagle" packet.

STAPLES, John Jacob, manufacturer, b. in Prussia; d. in Newton, Long Island, N. Y., in 1806. Early in life he came to New York, and was identified with the Methodist church, being a trustee and steward of the John street preaching-house in 1774-'8. He was one of the first to introduce sugar-refining into this country. His first refinery was in Rector street, and the second and largest one in Liberty street. This was one of the famous "sugar-house" in which the British confined American prisoners during the Revolution. Mr. Staples acquired wealth, but his property was lost by his son, John Jacob, who engaged in speculation in England.

STAPLES, Walter Redd, jurist, b. in Patrick Court-House, Va., 24 Feb., 1826; d. 20 Aug., 1897. He was graduated at the University of Virginia, studied law, and was admitted to practice in 1848. He served in the legislature in 1853-'4, was presidential elector on the Whig ticket in 1856 and 1860, and one of four commissioners to the Provisional congress that met in Montgomery, Ala., in 1861. He served in the Confederate congress for the subsequent three years, and took an active part in its deliberations. In 1870-'82 he was a judge of the supreme court of Virginia. He was one of the three revisers of the code of laws for the state in 1884-'5, an associate justice of the Richmond and Danville railroad. During his term on the bench he acquired a national reputation for the learning, soundness, and conservatism that characterized his opinions. He also took high rank as a political speaker.

STAPLES, William Read, jurist and historian, b. in Providence, R. I., 10 Oct., 1798; d. there, 19 Oct., 1868. After graduation at Brown in 1817, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1819. He was associate judge of the Rhode Island supreme court from 1855 till 1854, and was chief justice of that court in 1854-'6. From 1859 till his death he was secretary and treasurer of the Rhode Island society for the encouragement of domestic industry, contributed biographies to its transactions, and was a founder of the Rhode Island historical society, serving as its librarian, secretary, and vice-president. Brown gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1862. He edited the second edition of "Rhode Island historical society's collections," and Samuel Gorton's "Simplicities' Defence against Seven-Headed Policy" (Providence, 1825), and published the "Annals of Providence to 1832" (1843): "Documentary History of the Destruction of the 'Gaspee'" (1845); "Proceedings of the First General Assembly for the Incorporation of Providence Plantations in 1647" (1847); and "Rhode Island Form-Book" (1859).

STARBUCK, Calvin Washburn, journalist, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 20 April, 1822; d. there, 15 Nov., 1870. He was educated at the public schools of his native city, but, as his parents' means were limited, he began very early to support himself. He learned the printing trade, and, having saved a little money, established, at nineteen, the Cincinnati "Cinnati" and the Cincinnati "True Democrat," two penny papers. Being the fastest type-setter in Ohio, he prepared a large part of the paper for years, and also assisted in distributing it to subscribers. It rapidly gained success, and its weekly edition had at one time the largest circulation in the west. To his exertions and generosity are mainly due the Relief union, the Home of the Friendless, and other charitable institutions of Cincinnati, while his private gifts were unfailing and constant. During the civil war he strove by voice and pen to establish the National credit when the government needed money. To the families of the men in his employment who had enlisted he continued their regular pay while they were in the service. When in 1864 the governor of Ohio tendered the home-guards of the state to the country for a hundred days. Starbuck left his business and went into the field.

STARK, John Henry, steamboat-proprietor, b. in Sammonsville, Fulton co., N. Y., 27 Aug., 1827. He received a good education, intending to study a liberal profession, but began business in a dry-goods store in Fultonville, N. Y., in 1843. He was postmaster of the place under President Polk's administration. Afterward he began to hire canal-boats to carry freight in the waters about New York city. Succeeding in this enterprise, he was soon able to buy boats, and he next invested in steamboats. Having purchased for his summer residence a group of islands in Long Island sound, near the town of New Rochelle, he opened a summer resort for excursionists there, and it has become very popular. He founded the Starin city, river, and harbor transportation company, of which he is the president. In 1877 he was elected to congress, and served one term.

STARK, Andrew, cherryman, b. in the county of Selkirk, Scotland, 1790; d. in Denny-loanhead, Scotland, 18 Sept., 1849. He was graduated at the University of Glasgow in 1811. studied theology at the University of Edinburgh, taught in London, and was licensed to preach in 1817 by the Associate presbytery of Edinburgh. He was pastor of the congregation of South Shields in 1818-19, and in 1820 came to America. In 1822 he was installed pastor of the Grand street associate church. In 1849, owing to impaired health, he visited Scotland, where he died. His remains were brought to this country. The University of London gave him the degree of LL. D. about 1844. He published several sermons, and wrote a "History of the Secession" in a series of papers printed in the "New York World," and published in the "Associate Presbyterian Magazine," to which he was a frequent contributor.

STARK, Benjamin, senator, b. in New Orleans, 26 June, 1829; d. in New London, Conn., 10 Nov., 1898. He was educated at an academy, entered a counting-house in New York, and became a merchant. In 1845 he removed to Oregon, and engaged in the salmon and a few months later--he was ordered to the "Stirling" and with a few others he made a trip up the Columbia. After he returned to the Ohio, he became a member of the legislature and was elected governor. In 1845 he resigned his office to take charge of the Stirling.

STARK, John, soldier, b. in Londonderry, N. H., 28 Aug., 1726; d. in Manchester, N. H., 8 May, 1822. His father emigrated from the north of Ireland and settled on the extreme frontier of New Hampshire in near neighborhood to the Indians, owned extensive tracts of land about Amoskeag falls, and was an original proprietor of Dunbarton (then called Starkstown). Here the son grew up with few advantages of book education, but with abundant training in hunting and all athletic employments. He made frequent hunting-excursions into the forest, and on one of these occasions, in 1752, was taken prisoner by the savages, and retained in captivity till he was ransomed by the colony of Massachusetts. The bold and defiant bearing of Stark excited the admiration of his savage captors, and after the initiatory ceremony of running the ganitlet, in which he took the unexpected part of using his club on the Indians, he was released from the drudgery usually imposed on captives, and was called by them "the young chief." The knowledge he thus gained of forest life and of the topography of the border was of great service in subsequent conflicts with the Indians. In 1755 he was appointed a lieutenant in Maj. Robert Rogers' famous corps of rangers, and served with it, soon rising to the rank of captain, through all the campaigns around Lake George and Lake Champlain, where there existed till this time many of his sagacity and bravery. At the close of the war he retired from the army and engaged in farming at Derryfield (now Manchester, N. H.), and so continued till tidings reached him of the battle of Lexington. Promptly he then mounted his horse, and, at the head of several hundred of his neighbors, set out to join the army at Cambridge. Being there appointed major, he was the next day organized a regiment of eight hundred hardy backwoodsmen. On 17 June, 1775, he was stationed about three miles north of Boston, in a position from which he had a full view of Bunker's and Breed's hills. Seeing that a battle was inevitable, he waited for no orders, but set out at once for the ground, which he reached just before the conflict began. He led his men into the assault, shouting, "Boys, aim at their waistbands"—an order that has become historical. His ammunition giving out, he was forced to retreat, which he did with much deliberation, leading his men under a hot fire, but in good order, across Charlestown neck to Merion hill. After the evacuation of Boston he marched with his regiment to New York. He was subsequently ordered to Canada, and then joining Washington, was with him at Trenton and Princeton. Having been slighted, as he thought, in the promotions, he resigned his commission and retired to his farm. When information arrived that Gen. Arthur St. Clair had retreated and Ticonderoga had been taken, New Hampshire flew to arms, and called for Stark to command among the troops. He consented on condition that he should not be subject to any orders but his own, and to this the council of state agreed, because the men would not march without him. Setting out with a small force for Bennington, he there learned that Burgoyne had despatched Col. Frederick Baum with 500 men to seize the stores collected at that place. Sending out expresses to inform the neighborhood, Stark marched out to meet him, hearing of which, Baum intruded himself in a strong position about six miles from Bennington, and sent to Burgoyne for re-enforcements. Before they could arrive, Stark attacked him on 16 Aug., 1777. Tradition says that he called to his men as he led them to the assault: "There they are, boys. We beat them today, or Molly Stark's a widow!"—another of his sentences that has gone into history. Doubts have been cast on its actuality, and it is said that Mrs. Stark's name was Elizabeth. The second British force of 500 men, under Col. Breymann, presently arriving on the scene, was likewise totally defeated. Of the 1,000 British, not more than a hundred escaped, all the rest being killed or captured, a result of great importance, as it led ultimately to the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga. Col. Banna, who was mortally wounded, said, "We fought more like hell-hounds than soldiers." The American loss was only about seventy. Washington spoke of it immediately as "the great stroke struck by Gen. Stark near Bennington"; and Baroness Riedesel, then in the British camp, wrote: "This unfortunate event paralyzed our operations."

For this victory Stark was made a brigadier-general, 4 Oct., 1777, and given the thanks of congress. He continued in active service during the remainder of the war, displaying everywhere distinguished ability and commanding the northern department in 1778 and 1781. In 1783 he retired to his farm, where he lived in republican simplicity till his death at the age of ninety-three. When he was eighty-nine years old the congress allowed him a pension of sixty dollars a month and a house for his old age and habits this was not essential to his comfort. He was a good type of the class of men who gave success to the American Revolution.

With the exception of Gen. Thomas Sumter, he was the last surviving general of the Revolutionary army. He was buried on his own grounds on the east bank of Manchester, where a simple granite obelisk was placed in 1829 to mark his resting-place. The citizens of Manchester planted memorial trees around it in 1876. In August, 1887, the corner-stone was laid in Bennington of the monument seen in the illustration. It is an obelisk of limestone, 301 feet high from foundation to apex. It is also proposed to erect at Manchester a massive equestrian statue in bronze of the general. Stark's biography was written by William McLean in Sparks's "American Biographty." See also his "Life and Official Correspondence," by his grandson, Caleb Stark (Concord, N. H., 1880).—His brother, William, soldier, b. in Londonerry, N. H., 12 April, 1724; d. on Long Island, N. Y., about 1777, acquired a good education, and was among the first to whom the proprietors granted lands in Londonerry. Previous to the erection of a public meeting-house the town-meetings were held at his home. He served in the old French war, and, as a captain of rangers on the northern frontier, was at Ticonderoga, and fought under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst at Louisburg and Long Island. At the beginning of the Revolution he applied for the command of a regiment, but another officer was preferred by the New Hampshire assembly, and deeming this an insult, he entered the British service as colonel. He endeavored to persuade his brother John to adopt this course, but without success. He is described as possessing great bravery and hardihood, but as wanting in moral firmness. His name appears in the banishment and proscription act of New Hampshire, and his estate was confiscated. He was a proprietor of Piggwacket (now Plymouth), Vt., and in 1793 sold his farm for $1,800 as a legacy for his son. His death was caused by a fall from his horse.—John's son, Caleb, merchant, b. in Dunbarton, N. H., 3 Dec., 1739; d. on his estate in Oxford township, Ohio, 26 Aug., 1838, served at the age of fifteen as ensign in his father's regiment at Bunker Hill, and remained with the army until the close of the war, rising to the rank of brigade-major. He lived on his estate until his death, and was buried in New Hampshire. He is the second son named Caleb. He was an attorney of the New Hampshire legislature, and was the author of "Reminiscences of the French War, containing Rogers's Expeditions with the New England Rangers, and an Account of the Life and Military Service of John Stark" (Concord, 1841); "Memoir and Official Correspondence of Gen. John Stark; with Notices of other Officers of the Revolution" (1860); and "History of Dunbarton, N. H., from the earliest time to Mason's Assigns in 1751 to 1800" (1869).—John's great-grandson, William, lawyer, b. in Manchester, N. H., about 1890; d. in Somerville, Mass., 29 Oct., 1873, was graduated at Williams in 1850, studied law, was admitted to the bar of New York in 1854, and practised in Nassau. In 1853 he removed to Manchester, remaining there until 1870, when he resigned the practice of law in Somerville, Mass., as his faculties had become impaired. Previously he had devoted himself to literary pursuits and to the care of a large collection of rare birds and animals. His park in Manchester, which was open to the public, was widely known. He wrote several poems, and frequently lectured.

wanee, Wis. and practised law until 1861. On 17 May, 1861, he was made colonel of the 1st Wisconsin volunteers, took part in the battles of Falling Waters, 2 July, 1861, and Edward's Ferry, 29 July, 1861, and was mustered out on 21 Aug., 1861. Reorganizing his regiment for three years, by special order of the war department, he again enlisted and served in Kentucky and northern Alabama. He participated in the battle of Perryville, Ky., 8 Oct., 1862. He was also engaged at Stone river, 31 Dec., 1862, and 1-2 Jan., 1863, and remained on duty at Murfreesboro, Tenn., until 23 June, 1863. He was appointed brigadier-general of U. S. volunteers on 17 July, 1863, commanded brigades and divisions in the Army of the Cumberland, participated in the attack at Chickamauga, 19-21 Sept., 1863, where he was wounded, in battles around Chattanooga, Tenn., 23-25 Nov., 1863, and in the assault and capture of Mission Ridge, Tenn., 23-25 Nov., 1863. He served on the court-martial that tried Gen. William A. Hammond, surgeon-general, U. S. army, and was charged with committing several atrocities in Tennessee and Alabama, he was mustered out of the army on 11 May, 1865. After farming for several years in Wisconsin, and occupying posts of importance and trust, he removed to Washington, D. C., where he engaged in practice, having been admitted to the bar in 1857.—His cousin, Howard S. Hammond, of Dayton, Ohio, was also in the army. Hammond, D. C., 28 Jan., 1876, was educated in public schools, studied law, was admitted to the bar, served in the Connecticut legislature in 1856, and was a delegate to the National Republican conventions that nominated Lincoln in 1860 and Grant in 1868. In 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln to be postmaster of Dayton, Ohio, and served under President Johnson in 1863, but resigned in 1865. He was then chosen to congress as a Republican, and served from 4 March, 1867, until his death, being thrice reelected.

STARNES, Henry, Canadian statesman, b. in Kingston, Ontario, 13 Oct., 1816; d. in Montreal, 31 Dec., 1896. As a child, he was a member of the firm of Leslie, Starnes and Co., wholesale merchants in Montreal. He represented Chateauguay in the Canadian assembly from 1857 till 1863, when he retired. He became a member of the executive council, province of Quebec, in 1878, speaker of the legislative council in 1879, was commissioner of railways in 1882-4, and commissioner of public works in the Taillon ministry for a short time in 1887. Mr. Starnes had been warden of Trinity house, manager of the Ontario bank in Montreal, president of the Sheddiont county railway, and mayor of Montreal in 1856 and 1866.

STARR, Alfred Adolphus, lecturer, b. in New York city, 23 Dec., 1826, educated in private schools in New York and in Mendham, N. J., after which he entered mercantile life, which he abandoned in 1845, and began to deliver lectures, which he illustrated with a crude solar microscope made of pasteboard. Afterward he made an oxyhydrogen microscope, and several years later he produced a fine apparatus. He has given more than 2500 lectures and exhibitions before schools and colleges, and was also connected with Phineas T. Barnum. Using a microscope of enormous power, he projected living specimens on his screen, and, being a skilful manipulator, regulated their performances with dexterity, showing water-insects and animalcules feeding upon or fighting with each other. He was one of the first to procure a patent (1858) to light railroad-cars with gas.

STARR, Eliza Allan, author, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 29 Aug., 1824. She received her education in her native town, became a member of the Roman Catholic church in 1850, and has since devoted herself principally to the study of Christian art. In 1860 she removed to Chicago. She has published a volume of poems (1867), and "Patron Saints" (New York, 1871).

STARR, Frederick Ratchford, author, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 19 June, 1821; d. in Philadelphia, 27 April, 1889. He became president of an insurance company in Philadelphia, but retired in 1870 and moved to Chicago, where he was the Echo farm, a dairy and stock-farm that has become widely known. Later the Echo farm company was organized by him, which controls large creameries throughout a great part of Litchfield county. Mr. Starr served in the Connecticut legislature in 1855-6 and had been interested in temperature and other reforms. He had lectured and is the author of "Dyderly Dumps, the Newsboy" (Philadelphia, 1866): "May I Not? or Two Ways of looking through a Telesope" (1867); "What Can I Do? A Question for Professing Christians" (1867; revised ed., 1887); "Farm Echoes" (New York, 1881); and "From Shore to Shore" (Philadelphia, 1887).

STARRS, William, clergyman, b. in Drumquin, County Antrim, Ireland, in 1807; d. in New York city, 6 Feb., 1875. After receiving a good classical education, he studied theology at Maynooth college, near Dublin, Ireland, came to this country in 1828, was received into the diocese of New York, completed his theological course at St. Mary’s seminary, Baltimore, and in 1834 was ordained a priest at St. Patrick’s cathedral in New York. He resided at New York till 1844 when he went to Chicago, Ill., where he lived until 1853, when he was appointed rector of St. Patrick’s cathedral and vicar-general of the archdiocese of New York. After the death of Archbishop Hughes in 1864, Dr. Starrs was administrator of the diocese until the succeeding bishop was appointed, to whom he resigned the duties in the interest of the church. He resided in New York till 1866, and also filled this office at two councils of the province. For twenty years he was the spiritual superior of the Sisters of Charity, and president of the trustees of St. Vincent’s hospital. He was instrumental in instituting the Sisters of Mercy and Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

STAUGHTON, William, clergyman, b. in Coventry, Warwickshire, England, 4 Jan., 1770; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 Dec., 1820. He was graduated at the Baptist theological institution, Bristol, in 1792, and the next year came to this country, landing at Charleston. After preaching for more than a year at Georgetown, S. C., he removed to New York city, and thence to New Jersey, residing for some time at Bordentown, where, in 1797, he was ordained, and then at Bucks County. At the latter place he remained until 1805, when he accepted a call to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church of Philadelphia. After a successful ministry there of six years, he identified himself with a new enterprise, which resulted in the formation of a church and the erection of a large house of worship on Sansom street. His pastorate of this church, extending from 1811 till 1822, was one of great success. Besides preaching regularly three times on Sunday and once or twice during the week, he was the principal of a Baptist theological school. In 1822 he was called to the presidency of Columbian college, D. C., which office he resigned in 1827, and was elected in 1829 president of Georgetown college, Ky. He died in Washington, while on his way to this new field of service. He was probably the most eloquent Baptist minister of his time in this country. He received from Princeton the degree of D. D. in 1801. Besides a volume of poems, which he issued when he was seventeen years old, he published consisted of a few occasional sermons and discourses, among them "Eulogium on Dr. Benjamin Rush" (1813). See a "Memoir" by Rev. W. Lynd (Boston, 1834).

ST ANTON, William, clergyman, b. in Chester, England, 20 April, 1808; d. 29 Sept., 1889. At the age of fifteen he came to the United States, and received a good English and classical training under one of Dr. Hobart's former students. He studied theology under Rev. Dr. (afterward Bishop) Whitehouse in Rochester, N.Y., from 1830 till 1833, was ordained deacon in Oneida Castle, N.Y., 9 June, 1833, by Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk, and priest in Zion church, Palmyra, N.Y., 7 Sept., 1834, by the same bishop. During his diocesan he served as missionary in Palmyra and Lyons, N.Y.: St. Peter's, Seneca, Mass., from 1833–7, and of St. Peter's church, Morristown, N.J., 1840–7, founded St. Peter's church, Brooklyn, N.Y., and was its rector in 1848–51, and was rector of Trinity church, Potsdam, N.Y., 1852–9. Afterward, having given up active parochial work, he had resided in New York city, and been engaged in literary and other occupations. He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart in 1856. Dr. Stanton had published "Dictionary of the Church," which was subsequently revised and enlarged under the title of "Eccelesiastical Dictionary" (New York, 1844–61); "The Catechist's Manual" (1850); "Songs and Prayers for the Family Altar" (1860); "Book of Common Prayer" (1869); a prize "De Doctrina" and original "Voluntaries for the Organ," and "Episodes in Clerical and Parish Life" (1887). In 1878 he took charge of the musical science department in a new cyclopedia, and wrote nearly all the articles on that subject. He had also contributed freely to church literature in magazines and reviews.

ST EARS, Asahel, educator, b. in Lunenburg, Mass., 24 Nov., 1805; d. at Cambridge, Mass., 2 Feb., 1839. His ancestor, Isaac Stearns, came to this country from England in 1630, and was among the first settlers of Watertown, Mass. Asahel was graduated at Harvard in 1797, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice at Chelmsford, Mass. He was for several years county attorney for Middlesex, a member of congress in 1815–17, and professor of law at Harvard in 1817–29. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, and was one of the commissioners for revising the statutes of Massachusetts, which was his last labor. He published "Summary of the Law and Practice of Real Actions, with an Appendix of Practical Forms" (Hallowell, 1834), and, with Lemuel Shaw, "General Laws, 1780–1822," edited by the law at Harvard in 1823–26.

ST EARS, Charles, clergyman, b. in Lebanon, Mass., 19 July, 1755; d. in Lincoln, Mass., 26 July, 1826. He was graduated at Harvard in 1773, afterward taught school, and studied theology, and in 1780–1 was a tutor at Cambridge. In 1781 he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church at Lincoln, where he remained till his death. He received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1810. He published "The Ladies' Philosophy of Love, a Poem in Four Cantos" (1797); "Principles of Morality and Religion" (1798); and sermons and other works.

ST EARS, Charles Woodward, physician, b. in Springfield, Mass., in 1818; d. in Longmeadow, Mass., 8 Sept., 1887. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, and took his medical degree at the University of Pennsylvania in 1840. After practising for some time he entered the army as a surgeon, subsequently travelled and studied in Europe, and at the opening of the civil war entered the service as surgeon of the 3d New York regiment. He was on service at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Suffolk, Va., Fortress Monroe, and in the field. Dr. Stearns was widely known as an enthusiastic Shakespearean student and writer. His principal works are "Shakespeare's Medical Knowledge" (New York, 1849); "The History of the World Through Wisdom and Knowledge" (1849); and "Constitution of the United States" (1860).

ST EARS, George Luther, merchant, b. in Medford, Mass., 8 Jan., 1809; d. in New York, 9 April, 1867. His father, Luther, was a teacher of reputation. In early life his son engaged in the business of ship-chandlery, and after a prosperous career undertook the manufacture of beer and sheet-iron. He was rector of Trinity church in Cambridge, and afterward of Trinity church in Medford. He identified himself with the anti-slavery cause, became a Free-soiler in 1848, aided John Brown in Kansas, and supported him till his death. Soon after the opening of the civil war Mr. Stearns advocated the enlistment of negroes in the National army. The 54th and 55th Massachusetts regiments, and the 5th cavalry (colored), were largely recruited through his instrumentality. He was commissioned major through the recommendation of Sec. Stanton, and was of great service to the National cause by enlisting negroes for the volunteer service in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Tennessee. He was the founder of the "Commonwealth" and "Right of Way" newspapers for the dissemination of his views.

ST EARS, John, physician, b. in Wilbrington, Mass., 16 May, 1770; d. in New York city, 18 March, 1848. He was graduated at Yale in 1790, and at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, in 1812. He settled at Waterford, N.Y., in 1793, was in the New York senate in 1809–11, in 1810 removed to Albany, and in 1819 went to New York city, and remained there till his death. He originated the Saratoga county medical society, and in 1807 the Medical society of the state of New York, and in 1846 was the first president of the New York academy of medicine. He was also a founder of the American tract society. He contributed valuable medical discoveries to the New York "Medical Repository," and published numerous addresses (1847).

ST EARS, John Glazier, author, b. in Acker- worth, Cheshire co., N. H., 22 Nov., 1795; d. in Clinton, N. Y., 16 Jan., 1874. He was graduated in the first class at Hamilton literary and theological institution (now Madison university) in 1822, and was ordained a minister of the Baptist church. He was for fifty years a preacher in central New York, and published, among other works, "Dialogue on the Means of separating Masonry from the Church of Christ" (Utica, 1828); "Inquiry into the Nature and Tendency of Freemasonry" (1829); "An Antidote for the Doctrine of Universal Salvation" (1829); "Essays on the Influence of the Spirit and the Word in Regeneration"; "The Primitive Church" (1833); "The Sovereignty of God and Moral Agency" (1836); "Letters on Freemasonry" (1860); and several smaller works.

ST EARS, John Newton, editor, b. in New Ipswich, N. H., 24 May, 1829; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 21 April, 1893. He was carefully prepared for college, but impaired health prevented his entering. On attaining his majority he came to New York city and engaged in literary pursuits. In 1838 he became editor and proprietor of "Merry's Museum, and was widely known as "Robert Merry." He joined the order of the Sons of Temperance when it was in its infancy, and in 1866 was chosen most worthy patriarch, its highest office in this country. At his suggestion in 1865, the National temperance society and publication-house was organized, and he was appointed its corresponding secretary and publishing agent. In 1865 he became the editor of the "Temperance Advocate," and he has since held that place as having charge of the "Youth's Temperance Banner." In addition to his editorial work, he had issued annually since 1866 "The National Temperance Almanac and Temperator's Year-Book," and he had published "The Temperance Chorus" (New York, 1867); "The Temperance Speaker" (1869); "The Centennial Temperance Volume" (1876); "The Prohibition Songster" (1885); and "One Hundred Years of Temperance" (1889).

STEARS, John William, educator, b. in Sturbridge, Mass., in 1840. He was graduated at Harvard in 1869, was appointed professor of Latin in the University of Chicago in 1865, and in 1874 became director of the National normal school in that city. He was subsequently president of the normal school at Whitewater, Wis.

STEARS, Junius Brutus, artist, b. in Arlington, Va., 2 July, 1810; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1885. He was a pupil at the Academy of design, New York city, where in 1848 he became an associate, and an academician the following year. In the same year he went to Europe and spent some time there. After his return he became in 1851 recording secretary at the National academy, holding that post until 1865. His work was mainly in portraiture, but he painted also numerous historical subjects. Of these the best known are the "Washington Series," five paintings representing Washington as a citizen, farmer, soldier, statesman, and Christian. His "Millennium" is in the Academy of design, New York city, and was confined for nearly three years in a prison in Worcester, Mass. While he was a resident of New York he made the calculations for the first nautical almanac in this country, which he published, 29 Dec., 1822. He edited the "Philadelphia Magazine" in 1798, and published "Tour to London and Paris" (London, 1798); "A History of the Medical and Physical Society of the State of Pennsylvania" (1791); and "The American Herbal, or Materia Medica" (Walpole, N. H., 1801). He labored twenty-eight years on a "Medical Dispensatory," and to obtain information for it travelled for nine years in Europe and this country, but died before its completion. On the list of subscribers for this work were the names of all the leading physicians of Philadelphia.

STEARS, Samuel Horatio, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Mass., 12 Sept., 1801; d. in Paris, France, 15 July, 1837. His father, Samuel, was for forty years pastor of the Congregational church in Bedford, Mass. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1823, became a minister of the Congregational church, and was pastor of the church at Old Saybrook, Conn. He was married 10 April, 1834, till his death. A volume of his discourses, with a memoir by his brother, William A. Stears, was published (Boston, 1838).—His brother, William Augustus, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Mass., 17 March, 1805; d. in Amherst, Mass., 8 June, 1876, was graduated at Harvard in 1827, studied theology at Andover, and, after teaching for a short time at Duxbury, was ordained a minister of the Congregational church, and installed pastor of the church at Cambridgeport, Mass., 11 Dec., 1831. When the Rev. Edward Hitchcock resigned the presidency of Amherst college in 1831, Mr. Stearns was chosen to succeed him, and he held the office till his death. He published "Infant Church Membership" (Boston, 1844); "Infant Church Member's Guide" (1845); "Life and Select Discourses of Rev. Samiel H. Stearns" (1846); "Discourses and Addresses" (1855); "A Plea for the Nation," posthumous (1876); and sermons and discourses. —William Augustus's son, William French, merchant, b. in Cambridgeport, Mass., 9 Nov., 1834; d. in Orange, N. J., 21 May, 1874, was engaged in the East India trade, and for several years was a resident of Bombay, India, as head of the firm of Stearns, Hobart and Co. On his return to this country he established a house in New York for the same class of trade. He rendered great services to the American board of foreign missions during the civil war, built a church for Amherst college, and, as the personal friend and correspondent of Dr. David Livingstone, aided largely in fitting out his last expedition. —Another brother of Samuel Horatio, Jonathan French, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Mass., in 1808; d. 12 Nov., 1889, was graduated at Harvard, studied theology at Andover seminary, and was licensed to preach in 1834, was minister of the Presbyterian church in Newburyport, Mass., in 1835-49, and in December, 1849, became pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Newark, N. J., which connection continued about thirty years. In 1836 he was a commissioner from the presbytery of Londonderry to the general assembly in Pittsburg, and he was moderator of the general assembly that met in Harrisburg in 1868. He published "Sermon on the Death of Daniel Webster" (Newark, 1852), and "Historical Discourses relating to the First Presbyterian Church in Newark" (1853). —Another brother, Ebenezer Sperry, educator, b. in Bedford, Mass., in 1821; d. in Nashville, Tenn., in 1887, was graduated at Harvard in 1841, was master of the normal school at Framingham, Mass., of the Albany female academy, and in 1873 became chancellor of Nashville university. Amherst gave him the degree of D. D. in 1876. —Samuel Horatio's cousin, Edward Josiah, author, b. in Bedford, Mass., 24 Feb., 1810; d. 6 July, 1890, was graduated at Harvard in 1833, ordained a clergyman of the Episcopal church, and was professor of modern languages in St. John's college in 1849-53. At other times he was either teaching or rector of a parish. He had published "Notes on Uncle Tom's Cabin" (Philadelphia, 1853); "Practical Guide to English Pronunciation" (Boston, 1857); "The Afterpiece to the Comedy of Convocation" (Baltimore, 1870); "Birth and New Birth, a New Treatment of an Old Subject" (1872); "The Faith of Our Forefathers; an Examination of Archbishop Gibbon's "Faith of Our Fathers"" (New York, 1859); and "The Archbishop's Champion Brought to Book" (1881).

STEBBINS, Emma, artist, b. in New York city, 1 Sept., 1817; d. there, 25 Oct. 1882. For several years she devoted herself to painting in oil and water-colors, working also in crayon and pastels. She subsequently turned her attention to sculpture. In 1857 she went to Rome, where she studied under an Italian master, and also with Paul Akers. She executed a large fountain representing "The Angel of the Waters," (1858) in Central Park, New York; a bust of Horace Mann in Boston (1860); "Joseph," "The Angel of Prayer," and a bust of Charlotte Cushman (1859); a bust of John W. Stebbins in the Mercantile library, New York; and other works. While in Rome she won the friendship of Charlotte Cushman, with whom she returned to the United States in 1870. She prepared a memoir of Miss Cushman, at her request, after the actress's death (Boston, 1878).

STEECKL, Louis Joseph René, Canadian civil engineer, b. in Wintzenheim, Alsace, 6 Sept., 1844. He was educated at Benfeld, Alsace, and at Laval university, Quebec. He came to Quebec in 1857, and in the following year went to the western part of the United States, remaining till 1860, when he returned to Quebec. After studying civil engineering in America he returned to France, and dedicated his profession successfully, and has been chief clerk of the engineering branch of the department of public works, Canada, since July, 1859. In addition to other important work, he carried on extensive hydrographic surveys in 1881-2 of St. Lawrence ship-channel between Quebec and Cap à la Roche, and from 1884 till 1887 extensive geodetic levelling (Quebecs and St. Lawrence rivers, from Lake Champlain to tide-water in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He invented in 1868 a perfected flute, called the "Harmonic flute," and exhibited at the Indian and colonial exhibition, in London in 1886, a piccolo constructed on his system, and geodetic rods as perfected by him. He has published "Treatise on Geometry and Trigonometry" (Quebec, 1866), and "Essay on the Contracted Liquid Vein affecting the Present Theory of the Science of Hydraulics" (Ottawa, 1884).

STEDINGK, Curt Böziska Louis Christopher, Count von, Swedish soldier, b. in his father's castle of Pimnau, Pomerania, 26 Oct., 1749; d. in Stockholm. He was graduated at the University of Upsala in 1768, entered the Swedish army in his youth, took part in the war against Prussia, and, entering the French service in the Royal regiment of Sweden, rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. At Versailles, where he remained on duty, he lived on intimate terms of friendship with Count Axel Fersen. In command of a brigade of infantry he sailed in D'E斯塔ing's fleet in 1778, and gained credit in the operations against the West Indies; his conduct was praised in the expedition to Granada. In the attack upon Savannah, 9 Oct., 1779, the rashness and probable failure of which he predicted to D'E斯塔ing, led one of the two principal assaults, and, after planting the American flag on the last intrenchment, was wounded and compelled to retreat with the loss of half his brigade of infantry. After the battle of Vaux-le-Vicomte, the king made him colonel of the regiment of Alsace and knight of the Protestant branch of the Order of St. Louis, while the king of Sweden, in recognition of his services in America, made him colonel of dragoons and knight of the Order of the Sword. He also received the badge of the Society of the Cincinnati. He left France in 1787, took part in the war between Sweden and Russia, and was rewarded for his services by being appointed Swedish ambassador at St. Petersburg in 1790, which post he long retained. In 1814 he repaired to Paris in command of the Swedish army, and was the ambassador of the king of Sweden to sign the treaty of peace with France.

STEDMAN, Charles, soldier, b. in Philadelphia in 1753; d. in London, 26 June, 1812. He entered the army, served as an officer under Lord Percy at Lexington in 1775, and subsequently with Lord Howe in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and with Lord Cornwallis in the south. During his later years he was a deputy-comptroller of the stamp-office. He published "The History of the Origin, Progress, and Termination of the American War" (2 vols., London, 1794; Dublin, 1794). This excellent work is especially valuable for its military maps.

STEDMAN, Edmund Clarence, poet, b. in Hartford, Conn., 8 Oct., 1833. The son of Edmund W. Stedman, a merchant of Hartford, and Elizabeth C. Dodge, who was a sister of William E. Dodge, and who, subsequently to the death of Mr. Stedman, married William B. Kinney. Mr. Stedman is further related through his mother to William Ellery Channing, Bishop A. C. Cope, Ex-President of Union College, and T. W. Higginson. He was prepared for college at Norwich, Conn., and in 1849 entered Yale, where he distinguished himself in Greek and in English composition. His poem of "The Wonders and Marvels of an Abbey," published in the "Yale Literary Magazine" in 1851, received a first prize. In his junior year he was suspended for irregularities, and did not receive his degree until 1871, when he was restored to his class, and received the degree of A.M. From 1852 to 1855 Mr. Stedman edited successively the Norwich "Tribune" and the "Winsted Herald." He then removed to New York city, where he contributed to "Vanity Fair," "Putnam's Monthly," "Harper's Magazine" and other periodicals, and finally drifted into journalism. During 1859 his poems "The Diamond Wedding," "How Old John Brown took Harper's Ferry," and similar lyrics appeared in the "Tribune." Their success led him to issue his "Poems, Lyric and Idyllic" (New York, 1860). He joined the editorial staff of "The Nation," 1861, and was war correspondent for that paper, 1861-3. Later he accepted an appointment under Attorney-General Bates, but in 1864 he returned to New York and relinquished journalism to adopt some pursuit that would leave him more leisure for literary work. To this end Mr. Stedman soon purchased a seat in the stock exchange, and became a broker. His poetry of this period is included in "Alice of Monmouth, an Idyll of the Great War" (New York, 1864); "The Blameless Prince" (Boston, 1869); "Poetical Works" (1873). With T. B. Aldrich, he edited "Camoes" (Boston, 1874), selected from the works of Walter Savage Landor. He also edited, with an introduction, "Poems of Austin Dobson" (New York, 1880). About 1875 Mr. Stedman began to devote attention to critical writing, and contributed to "Scribner's Monthly" a series of sketches, which were later rewritten and published as "Victorian Poets" (Boston, 1873; London, 1876; 13th ed., with a supplement, bringing it down to 1887). In a similar manner he prepared "Poets of America" (Boston, 1886). With Ellen M. Hutchison he edited a "Library of American Literature" in eleven volumes (1888-90). In 1891 Mr. Stedman succeeded Mr. Lowell as president of the American copyright league. In the same year he delivered the initiatory course of lectures of the Tuckchair chair of poetry at Johns Hopkins University. These lectures were repeated at Columbia college and at the University of Pennsylvania, and were afterward published in the volume "The Nature and Elements of Poetry" (1897). In 1895 appeared "A Victorian Anthology." An American Anthology" is now in press, the two volumes supplementing their editor's critical reviews of the poetry of Great Britain and the United States during the 19th century.

In 1894-5 Mr. Stedman also edited and brought out, in conjunction with Prof. G. E. Woodberry, a definitive edition of Poe's works, in ten volumes, with a biography, and critical essays on Poe's tales, criticisms, and poems. In 1897 appeared Poems by New England Colleges. Mr. Stedman also delivered many poems on public occasions, the most important of which are "Gettysburg," 1871; the "Dartmouth Ode," 1873; "The Monument of Greeley." 1876; "The Death of Bryant"; "Meridian, an Old-Fashioned Poem" (read at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Yale class of 1853, 1878); "Corda Concordia" (read before the Summer school of Philosophy and Religion in the "Yale Ode," set to music by Horatio Parker, 1893. He has also been engaged during many years on a complete metrical translation of the Greek idyllic poets. Other publications include "Octavius Brooks Frothingham and the New Faith" (New York, 1876); "Hawthorne, and other Poems" (1877); "Lyrics and Idylls" (London, 1879). The "Oxford Poem, was published by the "Academy," 1880, (Boston, 1882). In 1891 Mr. Stedman received the degree of LL. D. from Columbia, and in 1884 the degree of LL. D. from Yale. In 1896 he removed from New York city to Lawrence Park, Bronxville, N. Y., where he now resides. - His cousin, Griffin Alexander, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 6 Jan., 1838; d. near Petersburg, Va., 5 Aug., 1864, was graduated at Trinity in 1859, and began to study law, but in 1861 entered the volunteer army as captain in the 5th Connecticut regiment. He was transferred to the 11th Connecticut as major after seeing service in the Shenandoah valley, and took part in the battle of Antietam, leading half of the regiment in the charge on the stone bridge, and receiving a severe wound. Later he served at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg, and at the beginning of the overland campaign of 1864 was placed at the head of a brigade. He repeatedly won the commendation of his superiors, and was mortally wounded in one of the skirmishes that followed the mine-explosion at Petersburg. Fort Stedman, one of the works near that place, had been named for him. He had been strongly recommended for promotion to brigadier-general, and was given that rank by brevet, to date from 5 Aug., 1864. His grave at Hartford is marked by a monument of granite and bronze.

STEDMAN, John Gabriel, British soldier, b. in Holland in 1744; d. in England in 1797. He early lost his paternal estate, and expected to enter the navy, but accepted an ensign's commission in the Scotch brigade in the Dutch service, and was a lieutenant when in 1722 a negro insurrection began in the colony of Surinam. He volunteered his company the expectation that was with the Dutch to suppress it, and was given the brevet rank of captain. On his return in 1777 he was promoted to major, and just before resigning from the service, at the beginning of hostilities with England in 1783, was made lieutenant-colonel. He published a valuable "Narrative of an Expedition against the Revoluted Negroes of Surinam," which contains authentic information of the influence which its inhabitants (2 vols., London, 1796; enlarged edition, 1800).

STEEDMAN, Charles, naval officer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 24 Sept., 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 13 Nov., 1890. He entered the navy, became a passed midshipman, 14 Jan., 1834, and cruised in the Mediterranean in the frigates "Constitution" and "United States." He was promoted to lieutenant, 24 Feb., 1841, and during the Mexican war served in the sloop "St. Mary's" in 1846-7. At the bombardment of Vera Cruz he commanded the siege-guns in the naval battery on shore, and he participated in other operations on the coast and in the boat expedition that captured Tampico. He was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and in 1857-8 was stationed at Pensacola, and commanded the brig "Dolphin." Notwithstanding the efforts of his family and friends in his native state to induce him to join the seceded states, he remained loyal and rendered valuable service to the Union. He immediately asked for duty, took command of the railroad ferry steamer "Maryland," and conveyed Gen. Benjamin F. Butler with the 8th Massachusetts regiment from Hatteras to Annapolis, Md., on 19 April, 1861. He then went to the west temporarily and assisted Admiral Foote in organizing the naval forces that operated on the Mississippi river in the gun-boats. In September, 1861, he commanded the steamer "Biville," in which he led the second column of vessels at the capture of Port Royal, S. C., and participated in operations on the coast of Georgia and Florida. He returned north in the spring, and took command of the steamer "Paul Jones," in which he assisted in the capture of Fort McAllister, on Ogeechee river, in August, 1862, and operated on St. John's river, Fla., during the following month. He was promoted to captain, 13 Sept., 1863, and in the steamer "Powhatan" took part in the blockade off Charleston and in several engagements there. He then towed the captured ram "Atlanta" to Philadelphia, took command of the steamer "Ticonderoga," and went to the coast of Brazil in pursuit of the Confederate cruiser "Florida" until November, 1864. He participated in the two attacks on Fort Fisher, remained in command of the "Ticonderoga" on a cruise in the Mediterranean, and returned in command of the steamer as a commander to New York. He was married in 1866.

STEEDMAN, James Barrett, soldier, b. in Northumberland county, Pa., 30 July, 1818; d. in Toledo, Ohio, 18 Oct., 1868. He went to Ohio in 1837 and engaged in the wool and woolen trade, and in 1843 was chosen to the legislature of that state as a Democrat. In 1849 he organized a company to cross the plains to California in search of gold, but he returned in 1850, and in 1851 became a member of the Ohio board of public works. During Buchanan's administration he was public printer at Washington, and in 1860 he was a delegate to the National Democratic convention at Charleston, advocating the nomination of Stephen A. Douglas. At the opening of the civil war he became colonel of the 4th Ohio regiment, and was ordered to western Virginia. After taking part in the battle of Philippi he joined Gen. Don Carlos Buell in Kentucky, was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers, 17 July, 1862, and rendered valuable service at Perryville, arriving on the battle-field just in time to drive back the enemy, who had broken the National line and were pushing a heavy column toward the towns of Kentucky and the Ohio river. He was placed in command of the 1st division of the reserve corps of the Army of the Cumberland. At the battle of Chickamauga he re-enforced Gen. George H. Thomas at a critical moment, and it has been claimed that he thus saved the day, though credit for ordering the movement is usually given to Gen. Gordon Granger. For his services here he was promoted major-general, 24 April, 1864. He was afterward active in the Atlanta campaign, relieving the garrison at Dalton and defeating Gen. Joseph G. Wheeler's cavalry in June, 1864. When Sherman marched to the sea he joined Gen. Thomas, and did good service at Nashville. He resigned on 19 July, 1866, after serving as provisional governor of Georgia, and was appointed U. S. collector of the port of Savannah by President Johnson, whose close friend he was. Here his lack of business ability involved him in financial trouble, and he returned to Ohio, where in 1870 he was chosen to the state senate, but was defeated in a second canvass. In the May before his death he became chief of police of Toledo, and he was editor and nominal owner of the Weekly Ohio Democrat. On 26 May, 1885, a monument was dedicated to his memory in Toledo.

STEEL, William, reformer, b. in Buggar, Scotland, 26 Aug., 1809; d. in Portland, Ore., 5 Jan., 1881. He came to the United States with his parents in 1817 and settled near Winchester, Va., but removed soon afterward to Monroe county, Ohio, where, from 1830 till the civil war, he was an active worker in the "Underground railroad," of which he was one of the earliest organizers. During these years large numbers of slaves were assisted to escape to Canada, and in no single instance was one retracted after reaching him. At one time the slaveholders of Virginia offered a reward of $5,000 for his head, when he promptly addressed the committee, offering to bring it to them if the money were placed in responsible hands. He acquired a fortune as a merchant, but lost it in 1844. From 1872 till his death he resided with his sons in Oregon. In the early days of the anti-slavery movement Mr. Steel was the recognized leader of the Abolitionists in southeastern Ohio. He was at one time a candidate of the Liberty party for congress, and in 1844 circulated in eastern Ohio the "great petition," in which he was co-signer with Henry Clay if he would emancipate his own slave.

STEEL, Frederick, soldier, b. in Delhi, N. Y., 14 Jan., 1819; d. in San Mateo, Cal., 12 Jan., 1898. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1843, and served as 2d lieutenant in the Mexican war, receiving the brevets of 1st lieutenant and captain for gallant conduct at Contreras and Chapultepec respectively. He was promoted to 1st lieutenant, 6 June, 1848, and served in California till 1853, and then principally in Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska till the civil war, receiving his captain's commission on 5 Feb., 1855. He was promoted to major on 14 May, 1861, and commanded a brigade in Missouri from 11 June, 1861, till April, 1862, being engaged at Dog Spring and Wilson's Creek, and also in charge of the south-eastern district of that state after February. He had become colonel of the 5th Iowa regiment on 23 Sept., 1861, and on 29 Jan., 1862, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He led a division in the Army of the Southwest from May till Nov., 1863, being engaged at Round Hill, 7 July, and in the occupation of Helena, Ark. On 29 Nov. he was made major-general of volunteers, and, after engaging in the Yazoo expedition, he commanded a division in the Vicksburg campaign, taking part in the operations at Young's Point, the advance to Grand Gulf, the attack on Jackson, and the siege of Vicksburg, and was in service in this capacity till he was brevetted colonel in the regular army, 4 July, 1863, and on 26 Aug. he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel. From July, 1863, till 6 Jan., 1864, he was at the head of the Army of Arkansas, taking part in the capture of Little Rock, 10 Sept., 1863, and then till 29 Nov. he commanded the department of that state. He led a column in the Mobile campaign, and at the close of the war received the brevet of brigadier-general, U.S. army, for services in the capture of Little Rock, and that of major-general for services during the war. He was then transferred to Texas, and placed in command on the Rio Grande, and from 21 Dec., 1865, he had charge of the Department of the Columbia. From 23 Nov., 1867, till his death he was on leave of absence, and then promoted colonel of the 20th infantry, 28 July, 1869.

STEELE, Joel Dorman, educator, b. in Lima, N. Y., 14 May, 1836; d. in Elmira, N. Y., 25 May, 1886. He was graduated at Geneseo college in 1858, and then taught at the Mexico academy, of which institution he was appointed principal in 1859. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he became head of a New York soldiers' schools, and served in the peninsula campaign, being severely wounded at Seven Pines. He was chosen principal of the Newark, N. Y., high-school in 1862, and in 1866 accepted a similar office in the Elmira free academy, which place he retained until 1872. Subsequently he devoted his time exclusively to the preparation of text-books. The degree of Ph.D. was conferred upon him by the regents of the University of the state of New York in 1870, and during the same year he presided over the New York state teachers' association. In 1872 he was elected a fellow of the Geological society of London, and also in 1872 he was chosen by the alumni a trustee of Syracuse university, in which Geneseo college had been merged, and to that university he bequeathed $30,000 to found a professorship of theistic science. Dr. Steele was the author of a popular series of scientific text-books, each intended for a course of fourteen weeks, including "Chemistry" (New York, 1867); "Astronomy" (1868); "Natural Philosophy" (1859); "Geology" (1870); "Human Physiology" (1873); "Zoölogy" (1875); and "Keane's Practical Questions in Steele's Sciences" (1873); also "Barne's Popular History of the United States" (1875); and with his wife, Esther Baker Steele, a series of brief histories, including "The United States" (1872); "France" (1874); "Ancient Peoples" (1883); "Medieval and Modern Peoples" (1883); "General History" (1883); "History of Greece" (1886); and "History of Rome" (1886).

STEELE, John, soldier, b. in Augusta county, Va., about 1755; d. about 1805. He entered the Revolutionary army, served as an officer at the battle of Point Pleasant, Va., 10 Oct., 1774, and at the battle of Germantown was shot through the body. He was for many years one of the executive coun-

He erected a paper-mill on Octorara creek, and subsequently two cotton-mills. He served in the war of 1812-14, and for meritorious conduct was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general. He died from illness which tired him from business and removed to Harrisburg, where he died. His son, Francis B. Steele, was military store-keeper at the Falls of St. Anthony, Minn., for a long period.

STEELE, John, statesman, b. in Salisbury, N. C., 1 Nov., 1764; d. there, 14 Aug., 1815. His mother, Elizabeth, entertained at her house in Salisbury on Green's Island, 1782, and it was then discouraged and penniless, and insisted on his accepting two small bags of specie, her earnings for years. "Never," says Greene's biographer, "did relief come at a more needed moment." John was educated as a merchant, but when he had arrived at manhood became a successful planter, and was also active in politics. He was elected to the legislature in 1787 and 1788, and in the latter year, as a member of the convention to consider the U.S. constitution, made fruitless efforts to secure its adoption. He was a member of the first two congresses, from April, 1790, till 2 March, 1793, having been elected as a Federalist, and was again in the legislature in 1794-5. On 1 July, 1790, Gen. Washington appointed him first auditor, which office he held through Adams's administration, resigning on 15 Dec., 1802, though President Jefferson solicited him to remain. He was a commissioner to adjust the boundary between North and South Carolina in 1806, and was again in the legislature in that year and in 1811-13, serving as speaker in 1811. He was elected to the same treasury on the day of his death. He was active in military matters, and attained the rank of general.

STEELE, William, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., in 1819; d. in San Antonio, Tex., 12 Jan., 1885. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1840, assigned to the 2'd dragons, and served in the Florida war, the military occupation of Texas, and the war with Mexico, being promoted 1st lieutenant, 9 May, 1846, and brevetted captain for gallantry at Contrary and Churubusco. He was stationed in Texas from 1849 till 1852, being promoted captain, 10 Nov., 1851, and was then in New Mexico till 1854. From that time till the civil war he was chiefly in Kansas, Dakota, and Nebraska, taking part in several expeditions against hostile Indians. He resigned on 30 May, 1861, joined the Confederate States naval service, commanded a war-ship, and took part in Gen. Henry H. Sibley's expedition to New Mexico. On its return he was made brigadier-general, 12 Sept., 1862, and in January, 1863, was assigned to the command of the Department of Western Arkansas and the Indian territory. He commanded at Galveston, Tex., in December, 1863, and had charge of a cavalry division in Louisiana in 1864, where he opposed the Red river expedition of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks. In 1867 he became a commission merchant in San Antonio, Tex., and for some time after 1874 he was adjutant-general of the state. In this office he did good service by procuring and publishing, at great pains and expense, lists of escaped convicts and other fugitives from justice, which he furnished to the sheriffs of the state.

STEENDAM, Jacob, Dutch poet, b. in Holland in 1616. It is uncertain when or where he died. He came to the colony of New Amsterdam about 1632, and stayed there till 1652, when he returned to Holland. During his residence in the Dutch settlement he owned farms at Amersfoort and Mespash, a house and lot on what is now Pearl street, and another on Broadway. He left Holland several years after his return, and made a voyage to Batavia, where he may possibly have died. The little that is known of him is due to the researches of Henry C. Murphy, who, when he was U. S. minister to the Hague, discovered some poems written by Steendam on New Amsterdam, and had them printed with an English version in the same metre. The work is entitled "Jacob Steendam no vader, A Memoir of the First Poet in New Netherland, with his Poems descriptive of the Colony" (The Hague, 1681). The poems are "Complaint of New Amsterdam, in New Netherland, to her Mother, of her Beginning, Growth, and Present Condition," and "The Praise of New Netherland: Sparring Verses to the Lovers of the Colony and Brothership to the Most Esteemed River of New Netherland. Peter Cornelissen Pickhoy, of Zierbekw." (The Hague, 1681).

STEENNA, Peter Henry, clergyman, b. near Franeker, Friesland, Netherlands, 24 Jan., 1833. He emigrated to the United States and entered Shurtleff college, Ill., where he was graduated in 1858. He then became a minister in the Baptist church, but afterward united with the Episcopalians, and was appointed rector of Grace church, Newton, Mass., in 1864. He became professor of Hebrew and Old and New Testament exegesis in the Episcopal theological school of Cambridge, Mass., in 1868. He translated and edited "Judges" and "Ruth" in the American edition of Lange's "Commentary" (New York, 1872). The degree of D. D., was conferred on him by St. John's college, Cambridge, Mass., in 1882.

STEIGER, Ernst, German-American bibliographer, b. in Gastewitz, Saxony, 4 Oct., 1832. He was trained as a bookseller, emigrated in 1853 to New York city, and in 1863 opened an independent business. He became the publisher of important works of German-Americans and of language textbooks, and also a manufacturer and importer of all the various kinds of book equipment. Steiger is the author of "Der Nachdruck in Nordamerika" (New York, 1860); "Das Copyright-Law in den Vereinigten Staaten" (1869); and "Periodical Literature," a bibliography (1873).

STEIN, Conrad (stine), German historian, b. in Heidelberg in 1701; d. in Breslau in 1762. He was for many years professor of history in the University of Breslau, and afterward made researches in the state and private libraries of Europe and America upon the ancient history of the latter. His works include: "Abhandlung über die Atlantica der Alten, und ihren Zusammenhang mit Amerika" (Breslau, 1750); "Geschichte der Entdeckungen durch Scandinavische Seekarten vom 12ten bis zum 15ten Jahrhunderte" (1754); "Geschichte der deutschen Aussefederungen in Nordamerika" (1755); "Abhandlung über die Spanischen Eroberer Cortés, Pizarro, und Almagro" (1757); "Historische Notizen über die Eroberung von Venezuela durch die Weiser" (1758); and "Kurze Beschreibung von Amerika" (1759); and "Abhandlung über die Indianer-Rasse oder Rothhättne, deren Geschichte und Zusammenhang mit der germanischen Rasse" (1760).

STEINBEIL, Roger Nelson, naval officer, b. in Middleton, Md., 27 Dec., 1816. He entered the navy as a midshipman on 27 March, 1822, and cruised in the schooner "Porpoise" and "Atlantic," near Vera Cruz in 1833. He was on duty in New York at the naval school in 1834-8, and became a passed midshipman, 23 June, 1838. He was commissioned lieutenant, 23 Oct., 1843, served in the coast survey until 1847, and then was on the Brazil station, on special duty in Washington, and in the steamer "Mississippi," on the East India station, in 1857-9. When the civil war began he went to Cincinnati to fit out river gun-boats, and then rendered good service in the Mississippi river flotilla. He commanded the river gun-boat "Lexington" at Belmont when Gen. Grant's force was defeated and saved by the gun-boats in November, 1861. From August, 1861, until May, 1862, he participated in several engagements, and contributed greatly to the successes and victories at Lucas Bend, 9 Sept., 1861, Fort Henry, 6 Feb., 1862, Island No. 10 from 16 March until its capture on 7 April, 1862, and in the action with the rams at Fort Pillow in May, 1862. In this last engagement his vessel, the "Cincinnati," was sunk, and he was seriously wounded. He then had special duty at Philadelphia and Pittsburgh until 1865, when he was sent to the Mediterranean. He was appointed commodore, 13 July, 1870, and appointed commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron in 1872. He was retired on 27 Dec., 1872, and subsequently promoted to rear-admiral on the retired list 3 June, 1874.

STEINER, Lewis Henry, physician, b. in Frederick city, Md., 4 May, 1827; d. in Baltimore, 18 Feb., 1892. He was educated at Marshall college, Pa., where he received the degree of A. M. in 1849, and was graduated the same year at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. He began to practise in Frederick, but in 1852 removed to Baltimore, where for three years he was associated with Dr. John R. W. Dunbar in the conduct of the Baltimore medical institute, at the end of which time he returned to Frederick. Soon after he began to practise his attention was especially directed to chemistry and the allied sciences, and during his residence in Baltimore his time was largely occupied in teaching. He was professor of chemistry at Johns Hopkins university, at the Western medical college, Washington, D. C., and also of chemistry and pharmacy in the National medical college, Washington, in 1853; lecturer on chemistry and physics in St. James college, Md., in 1854; lecturer on applied chemistry in Cincinnati, Ohio, 1853, and professor of chemistry in the Maryland college of pharmacy in 1856. During the civil war he was actively employed as an inspector by the U. S. sanitary commission, and for a period was in charge of its operations in the Army of the Potomac as chief inspector. In 1871 he was elected by the Republicans to the state senate for four years. He was succeeded from 1874 to 1876, as brigadier-general, and 1879. From 1855 till 1858 he was a contributor to, and afterward assistant editor of, "The American Medical Monthly." In 1884 he was appointed librarian of the Enoch Pratt free library, remaining there till his death. He had published "H. Will's Outlines of Chemical Analysis," translated from the 3d German edition, with Dr. Daniel Brud (Cambridge, 1855), "Cantate Domino: a Collection of Chants, Hymns, etc., for Church Service," with Henry Schwing (Boston, 1859); "Report containing a Diary kept during the Rebel Occupation of Frederick, Md., etc." (New York, 1862); and also translations from the German, with interpretations and notes, in various speeches.

STEINHAUER, Henry Bird, Canadian clergyman, b. in the Rnamah Indian settlement, Lake Simcoe, Ontario, in 1804; d. at Whitefish Lake, Northwest territory, Canada, 29 Dec., 1883. He was a pure-blooded Chippewa Indian, and received his name of Steinhauer from a German family that adopted and educated him. He accompanied the Rev. John Evans, a Methodist missionary, to the northwest in 1840, and settled at Norway House, where he remained until 1855, and made himself useful to the missionaries as an interpreter. He assisted Mr. Evans in inventing and perfecting the Cree syllabic characters, in which nearly all books in the Indian languages are printed in the northwest. He also translated into Cree the Old Testament from the book of Job to the end of the lesser prophets, and most of the New Testament. He was ordained a minister in 1858, and lived at Whitefish Lake.

STEINHEFFER, Juan (stone'-hay-fer), German botanist, b. in Silesia about 1650; d. in Sonora, Mexico, in 1716. He studied medicine, entered the Society of Jesus as a lay-brother, and was sent as a postulant to the missions of Sonora, making a study of the flora of that region, which was entirely unexplored. He wrote "Florologia Medicinal Mejicana" (Mexico, 1712; Amsterdam, 1719; and Madrid, 1732).

STEINITZ, William (styn'-its), chess-player, b. in Prague, Bohemia, 17 May, 1836. He was educated in Prague, and finished his studies at the Polytechnic institute in Vienna. He gained the first prizes at several European tournaments, notably in London in 1872 and in Vienna in 1873. At the exhibition in Vienna in 1872 he tied for the prize. Since 1862 Mr. Steinitz has won all single-handed games against other famous players. In October, 1882, he came from London to New York, remaining until April, 1883, when he returned to Berlin. He now resides in London, where he is a postulant to the missions of Sonora, making a study of the flora of that region, which was entirely unexplored. He wrote "Florologia Medicinal Mejicana." Since 1862, he has edited the "Chess Magazine," published in New York city. In 1876 he published in London a pamphlet entitled "The Match between Meers. Steinitz and Blackburn." In his recent contest with Mr. Zukertort in New York city his best efforts, by contrast with the great memory and science of his opponent, displayed remarkable originality and fertility of invention.

STEINWAY, Henry Engelhard (stone'-way), piano-forte manufacturer, b. in Wolfschagen, Germany, 15 Feb., 1797; d. in New York city, 7 Feb., 1871. The original spelling of the name is Steinweg. After receiving a common-school education in his native place, he was first apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, then worked in an organ-factory, and thereafter studied the art of piano-forte making. He opened a business in 1817, and among his contrivances were zithers and guitars, for his own amusement. At the age of fifteen the boy was left an orphan and thrown on his own resources. After a time Mr. Steinway began to make piano-fortes in a small way in his native place, but, being dissatisfied with the surroundings, came with his family to New York city in 1830. Here for several years father and sons were employed as journeymen in noted factories, until they resolved to unite their knowledge and experience and established the firm of Steinway and Sons. In 1862 they gained the first prize in London in competition with the most eminent makers in Europe; and this victory was followed in 1867 by a similar success at the Universal Expositions in Paris. According to Dr. Stein, and other high authorities, the Steinways have done more to advance the durability, action, and tone-quality of their instruments than any other makers of Europe or America.—Henry Engelhard's son, Albert, b. in Seesen, Germany, 10 June, 1840; d. in New York city, 14 May, 1877, early in the civil war he was commissioned to the colonelcy of the 6th regiment of New York volunteers, and later became brigadier-general on the staff of Gov. John T. Hoffman.

STEINWEHR, Adolph Wilhelm August Friedrich, Baron von, soldier, b. in Blankenburg, duchy of Brunswick, Germany, 25 Sept., 1822; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 25 Feb., 1877. His father was a major in the ducal service, and his grandfather a lieutenant-general in the Prussian army. Adolph was educated at the military academy in the city of Brunswick, and entered the army of the duchy as lieutenant in 1841. In 1847 he resigned and came to the United States to offer his services to the government during the Mexican war. Failing to obtain a commission in the regular army, he returned to Germany and married the daughter of a noble lady. In 1854 he again visited this country and purchased a farm near Wallingford, Conn. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a regiment, the 29th New York, which he commanded at the first battle of Bull Run, forming part of the reserve under Col. Dixon S. Miles. On 12 Oct., 1861, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers and placed at the head of the 2d brigade, Gen. Louis Blenker's division, which was attached in May, 1862, to the Mountain department under Gen. John C. Frémont. When Gen. Franz Sigel assumed command of the corps, after the organization of the Army of Virginia, Gen. Steinwehr was given the 2d division, and with it took part in the campaign on the Rapidan and Rappahannock in the following year. He was appointed to the command of the corps passed into the hands of Gen. Oliver O. Howard, and under that officer fought in the battles of Chancellorville and Gettysburg. He remained with the army until the close of the war. His home for several years before his death was in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he prepared an "Eclectic Series" of school geographies that was widely circulated, and published "A Topographical Map of the United States" and "The Centennial Gazetteer." (Philadelphia, 1878).
STEPHENS, Adam, soldier, b. in Virginia about 1730; d. there in November, 1791. He joined the expedition to the Ohio with a company in 1754, was promoted lieutenant-colonel, and in the absence of George Washington commanded the forces at Winchester, whence he set out in 1758 with an expedition against the Creeks for the relief of the colonists of South Carolina. He had charge of the frontier defenses of Virginia in 1761 and performed important services in bringing to a termination the French and Indian wars, and at the beginning of the Revolution was given the command of a regiment. He was made a brigadier-general on 4 Sept., 1776, fought at Trenton, and on 19 Feb., 1777, was promoted major-general. He led one of the attacking columns at the Battle of Yorktown; his division became involved in a combat with the troops of Gen. Anthony Wayne, owing to a fog. He was held responsible for the blunder, accused of intoxication, and in the winter of 1777-78 dismissed from the service.

STEPHEN, Sir George, bart., Canadian capitalist, b. in Dufftown, Banffshire, Scotland, 5 Feb., 1829. After passing some time in a humbler capacity, he removed to a merchant house in London, he came to Canada in 1850 and entered the warehouse of William Stephen and Co., Montreal. In a few years he obtained a joint partnership, and on the death of his relative, William Stephen, in 1862, he purchased the latter's interest and became head of the firm. He was elected president in 1876 of the Bank of Montreal, in 1878 of the Manitoba and Minneapolis railway, and in 1881 of the Canadian Pacific railway, but resigned the latter poston Aug., 1888. He was granted the confederation medal in 1867, and created a baronet in 1886. In 1891 he was raised to the peerage of Great Britain, with the title of Baron Mount Stephen. With his cousin, Sir Donald A. Smith, he founded in 1885 the Montreal scholarship of the Royal college of music, London, England.

STEPHEN, James, publicist, b. in Poole, Dorsetshire, England, in 1793; d. in Bath, England, 10 Oct., 1882. He was educated at Winchester, became a barrister, and subsequently was a parliamentary reporter. He received an appointment in the prize court in the island of St. Christopher, W. I., returned to England with an ample fortune, and obtained a large practice as advocate in prize cases before the privy council. He was returned to parliament for Truro, appointed under-secretary for the colonies, and made a master in chancery for his services in drawing up the system of continental blockade against Napoleon. He was connected by marriage with William Wilberforce, whose religious and anti-slavery principles he shared. Mr. Stephen was the author of a pamphlet, which Lord Brougham described as "of great merit," entitled "War in Disguise, or the Fraud of Neutral Flags" (London, 1805-6; New York, 1806), which elicited a reply from Gouverneur Morris, "An Answer to "War in Disguise"." (London and New York, 1806). He also published "Speech of the Hon. John Randolph in H. R., U. S., on Non-Importation, with Observations" (1806); "American Arguments on Neutral Rights," etc. (1806); "Speech in the H. of C. on the Overtures of the American Government" (1809); "The History of Tousissant L'Ouverture" (1814); and "The Slavery of the British West India Colonies Delineated," etc. 2 vols.

STEPHENS, Alexander Hamilton, statesman, b. near Crawfordsville, Ga., 11 Feb., 1812; d. in Atlanta, Ga., 4 March, 1883. His grandfather, Alexander, founder of the American branch of the Stephens family, was an Englishman, and an adherent of Prince Charles Edward. He came to this country about 1746, settled in the Penn colony, was engaged in several conflicts with the Indians, and in the old French war, serving under Col. George Washington. His home was at the junction of the Juniata and Susquehanna rivers. He was a captain in the Revolutionary army, and soon after the peace removed to Georgia. Alexander became an orphan at the age of fifteen. Under the charge of his uncle he attracted the attention of Charles Cornwallis, a member of his family, and at school he was offered a home in Washington, Wilkes co., and a place in the high-school that was taught by the Rev. Alexander Hamilton Webster, pastor of the Presbyterian church. His middle name, Hamilton, was taken from this gentleman. He regarded this charity as a loan, and afterward repaid the full amount. He also accepted the offer of the Presbyterian educational society to send him to college, with a view to the ministry, with the proviso that he was to refund the cost in case of his change of mind, and in any event when he should be able. He entered Franklin college (now the State university) in August, 1828, was graduated in 1833 with the first honor, and subsequently earned money by teaching to pay his indebtedness. At that period of his life he was much given to morbid introspection, which was partly the result of constitutionally delicate health. On 22 July, 1834, after two months' study, he was admitted to the bar, being congratulated by Senator William H. Crawford and Judge Joseph Henry Lumpkin on the best examination they had ever heard. He lived on six dollars a month, and made $400 the first year. In 1836 he entered the bar at Atlanta, and he soon owned his father's old homestead, and bought the estate that is now Liberty hall.

In 1836 he was elected to the lower branch of the legislature against bitter opposition because he strove against nullification, while believing in state sovereignty, and opposed vigilance committees and the then common "sleeking clubs," the parent of the Ku-Klux Klan. His first speech in the legislature secured the passage of the appropriation for what is now the Western and Atlantic railway from Atlanta to Chattanooga, the property of Georgia. His advocacy secured a charter for the Macon, Ga., female college, the first in the world for the regular graduation of young women in classes and the sciences. In 1839 he was a delegate to the Charleston convention. In 1843 he was nominated for congress under the "general-ticket system," there being then no division of the state into congressional districts. He was elected by 3,000 majority. His first speech was in favor of the power of congress to pass an act requiring the states to be divided into congressional districts. He seemed thus to question his own right to sit, as Georgia had not obeyed the law. He won both point and seat. It was, in fact, the entering-wedge of the assertion of the power of the general government to legislate in state domestic affairs, under the plea of regulating its own organization. On the same principle Mr. Stephens, as senator-elect from Georgia, in 1860, was not allowed to sit, Georgia not having complied with the terms of congress. He advocated the annexation of Texas by legislative resolution as early as 1838-9, and opposed the John Tyler treaty of 1844, but, with seven other southern Whigs, secured the passage of the Milford-Browne plan of 1845. He bitterly opposed President James K. Polk on the Mexican war, but adopted all its results as a godsend of southern territory. In 1848 he had a personal encounter with Judge Cone, of Greensboro, which illustrated the physical courage for which he had been noted from youth—the courage that comes, not from principle or duty, but from utter indifference to consequences. The difficulty grew out of a quarrel on the Clayton compromise of 1848. Cone cut Stephens terribly with a knife and cried: "Now,—you, retract, or I'll cut your throat." The bleeding, almost dying Stephens said: "Never—cut," and grasped the swiftly descending knife-blade in his right hand. That hand never again wrote plainly. Few of the witnesses of the affair, which passed to the world as recorded in a letter of Thompson's hotel, Atlanta, expected him to recover. He did, however, in time to make a speech in favor of Zachary Taylor for the presidency, the carriage being drawn by the people. In 1856 Mr. Stephens opposed the secession movement at the south, and thought the admission of California as a free state a blessing, as repealing the Missouri restrictions and opening all the remaining territories north and south to slavery. He was one of the authors of the "Georgia platform of 1850. Its first resolve was "that we hold the American Union in secondary importance only to the rights and principles it was designed to perpetuate." On the nominations of Franklin Pierce and Gen. Winfield Scott, at Baltimore, the lines of Whig and Democrat were drawn for the last time. Pierce approved the settlement of 1850; Scott did not. Stephens, with Charles G. Fanknner, Walker Brooke, Alexander White, James Abercrombie, Robert Toombs, James Johnson, Christopher H. Williams, and Meredith P. Gentry, killed the Whig party forever by their famous card of 3 July, 1852, giving their reasons for refusing to support Gen. Scott. Stephens wrote it. Daniel Webster was nominated without a party, but died, and Toombs and Stephens voted for him after he was dead. In 1854 Mr. Stephens defended the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act, as embodying the principle of 1850, "the people of the territories left free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions (including slavery), subject only to the constitution of the United States." In 1859 he retired from congress, and in a farewell speech in Augusta, Ga., intimated that the only way to get moved slaves and settle the territories with slave-holding voters was to reopen the African slave-trade.

Mr. Stephens seemed a bundle of contradictions, but he always acted upon reasons and principles. While a state-rights man, he supported Harrison in 1840. In 1844, though in favor of the acquisition of Texas, he supported Clay, who said it would reopen the slave issue and make war, as it did. In 1845 he voted with the Democratic party in admitting Texas. In 1846 and 1847 he stood with Calhoun and the Whig party upon the Mexican war. His house resolutions in February, 1847, became the basis of the Whig reorganisation of Gen. Zachary Taylor was elected president on the same policy in 1848. In 1850 he opposed Fillmore on policy, as he had with Polk, and approved the compromise of Clay. In 1854 he was with Stephen A. Douglas, and in 1856 aided to elect James Buchanan, his extreme foe. In 1859 he resigned his seat in congress, saying, "I saw there was bound to be a smash-up on the road, and resolved to jump off at the first station." In 1860 he supported Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency against John C. Breckinridge, the professor exponent of state rights, holding that the territorial views of Mr. Douglas were his life-long principles. In 1860 he made a great Union speech, and in 1861 became the head of the Georgia peace party. In 1864, and all the three supported by speeches and letters the Linton-Stephens peace, and habeas corpus resolutions passed by the Georgia legislature in that year. In February, 1865, he was at the head of the peace commission on the part of the Confederate government in the Hampton Roads conference. After the downfall of the Confederacy he was arrested and confined for five months in Fort Warren, Boston harbor, as a prisoner of state, but in October, 1865, was released on his own parole. On 22 Feb., 1866, he made a strong reconstruction speech and plea for the new freedmen. He had been chosen to the senate by the legislature, but congress ignored the restoration of Georgia to the Union under the presidential proclamation of Andrew Johnson, and he gave it up. He was defeated, did not run for the seat. On 16 April, 1866, he was called to testify before the congressional reconstruction committee. He both testified and spoke on his life-long theme. In 1867 he published the first volume of his "War between the States." In December, 1868, he was elected professor of political science and history in the University of Georgia, but declined from failing health. He was kept in the house by rheumatism nearly four years. In 1870 he completed the second volume of "The War between the States," but in a more partisan and less hopeful tone than the first volume. Later in the year he conceived the idea of a "School History of the United States, which he carried out (1870-4). He taught a law class in 1871 as a means of support, and edited and became in part proprietor of the Atlanta "Sun," which was published chiefly to defeat Horace Greeley for the presidency. The enterprise proved financially unsuccessful, and exhausted all the profits of his books. By 5 Sept., Charles O'Conor had declined the "straight-out" nomination in Louisville, and with that died Mr. Stephens's last hope. He was defeated in his campaign for a seat in the U.S. senate in November, 1871, but in 1874 was elected to congress. He opposed the civil rights bill in a speech on 5 Jan. Stephenses 1857, and the repeal of the increase of salary act. He was re-elected in 1876, and continuously served until his resignation in 1882. In the contest before the electoral commission on the Hayes-Tilden issue, he advocated going behind the returns and setting aside those of Florida and Louisiana, but opposed all resort to force for seating Mr. Tilden. In January, 1878, he reviewed the question in the "International Review." On the announcement that Mr. Hayes was elected he advised acquiescence. His successful canvassing during the painting, "The Signing of the Emancipation Proclamation," 12 Feb., brought praise from all quarters. An old admirer proposed to send his crusts to congress after he should cease to be able to go. In 1881-2 he undertook to write a "History of the United States," which he completed and published just before his death (New York, 1883). It had neither the vigor nor the value of his "War between the States," and was a failure, carrying with it his last bonds, in which he had invested part of the proceeds of his really great life-work. He had received a bad sprain in May, 1882, on the capital steps, and at the close of the session left Washington forever. In 1883 he was elected governor of Georgia, by 60,000 majority, over Gen. Lucius J. Gartrell, a Confederate officer and lawyer. He was successful in obtaining an excellent government. He made his last public speech at the Georgia sesquicentennial celebration in Savannah. 12 Feb., 1883.

—His brother, Linton, jurist, b. in Crawfordsville, Ga., 1 July, 1825; d. in Sparta, Ga., 14 July, 1872, was left an orphan at the age of three years, but his education was cared for by friends, and he was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1843. He then studied law, and University of Virginia and at Harvard, was admitted to the bar in his native state, and, taking an active part in politics, represented the counties of Taliaferro and Hancock in the legislature for several years. In 1858 he was appointed to a vacancy in the supreme court of Georgia, and his decisions, contained in three volumes of the "Georgia Reports," are characterized by his study of the points of law, and power of logic. Judge Stephens was a delegate to the Georgia secession convention in 1861, and opposed that measure, but subsequently proposed a preamble and resolution declaring that the lack of unanimity in the convention was in regard to the proposed remedy and its application before a resort to other means of redress, and not as to alleged grievances. This was adopted, and he signed the ordinance. During the civil war he was a member of the Georgia legislature, where he introduced the peace resolutions of 1864, and vigorously denounced the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus by the Confederate congress. He also served in the army, and attained the rank of colonel. He continued his activity in politics during the reconstruction period. During canvass of 1872 publicly spoke in favor of the selection of a purely Democratic ticket instead of adopting the candidacy of Horace Greeley.

STEPHENS, Ann Sophia, author, b. in Derby, Conn., in 1813; d. in Newport, R. I., 20 Aug., 1886. Her maiden name was Winterbotham. She married Edward Stephens in 1831, and shortly afterward elected to the Portland "Portland Magazine" in 1833, and continued to edit it till 1837. In 1836 she issued a collection of writings by natives or residents of Portland, which she entitled "The Portland Sketch-Book." Meanwhile her writings were beginning to be known, and when her husband received an appointment in the New York custom-house in 1837 she made that city her residence. She edited "The Ladies' Companion" for four years, wrote for "Graham's Magazine," and "Peterson's Magazine," and was for some time associate editor of these periodicals. She founded "The Ladies' World" in 1843 and "The Illustrated New Monthly" in 1846, and was during her life a frequent contributor to various other periodicals. She also wrote several poems, one of which, "The Polish Boy," has long been a favorite for recitation in schools. Her principal short stories were "Mary Devon," for which she obtained a prize of $400, "Malvina Gray," "The Batchwork Quilt," "The March" and "A Story of Western Life." In 1850 she made a tour through Europe and the East. On her return she published her first long novel, "Fashion and Famine" (New York, 1854), which is the best known, if not the best, of her stories. In France three different translations of it were published. Although Mrs. Stephens belonged to the intense school of novelists, her attention to minute details and her clearness of vision enabled her to be very realistic in the transcription of natural scenes, and she never hesitated to visit hospitals, public institutions, and even dangerous resorts, in search of striking types of character. Her principal works besides those mentioned include "Zana, or the Heirress of Clare Hall" (London, 1854; re-published as "The Heirress of Greenurst," New York, 1874); "The Old Homestead" (1855; 2 vols., Philadelphia, 1869); "Sybil Chase" (1862); and "Ahino's Plot" (1863). Mrs. Stephens also wrote a "Pictorial History of the War for the Union." A uniform edition of her writings was issued (Philadelphia, 1869; new ed., 23 vols., 1886).

STEPHENS, Daniel, clergyman, b. on his father's farm, Licking Creek, Bedford co., Pa., in April, 1787; d. in Bolivar, Tenn., 21 Nov., 1850. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Cannonsburg, Pa., in 1803, at the end of a two-years' course, with the highest honors, served as tutor in college for a short time, and then opened a school in Easton, Md. Although of a Baptist family, he resolved to apply for orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. After due preparation he was ordained deacon in Upper Marlborough, St. Mary's co., Md., in February, 1809, by Bishop Claggett, and priest at the diocesan convention in Baltimore in 1810 by the same bishop. His earliest service was in Chestertown; thence he went to Centreville, Queen Anne co., where he labored for four years. Deeming a change necessary for health, he moved to Havre de Grace, Hartford co. In 1810 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was then called to the church in Staunton, Va., where he remained until 1828. Soon afterward he became rector of St. Peter's church, Columbia, Tenn., and from 1833 till 1849 he was rector of St. James's church, Bolivar, Tenn. He was very active and serviceable in organizing the church in Tennessee and electing its first bishops. Dr. Stephens, though an excellent scholar and teacher, published only a few occasional sermons.—His son, Abednego, clergyman, b. in Centreville, Md., 24 July, 1812; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 27 Feb., 1843, was ordained deacon in October, 1837, by Bishop Otey, and priest soon afterward by the same bishop. His record is thus summed up by his bishop: "At the age of seventeen he was the acting principal of a large academy, at twenty-two professor of languages in a university, at twenty-seven the president of a college, and when, in his twenty-ninth year, his health failed, having stood the front rank of scholars and orators." His published address (1838), delivered before the alumni of the university, on "The Duty of the State to Endow Institutions for the Promotion of High Letters," is marked by felicity of style and great research.

STEPHENS, Harriet Marion, author. b. in 1829; d. in East Hampton, L. I., in 1838. She appeared on the stage under the name of "Mrs. Rosalie Somers," but abandoned it in 1854 for literature. She wrote "Home Scenes and Home Sounds" (Boston, 1853) and a novel, "Hagar, the Martyr" (1854), and also edited magazines, in which many of her productions appeared.

STEPHENS, Henry Louis, traveller, b. in Shrewsbury, Monmouth co., N. J., 28 Nov., 1805; d. in New York city, 10 Oct., 1852. He was graduated at Columbia in 1822, and, after studying law at Litchfield, Conn., and New York, was called to the bar. He practised his profession during eight years in the latter city, at the same time figuring occasionally as a public speaker at meetings of the Democratic party, of which he was a warm supporter. His health becoming impaired, he withdrew from the practice of law and went to Europe in 1830 and 1831, and extended his travels to some parts of Asia and Africa along the Mediterranean. He wrote a series of letters describing his journey, which appeared in Hoffman's "American Monthly Magazine." When he returned to New York in 1836 he found that these letters had been the most popular feature in the periodical. This fact induced him to publish them in a book. A large number of new drawings and lithographs were added by him; he published "Incidents of Travel in Egypt, Arabia Petraea, and the Holy Land" (2 vols., New York, 1837). This was followed by "Incidents of Travel in Greece, Turkey, Russia, and Poland" (1839). These works achieved success in England as well as in the United States, and repeated editions of them appeared in London. In 1839 he was sent by President Van Buren to negotiate a treaty with the government of Central America; but the negotiations were marred by a complication of difficulties between the two nations, and he was finally withdrawn. He returned to Europe in 1840, was in London during 1841, and afterwards in the United States, 1842. He was engaged in farming in New York in 1843.

STEPHENS, Matthew, president of the colony of Georgia, b. in the Isle of Wight, England, 28 Jan., 1671; d. in Georgia in August, 1733. He was educated at Winchester school and King's college, Cambridge, and studied law, but, abandoning it for public affairs, was a member of parliament and held several important offices. About 1730 he went to South Carolina for the purpose of surveying a barony of land. He was well pleased with his reception in the colony, became intimate with Gen. James Oglethorpe, and, on the recommendation of the latter, was appointed secretary to the trustees in Georgia in 1737. His duty in this office consisted in supervising the affairs of the colony. He was made president of the county of Savannah in 1741, and of the entire colony in 1743. He held the latter office in 1750, when he gave such evidence of mental and physical decline that he was requested to resign. He wrote "A Journal of the Proceedings in Georgia, beginning October 20, 1753," (3 vols., London, 1742). This work includes "State of the Province," which brings the narrative down to 28 Oct., 1741. The latter was also published separately (London, 1749). The work, which is exceedingly rare, especially the third volume, is believed to be of great importance in connection with the early history of Georgia. His son, Thomas, was the author of "The Castle-Builder, or the History of William Stephens, of the Isle of Wight" (2d ed., London, 1750).
striction. Mathew Stephenson led the native element. All those that voted with him were natives of slave states, while every native of a free state voted against, every proposition looking forward the freedom of the slave. The friends of liberty sought to have fixed by the constitution a period beyond which slavery should not exist in the state, placing the period in 1866. The points that they made were defended by the Liberals with great power and earnestness, and the journal of the Assembly, wrote an advance sentiment among these men, of whom Mr. Stephenson was the admitted leader.

STERETT, Andrew, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., about 1760; d. in Lima, Peru, 9 Jan., 1807. He entered the navy as a lieutenant, 25 March, 1798, was the executive officer of the frigate "Constitution" under Truxton, participated in the capture of the French frigate "L'Insurgente," off the island of Xevia, W.I., 9 Feb., 1799, and also took part in the action with the "Le Vengeur" in February, 1800. He commanded the schooner "Enterprise," in which he captured the French ship "L'Amour de la Patrie" in December, 1800, in the West Indies. He took the "Enterprise" to the Mediterranean when war was declared against Tripoli, and in August, 1801, as brig "Tripoli," took off Malta. A desperate engagement lasted for two hours, when the Tripolitan hauled down her colors. The Americans left the guns and gave three cheers for victory, whereupon the Tripolitan hoisted her colors and renewed the action. She was compelled to strike again, and then ordered under the quarter of the "Enterprise," but as soon as she got into that position she removed the fight for a third time. Sterett's superior skill in handling his vessel enabled him to take the corsair fore and aft, fifty of her crew were killed, and finally her captain threw his colors overboard and begged for quarter. Sterett then ordered her to be completely dismantled and her guns and ammunition to be thrown overboard. A jury-mast was rigged with a tattered sail, and she was sent into Tripoli. The "Enterprise" did not lose a single man. The Tripolitans were humiliated by this defeat by an inferior force. The commander was mounted on a jackass and paraded through the streets as an object of scorn. He received five hundred bastinadoes for his defeat. Sterett received a complimentary vote of thanks from congress, and the president was authorized to present him with a sword as account of this heroic action. 3 Feb., 1802. In the peace-establishment act he was retained as third on the list of lieutenants in 1801. After his return from the "Enterprise" he was promoted to master-commandant, and ordered to a brig that was then building at Baltimore. He had been senior to Stephen Decatur, and, on being informed of the decision that he was authorized to present him with a sword as account of his service in the navy, and resigned his commission, 29 June, 1805. He appears afterward to have entered the merchant marine,—his first cousin, Isaac Sears, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 28 Oct., 1801; d. in 1863. He entered the United States navy as a midshipman, 24 March, 1819, was commissioned lieutenant, 17 May, 1828, and was ordered to the shore service. He did not leave till 1855, when he made a two-years' cruise in the sloop "John Adams" on the Mediterranean station. He served in the coast survey in 1839-41. In January, 1842, he sailed as executive of the frigate "United States" to the Pacific station, and upon arrival at Callao took command of the "Relief" until April, 1844. During the Mexican war he rendered valuable services in command of the schooner "Reefer," of the Mosquito division of the U.S. naval forces in the Gulf of Mexico. He participated in the expedition against Porena and Tabasco, 12-27 Oct., 1846, where he captured the Mexican schooner "Tabasco." On 14 Nov., 1846, he took part in the attack and capture of Tampico, where five Mexican vessels, forts, and supplies were captured. He was present during the bombardment of Vera Cruz, 10-23 March, 1847, assisted in covering the landing of Scott's army, and engaged the Mexican batteries on two occasions. After the war he resumed duties in the naval rendezvous at Baltimore, and was promoted to commander, 5 Feb., 1850. He was governor of the Naval asylum at Philadelphia in 1852-3 and in 1854-5 commanded the sloop "Decatur," protecting New England fisheries. He was placed on the reserved list, 28 Sept., 1853, and promoted to captain, 2 March, 1857. When the civil war began he resigned his commission, 23 April, 1861, and entered the navy of the seceded states; but the only record of his services is as a member of the court to investigate the causes that compelled Com. Josiah Tatsnall to destroy the "Merrimac."
STERNE to 1885

STERNE, Simon, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 June, 1830. He was graduated in the law department at the University of Pennsylvania in 1851, and established himself in practice in New York city. In 1862 he was elected lecturer on political economy in Cooper union. He was on the staff of the "Commercial Advertiser" in 1863-4, and was a founder of the American Free-trade league in 1864, and in 1865 published the "Social Science Review." Taking an active part in the movement for the purification of municipal politics, he was chosen secretary of the committee of seventy in 1870, and drafted the charter that was advocated by that committee. In 1876 he was appointed by Gov. Samuel J. Tilden on a commission to devise a plan for the government of cities, in 1879 acted as counsel for the New York board of trade and transportation and chamber of commerce in the investigation of railroads and transportation, and that resulted in the appointment of a board of railroad commissioners for the state of New York. He was also a leader in the movement that resulted in the creation of the inter-state commerce commission, drafting the inter-state commerce bill in conjunction with the committee of the United States senate. In 1885 he was appointed by President Cleveland a commissioner to examine and report on the relations between the railroads and the government of western Europe. An essay that he read before the American bar association on "Slip-shod Legislation" led to the appointment in 1888 of a committee of the legislature to consider reforms in the drafting of laws. He has been a frequent writer on economical and political subjects, contributed articles on "Cities," "Legislation," "Monopolies," "Railways," and "Repression" to John J. Lalor's "Cyclopedia of Political Science and United States History" (1881-3), and is the author of "Representative Government and Personal Representation" (Philadelphia, 1870) and "Constitutional History and Political Development in the United States" (1880).

STIEFELDT, Carl August, mining engineer, b. in Holzhausen, near Gotha, Germany, 28 Sept., 1838. He was educated at the gymnasium in Gotha, the University of Göttingen, and at the mining-school in Clausthal, where he was graduated in 1861. Soon afterward he came to this country, and since that time he has been engaged in the practice of his profession as a mining engineer and metallurgist. At present (1888) he devotes himself principally to consultation, and has his office in New York. He is widely known through the mining districts by his invention of the Stiefeldt furnace, which is extensively used in the west for the roasting of silver ores preparatory to the extraction of the metal by either amalgamation or by leaching. He has been a member of the American institute of mining engineers since 1881, and was its vice-president in 1885-7. Besides technical papers he has written "The Lixiviation of Silver Ores with Hyposulfite Solutions." (New York, 1888).

STETSON, Charles Augustus, hotel-proprietor, b. in Newport, Mass., 1 April, 1821; d. in Newport, 29 July, 1864. His father was proprietor of a hotel in Newport. The son adopted the same calling, and after taking charge of the Tremont house, Boston, in 1839, and Barnum's hotel, Baltimore, in 1843, became proprietor of the Astor house, New York, in 1847, and kept it until 1875, for the first twenty years of this period in partnership with Robert B. Coleman. In 1851 he was quartermaster-general of New York, and he was usually known by his military title. Gen. Stetson acquired a wide reputation as a hotel-keeper in the days when the Astor house was almost the only large hotel in the city. He entertained during that period many eminent men, including Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Rufus Choate, and William H. Seward. The Astor house was the scene of all the great public dinners of those times, and the regular resting-place of congressmen from the eastern states in going to and returning from Washington. During the civil war Gen. Stetson showed many acts of kindness to soldiers on their way through New York, and he was publicly thanked by Gov. John A. Andrew, of Massachusetts.

STEUBEN, Frederick William Augustus Henry Ferdinand von, known in this country as Baron Steuben, German soldier, b. in Magdeburg, Prussia, 15 Nov., 1730; d. in Steubenville, N. Y., 28 Nov., 1794. His father, a captain in the army, took him when a mere child into the Crimea, whither he was ordered. The boy was only ten years old when the father returned to Prussia. He was educated in the Jesuit colleges at Neisse and Breslau, and distinguished himself as a mathematician. At fourteen he served with his father in the war of 1744, and was present at the siege of Prague. At the age of seventeen he entered as a cadet in the infantry regiment, and in two years was promoted to ensign, and four years afterward to lieutenant. He served in the seven years' war and was wounded in the battle of Prague. In 1754 he was made adjutant-general in the free corps of Gen. John von May, but after the death of the latter he re-entered the regular army in 1759, and was promoted to the rank of major. At the conclusion of the war he became chief of staff of the army and continued in that position until 1763, when he was recalled to Prussia and appointed governor of the provost canton of Collberg. In 1762 he was made aide de camp to Frederick the Great, and took part in the celebrated siege of Schweidnitz, which closed the military

of the American colonists lay in their ignorance of military tactics and want of discipline, endeavored to persuade him to come to this country and instruct the soldiers. But the baron declined to give up his honors and his ample income and risk everything on our desperate fortunes. The French minister, however, brought about an interview with Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane. The manner with which the former received him offended him, and this, with other reasons, caused him to abandon the project altogether. Recalled by German, he at length yielded to the latter's solicitations and promises, and resolved to cast his fortunes with the struggling colonies. Embarking in a French gun-boat under the name of Frank, he set sail from Marseilles, 11 Dec., 1777, and after a stormy passage of fifty-five days, during which the forecastle took fire three times while there were 1,500 pounds of powder aboard, and a mutiny was suppressed, he arrived at Portsmouth, N. H. The entire population went out to receive him. He at once wrote to congress, offering his services to the colonies, saying that the motive that brought him here was to "serve a nation engaged in the noble work of defending its rights and liberties," and adding that, although he had "given up an honorable title and lucrative rank," he asked "neither riches nor honors." To Washington he expressed the same sentiments, and said he wished to serve simply as a volunteer. He immediately began his journey inland for the south. A Tory landlord, in the course of the journey, declared that he would not provide bed or provisions for the party. Steuben leveled his pistol at the man's head and demanded both. They were quickly furnished, and in the morning the baron liberally rewarded his host in continental money. Presenting himself to congress, he proposed to enter the army as a volunteer, and, if his "services were not satisfactory or the colonies failed to establish their independence, he would receive nothing." If, on the other hand, they were successful and he remained in the army, he expected "to be refunded the income he had given up, and remunerated for his services." This generous offer was accepted, and he departed for Valley Forge, where the American army lay encamped. When the aide-de-camp of Frederick the Great reached the wintry encampment and saw the half-starved soldiers creep out of their huts, poorly armed and only half clad, he was astounded and said "no European army could be kept together a week in such a state." A less noble and less resolute nature would have abandoned his enterprise at the outset. He began at once, and from that day our whole military system assumed new shape. The awkwardness of the men, at times, would throw him into terrible rage, but his kindness, care, and liberality toward the suffering soldier made him beloved by all. In May, 1778, after the order of Washington, made him inspector-general of the army with the rank of major-general, and he at once entered on his duties and appointed sub-inspectors throughout the army. A thorough system of discipline and economy was established, until the whole army became a single machine in his hands. It is impossible to give in detail the great work he accomplished. It was unseen by the country in general, for it was unattended with outward display, but it can be safely said that no major-general in the field did half so much toward our success as this great organizer and disciplinarian. The result of this discipline was seen in the next campaign, in the battle of Monmouth, when he rallied the retreating and disordered troop of General Lee like a wise man, and gave the latter's left wing, and Alexander Hamilton, who saw the steady action of the troops under Baron Steuben, said he "had never known till that day the value of discipline." In the trial of Lee that followed, the testimony of Steuben offended the former, and he made some disparaging remarks in regard to it. Steuben instantly challenged him, but Lee apologized, and nothing came of the matter. Steuben now wished to take command in the field as major-general, but the American officers manifested so much opposition to it, on account of being outranked, that he withdrew his request and devoted himself to his old monotonous work, much of which seemed to him more befitting a drill-sergeant than a major-general. In the autumn of 1780 he published a manual for the army, furnished with diagrams to explain his rules. It was entitled "Regulations for the Order and Discipline of the Troops of the United States." Each chapter was written first in poor German, then translated into poor French, then put into good French, and lastly into good English, in which last condition it was entirely unrecognizable. It never accomplished its intended purpose, became the law and guide of the army, and, even after the war, was adopted by several of the states. In this year he was selected as one of the court-martial to try Maj. John André. After the defeat of Gen. Horatio Gates at Camden he was sent to Virginia to aid Gen. Nathanael Greene, then operating in North Carolina. Although he had fought so hard and with such success, Greene was unwilling to have him, and insisted that his chief duty was to forward troops to Greene as fast as he could raise them. The result was, when Arnold invaded Virginia he had only 150 men under him, and was compelled to see the traitor ravage the country before his eyes; but he did everything in his power to harass him. Soon afterward Cornwallis was beaten at Guilford Courthouse, and Steuben took his place as major-general in the line. He was in the trenches when the proposition to surrender was received. Lafayette came to relieve him; but this he refused, declaring that European etiquette required that the officer that received the first overtures of surrender must, out of respect to his command, keep his post till the terms of capitulation were agreed upon or hostilities resumed.
After the close of the war he was sent to Canada to demand the surrender of the posts on the frontier, but, not succeeding, he returned to headquarters. He now retired to private life and resided in New York city, where he remained for several years. Congress refused to fulfil its contract with him to pay him for his services, but he was given grants of land in Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. The latter he declined to accept when he found it consisted of the confiscated estates of an old Tory who would be lest destitute, and, in the kindness of his heart, interceded for him. He was given also a whole township near Utica, N. Y., and, after seven years' delay, congress at length allowed him a pension of $2,400. He now retired to this land, and, clearing off sixty acres, built a log house seen in the illustration, and settled down for life, though he returned every winter to New York city. On 22 Nov., 1794, as he was making preparations for this annual visit, he was struck with paralysis, and six days afterward he died. As he had requested, he was buried near his house, with his military cloak around him and the star of honor that he always wore on his breast. Only about thirty farmers attended his funeral. Col. North, his favorite aide, to whom he left all his property, erected a simple monument over his grave, to which many visitors annually resort. Numerous anecdotes are told of him, illustrating the tenderness and generosity of his nature. These traits were especially exhibited in the conduct of the army at New York. His life has been written by Francis Bowen, in Sparks's "American Biography," and by Friedrich Kapp (New York, 1860).

STEVEHNS, Aaron Fletcher, congressman, b. in Derry, N. H., 9 Aug., 1819; d. in Nashua, N. H., 10 May, 1887. He was educated at Pinkerton academy, Derry, removed to Peterborough, after he was studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and gained a high reputation as a lawyer. He was a member of the legislature in 1849, a delegate to the Whig national convention in 1852, and a representative in the legislature again in 1854. He identified himself with the Republican party when it was first organized, and was again sent to the legislature in 1856 and the following years. He was one of the first to enlist in the civil war, and was made major of the 1st New Hampshire volunteers, subsequently appointed colonel of the 13th regiment, and brevetted brigadier-general on 8 Dec., 1864, for gallantry at Port Harrison, where he was wounded. On his return home he was elected to congress and re-elected for the following term, serving from 4 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1871. From 1870 till 1884 he was a member of the legislature, and took part in its debates.

STEVEHNS, Abel, author, b. in Philadelphia, 19 Jan., 1815; d. in San José, Cal., 12 Sept., 1897. He was educated at Wesleyan, and became pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church in Boston. He traveled in Europe, and on his return took charge of a church in Providence, R. I. He went to Boston in 1840, and edited "Zion's Herald" till 1852. In 1853-4 he was the editor of the "National Magazine" in New York city. In 1856, on his return from a second European journey, he was elected editor of the "Christian Advocate and Journal," and resided in New York. He received in that year the degree of LL. D. from Indiana university. In 1860-2 he was pastor of a church in New York city, and in 1862-5 of the one at Mamaroneck, N. Y. From 1865 till 1874 he was one of the editors of the "Methodist." Subsequently he travelled extensively in the United States and Europe, and finally settled in Geneva, Switzerland, as pastor of the Union church there, and correspondent of American newspapers. While editing church papers, he became interested in the history of Methodism, which he reduced to a connected narrative in a series of works that were the first of their kind and remain the standard authority on the subject. His publications include "An Essay on Church Polity" (New York, 1853); "Memorials of the Introduction of Methodism into the Eastern States" (2 vols., Boston, 1847-52); "Preaching required by the Times" (New York, 1855); "The Great Reformer," a prize essay (1856); "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America" (4 vols., 1814-7); German translation, Cincinnati, 1867); "The Centenary of American Methodism" (1865); "The Women of Methodism: its Three Foundresses, Susanna Wesley, the Countess of Huntington, and Barbara Heck" (1866); "A Comprehensive History of American Methodism" (1867); "Madame de Staël: a Study of Her Life and Times" (2 vols., 1851); "Character Sketches" (1882); and "Christian Work" (1882).

STEVEHNS, Charles Ellis, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 July, 1853. He studied at the University of Pennsylvania and Yale, was graduated in 1873 at Berkeley divinity-school, Middle-town, Conn., spent one year in study in Europe, and was ordained a deacon in the Memorial church in 1876. He became rector of a church in Brooklyn, N. Y., and in 1878 secretary of an auxiliary of the board of missions of his denomination. For several years he was associate editor of the "Living Church." The degree of Ph. D. was given to him by Wooster university. He became an examining chaplain of the diocese of Long Island in 1886, and in 1887 was made archdeacon of Brooklyn. He is a member of the Royal geographical society of London and of the Society of antiquaries of Edinburgh, among other learned societies, and in 1888 received the degree of LL. D. from Wooster university, and that of D. C. L. from King's college, Nova Scotia. Dr. Stevens has published occasional pamphlets and frequent articles in the press, also "Sources of the Constitution of the United States considered in Relation to Colonial and English History" (New York, 1894).

STEVEHNS, Ebenezer, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 22 Aug., 1751; d. in Rockaway, L. I., 22 Sept., 1823. He was a member of the artillery company of B. F. Village Independent, and in the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor in December, 1773. Soon afterward he removed to Rhode Island, where he raised two companies of artillery and one of artificers, was commissioned as lieutenant, 8 May, 1775, and took part in the expedition against Quebec. He joined Henry Knox's regiment of artillery, was made a captain on 11 Jan., 1776, and on 9 Nov. received the brevet of major. He commanded the artillery at Ticonderoga and Stillwater, and on 30 April, 1778, was made lieutenant-colonel of John Lamb's regiment. He served under Lafayette in Virginia, and for a part of the time was a member of its council of war. He was present at the siege of Yorktown. After the Revolution he became an eminent merchant of New York city. He was major-general of the state militia, and, with Morgan Lewis, mustered for active service against the British the militia of the city in September, 1814.

His son, Alexander H. H. Holzdon, surgeon, b. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1789; d. there, 30 March, 1846, was graduated at Yale in 1807, studied in the office of Dr. Edward Miller, attended medical lectures in the College of physicians and surgeons and at the University of Pennsylvania, and was graduated M. D. by the latter institution in 1811. His thesis on "The Proximate Causes of Inflammation" was praised by medical men. He took passage for France with the object of pursuing surgical demonstrations, but was captured by an English cruiser and taken into Plymouth, he went to London and received the instructions of Dr. John Abernethy and Sir Astley Cooper for a year, and then studied for a year longer under Alexis Boyer and Baron Larrey in Paris. On his return to the United States he was appointed a surgeon in the army. Establishing himself in New York city, he was a professor of surgery in the New York medical institution in 1814. When appointed surgeon to the New York hospital in 1818, he introduced the European system of surgical demonstrations and instruction at the bedside. In 1825 he became professor of the principles and practice of surgery in the College of physicians and surgeons. He took the chair of clinical surgery in 1837, but in the following year resigned his active duties in this institution and in the college, and thenceforth acted mainly as a consulting surgeon, both in public and private practice. He was appointed consulting surgeon to the New York hospital and emeritus professor of the College of physicians and surgeons, of which he was made president in 1841. He was president of the American Medical Association in 1843. In 1849 he received from the New York state university the degree of LL. D. He retired from the presidency of the college faculty in 1855. Besides his contributions to medical periodicals, he published "Inflammation of the Ear" (Philadelphia, 1811); "Cases of Fungus Hematodes of the Eye" (New York, 1818); with John Watts, Jr., and Valentine Mott, "Medical and Surgical Register, consisting chiefly of Cases in the New York Hospital" (1818); an edition of Astley Cooper's "First Lines of Surgery" (1822); "Clinical Lecture on Injuries" (1837); "Lectures on Lithotomy" (1838); "Address to Graduates" (1847); and "Plea of Humanity in Behalf of Medical Education," an address before the New York state medical association (1849).—Another son, John Austin, banker, b. in New York city, 22 Jan., 1795; d. there, 19 Oct., 1874, was graduated at Yale in 1813, entered mercantile life, and became a partner in his father's business in 1818. He was for many years secretary of the New York chamber of commerce, and one of the organizers and first president of the Merchants' exchange. From its first establishment in 1839 to 1858 he was president of the Bank of commerce. He was a Whig in politics, but an earnest advocate of low tariffs. He was chairman of the committee of bankers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia which first met in August, 1861, and decided to take $500,000,000 of the government 7% loan. They subsequently advanced $100,000,000 more, and the terms of the transactions were arranged chiefly by Mr. Stevens, as the head of the treasury committee. His advice was frequently sought by the officers of the treasury department during the civil war. He was many years governor of the New York hospital, and took an interest in other benevolent institutions.—John Austin's son, John Austin, author, b. in New York city, 21 Jan., 1827, was graduated at Harvard in 1846, became a merchant in New York, and in 1862 was chosen secretary of the New York chamber of commerce, holding the office for six years. He has been librarian of the New York historical society, and has devoted himself to the investigation of topics of American history. He founded, and for many years edited, the "Magazine of American History." His publications include "The Valley of the Rio Grande; its Topography and Resources," "A Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce on Ocean Navigation" (1894); "Colonial Records of the New York Chamber of Commerce" (1897), containing illustrations and biographical and historical sketches; "The Progress of New York in a Century" (1876); "The Expedition of Lafayette against Arnold," published by the Maryland historical society (Baltimore, 1878); and "Albert Gallatin" in "The American Statesmen" (New York, 1883). He contributed the historical chapters to the "History of Newport County" (Boston, 1888).

STEVENS, Edward, soldier, b. in Culpeper county, Va., in 1745; d. there, 17 Aug., 1829. He commanded a battalion of militia at the battle of Great Bridge, 9 Dec., 1775, and in 1776 was appointed colonel of the 10th Virginia regiment. Joining Washington's army in New Jersey in 1777, he hovered around Gen. William Howe's forces at the battle of the Brandywine, and, by holding the road till nightfall, prevented a serious disaster. He served with credit at Germantown, and was made a brigadier-general. On 14 Aug., 1780, he joined the army of Gen. Horatio Gates with 700 Virginia militia, and urged him to engage Lord Rawdon's force of Canadians, but it was not until the next day that it was too late to retreat, or mistrusting the report of Lord Cornwallis. His brigade began the attack, but, being unfamiliar with the use of the bayonet, they gave way when the enemy charged. At Guilford Court-House they resisted the British attack with steadiness, although finally forced back. Gen. Stevens, who was severely wounded, received the praise of Gen. Nathanael Greene for his conduct in this action. He also served with credit at the siege of Yorktown. From the adoption of the state constitution till 1790 he sat in the Virginia senate.

STEVENS, George Barker, educator, b. in Spencer, Tioga co., N. Y., 13 July, 1854. He was educated at Cornell and Rochester, and was graduated at the latter university in 1877. After spending a year at Rochester theological seminary, he entered the divinity-school at Yale, where he was graduated in 1880. He was pastor of a Congregational church, in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1880-2, and in December, 1882, assumed the charge of a Presbyterian church at Watertown, N. Y. In 1883, after examination on a two years' course in philosophy, he received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Berlin, and in 1886 received the degree of D. D. from Jena. On his return to the United States he was appointed professor of New Testament criticism and interpretation at Yale. He had contributed theological and philosophical articles to religious magazines, and edited the "Homilies of Chrysostom on the Acts and Romans" for Dr. Philip Schaff's edition of "Post-Nicene Church Fathers."

STEVENS, Isaac Ingalls, soldier, b. in Andover, Mass., 28 March, 1818; d. near Chantilly, Fairfax co., Va., 1 Sept., 1862. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1839, ranking first in his class, and was commissioned as 2d lieutenant of engineers. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 1 July, 1849, and served as adjutant of the corps of engineers during the war with Mexico, being engaged at the siege of Vera Cruz and at Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Churubusco, where he gained the brevet of captain, at Chapultepec, of major, at Molino del Rey, and at the taking of the city of Mexico, where he was severely wounded. He superintended fortifications on the New England coast in 1841-7 and in 1848-9, and had charge of the coast-survey office in Washington, D. C., from 14 Sept., 1849, till 17 March, 1853, when he resigned, having been appointed governor of Washington territory. He was at the same time placed in charge of the exploration of the northern route for a Pacific railroad. In 1853, at the head of a large exploring party, he surveyed a route between St. Paul, Minn., and Puget sound, and established the navigability of the upper Missouri and Columbia rivers for steamers. He was superintendent of Indian affairs by virtue of his office of governor, and in 1854-5 he made treaties with the Indian tribes of the territory by which they relinquished their titles to more than 100,000 square miles of land. He also crossed the Rocky mountains to conclude a treaty, in October, 1855, of friendship with the Blackfeet Indians, at the same time intervening successfully to make peace between them and the hunting tribes of Washington and Oregon. While he was absent on this expedition the disfected Indians of Washington territory rose against the whites. He returned before January, 1856, called out 1,000 volunteers, and conducted a campaign against the revolted Indians that was so vigorous and successful that before the close of 1856 they were subdued and their chiefs slain. White sympathizers with the Indians were driven from their homes and confined in the towns, and, when Chief-Justice Edward Lander issued a writ of habeas corpus for their release, Gov. Stevens declared two counties under martial law, and on 7 May, 1856, caused Judge Lander to be arrested in his court-room, and held him a prisoner till the close of the war. He resigned in August, 1857, and was elected a delegate to congress for two successive terms, serving from 7 Dec., 1857, till 3 March, 1861. In congress he vindicated his course in the Indian war, and saw his treaties confirmed, and the script that he had issued to pay the voluntaries assumed by the government. In the presidential canvass of 1860 he acted as chairman of the executive committee of the Breckinridge wing of the Democratic party. But when the leaders of his party afterward declared for secession, he publicly denounced them, and urged President Buchanan to remove John B. Floyd and Jacob Thompson from his cabinet. At the intelligence of the firing on Fort Sumter he hastened from the Pacific coast to Washington, and was appointed colonel of the 79th regiment of New York volunteers, known as the Highlanders. The regiment had lost heavily at Bull Run and expected to be sent home to recruit. Disappointment at being kept in the field and commanded by regular army officers caused eight companies to mutiny. The courage and wisdom with which he restored discipline won the respect of the men, who, by their own desire, were transferred to his brigade when he was commissioned as brigadier-general on 28 Sept., 1861, and took part in the Port Royal expedition. He attacked the Confederate batteries on the Coosaw in January, 1863, and captured them with the cooperation of the gun-boats. He was engaged in actions on Stono river, and commanded the main column in an unsuccessful assault on the enemy's position near Seccessville. After the retreat of Gen. George B. McClellan from his position before Richmond, Gen. Stevens was ordered to Virginia. He commanded a division at Newport News, and was made a major-general on 7 Feb., 1863, serving under Gen. John Pope in the campaign in northern Virginia. He was engaged in skirmishes on the Rappahanock, distinguished himself at Manassas, and while leading his division at the battle of Chantilly was killed with the colors of the 9th regiment in his hand. He published "Campaigns of the Rio Grande and Mexico, with Notices of the Recent Work by Major Chantilly," and "Report of Explorations for a Route for the Pacific Railroad near the 47th and 49th Parallels of North Latitude, from St. Paul, Minn., to Puget Sound," which was printed by order of congress (2 vols., Washington, 1855-60).

STEVENS, James Gray, Canadian jurist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 25 Feb. 1822. His father, Andrew Stevens, was a noted surgeon and a brother, Grace Buchanan, daughter of Sir Colin Campbell, of Auchinleck, was an author. He was educated at Edinburgh university, came to New Brunswick in 1840, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1847, and practised his profession at St. Stephen's, N. B. He was a member of the New Brunswick assembly in 1861-5, was created a queen's counsel in February, 1867, the same year he was appointed judge of four county courts, and in 1873 was a delegate from New Brunswick to the convention in Montreal, which resulted in the union of the various Presbyterian bodies in Canada. He has been president of St. Croix agricultural society thirty years. He is the author of "An Analytical Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Courts of New Brunswick from 1825 to 1873, inclusive" (St. John, 1873); a further digest of the same reports from 1873 to 1887 (Toronto, 1887); "Index to the Statutes, Rules, Orders, Regulations, Treaties, and Proclamations of the Dominion of Canada" (St. Stephen's, 1876); and "Indictable Offences and Summary Convictions" (Toronto, 1895). was one of the joint commissioners for defining the boundary-line between New York and that colony in November, 1771. Resigning as a royalist councillor in June, 1776, he was, from 27 Aug. 1776, till 1782, vice-president of the council of New Jersey, presiding over the joint meetings of the two branches of the legislature. He was elected to the Federal congress in November, 1789, and on 18 Dec. 1787, he presided over that convention that ratified the United States constitution.

His son, John, engineer, b. in New York city in 1748 or 1749; d. at Hoboken, N. J., 6 March, 1830, was graduated at King's (now Columbia) college in 1768, and was admitted to the bar, but practised little. During the Revolutionary war he held several offices, among which was that of treasurer of New Jersey in 1779-84, and at its close, he married and resided in winter on Broadway, New York—and in summer on the island of Hoboken, which he then owned. His life was devoted to experiments at his own cost for the common good. In 1790 he petitioned congress for protection to American inventors, and his petition was referred to a committee, which reported a bill that became the law of 10 April, 1790, the foundation of the American patent law. He had begun experiments in the application of steam in 1780, and now continued them, having as his associates Nicholas I. Roosevelt and the elder Brunnell, who afterward built the Thames tunnel. Toward the close of the century he was engaged with his brother-in-law, Robert R. Livingston, and Roosevelt, in building a steamboat to navigate Hudson river, the legislature of the state of New York having previously offered a monopoly of exclusive privilege to the owners of a boat that, complying with given conditions, should attain a speed of three miles an hour; but their boat failed to achieve the required speed, and their joint proceedings were interrupted by the appointment of Livingston and six other Frenchmen in 1801. In Paris, Livingston met Robert Fulton, and afterward was associated with him in establishing steam navigation. Stevens persevered, and in 1804 built a vessel propelled by two screws that navigated the Hudson. The boiler was tubular and was identically the short four-threaded screw that is now used. That it was a helix, his letter of 1804 to Dr. Robert Hare, of Philadelphia, shows. This was the first application of steam to the screw-propeller. The engine and boiler of this steamboat are preserved in the Stevens institute at Hoboken, N. J. Mr. Stevens always upheld the efficiency of the screw and the screw was advantageous for ocean navigation. Shortly after his death his sons placed the engine and boiler referred to in a boat, which was tried before a committee of the American institute of New York, and attained a speed of about nine miles an hour.

It is remarkable that after 1804 no serious attempt was made for the further improvement of the screw until 1837, when it was brought into use simultaneously in England and the United States. Still more remarkable is the fact that its introduction into use in England was by the Archimedean screw of a single thread, and in America by a multi-threaded screw on the outer surface of a cylinder; that the first was completely modified in the course of five or six years into the short four-threaded screw that was used by Stevens in 1804, and that in about ten years the multi-threaded screw was also replaced by the screw of 1804. In 1807, assiduous experiments are recorded on a paddle-wheel steamboat “Phoenix” that plied for six years on the Delaware. Prof. James Renwick, who from his own observation has left the best description extant of Fulton's boat, the “Clermont,” as she ran in the autumn of 1807, says that “the Stevenses were but a few days later in moving a boat with the required velocity,” and that “being shut out of the waters of New York by the monopoly of Livingston and Fulton, Stevens conceived the bold design of conveying his boat to the Delaware by sea, and this boat, which was so near reaping the honor of first success, was the first to navigate the ocean by the power of steam.” Fulton had the advantage of a steam-engine that was made by James Watt, while his predecessors were provided only with inferior apparatus. The work of common blacksmiths and milledwrights. The piston-rod of the “Phoenix” was guided by slides instead of the parallel motion of Watt, and the cylinder rested on the condenser. Stevens also surrounded the water-wheel by a guard-beam. Among the patents that were taken out by Stevens was one in 1791 for generating steam; two in the same year described as improvements on the cylinder and on Thomas Savary's engine, both designed for pumping; the multi-tubular boiler in 1803, which was patented in England in 1805 in the name of his eldest son, John G.; one in 1816 for using slides; an improvement in rack railroads in 1824; and one in 1824 to render shallower rivers more navigable. In 1812 he made the first experiments with artillery against iron armor. He then proposed a circular vessel, to be rotated by steam to train the guns for the defence of New York harbor. On 11 Oct., 1811, he established the first steam-ferry in the world with the “Juliana,” which plied between New York city and Hoboken. In 1813 he invented and built a ferry-boat made of two separate boats, with a paddle-wheel between them which reiterated the motion. On the basis of the simplicity of its construction and its economy, this description of horse-boat continued long in use both on the East river and on the Hudson.

In February, 1812, shortly before the war with England and five years before the beginning of the Erie canal, Stevens addressed a memoir to the commission appointed to devise water-communication between the seaboard and the lakes, urging instead of a canal the immediate construction of a railroad. This memoir, with the adverse report of the commissioners, among whom were De Witt Clinton, Gouverneur Morris, and Chancellor Livingston, was published at the time, and again, with a preface, by Charles King, president of Columbia, in 1852, and by the “Railroad Gazette” and “Railroad Journal.” The arguments and arguments contrast strongly with the answer of the commissioners on the impracticability of a railroad. At the date of the memoir, although short railroads for carrying coal had been in use in England for upward of 200 years, there was not a locomotive or passenger-car in use in the world. Stevens's purpose was to build a passenger and freight railroad for general traffic from Albany to Lake Erie having a double track, made with wooden stringers capped with wrought-plate rails resting on piles and operated by locomotives. He enumerates comprehensively the advantages of a general railroad system, naming many details that were afterward found necessary, putting the probable future speed at from twenty to thirty miles an hour, or possibly at from forty to fifty. He gives a definite plan and detailed estimates of the construction and cost. His plan is identical with that of the successful South Carolina railroad built in 1830-32, the first long railroad in the United States, which has been described as "a continuous and prolonged bridge." The accuracy of his estimates was proved by the cost of this road. Stevens in 1814 applied to the state of New Jersey for a railroad charter from New York to Philadelphia. He received the charter in February, 1815, and located the road, but proceeded no further. In 1823, with Horace Binney and Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, he obtained from the state of Pennsylvania a charter for a railroad from Philadelphia to Lancaster, on the site of the present Pennsylvania railroad. These two were the first railroad charters that were granted in this country. On 23 Oct., 1824, he obtained a patent for the construction of railroads. In 1826, at the age of seventy-eight, to show the operation of the locomotive on the railroad, he built at Hoboken a circular railway having a gauge of five feet and a diameter of 220 feet, and placed on it a locomotive with a multi-tubular boiler which carried about half a dozen people at a rate of over twelve miles an hour. This was the first locomotive that ever ran on a railroad in America. Col. Stevens was an excellent classical scholar, and not only a close student of natural philosophy, but fond of metaphysical speculations, leaving several philosophical treatises, which have never been published. He was through life an enthusiastic botanist and amateur gardener, importing and cultivating many new plants.

The accompanying engraving represents Castle Point, Mr. Stevens's residence in Hoboken, N. J., which in 1835 was replaced by the present more spacious mansion.—The second John's son, John Cox, b. 24 Sept., 1785; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 13 June, 1857, was graduated at Columbia in 1803, and married Maria C. Livingston on 27 Dec., 1809. In the early part of his life he resided on his estate at Ammandale, on the Livingston manor, and later in New York city. He was from his youth a devoted yachtsman. He organized the New York yacht club, was its first commodore, and commanded the "America" in the memorable race in England in 1851.—Another son, Robert Livingston, b. 18 Oct., 1787; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 21 April, 1856, having a strong engineering bias, began to assist his father when only seventeen years old. He took the "Phoenix" to Philadelphia by sea in June, 1808. At the death of Fulton the speed of steamboats on the Hudson was under seven miles an hour, and at about that date Robert L. Stevens built the "Philadelphia," which had a speed of eight miles. He built many steamboats, increasing the speed of each successive one up to 1832, when the "North America" attained fifteen miles. From 1815 until 1840 he stood at the head of his profession in the United States as a constructor of steam vessels and their machinery, making innumerable improvements, which were generally adopted. In 1821 he eliminated the present form of ferry-boat and ferry-slips, making his boats with guards encircling them throughout, and constructing the ferry-slips with spring piling and spring fenders. In adopting the overhead working-beam of Watt to navigation, he made important improvements, inventing and applying, in 1818, the cam-board cut-off, subsequently in 1821 the gallows-frame that is now used for the column that supported the working-beam, and making that beam of wrought-iron strap with a cast-iron center, instead of purely of cast-iron. This he improved in 1828 into the shape that is now universally used. He lengthened the proportionate stroke of the piston, and invented the split cylinder-which was also capable of a head-valve, which was a modification of the Cornish double-beat valve, and is now always used on the beam-engine. He placed the boilers on the wheel-guards and over the water, improved the details in every part, and finally left the American working-beam (or walking-beam) engine in its present form. At the same time he strengthened the boiler, beginning with a pressure-plate two pounds to the square inch, and increasing the strength of the boilers, so that fifty pounds could be safely carried. He made the first marine tubular boiler in 1831, and was among the first to use anthracite coal. In the hulls of his vessels he gradually increased the amount of iron fastening until it was finally more than quadrupled, increasing the strength of vessel while diminishing their weight. He reduced the vibration of the hull by the masts and rods that are now used, and added greatly to their strength by his overhead truss-frame.

On the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester railway in 1830, he went to England, where he had made, from a model he brought over, the rails for the road he was building, which later his brother, Edwin A., in New Jersey. This rail is the well-known T-pattern, used in this country and in a large part of Europe, which is fastened by spikes without the intervention of chairs, which are required by the form of rail that is still used in England. He also then ordered from the Stephensons the locomotive called the "John Bull," the prototype of those that are made in this country, which is now preserved at the Smithsonian institution in Washington. Toward the close of the last war with England Robert was engaged in making a bomb that could be fired from a cannon instead of from a mortar, and that could thus be applied to naval warfare. In connection therewith he made many experiments on the Hodgkinson form, for which he obtained from the government the loan of heavy ordnance, and finally he succeeded in producing a successful percussion-shell. President Madison then appointed a board to test this shell in the harbor of New York, both against solid targets of wooden beams and against an actual section of a ship of the line, built for the purpose. Each was demolished by a percussion shell. The government then adopted the shell, purchasing a large quantity, together with the secret of its construction. In 1814 Edwin, under the direction of his father, had experimented with shot against inclined iron-plating, and in 1841, when, on account of the U.S. boundary disputes with England, public attention was directed to naval defences, he made a series of experiments, which he and his brothers laid before the government. President Tyler appointed a commission of officers of the army and navy to superintend, at Sandy Hook, the experiments of the brothers on the application of iron to war-vessels as a protection against shot, who, after many trials, reported that the iron four-inch and a half inches thick resisted effectually the force of a sixty-four-pound shot fired at thirty yards with battering charges. Thereupon an act was passed, 14 April, 1842, authorizing the secretary of the navy to contract with Robert L. Stevens for an iron-clad steam vessel. Stevens immediately began to excavate a dry dock for his vessel, which he had finished within a year, and also had his vessel planned, and began its construction: but the contract was changed in the latter part of 1843, when Capt. Robert F. Stockton constructed a wrought-iron cannon having a bore of ten inches and throwing a round shot that pierced a four-and-a-half-inch target. At each successive important increase of the size of the gun, the increased thickness of armor necessary for defence required increased tonnage in the vessel that Stevens had contracted to build, causing insuperable interruption and consequent delay. This vessel, which was known as the Stevens battery, lay in its basin at Hoboken for many years, and was never launched. It was the first iron-clad ever projected, preceding by more than ten years the small iron-clad vessels used by the French at Kinburn in 1854. Another son, James Alexander, b. in New York city, 29 Jan., 1799; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 7 Oct., 1873, was graduated at Columbia in 1818, and admitted to the bar in New York city in 1811. In connection with Thomas Gibbons, he established the Union steamboat line between New York and Philadelphia, which led to the suit of Ogden v. Gibbon, memorable for the decision that placed all the navigable waters of the United States under the jurisdiction of the general government.—Another son, Edwin Augustus, b. in Hoboken, N. J., 28 July, 1793; d. in Paris, France, 8 Aug., 1868, after assisting his brother Robert, in 1826 took charge of the Caledonia line, with the object of merging into the Caledonia and Amboy a vessel of the same class, for which the two brothers obtained from the state of New Jersey in 1830. They prosecuted the work so vigorously that the road was opened for traffic on 9 Oct., 1832, the elder brother being president and the younger treasurer and manager. In the next twenty years the railroad system of the United States, the railroad network of Great Britain, and the railroad system of England, was formed, and in aiding this development the brothers were conspicuous, inventing and introducing many appliances on the road, locomotives, and cars. The germ of many improvements afterward perfected on other roads can be traced back to the Caledonia and Amboy. Of this the vestibule-car is a modern instance. The brothers, while engaged in railroad affairs, still kept their great interests in navigation, and made many improvements in it. In 1827 the elder brother applied forced draught to the “North America,” and its use immediately became general, while in 1842 the younger patented the air-tight fire-room for this forced draught, and applied it on many vessels. This double invention of the two brothers is now used in all the great navies of the world. Both brothers spent a great part of their lives in devising and effecting improvements in the means of attack and defence in naval warfare. Robert had bequeathed the Stevens battery to his brother, and Edwin, at the beginning of the civil war, presented to the government a plan for completing the vessel, together with a small vessel, called the “Naugatuck,” to demonstrate the practicability of his plans. This small vessel was accepted by the government, and was one of the fleet that attacked the “Merrimack.” She was a twin-screw vessel, capable of being immersed three feet below her load-line, so as to be nearly invisible, of being raised again in eight minutes by pumping out the immersing weight of water, and of turning end for end on her centre in one minute and a quarter. The government refused to appropriate the money on the plans that were proposed by Mr. Stevens, and at his death he left the vessel to the state of New Jersey, together with $1,000,000 for its completion. He founded the Stevens institute (see illustration), bequeathing to it and to the high school a large plot of ground at Hoboken, and $150,000 for the building and $300,000 for endowment.—His widow, Martha Bayard, has devoted $200,000 to religious and charitable institutions, among which may be mentioned the erection of the Church of the Holy Innocents at Hoboken.

STEVENS, Paul. Canadian author, b. in Belgium in 1839; d. in Coteau du Lac, Canada, in 1882. He emigrated to Canada, became editor of “La patrie” in Montreal, and was afterward professor of literature in the College of Chambly. He returned to Montreal in 1860, and was for some time editor of “L’Artiste.” He then became a tutor in the De Beaujeu family at Coteau du Lac, where he remained till his death. He published “Fables” (Montreal, 1857). This work gained him the title of the “Lafontaine of Canada,” and he is the only Canadian that has distinguished himself in this species of composition. He also wrote “Contes populaires” (Montreal, 1867).

STEVENS, Phineas. soldier, b. in Sudbury, Mass., 29 Feb., 1707; d. in Chignecto, Nova Scotia,
6 Feb., 1756. He was a descendant of Thomas Stevens, of London, England, a supporter and friend of the Massachusetts colony, whose father, Thomas Stevens, of Devonshire, was one of the assignees of Sir Walter Raleigh's patent of Virginia. He removed with his parents to Rutland, Mass., about 1711, and when sixteen years old was carried as a captive to St. Francis by Indians, among whom he learned the savage mode of warfare. During King George's war he was a commandant of Fort No. 4, which was erected at the farthest settlement on Connecticut river, now Charlestown, N. H. When it was attacked in May, 1746, he routed the Indians in a bold sally, and on 19 June he defeated them in the open field. The fort was blockaded during the summer by French and Indians, who attempted to carry it by assault in August. In March, 1747, Capt. Stevens, who had evacuated the fort in the winter, resumed possession with thirty men, and in April they sustained an attack of 400 Frenchmen and savages. He held the fort till the close of the war. In 1749 he was sent to Canada by Gov. William Shirley to negotiate an exchange of prisoners. He went again in 1752 to treat for an exchange of prisoners, and was twice attacked and wounded in a free conflict among the Indians. After the renewal of hostilities he took part in Col. Robert Monckton's expedition against the French settlements in Nova Scotia, and died on the march to Bean Séjour.

The journal of his trip to Canada in 1749 is printed in the "New Hampshire Historical Collections."—His son, Simon, soldier, b. in Rutland Mass., 3 Sept., 1752; died in Charlestown, N. H., was lieutenant of Capt. John Stark's company in the expedition against Ticonderoga in 1758, was taken prisoner, and in May, 1759, escaped from Quebec, sailed down St. Lawrence river in a captured schooner, and reached a British post after many adventures, which are recounted in his unpublished journal. During the Revolution he served as a loyal volunteer in the British army.—Another son, Enos, localist, b. in Rutland, Mass., 13 Oct., 1739; d. in Barnet, Vt., in 1808, was carried off by the St. Francis Indians from Charlestown when ten years old, and held in captivity three months. He was a volunteer in the royal army on Long Island, and was engaged in foraging in privateers along the coast. After the Revolution he joined the emigrant refugees who went to Nova Scotia. After several years he returned to Charlestown, N. H. He subsequently settled at Barnet, Vt. He kept a journal of the events in which he participated from 1777 till 1783.—Enos's son, Henry, antiquary, b. in Barnet, Vt., 13 Dec., 1793; d. there, 30 July, 1867, was educated at peacham academy, Vt., and early began to collect manuscripts, tracts, newspapers, and printed volumes relating to American history, especially that of Vermont. He was the founder and first president of the Vermont historical society. The most valuable part of his collection was placed for safe-keeping in the state-house at Montpelier, where in 1857 it was burned. He was a member of the legislature for two terms.

—Henry's son, Enos, inventor, b. in Barnet, Vt., 22 Jan., 1816; d. there, 31 Jan., 1857, was graduated at Middlebury college in 1838, and taught for the next seven years in Paradise, Pa. He assisted Dr. Samuel G. Howe in investigating the condition of the idiots of Massachusetts in 1847-8, and then returned to Barnet and engaged in agricultural pursuits. He invented a system of musical notation, apparatus for automatically recording atmospheric changes, an instrument for phrenological measurements, a legislative toller that was put in use by congress in 1863, and other intricate machines, originated an astronomical theory of weather indications, and published pamphlets on astronomy, music, and phrenology, and many papers on agricultural topics.—Another son, Henry, bibliographer, b. in Barnet, Vt., 24 Aug., 1819; d. in South Hampstead, England, 28 Feb., 1886. His early education was received at the school of his native village. In 1836 he attended Lyceum academy, and he was afterwards a student at Middlebury college. He engaged in teaching at intervals, and also held a clerkship in the treasury department at Washington. In 1841 he entered Yale, where he was graduated in 1843, and then studied law a short time at Cambridge. Meanwhile he became much interested in his father's work, and devoted his attention to early colonial history and the historical relations between the states and England. Through his acquaintance with collectors of historical and genealogical books and manuscripts, and with an increasing knowledge of their wants, under their encouragement and support, he visited London in search of Americana in 1843, and remained there forty years until his death. Having gathered recommendations, he speedily made the acquaintance of the most distinguished bibliographers, and, to use his own expression, "drifted" one day into the British museum and presented to Sir Anthony Panizzi his letter of introduction from Jared Sparks. His coming was most opportune, for the authorities had just discovered that the museum was deficient in modern American books. The assistance of Mr. Stevens was immediately secured in supplying the deficiency, and from that time until his death he was their trusted agent for procuring North and South American books of all kinds, including state and national laws, journals and documents. As a result, the library of the British museum contains a larger collection of American books than any single American library. At the same time he was supplying many American public and private libraries with the rarest of Americana. Many books supplied by him at moderate prices are now worth fifty times the amount that was paid him for them. He soon became an experienced bibliographer, giving special attention to the early editions of the English Bible, and to early voyages and travels, especially those of the English and the American foundation. He became one of the highest authorities. John Carter Brown was one of his early correspondents, and he may be said to have formed the Lenox library, as he was James Lenox's agent to collect the rarest book treasures. He was an indefatigable bibliographer and a generous correspondent. He was constantly putting forth bibliographical brochures, and his catalogues are highly prized for their minute accuracy and valuable notes, as well as for peculiar excellence of typography. He never forgot the state in which he was born, but frequently signed himself Henry Stevens of Vermont, or wrote after his name the initials G. M. B., Green Mountain Boy. He was a genial friend, full of quaint savings and good-humor. In 1842 he was made a fellow of the Society of antiquaries. In 1857 he was a member of the committee for promoting the Caxton exhibition, and catalogued the exhibit of Bibles. The same year he became a member of the Librarim's association and took an active part in all its meetings. He formed a large collection of documents relating to Benjamin Franklin, which he published at his own expense. He also made a study extensively on bibliographical subjects, and left several unpublished essays, among which were investigations respecting Columbus and a supplement to Louis Fagan's "Life of Pannizzi," containing anecdotes relating to the British museum. Among his publications are "Catalogue of My English Library" (London, 1853); "Catalogue of a Library of Works relating to America" (1854); "Catalogue Raisonné of English Bibles" (1854); "American Bibliographer" (Chiswick, 1854); "Catalogue of America" (New York, 1857). "Analytical Index to Colonial Documents of New Jersey in the State Paper Offices of England" (New York, 1858); "Catalogue of American Maps in the British Museum" (London, 1859); "Catalogue of Canadian Books in the British Museum" (1859); "Catalogue of Mexican and other Spanish-American and West Indian Books" (1859); "Bibliotheca Americana" (1861); "Historical Nuggets" (1862); "The Humboldt Library" (1863); "Historical and Geographical Notes on the Earliest Discoveries in America" (New Haven, 1869); "Bibliotheca historica" (Boston, 1870); "Schedule of 2,000 American Historical Nuggets" (London, 1870); "Sebastian Cabot's John Cabot = 0" (Boston, 1870); "Bibliothecas geographica et historica" (part 1, London, 1872); "American Books with Tags to 'Em" (1872); "Bibles in the Caxton Exhibition" (1878); "History of the Oxford Caxton Memorial Bible" (1878); "Photo-Bibliography" (1878); "Historical Collections" (2 vols., 1881-82); "Who Spoils our New English Books!" (1881); and "Recollections of James Lea" (1886). He also aided important works relating to American history, the latest being "The Dawn of British Trade to the East Indies" (London, 1886). Another son, Benjamin Franklin, bibliographer, b. in Barnet, Vt., 19 Feb., 1833, entered Middlebury college, but on account of feeble health did not finish his course. He went to London to join his brother Henry in 1850, engaged in the bookselling business with him, married a daughter of the printer Whittingham, and after the death of his father-in-law had charge of the Chiswick press. He is U.S. despatch agent in London, is a purchasing agent there for American libraries, and sends English publications to the United States. Mr. Stevens has edited and published "The Campaign in Virginia in 1781," containing documentary letters of the week; "The Diary of Henry Clinton and Lord Cornwallis" (2 vols., London, 1888), and "Facsimiles of Manuscripts relating to America, 1773-'83" (35 folio vols., London, 1889-'90), a work of great national importance, carefully indexed.

STEVENS, Thaddeus, statesman, b. in Danville, Caledonia co., Vt., 4 April, 1792; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 Aug., 1868. He was the child of poor parents, and was sickly and lame, but ambitious, and his mother toiled to secure for him an education. He entered Vermont university in 1810, and after it was closed in 1812 on account of the war he went to Dartmouth, and was graduated in 1814. He began the study of law in Pacham, Vt., continued it while teaching an academy in York, Pa., was admitted to the bar at Bel Air, Md., established himself in 1816 at Gettysburg, Pa., and soon gained a high reputation, and was employed in many important suits. He devoted himself exclusively to his profession till the contest between the strict constructionists, who nominated Andrew Jackson for the presidency in 1828, and the new Whigs in the following year. When the Whigs drew him into politics as an ardent supporter of John Quincy Adams. He was elected to the legislature in 1833 and the two succeeding years. By a brilliant speech in 1835, he defeated a bill to abolish the recently established common-school system of Pennsylvania. In 1836 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and took an active part in its debates, but his anti-slavery principles would not permit him to sign the report recommending an instrument of slavery which restricted the franchise to white citizens. He was a member of the legislature again in 1837, and in 1838, when the election dispute between the Democratic and anti-Masonic parties led to the organization of rival legislatures, he was the most prominent member of the Whig and anti-Masonic house. In 1838 he was appointed a canal commissioner. He was returned to the legislature in 1841. He gave a farm to Mrs. Lydia Jane Pierson, who had written poetry in defence of the common schools, and thus aided him in saving them. Having incurred losses in the war of 1812, he removed in 1842 to Lancaster, Pa., and for several years devoted himself to legal practice, occupying the foremost position at the bar. In 1848 and 1850 he was elected to congress as a Whig, and ardently opposed the Clay compromise measures of 1850, including the fugitive-slave law. On retiring from congress, March, 1853, he confined himself to his profession till 1858, when he was returned to congress as a Republican. From that time till his death he was one of the Republican leaders in that body, the chief advocate of emancipation, and the representative of the radical section of his party. His great oratorical powers and force of character earned for him the title, applied to William Pitt, of the "great commoner." He urged on President Lincoln the justice and expediency of the emancipation proclamation, took the lead in all measures for arming and for enfranchising the negro, and initiated and pressed the fourteenth amendment to the Federal constitution. During the war he introduced and carried acts of confiscation, and after its close he advocated rigorous measures in reorganizing the southern states on the basis of universal freedom. He was chairman of the committee of ways and means for three sessions. Subsequently, as chairman of the house committee on reconstruction, he reported the bill which divided the southern states into five military districts, and placed them under the rule of army officers until they should adopt constitutions that conceded suffrage and equal rights to the blacks. In a speech that he made in congress on 24 Feb., 1868, he proposed the impeachment of President Johnson. He was appointed one of the committee of seven to prepare articles of impeachment, and was chairman of the board of managers that was appointed on the part of the house to conduct the trial. He was exceedingly positive in his convictions, and attacked his adversaries with bitter denunciations and sarcastic taunts, yet he was genial and witty among his friends, and was noted for his uniform, though at times impulsive, acts of charity. While skeptical in his religious opinions, he resented slighting
was educated at the village school of his native place, and subsequently he came to the United States, and became an enthusiastic bicyclist. He conceived the idea of making a tour around the world on his wheel, and, starting from San Francisco on 22 April, 1884, made his way across the continent of America, thence to England, and through Europe to Constantinople, where he landed in the spring of 1885. His progress through several countries in Asia was prohibited by their governments, and at times his advance was very difficult, owing to the hostility of the natives, but ultimately persevering, he reached Japan, whence he went by steamer to San Francisco, landing on 24 Dec., 1886. His experiences were given in a series of letters to a magazine which he has since collected in book-form as "Around the World on a Bicyle" (2 vols., New York, 1887-89).

STEVENS, Thomas Holdup, naval officer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 22 Feb., 1793; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 Jan., 1841. He lost his parents, whose name was Holdup, in early life, and was adopted by a citizen of Charleston, who procured for him a midshipman's warrant in 1809. In the beginning of the war of 1812 he volunteered for service on the lakes, was assigned to duty under Capt. Samuel Angus on the Niagara frontier, and took part in a night attack on the enemy's works opposite Black Rock, preparatory to the contemplated descent of Gen. Alexander Smythe on the Canada shore. He was one of the leaders of a deserting that war ended the enemy's artillery, and of a scaling-party that dislodged the British grenadiers by burning their barracks, and, although wounded in the right hand by a canister shot, remained after the naval force had retreated, and,
with two other midshipmen and five seamen, crossed Niagara river at great risk in a leaky canoe. For his bravery in this action he was made a lieutenant, 24 July, 1813, while he was with Com.
Oliver H. Perry at Erie, Pa., assisting in the building and equipment of the lake squadron. In the battle of Lake Erie he commanded the sloop
"Tripe," and fought against the rear of the enemy's line, poisoning ahead of the "Tigress" and "Porcupine," as well as grape and canister into the "Queen Charlotte" until she struck her colors, and, with Stephen Champlin, chasing and bringing back two of the enemy's vessels when they tried to escape. For these achievements he was voted a silver medal by congress, and presented with a sword by the citizens of Charleston. He was ordered in 1826 from the "Tigress" to the "Java," which Com. Perry was fitting out for a cruise in the Mediterranean.
In 1813, by legislative enactment, he changed his name to Stevens, which was that of his early benefactor. In 1819-20 he was attached to the frigate "Constellation." He performed valuable service in the cruise of Com. David Porter for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies, commanding successively the "Asp," the "Jackal,"
and the schooner "Shark," of the Mosquito fleet, being promoted master-commandant on 3 March, 1823. His last command aloft was the "Onto-io" sloop, which was attached to Com. James Bid-dle's Mediterranean squadron in 1830-2. He was made a captain, at that time the highest rank in the service, on 27 Jan., 1836, and commanded the navy-yard establishment at Washington until his death. —His son, Thomas Holdup, naval officer,
b. in Middletown, Conn., 27 May, 1819; d. in Rockville, Md., 15 May, 1896, was appointed a midship-man, served as aide to President Tyler in 1842, receiving his commission as lieutenant in 1849; and in 1852-5 commanded the schooner "Ewing" in surveys of the California and Oregon coasts. When the civil war began he apgan applied for duty at the front, was ordered to command the "Ortawa," one of the ninety-day gun-boats then afloat raising a nov-volunteers at

Erie, Pa., and joined the South Atlantic blockading squadron of Admiral Samuel P. Du Pont. While commanding a division of gun-boats, he drove the fleet of
Com. Josiah Tat-nall under the protection of the forts at Port Royal, 4 Nov., 1861. In the battle of Port Royal he engaged Fort Walker at short range. On 1 Jan., 1862, he had an engagement with Com. Tatnall's Mosquito fleet in Savannah river. His command was the leading vessel in a combined attack of the navy and land forces on Fort Clinch, 3 March, 1862, and in the capture of the town of St. Mary's, Ga., and commanded the first expedition up St. John's river, occupying May-port, Jacksonville, Magnolia, and Palatka and Fort Steele and Fort Finnegans, and capturing the yacht
ading squadron early in May, 1862, to take commend of the steamer "Maratha," was present at the battle of West Point, and commanded the first expedition to Cumberland and White House to open James river, taking part in the demonstration against Petersburg and the battle of Malvern Hill. On 4 July, 1862, he captured the Confederate gun-boat "Teazer." He was promoted commandant of the harbor of Washington and attached to "Monitor," with which he covered the flank of the army on James river and its rear during the withdrawal from the peninsula. In September, while attached to Com. Charles Wilkes's flying squadron, he captured five prizes, and chased the privateer "Florida" on the Bahamas banks. On 7 Oct., 1862, off St. George, Bermuda, he stopped the steamer "Florida", which was in the service of a blockade-runner, while she was under the convoy of the British sloop-of-war "Desperate," and both commanders cleared their decks for action. Early in August, 1863, he assumed command of the iron-clad "Patapsco," and in the engagements with the forts in Charleston harbor he performed gallant services. After a severe engagement with the batteries on Sullivan's island, he led a boat attack against Fort Sumter. Afterward he commanded the "Oneida" of the Western Gulf blockading squadron, but was temporarily transferred to the iron-clad "Winnebago" for the operations before Mobile in July, 1864, in which he was conspicuous for the handling of his vessel and his personal daring. He commanded the "Oneida" off the coast of Mexico in 1865, was commissioned captain on 2 July, 1866, commodore on 20 Nov., 1872, and rear-admiral on 27 Oct., 1879, and, after commanding the Pacific fleet and acting as president of the board of visitors at the U. S. naval academy, he was retired on 27 May, 1881. — His son, Thomas Holdup, is a lieutenant in the U. S. navy.

STEVENS, Walter Husted, soldier, b. in Penn Yan, N. Y., 18 Aug., 1837; d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, 12 Nov., 1887. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1858, and commissioned as lieutenant of engineers. He was engaged in constructing and repairing fortifications at New Orleans, La., built two forts on the coast of Texas, removed the great Colorado river raft by order of congress, and built the Ship shoal light-house in 1860. He was commissioned the erection of the custom-house at New Orleans after Maj. Pierre T. G. Beauregard was called away, and also built the custom-house at Galveston, Tex. In May, 1861, having resigned his commission and entered the Confederate service, he accompanied Gen. Beauregard to Virginia as his chief engineer. He was made a brigadier-general, and was the chief engineer of the Army of Northern Virginia until the autumn of 1862, when he was placed in charge of the fortifications of Richmond. He completed these defenses and again became chief engineer of Lee's army, and continued as such to the close of the war. He then sought and obtained employment as an engineer on the Mexican railway between Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico, and at the time of his death was its superintendent and contracting engineer. An English company was building this road, and during the revolution in which Maximilian was dethroned Gen. Stevens remained in sole charge of it, and he skilfully preserved the property through that difficult period.

STEVENS, Walter Le Conte, physicist, b. in Gordon county, Ga., 17 June, 1847. He is the nephew of John Amasa and John Daniel Stevens. After graduation at the University of South Carolina in 1868 he spent the year 1870-72 at the University of Virginia, and meanwhile had held the professorship of chemistry at Ogletorpe college, Atlanta, Ga., in 1871-2, and taught physics at Chatham academy, Savannah, Ga., in 1873-6. Prof. Stevens then settled in New York, and, after teaching several years, was called in 1882 to the chair of mathematics and physics in Packer collegiate institute in Brooklyn. In connection with his class-work he invented and improved forms of physical apparatus, of which his organ-pipe sonometer and reversible stereoscope are the best known, descriptions of which have been published in the "American Journal of Science." He is a member of scientific societies and secretary of the Brooklyn academy of science and art. The honorary degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by the University of Georgia in recognition of his writings on "Physiological Optics," which were published simultaneously in the "American Journal of Science" and the London "Philosophical Magazine" in 1881-2. Prof. Stevens has written for the "North American Review," the "Popular Science Monthly," and other journals, prepared the parts relating to the physics of the earth's crust, the ocean, and the atmosphere in "Appleton's Physical Geography" (New York, 1887), and rewrote J. Dorman Steele's "Popular Physics" (1888).

STEVENS, William Bacon, P. E., bishop, b. in Bath, Me., 13 July, 1815; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 June, 1887. He received his early education at Phillips Andover academy, but, his health failing, he went abroad and spent two years in travel. At the end of that time he returned and pursued the study of medicine at Dartmouth, receiving his degree from this college in 1837, and also from the Medical college of South Carolina. He went to Savannah, Ga., upon graduating, where he practised his profession for five years. In 1841 he received the appointment of state historian of Georgia, and published several volumes, among which were "The Historical Collections" (Savannah, 1841-2). About this time his attention was directed toward the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and, relinquishing the profession of medicine, he began a course of study in preparation for orders. He was ordained deacon in Christ church, Savannah, Ga., by Bishop Elliott, 28 Feb., 1843, and organized and took charge of Emmanuel church, Athens, Ga., of which he became rector on his advancement to the priesthood, 7 Jan., 1844. In this year also he was elected professor of belles-lettres, oratory, and moral philosophy in the University of Georgia. In 1847 he was sent as a deputy to the general convention from his diocese. In 1848 he accepted the rectoryship of St. Andrew's church, Philadelphia, Pa., and received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. The consecration of the diocese having elected him assistant bishop, he was consecrated in St. Andrew's church, 2 Jan., 1862, and Union college conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. Upon the death of Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1863, he became bishop of Pennsylvania. The diocese of Pennsylvania was divided in 1865, the western counties being erected into a new diocese, which took the name of Pittsburg. Again in 1871 another division was made by the setting off of the diocese of central Pennsylvania. In the mean time Bishop Stevens had been appointed to the charge of the American Episcopal church in the British Dominions, and made one or more visits during the six years of his oversight. At the Pan-Anglian council in 1878 he was chosen to preach the closing sermon, which he did at St. Paul's church, London. He was in feeble health for many years during the latter part of his life, and at last, in 1886, Bishop Whittaker was elected his assistant, and became the second bishop of the diocese of Philadelphia. His works include "Discourses before the Historical Society of Georgia" (Savannah, 1841); "History of Silk-Culture in Georgia" (1844); "History of Georgia" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1847); "Parables of the New Testament Unfolded" (1855); "The Bow in the Cloud" (1855); "Home Service" (1856); "The Lord's Day" (1857); "History of St. Andrew's Church and Philadelphia" (1858); "Sabbaths of Our Lord" (1872); "Sermons" (New York, 1879); and many essays, charges, and tracts.

STEVENVSON, Alexander Allan, Canadian printer, b. in Richmond, Yorkshire, Scotland, 29 January, 1829. He came with his family to Canada in 1846, and learned the printing trade in Montreal. In 1855 he assisted in establishing the "Star" newspaper, and subsequent years were spent in a general printing business, which he conducted till 1879. In 1855 he assisted in organizing the Montreal field-battery, in 1856 he became its commander, and he participated with this corps in 1858 in the military celebration in connection with the laying of the first Atlantic cable, his command thus having the only British military organization to carry the cable jack across the streets of New York since the evacuation. In 1874 he received the Conservative nomination to the Dominion parliament for Montreal west, but was defeated, though his opponent was afterward unseated on the charge of bribery by agents. He has since been nominated twice, but refused to accept. He has taken a prominent part in local and provincial matters in Montreal, and is president of the council of arts and manufactures of the province of Quebec.

STEVENVSON, Andrew, statesman, b. in Culpeper county, Va., in 1784; d. at Blenheim, his estate, in Albemarle county, Va., 25 Jan., 1857. He studied law, won a high place in his profession, and in 1804 was chosen to the state house of delegates, of which, after serving several terms, he became speaker. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 2 June, 1834, when he resigned. From 1827 till 1834 he was speaker of the house. From 1836 till 1841 Mr. Stevenson was minister to England. On his return he became rector of the University of Virginia, and he devoted the rest of his life to the duties of that office and to agricultural pursuits.—His son, John White, senator, b. in Richmond, Va., 4 May, 1812; d. in Covington, Ky., 10 Aug., 1886, was educated at Hampden Sidney and the University of Virginia, where he graduated in 1832, and in 1841 settled in Covington, Ky., where he practised law with success, and served in the Kentucky legislature 1843-7. He was a leader of the State constitutional convention of 1849, was chosen a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1848, 1852, and 1856, and from 1857 till 1861 sat in the lower house of congress. He was a delegate to the Philadelphia Union convention of 1866, and in 1867 he was chosen lieutenant-governor of the state. The governor, John L. Helm, died five days after his inauguration, and Mr. Stevenson acted as governor till 1868, and then was elected to the office by the largest majority that was ever given to a candidate in the state, serving till 1871. In the last year he took his seat in the U. S. senate, where he served till 1877. On the expiration of his term he became professor of commercial law and contracts in the law-school at Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1889 he was chairman of the Democratic national convention that nominated Gen. Winfield S. Hancock for the presidency. In 1884 he was president of the American bar association. He was a commissioner to prepare a "Code of Practice on Civil and Criminal Cases for Kentucky" (1854).

STEVENVSON, James, ethnologist, b. in Maysville, Ky., 24 Dec., 1840; d. in New York city, 25 July, 1888. Before he was sixteen years old he was engaged in geologic work for the government surveys of the northwest under Ferdinand V. Hayden. He spent several winters among the Blackfoot and Shoshone Indians, and studied the customs, and traditions, and made an exploration of the Yellowstone country. When the civil war began he joined the National army, and served till the close of hostilities. He then resumed his explorations in the northwest in connection with the engineer corps, and afterward with the U. S. geological survey, which he continued as executive officer. He followed the Columbia and Snake rivers to their sources, made the ascent of Great Teton mountain, discovered a new pass across the Rocky mountains, assisted Prof. Hayden in the survey of Yellowstone park, and was instrumental in having it made a government reservation. He was continued as executive officer of the survey, under Maj. John W. Powell, and detailed for research in connection with the bureau of ethnology of the Smithsonian institution, exploring the cliff houses of Arizona and New Mexico, and investigating the history and religious myths of the Navajoos and the Zinji, Mosqui, and other Pueblo Indians.

STEVENVSON, John Dunlap, soldier, b. in Stauton, Va., 8 June, 1828; d. in St. Louis, 22 Jan., 1897. He was a member of the Confederate States Congress for Kentucky, was graduated in law at Stauton, and began practice in Missouri. He organized a volunteer company in 1846, and served in Gen. Stephen W. Kearny's invasion of New Mexico. After his return he removed to St. Louis, was frequently a member of the legislature, president for one term of the state senate, and in 1861 was an earnest supporter of the Union. In that year he raised the 7th Missouri regiment, and during the siege of Corinth commanded the district of Savannah. He then led a brigade in Tennessee, was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, served in the Vicksburg campaign, and made a charge at Champion Hill that broke the enemy's left flank. He led a successful expedition to drive those federates from northern Louisiana, commanded the district of Corinth, and then occupied and fortified Decatur, Ala. On 8 Aug., 1864, being left without a command, he resigned; but he was recommissioned and given the district of Harper's Ferry. During the reconstruction period he was in charge of northern Georgia. In 1869, after the close of the war he was made brevet major-general of volunteers, and in 1867, for his services at Champion Hill, brevetted brigadier-general in the regular army, in which he had been commissioned a colonel on 28 July, 1866. He left the army in 1871, and had since practised law in St. Louis.
STEWART, Alexander. British soldier, b. in England about 1740; d. in December, 1784. He was appointed captain in the 5th foot in 1761, and reached the grade of colonel in 1780. During the Revolution, he served in the British forces. He died in 1781, commanded the British forces in South Carolina, and was defeated at Eutaw Springs on 8 Sept. by Gen. Nathanael Greene, being subsequently compelled to retreat to Charleston. In 1790 he was made a major-general.

STEWART, Alexander, Canadian jurist, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 30 Jan., 1784; d. there, 1 Jan., 1868. He was the son of a Scottish Presbyterian minister, was educated at the Halifax grammar-school, and became a clerk in the ordnance department. He afterward entered a house that was engaged in the West India trade, and soon became a member of the firm, but studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1829. He became a member of the Nova Scotia assembly in 1826, the legal executive in 1837, and in 1838, a member of the executive council. In 1846 he became master of the rolls and judge of the vice-admiralty court, and in 1856 he was made a companion of the Bath.

STEWART, Alexander Peter, soldier, b. in Rogersville, Hawkins co., Tenn., 2 Oct., 1821. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1842, became 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, and was acting assistant professor of mathematics at the academy from 1843 till 31 May, 1845, when he resigned. He was then professor of mathematics and natural and experimental philosophy in Cumberland university, Tenn., in 1845—9, and in Nashville university in 1854—5, and became city-surveyor of Nashville in 1855. He was appointed by Gov. Isham G. Harris major of the corps of artillery in the provisional army of Tennessee, 17 May, 1861, and became brigadier-general in the Confederate army, 8 Nov., 1861, major-general, 2 June, 1863, and lieutenant-general, 23 June, 1864. He was engaged in the battles of Belmont, Shiloh, Perryville, Murfreesboro', and the campaign about Hoover's Gap, Tullahoma, Chattanooga, and through the Dalton-Atlanta campaign under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. He was with Gen. John B. Hood in his movements in the rear of Gen. Sherman's army, and destroyed the railroads and captured the garrison at Big Shanty and Acworth. He was at Franklin and Nashville under Hood, and at Cole's Farm, in North Carolina, under Johnston. In 1868 he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, and was a member of the board of education of the University.

STEWART, Alexander Turney, merchant, b. in Lisburn, near Belfast, Ireland, 12 Oct., 1803; d. in New York, 10 April, 1876. He was the descendant of a Scotch emigrant to the north of Ireland and the only son of a farmer, who died when he was a school-boy. He studied with a view to entering the ministry, but, with his guardian's consent, abandoned that plan and entered the University of Pennsylvania in the summer of 1823, without any definite plans for the future. He was for a period employed as a teacher in a select school in Roosevelt street near Pearl, then one of the fashionable localities of the city. Returning to Ireland, he received the moderate fortune his father had left him, bought a stock of Belfast linens and linens, and on reaching New York opened a store at No. 285 Broadway, 2 Sept., 1828.
for which he paid a rent of $250 per annum, giving as a reference Jacob Clineh, whose daughter, Cornelia, he soon afterward married. The amount of the capital invested was about $2,000. The young merchant had a sleeping-room in the rear of his shop, and under these humble conditions was formed the germ of the most extensive and lucrative dry-goods business in the world. In 1826 he removed to a larger store at 202 Broadway, and soon afterward moved to 257 Broadway. He displayed a genius for business, met with remarkable success from the first, and in 1848 had accumulated so much capital that he was enabled to build the large marble store on Broadway between Chambers and Fourteenth streets, which afterward was devoted to the wholesale branch of his business. In 1862 he erected on the block bounded by Ninth and Tenth streets, Broadway and Fourth avenue, the five-story iron building used for his retail business. This was said to be the largest retail store in the world at that time. Its cost was nearly $2,750,000. About 2,000 persons were employed in the building, the current expenses of the establishment were more than $1,000,000 a year, and the aggregate of sales in the two stores for the three years preceding his death amounted to about $298,000,000. Besides these two vast establishments, Mr. Stewart had branch houses in different parts of the world, and was the owner of nearly $2,750,000. During the war his annual income averaged nearly $2,000,000, and in 1869 he estimated it at above $1,000,000. In 1867 Mr. Stewart was chairman of the honorary commission sent by the United States government to the Paris Exposition. In March, 1869, President Grant appointed him secretary of the treasury; but his confirmation was prevented by an old law which excludes from that office all who are interested in the importation of merchandise. The president sent to the senate a message recommending that the law be repealed in order that Mr. Stewart might become eligible to the office, and Mr. Stewart offered to transfer his enormous business to trustees and devote the entire profits accruing during his term of office to charitable purposes; but the law was not repealed, as it was believed that Mr. Stewart's proposed plan would not effectually remove his disabilities. His acts of charity were numerous. During the famine in Ireland in 1846 he sent a ship-load of provisions to that country and gave a free passage to as many emigrants as the vessel could carry on its return voyage to this country, stipulating only that they should be able to read and write and of good moral character. After the Franco-German war he sent to France a vessel laden with flour, and in 1871 he gave $50,000 for the relief of the sufferers by the Chicago fire. When Prince Bismarck sent him his photograph requesting that of Mr. Stewart in return, he forwarded instead a draft for 50,000 francs for the benefit of the sufferers by the floods in Silesia, as he would not permit his portraits of any description to be made. He was also one of the largest contributors to the sum of $100,000 presented by the merchants of New York to Gen. Ulysses S. Grant as an acknowledgment of his great services during the civil war. At the time of his death Mr. Stewart was completing, at the cost of $1,000,000, the iron structure on Fourth avenue between Thirty-second and Thirty-third streets, New York, intended as a home for working-girls. He was also building at Hempstead Plains, L. I., the town of Garden City, the object of which was to afford to his employes and others airy and comfortable houses at a moderate cost. Mr. Stewart's wealth was estimated at about $40,000,000. His real estate was assessed at $5,450,000, which did not include property valued at more than $300,000 on which the taxes were paid by the tenants. He had no blood relatives, and by his will the bulk of his estate was given to his wife. He bequeathed $1,000,000 to an executor of the will appointed to close his partnership business and affairs. Many bequests were made to his employes and to other persons. He left a letter, dated 29 March, 1873, addressed to Mrs. Stewart, expressing his intention to make provision for various public charities, by which he wished to have been held in everlasting remembrance, and desiring her to carry out his plans in case she should fail to complete them. Unfortunately, his noble schemes of benevolence were "turned away, and lost the name of action," and a large portion of his wealth passed to a person not of his name or lineage, verifying the words, "He heaped up riches and cannot tell who shall gather them." After Mr. Stewart's death his mercantile interests were transferred by his widow to other persons, who continued the business under the firm-name of A. T. Stewart and Co., which was soon changed to E. J. Denning and Co. Mr. Stewart's residence, on the corner of Fifth avenue and Thirty-fourth street, a marble mansion, seen in the accompanying illustration, is perhaps the finest private house in New York, and among the largest and most valuable in the country, was sold at auction in New York in 1857. Two of his most important paintings of the property; were presented to the Metropolitan museum of art. There was no satisfactory portrait of Mr. Stewart, and that from which the accompanying vignette is taken was painted after death by Thomas Le Clear. He was slight and graceful, of medium height, with fair hair and complexion, and light-blue eyes. He possessed refined tastes, a love of literature and art, and was fond of entertaining, which he did in a delightful manner. At his weekly dinners might be met men of distinction in all the various walks of life—from the emperor of Brazil and a Rothschild, to the penniless poet and painter. What was said of Stewart in the dedication of a volume published in 1874 was but the simple truth—that he was "the first of American merchants and STEWART, Alvan, reformer, b. in South Granville, Washington co., N. Y., 1 Sept., 1790; d. in New York city, 1 May, 1849. His parents removed to Vermont when he was five months old to Crown Point, N. Y., and in 1795, losing their possessions through a defective title, to Westford, Chittenden co., Vt., where the lad was brought up on a farm. In 1808 he began to teach and to study anatomy and medicine. In 1809 he entered Burlington college, Vt., supporting himself by teaching in the winters, and, visiting Canada in 1811, he received a commission under Gov. Sir George Prevost as professor in the Royal school in the seigniory of St. Armand, but he returned to college in June, 1812. After the declaration of war he went again to Canada, and was held as a prisoner. On his return he taught and studied law in Cherry Valley, N. Y., and then in Paris, Ky., making his home in the former place, where he practised his profession and his profession. He was a persistent advocate of protective duties, of internal improvements, and of education. He removed to Utica in 1832, and, though he continued to try causes as counsel, the remainder of his life was given mainly to the temperance and anti-slavery causes. A volume of his speeches was published in 1860. Among the most conspicuous of these was an argument, in 1857, before the New York state anti-slavery convention, to prove that congress might constitutionally abolish slavery; on the "Right of Petition" at Pennsylvania hall, Philadelphia, and on the "Great Issues between Right and Wrong" at the same place in 1898; before the joint committee of the legislature of Vermont; and before the supreme court of New Jersey on a habeas corpus to determine the constitutionality of slavery under the new state constitution of 1844, which last occupied eleven hours in delivery. His first published speech against slavery was in 1835, under threats of a mob. He then drew a call for a state anti-slavery convention for 21 Oct., 1835, at Utica. As the clock struck the hour he called the convention to order and addressed it, and the programme of business was completed ere the threatened mob arrived, as it soon did and dispersed the convention by violence. That night the doors and windows of his house were barred with large timbers, and fifty loaded muskets were provided, with determined men to handle them, but the preparations kept off the menacing invasion. "He was the first," says William Goodell, the historian of abolitionism, "to insist earnestly, in our consultations, in committee and elsewhere, on the necessity of forming a distinct political party to promote the abolition of slavery. Unalmixedly bringing the leaders into it, was its candidate for governor, and this new party grew, year by year, till at last it held the balance of power between the Whigs and Democrats, when, uniting with the former, it constituted the Republican party. The characteristics of Mr. Stewart's eloquence and conversation were a strange and astounding humor, a memory that held large resources at command, its large emergency, a rich philosophy, strong powers of reasoning, and an exuberant imagination. A collection of his speeches, with a memoir, is in preparation by his son-in-law, Luther R. Marsh.

STEWART, Archibald, member of the Continental congress. He resided in Sussex county, N. J., prior to the Revolution, and was active in the movements that hastened it. In July, 1774, he was appointed one of the committee to nominate deputies to the Continental congress, which was to meet in Philadelphia the following September, and in 1775 he was chosen a representative from Sussex county in that congress to fill a vacancy.

STEWART, Austin, author, b. in Prince William county, Va., about 1793; d. after 1860. He was born in the south and at Bath, N. Y. He afterward fled to Canandaigua, and in 1817 he engaged successfully in business in Rochester. In 1826 he delivered an oration at the celebration of the New York emancipation act, and in 1836 he was elected vice-president of the National convention of negroes at Philadelphia. The following year he removed to a small colony that had been established in Canada West. He was elected to the township, Wilberforce, and was chosen its president. He used his own funds to carry on the affairs of the colony, but, finding that no more land would be sold to the colonists by the Canadian company, returned to Rochester in 1857. He afterward opened a school in Canandaigua, and after two years became an agent for the "Anti-Slavery Standard" published by Goodell. "Twenty-two Years a Slave and Forty Years a Freeman" (2d ed., Rochester, N. Y., 1859).

STEWART, Charles, soldier, b. in County Donegal, Ireland, in 1728; d. in Flemington, N. J., 24 July, 1809. His grandfather, of the same name, was a Scottish officer of dragoons, who, for services in the battle of the Boyne, was given an estate in Ireland. The younger Charles came to this country in 1759 and became a deputy surveyor-general of the province of Pennsylvania. In 1774 he was a member of the first convention in New Jersey that issued a declaration of rights against the aggressions of the crown, and in 1775 a delegate to its first Provincial congress. By his adopted state he was made colonel of its first regiment of minute-men, then of the 4th regiment in 1777. In 1777 he was appointed by congress commissary-general of issues in the Continental army, serving as such on Washington's staff till the close of the war. In 1784-'5 he was a representative from New Jersey in congress. - His grandson, Charles Samuel, clergyman, b. in Flemington, N. J., 16 Oct., 1795; d. in Cooperstown, N. Y., 15 Dec., 1870, was graduated at Hamilton College in 1815, when, after studying law, he took a theological course. He was ordained and sent as missionary to the Sandwich Islands in 1823, but, owing to the falling health of his wife, returned in 1835, and afterward lectured through the northern states in advocacy of foreign missions. In 1828 he was appointed chaplain in the U. S. navy, and during his visits to all parts of the world he collected material for his works. He was subsequently stationed for many years at New York, where, in 1836-7, he edited the "Naval Magazine." In 1842 he was retired, and at his death he was the senior chaplain in the navy. The degree of D. D. was given him in 1863 by the University of New York. His works include "Residence at the Sandwich Islands, 1833-23," which is an authority on the early history of that mission (New York, 1828); "Visit to the South Seas in the U. S. Ship Vincennes," with Scenes in Brazil, Peru, etc. (2 vols., 1839; improved ed., by Rev. William Ellis, 2 vols., 1839); "Sketches of Society in Great Britain and Ireland in 1832" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1834); and "Brazil and La Plata in 1850-53: the Personal Record of a Cruise" (New York, 1856). Charles Samuel's son, Charles Seaford, soldier, b. at sea, 11 April, 1823, was graduated in 1840 at the U. S. military academy, where he was assistant professor of engineering in 1840-44. He was made 1st lieutenant in the corps of engineers in 1845, serving as assistant engineer in 1854-7, and as superintendent engineer in the construction of fortifications in Boston harbor till 1861, having been promoted captain in 1860. He served during the civil war in the corps of engineers, was made major in 1863, and was chief engineer of the United States navy during the civil war in 1864-5. He was made lieutenant-colonel in 1867, colonel in 1862, and was retired in September, 1866.

STEWART. Charles, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 July, 1778; d. in Bordentown, N. J., 6 Nov., 1869. His parents were Irish; his father died in 1780, and his mother was left with scant means to provide for four children. He entered the merchant marine as cabin-boy in 1791, and quickly rose to the command of an Indianan. Entering the navy as lieutenant, 9 March, 1798, he served in the frigate "United States" in the West Indies, operating against the French privateers. On 16 July, 1800, he was appointed to command the schooner "Experiment" in the West Indies, when he captured the French schooner "Deux Amis." He was also chased by two French vessels, which he skilfully avoided, and by following them he fought and captured one, the schooner "Diana," before the other vessel could assist in the engagement. On 16 Nov., 1800, he took the privateer "Louise Bridger," and the next month he rescued sixty women and children that had been wrecked while flying from a revolution in Santo Domingo. The Spanish governor of the island wrote a letter of thanks to the president for Stewart's services. He was retained on the list of lieutenants in the naval reorganization of 1801. In 1802 he served as executive of the "Constellation," blockading Tripoli, but returned in 1803 and was placed in command of the brig "Siren," in Preble's squadron, off Tripoli, where he convoyed Decatur in the "Intrepid" to destroy the "Philadelphia," and participated in all the attacks on Tripoli, being included in the vote of thanks by congress on 3 March, 1805, to Preble's officers. While blockading Tripoli he captured the Greek ship "Catapoliana" and the British brig "Scourge" for violating the blockade. As master-commandant he took the charge of the frigate "Essex" and went with the fleet to Tunis, where he convinced his commander-in-chief that it was illegal to make war except by declaration of congress. He returned home in 1806, commanding the "Constellation," and was promoted to captain, 22 April, 1806. He superintended the construction of gun-boats at New York in 1807-8, and was engaged in the merchant marine in 1808-12, but returned to the service in 1812, and with Bainbridge dissuaded the cabinet from the proposed policy of not sending the navy to sea against the British. He was assigned to command the "Argus" and "Hornet" in a special expedition to the West Indies on 23 June, 1812, but the order was cancelled, and he was appointed to command the "Constitution." In going to Norfolk he met a British fleet, which he skilfully avoided, and then participated in the defence of the town. In the summer of 1813 he took command of the "Constitution," destroyed the "Pieton," an armed merchant ship, and the brig "Catherine" and "Phoenix," chased several British ships-of-war and the frigates "La Pique," and narrowly escaped two British frigates near Boston. With new sails he left Boston in December, 1814, captured the brig "Lord Nelson" off Bermuda, 24 Dec., 1814, and the ship "Susan" off Lisbon, and on 23 Feb., 1815, took two British ships-of-war, the "Cyane" and "Levant," after a spirited engagement of fifty minutes. While he was at anchor at St. Jago, Cape de Verde, a British fleet approached, and Stewart received the orders to deliver up the "Constitution" and "Cyane," the "Levant" being recaptured by the fleet in the neutral harbor which she had just left. He received from congress a vote of thanks, a sword, and a gold medal, from the Pennsylvania legislature a vote of thanks and a sword, and the freedom of the city of New York. Like the famous frigate, represented in the illustration, Stewart received the sobriquet of "Old Ironsides." He commanded the Mediterranean squadron, in the "Franklin," in 1816-17, and the Pacific squadron in 1820-24, where he caused a paper blockade to be annulled, and vindicated the rights of American commerce. He was commissioner of the navy in 1830-32, commanded the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1832-41, and in 1841 was mentioned as a candidate for president, but was not nominated. He had charge of the Home squadron in 1842-3, commanded the Philadelphia navy-yard again in 1846, and from 1854 till 1861. He was retired as senior commodore in 1856 and flag-officer in 1860, and on 16 July, 1862, was commissioned rear-admiral, after which he was on waiting orders until his death. He was in the service seventy-one years, and the senior officer for seventeen years. On 21 May, 1825, his daughter, Delia Tebor, married Charles Henry Parnell, and she became the mother of Charles Stewart Parnell, the Irish home-rule leader in the British parliament.

STEWART, Charles James, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. at Galloway House, Wigtownshire, Scotland, 13 April, 1775; d. in London, England, 10 July, 1837. He was the third son of John, seventh Earl of Galloway, was educated at home and at Oxford, where he was graduated in 1799, and the same year was ordained in the Church of England. He was first settled as a pastor at Orton Longueville and Botoil Bridge, near Peterborough, in 1799, where he remained eight years, and so renovated the spiritual and moral condition of the society for the propagation of the gospel, he was appointed to the mission of St. Armand, Eastern townships, Lower Canada. There was no church in his mission, but he erected one at his own expense. In 1819 he was appointed a visiting missionary in the diocese of Quebec, which then included the whole of Canada, and suffered much hardship in travelling over a vast extent of sparsely settled country, without roads or adequate means of conveyance. On the death of Bishop Mountain in 1823, Dr. Stewart was nominated to the see of Quebec as his successor, and he was consecrated on 1 Jan., 1826, by Archbishop Sutton, at Lambeth palace. In May, 1827, Bishop Stewart returned to Quebec and was installed in the cathedral of that city. Henceforth till his death, he devoted himself principally to the interests of his church and the cause of Christianity in general. While he was in Canada he spent the whole of his private fortune in the service of the church and in charity, and promoted the erection of many churches in various parts of the country. In 1816 Oxford gave him the degree of D. D. He published a "Short View of the Eastern Townships in Lower Canada" (London, 1827). "The Stewart Missions, a Series of Letters and Journals, with a Brief Memoir of Bishop Stewart," edited by Rev. W. J. D. Waddilove, A. M. (London, 1838), and "Life of Bishop Stewart," by the Rev. John N. Norton (1839).

STEWART, David, senator, b. in Baltimore, Md., 13 Sept., 1800; d. there, 5 Jan., 1888. He was graduated at the L. 1821, after studying law, was admitted to the bar in 1821. Mr. Stewart had a large practice, and acquired reputation as a successful lawyer. In 1838 he was elected to the Maryland senate, and subsequently he was appointed to succeed Reverdy Johnson in the U. S. senate, where he served from 8 Dec., 1849, till 14 Jan., 1850. For some time he held the office of commissioner of public buildings for the District of Columbia. He was one of the contributors to an ephemeral publication called "The Rainbow," that was issued during 1821 in Baltimore.

STEWART, Electra Maria Sheldon, author, b. in Le Roy, Genesee co., N. Y., 6 Sept., 1817. She was educated in Detroit, Mich., whither she removed with her parents when she was very young. She edited the "Public Buildings," in Detroit in 1853-54, contributed ten sketches to the state pioneer collections of Michigan, and is the author of several Sunday-school books, under the name of Electa Maria Sheldon; and "The Early History of Michigan" (New York, 1858).

STEWART, Ferdinand Campbell, physician, b. in Williamsburg, Va., 10 Aug., 1815. He was educated at Williams and Mary, and graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1838. Subsequently he spent five years in professional study in Edinburgh and Paris. On his return he began the practice of medicine in Williamsburg, but was encouraged by his success to remove to New York city, where he was active until 1849. He obtained charge of medical and surgical wards in Bellevue hospital, and at the same time received in his office students that had the benefit of this clinical instruction. In 1848 he volunteered his services during the prevalence of typhus fever, and prescribed daily for two hundred dangerously ill patients. When Bellevue hospital was reorganized Dr. Stewart was appointed a member of the committee to recommend a new and improved plan, and after its adoption was made one of the visiting medical officers. In 1849 he was appointed the first physician of the marine hospital, where he remained till 1866, when the revenue service was discontinued, and continued in that office until 1851, meanwhile reorganizing that institution. Dr. Stewart continued to reside on Staten island until 1855, when the death of his father led to his removal to England in order to obtain estates to which he had fallen heir. He was a member of medical societies both in the United States and Europe, and in 1857 aided in founding the New York academy of medicine, whose success was principally owing to his exertions. He was its secretary until his removal from New York city, held the office of vice-president three times, and on three different occasions was anniversary orator. In 1848-9 he was chairman of the committee on typhus fever, when the disease had almost caused a panic in the city. He was one of the founders of the medical society of the city and county of New York, and was an active member of the organization that held its first meeting in New York in 1846, and was secretary of the meeting in Philadelphia in 1847, and he was also a member of the committee that drafted the constitution of the American medical association in 1847. Dr. Stewart was for many years the family physician of President Tyler, and refused several diplomatic appointments that were offered him by the president. He invented and introduced several instruments that have found use in genito-urinary diseases. In addition to his contributions to medical journals, he was in 1844-5 editor of the "New York Journal of Medicine," and he published a translation of Scouett on Club-Foot (Philadelphia, 1839); "Hospitals and Surgeons of Paris" (New York, 1843); and "History of Medicine in the American medical association (1849-50), embracing statistics and regulations of the medical colleges of the United States, and an account of similar institutions in all parts of the world.

STEWART, George, Canadian journalist, b. in New York city, 26 Nov., 1848. At an early age he removed with his parents to Canada, settled in St. John, New Brunswick, and was educated in the grammar-school there. He began the publication of the "Stamp-Collector's Monthly Gazette" in 1863, but relinquished it in 1867, and founded "Stewart's Literary Quarterly Magazine," which he published and edited for five years. He was for a short time city editor of the St. John "Daily News," for two years literary editor of "The Weekly Watchword," and founder of "How-land's Canadian Monthly," which he left in 1879 to become editor of the Quebec "Morning Chronicle," from which he retired in 1898 to become editor of the "Daily Mercury." In 1882 he was named one of the original members of the Royal society of Canada by the Marquis of Lorne. After 1885 he was several times elected to the literary and historical society of Quebec, and in 1885 he became a fellow of the Royal geographical society of England. In 1886 the degree of D. C. L. was conferred on him by King's university, Nova Scotia, and by the University of Bishop's college in 1888, and he was given that of doctor of letters in 1888 by Laval university, Quebec, for his services to literature in Canada. Dr. Stewart has contributed Canadian articles to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and to English, American, and Canadian periodicals, and is well known as a lecturer on literary and historical subjects.

He has published "The Story of the Great Fire in St. John, N. B." (Toronto, 1877); "Evenings in the Library" (1878); "Canada under the Administration of the Earl of Dufferin" (1878); "Emerson the Thinker" (1879); "Alcott the Concord Mystic" (1880); and "Essays from Reviews" (2 series). Quebec, 1881 and 1882.

STEWART, Gideon Tabor, lawyer, b. in Johnstown, N. Y., 7 Aug., 1824. He removed with his parents to Oberlin, Ohio, where he was educated. Subsequently he studied law in Norwalk and then with Noah H. Swanye in Columbus. In 1846, after his admission to the bar, he began practice in Norwalk, where in 1846 he became editor of the "Reflector." He was elected county auditor as a Whig and held that office during three terms. In 1861 he removed to Iowa, where he purchased the Dubuque "Daily Times," and published it during the civil war. At the time of its purchase it was the only daily Union paper in the northern half of the state. Previously he was one of the proprietors of the Toledo "Blade," and afterward of the Green Bay "Press." In 1865 he returned to Norwalk, where he has since continued his law-practice. Mr. Stewart was three times elected grand worthy chief templar by the Good Templars of Ohio. In 1853 he took part in the Maine law campaign of that year, and then endeavored to organize a permanent prohibition party. He was chairman of a state convention in 1853, and of a national convention in 1855, held at New York, as a party, but the movement failed on account of the troubles in Kansas and the civil war. In 1869 he was one of the delegates from Ohio to the Chicago convention that formed the National prohibition party. Since that time he has been nominated three times for governor, seven times for supreme judge, and elected a member of the state legislature, and once for vice-president in 1876, when, with Green Clay Smith as candidate for president, he received a popular vote of 9,522. For fifteen years he was a member, during four of which he was chairman of the national executive committee of his party. In 1876, 1880, and 1884 the prohibition state convention unanimously instructed the Ohio delegates to present him in the national convention as their choice for presidential candidate, but each time he refused to have his name brought forward. Mr. Stewart has written much in advocacy of the temperance reform, and many of his public addresses have been extensively circulated.

STEWART, Jacob Henry, physician, b. in Vermont, N. Y., 26 Dec., 1819; d. in Missoula, Mont., 20 May, 1884. He studied at Yale for three years, and was graduated at the medical department of the University of New York in 1851. Four years later he began practice in Peekskill, N. Y., but in 1855 he removed to St. Paul, where he obtained recognition as one of the most skillful practitioners of that city. In 1856 he was appointed physician of Ramsey county, Minn., and in 1857-58 he was surgeon-general of Minnesota, also serving as a member of the governor's staff and as a member of the state senate in 1858-59. On 17 April, 1861, he joined the 1st Minnesota volunteers, which was the first regiment that was received by President Lincoln, thus making Dr. Stewart the ranking surgeon in the volunteer service. He remained on the battle-field of Bull Run, was paroled, and allowed to care for his wounded at Sudley-church hospital until they were able to be removed to Richmond, when he was permitted to return home without exchange for voluntarily remaining on the battle-field in the discharge of his duty. The sword taken from him when he was made prisoner was given back to him by Gen. Beauregard in recognition of his faithfulness to duty. On his return to Minnesota he was appointed surgeon of the board of enrolment, and held that office until the close of the war. In 1864 he was elected mayor of St. Paul, and he was re-elected for four terms (1869-73). Dr. Stewart was the only Republican that has ever held that office in St. Paul, as the vote of the city is Democratic. From 1865 till 1870 he was postmaster of St. Paul, and he was then elected to congress as a Republican, serving from 13 Oct., 1877, till 4 March, 1879. He was appointed surveyor-general of the state in 1880, and held that office for four years. Dr. Stewart was president of Minnesota state medical society in 1875-6, and president of the board of physicians and surgeons to St. Joseph's hospital in St. Paul.

STEWART, James, physician, b. in New York city, 7 April, 1799; d. in Rye, N. Y., 12 Sept., 1884. He was educated at Queens (now Rutgers) college, and then, after studying medicine with Dr. Valentine Mott, was graduated of the college of physicians and surgeons of New York city, 1823. Dr. Stewart began practice in New York city, and made a specialty of pulmonary complaints and diseases of children. He was one of the founders of the northern dispensary and its second consulting physician. For more than twenty years he was medical examiner of the Mutual life insurance company, and placed many of its policies. He was shot through the heart while burglarizing his house, and lived for four days only. He published "On Cholera Infantum," 1857, and "The Public Health" (2d ed.), 1858. He also translated Charles M. Billaud's "Treatise on the Diseases of Children," with an appendix (Philadelphia, 1839); "A Practical Treatise on the Diseases of Children" (New York, 1842); and "The Lung" (New York, 1848). He was president of the Board of management of the Jesuit estates, of which he had been for many years a member of the board of management. He was for a long time president of the executive council of Canada.

STEWART, Robert Mercein, governor of Missouri, b. in Truxton, N. Y., 12 March, 1815; d. in St. Joseph, Mo., 21 Sept., 1871. He went to Kentucky as a boy; and in 1838 settled in Buchanan county, Mo. In 1845 he was a delegate to the State constitutional convention, and for ten years he was a member of the state senate. He was elected gov-
STEWART, Thomas McCants, lawyer, b. in Charleston, S. C., Dec. 38, 1834. He is of African descent. After his graduation at the University of South Carolina in 1875 he practised law in Columbia, S. C., and was professor of mathematics in the State agricultural college, Orangeburg, S. C. He entered the ministry in 1878, after studying at Princeton. In 1892 he became professor of belles-lettres and law in Liberia college, and spent a year on the west coast of Africa, serving also as general agent for industrial education in Liberia. In January, 1886, he was admitted to the bar of New York city. Mr. Stewart has contributed to newspapers and magazines and is the author of "Liberia, the America-African Republic" (New York, 1885); and "Perils of a Great City" (1887).

STEWART, Virgil Adam, b. in Jackson co., Ga., 27 Jan., 1809. In 1835 he became acquainted with John A. Murrell, who was the chief of an organization that existed throughout the south and southwest and made a practice of enticing negroes from their owners, with promise of freedom, and then selling them in a distant part of the country. Murrell is supposed to have recognized one another by signs, and dexterously concealed their identity. Their crimes included robbery and murder. Mr. Stewart succeeded in gaining full information concerning the plans of the organization, which included an extended uprising of the negroes, who were incited by promises of freedom to rebel and slay all the whites on the night of Dec. 33, 1835. Murrell, and the members of the conspiracy were to take advantage of the condition of affairs and plunder generally. A knowledge of this plot, which was divulged to Stewart by Murrell, led to the arrest of the latter, and his subsequent sentence to imprisonment for ten years. After the conviction, Stewart published a pamphlet account of the affair, under the title of "The History of the Great Western Land Pirate and His Gang" (New York, 1836).

STEWART, Walter, soldier, b. about 1750; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 June, 1796. He espoused the American cause at the beginning of the Revolutionary war, raised a company for the 31 Pennsylvania battalion, was commissioned captain, 6 Jan., 1776, and appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. Gates, 26 May, 1776, in which capacity he served until 17 June, 1777, when he was commissioned by the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania colonel of the state regiment of foot. He took command on 6 July, 1777, and led it at Brandywine and Germantown. By resolution of congress, 12 Nov., 1777, his regiment was annexed to the Continental army, becoming the 13th regiment of the Pennsylvania line. On 17 Jan., 1781, it was incorporated with the 21 Pennsylvania, under Col. Stewart's command. He served with great credit throughout the war, retiring, 1 Jan., 1783, with the brevet rank of brigadier-general. He was said to be the handsomest man in the American army. He was afterward well known as a merchant of Philadelphia, and became major-general of the state militia. His full-length portrait is in Col. Trumbull's picture of the surrender of Cornwallis, on the left of the line of the American officers.

STEWART, William, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Scotland in 1802; d. in Toronto, 6 March, 1836. He was a merchant and practiced law, and was one of the founders of the lumber trade in Canada. He was a member of the parliament of Canada for Bytown (now Ottawa) and for the county of Russell, and framed the millers' bill and other important acts.—His son, McCleod, lawyer, b. in Ottawa in 1847, was graduated at Toronto university in 1867. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1879, and established himself successfully in practice at Ottawa. He was elected mayor of that city in 1887, and was re-elected in 1888. Mr. Stewart is actively connected with many financial and industrial corporations, and is president of the Canada Atlantic railway company. He is a Liberal-Conservative in politics and has rendered important services to his party. He was appointed a lieutenant in the governor-general's foot-guards on the formation of that body.

STEWART, William Morris, senator, b. in Lyons, N. Y., 9 Aug., 1827. He entered Yale in 1848, and, although he was not graduated, his name was afterward enrolled among the members of the class of 1852, and he received the degree of LL.B. in 1855. In 1853 M. Stewart was appointed by the way of Panama and engaged in mining in Nevada county, where he discovered the celebrated Eureka diggings. He disposed of his mining interests and began the study of law early in 1852, and was appointed district attorney in December of that year, and in 1854 became attorney-general and settled in San Francisco. Later he moved to Downieville, Cal., where he devoted himself to study and practice of the laws that relate to mining, ditch- and water-rights, and similar processes. In 1869 he moved to Virginia City, Nev., and was retained in almost every case of importance before the higher courts. To his efforts is mainly due the permanent settlement of the titles of nearly all the mines on the great Comstock lode. In 1891 he was elected to the territorial council, and in 1893 he was elected a member of the Constitutional convention. Subsequently he was twice elected as a Republican to the U. S. senate, and served from 4 Dec., 1864, till 3 March, 1875. On his retirement he resumed the practice of his profession on the Pacific coast, where his great familiarity with mining law and mining litigation created a demand for his services. In 1887 he was again elected to the U. S. senate for a full term, taking his seat on 4 March. He has published various addresses and speeches.

STICKNEY, John, musician, b. in Stoughton, Mass., in 1744; d. in South Hadley, Mass., in 1827. He was taught music while a boy, and subsequently settled in Hatfield, where he gave lessons. Later he traveled extensively through the New England states, and acquired reputation as a teacher and composer, but finally settled in South Hadley, where he continued his teaching. He published "The Gentleman and Ladies Musical Companion" (Newburyport, 1774), a valuable collection of psalms and anthems, together with expository matter, intended to aid in the learning to sing, for singing schools.

STILES, Ezra, clergyman and educator, b. in North Haven, Conn., 29 Nov., 1727; d. in New Haven, Conn., 12 May, 1795. His ancestor, John, came from Bedfordshire, England, and settled in Windsor, Conn., in 1665, and John's grandson, Isaac, the father of Ezra, was graduated at Yale in 1722 and ordained pastor of the church in North Haven, then a part of New Haven, which charge he held until his death, 14 May, 1780. He published the “Prospect of the City of Jerusalem” (New London, 1742); “Looking-Glass for Changelings” (1749); “The Declaration of the Association of the County of New Haven concerning the Rev. George Whitefield” (Boston, 1745); and “The Character and Duty of Soldiers” (New London, 1755). Ezra was graduated at Yale in 1746, and in 1749 was chosen tutor there. About this time Benjamin Stiles sent an electric apparatus to Yale, and, becoming interested in the new science, Mr. Stiles made some of the first experiments in electricity in New England. Having studied theology, he was licensed in 1749, and in April, 1750, preached to the Housatonic Indians in Stockbridge, Mass., but, owing to religious doubts, abandoned the ministry for the law, and, being admitted to the bar in 1753, practiced for two years in New Haven. In February, 1755, he delivered a Latin oration in honor of Dr. Franklin on the occasion of his visit to Yale, and formed a friendship with Franklin that lasted until death. In 1756 he became pastor of the 21 church in Newport, R. I., and during his residence he devoted himself to literary and scientific research, corresponding with learned men in almost every part of the world. In 1757 he began the study of Hebrew and other Oriental languages. His congregation having been scattered by the occupation of Newport by the British, he removed in 1777 to Portsmouth, N. H., to become pastor of the first church. And, to New Haven, to accept the presidency of Yale college, which post he held from 23 June, 1778, until his death, serving also as professor of ecclesiastical history, and, after the death of Prof. Naphtali Daggett as professor of divinity, also lecturing on philosophy and astronomy. He was accounted, both at home and abroad, as the most learned and accomplished divine of his day in this country. He received the degrees of A. M. from Harvard in 1754, and of S. T. D. from Edinburgh in 1765, Dartmouth in 1780, and Princeton in 1784. Princeton also gave him the degree of LL. D. in the last-named year. His publications are “Oratio Funebrae pro Exequias Jonathan Law” (New London, 1755); “A Discourse of the Christian Union” (Boston, 1761; 2d ed., 1791); “A Discourse on Saving Knowledge” (Newport, 1770); “The United States Elevated to Glory and Honor,” a sermon before the legislature (Hartford, 1758); “Account of the Settlement of Bristol, R. I.” (Providence, 1785); and “History of Three of the Judges of Charles L., Major-General Whalley, Major-General Goffe, and Col. Dixwell,” etc., with an Account of Mr. Theophilus Whale, of Narragansett,” who was supposed to have been also one of the judges (Hartford, 1794). Dr. Stiles left unfinished an “Ecclesiastical History of New England.” His diary and forty-five volumes of manuscripts are preserved in the library of Yale. His daughter, Mary, married Dr. Abel Holmes, who wrote his “Life” (Boston, 1798). See also the “Life of Ezra Stiles,” by James Luce Kingsley, in Sparks’s “American Biography.”

STILES, Henry Reed, physician, b. in New York city, 10 March, 1852. He is a kinman of Ezra Stiles, and was educated at the University of the city of New York and at Williams. After graduation at the medical department of the University of the city of New York and at the New York Ophthalmic hospital in 1855, he practised in New York city, in Galena, Ill., and Toledo, Ohio. In 1856 he removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., and in 1857-8, under the firm of Calkins and Stiles, published educational works and the “Monthly Journal of Education.” In 1859-63 he practised medicine in Brooklyn and Woodbury, N. Y. In 1863 he became librarian of the Long Island historical society, of which he was a founder and director. In 1868-70 he served in the Brooklyn office of the Metropolitan board of health, and in 1870-3 he was a health inspector in the board of health of New York city. In 1876 he was appointed medical superintendent of the State homoeopathic asylum for the insane in Middletown, N. Y., and under his direction the first two buildings were erected and its service was organized. In 1877 he removed to Dundee, Scotland, to take charge of the Homoeopathic dispensary there, remaining until 1881, when he returned to New York city. He removed in 1888. He then opened a private establishment for the care of mental and nervous diseases at Hill View, N. Y. From 1882 till 1885 he was professor of mental and nervous diseases in the New York woman’s medical college and hospital. Dr. Stiles was an organizer of the Public health association of New York city in 1872, a founder and officer of the Society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and a member of the boards of the New York city, and has lectured on hygiene and sanitary laws in the New York homoeopathic medical college. He was an organizer of the American anthropological society in 1869, and one of the seven founders of the New York genealogical and biographical society, serving as its president from 1859 until 1875. Williams gave him the degree of A. M. in 1757. He has translated works in homoeopathic medicine, written a “Life, Correspondence and Journals of the Rev. Henry and Joseph Teniers,” has annotated and edited several works, and published “The History and Genealogies of Ancient Windsor, Conn.” (New York, 1859; supplement, Albany, 1863); “Monograph on Bundling in America” (Albany, 1861); “Genealogy of the Massachusetts Family of Stiles” (1863); “The Wallabout Prison-Ship Series” (2 vols., 1865); “The Genealogy of the Straunan and Josselyn Families” (1865); and “History of the City of Brooklyn, N. Y.” (3 vols., Brooklyn, 1867-70). He edited the “Illustrated History of the Counties of Kings and City of Brooklyn” (2 vols., 1884), and in part “The Humphreys Family and Genealogy” (1887).
Jan., 1865, he removed to Chicago, where he had earned a high reputation as a lawyer.

STILES, Joseph Clay, clergyman, b. in Savannah, Ga., 6 Dec., 1793; d. there, 27 March, 1873. After graduation at Yale in 1814 he studied law at Litchfield, and practised in his native city, but in 1822 entered Andover theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1825. After his ordination he became, in 1828, an evangelist in Georgia and Florida from 1829 till 1835, and gave an impetus to Presbyterianism in his native state, reviving old churches and building new ones. In 1835 he removed to Kentucky and spent nine years in the west, where he frequently engaged in public theological discussion that grew out of the division of his denomination. In 1844 he accepted a call to Richmond, Va., and in 1848 he became pastor of the Mercer street church, New York city, which charge he resigned, owing to impaired health, and became general agent for the American Bible society in the south in 1850. In 1853 he became pastor of the South church in New Haven, Conn., organized a southern aid society, and in 1860 labored as evangelist in that field. He was in military service in 1864 and 1865. He received the degree of D. D. from Transylvania university in 1846, and that of LL. D. from the University of Georgia in 1860. Dr. Stiles was the author of a "Speech on the Slavery Resolutions in the General Assembly" (New York, 1830); "Modern Reform Examined, or the Union of the North and South on the Subject of Slavery" (Philadelphia, 1858); "The National Controversy, or the Voice of the Fathers upon the State of the Country" (New York, 1861); and "Future Punishment Discussed in a Letter to a Friend" (St. Louis, 1868).—His brother, William Henry, lawyer, b. in Savannah, Ga., in January, 1808; d. there, 20 Dec., 1865, received an academic education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1831, and practised in Savannah. He was solicitor-general for the eastern district of Georgia in 1833-6, and afterward elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1845. On 10 April, 1845, he was appointed chargé d'affaires in Austria, holding this office until 3 Oct., 1849, and on his return he resumed law-practice in Savannah. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a regiment for the Confederate States, which he led as colonel, but resigned, owing to impaired health. Yale college gave him the degree of A. M. in 1837. He was the author of a "History of Austria, 1848-9" (2 vols., New York, 1853).

STILL, William, philanthropist, b. in Shamong, Burlington co., N. J., 7 Oct., 1821. He is of African descent, and was brought up on a farm. Coming to Philadelphia in 1843, he obtained a clerkship in 1847 in the office of the Pennsylvania Anti-slavery society. He was chairman and corresponding secretary of the Philadelphia branch of the "underground railroad" in 1851-61, and busied himself in writing out the narratives of fugitive slaves. His writings constitute the only full account of the organization with which he was connected. Mr. Still married the wife, daughter, and sons of John Brown while he was awaiting execution in Charlestown, Va. During the civil war he was commissioned post-sutler at Camp William Penn for colored troops, and was a member of the Freedmen's aid union and commission. He is vice-president and chairman of the board of managers, for the aid of colored persons, a member of the board of trustees of the Soldiers' and sailors' orphans' home, and of other charitable institutions. In 1885 he was sent by the presbytery of Philadelphia as a commissioner to the general assembly at Cincinnati. He was one of the original stockholders of "The Nation," and a member of the Board of trade of Philadelphia. His writings include "The Underground Rail-Road" (Philadelphia, 1878); "Voting and Laboring"; and "Struggle for the Rights of the Colored People of Philadelphia."
tion to numerous addresses and pamphlets, he has published "How a Free People Conduct a Long War" (Philadelphia, 1862); "Northern Interest and Southern Independence: a Plea for United Action" (1863); "Memorial of the Great Central Fair for the United States Sanitary Commission" (1864); "History of the United States Sanitary Commission" (1866); and "Studies in Medieval History" (1881).—Another brother, Moreton, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Oct., 1822; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 20 Aug., 1865. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1841, and after studying medicine with his brother, Alfred Stillé, was graduated at the medical department of the university in 1844. Subsequently he spent three years in the medical schools of Dublin, London, Paris, and Vienna, and on his return in 1847 settled in Philadelphia, where he began practice. In 1848 he was elected one of the resident physicians of the Pennsylvania hospital, which post he held for nine months, and in June, 1849, during the cholera epidemic of that year, he was appointed to serve in the Philadelphia almshouse, where he was stricken with the disease and narrowly escaped with his life. In 1853 he was appointed lecturer on the theory and practice of medicine in the Philadelphia association for medical instruction, and completed his first course of lectures there. Dr. Stillé contributed various articles to the medical journals of Philadelphia, and was associated with Francis Wharton in the preparation of a "Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence" (Philadelphia, 1853).

STILLMAN, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 March, 1798; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 March, 1887. His youth was passed in Charleston, S. C., where his parents had removed when he was eleven years old. His education, classical and theological, was good, though he attended neither college nor seminary. He was ordained to the ministry in 1799, and soon afterward became pastor of a Baptist church on James island. Impaired health obliged him to leave the south, and, after preaching for congregations in New Jersey, he was called in 1795 to the pastoral charge of the 1st Baptist church in Boston, which relation he sustained for more than forty years. Few clergymen in New England were held in higher esteem or exerted a wider influence. As a preacher he had no superior. In all the philanthropic movements that distinguished Boston he was an active and honored worker. He was a member for that city of the convention in 1788 that ratified the constitution of the United States. His zeal for education was evinced especially in the interest that he took in Brown university, in whose act of incorporation (1754) and first list of trustees his name appears. In 1783 that college conferred on him the degree of D. D. Dr. Stillman published a large number of sermons, among which were "A Sermon on the Repeal of the Stamp-Act" (1766); "Thoughts on the French Revolution" (1794); and "A Sermon occasioned by the Death of George Washington." (1799).

STILLMAN, Thomas Bliss, mechanical engineer, b. in Westerly, R. I., 30 Aug., 1806; d. in Plainfield, N. J., 1 Jan., 1866. He was educated at Union college, and in 1822 came to New York city and took charge of the Novelty iron-works. The first line of steamships on this coast to carry passengers and freight between New York and Charleston, S. C., was started by him. During the civil war he was U. S. inspector of steam vessels for the New York district, and superintendent of construction of revenue cutters. His last work was to put twelve armed steam cutters afloat in place of the sailing vessels that had been previously used. He was also at various times president of the board of comptrollers of the park board in New York county, and of the Metropolitan police commission. For nearly twenty years he was a trustee of the New York hospital, and he was long president of the Metropolitan savings bank. He invented improved forms of machinery that have come into use.—His brother, William James, author, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 1 June, 1828, was graduated at Union college. During his stay at the University of Pennsylvania he became interested in the science of landscape-painting under Frederick E. Church. In 1849 he went to Europe, remaining six months, and returning with a thorough belief in the new school of pre-Raphaelitism. During 1851-9 he was a regular exhibitor at the Academy of design, of which he was elected an associate member in 1854. In 1852 he went to Hungary for Louis Kossuth, to carry away the crown jewels of the kingdom, which had been hidden by Kossuth during the revolution. Thence he went to Paris, to study under Adolphe Yvon. On his return to the United States, in company with John Durand he founded the "Crayon," in 1855. He returned to Europe in 1859, and was U. S. consul in Rome during 1861-5, and in Crete in 1865-9. Since 1870 he has devoted himself entirely to literature. During 1875-82 he acted as correspondent of the London "Times" in Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Greece, and in 1883-5 he was the art critic of the New York "Evening Post" and associate editor of the "Photographic Times." Since 1886 he has resided at Rome as the London "Times" correspondent, and was retired in 1897. He has published works on "Photography in Athens" (London, 1870); "Cretan Insurrection" (New York, 1874); "Herzegovina and the Late Uprising" (London, 1877); and "On the Track of Ulysses" (Boston, 1887). He has also edited "Poetic Localities of Cambridge" (Boston, 1875), and has contributed articles to various magazines. Mr. Stillman is an expert photographer, and in 1872-3 published two manuals of photography. In 1872 he also brought out twenty-five photographic views of Athens, and in 1886 the Autotype company of London began the publication, for the Hellenic society, of a series of photographs from his negatives of the Acropolis.

STILWELL, Silas Moore, lawyer, b. in New York city, 6 June, 1800; d. there, 16 May, 1881. His ancestry, Nether Cornish, England, includes the regicide, emigrated to this country early in the 17th century, where he adopted the name Stilwell. Stephen, the father of Silas M. Stilwell, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, went in 1804 to Woodstock, Ulster co., N. Y., where he established a glass-factory. The son was educated at Woodstock free academy, New York, when his father having failed, he went to New York and entered business. In 1814 he engaged in surveying in the west, and then settled in Tennessee, where in 1822 he was in the legislature. He afterward removed to Vir-
Virginia, was clerk of Tazewell county, and a member of the house of burgesses, and in 1824 was admitted to the bar. He returned to New York in 1828, and in 1829 was elected to the legislature, where he continued until 1833. In 1834 he became a candidate for lieutenant-governor on the ticket with William H. Seward. He was elected alderman in New York city in 1833, and made chairman of the board; the political parties then more evenly divided, and he had the casting-vote on all appointments he became popularly known as King Caucus. He was the acting mayor at the time of the great fire in 1835. On Gen. Harrison's election to the presidency he was offered a cabinet appointment, but, having lost his fortune in the panic of 1837, he declined, but he was with Harrison during most of the latter's four terms of office, and after his death accepted the appointment of U. S. marshal for the southern district of New York, which he held during Tyler's administration. At this time he was sent on a special mission to the Hague to inquire as to the feasibility of negotiating a loan for the U. S. government. At the end of his term he resumed the practice of law. Mr. Stilwell was the author of a deed to establish an unemployment and debtors' court, which was passed, 26 April, 1831. This was commonly called the Stilwell act. He was also the author of the banking laws of the state of New York, of the general bankrupt act, and of the national banking act and system of organized credits in 1863. He wrote a great deal on questions of finance, beginning in 1857. His first pamphlet was entitled "A System of Credit for a Republic and Plan of a Bank for the State of New York" (1838). Others were "Notes Explanatory of Mr. Chase's Plan of National Finance," and "National Finances: a Philosophical Examination of Credit." (1866). Many of his articles appeared in the "Herald," from 1860 till 1872, under the pen-name of "Jonathan Oldbuck."

STIMPSON, William, naturalist, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 14 Feb., 1832; d. in Hichester Mills, Md., 26 May, 1872. He was early led to the study of natural history, and made extensive collections. It is claimed that he was the first to enter upon the work of deep-sea dredging in searching for specimens. He became a pupil of Louis Agassiz, and as such accompanied Agassiz's expedition to Norfolk, Va., and Charleston, S. C., to investigate the marine fauna of that region. Later in the year he was appointed naturalist to the North Pacific expedition, and spent three years and a half in making observations and collections. On his return he settled in Washington, and for nine years was engaged in classifying the results that he had obtained. In 1863 he became curator of the Chicago academy of sciences, and subsequently he was its secretary. While holding this office he organized a system of exchanges by which the library of the academy was supplied with scientific journals and transactions, and enriched its museum with specimens of natural history from all parts of the world. These collections, as well as many other valuable objects, the Chicago academy of sciences, which represented the researches of more than twenty years, were destroyed by the fire of 1871. For several years he visited Florida on scientific expeditions, and during the early part of 1872 he was engaged in superintending deep-sea dredging, under the auspices of the U. S. coast survey, in the Gulf of Mexico. The thoroughness of his method and his large collections and classified descriptions, gained him a high rank as a scientific observer, and it was said of him that he described more new species of marine animals than any naturalist except James D. Dana. He was a member of various scientific societies, and was early elected to membership in the National academy of sciences. During his connection with the Chicago academy of sciences he edited its "Transactions" and its annual reports. Besides his various contributions to scientific proceedings, he has published numerous memoirs, including "A Revision of the Synonymic List of the Testaceous Insects of New England" (Boston, 1851); "Synopsis of the Marine Invertebrata of Grand Manan," in the "Smithsonian Contributions" (Washington, 1858); "Crustacea and Echinodermata of the Pacific Shores of North America" (Boston, 1857); "Descriptiones Animalium Evertebratum (Philadelphia, 1857-'90); and "Notes on North American Crustacea" (New York, 1859). He was associated in the preparation of "Check-Lists of the Shells of North America" (Washington, 1860), and "Researches upon the Hydrobiolue and Allied Forms" (1865).

STIMPSON, Alexander Lovett, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 14 Dec., 1816. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1840, and was also connected with the press of Boston, New York, and New Orleans for many years. Mr. Stimson established in 1852, and for several years edited, the "Express Messenger." He is the author of "A History of the Boston Mercantile Library Association"; "Easy Nat, or the Three Apprentices" (New York, 1850; republished as New England Boys''; "History of the Steam Companies, and the Origin of American Railroads" (1859; new ed. 1881); "Waitwood," a novel (1864); and many tales in periodicals.

STIMUM, Frederic Jesup, author, b. in Dedham, Mass., 29 July, 1853. He was graduated at Harvard in 1876, and at the law-school in 1878, and was assistant attorney-general of Massachusetts from 1884 till 1885. He has pursued literature with law, writing his earlier novels under the pen-name of "J. S. of Dale." He has published "Stimson's Law Glossary" (Boston, 1881); "Guerrada," a novel (New York, 1889); "The Crime of Henry Vane" (1884); "The King's Men," in collaboration (1884); "American Statute Law" (Boston, 1886); "The Sentimental Calendar" (New York, 1886); "The Disciple" (1887); "By the Capitol" (1888); and "Subsidy Legatee" (1888). He was also one of the authors of "Rollo's Journey to Cambridge," which first appeared in the "Harvard Lampoon" and afterward in book-form (Boston, 1879).

STIMPSON, John Ward, artist, b. in Paterson, N. J., 16 Dec., 1850. He was graduated at Yale in 1872, and then studied art at the Ecole des beaux arts in Paris, France. On his return to this country he became art instructor and lecturer at Princeton, but on the establishment of the art-schools that are connected with the Metropolitan museum in New York city he was appointed their superintendent. During the four years that he had charge of these schools Mr. Stimson increased the membership from thirty pupils to nearly four hundred, with several thousand dollars in endowments. He has also written for periodicals, and has published "The Law of Three Primaries" (New York, 1884).
STIRLING, Sir Thomas, bar. British soldier, d. 9 May, 1808. He became captain in July, 1755, in the 241, or Royal Highland regiment, which took part in the expeditions of 1758 to Lake George and Lake Champlain. It was afterward sent to assist at the siege of Niagara, and in 1760 accompanied Sir Jeffrey Amherst from Oswego to Montreal. Capt. Stirling was stationed at Fort Chartres, Ill., in 1765, and in June, 1766, he returned to Philadelphia, after marching of motion 3,000 miles, with his entire detachment of 100 men in perfect health and without accident. He became major in 1770, and lieutenant-colonel in 1771, commanding his regiment throughout the Revolutionary war. He was in the engagement on Staten Island, the battle on Brooklyn heights in 1776, the storming of Fort Washington, the capture of Red Bank, the battle of the Brandywine, and that of Springfield, 7 June, 1779, where he was wounded. He was made colonel in 1779, and held the rank of brigadier-general under Sir Henry Clinton in the expedition against Charleston, S. C., in 1780. He became colonel of the 1st Highlanders in February, 1782, major-general in November, following; lieutenant-general and a baronet in 1786, and general in 1798.

STITH, William, historian, b. in Virginia, in 1689; d. in Williamsburg, Va., 27 Sept., 1755. He was a nephew of Sir John Randolph, and brother-in-law of Peyton Randolph. After studying theology, he was ordained in England as a minister of the established church, and in 1731 became master of the grammar-school of William and Mary college. He was chaplain of the house of burgesses in 1738, and in 1752-3, of the Senate of Virginia. He was a member of the 1st Highlanders, 1756, and a representative in the Virginia legislature that met in 1780. He was a correspondent of the Royal Society of London, 1746, and of the American Philosophical Society, 1766. He was a member of the Virginia Society of Antiquity, 1777, and of the American Philosophical Society, 1779. He was a member of the Virginia Society of Antiquity, 1777, and of the American Philosophical Society, 1779. any particular crop was to be raised the constituents of that crop. This led to the employment of the special fertilizers that are now widely used in the place of general fertilizers, or random fertilizers, which for a special purpose might be valuable or worthless. He is a member of various agricultural associations and has made many addresses on his specialties in New England and New York. His writings, including the results of his researches, appear in various publications, chiefly in the annual reports of the Massachusetts agricultural college. His brother, Henry, lawyer, b. in North Hadley, 31 Aug., 1822; d. in Baltimore, 11 March, 1895, was originally named Henry Smith Stockbridge, but he dropped the Smith. He was graduated at Amherst in 1845, and studied law in Baltimore, where he was admitted to the bar in 1848, and practised his profession. During the civil war he was a special district attorney to attend to the business of the war department, and in 1864, as a member of the legislature, he drafted the act that convened a constitutional convention for the abolition of slavery in the state. He took an active part in the proceedings of the convention, and defended the constitution that it adopted before the court of last resort. Afterward he instituted and prosecuted in the U. S. courts, proceedings by which were annulled the indentures of apprenticeship by which it was sought to evade the emancipation clause. Mr. Stockbridge thus practically secured the emancipation of more than 10,000 colored children. He was judge of the circuit court for Baltimore county in 1865, a delegate to the Loyalists' convention in 1866, and vice-president of the Republican convention of 1868. Mr. Stockbridge had been for twenty years editor of the Fund publications of the Maryland historical society, of which he was vice-president; and the author of publication No. 22: "The Archives of Maryland" (Baltimore, 1886); besides various contributions to magazines.

STOCKTON, Alfred Augustus, Canadian lawyer, b. in St. Paul, King's Co., New Brunswick, 2 Nov., 1842. His great-grandfather, Andrew Hunter Stockton, a native of Princeton, N. J., fought on the royal side in the war of the Revolution, and afterward settled in New Brunswick. Mr. Stockton was graduated at Mount Allison college in 1864, and was admitted to the bar of New Brunswick in 1869, and became a member of the New Brunswick bar in 1882. He was secretary of the board of governors of Mount Allison college, an examiner in political economy and constitutional history, and also an examiner in law at Victoria university, president of the New Brunswick historical society, and register of the court of vice-admiralty of the province. He has received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Victoria, and that of Ph. D. from Illinois Wesleyan university, and that of D. C. L. from Mount Allison college in 1884. He edited "Rules of the Vice-Admiralty Court in New Brunswick" (St. John, 1879), and "Berton's Report of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick," with copious notes (1888).

STOCKTON, Richard, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. at Princeton, N. J., 1 Oct., 1730; d. there, 28 Feb., 1781. His great-grandfather, of the same name, came from England before 1670, and, after residing several years on Long Island, purchased, about 1680, a tract of 6,400 acres of land, of which Princeton, N. J., is nearly the centre. About 1682 he and his associates formed a settlement there, and were the first Europeans in the district. Richard's father, John, inherited "Morven," the family-seat, and was for many years chief judge of the court of common pleas of Somerset county. The son was graduated at Princeton in 1748, studied law with David Ogden in Newark, and in 1754 was admitted to the bar, in which he soon attained great reputation. After acquiring a competency, he visited Great Britain in 1766-7, making the acquaintance of many public men and receiving the freedom of the city from the municipal authorities of Edinburgh. He exerted himself especially to remove the prevailing ignorance regarding the American colonies. While he was in Scotland his personal friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, reconsidered his refusal to become president of Princeton, and for this and other services to the college Mr. Stockton received the formal thanks of its trustees after his return in September, 1767. In 1768 he was made a member of the executive council of the province, and in 1774 he was raised to the supreme bench of New Jersey. He strove at first to effect a reconciliation between the colonies and the mother country, and on 13 Dec., 1774, sent to Lord Dartmouth "An Expedition for the Settlement of the American Disputes," in which he proposed a plan of colonial self-government, but he soon became active in efforts to organize a prudent opposition, and on 21 June, 1776, was chosen by the Provincial congress a member of the Continental congress, then in session in Philadelphia. His silence during the opening debates on the question of independence leads to the conclusion that at first he doubted the expediency of the declaration, but at the close of the discussion he expressed his concurrence in the final vote in a short but energetic address. He was re-elected to congress, where he was an active member, and in September, 1776, at the first meeting of the state delegates under the new constitution, was a candidate for governor. On the first ballot he and William Livingston received an equal number of votes, but the latter was finally elected. Mr. Stockton was then chosen chief justice by a unanimous vote, but declined. On 29 Sept., 1778, he and George Clymer were appointed a committee to inspect the northern army. On 30 Nov., at night, he was captured by a party of loyalists at the house of John Covenhoven, in Monmouth, N. J., which was then his temporary home. His host shared his fate. Mr. Stockton was thrown into the common prison in New York, and treated with such severity that it seriously affected his health. Congress passed a resolution directing Gen. Washington to inquire into the circumstance, remonstrate with Gen. Howe, and ask "whether he chooses this shall be the future rule for treating all such, on both sides, as the fortune of war may place in the hands of either party." Mr. Stockton was exchanged shortly afterward, but never regained his health. His library, which was one of the best in the country, had been burned by the British, and his lands were laid waste. His fortune was greatly diminished by these depredations and the depreciation of the Continental currency, and he was compelled to have temporary recourse to the aid of friends. Mr. Stockton, though of a hasty temper and somewhat haughty to those that manifested want of personal respect to him, was a man of great generosity and courtesy. He possessed much courage and agility as a horseman and swordsman. His funeral sermon was delivered in the college hall at Princeton by Rev. Samuel Smith, D.D. His statue was placed by the state of New Jersey in the capitol at Washington in 1888. The accompanying vignette is a representation of his residence at Princeton.—His wife, Annis, sister of Dr. Elias Boudinot, was well known for her literary attainments, and contributed to periodicals. One of her poems addressed to Washington after the surrender at Yorktown, drew from him a courteously acknowledgment. She also wrote the stanzas beginning “Welcome, mighty chief, once more!” which were sung by young ladies of Trenton while strewing flowers before Gen. Washington on his passage through that city just before his first inauguration as president. They are given in full in Chief-Justice Marshall’s “Life of Washington.”—Their son, Richard, senator, b. near Princeton, N. J., 17 April, 1764; d. there, 7 March, 1828, was graduated at Princeton in 1779, studied law in Newark with Elias Boudinot, was admitted to the bar in 1784, and began to practise in his native place. He was a presidential elector in 1792, and in 1793 was chosen to the U. S. Senate as a Federalist for the unexpired term of Frederick Frelinghuysen, resigned, serving from 6 Dec. of that year till 3 March, 1799, when he declined to be a candidate for re-election. He served in the lower house of congress in 1813–15, and again declined further candidacy. During his service in the house of representatives he had a debate with Charles J. Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, on free-trade and sailors’ rights. In 1825 he was appointed one of the commissioners on the part of New Jersey to settle a territorial dispute with New York, and he was the author of the able argument that is appended to the report of the New Jersey commissioners. Mr. Stockton possessed profound legal knowledge and much eloquence as an advocate, and for more than a quarter of a century held the highest rank at the bar of his native state. He received the degree of LL. D. from Queen’s (now Rutgers) college in 1813, and from Union in 1816. He was often called “The Duke.”—The second Richard’s son, Robert Field, naval officer, b. in Princeton, N. J., 20 Aug., 1795; d. there, 7 Oct., 1866, studied at Princeton college, but before completing his course he entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman, 1 Sept., 1811. He joined the frigate “President” at Newport, 14 Feb., 1812, and made several cruises in that ship with Com. Rodgers, with whom he went as aide to the “Guerriere” at Philadelphia; but, as the ship was unable to go to sea, Rodgers took his crew to assist in defending Baltimore. Before the arrival of the British, Stockton went to Washington and became the aide of the secretary of the navy, after which he resumed his post with Com. Rodgers and took part in the operations at Alexandria. He then went with Rodgers to Baltimore and had command of 1000 conscripts in the defence of that city against the British army. He was highly commended, and promoted to lieutenant, 9 Sept., 1814. On 15 May, 1815, he sailed in the “Guerriere,” a Decatur’s flag-ship, for the Mediterranean after the declaration of war with Algiers, but he was transferred soon afterward to the schooner “Spyhore,” as 1st lieutenant, in which vessel he participated in the capture of the Algerine frigate “Mahound,” and led the boarders at the capture of the Algerine brig “Esledio” in June, 1815. In February, 1816, he joined the ship-of-the-line “Washington” and made another cruise in the Mediterranean, in the course of which he was transferred to the ship “Erie,” of which he soon became executive officer. The American officers very often had duels with the British officers, and many such duels took place. At one time in Gibraltar, Stockton had accepted challenges to fight all the captains of the British regiment in the garrison, and several meetings took place. In one case after wounding his adversary he escaped arrest by knocking one of the guard from his horse, which he seized and rode to his boat. Stockton came home in command of the “Erie” in 1821. Shortly after his return the American colonization society obtained his services to command the schooner “Alligator” for the purpose of founding a colony on the west coast of Africa. He sailed in the autumn of 1821, and after skilful diplomatic conferences obtained a concession of a tract of territory near Cape Mesurado, which, since then, became the republic of Liberia. In November, 1821, the Portuguese letter-of-marque “Marianna Flora” fired on the “Alligator,” which she mistook for a pirate. After an engagement of twenty minutes the Portuguese vessel was taken and the capture was declared legal, though the prize was returned by courtesy to Portugal. On a subsequent cruise in the “Alligator” he captured the British Indiaman “Jemina.” He was invested with the right to seize slaves under a foreign flag was first established as legal. He also captured several piratical vessels in the West Indies. From 1826 until December, 1838, he was on leave, and resided at Princeton, N. J. He organized the New Jersey colonization society, became interested in the turf, and imported from England some of the finest stock of blooded horses. He also took an active part in politics, and became interested in the Delaware and Raritan canal, for which he obtained the charter that had originally been given to a New York company, and vigorously prosecuted the work. His whole fortune and that of his family were invested in the enterprise, which was completed, notwithstanding the position of railroads and a financial crisis, by which he was obliged to go to Europe to negotiate a loan. He retained his interest in this canal during his life, and the work stands as an enduring monument to his energy and enterprise. In December, 1838, he sailed with Com. Isaac Hull in the flag-ship “Ohio” as fleet-captain of the Mediterranean squadron, and was promoted to rear-admiral in Dec. He returned in the latter part of 1839, and took part in the presidential canvass of 1840 in favor of Gen. William Henry Harrison. After John Tyler became president, Stockton was offered a seat in the cabinet as secretary of the navy, which he declined. The U. S. steamer "Princeton" (see Ericsson, John) was built under his supervision, and launched at Philadelphia early in 1844. He was appointed to command the ship, and brought her to Washington for the inspection of officials and members of congress. On a trial-trip down the Potomac river, when the president, cabinet, and a distinguished company were on board, one of the large guns burst and killed the secretary of state, secretary of the navy, Gardiner of Gardiner's island, and several of the crew, while a great many were seriously injured. A naval court of inquiry entirely exonerated Capt. Stockton. Shortly after this event he sailed in the "Princeton" as bearer of the annexation resolutions to the government of Texas. In October, 1845, he went in the frigate "Congress" from Norfolk to serve as commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron, on the eve of the Mexican war. He sailed around Cape Horn to the Sandwich islands, and thence to Monterey, where he found the squadron in possession under Commodore John D. Sloat, whom Stockton relieved. News of the war had been received by the squadron before his arrival. Monterey and San Francisco were captured. Stockton assumed command of all American forces on the coast by proclamation, 23 July, 1846. He organized a battalion of Americans in California and naval brigades from the crews of the ships. Col. John C. Fremont also cooperated with him. He sent Fremont in the "Cape Horn" to San Diego, while he landed at Santa Barbara and marched thirty miles with the naval brigade to the Mexican capital of California, the city of Los Angeles, of which he took possession on 13 Aug. He then organized a civil government for the state, and appointed Col. Fremont governor. Rumors of a rising of the Indians compelled him to return to the north in September. The force that he left at Los Angeles was besieged by the Mexicans in his absence, and Stockton was obliged to sail to San Diego after finding all quiet in the northern part of California. The Mexicans had also recaptured San Diego. He landed at that place, drove out the enemy, and sent a force to the rescue of Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, who had been defeated by the Mexicans on the way to San Diego. Gen. Kearny, with sixty dragoons, then served under Stockton's orders, and the force proceeded to Los Angeles 150 miles distant. An engagement took place at San Gabriel on 9 Jan., 1847, followed by the battle of La Mesa the next day, in which the Mexicans were routed. Col. Fremont had raised an additional force of Californians, by which the force under Stockton amounted to more than 1,000 men. Negotiations were opened with the Mexican governor, and the independence of California was ceded to the United States and evacuated by the Mexican authorities. The treaty with Mexico was subsequently confirmed. Gen. Kearny raised a dispute with Stockton for his assumption of command over military forces, but Stockton's course was sustained by virtue of his conquest. On 17 Jan., 1847, he returned to San Diego, and then sailed to Monterey, where he was relieved by Com. William B. Shubrick. Stockton returned home overland during the summer. He was the recipient of many honors by all parties, and the legislature of New Jersey named a town and a reception. The people of California, in recognition of his services, named for him the city of Stockton, and also one of the principal streets of San Francisco. On 28 May, 1856, he resigned from the army in order to settle his father-in-law's estate in South Carolina and attend to his private interests. He continued to take part in politics, was elected to the U. S. senate, and took his seat 1 Dec., 1851, but resigned, 10 Jan., 1853, and retired to private life. During his brief service in the senate he introduced and advocated the bill by which flogging was abolished in the navy. He also urged measures for coast defense. After he resigned from the senate he devoted himself to the development of the Delaware and Raritan canal, of which he was president until his death. He continued to take an interest in politics, became an ardent supporter of the "American" party, and was a delegate to the Peace congress that met in Washington, 13 Feb., 1861. See his "Life and Speeches" (New York, 1856). —Robert Field's son, John Potter, senator, b. in Princeton, 2 Aug., 1826; d. in New York city, 22 Jan., 1900, was graduated at Princeton, was licensed to practise as an attorney, and came to the bar in 1850. He was appointed by the legislature a commissioner to revise and simplify the proceedings and practice in the courts of law of the state, and was for several years afterward reporter to the court of chancery. In 1857 he was appointed U. S. minister to Rome, but in 1861 he was recalled at his own request. In 1863 he was chosen U. S. senator from New Jersey by a plurality vote of the legislature, a resolution changing the number necessary to elect from a majority to a plurality having been passed by the joint convention that elected him. On this ground, after he had taken his seat in the senate, several members of the legislature sent to the senate a protest against his retaining it. The committee on the judiciary unanimously reported in favor of the validity of his election, and their report was accepted by a vote of twenty-two to twenty-one, Mr. Stockton voting in the affirmative. His vote was objected to by Charles Sumner, and on the following day, 27 March, 1866, he withdrew it, and was succeeded by a vote of twenty-three to twenty-one. He then devoted himself to the practice of professional business, but in 1869 was re-elected to the senate, and served one term till 1875. While in that body he advocated the establishment of life-saving stations on the coast, and procured on the appropriation bills the first provision for their maintenance. He served on the committees on foreign affairs, the navy, appropriations, patents, and public buildings and grounds; and took part in the debate on the question of admission of California to the union; and the decision of questions of international law. In 1877 he was appointed attorney-general of New Jersey, and he was chosen again in 1882 and 1887. In this office he has sustained by exhaustive arguments the system of railroad taxation, reversing in the court of errors the decisions of the supreme court against the constitutionality of it. Stockton has served as a delegate-at-large to all the Democratic National conventions since that of 1864, where, as chairman of STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, clergyman, b. in Mount Holly, N. J., 4 June, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, 27 Oct., 1884. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1826. In 1827 he was ordained pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, and in 1829 was elected president of the University of Pennsylvania. He served as president of the university for ten years, during which time the institution was transferred from the city of Philadelphia to the city of Harrisburg. He was a strong advocate of the abolition of slavery, and was one of the first to recognize the importance of the South as a potential market for northern goods. He was a prolific writer, and his works include a variety of subjects, such as education, the law, and the arts. He was a devoted family man, and is remembered as a kind and gentle man, who was loved by his students and colleagues alike.
STODDARD, Joshua C., inventor, b. in Paw-lett, Vt., 26 Aug., 1814. He was educated at the public schools, and became noted as an aeronaut. He also turned his attention to invention, and in 1856 devised the steam-callope, which is used on Mississippi steamers. He also invented the Stoddard horse-pace and hay-tedder. More than 100,000 of his rakes are now in use.

STODDARD, Richard Henry, poet, b. in Hing-ham, Mass., 2 July, 1823. He was the son of the captain, who was wrecked and lost on one of his voyages while Richard was a child, and the lad went in 1835 to New York with his mother, who had married again. He attended the public schools of that city, but worked for several years in an iron-foundry, at the same time reading the best authors, particularly poetry. His talents brought him into the notice of young men interested in literature, notably with Bay-ard Taylor, who had just published his "Views Afoot." Stoddard had written verses from his early years, and in 1849 printed privately a collection in a small volume called "Footprints," the edition of which he afterward destroyed. In 1852 he published a riper volume of poems, became a contributor to the "Knickracker," and entered upon literary work. Writing as a means of subsistence became such a burden that, through Na-thaniel Hawthorne, he obtained a place in the custom-house and retained it from 1853 till 1870. He was confidential clerk to Gen. George B. Mc-Clellan in the dock department in 1870-3, and city librarian in New York for about a year. He was literary reviewer on the New York "World" from 1860 till 1870, and has held the same office on the "Mail" and "Mail and Express" since 1880. He also edited for some time "The Aldine," an illustrated periodical, which was to have in its mind and tastes are poetical, but he has done a good deal of booksellers' work from the urgency of circumstances. In 1853 he published "Adventures in Fairy Land," for young folks, and in 1857 "Songs of Summer," abounding in luxuriant imagination and tropical feeling. Among his other works are "Town and Country," for children (New York, 1857); "Life, Travels and Adventures of Alexander von Humboldt," with an introduction by Bay-ard Taylor (Boston, 1860; London, 1862); "The King's Bell," a poem (Boston, 1862; London, 1864; New York, 1865); "The Story of Little Red Riding Hood," in verse (New York, 1864); "The Children in the Wood," in verse (1865); "Abraham Lincoln, a Horatian Ode" (1865); "Putnam, the Brave" (1869); "The Book of the English Poets," a series of later poems (1867). He has edited "The Last Political Writings of Gen. Nathaniel Lyon" (1861); "The Loves and Heroines of the Poets" (1861); John Guy Vassar's "Twenty-One Years Round the World" (1862); "Melodies and Madrigals, mostly from the Old English Poets" (1863); "The Late English Poets" (1865); enlarged editions of "Rutland Foster's Poems of America," "Female Poets of America" (1874); and the "Dise-
STODDARD, William Osborn, author, b. in Homer, Cortland co., N. Y., 24 Sept., 1815. His father was for many years a bookseller and publisher in Rochester and Syracuse, N. Y. He was graduated at the University of Rochester in 1838, edited the "Daily Ledger" in Chicago for a short time, and the same year became editor of the "Central Illinois Gazette," at Champaign, which he conducted for about three years. He was an opponent of slavery, and took an active part in the Republican presidential canvass of 1860. He was a private secretary to President Lincoln in 1861-4, was U. S. marshal for Arkansas in 1864-6, and has since been variously employed. He invented a center-locking printer's chase, and has taken out some interesting patents in desiccating processes and in machinery. He has published "Royal Degree of Scanderdon" (New York, 1869); "Verses of Many Days" (1873); "Dismissed" (1878); "The Heart of It" (1880); "Dub Kinzer" (1881); "The Quartet" (1882); "Essai Hardlery" (1882); "Saillito Boys" (1882); "Talking for Fun" (1883); "An American in Oklahoma" (1884); "Wrecked!" (1883); "The Life of Abraham Lincoln" (1884); "Two Arrows" (1886); "The Red Beauty" (1887); "The Volcano under the City," a description of the draft riots of 1863 (1887); "Lives of the Presidents"; "Incident in the White House in War Times" (1890); and "Men of Business" (1894).

STODDERT, Benjamin, cabinet officer, b. in Charles county, Md., in 1751; d. in Bladensburg, Md., 18 Dec., 1813. His grandfather, Maj. James Stoddert, a cadet of the Scotch family of Stoddert, settled in Maryland about 1675, and his father, Capt. Thomas Stoddert, of the Maryland contin- gent, was killed in "Brandywine." But James was educated for a merchant, but in 1776 joined the Continental army as captain of cavalry, and was in active service till the battle of Brandywine, when, holding the rank of major, he was so severely wounded as to unfit him for active service. As secretary of the board of war he remained with the army till the latter part of 1781. When peace was concluded he became a successful merchant of Georgetown, D. C. In May, 1789, he was appointed secretary of the navy, being the first to hold the post, and so remained till 4 March, 1801. He was acting secretary of war after the resignation of James Henry, until his successor, Samuel Dexter, took charge. When the navy department was created in 1798, the frigates "Constitution," "Con- tinental," and the frigates of the type which constituted the bulk of the American navy. By the latter part of 1799 five frigates and twenty-three sloops-of-war were in commission. Mr. Stoddert's experience in the mercantile marine, coupled with his tact, industry, and judgment, were valuable in the formation of this naval force, through which the hostilities with France were so soon terminated. That he possessed the confidence and friendship of Presi- dent Adams is shown by his official and private correspondence. At the close of Adams' administra- tion he returned to private life, settling his business affairs, which during his absence had be- come so entangled as to cause serious losses.

STOECKEL, Gustave Jacob, musician, b. in Malkammer, Bavarian Palatinate, Germany, 9 Nov., 1810. He was graduated at the seminary in Kaiserslautern in 1838, pursued a post-graduate course in musical composition under Joseph Krebs, and was a teacher and organist till 1847. He came to this country in that year, and since 1849 has been instructor in music at Yale, and organist of the college chapel. Yale gave him the degree of Mus. D., 1864. Mr. Stoeckel has composed a series of sacred music for mixed voices (New York, 1868), and "College Hymn-Book" for male voices (1866); besides compositions for the piano, songs, and overtures and symphonies for orchestra. He is also the author of the unpublished operas of "Lichtenstein," "Mahomet," "Miles Standish," and "Mississippi."
that of J.L. D. in 1869 by Union college. In 1862 the presidency of Girard college, Philadelphia, was offered to him, and in 1869 the professorship of Latin in Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa.; but he declined both. He was connected with the "Evangelical Quarterly Review" from its beginning in 1849, and was its sole editor from 1857 until his death. His biographical articles earned him the title of The Piastarch of the Lutheran Church. He was also editor of the "Literary Record and Linnaean Journal," in Gettysburg, in 1847-8, and published "Memoir of the Life and Times of Henry Melchior Muhlenburg, D. D." (Philadelphia, 1856); "Memorial of Philip F. Mayer, D. D." (1859); "Brief Sketch of the Lutheran Church in this Country" (1860); and "Discourse before the Lutheran Historical Society" (Lancaster, 1869).

STOKES, Anthony, British jurist, b. in England in 1736; d. in London, 27 March, 1799. He was a barrister at law of the Inner Temple, London, came to this country, was appointed chief justice of Georgia in 1768, and in 1772 became councillor of that colony, retaining those offices till the evacuation of Georgia by the British in 1782. He was a localist at the opening of the Revolution, and was taken prisoner, but was soon afterward exchanged. In 1778 his estate was confiscated. He went to Charleston, S. C., after leaving Georgia, and at the evacuation of that city he returned to England. He published "View of the Constitution of the British Colonies in North America and the West Indies" (London, 1783); "Narrative of the Official Conduct of Anthony Stokes" (1784); and "Desultory Observations on Great Britain" (1792).

STOKES, James Hughes, soldier, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1814; d. in New York city, 27 Dec., 1890. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, resigned in 1843, and engaged in business, removing in 1858 to Illinois. After aiding in the equipment of volunteers, he joined the army as captain, and served in Tennessee, and afterward as assistant adjutant-general. He was made a brigadier-general on 20 July, 1865, and was mustered out a month later.

STOKES, Montford, senator, b. in Wilkes county, N. C., 25 June, 1838; d. in Franklin, Ark., 4 Nov., 1842. He served in the navy during the revolutionary war, and after its close lived in Salisbury, N. C., where he was for several years clerk of the superior court. He became subsequently clerk of the state senate, and was elected to the U. S. senate, but declined the office. He was again elected to the same office in 1816, and served till 1825, was a member of the state senate in 1826, and of the state house of representatives in 1829 and 1830. He was governor of North Carolina in 1830-1, which office he resigned to accept that of commissioner to superintend the removal of the Indians west of Mississippi river. He was appointed by President Jackson in 1831 Indian agent for Arkansas territory, where he remained till his death. He was a member of the city council of Salisbury with Jesse D. Pierson, and was severely wounded.

STOLBRAND, Carlos John Muller, soldier, b. in Sweden, 11 May, 1821; d. in Charleston, S. C., 3 Feb., 1894. He entered the royal artillery, and took part in the campaign of Schiesswig-Holstein with part of his regiment in defence of Denmark. At the close of the war he came to the United States, and in July, 1861, he enlisted in the volunteer artillery. Soon afterward he was appointed its captain and joined the 1st battalion of Illinois light artillery, and became chief of artillery under Gen. John A. Logan. He took part in the movements against Corinth, Miss., and in 1863, on Gen. Logan's accession to the command of the 15th corps, was transferred to the command of its artillery brigade. He participated in the campaign of Atlanta and the march to the sea. In February, 1865, he was promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers, assigned to a brigade in the 15th corps, and shortly afterward took one in the 17th corps. The latter brigade, being reduced in numbers, was re-enforced and reorganized under his charge. In 1865 he went with his brigade to St. Louis, Mo., and thence to Leavenworth, Kan., and in February, 1866, he received an honorable discharge from the army. In 1868 Gen. Stolbrand was elected secretary of the Constitutional convention of South Carolina. He was delegate-at-large to the National Republican convention in 1868, and served as presidential elector. He made various improvements in steam-engines and steam-boilers, and was superintendent of the U. S. government building in Charleston.

STONE, Amasa, philanthropist, b. in Charlotte, Mass., 25 April, 1818; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 11 May, 1883. He was born in a family of twenty-one was engaged in the construction of railroad bridges, and while still young became the first bridge-builder in the country. In partnership with two friends he constructed the Cleveland, Columbus, and Cincinnati railroad, and afterward the Cleveland and Erie, of which roads he was made superintendent. He was next engaged in building the Chicago and Milwaukee railroad. He was president and director of numerous railroads and other industrial and financial corporations, was frequently consulted by President Lincoln in regard to matters of army transportation, and was offered by him an appointment as brigadier-general. He spent a year in Europe in 1868-9. Mr. Stone gave large sums in charity to the city of Cleveland. He built and endowed the Home for aged women and the Industrial school for children, and gave $600,000 to Adelbert college of Western Reserve university.

STONE, Andrew Leete, b. in Oxford, Conn., 25 Nov., 1815; d. in San Francisco, 17 Jan., 1892. His father was justice of the peace for a quarter of a century, served for several terms as judge of probate, and had local reputation as a physician. He was graduated at Yale in 1839, was engaged for three years as a professor in the New York institution for the deaf and dumb, studying at Union theological seminary. He then connected himself with the American Sunday-school union at Philadelphia, and in September, 1844, was ordained pastor of the South Congregational church at Middletown, Conn. In January, 1849, he was called to the pastorate of the Park street church, Boston. In 1856 he received a call to the 1st Congregational church in San Francisco, Cal. In 1881, his health failing, he was elected pastor emeritus. He is the author of "Service the End of Living" (1858); "Ashton's Mothers" (1839); "Discourse on the Death of Abraham Lincoln" (1865); and numerous printed addresses. Several of his sermons have been published, entitled "Memorial Discourses" (1866) and "Leaves from a Finished Pastorate" (1882).—His brother, David Marvin, journalist, b. in Oxford, Conn., 23 Dec., 1817; d. in Brooklyn, 2 April, 1895. He taught when he was only sixteen, and was a merchant in Philadel-phia from 1824 till 1849, when he came to New York city to take charge of the "Dry Goods Reporter." In December of that year he became commercial editor of the New York "Journal of Commerce," and in September, 1861, with William C. Prime, he purchased the interest of that paper, succeeding Mr. Prime in 1866 as editor-in-chief, which he held until June, 1896. He was president of the New York associated press for twenty-five years. For several years he contributed a financial article weekly to the New York "Observer," edited as a pastime the "Ladies' Wreath," and conducted the financial department of "Hunt's Merchants' Magazine." An important incident in his life is the support given by the government in 1894 for publishing a proclamation purporting to have been issued by President Lincoln, calling for volunteers to serve in the war and naming a day of fasting and prayer. It was the production of Joseph Howard, Jr., and appeared in the "Journal of Commerce," 18 May, 1864. The "Herald" printed 20,000 copies containing the so-called proclamation, but, finding that neither the "Times" nor the "Tribune" had printed it, destroyed the edition. The "World" published it, but afterward endeavored to undo the mischief. President Lincoln immediately ordered the suppression of the "Journal of Commerce" and the "World," and the arrest and imprisonment of their editors and proprietor, Gen. John A. Dix, who knew that the proclamation had been left at the newspaper offices at about three o'clock in the morning, after the responsible editors had departed, endeavored to secure a modification of this order. Some of the persons designated were arrested, but they did not include David M. Stone or Manton Marble. The government soon found that it had made a mistake, the troops that had been put in possession of the two newspaper offices were withdrawn, and the editors were released from arrest and their papers from suspension. Mr. Stone's opinions on commercial and other matters in his "answers to correspondents" were regarded as an authority by merchants throughout the country. In his younger days he wrote for the magazines, but since 1860 he had done little literary work except for his own paper. He published a volume called "Frank Forest," which passed through twenty editions (1819), and a memorial volume containing the "Life and Letters" of his niece, Mary Elizabeth Hubbell (1857).

STONE, Barton Warren, reformer, b. near Lexington, Ky., 16 Dec., 1842; d. in Hannibal, Mo., 9 Nov., 1894. He was graduated at the academy in Guilford, N. C., in 1793, studied theology, and, after teaching in Washington, Ga., was licensed in North Carolina in 1796. Two years later he was ordained pastor of the churches of Cane Ridge and Concord, Ky. During the revival of 1801 in Kentucky and Tennessee, Stone, with four other ministers, renounced the dogmas of Calvinism. One of the number was tried by the synod of Lexington, Ky., in 1803, for preaching anti-Calvinistic doctrines, whereupon they all withdrew in September from that body, formed themselves into the Springfield presbytery, and continued to preach and form churches, the first being one at Cane Ridge of Mr. Stone's old followers. In June, 1804, he was ordained by the same body and took the name of the Christian church. Having no pastoral charge, Stone supported himself for several years by farming and teaching while he continued to found churches in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. In 1826 he edited the "Christian Messenger," and six years later, with Rev. John T. Johnson, a Baptist, he at Lexington united the "Stoneite" and "Campbellite" churches in Kentucky. He removed to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1834, included Missouri in his circuit, and also continued his editorial labor until his death. His last preaching-tour was in 1843, and a year later, while on his way home from a visit to Missouri, he died. Mr. Stone wielded a great influence through his scholarship, piety, and attractive manner. He wrote part ii. of the "Apology of the Springfield Presbytery" (1803), which has been called the first declaration of religious freedom in the western hemisphere, and the hymn "The Lord is the Fountain of Goodness and Love." Among his other writings are "Letters on the Attonement" (1805); "Address to the Christian Churches" (1805); and "Letters to Dr. James Blythe" (1822).

STONE, Charles Pomeroy, soldier, b. in Green- field, Mass., 20 Sept., 1824; d. in New York city, 24 Jan., 1857. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, assigned to the ordnance, and served in the war with Mexico, being brevetted 1st lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Molino del Rey, and promoted, 13 Sept., for the battle of Chapultepec. He also participated in the siege of Vera Cruz and the assault and capture of the city of Mexico. He was on duty at Watervliet arsenal, N. Y., till 15 Sept., 1848, on leave of absence to visit Europe for the purpose of improvement in his profession and the gaining of general information till 13 May, 1850, and on duty at Watervliet and Fort Monroe arsenals in 1850. Under orders of the secretary of war he embarked men and stores, and conducted them to California via Cape Horn till August, 1851, after which, till 27 Jan., 1856, he was in charge of construction and in command of Benicia arsenal, and chief of ordnance of the Division and Department of the Pacific. He was president of the College of California, 1856, and from March, 1857, till 31 Dec., 1859, was chief of the scientific commission for the survey and exploration of the state of Sonora, Mexico. On 1 Jan., 1861, he was appointed colonel of the 14th infantry, 14 May, 1861, and given charge of the outposts and defenses of Washington. He commanded the Rockville expedition and engaged in the skirmishes of Edward's and Conrad's Ferry in June, and Harper's Ferry, 7 July, 1861, led a brigade in Gen. Robert Patterson's operations in the Shenandoah valley, commanded the corps of observation of the Army of the Potomac from 10 Aug., 1861, to 9 Feb., 1862, and on 30 Oct., 1861, was ordered by Gen. McClellan to keep a good lookout and make a feint of crossing the Potomac at Ball's Bluff. Gen. McClellan, in his report of this disastrous affair, says: "I did not direct him to cross, nor did I intend that he should cross the river in force for the purpose of fighting." After having made the feint, Gen. Stone, it appears, was led to believe that the enemy might be surprised, and accordingly caused a part of his command to cross the Potomac in the night. The enemy attacked in force at daybreak of the 21st, and pushed the National troops into the river with great loss. Gen. Stone was continued in the same command until 9 Feb., 1822, when he was suddenly arrested and imprisoned in Fort Lafayette, New York harbor, where he remained until 16 Aug., 1822. He was then released, no charge having been preferred against him, and awaited orders until 3 May, 1823, when he was directed to report to the commanding general of the Department of the Gulf, where he served until 17 April, 1824. He participated in the campaign of 1822-23, and was senior member of the commission for receiving the surrender of that place, 8 July, 1823. He was chief of staff to Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, commanding the Department of the Gulf, from 25 July, 1863, to 17 April, 1864, participating in the campaign of Bayou Teche, La., in October, 1863, and the Red River campaign in March and April, 1864. He was honorably mustered out as brigadier-general of volunteers, 4 April, 1864, and resigned his commission as colonel of the 14th infantry, 13 Sept., 1864. In the autumn of 1865 Gen. Stone was appointed engineer and superintendent of the Dover mining company in Glocester County, Va., where he resided until 1870. He then accepted a commission in the Egyptian army, and later transferred to the government service in which capacity he bestowed much attention upon the military school that had already been formed by French officers in the Egyptian service. He created a typographical bureau, where a great number of maps were produced and the government printing was executed, and when the reports of the American officers engaged in exploration of the interior were printed. Gen. Stone was placed in temporary charge of the cadastral survey, and was president of the Geographical society and a member of the Institut Egyptien at Cairo. The American officers were mustered out of the service in 1873, as a measure of economy, by the reform government which succeeded the dethronement of Ismaïl. Gen. Stone alone remained, and acted as chief of the staff until the insurrection of Arabi and the army, in which he took no active part. He resigned and returned to the United States in March, 1883. Gen. Stone was decorated by Ismaïl Pacha with the order of the commander of the Osmanieh, was made grand officer of the Medjidieh and Osmanieh, and was created a Ferik pacha (general of division). In May he was appointed engineer-in-chief of the Egyptian army, and directed a preliminary survey across the northern part of the peninsula. On 3 April, 1886, he became engineer-in-chief to the committee for the construction of the pedestal of the Bartholdi statue of "Liberty enlightening the World," and upon its successful completion he acted as grand marshal in the military and civic ceremony that accompanied the occasion.

STONE, Collins, clergyman and educator, b. in Guilford, Conn., 7 Sept., 1812; d. in Hartford, Conn., 23 Dec., 1870. He was graduated at Yale in 1832, and in the following year became a teacher in the American deaf-mute asylum at Hartford. In 1832 he was called as principal to the Ohio state asylum for the deaf and dumb at Columbus, but he returned to Hartford, where he remained until his death. He studied theology, and was ordained to the ministry in 1853 while in Ohio. For nearly forty years Mr. Stone was prominent in his department of education, and merits the credit of laying the foundations of the future prosperity of the Ohio institution, and of carrying the Hartford asylum through difficulties. He published annual reports of the Ohio institution (1852-'63) and of that at Hartford (1863-'70). His other educational writings, including an address on his "History of Deaf-Mute Instruction" before the Ohio institution (1860), were published in the "American Annals of the Deaf and Dumb." A railroad accident was the cause of his death.

STONE, David, senator, b. in Hope, N. C., 17 Feb., 1770; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 7 Oct., 1818. His father, Zedekiah Stone, was a member of the Provincial Congress in 1776, and was for many years a state senator. David was graduated at Princeton in 1788, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1790. He was a member of the legislature in 1791-4, judge of the supreme court of North Carolina in 1795-8, and a member of congress in 1799-1801, having been chosen as a Democrat. In the latter year he was sent to the U. S. senate, but he resigned in 1807 to become judge of the state supreme court. He was governor of North Carolina in 1808-'10, and in the two following years sat again in congress. In 1813 he was again sent to the U. S. senate by a legislature whose majority supported the measures of President Madison and the war with England; but, opposing these measures, he was censured by the legislature, and resigned in 1813.

STONE, Ebenezer Whitten, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 June, 1801; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 18 April, 1880. In 1817 he enlisted in the U. S. army, from which he was discharged in 1821. He was connected with the Massachusetts militia in 1823-29, receiving the appointment of adjutant-general in 1821 and filling the post till the close of his service. In 1830 he was a member of the legislature, serving on the military committee. The first full battery of light artillery in the United States, except those in the regular army, was organized by him in 1853, and through his efforts Massachusetts was the first state to receive the new rifled musket of the pattern of 1855. From experiments that he made with this musket, Gen. Stone conceived the idea that cannon could also be rifled, and after successful tests in 1859 he ordered a model from John P. Schenkl, the inventor of the Schenkl shell. It is claimed that this was the first rifled cannon that was made in the United States, and that the invention was original with Gen. Stone, though rifled cannon had been in use in Europe for several years. From April till October, 1861, Gen. Stone, as chief of ordnance, armed and equipped twenty-four regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and three light batteries of artillery. He was for twelve years a member of the Ancient and honorable artillery company, and became its captain in 1841. He prepared, under an act of the legislature, a "Digest of the Militia Laws of Massachusetts" (Boston, 1831), and a "Compend of Instruction in Artillery Tactics," and "The Manual of Percussion Arms" (1857).

STONE, Edwin Martin, clergyman, b. in Framingham, Mass., 29 April, 1805; d. in Providence, R. I., 15 Dec., 1883. After working as a printer in Boston, he edited the "Times" in that city in 1827, the "Independent Messenger" in 1832-3, and subsequently the "Salem Observer." In 1833 he became editor of the "Independent" church in Beverly, Mass., in the mean time serving two years as representative in the general court of Massachusetts, to which he made some important legislative reports. In 1847 he took charge of the ministry-at-large in Providence, R. I., devoting himself for thirty years to mission work, and suggesting reforms that were successfully carried out. Chief of these was a home for aged men, founded in 1784, of which he was a charter member. During that time he also served on the Providence school committee. In 1848-83 he was librarian of the Rhode Island historical society, and contributed antiquarian and miscellaneous matter to his annual reports. He was also a member of many learned societies. He has published "Life of Elihaman Winchester" (Boston, 1836; Salem, 1838); "Hymns for Sabbath-Schools" (1837); "Hymns and Tunes for Vestry and Conference Meetings" (4th ed., 1844); "History of Beverly, Mass., 1830-1860" (1860); "The History of the Metamora, N. Y." (Providence, 1857); "History of the Providence Association of Mechanics and Manufacturers" (1860); "The Invasion of Canada in 1775," including the journal of Capt. Simeon Thayer, with notes and appendix (Providence, 1867); "The Architect and Monomaniac: a Brief Memoir of Thomas Alexander Tofts" (1869); and "Our French Allies" (1885). Assisted by his son, Edwin W., he edited the "Adjutant-General's Report of Rhode Island for 1865," which contains a roster of the Rhode Island soldiers in the civil war. He left unpublished a "Life of Rev. Dr. Manasseh Cutler," and a history of Providence.—His son, Edwin Winchester (1835-78), served in the Rhode Island artillery during the civil war, was made colonel of volunteers, and was afterward colonel and published "Rochie Island in the Rebellion" (Providence, 1864).

STONE, James Samuel, clergyman, b. in Shipston-on-Stour, Worcestershire, England, 27 April, 1852. He emigrated to Philadelphia in 1872, and studied theology in the divinity-school in that city, and at the College of the City of New York. He was ordained in 1876, and ordained priest by the bishop of Toronto, Canada, in 1877. He was rector of St. Philip's church, Toronto, from 1878 till 1882, of St. Martin's, Montreal, Grace church, Philadelphia, and since January, 1895, has been rector of St. James's church, Chicago. He was professor of ecclesiastical history in Wycliffe college, Toronto, in 1877-82. He is well known in Canada as a lecturer, some of his topics being "Love in ye Olden Time," "Trials of a Parson," "Robin Hood," and "John Bunyan." He received the degree of B. D. from Cambridge (Mass.) Episcopal theological school in 1880, and those of B. D. and D. D. from the University of Bishop's college, Lenoxville, Canada, in 1886. Besides many pamphlets and magazine articles, Dr. Stone has published "Simple Sermons on Simple Subjects" (Toronto, 1879) and "The Heart of Merrie England" (Philadelphia, 1887).

STONE, John Augustus, dramatist, b. in Concord, Mass., in 1801; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 June, 1834. He appeared on the stage in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia in 1824. In 1827 he wrote "Metamora," "The Ancient Briton," and "Fauntleroy"; and among other plays he published "La Roque," "The Demoniac," and "Tancer." He was drowned in a fit of temporary insanity in the Schuykill, at Philadelphia, and his monument there bears the inscription: "Erected to the memory of the author of "Metamora," by his friends." He was buried in the city cemetery.

STONE, John Osgood, physician, b. in Salem, Mass., 1 Feb., 1813; d. in New York city, 7 June, 1876. He was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and at the medical department there in 1836. After hospital experience in London and Paris he began practice in New York city, identifying himself with many medical charities and scientific organizations, and attaining eminence in his profession. He was long a surgeon at Bellevue hospit-
Clergyman, of the same name has been recently supplied, by the register of the Church of All Saints, Hartford, to the writer's knowledge. The son, in 1863, at Emmanuel college, Cambridge, in 1823–27. Plessing to the American colonies to escape religious persecution, he landed at Boston, Mass., 3 Sept., 1863, having as companions in his flight Rev. John Cotton and Rev. Thomas Hooker. With the latter he was an associate in a church at Cambridge until 1865, when they both removed to the present site of Hartford, Connecticut, which was later his home. The spelling being conformed to the English pronunciation. He was distinguished as a controversialist and celebrated for his wit and humor. Being a man of strong convictions, he engaged during the latter part of his life in theological disputes which caused part of his congregation to secede and found another church. On his decease, his old companion, Hooker, succeeded him in the ministry. Mr. Stone published "A Congregational Church is a Catholic Visible Church: Examination of Mr. Hudson's View" (London, 1652), and he left two works in manuscript, "A Body of Divinity" and a confutation of the Antinomians. Of the former, Cotton Mather says: "This rich treasure of a book has been transcended by the vast powers of our candidates for ministry; yet it has made some of our most considerable divines."

STONE, Thomas Treadwell, clergyman, b. in Waterford, Me., 9 Feb., 1801; d. in Bolton, Mass., 13 Nov., 1863. He was graduated at Bowdoin, and was pastor of the Congregational church at Andover, Me., in 1824–30, of that at East Machias in 1832–40, of the first church (Unitarian) at Salem, Mass., in 1846–52, of the 1st Congregational church at Bolton, Mass., in 1852–60, and of the 1st ecclesiastical society, Brooklyn, Conn., from 1863 till 1871, when he retired from the active duties of the ministry. He afterward removed to Bolton, Mass., where he had since resided. He received the degree of D. D. from Bowdoin in 1868, was principal of Bridgton academy, 1893–95, one of the early members of the Transcendental school, contributed to various religious periodicals, and published "Sermons on War" (Boston, 1862); "Sketches of Oxford County, Me." (Portland, 1862); "Sermons" (Boston, 1864); "The Rod and the Staff" (1856); and separate sermons and addresses.

STONE, Warren, physician, b. in St. Albans, Vt., in February, 1818; d. in New Orleans, La., 6 Dec., 1872. He studied medicine in Massachusetts, settled in New Orleans, and soon became one of the chief physicians there. He began teaching anatomy in 1836, in 1837 was appointed professor of that branch in the University of Louisiana, and afterward accepted the chair of surgery, which he held till his death. Dr. Stone was at the head of his profession in the south, and when Gen. Grant was thrown from his horse near New Orleans in September, 1863, he was called to attend him. He contributed numerous articles to medical journals.

His son, Warren, physician, b. in New Orleans in 1843; d. there, 3 Jan., 1883, was educated at the Jesuits' college, New Orleans, and served in the Confederate army during the civil war. On returning to New Orleans he began practice, and was graduated at the University of Louisiana in 1867, and at the opening of the Charity hospital medical college of New Orleans, in 1874, was appointed to the chair of surgical anatomy. In 1873 he made what is thought to be the first recorded cure of traumatic aneurism of the subclavian artery by digital pressure. He gave the services to the people of Brunswick, Ga., during the prevalence of yellow fever in 1874, and in 1878, when that disease was raging in the southwest, he left his home and large practice and travelled about from one stricken village or town to another, giving his services gratuitously. Dr. Stone became a member of the American public health association in 1880.

STONE, William, colonial governor, b. in Northamptonshire, England, about 1663; d. in Charles county, Md., about 1661. He emigrated to the eastern shore of Virginia, where he settled Northampton county. There was a settlement of Puritans in Nansemond county, and their condition becoming uncomfortable from the attitude and treatment of the Episcopalians of Virginia, Stone arranged with Cecilius Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, to remove 300 settlers to Maryland. On 8 Aug., 1648, Baltimore appointed Stone governor of his province, and he arrived there as early as 1649. His Puritan emigrants from Virginia settled at a place on Severn river, which they called Providence and which is now Annapolis. In 1673 Stone was removed from the governorship by William Claiborne and Richard Bennett, parliamentary commissioners. But on 25 March, 1655, at the head of the Cavalier forces of the province, he attacked the Roundhead forces under Capt. William Fuller at Severn, where he was routed, taken prisoner, and condemned to death by martial. His life was spared at the entreaty of the men of the victorious party. After this he does not appear to have taken part in public affairs, but lived and died on his manor of Avon on Nanjemoy river, in Charles county. Md. In consideration of his faithful services to the proprietary, he was granted as much land as he could ride around in a day. — His great-grandson, Thomas, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Charles county, Md., in 1743; d. in Alexandria, Va., 5 Oct., 1787, daily rode ten miles to school in order to acquire a classical education, borrowed money to enable him to study law in Annapolis, began practice in Frederick about 1770, and two years later removed to Charles county, purchasing a farm near Port Tobacco. He early espoused the cause of his country in the disputes with the British government, and was elected to the Continental congress, when two members were added to the Maryland delegation, 8 Dec., 1774, taking his seat on 15 May, 1775. In July he was re-elected for a year longer, and again on 21 May, 1776, till the end of the next session of the convention. The Maryland delegates, notwithstanding their instructions in favor of reconciliation, voted for the resolution of 15 May, 1776, declaring that the authority of the crown had ceased. Late in June the instructions were recalled, leaving them free to vote for the Declaration of Independence on 4 July. On the same day Stone and his colleagues were re-elected without restrictions on their action. Although he bore no active part in the debates of congress, he served on committees that were entrusted with important matters, such as the augmentation of the flying camp, the failure of the Canada expedition, the consideration of some of Gen. Washington's letters, and the elaboration of a scheme of a confederacy for the colonies in the confederation, which was appointed on 12 June, 1776, he was the only member from his province. Being re-elected to congress in February, he labored in this committee till the articles of confederation were finally settled on and agreed to by the vote of 15 Nov., 1777. The Maryland convention refused to enter the confederacy, and expressed a wish that the confederacy of the colonies and the mother country might yet be accommodated. Stone declined a re-election to congress, and entered the Maryland senate, where he could be more useful to the patriotic cause. In 1783 he was again elected to congress, and in the session of 1784 he served on most of the important committees. Toward its close he acted as president pro tempore. He declined re-election, and devoted himself thenceforth to his profession and to his duties as a member of the state senate, in which he opposed in 1785 a proposition to establish a paper currency. After the death of his wife in June, 1787, he abandoned his large legal practice in Annapolis, sank into a settled melancholy, and died when he was about to write a second volume. — Another great-grandson, John Hoskins, gr. of Charles county, Md., b. in Charles county, Md., in 1745; d. in Annapolis, Md., 5 Oct., 1804. On 2 Jan., 1776, the convention of Maryland elected him captain in Col. Smallwood's battalion, and in December of the same year he was promoted to the rank of colonel. He served with credit in the battles of Long Island, White Plains, Princeton, Germantown, received in the last-mentioned battle a wound that maimed him for life, and on 1 Aug., 1779, resigned his commission. In 1781 he was clerk in the office of Robert R. Livingston, secretary of state, and afterward was one of the executive council of Maryland. He was governor from 1794 till 1797. — Another great-grandson, William Murray, P. E. bishop, b. in Somerset county, Md., 1 June, 1792; d. in Salisbury, Md., 26 Feb., 1838. He entered Washington college, Md., was graduated in 1799, and studied theology, preparatory to taking orders in the Episcopal church. He was ordained deacon in St. Paul's church, Prince George co., Md., 17 May, 1802, by Bishop Chaggett, and priest in the same church, 27 Dec., 1803, by the same bishop. In 1803 he became rector of St. Stephen's church (now Wicomico) county. This position he held for twenty-three years, and he was very diligent and successful in his pastoral work. In 1829 he accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's church, Chestertown, Kent co., Md. The following year, at the convention in May, after a failure to elect either of two prominent clergymen, he was nominated and elected bishop by a nearly unanimous vote. He was consecrated in St. Paul's church, Baltimore, Md., 21 Oct., 1830. The same year he received the degree of D. D. from Columbia. Bishop Stone's publications were "A Charge to the Clergy and Laity of Maryland" (1831); "A Pastoral Letter to the Diocese of Maryland" (1835); and The Sermon before the General Convention of the P. E. Church "(1835). — Thomas's brother, Michael Jenifer, jurist, b. in Charles county, Md., about 1759; d. there in 1812, received a classical education. He was a member of the Maryland convention that ratified the Federal constitution, and was elected to the 1st congress, serving from 8 June, 1789, till 3 March, 1791. Under the state government he was a judge of the general court, and he sat on the bench till the judicial system was reorganized in 1806. — Michael Jenifer's grandson, Frederick, congressman, b. in Virginia, 7 Feb., 1820, was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, and studied and practised law at Port Tobacco, Charles co., Md. He was elected by the general assembly in 1839 one of the commissioners to simplify the rules of pleading and practice in the state courts. He was elected to the Constitutional convention to form a new constitution for the state in the spring of 1864, but declined to take his seat. In the following November he was elected to the house of delegates from Charles county at the special session. He was elected to congress in 1866, and re-elected in 1868. In 1871 he was again elected to the house of delegates, and served his term. He was chosen judge of the court of appeals in 1881, which place he held until February, 1890.

STONE, William Leece, author, b. in New Paltz, N. Y., 29 April, 1792; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 15 Aug., 1844. His father, William, was a soldier of the Revolution and afterward a Presbyterian clergyman, who was a descendant of Gov. William Leece. The son removed to Sodus, N. Y., in 1808, where he assisted his father in the care of a farm. The country was at that time a wilderness, and the adventures of young Stone during his early pioneer life formed material that he afterward wrought into border tales. At the age of seventeen he became a printer in the office of the Cooperstown "Federalist," and in 1813 he was editor of the Herkimer "American," with Thurlow Weed as his journeyman. Subsequently he edited the "Northern Whig" at Hudson, N. Y., and in 1817 the Albany "Daily Advertiser." In 1818 he succeeded Theodore Dwight in the editorship of the Hartford "Mirror." While at Hartford, Jonathan M. Wainwright (afterward bishop, Samuel G. Goodrich (Peter Parley), Isaac Toney, and himself alternated in editing a literary magazine called "The Knights of the Round Table." He also edited while at Hudson "The Lounger," a literary periodical which was noted for its pleasantness and wit. In 1821 he succeeded Zachariah Lewis in the editorship of the New York "Commercial Advertiser," becoming at the same time one of its proprietors, which place he held until his death. Brown university gave him the degree of A. M. in 1825. Mr. Stone always advocated in its columns the abolition of slavery by constitutional action, and at the great anti-slavery convention at Baltimore in 1825 he originated and drew up the plan for slave emancipation which was recommended at that time to congress for adoption. In 1824 his sympathies were strongly enlisted in behalf of the Greeks in their struggles for independence. He wrote Edward Everett and Dr. Samuel G. Howe, was among the first to draw the attention of the country to that people and awaken sympathy in their behalf. In 1825, with Thurlow Weed, he accompanied Lafayette on his tour through part of the United States. He was appointed by President Harrison minister to the Hague, but was recalled by Tyler. Soon after the Morgan tragedy (see Morgan, William) Mr. Stone, who was a Freemason, addressed a series of letters on "Masonry and Anti-Masonry" to John Quincy Adams, who in his retirement at Quincy had taken in which to the anti-Masonic movement. In these letters, which were afterward collected and published (New York, 1832), the author maintained that Masonry should be abandoned, chiefly because it had lost its usefulness. The writer also cleared away the mists of slander that had gathered around the name of De Witt Clinton, and by preserving strict impartiality he seemed to have done much to make Masonry obtain, however ingenious. In 1838 he originated and introduced a resolution in the New York historical society directing a memorial to be addressed to the New York legislature praying for the appointment of an historical mission to the governments of England and Holland for the recovery of such papers and documents as were essential to a correct understanding of the colonial history of the state. This was the origin of the collection known as the "New York Colonial Documents" made by John Romeyn Brodhead, who was sent abroad for that purpose by Gov. William H. Seward in the spring of 1841. He was the first superintendent of public schools in New York city, and while holding the office, in 1844, had a discussion with Archbishop Hughes in the Commercial Advertiser on the use of the Bible in the public schools. Although the influence of Col. Stone (as he was familiarly called, from having held that rank on Gov. Clinton's staff) extended throughout the country, it was felt more particularly in New York city. He was active in religious enterprises and benevolent associations. His works are: "History of the Great Albany Constitutional Convention of 1821" (Albany, 1822); "Narrative of the Grand Erie Canal Celebration," prepared at the request of the New York common council (New York, 1825); "Tales and Sketches," founded on aboriginal and Revolutionary traditions (2 vols., 1834); "Matthews and His Impositions" (1833); "Maria Monk and the Nunnery of the Hotel Dieu," which put an end to an extraordinary mania (see Monk, Maria) (1836); "Tips and Downs in the Life of a Distressed Gentleman," a satire on the fashionable follies of the day (1836); "Border Wars of the American Revolution" (1837); "Life of Joseph Brant" (1838); "Letters on Animal Magnetism" (1838); "Life of Red Jacket" (1840); new ed., with memoir of the author by his son, William L. Stone, 1849; "Poetry and History of the Shakers" (1850), and "Gertrude of Wyoming" (1841; with index, Albany, 1864); and "Unies and Miantonomoh" (1842). His only son, William Leece, author, b. in New York city, 4 April, 1835, entered Brown, but left college in 1856 and spent several months in Germany in acquiring a knowledge of the German language with a view of translating into English several of the writings of Goethe and Schiller. He was graduated at Brown, in 1859, with the degree of B. A. at Albany law-school. He practised law at Saratoga Springs during 1860-3, and in 1864-7 was city editor of the New York "Journal of Commerce." In 1870-4 he was editor and proprietor of the "Commerical Review," a paper published in the interests of American colleges and a memorial of the Saratoga monument association since its incorporation by the legislature of the state of New York in 1851, and is also one of its original trustees and incorporators. At the laying of the corner-stone of the monument on 17 Oct., 1877, the centennial of Burgoyne's surrender, he delivered the historical address, and he is the author of "The Life and Times of Sir William Johnson, Bart." ...for the surrender of the government property to the secessionists, evacuated the fort, and went to New York by steamer. He became major of the 1st cavalry on 9 May, 1861, and served in western Virginia till 13 Aug., when he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers and chief of cavalry of the Army of the Potomac. He organized the cavalry of that army and commanded during the Virginia peninsula campaign of 1862. After the evacuation of Yorktown by the Confederate troops his cavalry and artillery pursued and overtook them, and thus brought on the battle of Williamsburg, 5 May, 1862. He took command of Gen. Philip Kearny's division after the second battle of Bull Run, succeeded Gen. Samuel P. Heintzelman as commander of the 1st army corps, 15 Nov., 1862, and led it at Fredericksburg on 13 Dec. He was promoted major-general, 20 June, 1863, and on 13 April, 1862, led a cavalry corps in the raid toward Richmond from 13 April till 2 May, 1863, and commanded the 23rd corps from January till April, 1864. On the reorganization of the armies operating against Richmond by Gen. Grant, Gen. Stone- man was appointed to a cavalry corps in the Department of the Ohio, was engaged in the operations of the Atlanta campaign in May-July, 1864, and conducted a raid for the capture of Macon and Andersonville and the liberation of prisoners, but was captured at Clinton, Ga., 31 July, and held a captive till 27 Oct. He led a raid to southeastern Virginia in December, 1864, commanded the district of east Tennessee in February and March, 1865, commanded the 1st cavalry div. in March-April, 1865, and was engaged at Wytheville, the capture of Salisbury, N. C., and at Ashville. He became colonel of the 21st cavalry, 27 June, 1866, and was brevetted colonel, brigadier- and major-general for gallant conduct. He retired from the army, 16 Aug., 1871. After the war he resided in California, of which he was governor in 1883-7, having been chosen a Democrat.

STORER, William Oliver, artist, b. in Derby, Conn., 26 Sept., 1830; d. in Newport, R. I., 15 Sept., 1873. He studied with Nathaniel Jocelyn at New Haven, and in 1851 removed to New York. In 1856 he was elected an associate of the National academy, and he became an academician three years later. He gained distinctiveness in portraiture, and devoted himself entirely to that branch of art. Among his numerous portraits are those of Bishops Williams of Connecticut (1858), Littlejohn of Rhode Island (1858), and Kip of California (1861). He was a member of Captain Pansch, Chief of the Hanau Artillery during the Burgoyne Campaign (1858); "Genealogy of the Stone Family" (1857); and "Battles of the Burgoyne Campaign" (1853).

vate practice, to Sir James Y. Simpson. In 1855 he established himself in Boston and made a speciality of gynecology. For several years he served as assistant to his father while the latter lectured at Harvard, and in 1863 he was chosen to the chair of obstetrics and medical jurisprudence in Berkshire medical college, which he held for four years. To better fit himself for teaching medical jurisprudence, he attended the Harvard law-school, and was graduated in 1868. For several years he de- liberately avoided the chair of surgery, and the medical graduates upon the surgical diseases of women, refusing to admit any applicant that was not in good standing in the American medical association. These lectures were attended by physicians from all parts of the country. In 1872 his health failed and he went to Europe, where he spent five years, studying practically the fevers of southern Italy. On his return he settled in Newport, R. I., where he has since resided. While in Boston he was physician to the Boston lying-in hospital, to St. Elizabeth’s hospital, and to St. Joseph’s home, consulting surgeon to Carney general hospital, and surgeon to the New England hospital for women and children. Dr. Storer is a member of many scientific and medical societies in this country and abroad, and was one of the founders and the later president of the Gynecological society of Boston, of whose journal he was also the active editor in 1869-73. He was also in 1871 president of the Association of American medical editors. He has been a frequent attendant at the meetings of the American medical association, of which he was secretary and prize essayist in 1869 and vice-president in 1898, and in 1871, by special invitation of the California state board of health, he delivered a lecture in Sacramento on “Female Hygiene.” He was a vice-president of the gynecological section of the Ninth international congress. Dr. Storer has been a very large contributor to medical journals, and the titles of his papers exceed 250 in number. In book-form he has published, with Dr. William O. Priestley, “The Obstetric Memoirs and Contributions of Sir James Y. Simpson” (Edin- burgh, 1855; Philadelphia, 1856); “Criminal Abortion in America” (Philadelphia, 1860); “Why Not? A Book for Every Woman” (Boston, 1866); “Is it it? A Book for Every Man” (1867); with Franklin E. Heard, “Criminal Abortion: Its Nature, Its Evidence, and Its Laws” (1869); “On Nursing, with Special Reference to the Management of Sick Women” (1868); and “Southern Italy as a Health Station for Invalids” (Naples, 1875).—Another son, Francis Humphreys, chemist, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 March, 1832, entered the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1850, and there made a specialty of chemistry, studying under Dr. P. Cooke, whose assistant he was in the summer of 1851. He was appointed to Prof. Cooke’s laboratories at Cambridge and at Harvard medical school in Boston, where he also instructed a private class in chemical analysis. In 1853 he was appointed chemist to the U. S. North Pacific exploring expedition, and visited the principal islands of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. On his return he completed his course at the Law- rence scientific school and was graduated of S. B. in 1855, and then studied abroad with Bunsen in Heidelberg, Richter in Freiberg, Stockard in Tharandt, and with Emile Kopp in Paris. He returned in 1857, and was chemist to the Boston gas-light company till 1871, also opening a private laboratory as an analytical and consulting chemist. In 1865 he was appointed professor of general and industrial chemistry at the Massachusetts institute of technology, where, with Charles W. Eliot, he devoted himself to teaching chemistry in its application to the arts and as a means of mental training in general education, and to the task of organizing and perfecting a system of instructing students in large classes by the experimental method. He spent several months abroad during 1867 for the purpose of studying the chemical departments of the world’s fair in Paris and the processes actually employed in the chemical manufacture of Europe. In 1870 he was called to the chair of agricultural chemistry of Harvard, to which he has since occupied that post, and is dean of the Bussey institution. Prof. Storer received the honorary degree of A. M. from Harvard in 1870, and is a member of scientific societies at home and abroad. His papers exceed 100 in number. For some time he was American editor of the “Répertoire de chimie appliquée,” and has contributed the “Bulletin of the Bussey Institution.” In book-form he has published “Dictionary of the Solubilities of Chemical Substances” (Cambridge, 1864); with Charles W. Eliot, “Manual of Inorganic Chemistry” (New York, 1868) and “Manual of Qualitative Chemistry Analysis” (1869); “Cyclopedia of Quantitative Analysis,” in two parts (Bos- ton, 1870); and “Technical Relations with Chemistry” (2 vols., New York, 1873).—David’s cousin, George Washington, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1789; d. there, 8 Jan., 1804, entered the navy as a midshipman, 16 Jan., 1809, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 24 July, 1813. He served in the ship “Independence,” on the Mediterranean station in 1813-16, commanded the schooner “Lynx” on the New England coast and in the Gulf of Mexico in 1817, cruised in the frigates “Congress” and “Java” in the West Indies in 1818-19, and in the frigate “Constitution” in the Mediterranean in 1820-4. He was commissioned master-commandant, 24 April, 1828, and captain, 9 Feb., 1837, commanded the receiving-ship “Constellation” at Boston in 1839, the frigate “Por- tomac,” of the Brazil station, in 1840-4, the naval-yard at Portsmouth in 1843-4, and was commander-in-chief of the Brazil squadron in 1847-50. He was on leave and served as member of boards, president of the board of inquiry, and other duty in 1851-4. In 1855-7 he was governor of the naval asylum at Philadelphia. He was retired, 21 Dec., 1891, on account of age, and promoted rear-admiral on the retired list, 16 July, 1892. In 1861-2 he served on special duty in Brooklyn, after which he was unemployed for one year.

STORER, Clement, senator, b. in Kennebunk, Me., in 1769; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 21 Nov., 1830. He received an academical education, studied medicine at Portsmouth and afterward in Europe, and began practice at Portsmouth. He was a member of the army, was a member of the legislature and one year its speaker, and sat in congress from 26 Oct., 1807, till 3 March, 1809. He was then elected to the U. S. senate to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Jeremiah Mason, and served from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1819. He was high sheriff of the county of Rockingham in 1828.

STOREY, Wilbur Fisk, journalist, b. in Salisbury, Vt., 19 Dec., 1819; d. in Chicago, Ill., 29 Oct., 1884. He received a common-school education, learned the printing trade at twelve years of age, and supplemented his training by wide miscellaneous reading. He worked steadily in the office of the Middlebury “True Press” until he was seventeen years old, when he went to New York and set type on the “Journal of Commerce.” Two years later he went to La Porte, Ind., and had there his first experience in publishing a newspaper, which was unsuccessful. He kept a drugstore for some time, and edited a country weekly, and, growing tired of Indiana, went to Jackson, Mich., and studied law for two years. He next established the "Patriot" in that town, of which he was appointed postmaster under Polk's administration, whereupon he sold the paper. Having been removed by Taylor in 1849, he set up another drugstore, which was chosen the year following, and, becoming the "Pendleton Democrat," and subsequently appointed state-prison inspector. In 1853 he removed to Detroit, bought an interest in the "Free Press," and ere long rose to be its editor and sole owner. He went to Chicago in 1861 and purchased the "Times," which then had a very small circulation. His energy, enterprise, and fearless expression of his views on every subject gave the paper notoriety. No man in the northwest has done so much as he both to benefit and injure journalism. Without faith in any one, as a consequence no one placed faith in him. He was independent in an extreme and unwholesome sense, boasting that he had no friends and wanted none, and apparently doing his utmost to create enemies. His publishing enterprise, which was born with a new idea of what constitutes news being frequently morbid and indecorous. He was daring to a degree of recklessness and repulsive cynicism, but his course yielded him a large fortune. About 1877 his health began to fail, and he went abroad. In the summer of 1878 he had a paralytic stroke, and was brought home. He was adjudged of unsound mind in 1884, and a conservator of his estate was appointed by the courts.

STORK, Charles Augustus Gottlieb, clergyman, b. in Helmstädt, duchy of Brunswick, Germany, 16 June, 1764; d. in Salisbury, N. C., 27 March, 1831. The family name was originally Storch. He received his classical and theological education in the University of Helmstädt, in 1785 became a private tutor, and in 1788 accepted a call as pastor and missionary among Lutherans in North Carolina. He was examined and ordained to the ministry, and arrived in Baltimore, Md., in June. Immediately after his arrival he took charge of congregations in Cabarrus county, N. C., where he remained until he retired from the active duties of his profession. He was a diligent and hospitable minister of the church. When, on 2 May, 1803, the synod of North Carolina was organized, he was elected the first president, and he was annually re-elected whenever he could be present. During the latter part of his life he removed to a farm ten miles south of Salisbury, where he spent the remainder of his days. He was a man of learning and piety, and had the reputation of being a supine linguist. See "The Stork Family in the Lutheran Church," by John G. Morris, D. D. (Philadelphia, 1886).—His son, Theophilus, clergyman, b. near Salisbury, N. C., in August, 1814; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 March, 1874, was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1833, and at the theological seminary in 1837. In the same year he was licensed to preach by the synod of Maryland, and assumed pastoral charge of the Lutheran congregation at Winchester, Va., where he remained until 1841. In the latter year he removed to Philadelphia as pastor of St. Matthew's congregation, the second English Lutheran congregation in the city. In 1849 he was one of the leaders in the movement that resulted in the organization of the East Pennsylvania synod. In 1850 he resigned as pastor of St. Matthew's congregation and organized St. Mark's congregation, building a new church. In 1858 he accepted the presidency of Newberry college, S. C., but in 1860 he removed to Baltimore, Md., as pastor of a new congregation. Here he remained until 1865, when he retired on account of failing health. For the next few years, until 1871, he was engaged in pastoral and editorial duties in Philadelphia, as well as in literary pursuits. In 1851 he received the degree of D. B. from Pennsylvania college. He was re-elected at Baltimore, Md., as pastor of a new congregation. Among his published works are "Life of Martin Luther and the Reformation in Germany," edited with introduction (Philadelphia, 1854); "The Children of the New Testament" (1854); "Luther's Christmas-Tree" (1855); "Jesus in the Temple, or the Model of Youth" (1856); "Home Scenes in the New Testament" (1857); "Luther at Home" (1857); "The Unseen World in the Light of the Cross" (1857); "Luther and the Bible" (1873); "Afternoon" (1874); and "Sermons," edited by his sons (1876).—Theophilus's son, Charles Augustus, clergyman, b. near Jefferson, Frederick co., Md., 4 Sept., 1868; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Dec., 1885. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, where his room-mate was James A. Garfield. Studied at Andover theological seminary, and was professor of Greek in Newberry college, S. C., in 1879-80. In 1881 he was ordained to the ministry. He was pastor of St. James's Lutheran congregation in Philadelphia for a few months in 1861, of St. Mark's congregation in Baltimore, Md., 1862-81, and professor of theology at his own seminary, and chairman of the faculty from 1881 until his death. In 1874 he received the degree of D. D. from Pennsylvania college. He published numerous articles in periodicals, and was for a time co-editor of the "Lutheran Missionary Journal" and the "Lutheran Observer" in Philadelphia. Some of his fugitive writings have been collected in a posthumous work entitled "Light on the Pilgrim's Way," edited by his brother, Theophilus B. Stork (Philadelphia, 1885).

STORRS, Emery Alexander, lawyer, b. in Hinsdale, Cattaraugus co., N. Y., 12 Aug., 1835; d. in Ottawa, Ill., 12 Sept., 1883. He first studied law with his father, and then went to Buffalo, where he was admitted to the bar. He was admitted to the bar. In 1857 he went to New York, remaining there for two years. He then settled in Chicago, and soon took a prominent place among the lawyers of the county. As an orator he had few superiors. Politically a Republican, he devoted his great talents to that party, taking an active part in the presidential campaigns of the last century. In 1866, 1872, and 1880 he was a delegate-at-large from Illinois to the National Republican convention, being on each occasion one of the foremost in shaping the policy and formulating the platform of his party. His friends urged his appointment as attorney-general under the administrations of Hayes and Arthur, but without success. A few months before his death he accepted a large retainer to defend the Mormons in the U. S. courts of Utah.

STORRS, Henry Randolph, b. in Middletown, Conn., 3 Sept., 1877; d. in New Haven, Conn., 29 July, 1897. He was graduated at Yale in 1894, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1897, and practised at Champion, Whitestone, and Ursa, N. Y., serving for five years as justice of Ogle county. He was elected to congress as a Federalist from Utah, and served with re-elections from 6
Dec., 1819, till 3 March, 1831, except during the 17th congress. Mr. Storrs was a member of the New York city bar and attained a high rank at the bar.

He was possessed of uncommon powers of discrimination, great logical exactness, and a ready and powerful elocution, and as a debater in congress was in the first rank. Several of his speeches have been published.—His brother, William Lucius, jurist, b. in Middletown, Conn., 25 March, 1795; d. in Hartford, Conn., 25 June, 1861, was graduated at Yale in 1818, and then studied law in Whiting, N. Y. In 1817 he was admitted to the bar, but soon returned to his native city and there followed his profession. He was elected to the state assembly in 1827–9 and 1834, and was speaker during the last term. In 1829 he was chosen to congress as a Whig and served from Dec. 18, 1829, till 3 March, 1833, and again from 2 Dec. 1833, till June, 1840, when he resigned to accept the appointment of associate judge of the court of errors, and in 1837 was appointed chief justice. He held the professorship of law in Yale during 1846–7, and the degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Western Reserve in 1846. His decisions, which are regarded as exceedingly able, are published in the "Connecticut Reports."

STORRS, Richard Salter, clergyman, b. in Long Meadow, Mass., 6 Feb., 1817; d. in Braintree, Mass., 11 Aug., 1873. His grandfather, John, served as a chaplain in the Revolution, and his father, Richard Salter, was pastor of the Congregational church at Long Meadow, Mass. The son received his early education at home and entered Yale in 1832, but, his health failing, he taught in the Clinton academy in East Hampton, L. I., where he had been invited to take the Lyman Beecher. Meanwhile he continued his studies, and, entering the senior class, was graduated at Williams in 1837. He then returned to Long Island and studied theology under Rev. Aaron Woolworth in Bridgehampton. A year later he was licensed by the Suffolk presbytery and had charge of the parishes of Lisip and Smithtown, but soon resigned this work and entered Andover theological seminary, where he graduated in 1810. He was then ordained pastor of the 1st Congregational church of Braintree, which charge he retained until his death, except during an interval of five years, when he was engaged in the service of the Home missionary society of Massachusetts. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Williams in 1838, and by Amherst in the same year. During 1817–25 he was editor of the "Boston Recorder," and he was senior associate editor of the "Congregationalist" in 1850–6. Dr. Storrs was also a contributor to the "Pulpit," the "Home Monthly," and other periodicals, and in addition to about twenty sermons, published "Memoir of Rev. Dr. Samuel Beecher, of Boston," "Life of Dr. D. B. Salter," Letters of Rev. Daniel Temple" (New York, 1853), and edited "Williston's Sacramental Meditations" (Boston, 1857).—His brother, Charles Backus, clergyman, b. in Long Meadow, Mass., 15 May, 1794; d. in Braintree, Mass., 35 Sept., 1833, was educated at Munson academy and at Princeton, but left college at the close of his junior year on account of ill health. He was president of Bridgehampton, L. I., and was licensed to preach by the Long Island presbytery in 1818. For a year he had charge of two small churches on Long Island, but, his health failing, he returned to his father's home. On his recovery he was graduated at Andover theological seminary in 1820, and was ordained as an evangelist by the Charleston Congregational association on 2 Feb., 1821. For two years he labored as a missionary in South Carolina and Georgia, when his health again failed him. In 1823 he gathered a church at Ravena, Ohio, and continued there for six years. He then accepted the professorship of theology in Western Reserve college, and in 1831 was inaugurated president of that institution, which place he held until his death. He published an address on his induction into the presidency.

—Richard Salter's son, Richard Salter, clergyman, b. in Long Meadow, Mass., 1 Aug., 1831, was graduated at Amherst in 1853, and, after teaching in Monson academy and Williston seminary, studied law under Rufus Choate. Turning his attention to theology in 1842, he was graduated at Andover seminary in 1845, and ordained on 22 Oct. of that year in Brooklyn, Mass., where he had been called to the charge of the Harvard Congregational church. In 1846 he accepted the pastorate of the newly organized Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn, where he has since remained. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Union college in 1853 and by Harvard in 1859, that of LL. D. by Princeton in 1874, and that of L. H. D. by Columbia in 1887. In 1855 he delivered the Graham lectures, before the Brooklyn institute, "On the Wisdom and Goodness of God," his subject being "The Constitution of the Human Soul," and in 1879 he delivered the J. P. Stone lectures at Princeton theological seminary. He also gave the lectures on "Preaching without Notes," at the Union theological seminary, in New York, in 1875, and those on the "Divine Origin of Christianity," in the same institution, in 1881, which were repeated before the Lowell institute in Boston. Dr. Storrs has attained reputation as one of the most eloquent pulpit orators in the United States. In 1873 he made an address on the "Appeal of Romans to educated Protestants," before the National educational alliance. He is well known for his historical studies, and has delivered frequent addresses on public occasions. In 1875 he made the address before the New York historical society on its seventieth anniversary, in 1876 the centennial oration in New York city, and in 1881 the B. B. K oration at Harvard. Dr. Storrs was elected a trustee of Amherst in 1863, and since 1873 has been one of the trustees of the Long Island historical society. In 1887 he was chosen president of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. He was one of the editors of "The Independent" from 1848 till 1861, and, in addition to numerous articles in periodicals, prepared a "Report on the Revised Edition of the English Version of the Bible," which published works further include "The Constitution of the Human Soul" (1856); "Conditions of Success in Preaching without Notes" (1875); "Early American Spirit and the Genesis of It" (1873); "Declaration of Independence, and the Effects of it" (1876); "John Wycliffe and the First English Bible" (1880); "Recognition of the Supernatural in Letters and in Life" (1881); "Manliness in the Scholar" (1883); "The Divine Origin of Christianity indicated by its Historical Effects" (1884); "The Prospective Advance of Christian Missions" (1885); "Forty Years of Pastoral Life" (Brooklyn, 1886); and "The Broader Range and Outlook of the Modern College Training" (1887).

STORY, George Henry, artist, b. in New Haven, Conn., 23 Jan., 1835. When he was fifteen years of age he apprenticed himself to a wood-carver for three years. At the expiration of this term he was a pupil under Charles Hine for three years. He then studied in Europe for one year, after which he went to Portland, Me., where, in 1859, he gained the state medal. He painted for two years in Washington, D. C., then one year in Cuba, and since then has resided in New York. In 1873 he was elected an associate of the National Academy. His portraits include those of Salmon P. Chase, Howell Cobb, Whitelaw Reid, and Gov. Partino and family, of Cuba. Among his genre pieces are "The Testy Old Squire"; "The Fishermen"; "Sunday Morning," "Clock-Tinkers," and "Twenty Thousand Majority."

STORY, Joseph, jurist, b. in Marblehead, Mass., 18 Sept., 1779; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 10 Sept., 1845. His father, Dr. Elisha Story, was one of the "Demon tea-party," and substitute of a surgeon in the Revolutionary army. In his boyhood the son manifested unusual powers of observation and an intense craving for knowledge. In 1798 he was graduated at Harvard, delivering the poem at the commencement exercises, and, choosing the law for his profession, studied under Samuel Sewall and Samuel Putnam. In 1801 he began practice in Salem, and prepared and published a "Selection of Pleadings in Civil Actions" (Salem, 1805). He published also "The Power of Solitude, with Fugitive Poems" (1804), a literary venture which he afterward deeply regretted. Becoming interested in feudalism, he made a profound study of the old black-letter law of England, and mastered the intricate and technical rules which govern the law of real property. Rising rapidly to eminence, he was soon retained in important cases, and took rank with the leaders of the New England bar. In 1805 he was elected a representative of Salem in the legislature, where he was a vigorous and accomplished debater, and became the acknowledged leader of the Republican party. Though Democratic in his political views, he was never a slave to party, and on questions of national politics was of the school of Washington and Marshall. In 1808, in opposition to Christopher Gore, then at the zenith of his fame, Story defended the embargo in the only measure short of a declaration of war which the administration could have adopted without submitting to ignominious restrictions on American commerce by the belligerent powers. In the same year he was elected a representative to congress, where, in opposition to the embargo, he labored to procure a repeal of the embargo, on the ground that it was expedient only as a temporary, not as a permanent, measure, and that its continuance would be disastrous to New England. When the embargo was finally repealed, President Jefferson attributed that result to Story, whom he styled "a pseudo-Republican." Another measure that Story advocated in opposition to the administration was an increase of the navy.

On his return home, he was re-elected to the Massachusetts house of representatives, and in 1811 became its speaker. In November of the same year, at the early age of thirty-two, Story was appointed by President Madison an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. His circuit embraced four states—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island—and his judicial duties were onerous in the extreme. Among the questions that came before him for adjudication were curious and perplexing ones of admiralty law, of the law of salvage, and of marine insurance, also of prize law, the principles of all which, now clearly defined, were then unsettled and imperfectly understood. Of the law relating to these subjects, and of the patent law, he was in a great measure the creator. He also divided with Chancellor Kent the honor of having founded the American system of equity jurisprudence and the precedents that it established. This work was still carried on in the ports of New England, so vehemently in his charges to the grand juries that he greatly contributed to its extinction. Though denounced by the press as deserving to "be hurled from the bench," he redeemed the charge, and in the case of "La jeune Eugenie," branded the traffic in a masterly judgment as a violation of the sacred rights of nations, when, one year he gave his opinion in the celebrated Dartmouth college case, which is one of his best. When the Missouri compromise was agitating the country his feeling on the subject was so strong that he took part in a public meeting at Salem to protest against that measure. In 1830 he made, in the convention called to revise the constitution of Massachusetts, a powerful and brilliant speech, the best, he afterward thought, that he ever made, in opposition to a motion that the legislature should have authority to diminish the salaries of the judges of the supreme court. In 1829, when Nathan Dane founded a professorship of law at Harvard, he was elected to fill it, in accordance with the stipulation of its founder, and delivered an able and polished inaugural discourse. He naturally returned to Cambridge, where he resided for the rest of his life. The school, hitherto unsuccessful, now attracted students from all parts of the land. The number rose from one, the only student in attendance the year before, to thirty, to one hundred and twenty in 1842. and to one hundred and fifty-six in 1844. The annual salary that Story received during his professional life was $1,000. As a teacher of law Judge Story has had few if any equals. His vast acquirement, extraordinary fluency, sympathy with learners, and personal magnetism, eminently fitted him for that office. His familiar bearing toward "the boys," as he called the students, his frankness and abandon, his bubbling humor, his merry confidence, his impartiality, his originality, his love of incident and anecdote, with which he gave piquancy and zest to the driest themes, won for him not only the attention but the love of his pupils, whose professional careers, after they left the school, he watched with fatherly interest. He conducted his lectures as conversational exercises, and the text-books were taught by the method of reading and question from the book. He delivered the moot-courts in the library. His manner when lecturing was that of an enthusiast rather than that of a professional teacher.
in 1831 Judge Story was offered the chief justiceship of Massachusetts, but he declined. After the death of Chief Justice Marshall, being the senior member by appointment, he presided over the deliberations of his associates until the confirmation of Chief Justice Taney. It had been the wish of Marshall that Story should succeed him, but he was unwilling to accept the responsibility. His health was suffering from the overtaxing of his energies in his judicial duties, and he had been laboring under a serious illness. During the illness of Taney in 1844 he again filled the chief justice's place for a few months. Judge Story had nearly completed his preparations for retiring from the bench and devoting his energies exclusively to the law-school, when he was stricken with a fatal illness. In 1818 he was elected an overseer of Harvard, and that university conferred on him the degree of LL. D. in 1821; while Brown similarly honored him in 1815, and Dartmouth in 1824. For many years he was president of the Merchants' bank in Salem, and in 1842 he was active in establishing the alumni association of Harvard, of which he became vice-president. Though for thirty-three years a laborious judge of the supreme court of his state, and over thirty years in the discharge of the duties of his life an eminently successful teacher of law, Story gave to the world more text-books on jurisprudence than any other writer of his time. The list comprises his "Commentaries on the Law of Bailments" (Cambridge, 1832); "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States," a work remarkable alike for its depth of research, vivid historical sketches, and treasures of political wisdom (3 vols., 1833); "Commentaries on the Conflict of Laws," his ablest and most original work (Boston, 1834); "Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence," the first logical and systematic discussion of that subject (2 vols., 1835-6); "Equity Pleadings" (1838); "Law of Agency" (1839); "Law of Partnership" (1841); "Law of Bills of Exchange" (1843); and "Law of Promissory Notes" (1845). He also edited "Chitty on Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes" (Boston, 1899); "Abbot on Shipping" (1810); and "Laws on Assumpsit" (1811), with notes of American statutes and cases. All of these works have passed through many editions, and are recognized not only by British judges, but on the continent, where they have been translated into the Latin, German, and French languages, as the highest authority. Edward Everett writes: "For an American judge to be daily cited in the British courts from the highest of all, the court of parliament, down, and to have his books alluded to as the proof that certain branches of jurisprudence, and these the nobler ones, are more extensively and successfully cultivated in America than in England, may well be regarded as an offset for the taunts of tourists and reviewers." Story's decisions as a circuit-court judge are contained in thirteen octavo volumes, being the reports of Cranch, Wheaton, Peters, and Howard, from 1811 to 1845. The reports of the supreme court during his judicial life fill thirty-five volumes, of which his judicial opinions, remarkable alike for their compact logic, luminous cleanness of wealth of learning, and fulness of illustration, form a large part. The notes he contributed to Wheaton's reports fill 184 closely printed pages. Besides all these legal labors, he delivered many discourses on literary and other themes, wrote numerous biographical sketches of his contemporaries, and contributed elaborate parts, of which he was not in sympathy with the "American Jurist." He also wrote for his friend Dr. Lieber's "Encyclopædia Americana" articles filling 120 pages, prepared reports on codification, etc., and drafted some of the most important acts of congress. He left an unpublished "Digest of Law" in three manuscript folio volumes, which is in the Harvard law library. The secret of these colossal achievements was ceaseless, systematic industry, an extraordinary memory equally tenacious of principles and of cases, frequent change of labor, and concentration of mind. He economized odd moments, changed his work when weary, and wrought with all the force of his intellect. Judge Story had fine collegial powers, which manifested themselves not in wit or epigram, but in a continuous flow of genial and sparkling remark. His favorite English poets were Pope and Gray; his favorite Latin poet was Virgil, of whose works, when travelling, he always carried with him a well-thumbed pocket edition. A collection of his "Miscellaneous Writings" was published during his life-time (1835), and an enlarged edition, edited by his son, William W. Story, appeared after his death (2 vols., Boston, 1851). See also "Life and Letters of Joseph Story," by William W. Story (2 vols., 1851). A selection from his decisions, entitled "Notes on the Principle and Practice of Prize Courts," was edited by E. T. Pratt (London, 1854).

His son, William Wetmore, artist, b. in Salem, Mass., 12 Feb., 1819; d. in Vallambrosa, Italy, 7 Oct., 1893, was graduated at Harvard in 1838, and studied law under his father's direction. He was admitted to the bar, and devoted his attention largely to the preparation of the "Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Circuit Court of the United States for the First Circuit" (3 vols., Boston, 1842-7); "Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal" (1844); and "Treatise on the Law of Sales of Personal Property" (1847). At the same time he was frequently contributing a half-page of prose and verse to the "Boston Miscellany" and other periodicals. Mr. Story was the poet of his class, and in 1844 delivered the B P K poem at Harvard on "Nature and Art," in which he indicated the tastes which were to govern his future life. His first volume of "Poems" was published in 1847, and in 1856 he delivered a poem at the dedication of the statue of Beethoven at the Boston music-hall. In 1848 his fondness for art led to his going to Italy, where he had since resided, devoting his attention chiefly to sculpture. His statue of his father in the chapel of Mount Auburn cemetery, of Edward Everett in the Boston public garden, busts of James Russell Lowell, Theodore Parker, and Josiah Quincy, are well-known examples of his work, and he modeled a bronze statue of George Peabody, which was erected in London in 1869, and a replica of which was presented in 1888 to the city of Baltimore through the liberality of Robert Garrett. He was a U. S. commissioner on fine arts to the World's fair at Paris in 1879, and had received decorations from France and Italy. Mr. Story held a professorship in the University of the Natio-
STOUGHTON, Edwin Henry, soldier, b. in Springfield, Vt., 28 June, 1838; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 Dec., 1888, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1859, and assigned to the 6th infantry. During 1859-60 he served in garrison at Fort Columbus, N. Y., and on scouting duty in the western territories, but he resigned on 4 March, 1861, from the regular army. In September he was commissioned colonel of the 4th Vermont volunteers, and with his regiment joined the Army of the Potomac. He served during the insular campaign, and was engaged in the siege of Yorktown, the action at Lee's Mill, the battles of Williamsburg and Savage Station, and the operations before Richmond. His services gained for him promotion to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers on 3 Nov., 1862, and he was assigned to the command of the 2d Vermont brigade, covering the defences of Washington. While stationed at Fairfax Court-House, Va., he was captured by Gen. John S. Mosby on 8 March, 1863, but, after confinement for several weeks in Libby prison, he was released. His commission had expired by constitutional limitations four days before his capture. Gen. Stoughton then resigned from the army and entered the practice of law in New York city, but failing health compelled his removal to Boston, where he died.

STOUGHTON, Israel, settler, b. in England; d. in Lincoln, England, in 1645. He emigrated to Massachusetts and early settled in Dorchester. In November, 1663, he was admitted as a Freeman, and he was a member of the first general court, which convened on 9 March, 1634, and continued to sit there till 1666. He was pronounced disabled from holding office for three years in consequence of the publication of a pamphlet in which he denied to the governor and his assistants certain of the powers that they claimed, but in 1636 he was restored to his privileges. In May, 1637, he commanded the Massachusetts troops that were sent against the Pequots, and in 1642 he became captain of the artillery company. He was appointed a commissioner to administer the government of New Hampshire in 1641, and was assistant to the governor of Massachusetts in 1637-42 and 1644. In 1642 he went to England, but he returned in 1644 as lieutenant-colonel of Gen. William Hainsborough's regiment, in which command he served until his death. He was also a commissioner of the island, and in 1650 he gave 300 acres to Harvard college.—His son, William, governor of Massachusetts, b. in England, 30 May, 1632; d. in Dorchester, Mass., 7 July, 1701, was graduated at Harvard in 1650, after studying theology went to England, where he became a fellow at New college, Oxford, but was ejected from that office in 1656, and served in the army. He returned to New England in 1662, and acquired a high reputation as a preacher. In 1688 he was appointed to deliver the annual election sermon, and it was pronounced one of the best that had been heard upon such an occasion. He declined all invitations of settlement as a pastor, but served as an assistant from 1671 till the dissolution of the government in 1685. He was appointed to represent New England as agent for the colony. In 1680 he was re-elected assistant, but refused to serve, occupying, however, the office of chief justice from July to December, 1686. He also became a member of the council of Gov. Edmund Andros, which office he held until April, 1689, when he was one of the council of safety that took over the government from that officer. In May, 1692, he was appointed lieutenant-governor, which place he held until the end of his life, and at the time of the death of Sir William Phips became acting governor. He was appointed chief justice of the superior court of the colony on 22 Dec., 1622, and held that office during the witchcraft trials. When other authorities acknowledged that they had been deluded, he persistently contended that he had acted up to his best judgment.

Purcell Stoughton is spoken of as a "rich and attribularexious bachelor," although he gave to Harvard property that cost £1,000, and by his will made a bequest of land to the college. In 1698 the first Stoughton Hall was built, which gave place to a new edifice in 1895, that still preserves the memory of his gift. Gov. Stoughton also gave liberally to the churches of Dorchester and Milton and to the poor people of his own town.

STOUGHTON, William Lewis, lawyer, b. in New York, 20 March, 1827; d. in Sturges, Mich., 6 June, 1888. He early removed to Sturges, Mich., and, after being admitted to the bar in 1851, he settled in the practice of his profession. In 1854 he was elected prosecuting attorney of Calhoun county, and in 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln U. S. district attorney for Michigan. This office he resigned in the beginning of the civil war, and entered the 11th Michigan volunteers, in which he became lieutenant-colonel. His services were principally in the west, and at Stone River he attained his colonelcy and commanded a brigade in Gen. George H. Thomas's corps at Chickamauga. At Resecon Ridge, Resaca, New Hope Church, Ruff's Station (where, while directing the fire of a battery, he lost a limb), and Atlanta. He continued with his regiment until wounded, and on 13 March, 1865, he received the brevets of brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers. In 1866 he was elected attorney-general of Michigan; then he was chosen as a Republican to congress, and served, with re-election, from 4 March, 1869, till 3 March, 1873. Subsequently he retired to Sturges.

STOW, Baron, clergyman, b. in Croydon, N. H., 16 June, 1801; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 Dec., 1889. He was graduated at Columbian college, Georgetown, D. C., in 1825, and in 1827 was ordained to the ministry in Portsmouth, N. H., where he was settled as pastor of the Baptist church. In 1832 he was called to the pastorate of the Baldwin place Baptist church in Boston, in which connection he had a successful ministry of sixteen years. At the close of this term of service he became pastor of the Rowe street (now Clarendon avenue) church, and continued in this relation until 1867, when he retired from regular church duties, and to study the Bible. He twice visited Europe for the benefit of his health. Dr. Stow performed a large amount of work as a member of the executive committee of the American missionary union. He was a graceful and vigorous writer, as well as one of the most eloquent and successful preachers of his denomination. He was one of the compilers of the "Psalms, an hymnal" (1849), and editor of "Daily Manna" and the "Missionary Enterprise" (1846), a volume of sermons on missions, to which he contributed one of great merit. He was also author of "Our Harriet Dow" (Boston, 1832); "History of the Baptist Mission to India" (1833); "History of the Danish Mission on the Coast of Coromandel" (1837); "Daily Manna" (1842); "The Whole Family in Heaven and Earth" (1845); "Christian Brotherhood" (1859); and "First Things" (1859).

STOWE, Calvin Ellis, clergyman, b. in Natick, Mass., 6 April, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., 22 Aug., 1886. His ancestors came from London to Boston in 1634. Mr. Stowe was a lad of six years when his father died, leaving a widow and two boys to struggle with poverty, and at the age of twelve he was apprenticed to a paper-maker. He was early distinguished for his insatiable craving for books, and acquired the rudiments of Latin by studying at odd moments during his apprenticeship in the paper-mill. His earnest desire and determined efforts to gain an education attracted the attention of benevolent people, who resolved to assist him, and in November, 1820, he was sent to the academy in Gorham, Me. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1824, remained there one year as librarian and instructor, and in September, 1825, entered the theological seminary at Andover, Mass. In the seminary, on the instigation of Prof. Moses Stuart, he completed a scholarly translation of Jahn's "Hebrew Commonwealth" (Andover, 1828; 2 vols., London, 1829). In 1828 he was graduated, and in the following year he became editor of the Boston "Recorder," the oldest religious paper in the United States. In addition to his editorial labors, he published a translation from the Latin, "Ovid's Fasti," in 1828, and "Lyric and Narrative Poetry of the Hebrews" (1829). In 1830 he was appointed professor of Greek in Dartmouth, and he married in 1832 Eliza, daughter of Rev. Bennett Tyler, of Portland, Me. The same year he removed to Walnut Hills, near Cincinnati, Ohio, having been called to the chair of sacred literature in Lane theological seminary. In August, 1834, his wife died, and in August, 1835, he married Harriet Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Lyman Beecher, the president of the seminary. Prof. Stowe became convinced by his experience as an instructor that the great need of the west at that time was an efficient common-school system, and, without neglecting his professional duties, he devoted himself heart and soul to this work. In May, 1836, he sailed for England, primarily to purchase a library for Lane seminary, but he received at the same time an official appointment from the state legislature to visit as agent the public schools of Europe, particularly those of Prussia. On his return he published his "Report on Elementary Education in Europe." In 1850 Prof. Stowe accepted a professorship at Bowdoin, and in 1852 he was appointed to fill the chair of sacred literature at Andover seminary. In 1853 and 1856 he visited Europe with Mrs. Stowe. In 1864, owing to failing health and increasing infirmities, he resigned his professorship and removed to Hartford, Conn. Besides the works mentioned above, he published "Introduction to the Criticism of the Hebrew Text of the Bible" (1834); "The Religious Element in Education," a lecture (1844): "The Right Interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures," inaugural address (Andover, 1853); and "Origin and History of the Books of the Bible, both Canonical and Apocryphal" (Hartford, 1867).

--His wife, Harriet Elizabeth Beecher, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 14 June, 1812; d. in Hartford, 1
July, 1896. She was the third daughter of Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher. When she was a mere child Mrs. Beecher died, yet she never ceased to influence the lives of her children. Mrs. Stowe wrote:

"Although my mother's bodily presence disappeared from our circle, I think that her memory and example had more influence in moulding her family than the living presence of many mothers."

After her death, Mrs. Stowe was placed under the care of her granddaughter at Guilford, Conn. Here she listened, with untiring interest, to the ballads of Sir Walter Scott and the poems of Robert Burns. The "Arabian Nights," also, was to her a dream of delight—an enchanted palace, through which her imagination ran wild. After her father's second marriage, her education was continued at Litchfield academy under the charge of Sarah Pierce and John Brace. Of Mr. Brace and his methods of instruction Mrs. Stowe ever spoke with the greatest enthusiasm. "Mr. Brace excelled all teachers that I ever knew in the faculty of teaching composition," she wrote. "Much of the inspiration and training of my early days consisted in these things: I was supposed to be studying, but in hearing, while seated unnoticed at my desk, the conversational style of Mr. Brace, with the older and wiser men. Nor indeed were the influences in her home less stimulating to the intellect. Dr. Beecher, like the majority of the Calvinistic divines of his day, had his system of theology vast and comprehensive enough to embrace the fate of men and angels, and to fathom the counsels of the Infinite. His mind was kept in a state of intense and jocous intellectual activity by constantly elaborating and defending his system. Consequently his children grew up in an atmosphere surcharged with mental and moral enthusiasm. There was no trace of morbid melancholy or ascetic gloom in Dr. Beecher. He was sound in body, sound in mind, and the religious influence which he exerted on the minds of his children was healthy and cheerful. Under such circumstances it is not surprising to find a bright and thoughtful child of twelve years writing a school composition on the profound theme "Can the Immortality of the Soul be proved from the Light of Nature?"

The writer took the negative side of the question, and argued with such power and originality that Dr. Beecher, when it was read in his presence, not knowing the author asked with emphasis, "Who wrote that?" "Your daughter, sir," quickly answered Mr. Brace. Said Mrs. Stowe, speaking of this event: "It was the proudest moment of my life. There was no mistaking father's face when he was pleased, and to have interested him was past all juvenile triumphs.

Dr. Beecher read with enthusiasm, and encouraged his children to read. Both Byron and Scott, when nine or ten years of age, Mrs. Stowe was deeply impressed by reading Byron's "Corsair." "I shall never forget how it electrified and thrilled me," she wrote, "I went home absorbed and wondering about Byron, and after that listened to everything that father and mother said at table about him." Byron's death made an enduring, but at the same time solemn and painful, impression on her mind. She was eleven years old at the time, and usually did not understand her father's sermons, but the one that he preached on this occasion she remembered perfectly, and it had had a deep and lasting influence on her life. At the time of the Missouri agitation Dr. Beecher's sermons and prayers were burdened with the anguish of his soul for the cause of the slave. His passionate appeals drew tears down the hardest faces of the old farmers who listened to them. Night and morning, in family devotions, he appealed to heaven for mercy, and prayed that time of deliverance might come. The effect of such sermons and prayers on the mind of an imaginative and sensitive child can be easily conceived. They tended to make her, what she had been from earliest childhood, the enemy of all slavery. In 1851, when thirteen years of age, Mrs. Stowe went to Hartford to attend the school that had been established there by her eldest sister, Catherine. Here she studied Latin, read Ovid and Virgil, and wrote metrical translations of the former, which displayed a very respectable knowledge of Latin, a good command of English, with considerable skill in versification. At the age of fourteen she taught with success a class in "Butler's Analogy," and gained a good reading knowledge of French. As scholar and teacher she remained with her sister in Hartford till the autumn of 1852, when both removed with their father to Cincinnati, Ohio, where Dr. Beecher assumed the presidency of Lane theological seminary and the pastorate of the 2d Presbyterian church. At this time Mrs. Stowe compiled an elementary geography for a women's club in Cincinnati, and again engaged in teaching with her sister in Cincinnati. She wrote lectures for her classes in history, and, as a member of a literary club, called the Semi-Colon, humorous sketches and poems.

In January, 1836, she married Mr. Stowe. During her residence in Cincinnati she frequently visited the anti-slavery states, and the agitation of the knowledge of southern life that was so conspicuously displayed in her subsequent writings. Fugitive slaves were frequently sheltered in her house, and assisted by her husband and brothers to escape to Canada. During the riots in 1836, when James G. Birney's press was destroyed and free negroes were hunted like wild beasts through the streets of Cincinnati, the only distance from the city and the depths of mud saved Lane seminary and the Yankee Abolitionists at Walnut Hills from a like fate. Many a night Mrs. Stowe sank into uneasy slumber, expecting to be roused by the howlings of an angry mob, led by the agents of exasperated and desperate slave-holders. In 1849 Mrs. Stowe published "The Mayflower and the Descendants of the Pilgrims" (New York; new ed., with additions, Boston, 1855), being a collection of papers which she had from time to time contributed to various periodicals. In 1850 she removed with her husband and family to Brunswick, Me., where the former had just been called to a professorship in Bowdoin. It was at the height of the excitement caused by the passage of the fugitive-slate law. It seemed to her as if slavery were about to extend itself over the free states. She conversed with many benevolent, tender-hearted, Christian men and women, who were blind and deaf to all arguments against it, and she concluded that it was because they did not realize what slavery really meant. She determined, if possible, to make them realize it, and, as a result of this determination, wrote "Uncle Tom's Cabin, or Life among the Lowly." In the mean time Prof. Stowe was appointed to the chair of biblical literature in the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., and removed thither with his family about the time that this remarkable book was published. Neither Mrs. Stowe nor any of her friends had the least conception of the future that awaited her book. She was herself very despondent. It does not appear that she had been very widely read, or that the book even appeared in the "National Era," at Washington, D. C., from June, 1851, till April, 1852, before it was issued in book-form (Boston, 1852). Mrs. Stowe says: "It seemed to me that there was no hope; that nobody would hear; that nobody would read, nobody would pity; that this frightful system which had pursued its victims into the free states might at last threaten them even in Canada." Nevertheless, nearly 500,000 copies of this work were sold in the United States alone in the five years following its publication. It has been translated into Armenian, Bohemian, Danish, Dutch, Finnish, French, German, Hungarian, Illyrian, Polish, Portuguese, modern Greek, Russian, Servian, Spanish, Swedish, Wallachian, Welsh, and other languages. A large and valuable collection of portraits and other documents relating to her life and works is by her own direction now in the British museum in London, together with the most extensive collection of the literature of this book. In reply to the abuse and recrimination that its publication called forth, Mrs. Stowe published, in 1853, "A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, presenting the Original Facts and Documents upon which the Story is founded, together with Corroborative Statements verifying the Truth of the Work." She also wrote "A Peep into Uncle Tom's Cabin, for Children" (1853). The story has been dramatized in various forms: once by the author as "The Christian Slave; a Drama" (1855). The character of Uncle Tom was suggested by the life of Josiah Henson (q. v.).

So reduced was Mrs. Stowe's health by her severe and protracted labors that complete rest and change of scene became necessary. Consequently, in the spring of 1853, accompanied by her husband and brother, the Rev. Charles Beecher, she sailed for England. In the following year appeared "Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands," a collection of letters of Mrs. Stowe and her brother during their travels in Europe: 2 vol. Boston, 1854). In 1856 she published "Dred, a Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp." The same book was re-issued, in 1866, under the title "Nina Gordon," but has now been again issued under the original title. About this time Mrs. Stowe made a second visit to England, and an extended tour of the continent. In the judgment of some critics, by far the most interesting visit ever made from Mrs. Stowe's pen, in a purely literary and critical view, was that of "Minister's Wooing" (New York, 1839). It was first given to the public as a serial in the "Atlantic Monthly," and James Russell Lowell said of it: "We do not believe that there is any one who, by birth, breeding, and natural capacity, has had the opportunity to know New England so well and intimate acquaintance with all its prof and non-profit by the knowledge. Already there have been scenes in the Minister's Wooing that, in their lowness of tone and quiet truth, contrast as charm-ingly with the timid vagueness of the modern school of novel-writers as the "Vieir of Wake- field" itself; and we are greatly mistaken if it do not prove to be the most characteristic of Mrs. Stowe's works, and that on which her fame will chiefly rest with posterity." Mrs. Stowe received letters containing similar expressions of commendation from William E. Gladstone, Charles Kingsley, and Bishop Whately.

In 1864 Prof. Stowe resigned his professorship at Andover, and removed to Hartford, Conn., where the family continued to reside, making their winter home in Mandarin, Fla., until Prof. Stowe's increasing infirmities made the journey no longer possible. In 1869 Mrs. Stowe published "Old-Town Folks," a tale of New England life, and in December, and Bishop the same year, moved thence to reading the Countess Guicciardi's "Recollections of Lord Byron," contributed a paper to the "Atlantic Monthly" on the "True Story of Lady Byron's Life." In reply to the tempest of adverse criticism that this paper evoked, she published "Lady Byron vindicated: a History of the Byron Controversy" (Boston, 1869). Her seventieth birthday was celebrated with a garden party, mainly of literary people, in Cambridge, Mass. She spent the summer of 1888, in failing health, at North Haven, Long Island. George Sand has paid the following tribute to the genius of Mrs. Stowe: "I cannot say she has taken as one understands it in the world of letters, but she has genius as humanity feels the need of genius—the genius of goodness, not that which, though not bad, is not penetrating, and profound, the spirit that thus fathoms the recesses of the human soul." The accompanying steel engraving represents Mrs. Stowe as she appeared in middle life; the vignette, at threescence and ten.

Besides the works that have been mentioned, Mrs. Stowe had written "Geography for my Children" (Boston, 1855); "Our Father Charles, and what to do with him" (1859); "The Pearl of Orr's Island; a Story of the Coast of Maine" (1863); "Agnes of Sorrento" (1862); "Reply on Behalf of the Women of America to the Christian Address of many Thousand Women of Great Britain" (1863); "The Ravages of a Carpet" (1864); "House and Home Papers, by Christopher Crowfield" (1864); "Religious Poems" (1867); "Stories about our Dogs" (1865); "Little Foxes" (1865); "Quer LITTLE PEOPLE" (1867); "Daisy's First Winter, and other Stories" (1867); "The Chimney Corner, by Christopher Crowfield" (1868); "Men of our Times" (Hartford, 1865); "The American Woman's Home, with her sister Catherine (Philadelphia, 1869); "Little Pussy" (Boston, 1859); "Pink and White Tyranny" (1871); "'Sam Lawson's Farm-Side Stories" (1871); "My Wife and I" (1872); "Palmetto Leaves" (1872); "Betsy's Bright Idea, and other Tales" (1873); "We and Our Neighbors" (1875); "Footsteps of the Master" (1876); "Bible Heroines" (1878); "Pagan People" (1878); and "A Dog's Mission" (1881). Most of these works have been reprinted in collected selections from her writings entitled "Golden Fruit in Silver Buckets" (London, 1859). In 1868 she became co-editor with Donald G. Mitchell of "Hearth and Home" in New York. Her life has been written by her son, the Rev. Charles Edward Stowe, who is pastor of Windsor avenue Congregational church in Hartford (Boston, 1890).
STRACHAN, John, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, 12 April, 1778; d. in Toronto, 1 Nov., 1867. He was graduated at King's college, Aberdeen, in 1796, studied theology at St. Andrew's, and taught in a village school until 1799, when he emigrated to Canada. He opened a school at Kingston and taught for three years, preparing himself in the meanwhile to take orders in the Church of England. He was ordained a deacon by Bishop Mountain in May, 1803, a priest, 3 June, 1804, and appointed to the mission of Cornwall, where he opened a grammar-school, and had among his pupils several that have since become eminent in Canada. In 1812 he removed to York (now Toronto), and became rector in that place. In 1813, after the explosion by which Gen. Zebulon M. Pike was killed at the old fort, York, he visited Gen. Henry Dearborn, and was successful in dissuading him from sacking the town. In 1818 he was nominated an executive councillor, took his seat in the legislative council, and remained a member of the government till 1836, and of the upper house till 1841. In 1819 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada. In 1839 he was appointed bishop of the diocese of Toronto, the fourth bishop in the Diocese of the Mississaugas, which was constituted in 1836. In 1845 he returned to England for a time, and in 1848 was translated to the See of Grenfell. He died 1 Nov., 1867. His published works include "History of the Protestant Episcopal Church from Its Foundation to 1841" (2 vols., 1841); "The Rulers and Subjects of the British Empire" (1849); "The Missionary, the Priest, and the Layman" (1856), etc.

STRACHAN, James Samuel Thomas, capitalist, b. in Peterborough, N. Y., 23 April, 1898; d. in Saratoga, N. Y., 3 Sept., 1898. He was educated in the common schools, where he afterward taught, and then studied civil engineering. In 1827 he visited the region of the upper lakes for the purpose of opening trade with the Indians; but finding this undesirable, he engaged in the wool trade. He became associated in 1832 with Gerrit Smith in developing the manufacturing interests of Oneida Islands of the Bermudas," which was published in the fourth volume of Purchas's "Pilgrims." He also compiled for the colony in Virginia "Lawses Divine, Morall, and Martiell" (London, 1612), and was the author of "Historie of Travaile into Virginia Britannia" (1618), published by the Hakluyt society, from an original manuscript, in 1849.

STRAINS, Isaac G., naval officer, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 14 May, 1812; d. in Aspinwall, Colombia, 14 May, 1857. He entered the U. S. navy as midshipman in 1837, and was advanced to the grade of passed midshipman in 1843. While in the South Atlantic ocean in 1845 he led an exploring expedition into the interior of Brazil, and in 1848 he visited the peninsula of Lower California. In 1849 he obtained permission to leave his vessel at Valparaiso for the sake of making the return journey to Rio Janeiro, where he rejoined his ship. The result of his experiences he gave to the public as "The Cordillera and Pampa: Sketches of a Journey in Chili and the Argentine Provinces in 1849" (New York, 1853). He was promoted lieutenant, 27 Feb., 1859, and was attached to the commission that in 1860 located the boundary-line between the United States and Argentina, and had charge of the expedition to survey the Isthmus of Darien. The extremities to which his party were reduced in that affair, and the heroism with which he sustained his command under extraordinary difficulties, brought him to the notice of the public. In the summer of 1856 he sailed in the "Arctic" on her voyage to ascertain by soundings in the North Atlantic ocean the possibility of an ocean telegraphic cable between the United States and Great Britain. Lieut. Strain was a member of the American ethnological society, and to its proceedings and those of the American geographical society he contributed interesting accounts of his expeditions, including a paper on "The History and Prospects of Interoceanic Communication" (New York, 1856). His death was the result of undue exposure while he was on the isthmus.

STRAKOSCH, Maurice, musician, b. in Butschowitz, Moravia, 15 Jan., 1835; d. in Paris, France, 9 Oct., 1887. His father removed to Germany in 1836, and young Strakosch there began the study of music. He soon gained a reputation as an excellent pianist, and joined the toured opera companies in which he travelled. In 1848 he came to the United States, and soon devoted himself entirely to managing operatic troupes, organizing his first company in 1855. In 1852 he married Amalia Patti, a sister of Adelina. His compositions for the piano were at one time very popular, and among them the music of one of Haydn Taylor's songs. He wrote a small volume of "Souvenirs" in French not long before his death.—His brother, Max, b. in Brunn, Moravia, 27 Sept., 1835; d. in New York city, 17 March, 1892, was associated with him in most of his enterprises, and some of the most famous artists travelled under their management, including Parepa-Rosa, Carletta and Adelina Patti, Karl Formes, Pasquale Briggs, Carl Ditzen, Christine Nilsson, and Marietta Alboni.

In 1857 he accepted the presidency of Mills college, Oakland, Cal., which place he held three years. He was a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist church in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1872, and to that in Cincinnati in 1880. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Northwestern and Willamette universities in 1873. He edited "The North American 'Har- ven" (New York, 1883), and has prepared a volume of the sermons and lectures of Bishop Haven.

STRATTON, Charles Sherwood, dwarf, b. in Bridgeport, Conn., 4 Jan., 1838; d. in Middleborough, Mass., 15 July, 1883. He was first exhibited as a dwarf by Phineas T. Barnum at his American museum in New York city on 8 Dec., 1845, who gave him the name of Gen. Tom Thumb. At that time he was not more than two feet high, and weighed less than sixteen pounds. He was engaged at a salary of three dollars a week and travelling expenses; but, as he proved a great success, his salary was soon increased to twenty-five dollars a week, and at the end of his second year he received fifty dollars a week. In 1844 he visited Europe under Barnum's management, and appeared at the courts of England, France, and Belgium. In 1857 he again visited Europe, and on later occasions he travelled extensively on the continent. He accumulated a large fortune, and settled in Bridgeport. In 1862 he met Lavinia War- ren, also a dwarf, who was exhibited by Mr. Bar- num, and married her on 10 Feb., 1863. The wed- ding ceremony was performed at Grace church in New York city, with "Commodore" Nutt as groomsman and Minnie Warren as bridesmaid. Subsequently Mr. and Mrs. Stratton travelled over the world and gave exhibitions wherever they went. As he grew older he became stout and weighed seventy pounds, and his height increased to forty inches. The dwarf's death was the result of a stroke of apoplexy, which was to play a part in the stratifications of the North Carolina legislature. On his return to Fayetteville he resumed his profes- sion, and subsequently was solicitor of the 5th judi- cial district of North Carolina. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Rutgers in 1840. Judge Strange published for private circulation a novel entitled "Eonegnski, or the Cherokee Chief," in which he preserved many of the traditions of the region in which he resided.

STRANGE, Thomas Bland, Canadian soldier, b. in Meurut, India, 15 Sept., 1831. He entered the Royal artillery as 2d lieutenant in 1851, and retired from the service in 1881 with the rank of major-general. He served during the Indian mutiny, and distinguished himself at the siege and capture of Lucknow. Gen. Strange was appointed command- ant of the School of gunnery, Quebec, in 1871, inspector of artillery for the Dominion in 1872, commandant of artillery for Quebec in the same year, and was retired in 1882. He commanded the Alberta field-forces during the northwest campaign in 1885, and was awarded a medal.

STRATTON, Charles Carroll, b. in Mansfield, Pa., 4 Jan., 1833. He early settled in Oregon, and was educated at Willamette university. In 1858 he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church and held various pas- torates until 1885, except during 1897-8, when he returned to Willamette and took his degree. He was elected president of the University of the Pacific in 1877, and held that post for ten years, during which time the attendance rose from about 100 to more than 400. The buildings and appliances increased correspondingly, and the annual income of the institution was advanced from about $7,400 to $85,000. In 1857 he accepted the presidency of Mills college, Oakland, Cal., which place he held three years. He was a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist church in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1872, and to that in Cincinnati in 1880. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Northwestern and Willamette universities in 1873. He edited "The North American 'Har- ven" (New York, 1883), and has prepared a volume of the sermons and lectures of Bishop Haven.

STRATTON, Henry Dwight, educator, b. in Amherst, Ohio, 24 Aug., 1824; d. in New York city, 20 Feb., 1867. He was educated in the public schools of Lorain county and at Oberlin college, but was not graduated. With Henry B. Bryant he established the Bryant and Stratton business colleges, which at the time of his death numbered more than fifty, the largest of which were in the principal cities of the United States and Canada.

STRAUS, Oscar Solomon, merchant, b. in Ot- terberg, Rhenish Bavaria, 23 Dec., 1850. He emigrated with his parents to the United States, and settled in Tallbackton, Ga. At the close of the civil war he removed to New York, where he was gradu-STRAWBRIDGE, Robert, pioneer, b. in Drummer's Nave, near Carrick-on-Shannon, County Leitrim, Ireland; d. in Maryland in 1781. He came to this country some time between 1750 and 1765, settled on Sam's creek, Frederick co., Md., and soon opened his house for religious services. Shortly afterward a Methodist society was formed, and a place of worship, known as the Log meeting-house, was erected. Mr. Strawbridge now travelled constantly through the state, forming new societies, and in order that he might go on these journeys his farm was cultivated for him by his neighbors. After residing on Sam's creek about sixteen years he removed to Long Green, Baltimore county, where the use of the Log house remained his life. He died while he was on one of his preaching tours. It is a matter of dispute whether he or Philip Embury founded the first Methodist society and built the first chapel in this country, but most authorities give Embury priority. A full discussion of the point may be found in Joseph B. Wakeley's "Lost Chapters Recovered from the History of America's first Sunday School" (New York, 1858), and John Atkinson's "Centennial History of American Methodism" (1884).

STRAZNICKY, Edward R. (strats-nik'-y), librarian, b. in Moravia, Austria, in 1820; d. in New York city, 9 Feb., 1876. He was educated at the University of Vienna, taking degrees in the departments of medicine and philosophy, and acquired by travel a familiar knowledge of modern languages. During the Hungarian rebellion he served as an officer in the revolutionary army. At the defeat of the Nationalists he went into exile, and his property was confiscated. After a brief residence in England, he came to the United States, and found mercantile employment in Philadelphia. In 1850 he became a clerk in the New York city, and in 1872 he was elected superintendent, which office he held till the time of his death. He was also secretary of the American geographical society.

STREET, Alfred Billings, author, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 18 Dec., 1811; d. in Albany, N. Y., 2 June, 1881. He removed at an early age to Morrisania, N. Y. Mr. Billings was educated at Dutchess county academy, after which he studied law with his father, Randall S. Street, and practised in Monticello. In 1839 he removed to Albany, in 1843-44 edited the "Northern Light," and from 1848 till his death he was state librarian. Mr. Street began at an early age to write poetry for the magazines, and he attained a respectable rank as a descriptive poet. At the same time he wrote verses of far more highly appreciated by critics, and several of his poems have been translated into German. His publications include "The Burning of Schenectady, and other Poems." (Albany, 1842); "Drawings and Tintings." (New York, 1844); "Fugitive Poems." (1846); "Frontenac, or the Atrocity of the Iroquois, a Metrical Romance." (London, 1846); New York, 1870); "The Council of Revision of the State of New York," a history (Albany, 1859);

"Woods and Waters, or the Saranacs and the Racket," describing a trip in the Adirondack region (New York, 1860); "A Digest of Taxation in the United States." (Albany, 1869); a collected edition of his poems (2 vols., 1866); and "The Indian Pass," describing explorations in Essex county, N. Y. (1869). He also contributed sixteen poems to John A. How's "Forest Pictures in the Adirondacks" (1864), and published various poems that he read at different colleges, including Geneva (now Hobart) (1840); Rambler, 1841; Yale (1841); and some others in the battle-field of Saratoga.

STREET, Augustus Russell, donor, b. in New Haven, Conn., 5 Nov., 1791; d. there, 12 June, 1866. He was graduated at Yale in 1812, and studied law, but was compelled to abandon it on account of feeble health, and remained an invalid during the greater part of his life. From 1843 till 1848 he resided in Europe, travelling and devoting himself to the study of art and the modern languages. Mr. Street inherited a fortune, and gave largely to benevolent objects. He presented to Yale its school of the fine arts, one of its finest buildings, also making partial provision for its endowment, founded the Street professorship of modern languages, and made provision in his will for the renewal of that professorship in the theological department. His daughter married Admiral Andrew H. Foote.

STREET, Whiting, philanthropist, b. in Waltham, Conn., 25 March, 1790; d. in Northampton, Mass., 31 July, 1878. He was educated at public schools in West Springfield, Mass., and was successively a farmer, a freight-broker, and a river-boat owner. He accumulated a large fortune, and at his death left $106,000 to the city of Holyoke and twenty-one adjacent towns, to be used for the benefit of the worthy poor that should not be already in charge of the public.

STRIBLING, Cornelius Kinchloe, naval officer, b. in Pendleton, S. C., 22 Sept., 1790; d. in Martinsburg, W. Va., 17 Jan., 1880. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 18 June, 1812, and served in the frigate "Mohawk" on Lake Ontario in 1815, where he participated in the blockade of Kingston. He was commissioned lieutenant, 1 April, 1818, cruised on the Brazil station in 1819-20, and then in the West Indies suppressing piracy. He commanded the sloop "Peacock" in the East Indies in 1833-34, and for a time was captain of the "Saratoga." He was commissioned commander, 24 Jan., 1840, and in 1842-44 had the sloop "Cyan" and frigate "United States" successively on the Pacific station. For the next two years he had command of the receiving-ship at Norfolk, and he then went out as fleet-captain in command of the ship-of-the-line "Ohio," of the Pacific squadron, during the greater part of the Mexican war, returning to New York in April, 1850. He was superintendent of the naval academy at Annapolis in 1850-53, was commissioned captain, 1 Aug., 1853, and commanded the steam sloop "San Jacinto" on special service in 1854-5. He was commandant of the Pensacola navy-yard 1857-9, and served as flag-officer in command of the East India squadron in 1859-61. When the civil war opened he returned home, and, notwithstanding the secession of his native state, adhered to the Union. He served on the board to regulate the compensation of government officers in 1861, and on the light-house board in 1862. By operation of law he was placed on the retired list in December, 1861, but he continued to render valuable service in command of the light-house at Philadelphia in 1862-4, and from February till July, 1865, as commander-in-chief of the Eastern
STRINGHAM

Participate in the boat the 'Mint, 719 in July. He entered the military service, attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and emigrated to Canada in 1826. He was a brother of Susanna Moodie, Agnes Strickland, and in 1834, the year that he took his place as one of the chief architects in the country, and as such built the new Chestnut street theatre, the Arch street theatre, U.S. custom-house, St. Stephen's Episcopal church, the Merchants' exchange, U.S. mint, and the U.S. naval asylum, all in Philadelphia. Mr. Strickland was one of the first architects and engineers that turned his attention to the construction of railroads, and he went to Europe to study the system. On his return he built the Delaware breakwater for the U.S. government. His last work was the state-house at Nashville, Tenn., and he died while engaged in superintending its construction. By a vote of the legislature of the state his remains were placed in a crypt in that edifice. He published "Triangulation of the Entrance into Delaware Bay" (Philadelphia); "Report on Canals and Railways" (1826); and, with Gill and Campbell, "Public Works of the United States" (London, 1841).

STRICKLAND, William Peter, clergyman, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 17 Aug., 1809; d. in Ocean Grove, N. J., 15 July, 1884. He was educated at Ohio university, Athens, Ohio, from which he afterward received a degree. In 1832 he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in Ohio, and, after serving in the itinerancy and also for five years as an agent of the American Bible society, he removed to New York in 1836, where he was connected with the Methodist book concern, and was an assistant editor of the "Christian Advocate." From 1835 till 1874 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian church in New York, and then he was installed as its regular pastor, but three years later he resigned on account of his wife's health. Afterward he labored as an evangelist. In 1862 he served as chaplain of the 48th New York regiment at Port Royal, S. C. Dr. Strickland published "History of the American Bible Society" (New York, 1856), and continued to 1896, 1899; "History of the Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church" (Cincinnati, 1850); "Genius and Mission of Methodism" (Boston, 1851); "Manual of Biblical Literature" (New York, 1853); "Light of the Temple" (Cincinnati, 1854); "The Astrologer of Chaldea, or the Life of Faith" (1855); "Christianity demonstrated by Facts" (1855); "Pioneers of the West" (New York, 1856); "The Pioneer Bishop, or the Life and Times of Francis Asbury" (1858); "Old Mackinaw, or the Fortress of the Lakes and its Surroundings" (Philadelphia, 1859); and "Life of Jacob Gruber" (New York, 1869). He also edited numerous volumes of sermons and other works, among them the "Autobiography of Peter Cartwright" (1856), and was editorially connected with several journals in the west, besides the one mentioned above.

STRINGER, Samuel, physician, b. in Maryland in 1754; d. in Albany, N. Y., 11 July, 1817. He studied medicine in Philadelphia with Dr. Thomas Bond, was appointed to the medical department of the army in 1755 by Gov. William Shirley, and served in the campaign of 1758 at Ticonderoga. He then settled in Albany, and on 14 Sept., 1775, was appointed director and physician of the hospitals of the northern department, and authorized to appoint a surgeon for the fleet that was then fitting out upon the lakes. He accompanied the troops in the invasion of Canada, but was dismissed by the service by congress, 9 Jan., 1777; and in February that body ordered an inquiry to be made concerning medicines that he had bought. Gen. Philip Schuyler remonstrated against his removal, and on 15 March, 1777, he was reprimanded by congress. Dr. Stringer afterward practised in Albany with great reputation till his death.

STRINGHAM, James S., physician, b. in New York city in 1775; d. in St. Croix, W. I., 28 June, 1817. He was graduated at Columbia in 1798, and began to study theology, but abandoned it for medicine, which he pursued first under Dr. Samuel Bard and Dr. David Hosack in New York, and then at the University of Edinburgh, where he received his degree in 1809. He was professor of chemistry in Columbia in 1809-13, and of medical jurisprudence in the College of physicians and surgeons from 1813 till his death. He was the first to lecture here on the latter science, and may be regarded as its founder in the United States. Dr. Stringham was one of the most efficient of the early promoters of science in this country. He was a physician of the New York hospital, a member of the Royal medical society of Edinburgh, and a fellow of the New York literary, philosophical, and historical societies. He published "De Absorbentium Systemate," his inaugural dissertation; and various essays and papers in medical journals.

STRINGHAM, Silas Horton, naval officer, b. in Middletown, Orange co., N. Y., 7 Nov., 1798; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1870. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 15 Nov., 1809, and in the frigate "President" participated in the engagements with the "Lattie" off Bridgehampton, L. I., and "Belvidera." He was commissioned lieutenant, 9 Dec., 1814, and served in the schooner "Spark" in the Mediterranean in 1834, participating in the Algerine war. During a storm at Gibraltar, upon one occasion, he went in a boat with six men to rescue the crew of a French brig that had capsized. He succeeded in getting the crew, but was unable to get... back to port, and was blown off to Algeiras, where his boat capsized in the surf on the beach, and one of his crew and two Frenchmen were drowned. In 1819-'21 he served in the sloop "Cyane" on the coast of Africa, and brought home four slaves as prize-master. He was executive officer of the "Hornet" in the West Indies in 1821-'4, for the suppression of piracy, and assisted in the capture of the "Moscow," the most dreaded piratical vessel in those waters. He was commissioned commander, 3 March, 1831, and captain, 8 Sept., 1841, was commandant of the New York navy-yard in 1844-5, and with the ship Ossipee took part in the bombardment of Veracruz in 1847. He was in charge of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1848-'53, and the Boston navy-yard in 1856-'60, and in 1853-'6 commanded the Mediterranean squadron as flag-officer. When the civil war began he was summoned to Washington to advise upon the preparations for war, especially in relation to the relief of Fort Sumter, which he strongly urged, but his advice was not followed until it had become too late to be feasible. He took command of the North Atlantic blockading fleet, and planned the expedition to Hatteras inlet. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler accompanied him with nine hundred men. The squadron bombarded the forts, sailing in an ellipse, by which means the vessels concentrated their fire on the forts, and prevented their delivery. Both forts surrendered after the bombardment, and the troops were landed to garrison them on 29 Aug., 1861. Not one of the National troops was injured. The Confederates lost twelve killed and thirty-five wounded, and seven hundred and fifteen prisoners, and large quantities of guns and stores were captured. This was the first naval victory of the war, and the country rejoiced at it. For his services he was commended for active service on account of his age, and was retired, as commodore, 31 Dec., 1861. He continued to render valuable service as commandant of the Boston navy-yard in 1862-'5, and was promoted to rear-admiral on the retired list, 16 July, 1862. He was post-admiral at New York in 1870-'2, and was on waiting orders until 1874.

STROBEL, William Daniel, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 7 May, 1808; d. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 6 Dec., 1884. He received his classical education in his native place, and pursued his theological course at Hartwick seminary, where he was graduated in 1829. In the same year he was licensed to preach by the ministerium of New York, and in 1830 he was ordained to the ministry by the synod of South Carolina. He served as missionary among the destitute Lutherans in South Carolina in 1829-'30, was pastor in Columbia, S. C., in 1830-'7, and in New York city in 1831-'41, principal of Hartwick seminary, N. Y., in 1841-'4, and held other pastorates in New York state and Maryland till 1848, when he retired from the active discharge of his office on account of advancing age and failing health, and lived in retirement at Rhinebeck, N. Y., until his death. He was president of the general synod in 1859-60, and held other offices. He received the degree of D. D., in 1846, from Hamilton college, and was the author of numerous articles in periodicals of the church, which were afterward published separately. Among them are "Jubilee Tract" (Baltimore, 1867); "Influence of the Death and Resurrection of the Saviour upon the World"; and an introduction to Dr. George B. Miller's posthumous sermons (New York, 1860).

STRONG, Augustus Hopkins, educator, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 5 Aug., 1835. His great-grandfather, Philip, was first cousin to Jedediah, noticed below. His father, Alvah Strong, published for thirty years the Rochester daily "Democrat." The son was graduated at Yale in 1857, and at Rochester theological seminary in 1859. He then spent some time abroad, studying in the German universities and travelling in Europe and the East. In 1861 he became pastor of the 1st Baptist church of Haverhill, Mass., and was ordained to the ministry. In 1865 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church in Cleveland, Ohio, and remained there until 1872, when he was elected president and professor of biblical theology in Rochester theological seminary. This place he still holds. Brown gave him the degree of D. D. in 1870. He preaches often, and gives much time to the general affairs of the denomination with which he is identified. He is a trustee of Vassar college. Dr. Strong has written much for reviews and newspapers on a variety of subjects, literary as well as theological. He is the author of "Systematic Theology" (Rochester, 1886), which has received high commendation for its ability and learning, and also of "Philosophy and Religion" (New York, 1888).

STRONG, Caleb, senator, b. in Northampton, Mass., 9 Jan., 1755; d. there, 7 Nov., 1819. He was fourth in descent from John, founder of the family, who came to this country from Taunton, England, in 1630, and settled in Northampton, Mass. After graduation at Harvard in 1764, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1772. During the Revolution he was a member of the general court and the Northampton committee of safety, and from 1776 till 1800 he was county attorney. He was sent to the State constitutional convention in 1779, where he aided in drawing up the constitution, and from the latter year till 1780 he was in the state senate. In 1781 he declined a seat on the supreme bench. In 1787 he was chosen to the convention that framed the constitution of the United States, and, although illness in his family compelled him to return before it was completed, he exerted himself in the state convention to procure its ratification. In 1789 he was elected one of the first U. S. senators from Massachusetts, and he served till his resignation in 1796. He was governor of his state from 1800 till 1807, and again from 1812 till 1816. As a Federalist, he earnestly opposed the war of 1812, and when requisition was made upon him for the state troops, he claimed the right of the president on constitutional grounds. He claimed that, as governor of the state, he should be the judge of the exigency in which the constitution allowed the president to call out the militia, and that, when this was done, the state troops should be commanded by their own officers. The state supreme court, being called upon for an opinion on these points, sustained the governor. But when the administration withdrew nearly all the National troops from the coast of Massachusetts, leaving it defenseless, he was active in adopting measures for the safety of the state. See his "Life" by Alden Bradford (Boston, 1820); his "Speeches, and STRONG, George Crockett, soldier, b. in Stockbridge, Vt., 16 Oct., 1823; d. in New York city, 30 July, 1863. Losing his father early in life, he was adopted by his uncle, Alfred L. Strong, of Easthampton, Mass. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1847, assigned to the ordnance department, and became assistant at Watervliet arsenal, of which he took command in May, 1861. He was ordnance officer on Gen. Irvin McDowell's staff at Bull Run, and was then attached successively to the staffs of Gen. George B. McClellan and Gen. Benjamin P. Butler, whose chief of staff he became in May, 1862. He had previously been engaged in the organization of the New Orleans expedition, and on 1 Oct., 1861, had been commissioned major and assistant adjutant-general. He commanded the expedition from Ship island to Biloxi, Miss., in April, 1862, and that to Pouschatoula in September, when he destroyed a large train and inflicted much damage on the enemy. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and was on sick leave in New York from the following December till June, 1863, and then commanded a brigade in the operations against Charleston, S. C. He had been commissioned captain of ordnance, 3 March, 1863. He led the successful attack on Morris island, where he was the first to land. At the assault on Fort Wagner on 18 July, while he was leading and cheering on the storming column, he was mortally wounded. He was at once removed to New York city, where Strong was the author of "Cadet Life at West Point" (Boston, 1862).

STRONG, James, scholar, b. in New York city, 14 Aug., 1829; d. in Round Lake, N. Y., 7 Aug., 1894. His father came to this country in 1815. The son was left an orphan at an early age, and began the study of medicine, but the failure of his health led to its abandonment. He was graduated at Wesleyan in 1844, taught two years in Poulney, Vt., and then failing health again compelled his retirement to a farm in Newtown, Long Island. Eighteen months later he settled at Flushing, where he followed biblical studies. He held various local offices, took an active interest in the development of the town, and projected and built the Flushing railroad, of which he was president. He gave gratuitous private instruction to Assistants and Shockans, and gave up his literary labor, the preparation of brief manuals of Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldee grammar, which were afterward published (1856-69). From 1858 till 1861 he was professor of biblical literature and acting president of Troy university, where in the former year he delivered an inaugural on "Scripture and Education and Biblical Interpretation" (Troy, 1859), which attracted the attention of Flushing to engage in public improvements. Since 1868 he had been professor of exegetical theology in Drew theological seminary, Madison, N. J. Wesleyan gave him the degrees of D. D. and LL. D. in 1856 and 1881 respectively. Dr. Strong travelled in Egypt and Palestine in 1874, and was a member of the American branch of the Palestine exploration committee. He was also one of the Old Testament committee of the committee for the revision of the authorized version of the Bible. In 1872 he was a lay delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. He was the author of "A New Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels" (New York, 1852); "Harmony in Greek" (1854); "Scripture History delineated from the Biblical Records and all other Accessible Sources" (Madison, N. J., 1878); "Trenics, a Series of Essays showing the Virtual Agreement between Science and the Bible" (New York, 1883); and "The Tabernacle of Israel in the Desert" (1888). He edited, for the American edition of Lange's commentary, the parts on "Daniel" (1876) and "Esther" (1877), and published a "Literal Translation of Ecclesiastes" (1877). The chief work of his life is the "Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature" (10 vols., 1867-81; supplem. 2 vols., 1885-7). In the preparation of the first three volumes of this work, which was begun in 1853, he was the associate of its publisher, Dr. John McClintock (p. r.), who took charge of the theological part, while he attended to the department of biblical literature, but since the death of Dr. McClintock Dr. Strong had had sole charge. He had also prepared various question manuals for Sunday-schools and Bible classes, based on his "Harmony of the Gospels," several of which were edited by Daniel P. Kidder, D. D. (New York, 1833-4), and with Orange Judd and Mrs. Julia M. Olin lessons for every Sunday in the year (4 vols., 1862-3), on the plan afterward used in the "International Lessons."

STRONG, James Hooker, naval officer, b. in Canandaigua, N. Y., 26 April, 1814; d. in Columbus, N. C., 23 Nov., 1882. He was appointed a midshipman in the navy while he was a student in the Polytechnic college at Chittenango, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1829, but remained at the college until he was graduated in 1833. He made his first cruise on the Brazil station in 1833-5, and, while attached to the sloop "Lexington," commanded a boat expedition that captured a piratical establishment in the Falkland islands, where he had a hand-to-hand conflict with the pirates, and won credit by his valor and ability. The vessels that had been captured were restored to their crews, and the pirates were taken to Buenos Ayres for trial by the Argentine government. He became passed midshipman, 4 June, 1836, and lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and after various cruises commanded the store-ship "Relief" (in 1859). He was commissioned commander, 24 April, 1861, and had the steamers "Mohawk" and "Flag" on the South Atlantic blockade in 1861-2, and the steamer "Monongahela" on the Western Gulf blockade in 1863-5, in which he rendered good service at Arkansas post and especially at the battle of Mobile bay, where he was the first to ram the iron-clad "Tennessee," and was highly commended. After being commissioned commodore, 5 Aug., 1865, he was on duty at the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1866-7, and commanded the steamer "Canandaigua," of the Mediterranean squadron, in 1869-70. He was commissioned commodore, 2 March, 1870, and served as light-house inspector for two years. He was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, 10 Sept., 1873, was commander-in-chief of the South Atlantic squadron from 1873 till 1875, and was placed on the retired list, 25 April, 1876.
STRONG, Jedediah, politician, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 7 Nov., 1735; d. there, 31 Aug., 1802. His father, Suypl Strong, was one of the first settlers of Litchfield in 1733, and is said to have owned one eighth of the township. The son was graduated at Yale, and began the study of divinity, but abandoned it for law. He was admitted to the bar, but devoted himself to politics, in which he long wielded great influence. He was elected to the legislature in 1771, and sat in that body for thirty regular sessions thereafter, during several of which he was clerk of the house. In 1774 he was chosen to the Continental congress, and declined, but he served in that body in 1782-'4, and in 1789-'91 he was a judge of the county court. In 1775-77 he was a member of the committee of inspection, and in 1775 he was made a commissary of supplies in the army. In April, 1775, the legislature sent him to Albany to secure all the "arms belonging to this colony left there during the French war." In 1788 he was a member of the state convention that ratified the U. S. constitution. He became dissatisfied with the evils from poverty and obscurity.

STRONG, John, engineer, b. in Coventry, Conn., 16 Aug., 1788; d. in Addison, Vt., 16 June, 1816. He removed in 1765 to the eastern side of Lake Champlain, where he built the first house that was erected by an English settler north of Massachusetts. He was driven from his home by Burgoyne's invasion in 1777, and separated from his family, but accidentally found them in Dorset, Vt., where he remained several years, representing the town in the legislature in 1779-82, and serving as assistant judge of Bennington county in 1781-2. He returned to his old home in Addison, Vt., in 1783, sat again in the legislature in 1784-'6, was first judge of the county court in 1785-'80, and judge of probate in 1788-'81. In 1791 he sat in the convention that ratified the U. S. constitution. He was known as Gen. John Strong. — His son, Samuel, soldier, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 17 July, 1762; d. in Vergennes, Vt., 5 Dec., 1832, became a large landholder at Vergennes. During the war of 1812 he raised of his own accord a body of soldiers, and hastened to the relief of the garrison at Plattsburg, N. Y. He received for his services the thanks of the Vermont and New York, and a gold sword from the latter. -- John's brother, Adoniah, b. in Coventry, Conn., 5 July, 1743; d. in Salisbury, Conn., 12 Feb., 1813, was a lawyer, and served in the Revolutionary army as commissioner general. -- Adoniah's grandson, Theron Rudd, jurist, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 7 Nov., 1802; d. in New York city, 15 May, 1879, was the son of Martin Strong, who was for many years a county judge, and member of both houses of the Connecticut legislature. The son studied law with his father, at Litchfield, and in Salem, N. Y., and on his admission to the bar in 1826 opened an office in Palmyra, N. Y. He was district attorney for Wayne county in 1834-'9, sat in congress in 1857-'91, having been elected as a Democrat, and in 1842 was re-elected. From 1856 till 1870 he was a judge of the New York supreme court, and during one year of that time he was a member of the court of appeals. More opinions written by Judge Strong were published while he was on the bench of the latter court than by any other member except Hiram Denio. On his retirement from the bench he resided business in Rochester, N. Y., where he had removed in 1853, but in 1867 he went to New York city. He had a large practice, and his services were also frequently in demand as a referee. -- Another grandson of Adoniah, William, jurist, b. in Somers, Conn., 6 May, 1808; d. at Lake Minnewasen, N. Y., 19 Aug., 1895. He was a son of Rev. William L. Strong, who graduated at Yale, and engaged in the study of law, teaching at the same time, at one period in Burlington, N. J., where his legal preceptor was Garret D. Wall. He finished his legal studies by a six months' course in Yale law-school. Declining to practise in Pennsylvania, he was admitted to the bar in that state in 1832, and, settling at Reading, mastered the German language, then much spoken in that region, and soon ranked high as a lawyer. In 1846 he was a candidate for congress, and was elected to the Democratic ticket, serving from 1847 till 1851. In his second term he was appointed chairman of the committee on elections. He declined a third nomination, and retired from active politics, but when the civil war began, though then occupying a high judicial post, he gave all his support and influence in aid of the government. In 1857 he was elected a justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and he served eleven years, attaining a high reputation as a jurist. His opinions, in volumes 30-69 of the state reports, exhibit great care in preparation, clearness of statement, precision and vigor of style, and accurate knowledge of law. In 1865 he resigned his seat on the bench, and opened an office in Philadelphia, at once obtaining a large and lucrative practice. In February, 1870, he was appointed a justice of the supreme court of the United States, and served until December, 1889, when he resigned. His great knowledge of law, keen discrimination, and sound judgment made him an invaluable associate at the joint committee, and his clear and masterly opinions have added largely to the learned and substantial body of the court. Of his opinions, those in the legal tender cases, the state freight-tax cases, and the civil-rights cases, including Tennessee vs. Davis, exhibit in an eminent degree his great power of analysis and rigorous logic. Justice Strong was a member of the electoral commission in February, 1877, and in his opinions contended that congress has no power to canvass a state election for presidential electors (which was the great question at issue), and that in the cases that he specially reviewed (those of Florida and Oregon) the canvass of the state authorities was clear and decisive. Besides his official and professional labors, Justice Strong had been taken an active part in the councils of the Presbyterian church, of which he was a member. He had for years been president of the American tract society and of the American Sunday-school union, and had taken part in other benevolent enterprises. He had delivered many public addresses and lectures, and had frequently contributed to magazines and reviews. He dwelt in his latter years at the Philadelphia bar and the American philosophical society, of which he was a member, an address on the "Life and Character of Horace Binney," and in 1879 an address before the law department of the University of Pennsylvania on the "Growth and Modifications of Private Civil Law." He had also delivered a course of lectures to the professors and students of the Union theological seminary of New York, and for several years lectured to the law department of Columbia University, Washington. Lafayette gave him the degree of L.L.D. in 1867, and Yale and Princeton in 1870. The portrait of Justice Strong is copied from an engraving that appeared in the "Democratic Review" in 1850.

STRONG, Josiah, clergyman, b. in Naperville, Du Page co., Ill., 19 Jan., 1847. His father, the same Josiah Strong, was born in Hudson, Ohio, where the son was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1869. He studied at Lane theological seminary in 1869-71, and after holding Congregational pastorates in Hudson, Sandusky, and Cincinnati, Ohio, became in 1886 general agent of the Evangelical alliance in the United States, resigning in 1898. He has published "Our Country and other works (New York, 1896).

STRONG, Nathan, clergyman, b. in Coventry, Conn., 16 Oct., 1748; d. in Hartford, Conn., 25 Dec., 1816. His father, of the same name, was pastor at Coventry, Conn. The son was graduated at Yale in 1769, and was tutor there in 1772-3. He began to study law, but abandoned it for divinity, and on 5 Jan., 1774, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at New London, serving as a chaplain in the Revolutionary army, and served the patriot cause ably with tongue and pen. Princeton gave him the degree of D.D. in 1801. Dr. Strong was a man of wide erudition, and great natural powers. His sermons were clear and pithy, and he had great facility in extemporizing. In 1793 he invested part of the estate that his father had left him, in the Episcopal church, and thus involved him in pecuniary difficulties. He projected and sustained the "Connecticut Evangelical Magazine," which was continued from 1800 till 1815; and he also was the chief founder of the Connecticut missionary society in 1798, and its principal manager till 1806. Besides separate discourses, he published "The Doctrine of Eternal Misery consistent with the Infinite Benevolence of God," in reply to a work by Rev. Dr. Joseph Huntington (Hartford, 1796), and two volumes of "Sermons" designed to give aid and direction to revivalists (1798 and 1800). He also projected and was the principal compiler of the "Hartford Collection of Hymns," several of which he wrote (1799).—His brother, Josiah, b. in Coventry, Conn., 21 Sept., 1753; d. in Norwich, Conn., 18 Dec., 1834, was graduated at Yale in 1773, and was for fifty-six years pastor of the 1st church in Norwich. He was known for his wide information, winning manners, and the fervency and solemnity of his prayers. Princeton gave him the degree of D.D. in 1807. He published several single discourses.

STRONG, Nathaniel, elder, b. in Northampton, Mass., 3 Mar., 1745; d. in Bridgeport, Conn., 12 Aug., 1897. He was graduated at Yale in 1765, was tutor there in 1757-60, and served as pastor of a church at Granby, Conn., in 1761-8. In December, 1770, he became the first professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Yale, which chair he held till 1781. He then resigned and studied law little, and afterward living in New Milford, Conn., removed to Brudger. Prof. Strong married a woman whose first husband, as was universally believed, had perished at sea, but he returned unexpectedly, and claimed his wife, who left her second husband for her first. President Timothy Dwight spoke of him as "a man of vigorous understanding." He published "Astronomy Improved" (New Haven, 1784).—His brother, Simeon, jurist, b. in Northampton, Mass., 6 March, 1765; d. in Amherst, Mass., 14 Dec., 1865, was graduated at Yale in 1786, and studied law, but after preaching several years, and declining offers of parishes on account of his health, left the ministry and studied law in Springfield, Mass. He was admitted as an attorney in 1761, and attained reputation at the bar. He was a representative in the general court in 1767-9, a state senator in 1783, and a judge of the state supreme court in 1794. Harvard gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1808, and De-shall Mason, lawyer, b. in Amherst, Mass., 3 Sept., 1813; d. in Racine, Wis., 9 March, 1864, was the son of Hezekiah W. Strong, who attained reputation as a lawyer in Troy, N. Y. The son studied two years at Amherst and one at Union college, read law and was admitted to the bar at Troy, and in June, 1836, removed to Racine, Wis. In 1830 he was elected to the territorial council, where he was one of a committee to revise the laws of the territory, and he served again in 1844-7. In 1846 he was in the convention that framed a state constitution, where he took an active part, but resigned before the close of the session, and labored successfully for its defeat at the polls. In 1849 he was elected again to the legislature, and took an active part in the passage of the bill to establish the state bank. Mr. Strong was an active supporter of the National government during the civil war. He was a large contributor toward the establishment of Racine college.—Marshall Mason's nephew, Latham Cornell, poet, b. in Troy, N. Y., 12 June, 1845; d. in Tarrytown, N. Y., 17 Dec., 1878, was the son of Henry Wright Strong, a lawyer of Troy, who was as an old man recognized before his death. He was also the author of letters to Europe, and "Sleepy Hollow Sketches" in Troy newspapers. His published volumes include "Castle Windows" (Troy, 1876); "Poke O'Moonshine" (New York, 1878); and "Midsummer Dreams" (1879).—Simeon's great-grandson, William Emerson, soldier, b. in Granville, N. Y., 8 Aug., 1849; d. in foreign service, Italy, 10 April, 1911. He was the son of John E. Strong, a merchant, who in 1853 removed to Wisconsin and became a farmer. The son studied law in Racine, Wis., in 1857-61, and was admitted to the bar in the latter year. He then raised a company, which was assigned to the 2d Wisconsin regiment, and as its captain served at Blackburn's Ford and Bull Run. He was promoted major of the 12th Missouri regiment in 1862, and served in Missouri, Kansas, and New Mexico. He was then on staff duty with the Army of the Tennessee, with rank of lieutenant-colonel, served in the Vicksburg campaign, and in 1864 became inspector-general of the Department and Army of the Tennessee. He was chief of staff to Gen. Oliver O. Howard in the march through the Carolinas, was promoted colonel, and assigned to the "Second National army on the field of battle" at Atlanta, and on 21 March, 1865, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. He was inspector-general of the Freedmen's bureau from May, 1865, till September, 1866, and from 1897 till 1873 was secretary of the Peshtigo lumber company in Chicago, Ill., of which he had been president since the latter year.—William Kerley, soldier, grandson of Simeon's first cousin, Josiah, b. in Duanesburg, N. Y., 30 April, 1807; d. in New York city, 13 March, 1868, became an extensive wool merchant in New York city, but early retired from business to his estate in Geneva, N. Y. He returned to his former occupation for a time in 1843, but at the opening of the civil war was in Egypt. He had been active in politics as a Democrat, but at once set out for France, where he remained with Fremont and others, and was instrumental in the purchase of arms for the National government. On his return he made patriotic addresses, and on 28 Sept., 1861, on the solicitation of merchants in New York, was made a brigadier-general of volunteers. He served for some time under Fremont, and was in command at Cairo, Ill., but on 20 Oct., 1863, resigned his commission. On his return to New York, while riding in Central park, he was thrown from his carriage, receiving injuries that paralyzed him for life, and finally caused his death.

STRONG, Paschal Neilson, clergyman, b. in Setauket, Suffolk co., N. Y., 16 Feb., 1783; d. in St. Croix, W. L., 7 April, 1825. He was graduated at Columbia in 1810, at the head of his class, studied theology with John E. Nelson, and was ordained as one of the pastors of the Collegiate Dutch Reformed church, New York, 14 July, 1816. In 1824 he was seized with a pulmonary affection, which was the cause of his early death. He had received the degree of D. D., and served as a trustee of Columbia in 1822-23. During his short pastoral career he obtained a reputation as a pulpit orator. Dr. Strong published "The New York Magazine," 1817; "A Punishment for Public Sins; A Sermon preached after the Cessation of the Yellow Fever" (New York, 1822), which attracted much attention.—His brother, Thomas Morris, clergyman, b. in Cooperstown, N. Y., 20 April, 1797; d. in Flatbush, Long Island, N. Y., 14 June, 1861, was graduated at Columbia in 1816, studied at Princeton theological seminary, and was pastor of the Dutch Reformed church in Flatbush from 1822 till his death. He published a "History of the Town of Flatbush" (New York, 1842).

STRONG, Samuel Henry, Canadian jurist, b. in Dorsetshire, England, in 1825. He accompanied his father, the Rev. Samuel S. Strong, to Canada where he began to teach in a school at Montreal, then in Ottawa. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1849, and began practice in Toronto. In 1856 he was appointed a member of the commission for consolidating the public general statutes of Upper Canada, and Canada, and labored at this work till its completion in 1859. He was elected a member of the Law society of Upper Canada in 1859, appointed queen's counsel in 1863, and made vice-chancellor for Ontario, 27 Dec., 1869. He was transferred to the court of error and appeal, and later was appointed chief-justice of the supreme court. In 1893 he was knighted.

STRONG, Selah, jurist, b. in Setauket, Suffolk co., N. Y., 25 Dec., 1737; d. there, 4 July, 1815. He was a delegate to the Provincial council in 1775, served as a captain in the Revolution, was a state senator in 1792-93, and first judge of the county court of common pleas from 1783 till 1793.

—His grandson, Selah Brewster, jurist, b. in Setauket, 1 May, 1792; d. there, 29 Nov., 1872, was the son of Thomas S. Strong, who was first judge of the common pleas for his county in 1792-93. He was graduated at Yale in 1811, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1814, and was district attorney of Suffolk county from 1821 till 1841. He was a member of congress in 1843-45, having been chosen as a Democrat, and in 1847-50 was a judge of the state supreme court. In 1867 he was a member of the State constitutional convention. Judge Strong gained a high reputation by his opinions on the bench.—Another grandson, Oliver Smith, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 11 Dec., 1808; d. in Mount Vernon, N. Y., 30 April, 1874, was the son of Benjamin Strong (1770-1851), a merchant of New York, who was president of the New York Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Co., and to his daughter's savings bank in 1834-51, and for 31 years engineer of the fire department. Oliver was graduated at Columbia in 1829, became a merchant in New York, and from early youth was active in philanthropic measures. From 1856 till his death he was president of the Society for the reformation of juvenile delinquents, of which he had long been a director, and the prosperity of the House of Refuge is largely due to his efforts. He was also a director of the New York institution for the deaf and dumb, made himself familiar with methods of deaf-mute instruction, and by his earnest efforts before the legislature secured many measures for their moral and mental improvement. Hareside for many years in Jersey City, and in 1843 was appointed to the bench of the New Jersey superior court. His grandson, George Templeton, lawyer, b. in New York city, 26 Feb., 1829; d. there, 21 July, 1875, was the son of George Washington Strong (1783-1855), a lawyer of much repute in his day, who was successively the partner of John Wells, George Grifflin, and Marshall S. Bidwell. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1848, became a lawyer, and married a daughter of Samuel B. Ruggles. During the civil war he was treasurer and one of the executive committee, of the U. S. sanitary commission, in which capacity he rendered valuable service. Mr. Strong was an accomplished scholar, and his library was among the finest in the city. It was sold in New York city in November, 1873.

STRONG, Theodore, mathematician, b. in South Hadley, Mass., 20 July, 1790; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 1 Feb., 1869. He was graduated at Yale in 1812, and became a tutor in mathematics at Hamilton. He held the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy from 1816 until 1827, and then accepted a call to Queen's college (now Rutgers), where he filled a similar chair. He returned to New York in 1830, and continued his work until 1861, when he was made professor emeritus, but in 1863 he severed his connection with the college, of which he had served also as vice-president from 1839. His original work was entirely in the line of pure mathematics, and in his knowledge of this subject it may be doubted whether he had a superior. He succeeded in solving by a direct method the irreducible case of cubic equations left by Cardan, which had baffled the best mathematicians of Europe, and he also discovered a method of extracting by a direct process, for the first time, any root of any integral number. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Hamilton in 1815, and that of LL. D. by Rutgers in 1830. He was a member of the chief scientific societies of the United States, and was named by congress in 1863 as one of the corporate members of the National academy of sciences. His papers, about 60 in number, are devoted almost exclusively to mathematics, and appeared principally in the "American Journal of Science," and in the "Mathematical Miscellany." Among the memoirs that preceded before the National academy of sciences are "Notes on the Parallelogram of Forces and on Virtual Velocities" (1864); "On the Integration of Differential Equations of the First Order and Higher Degrees" (1864); "A New Theory of the First Principles of the Differential Calculus" (1865); "A New Theory of Planetary Motion" (1866); and "On a Process of Integration used in the Case of a Planet's Orbit disturbed by Small Forces" (1867). He also published "A Treatise on Elementary and Higher Algebra" (New York, 1859), and "A Treatise on the Differential and Integral Calculus" (1869). See a sketch of his life by Joseph P. Bradley in "Biographical Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences" (Washington, 1898).

STRUYE, Titus, clergyman, b. in Brighton, Mass., 26 Jan., 1877; d. in Greenfield, Mass., in June, 1855. At the age of fourteen he went into a printing-office in Northampton, Mass., to learn the trade, and continued there for four years. Next he began the study of law, but gave it up by reason of failing health. He taught in various places, and began to study theology in 1857. Although of a Congregationalist family, he sought for orders in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1812. He was ordained deacon in Dedham, Mass., 24 March, 1814, by Bishop Griswold, and priest in St. James's church, Greenfield, 7 April, 1814, by the same bishop. He became rector of the church in Greenfield, and held that post during the rest of his life. Trinity gave him the degree of D.D. in 1839. Dr. Strong aided in the building of the church in Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire. He published "Tears of Columbia, a Political Poem" (1812); "A Candid Examination of the Episcopal Church" (1818); "Young Scholar's Manual" (1821); "The Deerfield Captive, a Tale for Children" (1831); and "A Sermon on the Death of Rev. Dr. William Cresswell" (Boston, 1851). He also published occasional sermons and addresses, and contributed freely to journals and magazines on religious and other topics.

STROTHER, David Hunter, author, b. in Martinsburg, Va. (now W. Va.), 16 Sept., 1816; d. in Charleston, W. Va., 3 March, 1888. In 1829 he went to Philadelphia to study drawing with Pietro Ancora, and seven years later became a pupil of Samuel F. B. Morse in New York. He went to the west in 1838, travelling through various states, and in 1840 visited Europe, remaining five years. On his return he settled in New York, where, under the direction of John G. Chapman, he acquired the art of drawing on wood for printer's use. In 1848 he returned to his native place, and four years later published, under the pen-name of "Purte Cravon," the first of his series of papers in "Harper's Magazine." They relate chiefly to Virginia and the south, and were illustrated by himself. Many of these papers were published in book-form under the title of "The Blackwater Chronicle" (New York, 1853) and "Virginia Illustrated" (1857). At the opening of the war in 1861 he joined the National army as captain and assistant adjutant-general, became colonel of the 3d Virginia cavalry, and resigned in September, 1864. In 1865 he received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers. After his return to his home at Berkeley Springs he continued for several years to furnish sketches to the magazines. He was a clever writer and artist of considerable ability. His pencil was also occasionally employed in illustrating the works of others, notably John P. Kennedy's "Swallow Barn" and "Rob of the Bowl." In 1879 he was appointed consul-general to Mexico, which post he held until 1883.

STROUD, George McDowell, jurist, b. in Stroudsburg, Pa., 12 Oct., 1795; d. in German- town, Pa., 20 Jan., 1869. He was graduated at Princeton in 1817, and admitted to the bar of Pennsylvania in 1819. For many years he was judge of the district court of Philadelphia. He was a contributor to law magazines and the author of a volume entitled "Sketch of the Laws Relative to Slavery in the Several States" (Philadelphia, 1857; enlarged ed., 1859).

STUENSEE, Karl (stroo-en-zay), German navigator, b. in Bremen about 1593; d. in Amsterdam about 1650. He was the son of a pilot, entered the service of the Dutch East India company, and acquired the reputation of a successful navigator. The discovery of the Strait of Lemaire, which allowed the Dutch to reach the Pacific ocean in a few days, greatly annoyed the Spanish authorities. He was ordered to fortify the strait, which they claimed to be a Spanish possession. The states-general of Holland, with the intention of anticipating Spain, ordered Stuensee with a fleet to choose a favorable point for constructing a fortress. Sailing from the Texel in 1643, Stuensee entered the Strait of Lemaire in December, and stopping at Mauritius bay, he made a survey of the small Stathour Islands, which he found the most convenient for building a fort to command the strait. He afterward sailed around Staten-land, taking exact astronomical observations at different points of the coast, and on his return to the Strait of Lemaire made numerous soundings. After his arrival in Amsterdam he presented his report to the states-general, but the project of fortifying the strait was afterward abandoned as impracticable. A narrative of his journey was written by his clerk under the title "Beschryving der Reis, ondernomen onder gezag en voor kosten van de Edele Heeren der Staten generaal, naar de Zee- engele van Le Maire en de Zuutzee door Karl Stuensee van Bremen" (Amsterdam, 1645; French version 1647; Latin, 1648).

STUVE, Gustav von, German agriculturist, b. in Munich, Bavaria, 11 Oct., 1805; d. in Vienna, Austria, 21 Aug., 1870. He studied law, spent a short time in the diplomatic service of the duke of Oldenburg, then settled as an advocate in Mannheim, Baden, and soon became known as a Liberal journalist and political speaker. He also gave attention to phrenology, and published three books on the subject, and at the end of the "Mannheim Journal," he was repeatedly condemned to imprisonment. When he was expelled in 1846 to retire from the management of this paper, he founded the "Deutsche Zuschauer," in which he addressed his radical sentiments to a larger circle of readers. He was one of the leaders of the Baden rising of 1848, and attempted, with Friedrich Hecker, to eject the Hungarian soldier. After the failure of the first insurrection, he fled to France, and thence to Switzerland, where he and Carl P. Heinzen drew up a plan for revolutionizing and re-publicizing Germany." In September, 1848, he returned with a body of followers to Baden, and stirred up a second insurrection. After his defeat at Staufen, he was arrested, 25 Sept., 1848, and on 29 March, 1849, was condemned to five years' solitary confinement for high treason. He was taken to the Bruchsal penitentiary on 12 May, but on the following day the revolutionists took possession of the government, and set him free. He went to the fortress of Rastadt, and stirred the soldiers of the garrison to revolt and fight on the side of the people against the Prussians. He was the leader of the Republican party, and was at the head of his followers when this body was dissolved after the victory of the Prince of Prussia over the armies of Baden and the Palatinate, Struve again escaped into Switzerland. The authorities, after two months, expelled him from that country. He went to France, and afterward to England, and in 1851 emigrated to the United States. He edited the "Deutsche Ztschraner" in New York city, but soon discontinued its publication because of insufficient support. He wrote several novels and a drama in German, and then undertook, with the assistance of his wife, the composition of a universal history from the standpoint of radical republicanism. In the beginning of the civil war he entered the volunteer service as an officer in the New Jersey Volunteers, but soon discontinued his self-support. His publication included "Politische Briefe" (Mannheim, 1846); "Das öffentliche Recht des deutschen Bundes" (2 vols., 1846); "Grundzüge der Staatswissenschaft" (4 vols., Frankfurt, 1847-50); "Geschichte der drei Volkerhebungen in Baden" (Bern, 1849); "Weltgeschichte" (6 vols., New York, 1836-70; 7th ed., with continuation, Colburg, 1866-70); "Das Revolutionäreralter" (New York, 1850-59); "Dresdins und jenseits des Oceans" (Colburg, 1846-54); "Kurzgefasster Wegweiser für Auswanderer" (Bamberg, 1847); "Pflanzenkunde der Grundzüge einer neuen Weltanschauung" (Stuttgart, 1866); "Das Sedenleben, oder die Naturschichte des Menschen" (Berlin, 1859); and "Eines Fürsten Jugendliebe", a drama (Vienna, 1852). He also wrote "Amadeus" in New York, N. Y., in 1852, was one of the authors of "Erinnerungen aus den bürgerlichen Freiheitskämpfen" (Hamburg, 1850), and "Historische Zeitbilder" (3 vols., Bremen, 1859).

STRYKER, John, soldier, b. 2 March, 1740; d. near Millstone, N. J., 25 March, 1776. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was commissioned a captain of a troop of light horse in the Somerset county, N. J., militia, and afterward attached to the state troops. He was a zealous patriot during the entire war and performed conspicuous service whenever the British foraging parties attempted to raid into the Jerseys. He had the confidence of the public to an unusual degree, especially in that portion of New Jersey around Millstone, N. J.; and, to give him a large inheritance. His family mansion still remains to this day. His son, Peter L., practised as a physician in Millstone and Somerville, was afterward, a judge, and during three sessions was president of the New Jersey senate, and by virtue of this office acted for several months as governor of the state.—His great-grandson, James, jurist, b. on Staten Island, N. Y., 2 Jan., 1792; d. in Siaror, Conn., 3 June, 1894. He was graduated at Columbia in 1899, studied law with De Witt Clinton, and began practice in New York city at the age of twenty-one. During the war with Great Britain in 1812-15 he served as a captain. He removed to Buffalo in 1830, having been appointed judge of the court of Erie county, and retained that post for ten years. He edited for several years the "Buffalo Republican," and he also founded and conducted the "American Quarterly Register and Magazine" (6 vols., Philad., 1818-23).

STUART, William Scudder, soldier, b. in Trenton, N. J., 6 June, 1828, was graduated at Princeton in 1858, and began the study of law. In the beginning of the civil war he assisted in organizing the 14th New Jersey volunteers, and in February, 1863, was ordered to Hilton Head, S. C., where he served as aide to Gen. Quincy A. Gilmore, with the rank of first lieutenant. He was in the capture of Morris Island and in the night attack on Fort Wagner. Returning to the north on account of illness, he became senior paymaster in charge of all disbursements in the district of Columbus, Ohio, was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for meritorious services, and resigned on 30 June, 1866. Soon afterward he was placed on the military staff of the governor of Oregon, and since 12 April, 1867, he has filled the office of adjutant-general of the state. He was admitted to the bar in 1866, and for some time was president of the Trenton banking company. Gen. Stryker has compiled a "Roster of Jerseymen in the Revolutionary War (Trenton, 1872) and a "Roster of New Jersey Volunteers in the Civil War" (1876). He has also published a monograph relating to the history of New Jersey, among these being: "The Reel Controversy" (Trenton, 1876); "New Jersey Continental Line in the Virginia Campaign of 1781" (1882); "New Jersey Continental Line in the Indian Campaign of 1779" (1883); and "The New Jersey Volunteers (Loyalists) in the Revolutionary War," (1887).
STUART

May, 1847, Emory He Richmond, 727 d. an In military airy At after and cousin, Virginia absence, identified Ferry ment with Indian to Washington 4v Va., Aug. 1833 sold soldier, in personal effects, wounded Dec. 1856 1st umns made at Manassas Junction, and sent into the town a brigade of infantry, which took many prisoners and carried off stores of great value. His cavalry was engaged in the second battle of Bull Run, and led the advance of Stonewall Jackson's corps in the ensuing invasion of Maryland. He performed important services at Antietam, guarding with artillery an eminence on Jackson's left that was essential to the security of the Confederate position, and under the same circumstance that resulted in the repulse of Gen. Edwin V. Sumter's corps. A few weeks later he crossed the Potomac near Williamsport at the head of 1,800 picked troopers, gained the rear of the National army, rode as far north as Meroesburg and Chambersburg, Pa., returned on the other side of McClellan's position, and recrossed the river below Harper's Ferry. At Fredericksburg Stuart's cavalry guarded the extreme right of the Confederate line. In a raid to Dumfries he ascertained the intended movements of the National troops by means of forged telegrams that he sent to Washington. In March, 1863, he encountered the National cavalry at Kelly's Ford. At Chancellorsville the cavalry screened Stonewall Jackson's march to the right of the National army. After Gen. Jackson was wounded, and Gen. Ambrose P. Hill was disabled, the command of Jackson's corps devolved temporarily on Stuart, who took command in the night of 2 May and directed its movements during the severe fighting of the following day. He led two charges in person, and carried the ridge of Hazel Grove, which was the key to the field. He was sent forward to guard the flank of the advancing column of Lee's army in the Gettysburg campaign, but was opposed and checked by the National cavalry at Fleetwood Hill and Stevensburg, with heavy losses on both sides. At Aldie he was successful in an encounter with the National cavalry, but at Middleburg and Upperville he was defeated. He was directed to cross the Potomac in advance of the infantry column, and take position on its right. He held the pass in the Blue Ridge for a while, and then made a raid in the rear of the National army, rejoining the main body at the close of the conflict at Gettysburg. The responsibility for this movement and its influence on the event have been the subject of much controversy. In the retreat from Gettysburg Stuart guarded the gaps in the mountains. While the Confederate army was entrenched on the northern bank of the Potomac, he engaged in indecisive conflicts with the cavalry of Gen. Judson Kilpatrick and Gen. John Buford. While the cavalry held the line of the Rappahannock, during the rest of the summer of 1863, he evaded Gen. Kilpatrick at Culpeper Court-House, retired from Gen. Buford at Jack's Shop, after a severe conflict, but forced back the National cavalry under Gen. Buford at Manassas Station, and by a rapid routes the bridge of Gen. Henry E. Davies near Buckland. After Gen. Grant crossed the Rapidan, Stuart led the advance of Ambrose P. Hill's corps. When Gen. Philip H. Sheridan with his cavalry moved on Richmond, Stuart, by a rapid circuitous march, intersected his cavalry, concentrating against the town, where he was severely wounded in the obstinate engagement that ended in the defeat of the Confederates. See "Life and Campaigns of Major-General J. E. B. Stuart," by his chief-of-staff, Maj. Henry B. McClellan (Boston, 1885).

STUART, Ambrose Pascall Sevilon, educator, b. in Sterling, Mass., 22 Nov. 1820. He was graduated at Brown in 1847, and till 1849 taught in Acadia college, Horton, Nova Scotia, where, after teaching in Providence, R. I., and North Danvers, Mass., he returned in 1853 as professor of mathematics and chemistry, but in 1858 he resigned and for three years studied chemistry at Göttingen and Heidelberg. On his return he was called to the charge of the Worcester academy, and later became assistant instructor of chemistry in the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard. In 1865 he accepted the chair of chemistry in Lima industrial university, which he held until 1874. Prof. Stuart has since resided chiefly in Lincoln, Neb., where he is interested in various financial institutions.

He is a member of the Chemical society of Berlin, a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a corresponding member of the New York academy of sciences. His chemical researches have been published in the transactions of societies of which he is a member and in technical journals.

STUART, Charles, author, b. in Jamaica, West Indies, about 1783; d. near Lake Simcoe, Canada, in 1865. His father was a British officer, who fought at Bunker Hill and in other battles of the Revolution, and was subsequently stationed in the West Indies, where he remained until 1808, when living at Belfast, Ireland, received a lieutenant's commission in the Madras army. He was promoted captain, received a severe wound in an encounter with native insurgents, and after thirteen years' service, returned to England, and was retired with a pension. Some time later he received a grant of land in Lake Simcoe, and was commissioned as a local magistrate. About 1822 he settled in Utica, N. Y., as principal of the academy, which he taught for several years. From that period he spent much of his time in the United States. He was one of the early emancipationists, and took part with Gerrit Smith in anti-slavery meetings. Capt. Stuart was the author of several pamphlets that were published by the British and foreign anti-slavery society, the most effective of which was "Prejudice Vindicated," which was reprinted in this country. He published a volume of short poems, and a religious novel entitled "Parade of Lun Sing, or the Missionary and the Mountain Chiefs." His principal other works were "The West India Question: Immediate Measures would be Safe and Profitable" (New Haven, 1834); "Memoirs of Granville Sharp" (New York, 1836); and "Ovidia and Oberlin: the Extirpation of Slavery in the United States" (Bristol, 1841).

STUART, Charles Beebe, engineer, b. in Chittenango Springs, N. Y., 4 June, 1814; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 4 Jan., 1881. He entered upon the profession of civil engineering, for some time state engineer of New York, entered the service of the U. S. government, and completed the Brooklyn docks. He was appointed engineer-in-chief of the U. S. navy on 1 Dec., 1850, and resigned on 30 June, 1853. He published "The Naval Dry-Docks of the United States" (New York, 1851); "The Naval and Mail Steamers of the United States and Canada" (1853); "Railroads of the United States and Canada" (1855); "Water-Works of the United States" (1855); and "Civil and Military Engineers of America" (1857).

STUART, Charles E., senator, b. in Columbia county, N. Y., 23 Nov., 1810; d. in Kalamaoo, 19 May, 1887. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and settled in Kalamaoo,Mich. From 1841 till 1846 he was a member of the state legislature in which he calculated the National house of representatives as a Democrat, serving from 6 Dec., 1847, till 3 March, 1849. He was defeated in 1848, but at the next election was again successful, and at the close of his second term was elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 4 March, 1853, till 3 March, 1859. In the senate he was chairman of the committee on public lands. He attended the National Union convention at Philadelphia in 1866.

STUART, George, educator, b. in Saratoga county, N. Y., about 1834. He was taken to Philadelphia at the age of six years, passed through the public schools of that city, and after graduation at the high-school in 1852-3 engaged in teaching. He was assistant professor of mathematics in the high-school in 1854-'6, tutor of Latin and Greek in Haverhill college in 1856-'9, professor of English branches in Girard college in 1859-'62, then principal of a grammar-school till 1866, and since that date has been professor of Latin in the high-school. As co-editor of the "Chase and Stuart Classical Series" he has published, with Prof. Thomas Chase, elementary Latin books and school editions of Cesar's "Gallic War"; Cicero's "Select Orations"; and works of Sallust, Cornelius Nepos, Tacitus, Virgil, and Ovid. He is also the author of an educational tract on "The Raison d'être of the Public High-School System".

STUART, George Hay, philanthropist, b. in County Down, Ireland, 2 April, 1816; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 April, 1890. He came to Philadelphia in 1831, and was a merchant. During the civil war he was president of the U. S. Christian commission. He presided over the international conventions of the Young Men's Christian associations in 1859 and 1861, and over the Presbyterian national convention in Philadelphia in November, 1867, was an officer in the American Sunday-school union, the American Bible society, and the American tract society. He twice declined a seat in President Grant's cabinet, but consented to serve on the first board of Indian commissioners, and was chairman of its purchasing committee. Mr. Stuart was a munificent giver to foreign missions and other religious and charitable objects.

STUART, Gilbert, artist, b. in Narragansett, R. I., 3 Dec., 1755; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 July, 1784. The name Charles was given to him by his father, an ardent Jacobite, but Stuart dropped it, and used only his first name. He attempted portrait-painting when a mere boy, and produced several pictures which, if not remarkable as paintings, were at least good likenesses. Two of these early attempts, portraits of Mr. and Mrs. John Bannister, are now in the Redwood library, New- port. He had no regular instruction until he became, in 1776, the pupil of Cosmo Alexander, a Scotchman. When Alexan- der returned to his native land, about two years later, he took his young pupil with him. Unfortunately for Stuart, his master died soon after arriving in Edinburgh, and left the protection and instruction of Sir George Chalmers, The latter did not long outlive Alexander, and Stuart was thus thrown on his own resources. It is said that he worked his passage home on a "collier bound to Nova Scotia," and while on board he seems to have experienced... much rough usage; but he never spoke of this matter, and any reference to it gave him evident pain. On arriving in this country, after an absence of about two years, he began to practise as a portrait-painter in New York. He had a strong desire to revisit Europe, in order to gain a more complete knowledge of his art, and especially to study under his countryman, Benjamin West. As in the event of war, which then appeared inevitable, it would be impossible for him to visit England for some time, he embarked for London in the spring of 1775. There he had much difficulty in finding employment for his services, and suffered from poverty at times. He had been several years in London before he summoned courage to go to West, who in 1778 received him kindly and gave him much assistance and instruction. Stuart lived with him for several years, during which time, his earnings being as yet scanty, his knowledge of music was of great service to him. He had always been greatly interested in the art, and had learned to play upon several instruments. He now accepted a position as organist in a church, with a salary of £30 a year. After several years, at the advice of West, he opened a studio. The first portrait that brought the young artist into notice was a full-length of W. Grant, of Congalton, which he had painted while still a pupil of West. When it was exhibited in the Society of Artists, it was much admired, and Stuart soon became a fashionable artist in London. He married Charlotte Coates in 1786, and two years later, on an invitation from the Duke of Rutland, went to Dublin, where many noblemen and people of wealth and fashion sat to him. After a stay in Dublin of about four years he returned to the United States in 1792. He spent some time at first in New York, where he painted numerous portraits, among them those of Sir John Temple, John Jay, and Gen. Matthew Clarkson. He went, in 1794, to Philadelphia, with a letter to Gen. Washington from John Jay. His long-cherished wish, to paint the portrait of Washington, was thus to be fulfilled. Washington sat to him the following year, but Stuart was not satisfied with his work. He had gone so far with the portrait, that it was subsequently destroyed by the picture. Rembrandt Peale, however, says that Stuart made five copies of the painting. He next executed a full-length for the Marquis of Lansdowne. This was followed by the head known as the "Athenaeum portrait." The latter was long accepted as the best likeness of Washington, but it is said that this, as well as the Lansdowne portrait, is inferior as a portrait to Stuart's first picture of Washington. Of this third portrait only the head was finished, but it formed the basis of all of Stuart's subsequent portraits of Washington. A large number of replicas of it were executed by Stuart and other artists, and it has been frequently engraved, notably by Asher B. Durand in 1834. Stuart offered it to the state of Massachusetts for $1,000; but it was not accepted. After his death, his widow sold it, together with the companion portrait of Mrs. Washington, for $1,500. It belongs to the Boston Athenæum. While in Philadelphia Stuart painted a large number of portraits, and when the city of Washington was founded, and congress removed to permanent residence in the new city, he remained there. During his stay he was intimately associated with the most eminent men of the country, and his pen and was kept as busy as ever. In 1805 he removed to Boston, where he afterward resided. There were no signs of failing health until 1853-5, when his left arm showed symptoms of paralysis. Yet he still tried to paint, and succeeded in finishing several heads. But soon the gout, which had caused him severe suffering at times, settled on his chest and stomach. This was in 1828, and Stuart, after bearing his pains with great fortitude for three months, died during July of that year. Washington, on hearing this, was asked to pronounce an oration on Stuart, but his feeble health forced him to decline. He wrote an oration, however, which was printed in the Boston "Daily Advertiser." Personally Stuart was a great favorite in society, of which he was very fond. He had a true artist's nature, and was frequently brought into trouble by his reckless expenditures; yet despite the fact, his family was left quite destitute. His remarkable conversational powers were usually employed to good effect while he was occupied with his sitters. At such times it was his custom to draw on his store of narratives and anecdotes, and, as Allston says, "by banishing all restraint, to call forth, if possible, some involuntary traits of the natural character. . . . It was this which enabled him to animate his canvas, not with the appearance of a mere general life, but with that peculiar, distinctive life, which separates the humblest individual from his kind.

Were other evidence wanting, this talent alone were sufficient to establish his claims as a man of genius." Stuart produced during his career an exceedingly large number of portraits—how many is not known. The portrait was painted for money or patronage, as is evident from the catalogue of the exhibition of his portraits, held in 1890 in Boston, gives a list of 534 numbers, and even this is not quite complete. Some of the more important, besides those already mentioned, are the Duke of Northumberland and his children; John Kemble; James Greenleaf and Robert Morris (1795); John Trumbull; Theodore Sedgewick; John Kirke; Gen. Henry Knox; Gen. Henry Dearborn; Gen. Thomas Jefferson; Mr. and Mrs. James Madison; Mr. and Mrs. John Quincy Adams (1818); Madame Jerome Bonaparte; Josiah Quincy (1806 and 1824); John Adams (1825); Fisher Ames; Joseph Story; and John Jacob Astor. His last portrait was that of John Quincy Adams, a full-length, of which only the head was completed when Stuart died. His portraits of Washington, says Greenleaf, "were the most frequently sought after in this country. He painted the body and accessories. Most of these portraits are in the possession of private individuals, but several are owned by the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, the Lenox library, New York, the New York historical society, the Boston art museum, the Redwood library, the Maryland historical society, and Harvard university. He had a remarkable eye for color—"color was one of Stuart's strong points," as his daughter says—and was a master in the rendering of flesh. In painting flesh his practice was to lay the pure colors directly on the canvas, and then drag them together by a large brush. He was especially successful in his heads, the figure and drapery, at least in some of his portraits, being at times quite carelessly executed. Very many of his portraits have been frequently copied by himself and others, and a large number have been engraved. See "Life and Works of Gilbert Stuart," by George C. Mason (New York, 1879).—His daughter, Jane, b. about 1819; d. in Newport, R. I., 28 April, 1888, followed for many years the profession of portrait-painting. She contemplated writing a life of her father, as published several years before his death. All 1877. The work was subsequently written, at her request, by George Champlin Mason.
1838 he removed to Texas, where he established the “Civilian,” an independent Democratic journal, which he continued for nearly forty years. He had resided in Galveston since its foundation, was its mayor in 1848–52, and served as a member of the legislature in 1847–8. During the republic he enjoyed the confidence of Presidents Houston and Jones, and was opposed to the policy of annexation, but following the admission of Texas to the Union he was unwilling to annul the compact. He was appointed collector of customs of Galveston in 1851, and held that office until 1861, when, owing to his opposition to secession, his services were not retained by the Confederate government.

Mr. Stuart was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1866, and subsequently came one of the editors of the Southern "News."

STUART, James, traveller, b. in Duncarn, Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1775; d. in London, England, 3 Nov., 1849. Having killed in a duel Sir Alexander Boswell, the eldest son of Dr. Johnson's biographer, he came to North America, and in 1829–30 travelled in the United States. His views on the natural phenomena and physical phase of the country were characterized by keenness of observation, and, when published in book-form, under the title of "Three Years in North America" (Edinburgh, 1833), attracted much attention, and his sketch in it of his visit to the Saratoga battlefield, including a description of its topographical features is, next to Prof. Silliman's in "Silliman's Tour," the best account of the eastward journey of several adverse criticisms from those of the English reviews that were unfriendly to republican institutions, which elicited a reply from him in a work entitled "A Refutation of Aspersions on Stuart's 'Three Years in North America'" (London, 1834). He edited for several years the London "Quarterly." The violent partisan attitude that he assumed in politics called for chastisement frequently in the pages of "Blackwood's Magazine," especially from John Wilson, in the "Nectes Ambrosianus," where he figures under the name of the "Stot" (steer). Stuart was noted for his taste in art, and his social qualities rendered him welcome in society, although his adherence to principles frequently led him into serious difficulties. He was buried at sea about 1790; d. there in 1792. He came to this country in 1733 with Gen. James E. Oglethorpe. When Fort Loudoun was invested by the Cherokee in the French war, he made terms with Oconostota, who consented that the garrison should march out with their arms and have free passage to Virginia. They were received on the route, but Stuart, who was popular with the Indians, was spared. In 1863 he was appointed general agent and superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern department. On 14 Oct., 1768, he concluded a treaty with the Cherokees, fixing the western boundary of Virginia at Kanawha river, to the chagrin of the people of that province. He had a deputy with each tribe, and exerted great influence over the southern Indians. When the Revolutionary war began, he conceived the idea of suppressing the revolt of the colonies by the aid of the savages. The British cabinet approved his plan, which was to land a body of troops in western Florida, which should march through the territory of the Creeks, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, and with the war cry of the Indians destroy the settlements and exterminate the Whigs by a sudden blow, their attention being diverted by the landing of an army from Boston and an attack on Charleston by the British fleet. Letters were distributed by Stuart among the loyalists in South Carolina, urging them to join the royal standard as soon as it should be raised in the Cherokee country. He circulated among the tribes in the spring of 1776, and arranged for the murderous raid to take place simultaneously with the appearance of Sir Peter Parker's naval force on the coast. But it was frustrated by the vigilance of the Kentucky backwoodsmen (Capt. John Stuart, after the defeat of the Indians and the discovery of his plans, which Sir Henry Clinton made two later attempts to carry out, fled to Florida, and in 1779 returned to England. His property was confiscated in 1782.—His son, Sir John, British soldier, b. in Georgia in 1761; d. in Kensington, England, 1 April, 1867. The older of the two sons of Captain John Stuart, Westminster school, entered the foot-guards as ensign in January, 1779, served under Lord Cornwallis in this country, and was dangerously wounded at Guilford. He was a major-general during the Napoleonic wars, gained a victory over Gen. Jean Louis Ney on Maida, Sicily, 4 July, 1806, for which he was knighted, and was subsequently made a marshal of France.

STUART, John, clergyman, b. in Harrisburg, Pa., 24 Feb., 1740; d. in Kingston, Canada, 15 Aug., 1811. He was the son of a Presbyterian emigrant from the north of Ireland, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1767, entered the communion of the English church, studied and was ordained priest in England, and, after his return in 1770, labored for seven years as missionary among the Indians of the Mohawk valley, into whose language he translated the gospel of Mark and the church catechism. After the revolt of the colonies, his loyalist principles and supposed connection with efforts to rouse the Indians against the Americans led to his expulsion by the Whigs. His house and church were plundered, and he took refuge in Schenectady in 1778, and in 1781 emigrated to Canada, where he was soon afterward appointed chaplain of a provincial regiment. He labored as a missionary among the Indians of Upper Canada, and laid the foundations of the Church of England among the white inhabitants of the province, his parish covering its entire area. For some time he taught an academy in Kingston, and labored the religious instruction of the Indians. He was chaplain to the legislative council some time before his death.—His son, George Oilil, clergyman, b. in Fort Hunter, N. Y., in 1776; d. in Kingston, Ontario, 5 Nov., 1862, was graduated at Harvard in 1801, after first studying in Windsor college, Nova Scotia, was ordained priest in 1804, and was rector of a church in Quebec (now Montreal) till 1811, when he removed to Kingston to succeed his father. In 1829 he was made archdeacon of Kingston. He received the degree of LL D from Windsor college in 1832, and in 1848 that of D D from Harvard. In 1862 he became dean of the newly created diocese of Ontario.—Another son, Sir James, bart., jurist, b. in Fort Hunter, N. Y., 2 March, 1790; d. in Quebec (now Montreal) 11 July, 1868; studied at Windsor college, Nova Scotia, read law with Jonathan Sewell, and was admitted to the bar in 1801. He was assistant secretary to the lieutenant-governor, Sir Robert S. Milnes, for several years, at the same time practising law in Quebec, and in 1825 was appointed solicitor-general for Lower Canada. In 1837 he was elected to represent Montreal in the legislature. He was removed from office in 1839 in consequence of a difference with the executive. He remained in the assembly till 1817, and was in that body the foremost representative of the English party and an eloquent opponent of Chief-Justice Sewell. In 1822 he was sent to England as a delegate of the people of Montreal to advocate the reunion of the provinces, and while there received the appointment of a lord chancellor. He became an executive councillor in 1827, and the same year was elected to represent Sorel in the provincial parliament. His political course led to his suspension from office in March, 1831. This act of the governor-general was approved by the British minister for the colonies in November, 1832. The succeeding colonial minister, to repair the injustice that had been done Mr. Stuart, offered him the post of chief justice of Newfoundland; but he declined, and resumed the practice of law in Quebec. In 1838 the Earl of Durham, at the conclusion of his inquiry into the state of the Canadian provinces, appointed Stuart chief justice of Lower Canada in the place of Jonathan Sewell, who was retired. During Sir John Colborne’s administration he acted as chairman of the special council of Lower Canada, and framed the law for the registration of titles and mortgages, the corporation acts for Quebec and Montreal, and a general municipal system for the province. He prepared the act of union that was passed by the British parliament in 1840, and in that year was created a baronet.—Another John, Andrew, lawyer, d. in Kingston, King’s, Nov. 26, 1786, and of Quebec, 21 Feb., 1840, was educated in the school of Rev. John Strachan, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1807. He established his reputation as an eloquent advocate in 1810, when defending Justice Pierre Bedard, and from that time till his death was employed in nearly every difficult or important suit. He entered the provincial parliament in 1813 as representative of the Lower town of Quebec, and afterward represented the upper town until the constitution was suspended in 1838, except in 1834, when his defeat and that of others who sought to curb popular passions led to the formation of the Constitutional association, of which he was chosen chairman, and by which he was sent to England in 1835 to secure the re-establishment of the colonies. From 1838 till his death he held the office of solicitor-general. He contributed five papers on historical and antiquarian topics to the “Transactions” of the Quebec literary and historical society and published “Notes upon the Southwestern Boundary-Line of the British Provinces of Lower Canada and New Brunswick and the United States of America” (Quebec, 1830); “Review of the Proceedings of the Legislature of Lower Canada, 1831.” (Montreal, 1832); and, with William Badgley, an “Account of the Endowments for Education in Lower Canada” (London, 1838).

STUART, John Todd, lawyer, b. near Lexington, Ky., 10 Nov., 1807; d. in Springfield, Ill., 28 Nov., 1882. His father, Robert Stuart, was a Presbyterian minister, and his maternal grandfather was Levi Todd, one of the survivors of the disastrous Indian battle at the Blue Licks in 1782. He was graduated at Centre college, Kentucky, in 1826, was admitted to the bar, and removed to Springfield, Ill., at the age of twenty-one. He took at once a high place in his profession, and held it continuously for nearly sixty years, to the day of his death. He was a Whig until the formation of the Republican party, served in the legislature from 1832 till 1836, and was defeated in a congressional contest in the latter year, being then the recognized leader of his party. He renewed the contest in 1838, with Stephen A. Douglas as his opponent, and was successful after a campaign that excited national attention. After two terms in congress he declined a re-election. Mr. Stuart was a member of the state senate from 1848 till 1852, and was distinguished for the part he took in settling the questions of the Illinois Central railroad, from the provisions of which the state derives an annual revenue that amounted in 1887 to $396,315.07, the total revenue of the state in the same year being $3,185,697.56. He remained out of public life until 1862, when he was again elected to congress, but now as a Democrat, serving one term, as the special public service of Mr. Stuart was as a commissioner in the erection of a new state-house. He was also chairman of the executive committee of the National Lincoln monument association. He served as a major in the Black Hawk war in 1832, and this title was always used in addressing him. In this campaign he met Abraham Lincoln, and thus began a life-long intimacy. They were fellow-members of the legislature in 1834. He induced Mr. Lincoln to study law, lent him the necessary books, and took him as a partner as soon as he was admitted to practice. This partnership lasted until April, 1841; in 1843 Mr. Stuart associated with himself in legal business Benjamin S. Edwards, and in 1850 his son-in-law, Christopher C. Brown, and their firm was at Mr. Stuart’s death, in 1862, the largest in the state. In personal character Mr. Stuart was a man of character, fidelity, purity, and nobility, and in his busy career as a lawyer and legislator he found time for the exercise in many directions of a wise public spirit, which made him for more than half a century one of the most notable citizens of the community in which he lived.

STUART, Moses, Hebraist, b. in Wilton, Conn., 26 March, 1780; d. in Andover, Mass., 4 Jan., 1832. He was graduated at Yale in 1799, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1802, but did not enter on the practice of his profession, being called to a tutorship in Yale college the same year. After two years of teaching he studied theology, and in 1806 was ordained as pastor of a Congregational church in New Haven. He gained high repute as a forerunner and pioneer of modern Hebrew literature. He was called to the professorship of sacred literature in Andover seminary, although at that time he possessed but a limited knowledge of Hebrew. He applied himself diligently to the language, learning German in order to study the philological treatises of Friedrich II. W. Gesenius, and in 1813 completed a grammar, which was published in manuscript, and copied by his pupils. When he obtained type for printing the work, he could find no compositors acquainted with the Hebrew characters, and therefore began the composition with his own hands. His first Hebrew grammar, which was without the diacritical points, was superseded eight years later by his grammar with points, which was the book that was generally used in the United States, and was republished in England by Rev. Dr. Edward B. Pusey, regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford. Prof. Stuart was the first to make Americans acquainted with the works of Rosenmuller, Ewald, and other German Orientalists, and, by applying their scientific methods of philological and archeological investigation, the new school on biblical exegesis. He retired from his professorship on account of advancing age and infirmities. His publications include a "Sermon" on resigning his pastoral charge (1810) and other discourses: "Grammar of the Hebrew Language without Points" (Andover, 1813); "Letters to Rev. William E. Channing, containing Remarks on his Sermon recently preached and published at Baltimore" (Andover, 1819); "Discussions of Jahn and Others on the Best Method of studying the Languages of the Bible," translated, with notes (1821); "Grammar of the Hebrew Language, with a Copious Syntax and Praxis" (1821); "Elements of Interpretation," translated from the Latin of Johann A. Ernesti, with notes (1822); Two Discourses on the Atoms and the Vacuum, with Notes, by Rufus Robinson, a translation of George P. Whiner's "Grecian Grammar of the New Testament" (1823); "Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (2 vols., 1827–5); "Hebrew Christomathy, designed as a Course of Hebrew Study" (2 vols., 1829–30); "Practical Rules for Greek Accents and Quantity" (1826); "Exegetical Essays upon Several Words relating to Future Punishment" (1830); "Letter to William F. Channing upon the Subject of Religious Liberty" (Boston, 1830); "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, with a Translation and Various Excursus" (Andover, 1832); "Is the Mode of Christian Baptism prescribed in the New Testament?" (1833), to which Prof. Henry J. Riple replied (1837); "Cicero on the Immortality of the Soul" (1833); "The Benediction of Prof. Charles L. Kingsley in the "American Monthly Review"; "Grammar of the New Testament Dialect" (1834); "On the Discrepancies between the Syriac and Athanasian Methods of representing the Doctrine of a Trinity in the Godhead," translated from the German of Friedrich Schleiermacher, with notes and illustrations (1834); "Philological View of Modern Doctrines of Gnosis" (1834); "Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy" (1842); "Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon" (1845); "Commentary on the Apocalypse" (Andover, 1845); "Miscellanies," comprising his letters to Channing and sermons on the atonement (1846); "Hebrew Grammar of Gesenius, as edited by Rödder, translated, with Additions, and also a Hebrew Christomathy" (1846), which drew forth a volume of strictures from the first translator, Thomas J. Conant (New York, 1847); "A Letter to the Editor of the 'North American Review' on Hebrew Grammar," replying to Conant's criticisms (1847); "Conscience and the Constitution, with Remarks on the Speech of Webster on Slavery," a defense of Daniel Webster's arguments in the Compromise of 1850, which generated "Life of Jonathan Trumbull, the Revolutionary Governor of Connecticut" (Boston, 1859).

STUART, Philip, soldier, b. in Maryland in 1769; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 Aug., 1830. He received a good English education, and soon after the beginning of the Revolutionary war became an officer in the Burgoyne's dragoons. Subsequently he served under Col. William A. Washington, and took part in the battle of Eutaw, where he was wounded. Col. Stuart was elected as a Federalist to Congress from Maryland, and served, with re-elections, from 4 Nov., 1811, till 3 March, 1819. During the war of 1812 he was an officer in the Maryland volunteers at the time of the British invasion. He continued a resident of Washington after his retirement from Congress.

STUART, Robert, explorer, b. in Callender, Scotland, 19 Feb., 1785; d. in Chicago, Ill., 28 Oct., 1848. He was the grandson of the Alexander Stuart who is mentioned in the life of Rob Roy as the successful opponent of that chieftain. At the age of twenty-three he went to Oregon, and after spending some time in Canada went out in 1810 as one of the founders of Astoria, Oregon. (See Astor, John Jacob.) It became necessary to communicate with the Atlantic coast, and Mr. Stuart volunteered to make the effort. He set out in June, 1812, with only five attendants. The story of the journey is given at length by Washington Irving in his History of theú Pacific Fur Company. He was also appointed by President Harrison as commissioner for all the Indian tribes of the northwest. In 1834 he removed to Detroit, became treasurer of Michigan, and held other offices of public trust and importance connected with the development of the great lake region. He was known as "the friend of the Indian," while his energetic, lofty, and austere character made him equally venerated and feared among the whites. His son, David, soldier, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 12 March, 1816; d. in Detroit, Mich., 19 Sept., 1898. He removed to Michigan, studied law, and practised in Detroit. He was there elected to Congress as a Democrat, and served from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1855. He subsequently settled in Chicago, Ill., becoming solicitor for the Illinois Central railroad. He was appointed colonel of the 55th Illinois infantry on 31 Oct., 1861, and commanded the 2d brigade of Gen. William T. Sherman's division from 27 Feb. till 14 May, 1862. His brigade held the position on the extreme left at Shiloh, and suffered severe loss, while he was wounded in the shoulder. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 20 Nov., 1862, and commanded a brigade of Michigan infantry during the siege of Corinth and subsequent operations till Gen. Smith was wounded at Chickasaw Bayou, after which he led the division, participating in the capture of Arkansas Post. When the senate failed to confirm his appointment as brigadier-general, he left the service on 3 April, 1863, and returned to legal practice in Detroit.

STUART, Robert Leighton, merchant, b. in New York city, 21 July, 1806; d. there, 12 Dec., 1882. His father, Kinloch, was a successful candy-manufacturer, who came from Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1895, and died in 1826. The son succeeded to the management of the business, and in 1828 formed a partnership with his brother, Alexander. They began refining sugar by steam in 1829, and were the first to succeed in this process. They abandoned candy-making in 1856, devoting themselves solely to sugar-refining, and in 1872 they retired from active business.

Stuart was president of the American Academy of Natural History and of the Presbyterian hospital, New York, was connected with various charitable, scientific, and social organizations, and was known also as the possessor of a large and valuable library and gallery of paintings, and a munificent giver to educational and religious institutions. In politics he was a Whig. In philosophy he was a Universalist.

Mr. Stuart's charities were continued by his widow, whose New York residence was among the finest in the city. His brother, Alexander, b. in New York city, 22 Dec., 1810; d. there, 23 Dec., 1879, was a generous donor to philanthropic objects. The brothers began in 1832 to devote each year a certain minimum sum to works of benevolence, chiefly connected with the Presbyterian church, and before the death of Alexander had given away $1,391,000, which was increased by the subsequent gifts of Robert L. to nearly $2,000,000.

STUART, William, journalist, b. in Galway, Ireland, 7 July, 1821; d. in New York city, 25 Dec., 1886. His real name was Edmund O'Flaherty. He was educated at Eton college, and soon after being graduated became interested in Irish politics. He was elected to parliament, and identified himself with a group that opposed the ecclesiastical-titles bill, but made terms with Lord Aberdeen's coalition ministry in 1852. Edmund O'Flaherty receiving the appointment of commissioner of the income tax. Two years later, becoming peculiarly embarrassed by election expenses and losses on the turf, he attempted to raise money by a fraud, and fled to Paris to avoid prosecution, and thence to New York city. Taking the name of his mother's family, he wrote newspaper articles for a livelihood, and gained a great reputation. His democratic critic by caustic strictures in the New York "Tribune" on Edwin Forrest's style of acting, enhancing the popular interest in his criticisms by sarcastic replies that he wrote for the "Evening Express." He became a theatrical manager in Washington and Philadelphia, and then the lessee of the Winter Garden theatre in New York city, where Edwin Booth gained a great success. Harriet Martineau and Dion Boucicault and Agnes Robertson were introduced to the public in the "Octoroom," which had to be taken off the stage on account of the political feeling that it excited. After the burning of the Winter Garden in 1867, he was associated with Lester Wallack, and in 1869 returned to the profession of journalism. Stuart was a connoisseur in gastronomy, and in the clubs of New York and elsewhere he entertained many notable people of both continents.

STUCKENBERG, John William Wilburn, clergyman, b. in Braunsch, Hanover, Germany, 6 Jan., 1835. He emigrated in early life to the United States, and was graduated at Wittenberg college, Springfield, Ohio, in 1857, after which he returned to Germany to study theology in the universities of Göttingen, Berlin, and Tübingen. He was ordained as a Lutheran minister in 1860, and held pastoral charges in Iowa and Pennsylvania, besides officiating as chaplain of the 45th Pennsylvania volunteers. He was professor of theology at Wittenberg college from 1873 till 1880, and since that time has been pastor of the American church in Berlin, Germany. He is a member of the Berlin philosophical society. In addition to contributions to religious periodicals, he has published "German Rationalism in its Rise, Progress, and Decline," from the German of Carl Rudolf Hagenbach, in conjunction with William L. Gage (Edinburgh, 1865); "Ninety-five Theses" (Baltimore, 1867); "History of the Augsburg Confession from its Origin till the Adoption of the Formula of Concord" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Christian Sociology" (New York, 1880; London, 1881); "Life of Emmanuel Chrysoloras" (London, 1882); and "Introduction to the Study of Philosophy.

StuBer, Henry, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1770; d. there in 1792. He was of German extraction. After graduation at the University of Pennsylvania in 1784, and at the medical department in 1788, he obtained a clerkship in a government office and began the study of law, but was worn out with pulmonary disease, after establishing a reputation as a lively satirist and original thinker. Besides contributions to periodical literature, he wrote a sequel to Benjamin Franklin's "Autobiography," containing an account of his discoveries in electrical science. A memoir was published shortly after his death.

STUNG SERPENT (or Le Serpent Purge), chief of the Natchez Indians, d. in Louisiana, about 1725. The Natchez, having killed some Frenchmen in 1713, and Bienville having been sent to punish them, a deputation, headed by Stung Serpent and other chiefs, came to negotiate with him. After Bienville's expedition had ended successfully, he made peace with the Natchez, and released their chiefs. In 1723 several Natchez villages rose against the French, and a soldier was murdered. The Natchez were sent to reduce them, but Stung Serpent, who was then great chief, endeavored to make separation by fining the villages. He acted as interpreter to the French, and is described as being their best friend among the Natchez. Some authorities place his death later than 1725.

Sturge, Joseph, English author, b. in Elver- ton, Gloucestershire, in 1760. He visited in Birmingham, 1 May, 1859. He was a member of the Society of Friends, established himself as a corn-factor in Birmingham in 1829, acquired great wealth, and devoted himself, among other philanthropic objects, to the abolition of slavery. To familiarize himself with the subject of slavery, he visited the West Indies in 1857, and four years subsequently the United States. He succeeded in the West Indies in 1837; (London, 1838), and "Visit to the United States in 1841" (Boston, 1842). The "Memoirs of Joseph Sturge" were written by Henry Richard (London, 1864).

Sturgeon, Daniel, senator, b. in Adams county, Pa., 27 Oct., 1799; d. in Uniontown, Fayette co., Pa., 2 July, 1878. He was educated at Jefferson college, Pa., studied medicine in Fayette county, and in 1813 began practice. In 1818 he was chosen a member of the Pennsylvania house of representatives, serving three terms, and in 1825
he was elected to the state senate, being speaker of that body the last three years of his term. In 1830 he was appointed auditor-general of the state, which office he filled six years, and in 1836 and 1839
he was state treasurer and ended the "Buckshot war" by refusing to honor Gov. Ritner's warrant for payment of the troops. He was elected U. S.
Measurer as a Democrat for the term that began 4 March, 1839, and was re-elected to that body, his last term expiring 3 March, 1851. In 1853 President Polk appointed him treasurer of the U. S.
mint at Philadelphia, which post he held until 1858.
Although he was called the "silent senator," he was considered a hard-working committee-member. He made but one speech, and that was to reiterate a remark he had made in committee: "Any senator who says anything that would tend to the disruption of the Union is a black-hearted villain."

STURGES, Jonathan, member of congress, b. in Fairfield, Conn., 29 Aug., 1790; d. near Newtown, Conn., Oct., 1814. He was graduated at Yale in 1799, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Fairfield. He took an active part in the pre-Revolutionary movements, and was a representative from Connecticut in the 1st and 2d congresses, serving from 4 March, 1799, till 2 March, 1800. He was a judge of the state supreme court in 1793-1803, and was a presidential elector in 1797 and 1805. He received the degree of LL. D. from Yale in 1806.—His grandson, Jonathan, merchant, b. in Southport, Conn., 24
March, 1802; d. in New York city, 28 Nov., 1874, went to New York in 1821 and became a clerk in a mercantile house, in which he rose to be a junior partner in 1828, and senior partner in 1836.
He remained connected with the firm till 1865, when he retired with a large fortune. He was one of the chief promoters of the Illinois and Central railway and a director, during the civil war was among the most liberal and outspoken supporters of the government, and took an active part in establishing the Union league club of which he was president in 1863. He was active in the measures to break up the Tweed ring and to promote municipal reform in the government of the city of New York. He was distinguished for philanthropy, and was liberal as a founder or supporter of many charities in that city. He was at one time vice-president of the New York chamber of commerce, an active member of the Century club, and a generous patron of art. Mr. Sturges was an intimate friend of the poet Bryant, and was among the most active in the movement that led to the presentation of the vase, known as the "Bryant vase," now in the Metropolitan museum of art.

STURGIS, Frederic Russell, physician, b. in Manila, Luzon, Philippine islands, 7 July, 1844.
He was educated in London, England, and Boston, Mass., was graduated as a physician at Harvard in 1867, practising in New York city. He has been visiting surgeon of the Charity hospital, New York, from 1872, was surgeon of the New York dispensary in 1877-8, and became house physician there in 1878. He was appointed in 1874 clinical lecturer on venereal diseases in the University of the city of New York, in 1880 professor of that department in the same institution, and in 1882 proestor of the Post-graduate medical school and hospital. Prof. Sturges was president of the New York county medical society in 1881-2, and a member of its board of censors in 1878-81. He has published "Students' manual of venereal diseases" (New York, 1889); annotated and edited Diday's work on "Infantile syphilis" (1883); and is the author of many articles on medical subjects.

STURGIS, Samuel Davis, soldier, b. in Shippensburg, Pa., 11 June, 1822; d. in St. Paul, Minn., 28 Sept., 1889. He was graduated at the U. S.
military academy in 1846, entered the 2d dragoons, served in the war with Mexico, and was made prisoner before the battle of Buena Vista, but was exchanged for a 4th Cavalry officer. He served in Mexico, and the territory, and was commissioned captain, 3 March, 1855. At the opening of the civil war he was in command of Fort Smith, Ark., but, all his officers having resigned and joined the souther Confederacy, he evacuated the fort on his own responsibility, and thus saved his command and the government property. He was appointed major of the 4th cavalry, 2 May, 1861, and served in Misouri under Gen. Nathan Lyon, whom Sturges succeeded in command after his death at the battle of Wilson's Creek. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 10 Aug., 1861, was assigned to the Army of the Tennessee, and afterward to the command of the Department of Kansas. In 1862 he was called to Washington to assist the military governor, and was given command of the fortifications around the city. At the battles of South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg he commanded the 2d division of the 9th army corps, and was engaged in the operations in Kentucky from April till July, 1863. He was chief of cavalry of the Department of the Ohio from July, 1863, till April, 1864, was graduated and his command, 13 Jan., 1864. He was engaged at Bolivar, Tenn., 10 May, 1864, and in the expedition against Gen. Nathan Forrest, and in the fight near Guntown, Miss., 10 June, 1864. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 6th cavalry, 27
Oct., 1863, colonel of the 7th cavalry, 6 May, 1869, and was retired, 11 June, 1886. He had been brevetted colonel for Fredericksburg, and brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865. — His son, James Garland, b. in Albuquerque, N. M., 24 Jan., 1854, was graduated at the United States military academy in 1875, and was killed in the Indian massacre on Littie Big Horn river, 25 June, 1876.

veen, Alsace, in 1799; d. there in 1814. He received his education at the University of Strasbourg, and was graduated in medicine in 1799.
In the following year he was appointed assistant surgeon of a regiment in Santo Domingo, but he fled to the United States during the civil war in 1793, and settled in Philadelphia, where he practised his profession. After the peace of Amiens he returned to France, re-entered the army as surgeon-major, and served till 1811, when he was retired on a pension. His works include "Dictionnaire de médécine employés dans les antilles, La Louisiane et l'Amé-STURM, Jacques (storm), French naturalist, b. in Hagnenman, Alsace, in 1743; d. in Nancy in 1802. He entered the church, but received only minor orders, and was for several years preceptor in the family of the Duke d'Agouillon, who obtained for him a scientific mission to South America. Sailing from Brest in 1775, he visited the Canaries and the Verde islands and Brazil, coasted along Chili, Peru, and California, and visited the Philippines, Batavia, and Sumatra, collecting specimens of natural history. In 1785 he returned to South America, at the invitation of the Academy of Medicine, to study the medicinal plants of Brazil. After exploring the basin of the Orinoco, he crossed to Amazon river, which he descended for several, tried miles amid many dangers and hardships. Deserted by his escort, he lived for months with half-civilized Indians, and in 1791 reached Para, after forming a collection of 1,100 plants, 400 of which were new, belonging to 150 families. Owing to the state of affairs in France, he delayed his departure, and accepted a chair in the city college. In 1792 he returned to Paris and presented his collection to the legislature, of which he was elected a corresponding member in 1798. His works include "Deux ans de séjour dans les déserts de l'Amazonie" (Nancy, 1796); "Catálogo raisonné de la flore Brésilienne" (2 vols., 1798); "Essai sur l'histoire naturelle du Brésil" (1800); "Dictionnaire des plantes médicinales propres au Brésil" (1801).

STURTEVANT, Edward Lewis, agriculturist, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Jan., 1843. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1866, and served during that year as captain in the 24th Maine volunteers, after which he was graduated at the medical department of Harvard in 1866. Dr. Sturtevant settled in South Framingham, where he devoted himself to agricultural pursuits on a liberal scale, and to the cultivation of favorite breeds of dairy cattle, also contributing frequent papers to the press and delivering lectures on topics relating to his chosen work. In 1881 he was called to the charge of the New York agricultural station at Geneva, where he remained for six years. He is a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and was president of the Society for the promotion of agricultural science in 1887. Besides many agricultural papers, he published, "The American Farmer" in 1876-9, the "North American Ayshire Register" and the annual "Reports of the New York Agricultural Experiment Station" (1882-7), and, with Joseph N. Sturtevant, published "The Dairy Cow," a monograph on the Ayshire breed of cattle (Boston, 1875).

STURTEVANT, Julian Monson, educator, b. in Jackson village, Ill., 11 Feb., 1896. He was graduated at Yale in 1920, and at Yale divinity-school in 1929, began to teach before his education was completed, and continued to do so till a few months before his death. He was a tutor in Ilinos college in 1828-30, professor of mathematics, natural philosophy, and astronomy in the same in 1831-44, professor of geology and botany in 1844-76, and professor of mental science and the science of government from 1876 till his death. He was successful as an educator, preached frequently, and published "Economics, or Science of Wealth" (New York, 1870), and "Keys of Sect, or the Church of the New Testament" (Boston, 1870). He was a frequent contributor to the "New Englander" and other periodicals.

STUYVESANT, Peter, governor of New York, b. in Holland in 1592; d. in New York city in August, 1642. He was the son of a clergyman of Friesland, and at an early age displayed a fondness for military life. He served in the West Indies, was governor of the colony of Curacao, lost a leg during the unsuccessful attack on the Portuguese island of St. Martin, and returned to Holland in 1644. Being appointed director-general of New Netherlands, he took the oath of office on 28 July, 1646, and reached New Amsterdam on 11 May, 1647, amid such vehement firing of guns from the fort that nearly all the powder in the town was consumed in salutes. Soon after his inauguration on 27 May he organized a council and established a court of justice. In deference to the popular will, he ordered a general election of eighteen delegates, from whom the governor and his council selected a board of nine, whose power was advisory and not legislative. Among his first proclamations were orders to enforce the rigid observance of Sunday, prohibit the sale of liquor and fire-arms to the Indians, and protect the revenue and increase the treasury by heavier taxation on imports. He also endeavored to erect a better class of houses and taverns, established a market and an annual cattle-fair, and was also interested in founding a public school. One of the first acts of the new governor was to enter into a correspondence with the other colonies regarding the decisive settlement of the boundary question; but New England would not agree to terms. He also became involved in a controversy with Gov. Theophilus Eaton, of Connecticut, over the claim of the Dutch to jurisdiction in that state. In 1648 a conflict arose between him and Gov. Van Slenchotenhorst, the commissary of the young patron of Reusselaerswyck at Beverwijk, Stuyvesant claiming power irrespective of the special feudal privileges that had been granted in the charter of 1629. In 1649 Stuyvesant marched to Fort Orange with a military escort, and ordered certain houses to be razed to permit of a better defence of the fort in case of an attack of the English. But Van Slenchotenhorst, commanding that stores and timber should be taken from the patroon's hand to repair the fortifications, this Van Slenchotenhorst refused to do, and the director sent a body of soldiers to enforce his orders. The controversy that followed resulted in the commissary's maintaining his rights and the director's losing some popularity. The first two years of his administration were not free from some trouble with the patroons, who interfered with the company's trade and denied the authority of the governor, and he was also embroiled in contentions with the council, which sent a deputation to the Hague to report the condition of the colony to the states-general. This report was published as "Vertoog van Niew Netherland" (The Hague, 1650). The states-general afterward commanded Stuyvesant to appear personally in Holland; but the order was not confirmed by the Amsterdam chamber, and Stuyvesant refused to obey, saying: "I shall do as I please." In September, 1650, a meeting of the commissioners on boundaries took place in Hartford, whither Stuyvesant travelled in state. The line was arranged much to the dissatisfaction of the Dutch, who declared that the governor had ceded away enough territory to form five colonies each fifty miles square." Stuyvesant grew haughty in his treatment of his opponents, and threatened to dissolve the council. A plan of municipal government was finally arranged in Holland, and the name of the new city—New Amsterdam—was officially announced on 2 Feb., 1653. Stuyvesant made a speech on this occasion, showing that his authority would remain unimpaired. The governor was now ordered to Holland again; but the order was soon revoked on the declaration of war with England. Stuyvesant prepared against an attack by ordering his subjects to make a ditch from the North river to the East river, and to erect breastworks. In 1665 he sailed into the Delaware with a fleet of seven vessels and about 700 men and took possession of the colony of New Sweden, which he called New Amstel. In his absence New Amsterdam was ravaged by Indians, but his return inspired confidence. Although he organized militia and fortified the town, he subdued the hostile savages chiefly through kind treatment. In 1653 a convention of two deputies from each village in New Netherlands had demanded reforms, and Stuyvesant commanded this assembly to disband their authority from God and the company, not from a few ignorant subjects. The spirit of resistance nevertheless increased, and the encroachments of other colonies, with a depleted treasury, harassed the governor. In 1664 Charles II. ceded to his brother, the Duke of York, a large tract of land, including New Netherlands; and four English war vessels, bearing 450 men, commanded by Capt. Richard Nicholls, took possession of the harbor. On 30 Aug. Sir George Cartwright bore to the governor a summons to surrender, promising life, estate, and liberty to all who would submit to the king's authority. Stuyvesant read the letter before the council, and, fearing the concurrence of the people, tore it into pieces. On his appearance the people, who had assembled around the city-hall, greeted him with shouts of "The letter! The letter!" and, returning to the council-chamber, he gathered up the fragments, which he gave to the burgomasters to do with the order as they pleased. He sent a default answer to Nicholls, and ordered the troops to prepare for an attack, but yielded to a petition of the citizens not to shed innocent blood, and signed a treaty at his Bouwerie house on 9 Sept., 1664. The burgomasters proclaimed Nicholls governor, and the town was called New York. In 1665 Stuyvesant went to Holland to report, and labored to secure from the king the satisfaction of the sixth article in the treaty with Nicholls, which granted free trade. During his administration commerce had increased greatly, the colony obtaining the privilege of trading with Brazil in 1648, with Africa for slaves in 1652, and with other foreign ports in 1654. Stuyvesant endeavored unsuccessfully to introduce a specie currency and to establish a mint in New Amsterdam. He was a thorough conservative in church as well as state, and intolerant of any approach to religious freedom. He refused to grant a meeting-house to the Lutherans, who were growing numerous, drove their minister from the colony, and frequently punished religious offenders by fines and imprisonment. On his return from Holland he spent the remainder of his life on his farm of sixty-two acres outside the city, called the Great Bouwerie, beyond which stretched woods and swamps to the little village of Haarlem. The house, a stately specimen of Dutch architecture, was erected at a cost of 6,400 guilders, and stood near what is now Eighth street. Its gardens and lawn were filled by about fifty negro slaves. A pear-tree which he brought from Holland in 1647 remained at the corner of Thirteenth street and Third avenue until 1867, bearing fruit almost to the last. The house was destroyed by fire in 1877. He also built an executive mansion of hewn-stone called Whitehall, which stood on the street that now bears that name. Stuyvesant was about six feet one in height, of a fine physique. He dressed with ease, and usually wore slashed hose fastened at the knee by a knotted scarf, a velvet jacket with slashed sleeves over a full puffed shirt, and rosettes upon his shoes. His lost leg was replaced by a wooden one with silver bands, which accounts for the tradition that he wore a silver leg. Although abrupt in manner, unconventional, cold, and haughty, full of prejudice and passion, and sometimes unapproachable, he possessed large sympathies and tender affection. His clear judgment, quick perception, and extent of reading were remarkable. Washington Irving has humorously described him in his "Knickertbocker's History of New York." Late Captain General and Governor in Chief of Amsterdam
in NewNetherland nowcalled NewYork
and the Dutch West Islands died in1677 aged 80 years.

Stuyvesant in the outer wall of St. Mark's church in New York city.—His wife, Judith Bayard, b. in Holland; d. in New York in 1687, was the sister of Samuel Bayard, of Amsterdam, who married Anna Stuyvesant. She spoke several languages, possessed an excellent voice and a cultivated taste in music, displayed artistic skill in dress, and extended a wide hospitality. She left a fund to the Dutch church in New York for St. Mark's chapel.—Stuyvesant's son, Nicholas William, b. in 1649; d. in 1698, married Maria, the daughter of William Beckman, and afterward the daughter of Brant Van Slechtenhorst. Of their three children, Gerardus married his second cousin, Judith Bayard, and only one of their four sons, Peter, b. in 1727, left descendants. He married Margaret, daughter of Gilbert Livingston, and their sons were Peter Gerard and Nicholas William. Their daughters were Judith, who married Benjamin Winthrop; Cornelia, who married Dirck Ten Broeck; and Elizabeth, who married Col. Nicholas Fish, and became the mother of Hamilton Fish.

—Peter's son, Peter Gerard, lawyer, b. in New York city in 1778; d. at Niagara Falls, N. Y., 16 Aug., 1847, was graduated at Columbia in 1794, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised for a short time in New York city. He was a founder of the New York historical society, of which he was president from 1836 till 1840. His residence, "Petersfield," and that of his brother Nicholas William, the "Bowery House," were built before the Revolution, and were situated on their father's Bauwinera farm. The chief portion of this extensive property was devised to his nephew Gerard Stuyvesant, Hamilton Fish, and Rutherford Stuyvesant.

SUARD, Nicolas (soo-ar), Haytian patriot, b. in Jacmel about 1740; d. in Port au Prince, 26 Feb., 1791. He was a mulatto, and a rich merchant of Cape Français at the beginning of the French revolution. In 1790 he tried vainly to get the delegates of the assembly, and, being defeated on account of his color, went to Paris, where he became a member of the club "Les amis des noirs," and devoted his large fortune to the cause of the emancipation of the slaves and to gain equal political rights for the mulattoes. The assembly having negative a motion for emancipation, Suarez and his countryman Vincent Oge resolved to leave France. They went to Philadelphia and New Orleans, enlisted 250 men, and with a supply of arms and ammunition, landed near Cape Français, 23 Oct., 1790, where they were joined by Jean Baptiste Chavannes and other insurgents. Suarez shared in Oge's defeat, fled with him to the Spanish part of the island, and was delivered to the Spanish authorities and executed.

SUAREZ, Jose Bernardo, Chilian author, b. in Santiago, 29 Aug., 1822. He received his education in the colleges of Merced and San Francisco, and finished his studies in 1842 in the normal school. In 1843 he was appointed inspector of the lyceum of San Felipe, Aconcagua, and in 1847-9 he occupied the chair of humanities in several colleges of Santiago. He visited several schools in Valparaiso, and in 1856 director of the first fiscal school of Santiago, which was founded by order of President Montt. He established in Valparaiso and Santiago the first free evening-schools for artisans, became in 1869 director of the model college, and in 1861 visitor-general of schools for the republic, retiring in 1869 on a pension. He is the author of several published works of various kinds, and has written about twenty historical and didactic works, among which are "Hombres célebres de Chile" (Santiago, 1859); "Plutarco de los Jóvenes" (1861); "Tesoro de Bellas Artes" (1862); "Recreo del soldado Chileno" (1864); "Rasgos Biográficos de niños célebres" (1857); "Rasgos de Prueba" (1869); "Manual del Ciudadano" (1857); and "Principios de la formacion de la Nación" (1888).

SUAREZ, Juan (soo-ar-ray), Spanish colonist, b. in Andalusia about 1540; d. in Aruacania in 1588. He served as captain in the expedition of Diego Flores de Valdes and Pedro Sarmiento, who sailed from Seville, 25 Sept., 1584, to found a colony in the Strait of Magellan. After five ships were wrecked, the fleet, reduced to sixteen vessels, arrived, 24 March, 1582, at Rio Janeiro. Having made several Various attempts to find the strait, they at length arrived at its entrance, 7 Feb., 1583, and cast anchor, but were forced out again by a gale. They returned the following year, when the fleet was reduced to five ships, and were again carried back by the strength of the ebb tide, but anchored close to Cape de las Virgenes, and the landing of the settlers began immediately under the direction of Suarez. With his own persons they soon obliged the ships to quit their anchorage. On the same day Diego de Ribero left for Spain during the night, taking with him the whole fleet except the vessel of Suarez, who refused to abandon the colony. Sarmiento had 400 men, 30 women, and provisions for eight months. They immediately built a city, Nombre de Jesus, near the mouth of the strait, and about eighty miles south founded San Felipe. Sarmiento, leaving the command to Suarez, sailed on 25 May, 1584, for Brazil, and subsequently went to Spain in April, 1585. In August, 1584, the two colonies united, but subsequently Suarez removed with 200 men to Nombre de Jesus. Many died during the winter, and by the hands of the Indians, who ruined the crops. For the beginning of 1585, the colonists of San Felipe to build two banks, but they were wrecked, and in January, 1587, only eighteen men survived. One of these was rescued by Thomas Cavendish, and one other lived to be taken from the strait in 1589 by Andrew Merrick. He belonged to the colony of Nombre de Jesus. The latter suffered, perhaps, greater hardships than those that were conquered by the colonists of San Felipe. Nearly all of them set out toward the middle of 1587 in hope of reaching by land the establishments of the Plate river; but they were either killed by the Indians or died from hunger in the deserts of Araucania. Accounts of the expedition are to be found in Hakluyt's and James Burney's collections, and in the "Noticias de las expediciones a Magallanes" (Madrid, 1788).

SUAREZ, Lorenzo, Mexican missionary, b. in Mexico about 1560; d. in San Gregorio in 1627. He was employed among the Indians of northern Mexico, attained great distinction as an orator both in Spanish and native Mexican languages, and in 1629 was appointed royal preacher. His works include "Sermóns en lengua Mexica" (Mexico, 1617); "Oración Extremadura" (1620), which was among the first printed in the New World. A copy of it was sold at public auction in Brussels in 1847 for $2,500.

SUAREZ PERALTA, Juan, b. in the city of Mexico about 1530. Nothing further is known of his life than that he was a son of one of the Spanish officers who were conquered by the conquistadores and studied. A manuscript chronicle of events in Mexico, written by him in 1589, was some years ago discovered by Marcos Toledo. Although many of its conceptions are erroneous, it has a special merit as containing information not furnished by any previous work. The manuscript was published by Justo Zaragoza, under the original title of it: "Noticies y crónicas históricas de la Nueva España" (Madrid, 1878).

SUAREZ Y ROMERO, Anselmo, Cuban writer, b. in Havana in 1818; d. there in 1889. He was educated in his native city, devoted himself to teaching, and did a great deal in behalf of public education. His literary career began with the publication of his "Biografía de Carlota Valdés" (Havana, 1888), which was followed by a series of masterly sketches and descriptions of Cuban sce-
SUBERCASE, Daniel Anger de, governor of Acadia, b. Limousin, France, 1663; d. there, 1710. In 1701, he was transferred to Canada as an ensign and rose rapidly in the service. In 1700, with 100 men, he occupied the Île d'Orléans, and this movement aided in compelling the British to raise the siege of Quebec. He served during the following years in the war against the Iroquois, and in 1706 was major-general in Frontenac's expedition that burned the villages of the Onondagas. In 1703 he was appointed governor of Port St. Louis of Placentia, and waged war against the English. His main object was to expel them from Newfoundland, and this being approved at court, he set out, 15 Jan., 1706, at the head of 450 well-armed men, soldiers, Canadians, privateersmen, and Indians, all accustomed to maritime warfare, and four rivers filled with floating ice, and they were also delayed two days by a heavy fall of snow. On 26 Jan. they surprised Belleau, took Petty Harbor, three leagues from St. John, and burned every house in the latter place, but they were unable to capture the large fort that protected St. John. Returning by way of Ferryland, which he burned, Subercase sent out parties in six canoes, and to the British forces and to the French and to the United States. After the conclusion of peace he held for three years the office of king's lieutenant at Tobago, but returned subsequently to Santo Domingo, retiring with a pension in 1784. He devoted the remainder of his life to literary labor and historical works, and made several voyages to Paris for researches in the libraries and in the archives of the navy department. Being driven from Santo Domingo by the risings of 1791, he made Nantes his residence, but was arrested during the reign of terror and executed as a pensioner of the monarchy. His published works include "Exposé historique des progrès, du commerce, et de la navigation dans les Antilles françaises pendant les guerres de l'Amérique, 1778-1784; "Histoire de la guerre soutenue par les Français dans les Antilles de 1778 à 1783" (2 vols., 1790); and "Histoire des campagnes du Comte de Bouillé dans les Antilles" (1792). His manuscripts, preserved in the National library at Paris, include "Histoire générale des Antilles" and "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'administration française dans les Antilles.

SUCKLEY, George, physician, b. in the city of New York, in 1830; d. there, 30 July, 1869. He was graduated at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, in 1851, served as resident surgeon in the New York hospital in 1852, and was assistant surgeon in the U. S. army in 1853-6. He became brigade surgeon in 1861, and was staff surgeon, U. S. volunteers, in 1862-3. He became lieutenant-colonel and colonel, U. S. volunteers, 15 Aug., 1865. Dr. Suckley contributed to the transactions of the American medical association and the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences. With James G. Cooper, M. D., he published "Reports on the Natural History, Climate, and Physical Geography of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Oregon," and "Reports of the West Indies" (New York, 1869).

SUCKLEY, Thomas Holy, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 21 Nov., 1849; d. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 9 Feb., 1888. He inherited great wealth from his father, an Englishman of good family, who had been engaged in business in New York city. The son was never engaged in any active business. He devoted himself to the welfare of the poor, to the furtherance of the missions of the Methodist church, and was a benefactor of the Children's aid society, the Brooklyn Methodist Episcopal hospital, and the Society for the prevention of cruelty to animals. He established the Mount Rutson home for aged Methodist ministers near Rhinebeck, and endowed it liberally.

SUCRE, Antonio José de (see-say), South American soldier, b. in Oona, Venezuela, 3 Feb., 1793; d. near Pasto, Colombia, 4 June, 1830. He studied mathematics at Caracas, was graduated at the College of military engineers in 1810, and, joining the patriot cause, was sent in May of that year as post-commander to the province of Barcelona, and in 1811 called to the personal staff of Gen. Miranda. After the capitulation of the latter, Sucre fled to his native province in 1816, joined the invading forces of Santiago Marino, with whom he took part in the campaign of 1813. In March, 1814, he joined Bolivar, who appointed him to the staff of the Army of the Orient, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. After the defeat of Gen. Ribas at Urica, 5 Dec., 1814, Sucre took refuge in Trinidad, and, on Bolivar's landing in Venezuela in 1816, rejoined Marino's forces; but when the latter refused allegiance to Bolivar in Carico, 8 May, 1817, Sucre abandoned his command to join Bolivar in Guayaquil, and was appointed chief of staff of his division. In 1818 he was promoted brigadier and commissioned by Bolivar to solicit arms and ammunition in the West Indies, and, pledging his personal credit, he soon returned with 9,750 stand of arms, twelve cannon, and a plentiful supply of ammunition. Being appointed second chief of the general staff, he displayed such energy in the reorganization of the forces that Bolivar called him the "soul of the army." In this office he assisted in the victorious invasion of New Granada in 1819, and was a consistent, and skilful advisor of Bolivar to arrange for a six-months' armistice, which was signed in Trujillo, 28 Nov., 1820. He was then sent to the south to take command of the forces operating against the Spanish president of Quito, who refused to recognize the validity of the treaty of Teyeto. He reorganized the patriot forces, marched to the port of Buenaventura, embarked his army, and in May, 1821, suddenly landed in Guayaquil, to protect the republican government that had been established there. On 19 Aug. he defeated the Spaniards at Yaguarichi, but he was routed on 12 Sept. at Guachal, and in November obtained a suspension of hostilities, which he employed to reorganize his forces and obtain auxiliary troops. He now marched upon Quito, and on 24 May defeated the enemy in the battle of Pichincha, granting him a capitulation, which finished the Spanish domination in Ecuador, the province declaring itself incorporated in the republic of Colombia. Sucre was promoted major-general and intendant of the department of Guayaquil, and in May, 1823, was sent with a Colombian auxiliary division to Peru. Refusing the command-in-chief, he remained with his forces in the defence of Callao, and sent, on 4 July, a division to assist Santa Cruz in the south. After the arrival of Bolivar, 1 Sept., who assumed the supreme command, Sucre co-operated with him in reorganizing the army for the final campaign against the Spanish dominion. In July, 1824, they marched across the Andes to attack the army of Santander, and defeated him at Junin on 6 Aug. Bolivar, being obliged to leave for Lima to organize the government, appointed Sucre to the command-in-chief of the allied army, ordering him to force a decisive campaign on the viceroy, La Serena. On 9 Dec., Sucre met with 5,800 men the Spanish army of 9,300 men on the plateau of Ayacucho, and totally defeated it, capturing the viceroy and ending the Spanish power in Peru. Sucre was created by the Peruvian congress grand marshal of Ayacucho, and marched at once to upper Peru to subdue Olata, who refused to submit to the capitulation of Ayacucho. He convoked a number of delegates to decide upon the future of the country, which, meeting at Chuquisaca, declared upper Peru an independent republic, under the name of Bolivia, on 10 Aug., 1825. The constituent congress, which met 25 May, 1826, elected Sucre president for life. He accepted the executive, however, only for two years; but the revolution of January, 1827, in Peru, against the authority of Bolivar, caused also several mutinies in La Paz, and finally, on 18 April, 1828, a Colombian regiment revolted in Chuquisaca. Sucre was dangerously wounded, and, on his recovery, he resigned the office and returned to Guayaquil. When finally Ecuador was invaded by the Peruvian troops, Sucre was appointed commander-in-chief, and totally defeated the invaders under Gen. La Mar at Tarqui, 26 Feb., 1829. He now retired to private life, but was sent as deputy for Guayaquil to the Colombian congress at Bogota, 20 Jan., 1830, and was elected president of that republic, and was sent as commissioner to Rosario de Quema to arrange the difficulties with Venezuela. Seeing the hopelessness of the task, he soon returned to Bogota, and when congress closed its sessions, he was returning to his home in Guayaquil when he was shot from ambush in the mountain of Bermejos. At first it was asserted by Gen. Jose Maria Obando, district commander of Pasto, that the murder had been committed by robbers, but it is generally believed that the crime was instigated by Obando himself, though he tried to implicate Gen. Juan Jose Flores. The latter was vindicated by his son, Antonio, in his "El Gran Mariscal de Ayacucho" (New York, 1883). Sucre's remains were transported by his family to the Church of San Francisco in Quito, where the second STANDARD government of Bolivia in 1845, and that of Venezuela in 1875, asked permission to transport them to their respective pantheons.

SUCRE, Etienne Henry (soo-ray), French painter, b. in Port Royal, Acadia, in 1703; d. in Paris in 1745. He was the son of a rich settler who returned to France after the taking of the colony by the English. Young Etienne received his early education at Caen, but finished his studies at the College of the Jesuits at Paris, and became afterward a pupil of the Academy of designs. In 1729 he exhibited in the Academy gallery a "Descente de croix" that was much admired, and in 1741 he was given the title of royal painter with a pension of 1,200 livres. His works include "Paysage avec un Cheval," in the Louvre; "Duc de Saint Simon" (1736); "Christ at the Cradle" (1736); "An Episode of the War in Acadia" (1737); "Acadians driven Away from their Home" (1738); and "Portrait of Louis XV." (1741).

Sudds, William, clergyman, b. in Bradford, England, in 1808. He emigrated to the United States in 1832, was ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church in 1833, and the same year became rector of St. James's church, Zanesville, Ohio. In 1834 he assumed the rectorship of Grace church, Philadelphia. He received the degree of D.D., was for fifteen years either associate or sole editor of "The Episcopal Recorder," and edited "The British Pulpit" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1817).

Sudder, William F., musician, b. in London, England, March, 5, 1843. At the age of seven he came with his parents to the United States. While he was yet a boy he learned to play on several instruments, but he had no regular music-lessons until 1864. Nine years later he became a pupil at the Boston conservatory of music. Mr. Sudds resides at Governor, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., where he keeps a music-store. He occupies compositions on both vocal and instrumental music, and some of his pieces have become very popular. He has also published "National School for the Piano-Forte" (1881), and several collections of music in book-form, including "Anthem Gems" (Philadelphia, 1881-3) and "Modern Sacred Duets" (Cincinnati, 1888).
SULLIVAN, Edward, Canadian bishop, b. in Lurgan, Ireland, 18 Aug., 1832; d. in Toronto, 9 Jan., 1899. He was ordained a priest of the Church of England in 1857, was assistant minister at St. George's church, Montreal, afterward rector of Trinity church, Chicago, and then took charge of a parish in Montreal. He became bishop of Algoma in 1882, resigned in 1892, and was elected bishop of Algoma in 1894. He received a D.C.L. degree.

SULLIVAN, Jeremiah, lawyer, b. in Harrisonburg, Va., 21 July, 1794; d. in Madison, Ind., 6 Dec., 1879. He was educated at William and Mary college, and was admitted to the bar in Winchester, Va., in 1814. He served for some time as a major of volunteers in the war of 1812, and in 1816 removed to Indiana, and, settling at Madison, engaged in practice. In 1821 he was elected to the legislature, and while a member of that body proposed Indianapolis as the name for the state capitol. From 1831 till 1837 he was one of the fund commissioners for the state, in 1837 he was appointed one of the judges of the state supreme court, and he was judge of the criminal court of Jefferson county from 1837 till his death. He was once an unsuccessful candidate for congress, and had been appointed by the governor of the state a commissioner to adjust the land question that arose between Ohio and Indiana out of the construction of the Wabash and Erie canal.—His son, Algernon Sydney, lawyer, b. in Madison, Ind., 5 April, 1829; d. in New York city, 4 Dec., 1887, was educated at Miami university, Ohio, and graduated at the latter in 1850. Having been admitted to the bar, he practised for several years, in 1855 removed to Cincinnati, and in the spring of 1859 to New York, where he soon attracted attention by his legal talent and his oratory. Shortly after the opening of the civil war he was commissioned for several private-armies that had been captured and taken to New York, and his acting in that capacity having caused him to be suspected by the authorities, he was arrested and confined in Fort Lafayette for three months. He was assistant district attorney of New York for three years, and public administrator from 1853 till 1859, resigning each of these offices to attend to his private practice. He was a member of the board of trustees of the Southern society, and connected with many charitable associations.—Another son, Jeremiah Cutter, soldier, b. in Madison, Ind., 1 Oct., 1830; d. in Oakland, Cal., 21 Oct., 1890, served during the civil war, became brigadier-general of volunteers. 28 April, 1862, and resigned, 11 May, 1865.

SULLIVAN, John, soldier, b. in Berwick, Me., 17 Feb., 1749; d. in Durham, N. H., 23 Jan., 1795. Deceased of Beare and Bantry, Ireland, who was killed in his castle of Dunboy in 1549, was his well-known lineal ancestor. His father, Owen, who died in 1796 at the age of 105, was born in Limerick during the siege in 1691, and came to this country in 1729. The son studied law, practiced in Dunboy, and in 1772 held the commission of major-in-ordinary. He was sent from New Hampshire in May, 1774, to the Continental congress at Philadelphia at the age of thirty-three, and was appointed in June, 1775, one of the eight brigadier-generals of the Continental army, then engaged in the siege of Boston. Gen. Nathaniel Greene and himself being placed in command of the left wing under Gen. Charles Lee. Before this, in December, 1774, he had led, with John Langdon, a successful expedition against Fort William and Mary, near Portsmouth. He took a principal part in the siege of Boston, but for a brief period was detached for the defence of Portsmouth. By his influence, when the time was up for the stipulated service of the troops from Connecticut, the army was re-enforced by 2,000 men from his own state of New Hampshire. After the evacuation of the city, Sullivan took command, on 2 June, 1776, of the northern army on the borders of Canada. He made an unsuccessful attack on the British at Three Rivers, but his troops were proscribed by small-pox and menaced by greater superiority, and he led them in a skillful retreat to join Washington at New York. After holding for a brief period the chief command on Long Island, and being appointed major-general, he yielded command on the island to Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, his senior in years and date of commission. With Gen. Stirling and about 8,000 men on Long Island they held a bay for a time 23,000 British troops, better equipped and disciplined. Sullivan and Stirling were captured, but soon exchanged. The former did good service in the operations of Westchester, receiving the thanks of Washington in general orders at the close of the campaign. When Gen. Charles Lee, lodging apart from his troops, was taken prisoner, Sullivan led the right wing to join Washington on the Delaware, and commanded the right wing in the passage of the river on Christmas night, and the capture of the Hessians at Trenton. He also took part in the battle of Princeton. While waiting for the British to attack Philadelphia, Sullivan made a night descent on the Trenton island, seized several regiments that were posted there, and took 100 prisoners. He received the approbation of congress. He then marched rapidly to join Washington, and, in command of the right wing, fought at the Brandywine and at Germantown, where he defeated the British left. When, early in 1778, the alliance was made with France, Sullivan was sent by Washington to take command in Rhode Island, and when D'Easting arrived with his fleet he did his part to raise 10,000 men in a few weeks to co-operate with it against Newport, which was then garrisoned by 7,000 British and Hessians. The volunteers were disembarked by the withdrawal of the French fleet, which sailed away to fight the English, and being re-enforced in numbers at Burlington that 5,000 more troops were on their way to re-enforce the garrison. Sullivan marched the army, now reduced to 6,000 men, to Butts' hill, and from 7 A.M. to 7 P.M. on 29 Aug. fought what Lafayette pronounced the best-contested battle of the war. 6,000 on each side, virtually ending about 4 P.M. in driving the enemy from the battle-field at the point of the bayonet. While waiting in the summer of 1779 for the promised return of D'Easting from the West Indies to co-operate against Canada, Sullivan, in command of 4,000 men, to prepare the way, entered the Iroquois' country in the state of New York to punish and prevent the devastations of the Indian tribes and their English allies, and defeating all that ventured to oppose him, including a force under Joseph Brant and Sir John Johnson at Newtown on 29 Aug., 1779, drove out of the country thousands of Indian warriors and destroyed their villages and crops. After moving several hundred miles through the wilderness, he returned to Pennsylvania to learn that D'Estaing had fruitlessly spent his strength in the siege of Savannah and sailed for France. His health being shattered by five years' active and continuous service in the field, he resigned, and was again sent to the British and Continental congress, where he helped to reorganize the army and to establish the finances and public credit. He was chairman of the committee that aided in suppressing the mutiny of Pennsylvania troops in 1781. Resuming his practice in New Hampshire, he was president of the state in 1786-9, a member of the State constitutional convention of 1784, councillor in 1781, and a commissioner to settle the "New Hampshire grant" troubles with Vermont. In 1786, by intrepidity and good management, he saved his state from anarchy, and in 1788 he was active in securing the adoption of the constitution of the United States. From 1789 till his death he was U. S. judge for his state. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1790. See his life by Oliver W. B. Peabody in Sparks's "American Biography"; his "Military Services and Public Life," by Thomas C. Amory (Boston, 1808); and "Journals of the Military Expedition of Major-General John Sullivan against the Six Nations of Indians in 1799, with Records of Centennial Celebrations," prepared by order of the state government (Auburn, N. Y., 1876). His son, George, statesman, b. in Dummer, N. H., 29 Aug., 1771; d. in Exeter, N. H., 14 June, 1838, was graduated at Harvard in 1790, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise at Exeter in 1793. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1805, attorney-general of New Hampshire in 1805-6, a member of congress in 1811-13, and of the state senate in 1814-15, and was again attorney-general in 1816-18. He published orations and pamphlets—Gen. John's brother, James, statesman, b. in Berlin, Me., 22 April, 1744; d. in Boston, Mass., 10 Dec., 1808, was intended for a military life, which he was prevented from following by the fracture of a limb. He began to study law under his brother, was admitted to the bar, began practise at Biddeford, and in 1770 received the appointment of a king's attorney for York county. He early took an active part in the Revolution, was a member of the Provincial congress of the Massachusetts in 1775, and with two others ably executed a difficult mission to Ticonderoga. In the early part of 1776 he was appointed a judge of the superior court, which post he resigned in February, 1782. In 1779-80 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and in 1784-5 he was a delegate from Massachusetts to the Continental congress. He repeatedly represented Boston in the state assembly, and in 1784 was a commissioner to settle the controversy between New York and Massachusetts regarding their claims to western lands. In 1787 he was of the executive council and judge of probate of Suffolk county, and he served as attorney-general from 1790 till 1807, when he was elected governor of Massachusetts by the Republican party and re-elected in 1808. He was one of the commissioners appointed by Washington to settle the boundary-line between Vermont and New Hampshire. He was a member of the British and Continental congress, and the projector of the Middlesex canal, which was constructed under the superintendence of his son, John Langdon. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences from its institution, and one of the principal founders of the Massachusetts historical society, and for many years its president. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1789. He published "Observations on the Government of the United States" (Boston, 1791); "The Path to Riches, or Dissertation on Banks" (1792); "History of the District of Maine" (1795); "The Altar of Baal thrown Down, or the French Nation Defended" (1795); "Impartial Review of the Causes of the French Revolution" (1801); "History of Land-Titling in Massachusetts" (1801); "Discourse on the Connection of the Liberty of the Press" (1801); "Correspondence with Col. Pickering" (1805); and "History of the Penobscot Indians," in "Massachusetts Historical Collections." His life, with selections from his writings, was published by his grandson, Thomas C. Amory (2 vols., Boston, 1859)—James's son, William, author, b. in Soc., Me., 20 Nov., 1774; d. in Boston, Mass., 3 Sept., 1854. He graduated at Harvard in 1792, admitted to the bar in 1795, and practised successfully for many years in Boston, where he was long president of the Suffolk bar association. He was frequently a member of the state legislature and council of Massachusetts between 1804 and 1830, and was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1830. He was a brigadier-general of militia, a member of the Pennsylvania College of arts and sciences, the Massachusetts historical society, and the American philosophical society. Mr. Sullivan was a fine belles-lettres scholar, and a persuasive orator. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1829. He published "Political Class-Book" (Boston, 1831); "Moral Class-Book" (1833); "Historical Class-Book"; "Familiar Letters on the Public Men of the Revolution, including Events, 1783-1815" (1834); new ed., with a biographical sketch of the author, by his son, John T. S. Sullivan, Philadelphia, 1847); "Sea Life" (Boston, 1837); "Historical Causes and Effects, A. D. 476-1517" (1838); and many addresses.—William's son, John Turner Sargent, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 Feb., 1818, was educated in Germany, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Philadelphia, Pa., and St. Louis, Mo. His social and convivial qualities made him very popular. He wrote several well-known songs, and, besides the memoir of his father, published translations of stories from the German.—Another son of Gov. James, John Langdon, b. in Boston, Mass., 9 Feb., 1818, after engaging in mercantile business travelled in Europe, studied the construction of canals in France and England, and in 1894 was appointed agent and engineer of the Middlesex canal, between Boston and Concord, N. H. He invented a steam tow-boat, for which he received a patent in 1814, in preference to Robert Fulton, who applied for it at the same time.

SULLIVAN’s priority of invention being fully shown. In 1824 he was appointed by President Monroe associate civil engineer of the board of internal improvements, which post he resigned in 1825, after reporting the practicability of a canal across the Alleghenies. He then studied medicine, received his degree at Yale in 1827, and engaged in practice at New Haven, adapting the views of the homeopathists. In 1847 he removed to New York. Dr. Sullivan made some important inventions and discoveries in medicine and surgery, and published pamphlets on steamboat navigation. —John Langdon’s son, Thomas Russell, clergyman, b. in Brookline, Mass., in 1799; d. in Somerville, Mass., 29 Dec., 1858. He was settled as a Unitarian minister at Keene, N. H., in 1825-35, and taught in Boston from 1835 till his death. He published “Remarks on Robinson’s Sermon on the Divinity of Christ” (Keene, N. H., 1829); “Letters against the Immediate Abolition of Slavery” (Boston, 1835); “Limits of Responsibility in Reforms” (1861); and other controversial writings. He edited sermons on “Christian Communion.”

SULLIVAN, Michael, Canadian educator, b. in Killarney, County Kerry, Ireland, 13 Feb., 1838. He came to Canada in 1842, and settled with his parents at Kingston, where he was educated at Regiopolis college, and graduated as a physician at Queen’s college in 1862. After practicing for ten years that he left Canada and in 1862 offered to teach in an anatomy in Queen’s college, and upon the establishment of the Royal college of physicians and surgeons in affiliation with Queen’s, he became its professor of anatomy. He is now (1888) professor of surgery and histology in the same college and of anatomy in the Female medical college, a branch of the Royal college of physicians and surgeons. He is also a trustee and in the Ontario medical council, and president of the Medical association of Canada in 1888. He was mayor of Kingston in 1874 and 1875, an unsuccessful candidate for the Dominion parliament in the Conservative interest in 1882, and was appointed senator, 29 Jan., 1884. He was purveyorgeneral during the northwest rebellion in 1885, and represented Prince Edward Island in the Legislature.

SULLIVAN, Peter John, soldier, b. in County Cork, Ireland, 15 March, 1821; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 2 March, 1883. He was descended from Gen. William O’ Sullivan of the British army, came to this country with his parents when he was two years old, passed his early years in Philadelphia, and was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He omitted the prefix “O” from his name on reaching manhood. He served through the Mexican war, attaining the rank of major, and at its close was appointed an official stenographer in the U. S. senate. In 1848 he removed to Cincinnati, studied law, and was a draughtsman for the U. S. topographical corps. In 1855 he was elected colonel of the German regiment and contributed toward the suppression of the “Know-Nothing” riots of that year. At the opening of the civil war he raised four regiments at his own expense, was commissioned colonel of the 4th Ohio volunteer infantry, and was present at Shiloh, where he captured a Confederate flag and was wounded three times. In consequence of his injuries he was unfit for service for nine months, but he was present at the fall and capture of Vicksburg, was post-commander at Memphis and Fort Pickering, and during the last days of the war was the presiding judge of the military court of claims. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious services, and immediately after was appointed by President Johnson minister to the United States of Columbia, serving till 1869, when his health compelled him to resign. He subsequently practiced occasionally in the U. S. supreme court, in the court of claims, and in the government departments at Washington, D. C. He was the author of the “Don Felix, Letters, or Pen-Portraits of Members of the Bar.”

SULLIVANT, William Starling, botanist, b. in Franklinton, near Columbus, Ohio, 15 Jan., 1803; d. in Columbus, 30 April, 1873. He was educated at Ohio university, and at Yale, where he was graduated in 1823. The death of his father, Lucas, greatly increased his responsibilities, and he was called to the charge of the family property. This duty led to his becoming a surveyor and practical engineer, which occupation he followed until late in life. Meanwhile he turned his attention to botany, and collected and studied the plants of central Ohio, publishing “A Catalogue of Plants, Native or Naturalized, in the Vicinity of Columbus, Ohio” (1840). Soon afterward he turned his attention to mosses, which became the subject of his special study until he was recognized as the most accomplished bryologist that this country has ever produced, and it is doubtful whether his superior existed anywhere. His first publication in this branch of botany was “Musci Alleghenienses” (2 vols., 1845), the materials for which he collected on a botanical excursion along the Allegheny mountains from Maryland to Georgia in 1843. His next work of importance was “Contributions to the Bryology and Hepaticology of North America” (2 parts, 1846-9), which appeared originally in the “Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.” The description of the Musci of Cuba and the “Hepaticology of Cuba and the United States” was prepared by him and issued separately as “The Musci and Hepaticae of the United States East of the Mississippi River” (New York, 1856). In association with Leo Lesueur (q. v.) he published “Musci Boreali Americi Exsiccati” (1856); containing the results of a journey through the mountains of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, in which he examined the specimens that were collected by Charles Wright in Cuba, and issued “Musci Cubenses” (1860); also those gathered by August Fendler in Venezuela and by Charles Wright on the North Pacific exploring expedition, but the results had not been published at the time of his death. The mosses collected by the South Pacific exploring expedition under Capt. Charles Wilkes, and those of the Pacific railroad exploration under Lieut. Amiel W. Whipple, were examined by him, and his results appeared in the government’s reports of the expeditions. His greatest work was “Icones Muscorum” (1864; Supplement, 1874), consisting of figures and descriptions of most of those mosses found in North America that had not been represented up to that time. The name of Sullivantia Ohionis was given by his associates, Asa Gray and John Torrey, to a rare saxifragaceous plant which he had discovered in Ohio. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Gambier in 1864, and, besides his membership in scientific societies in the United States and Europe, he was elected to the National academy of sciences in 1872. His bryological books and his collections and preparations of mosses were given to the Gray herbarium of Harvard university, and the remainder of his botanical library, his choice microscopes, and other collections were bequeathed to the University of Ohio and to Starling medical college, which was founded by his uncle, and of which he was the senior trustee.—His brother, \textbf{Michael Lucas}, farmer, b. in Franklinton, Ohio, 6 Aug., 1807; d. in Henderson, Ky., 29 Jan., 1879, was educated at Ohio university and at Centre college, Kentucky, and afterward engaged in farming. He proceeded at once to improve the immense tract of land that he inherited from his father, and purchased mules and blooded horses, and was an originator of the Ohio stock importing company, which introduced a new era of stock-breeding in the West. In 1854 he sold his Ohio estate, bought 80,000 acres of land in Illinois, and engaged in farming on a larger scale than had ever been attempted before. He introduced new methods and improved machinery in his farm of "Broadlands," but, meeting with reverses, he sold part of his property and retired to his farm of 40,000 acres at Burr Oaks, Ill. The estate embraced sixty-five square miles.

SULLY, Thomas, painter, b. at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, England, 8 June, 1785; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Nov., 1873. At the age of nine he was brought by his parents to the United States. His father placed him in 1795 in an insurance broker's office, but it soon became evident that art was his true vocation. In 1799 he joined his brother Laurence, a miniature painter, at Richmond, Va., and two years later removed with him to Norfolk. Thomas soon surpassed his brother, and began to try his hand at oil portraits, aided somewhat by Henry Bembridge. He determined to go to London for study, and worked hard to gain sufficient money to carry him there. But the death of his brother in 1804 decided him to remain and protect the latter's family, who he understood were unprovided for. In 1806, after marrying his brother's widow, Sully went to New York, where he resided until 1808. In 1807 he made a short visit to Boston, where he had some instruction and advice from Gilbert Stuart. He returned to Philadelphia in 1809, and went the same year to London. Here he studied for some time under Benjamin West, and made copies after old masters that had been contracted for in this country, after which he embarked for New York in 1810. He now settled permanently in Philadelphia. During the following years he executed numerous portraits, notably those of George Frederick Cooke as Richard III., which is owned by the Pennsylvania academy; Benjamin Rush (1814); and Gen. Decatur, in the city hall, New York. After an 1818 the legislature of North Carolina applied to him for two full-length portraits of Washington. Sully, in reply, proposed to paint a historical picture which should represent some memorable action of the great commander, and suggested the crossing of the Delaware. This was agreed upon; but when Sully wrote for the dimensions of the space that the picture was to occupy, he received no answer. Nevertheless, he proceeded with the work on a canvas of large size. When, after a considerable expense of time and money, the picture was finished, he was informed that there was no place fitted to receive it, and it was thrown upon his hands. The picture finally came into the possession of the Boston museum. Sully was perhaps most successful in his portraits of women. Henry T. Tuckerman says of him: "His organization fits him to sympathize with the fair and lovely rather than the grand or comic. ... Sully's Portraits of the Fair" are among the most successful portraits, of which many have been engraved, are those of Gen. Jonathan Williams (1815); Bishop William White, of Pennsylvania; Lafayette, in Independence hall, Philadelphia; Thomas Jefferson, painted for the United States military academy (1821); Fanny Kemble and her father, Charles Kemble; Reverdy Johnson; Charles Carroll of Carrolton; Queen Victoria, painted in 1837-8 for the St. George society, Philadelphia; Rembrandt Peale; Percival Drayton (1827); Alexander J. Dallas; Dr. Philip Syng Physick; Joseph Hopkinson; George M. Dallas; and Robert F. Stockton (1851). The Corcoran gallery owns the portraits of James Madison, Andrew Jackson (1825), John Marshall, and a portrait of Maria Effingham. By the aid of some of his portraits, he was able to purchase a considerable number of historical pictures, among which are "Capture of Major Andre" (1812) and "Miranda" (1815). Sully wrote an autobiographical sketch, "Recollections of an Old Painter," which appeared in "Hours at Home" for November, 1869. His "Hints to Young Painters," which he prepared for the press in 1851 and revised in 1871, was published after his death (Philadelphia, 1871). His son-in-law, James, afterward Mrs. John C. Darley, followed their father's profession.—Another son, Alfred, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1821; d. in Fort Vancouver, Washington territory, 17 April, 1879, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, assigned to the 2d infantry, which was then engaged in the Seminole war, and participated with credit in the attack on Havana, Oct., 1842. He was on garrison duty on the great lakes till the Mexican war, and after the siege of Vera Cruz in 1847 was ordered to the north on recruiting service. He was then stationed in California, and on 22 Feb., 1849, was promoted to captain. In 1853 he was sent with others to re-enforce the governor of Oregon in an impending insurrection, and returned with him in December of that year, while on his way to New York, he was wrecked off the California coast and remained six days on a desert island. He was then in Minnesota, Nebraska, and Dakota till 1858, and, after spending a year in Europe on leave of absence, took part in operations against the Cheyenne Indians in 1859-61. He then served in the defense of Washington and 4 March, 1862, when he became colonel of the 1st Minnesota regiment. He led a brigade during the change of base to James river, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, for gallantry at Fair Oaks, and colonel for Malvern Hill. After engaging in the northern Virginia and Maryland campaigns, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 1 Oct., 1862. He led his brigade again on 4 March, and in May, 1863, was assigned to the command of the Department of Dakota, where he soon gained note by his expeditions against hostile northwestern Indians, especially in the engagement at White Stone Hill, 3 Sept., 1863, that at Tah-ah-ka-ha-kut, 28 July, 1864, and the skirmish in the Bad Lands, 8 Aug., 1864. He was given the rank of major-general of volunteers, and that of brigadier-general in the regular army, at the close of the war, and subsequently served on the board of promotion, and was on special service in the interior department at Washington. He was made lieu-SULTE, Benjamin, Canadian author, b. in Three Rivers, Quebec, 17 Sept., 1841. He early devoted himself to literary pursuits, became editor of "Le Canada" in 1866, entered the service of the Canadian parliament as one of its translators in November, 1867, and in 1870 became attached to the department of militia and defence. He established in Three Rivers the Literary institute, of which he was the first president, was elected in 1866 corresponding member of the "Cercle artistique et littéraire" of Brussels, Belgium, was president of the Institute Canadien-Français in 1854-6, and was corresponding delegate of "L'Institution ethnographique de France" in 1870. He became a member of the Royal society of Canada in 1882, and in 1883 was made president of its first section. He is also connected with various learned societies in the United States, Canada, and Europe. He has contributed to periodicals, and published "Les Laurentiennes" (Montreal, 1870); "History of Three Rivers" (1870); "Les chants nouveaux" (1876); "Mélanges d'histoire et de littérature" (Ottawa, 1876); "Chronique ettrivuline" (Montreal, 1879); and "Histoire des Canadiens-Français" (8 vols., 1879-84).

SUMMERFIELD, John, clergyman, b. in Preston, England, 31 Jan., 1798; d. in New York city, 18 June, 1825. He was educated at a Moravian school, and removed to Dublin in 1813, where he plunged into a life of dissipation, and wasted himself by evil habits. A period of contrition succeeding, he united in 1817 with the Wesleyans, where his pulpit talents attracted universal attention, and in 1819 he was preaching to immense congregations in Dublin and doing missionary labor. His health failing, he removed to New York in 1821, and in 1823 was elected dean of the Methodist conference of that state. In 1822 he visited Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, his eloquence everywhere arousing enthusiasm. The same year he visited France and England, again in quest of health, and having been appointed a delegate to the anniversary meeting of the Protestant Bible society in Paris. Upon his return, in April, 1824, he preached in the large cities with great success, and formed missionary societies till the following February. He was a founder of the American tract society a short time before his death. Prin- ceton gave him the degree of M.A. in 1822. His biography was written by John Holland (New York, 1829) and by William M. Willett (Philadelphia, 1857), and his "Sermons and Sketches of Sermons" were published (New York, 1842).

SUMMERS, Thomas Osmond, clergyman, b. in Dorsetshire, England, 11 Oct., 1812. He came to the United States in 1839, united with the Methodist church, was admitted to the Baltimore conference in 1855, and appointed to the Augusta circuit, Va. In 1840 he was one of the organizers of the first Texas conference, four years later he was transferred to the Alabama conference, of which he was a member till 1876, and in 1849, as secretary of the Tabernacle convent, was addresed by the organization of the Methodist Episcopal church, south. The following year he was appointed co-editor of the "Southern Christian Advocate" and chairman of the committee to compile a new hymn-book. In 1850 he was elected by the general conference editor of their books and tracts and of the Sunday-School Visiting Institution; and while he took charge of the "Southern Quarterly Review." During the civil war he returned to Alabama and performed pastoral work till 1866, when he was appointed editor of the Nashville "Christian Advocate." He became professor of systematic theology in Vanderbilt university, Nashville, Tenn., in 1874, was dean of the theological faculty, and ex-officio pastor of the institution. He has been secretary of every general conference of his church. The degrees of D.D. and LL. D. have been conferred upon him. Dr. Summers has revised and edited hundreds of church books with introductions, notes, and additions. Among his works are "Commentaries on the Gospels and on the Acts of the Apostles" (6 vols.); "Commentary on the Ritual of the E. E. Church," 3d ed. (1868); "The Golden Censer"; "Refutation of Thomas Paine's Theological Writings, not answered in Bishop Warren's "Apology"?; Watson's "Biblical and Theological Dictionary," enlarged and revised; and many tracts, pamphlets, and sermons.

SUMNER, Charles, statesman, b. in Boston, Mass., 6 Jan., 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 March, 1874. The family was English, and William Sumner, from whom Charles was descended in the seventh generation, came to America about 1635 with his wife and three sons, and settled in Dorchester, Mass. The Sumners were generally farmers. Job, grandfather of Charles, entered Harvard in 1774, but in the next year he joined the Revolutionary army, and served with distinction during the war. He was not graduated, but he received in 1785 an honorary degree from the college. He died in 1789, aged thirty-three. Charles Pynchey Sumner (b. 1776, d. 1839), father of Charles, was graduated at Harvard in 1796. He was a lawyer and was sheriff of Suffolk county from 1825 until a few days before his death. In 1810 he married Relief Jacob, of Hanover, N. H., and they had nine children. Charles was the eldest and twins. Matilda died in 1832. Sheriff Sumner was an upright, grave, formal man, of the old Puritan type, fond of literature and public life. His anti-slavery convictions were very strong, and he foretold a violent end to slavery in this country. In his family he was austere, and, as his income was small, strict economy was indispensable. Charles was a quiet boy, early matured, and soon showed the bent of his mind by the purchase for a few cents of a Latin grammar and "Liber Primus" from a comrade at school. In his eleventh year he was placed at the Latin-school where Wendell Phillips, Robert C. Winthrop, James Freeman Clarke, and other boys, afterward distinguished men, were pupils. His first attempts were in general information, and in writing essays, but he was not especially distinguished. Just as he left the Latin-school for college he heard President John Quincy Adams speak in Faneuil hall, and at about the same time he heard Daniel Webster's oration upon Adams and Jefferson. It was in a New England essentially humanitarian style that the Sumner were reared and formed the Sumner grew up. At the age of fifteen he was reserved and thoughtful, caring little for sports, slender, tall, and awkward. His thirst for knowledge of every kind, with singular ability and rapidity in acquiring it, was already remarkable. He had made a compend of English history in eighty-six pages of a copy-book, and had read Gibbon's history.

In September, 1826, he began his studies at Harvard. In the classics and history and forensics, and in belles-lettres, he was among the best scholars. But he failed entirely in mathematics. His memory was extraordinary and his reading extensive. Without dissipation of any kind and without sensitiveness to humor, generous in his judgment of his enemies, devoted to little society he was a general favorite, although his college life gave no special promise of a distinguished career. In his junior year he made his first journey from home, in a pedestrian tour with some classmates to Lake Champlain, returning by the Hudson river and the city of New York. In 1830 he was graduated, and devoted himself for a year to a wide range of reading and study in the Latin classics and in general literature. He resolutely grappled with mathematics to repair the defect in his education in that branch of study, wrote a prize essay on commerce, and listened carefully to the Boston orators, Webster, Everett, Chase, and Channing. No day, no hour, no opportunity was lost for acquiring knowledge. His first interest in public questions was awakened by the anti-Masonic movement, which he held to be a "great and good cause," two adjectives that were always associated in his estimate of causes and of men. Mindful of Dr. Johnson's maxim, he diligently maintained his friendships by correspondence and intercourse. On 1 Sept., 1831, he entered the law-office of Judge Story. He was the chief professor. Story had been a friend of Sumner's father, and his friendly regard for the son soon ripened into an affection and confidence that never ceased. Sumner was now six feet and two inches in height, but weighing only 120 pounds, and not personally attractive. He was never ill, and was an unerring walker; his voice was clear and his smile quick, his humorous laugh, his intellectual industry and his memory were extraordinary. He began the study of law with the utmost enthusiasm, giving himself a wide range, keeping careful notes of the moot-court cases, writing for the "American Jurist," and preparing a catalogue of the library of the Law-school. He joined the tempest society of the professional schools and the college. His acquirements were already large, but he was free from vanity. His mental habit was so serious that, while his talk was interesting, he was totally disconcerted by a jest or gay repartee. He had apparently no ambition except to learn as much as he could, and his life then, as always, was pure in word and deed.

When the question of slavery had already begun, "The Liberator" was established by Mr. Garrison in Boston on 1 Jan., 1831. The "nullification movement" in South Carolina occurred while Sumner was at the Law-school. He praised President Jackson's proclamation, and saw civil war impending; but he wrote to a friend in Boston, Politics I begin to loathe; they are for a day, but the law is for all time." He entered the law-office of Benjamin Rand, in Boston, in January, 1834, wrote copiously for the "Jurist," and went to Washington for the first time in April. The favor of Judge Story opened to Sumner the pleasantest houses at the capital, and his professional and general accomplishments secured an ever-widening welcome. But Washington only deepened his love for the law and his aversion to politics. In September, 1834, he was admitted to the bar. During the month that he passed in Washington, Sumner described his first impression of the unfortunate race to whose welfare his life was to be devoted: "For the first time I saw slaves [on the journey through Maryland], and my worst preconception of their appearance and ignorance did not fall as low as their actual stupidity. They appear to be nothing more than moving masses of flesh, endowed with anything of intelligence above the brute. I have now an idea of the blight upon the soul of the poor old slave who, acting upon hearing Calhoun, says: 'He will be the last man I shall ever hear speak in Washington.' In 1835 he was appointed by Judge Story a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States and reporter of Story's judicial opinions, and he began to teach in the Law-school during the judge's absence. This service he continued in 1836-7, and he aided in preparing a digest of the decisions of the supreme court of Maine. He wrote upon literary and legal topics, he lectured and edited and pleaded, and he was much overworked in making a bare livelihood. In 1835 his interest in the slavery question deepened. The first newspaper for which he subscribed was "The Liberator," and then he wrote to Dr. Francis Lieber, then professor in the college of South Carolina, a letter of it [slavery]. Should it longer exist? Is not emancipation practicable? We are becoming Abolitionists, at the north, fast." The next year, 1836, his "blood boils" at an indignity offered by a slave-master to the Boston counsel of a fugitive slave. Sumner now saw much of Channing, by whose wisdom and devotion to freedom he was deeply influenced. His articles in the Socialists, and his letters correspondence with many eminent European publicists. His friends at home were chiefly among scholars, and already Longfellow was one of his intimate companions. In the summer of 1836 he made a journey to Canada, and in December, 1837, he sailed for France.

He carried letters to distinguished Americans to distinguished Europeans, and his extraordinary diligence in study and his marvellous memory had equipped him for turning every opportunity to the best account. During his absence he kept a careful diary and wrote long letters, many of which are printed in the memoir by Edward L. Pierce, and there is no more graphic and interesting picture than that present of the social and professional life at that time of the countries he visited. Sumner remained in Paris for five months, and carefully improved every hour. He attended 150 university lectures by the most renowned professors. He walked the hospitals with the great surgeons. He frequented the courts and theaters and opera and libraries and museums. He was a guest in the most elegant, and he saw and noted everything, not as a loafer, but as a student. On 31 May, 1838, he arrived in England, where he remained for ten months. No American had ever been so universally received and liked, and Carlyle characteristically described him as "Popularity Sumner. He saw and studied England in every aspect, and in April, 1839, went to Italy and devoted himself to the study of history, art, and literature, with which, however, he was already familiar. In Rome, where he remained for some months, he met the sculptor Thomas Crawford, whom he warmly befriended. Early in October, 1839, he left Italy for Germany, in the middle of March, 1840, he was again in England, and in May, 1840, he returned to America.
He showed as yet no sign of political ambition. The "hard-eider campaign" of 1840, the contest between Harrison and Van Buren, began immediately after his return. He voted for Harrison, but without especial interest in the measures of the Whig party. In announcing to a brother, then in Europe, the result of the election, he wrote: "I take very little interest in politics." The murder of Lovejoy in November, 1847, and the meeting in Faneuil hall, where Wendell Phillips made his memorable speech, and the local disturbances that attended the progress of the anti-slavery agitation throughout the northern states, had plainly revealed the political situation. But Sumner's letters during the year after his return from Europe do not show that the question of slavery had especially impressed him; while his friends were in the most socially delightful circles of conservative Boston. But in 1841 the assertion by Great Britain, of a right to stop any suspected slaver to ascertain her right to carry the American flag, produced great excitement. Sumner at once showed his concern for freedom and his interest in great questions of liberty. His opinions were published in an article published in a Boston newspaper early in 1842, the right and the justice of such an inquiry. Kent, Story, Cheate, and Theodore Sedgwick approved his position. This was his first appearance in the anti-slavery controversy. In 1842 Daniel Webster, as secretary of state, wrote his letter upon the case of the Creole, condemning that the slaves who had been against the ship's officers should not be liberated by the British authorities at Nassau. Sumner strongly condemned the letter, and took active part in the discussion. He contended that the slaves were manumitted by the common law upon passing beyond the domain of the local law of slavery, and if this were not so, the piracy charged was an offence under the local statute and not under the law of nations, and no government could be summoned to surrender offenders against the municipal law of other governments. In April, 1842, he writes: "The question of slavery is getting to be the absorbing one among us, and growing out of this is that other of the Union." He adjoined Longfellow to write verses that should move the country against the existing slavery, that this country was a great moral power, and not academic, and that the British government very properly insisted upon the non-intercourse law, under which the liberty of the slave was protected. In 1843 Sumner published the "North American Review," an article defending Com. Alexander Shedd MacKenzie for his action in the case of the "Somers" mutiny. As a son of John C. Spencer, secretary of war, was executed. He published also a paper upon the political relations of slavery, justifying the moral agitation of the question. In this year he contributed largely to the "Law Reporter," and taught for the last time in the Law-school. In the election of 1844 Sumner took no part. He had no special sympathy with Webster, yet thought that the chief danger in 1844 looked as if slavery seemed to him to be the chief public question. "He was a Whig, as he said in 1848, because it seemed to him the party of humanity, and John Quincy Adams was the statesman whom he most admired. He was overwhelmed with professional work, which brought on a serious illness. But his activity was unabated, and he was elected a member of various learned societies. His letters during 1844 show his profound interest in the slavery question. He speaks of the "atrocious immorality of John Tyler in seeking to absorb Texas," and the disingenuous vindication of slavery by Calhoun, which he regrets that he is too busy to answer. In 1845 he was deeply interested in the question of popular education, and was one of the intimate advisers of Horace Mann. Prison-discipline was another question that commanded his warmest interest, and his first public speech was made upon this subject at a meeting of the Prison-discipline society, in May, 1845. This was followed, on 4 July, by the annual oration before the civil authorities of Boston, upon "The True Grandeur of Nations." The oration was a plea for peace and a vehement denunciation of war, delivered, in commemoration of an armed revolutionary contest, to an audience largely military and in military array. This discourse was the prototype of all Sumner's speeches, and was a declaration of a fundamental principle, full of learning and precedent and historical illustration, forcible argument and powerful moral appeal. The effect was immediate and striking. There were great indignation and warm protest on the one hand, and upon the other sincere congratulation and high compliment. Sumner's view of the absolute wrong and iniquity of war under all circumstances met with most strong approval. He expressed at the great purpose of a peaceful solution of international disputes he never relinquished. The oration revealed to the country an orator hitherto unknown even to himself and his friends. It showed a moral conviction, intrepidity, and independence, and a relentless vigor of statement, which were worthy of the best traditions of New England. Just four months later, on 4 Nov., 1845, Sumner made in Faneuil hall his first anti-slavery speech, at a meeting of which Charles Francis Adams was chairman, to protest against the admission of Texas. This first speech had all the characteristics of the last important speech he ever made. It was brief, but sternly bold, uncompromising, aggressive, and placed Sumner at once in the van of the political anti-slavery movement. He was not an Abolitionist in the Garrisonian sense. He held that slavery was sectional, not national; that the constitution was meant to be a bond of national liberty as well as union, and nowhere countenanced the theory that there could be property in men; that it was to be judicially interpreted always in the interest of freedom and the rights of legal restriction and the moral force of public opinion. The abolition party would be forced to disappear. This was subsequently the ground held by the Republican party. Sumner added to his reputation by an elaborate oration at Cambridge, in August, 1846, upon "The Scholar, the Jurist, the Artist, the Philanthropist," of which the illustrations were his personal friends, then recently dead, John Pickering, Judge Story, Washington Allston, and Dr. Channing. The reference to Channing gave him the opportunity, which he improved, to urge the duty of anti-slavery action. It was the first time that the burning question of the hour had been discussed in the scholastic seclusion of the university. In September, 1846, at the Whig state convention held at the time of the convention, Sumner spoke upon the "Anti-Slavery Duties of the Whig Party," concluding with an impassioned appeal to Mr. Webster to lead the Whigs as an anti-slavery party. He sent the speech to Mr. Webster, who, in replying coolly, politely regretted that they differed in regard to political duty. In October, Sumner wrote a public letter to Robert C. Winthrop, representative in congress from Boston, censuring him severely for his vote in support of the Mexican war. He wrote as a Whig constituent of Mr. Winthrop's, and during his absence from Boston he was nominated for congress, against Mr. Winthrop, by a meeting of Whigs, including Charles Francis Adams and John A. Andrew. But he immediately and peremptorily declined, and he warmly supported Dr. Samuel G. Howe, who was nominated in his place.

During this period, when "Conscience Whigs" were separating from "Cotton Whigs," Sumner was worth in his public activity. He spoke often, and he argued before the supreme court of the state the invalidity of enlistments for the Mexican war, and delivered a lecture upon "White Slavery in the Barbary States," which was also printed as a pamphlet, and was a valuable historical study of the subject. In June, 1847, a speech upon prison-discipline showed his interest in the question to be unaltered. On 29 Sept., 1847, he spoke for the last time as a Whig, in the State convention at Springfield, in support of a resolution that Massachusetts Whigs would support only an anti-slavery man for the presidency. The resolution was lost, and upon the Whig nomination of Gen. Zachary Taylor, 1 June, 1848, a convention of anti-slavery men of both parties was called at Worcester on 28 June, at which Sumner, Charles Francis Adams, Samuel Hoar (who presided), and his son, E. Rockwood Hoar, with many other well-known Whigs, withdrew from the Whig party and organized the Free-soil party, which was presented to the people, said Sumner in his speech, alluding to Cass and Taylor, "I will take neither." Sumner was chairman of the Free-soil state committee, which conducted the campaign in Massachusetts for Van Buren and Adams, nominated at the Buffalo convention. In October, 1848, he was nominated for Congress in the Boston district, receiving 2,566 votes against 1,400 for the Democratic candidate. But Mr. Winthrop received 7,726, and was elected. In May, 1849, he renewed his plea for peace in an exhaustive address before the American peace society on "The War System of the Commonwealth of Nations," and on 5 Nov., 1850, his speech, after the passage of the Fugitive-slave law, was like a war-cry for the Free-soil party, and was said to have made him senator. In the election of members of the legislature the Free-soilers and Democrats united, and at a caucus of members of the Free-soil party Sumner was unanimously selected as their candidate for U. S. senator.

He was more acceptable to the Democrats because he had never been an extreme Whig, and the Democratic caucus, with almost equal unanimity, made him its candidate. The Whigs nominated Henry S. Foote, the well-known governor, Henry W. Cushman lieutenant-governor, and Robert Rantoul, Jr., senator for the short term. These were all Democrats. The house of representatives voted, on 14 Jan., 1851, for senator, casting 81 votes, with 191 necessary to a choice. Sumner received 186, Robert C. Winthrop 167, secertary 28, blanks 3. On 22 Jan., of 89 votes for the senate, 54 went to Sumner, 14, and H. W. Bishop 1, and Sumner was chosen by the senate. The contest in the house continued for three months. Sumner was treated to modify some expressions in his last speech; but he refused, saying that he did not desire the office, and on 22 Feb., he asked Henry Wilson, president of the senate, and the majority of members, to abandon him whenever they could do so. On 24 April, Sumner was elected senator by 193 votes, precisely the necessary number of the votes cast.

When he took his seat in the senate he was as distinctly the uncompromising representative of freedom and the north as Calhoun had been of slavery and the south. But it was not until 28 Aug., 1852, just after the Democratic and Whig national conventions had acquiesced in the compromises of 1850, that Sumner delivered his first important speech, "Freedom National, Slavery Sectional." It treated the relations of the national government to slavery, and the true nature of the constitutional provision in regard to fugitives. The speech made a profound impression. The general view was accepted at once by the anti-slavery party as sound. The argument seemed to the anti-slavery sentiment to be unanswerable. Seward and Chase both described it as "great," and it was evident that another warrior thoroughly equipped was now to be encountered by the slave power. On 23 Jan., 1854, Stephen A. Douglas introduced the Kansas-Nebraska bill, by which the Missouri compromise was repealed, and on 21 Feb., 1854, Sumner opposed it in a speech characteristically comprehensive and exhaustive, reviewing the history of the restriction of slavery. On the eve of the passage of the bill he made a solemn and impressive protest, and his reply to assailants, 28 June, 1854, stung his opponents to madness. He was now the most unsparing, the most feared, and the most hated opponent of slavery in Congress.

On 17 March, 1856, Mr. Douglas introduced a bill for the admission of Kansas as a state. On 19 and 20 May, Sumner delivered a speech on the "Crime against Kansas" which again aroused the country, and in which he spoke, in reference to the slave and free-soil factions in Kansas, of "the fury of the propagandists and the calm determination of their opponents," who through the whole country were "marshalling hostile divisions, and foreshadowing a conflict which, unless happily averted by freedom, will become war—fratricidal, pernicious war." It provoked the bitter rejoinders in the Senate, to which Sumner replied contemptuously. In his speech he had sharply censured Senator Butler, of South Carolina, and Senator Douglas, and two days after the delivery of the speech, as Sumner was sitting after the adjournment writing at his desk alone in the Senate-chamber, Preston Smith Brooks, a relative of Butler's and a representative from South Carolina, entered the chamber, and, after speaking a few words, he would have seized Sumner violently upon the head with a bludgeon, and while Sumner was struggling in vain to extricate himself from the desk and seize his assailant, the blows continued until he sank bloody and senseless to the floor. This event startled the country as a presage of civil war. The excitement was universal and profound. The House of representatives refused to give the two-thirds vote necessary to expel Samuel Brooks, but he resigned and appealed to his constituents, and was unanimously re-elected. Sumner was long incapacitated for public service. On 3 Nov., 1856, he returned to Boston to vote, and was received with acclamation by the people, and with the highest honor by the state and city authorities. On 13 Jan., 1857, he was re-elected senator, receiving all but ten votes, and on 7 March, he said to one of his private correspondents, "I am in Europe, where he submitted to the severest medical treatment. With characteristic energy and industry, in the intervals of suffering, he devoted himself to a thorough study of the art and history of engraving.

For nearly four years he was absent from his seat in the Senate, which he resumed on 5 Dec., 1859, at the opening of the session. He was still feeble, and took no part in debate until the middle of March, and on 4 June, 1860, on the question of admitting Kansas as a free state, he delivered a speech upon "The Barbarism of Slavery," which showed his powers untouched and his ardor unquenched. Mr. Lincoln had been nominated for the presidency, and Sumner's speech was the last comprehensive word in the parliamentary debate of free and slave. The controversy could now be settled only by arms. This conviction was undoubtedly the explanation of the angry silence with which the speech was heard in the senate by the friends of slavery. During the winter of secession that followed the election Sumner devoted himself to the prevention of any form of compromise, but his patience was strained and he was forced to the surrender of constitutional principles. He made no speeches during the session. By the withdrawal of southern senators the senate was left with a Republican majority, and in the reconstruction of committees on 8 March, 1861, Sumner was made chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. For this place he was peculiarly fitted. His knowledge of international law, of the history of other states, and of their current politics, was comprehensive and exact, and during the intense excitement arising from the seizure of the "Trent" he rendered the country a signal service in placing the surrender of Stidell and Mason upon the true ground. (See Mason, James Murray.) While there was universal acquiescence in the decision of the government to exclude the Fraser and his friends, there was not universal satisfaction and pride until on 9 Jan., 1862, Sumner, in one of his ablest speeches, showed incontrovertibly that our own principles, constantly maintained by us, required the surrender. One of the chief dangers throughout the civil war was the possible action of foreign powers, and especially of England, where iron-clads were on their way to the Mediterranean, and on 10 Sept., 1863, Sumner delivered in New York a speech upon "Our Foreign Relations," which left nothing unaided. Happily, on 8 Sept., Lord Russell had informed the American minister, Charles Francis Adams, that the rums would not be permitted to leave English ports.

Throughout the war, both in congress and upon the platform, Sumner was so uncompromising as to win the warmest respect, and when the war ended he was equally anxious to secure entire equality of rights for the new citizens. But while firm upon this point, and favoring the temporary exclusion of recent Confederates from political power, he opposed the proposition to change the jury law for the trial of Jefferson Davis, and declared every feeling of vengeance. He was strong in his opposition to President Andrew Johnson and his policy. But the great measure of the Johnson administration, the acquisition of Alaska by treaty, was supported by Sumner in a speech on 9 April, 1867, which is an exhaustive history of Russian America. He voted affirmatively upon all the articles of impeachment of President Johnson, which in a long opinion he declared to be one of the last great battles with slavery. Early in the administration of President Grant, 10 April, 1869, Sumner opposed the Johnson-Clarendon treaty with England, as affording no means of adequate settlement of our British claims. In this speech he asserted the claim for indirect or consequential damages, which afterward was proposed as part of the American case at the Geneva arbitration, but was discarded. In his message of 5 Dec., 1870, President Grant, regretting the failure of the treaty to acquire Santo Domingo, strongly urged its acquisition. Sumner strenuously opposed the project on the ground that it was not the wish of the "black republic," and that Baez, with whom, as president of the Dominican republic, the negotiation had been irregularly conducted, was an adventurer, held in his place by an unconstitutional use of the navy of the United States. Sumner's opposition led to a personal rupture with the president and the secretary of state, and to alienation from the Republican senators, in consequence of which, on 10 March, 1871, he was removed, by the Republican majority of the senate, from the chairmanship of the committee on foreign affairs. He was assigned the chairmanship of the committee on privileges and elections; but, upon his own motion, his name was stricken out. On 24 March, 1871, his speech in introduction of Mr. Chittenden's bill to make a new constitution of New York, was a powerful speech, severely arraigning the president for his course in regard to Santo Domingo. In December, 1871, he refused again to serve as chairman of the committee on privileges and elections. Early in 1872 he introduced a supplementary civil rights bill, which, since January, 1870, he had vainly sought to bring before the senate. It was intended to secure complete equality for colored citizens in every relation that law could effect: but it was thought to be unwise and impracticable by other Republican senators, and as drawn by Sumner it was not supported by them. He introduced, 12 Feb., 1872, resolutions of inquiry, aimed at the administration, into the sale of arms to France during the German war. An acrimonious debate arose during which the course was sharply criticized by some of his party colleagues, and he and Senators Trumbull, Schurz, and Fenton were known as anti-Grant Republicans.

Sumner was urged to attend the Liberal or anti-Greeley Republican convention, to be held at Cincinnati, May, which nominated Horace Greeley for the presidency, and the chairmen of the committee to write the platform were offered to him as inducements. But he declined, and in the senate, May, declaring himself a Republican of the straitest sect, he denounced Grantism as not Republicanism in a speech implying that he could not support Grant as the presidential candidate of the party. The Republican convention, 5 June, unanimously renominated Cleveland, who also was renominated by the Democratic convention, 9 June, adopted the Cincinnati platform and candidates. In reply to a request for advice from the colored citizens of Washington, 29 July, Sumner, in a long letter, advised the support of Greeley, on the general ground that principles must be preferred to party. In a sharp letter to Speaker Blair, 5 Aug., he set forth the reasons of the course he had taken.

But the strain of the situation was too severe. His physicians ordered him to seek recreation in Europe, and he sailed early in September, leaving the manuscript of a speech he had proposed to deliver in Faneuil hall at a meeting of Liberal Republicans. He opposed the election of Grant upon the ground that he was unfaithful to the Constitution and to Republican principles, and otherwise unfitted for the presidency; and he supported Greeley as an original and unswerving Republican, nominated by Republicans, whose adoption as a candidate by the Democratic party proved the honest acquiescence of that party in the great results of the civil war. He returned from Europe in time for the opening of the session, 2 Dec., 1872. The Republican majority omitted him altogether in the arrangement of the committees, leaving him to be placed by the Democratic minority. But Sumner declined to serve upon any committee, and did not attend the Republican caucus. On the first day of the session he introduced a bill forbidding the names of battles with fellow-citizens to be continued in the army register or placed on the regimental colors of the United States. And when he took no party stand and made no political speech, pleading only for equality of civil rights for colored citizens. At the next session, 1 Dec., 1873, he was placed on several committees, not as chairman, but as one of the minority, and he did not refuse to serve, but attended no meetings. During this session the cordial relations between Sumner and his fellow Republicans in the Senate, one of them said that he had no enemy but himself, and Sumner refused to speak to him for the rest of the session. But the next autumn his friend stepped into an omnibus in New York in which Sumner was sitting, and, entirely forgetting the breach, greeted him with the old warmth. Sumner responded as warmly, and at once the old intimacy between Sumner and his fellow Republicans in the Senate was restored, and in Massachusetts the Republican feeling for him was very friendly. Again, promptly but vainly, 2 Dec., 1873, he asked consideration of the civil-rights bill. On 27 Jan., 1874, he made for the bill a last brief appeal, and on 11 March, 1874, after a short illness, he died. The bill that was his last effort to serve the race to whose welfare his public life had been devoted was reported, 14 April, 1874, substantially as originally drawn, and passed the Senate, 22 May. But it failed in the house, and the civil-rights bill, approved 1 March, 1875, was a law of less scope than his, and has been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court.

Sumner's death was universally lamented. One of the warmest and most striking eulogies was that of Charles Lever, who represented him in congress from Mississippi, who had been a sincere disciple of Calhoun and a Confederate officer, who also recognized in Sumner a kindred earnestness and fidelity. The later differences with his party were forgotten when Sumner died, and only his great service to the country in the most perilous hour, and his uncompromising devotion to the enslaved race, were proudly and enthusiastically remembered. Among American statesmen his life especially illustrates the truth he early expressed, that politics is but the application of moral principles to public affairs. Throughout his public career he was the distinctive representative of the moral conviction and political purpose of New England. His ample learning and various accomplishments were rivaled among American public men only by those of John Quincy Adams, and during all the fury of political passion in which he lived there was never a whisper or suspicion of his political honesty or his personal integrity. He was fortunate in the peculiar adaptation of his qualities to his time. His profound conviction, supreme conscientiousness, indomitable will, and complete separation from this world, to the extent of his legal, his political, serious temper, and untiring energy, were indispensable in the final stages of the slavery controversy, and he had them all in the highest degree. "There is no other side," he said to a friend with fervor, and Cromwell's trenches did not ride into the fight more absolutely triumphant than they were persuaded that they were doing the will of God that they werelings the international, and political contests he had no taste, and at another time and under other circumstances he would probably have been an all-accomplished scholar or learned judge, unknown in political life. Of few men could it be said more truly than of him that he never lost a day. He knew most of the famous men of his time, was won over by his time, and he was familiar with the contemporary political and artistic movement in every country. In public life he was often accounted a man of one idea; but his speeches upon the "Treaty" case, the Russian treaty, and our foreign relations showed the fulness of his knowledge and the variety of his interest. He was dogmatic, often irritable with resolute opposition to his views, and of generous self-esteem, but he was of such child-like simplicity and kindness that the poisonous sting of vanity and malice was wanting. During the difference between Sumner and his fellow Republicans in the Senate, one of them said that he had no enemy but himself, and Sumner refused to speak to him for the rest of the session. But the next autumn his friend stepped into an omnibus in New York in which Sumner was sitting, and, entirely forgetting the breach, greeted him with the old warmth. Sumner responded as warmly, and at once the old intimacy between Sumner and his fellow Republicans in the Senate was restored, and in Massachusetts the Republican feeling for him was wholly free. No man was more constant and un sparing in the warfare with slavery and in the demand of equality for the colored race; but no soldier ever fought with less personal animosity. He was absolutely fearless. During the heat of the controversy in congress his life was undoubtedly in danger, and he was urged to carry a pistol for his defense. He laughed, and said that he had never fired a pistol in his life, and, in case of extremity, before he could possibly get it out of his pocket he would be shot. But the danger was so real that, unknown to himself, he was for a long time under the constant protection of armed friends in Washington. The savage assault of Brooks undoubtedly shortened Sumner's life, but to a friend who asked him how he felt toward his assailant, he answered: "As to a brick that should fall upon my head from a chimney. He was the unconscious agent of a malign power." Personally, in his later years, Sumner was of commanding presence, very tall, and of a stalwart frame. His voice was full, deep, and resonant, his elocution declamatory, stately, and earnest. His later speeches in the senate he read from printed slips, but his speech upon Alaska, which occupied three hours in the delivery, was spoken from notes written upon a single sheet of paper, and it was subsequently written out. Few of the bills drawn by him became laws, but he influenced profoundly legislation upon subjects in which he was most interested. He was four times successively elected to the senate, and when he died he was the senior senator of the United States in consecutive service. In October, 1866, when he was fifty-five years old, Sumner married Mrs. Alice Mason Hooper, of Boston, daughter-in-law of his friend, Samuel Hooper, representative in congress. The union was very brief, and in September, 1867, Mr. and Mrs. Sumner, for reasons that were never divulged, separated; and they were ultimately divorced. Of the "Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner," written by his friend and literary executor, Edward L. Pierce, two volumes, covering the period to 1845, have been published (Boston, 1877). His complete works in fifteen volumes are also published (Boston, 1870–85). The notes by himself and his executors supply a chronology of his public career, and the paper is written in a style that had no models. A crayon drawing by Eastman Johnson (1846) hung in Longfellow's study, and is engraved in Pierce's memoir. A large daguerreotype (1853) is also engraved in the memoir. A crayon by William W. Story (1854) for Lord Morpeth is now at Castle Howard, Yorkshire. An oil portrait by Moses Wight (1856) is in the Boston public library, and another by his other brother is in Harvard college. A portrait by Edgar Parker was painted several years before his death. There is a photograph of the "Memorial History of Boston"; a photograph (1869) engraved in his works; another (1871) engraved in the city memorial volume of Sumner; a full-length portrait by Henry Uline (1873) for the Haytian government—copy presented to the state of Massachusetts by James Worme (1884), now in the State library: a photograph (1875), the last likeness ever taken, engraved in the state memorial volume: Thomas Crawford's bust (1839) in the Boston art museum: Martin Milmore's bust (1874) in the state house, a copy of which is in the Metropolitan art museum, New York; a bronze statue by Thomas Ball (1878) in the public garden, Boston; and a statuette in plaster by Miss Whitney (1857), an admirable likeness. The illustration represents Mr. Sumner's tomb in Mt. Auburn cemetery, near Boston. His brother, George, political economist, b. in Boston, Mass., May 25, 1817; d. there, 6 Oct., 1863, studied at the universities of Heidelberg and Berlin, and travelled through Europe, Asia, and Africa, devoting himself to the study of the customs and institutions of various countries, and especially to comparative jurisprudence, international law, economic subjects, and philanthropic organizations. After his return to the United States he associated himself with Dr. Samuel G. Howe in the effort to establish schools for idiots. He lectured extensively on philanthropic subjects, and contributed to the "North American" and the "Democratic" reviews and to French and German periodicals. Alexander von Humboldt praised Mr. Sumner's notes of his research, and Alexis de Tocqueville spoke of him as knowing European politics better than any European with whom he was acquainted. His essay on the education of the feeble-minded was translated into French and Italian. He delivered an address at Cambridge in 1845 entitled "Memoirs of the Pilgrims at Leyden," which was published in the United States historical society. His advocacy of the system of solitary confinement in prisons led to its adoption in French penitentiaries, which furnished the subject for a pamphlet entitled "The Pennsylvania System of Prison Discipline Triumphant in France" (Philadelphia, 1847) and an "Address on the Progress of Reform in France." An oration before the authorities of Boston was also published (Boston, 1859), and in the American edition of Alphonse M. L. de Lamartine's "History of the Girondists" he printed a reply to the author's strictures on American institutions.

SUMNER, Charles Allen, stenographer, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., 2 Aug., 1835. His father, Judge Increase Sumner, was a distant relative of the celebrated abolitionist. The father of the late Judge Sumner studied at Trinity, but was not graduated. He subsequently studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but his chief attention was given to the practice of stenography. In 1856 he sailed for California, and reported for the legislature in 1857-61. He settled at San Francisco, and between the legislative sessions he was engaged in the state and county courts, in law-reporting, and general editorial duties till 1860, when he entered the Republican canvass. The following year he edited the "Herald and Mirror," in which his opposition to the "Slater" land bill succeeded in defeating it. Removing to Virginia City, Nev., Mr. Sumner was made assistant-quarter master in the U. S. forces in 1862, became colonel in 1864, and served as state secretary of the breveted colonel during one session. Meanwhile he had been twice an unsuccessful Republican candidate for congress. He returned to San Francisco in 1868, and began to advocate a government postal telegraph bill. Trinity gave him the degree of A. M. in 1887. He has published "Short-hand and Reporting" (New York, 1882); "Golden Gate Sketches" (1884); "Travel in Southern Europe" (1885); and "Sumner's Poems," with his brother, Samuel B. Sumner (1887).

SUMNER, Edwin Vose, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 30 Jan., 1797; d. in Saratoga, N. Y., 21 March, 1863. Young Sumner was educated at Milton (Mass.) Academy, and entered the army in 1819 as 2d lieutenant of infantry. He served in the Black Hawk war, became captain of the 3d dragoons in 1833, and was employed on the western frontier, where he distinguished himself as an Indian fighter. In 1838 he was placed in command of the School of cavalry practice at Carlisle, Pa. He was promoted major in 1846, and in the Mexican war held a cavalry charge at Cerro Gordo in April, 1847, commanded the reserves at Contreras and Churubusco, and at the head of the cavalry at Molino del Rey checked the advance of 5,000 Mexican lancers. He was governor of New Mexico in 1851-3, when he visited Europe to report on improvements in cavalry. In 1855 he was promoted colonel of the 1st cavalry, and made a successful expedition against the Cheyennes. In command of the Department of the West in 1858 he rendered efficient service during the Kansas troubles. In March, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general in the regular army, and sent to relieve Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, in command of the Department of the Pacific, but was recalled in the following year to the command of the 1st corps of the Army of the Potomac at Washington. He commanded the left wing at the siege of Yorktown. At Fair Oaks, where McClellan's army was divided by the Chickahominy and the left wing was heavily attacked, the orders to Sumner to cross the river and reinforce that wing found him with his corps drawn out and ready to move instantly. In the seven days' battles he was twice wounded. In 1862 he was appointed major-general of volunteers, led the 2d corps at the battle of Antietam, where he was wounded, and commanded one of the three grand divisions of Burnside's army at Fredericksburg, his division being the first to cross the Rappahannock. At his own request he was relieved in 1863, and, being appointed to the Department of the Missouri, he was on his way thither when he died. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for Cerro Gordo, colonel for Molino del Rey, and major-general in the regular army for services before Richmond. Gen. Sumner's last words, as he with great effort waved a glass of wine above his head, were: "God save my country, the United States of America."—His son, Edwin Vose, served with merit through the civil war, and was appointed major of the 5th cavalry in 1879, and inspector of rifle practice. In 1898 he was made brigadier-general of volunteers and ordered to the front.
SUMNER, George, physician, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 19 Dec., 1783; d. in Hartford, Conn., 20 Feb., 1855. He was graduated at Yale in 1803, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1817. Two years later he established himself at Hartford, Conn., where he was professor of botany in Trinity college from its foundation in 1824 till his death. He was an active friend of the college, and to his taste and liberality the beautiful grounds of the former college site owed much of their attractiveness. For many years he was also a lecturer on botany. He published a "Compendium of Physiological and Systematic Botany" (Hartford, 1829).

SUMNER, Increase, jurist, was born in Roxbury, Mass., 27 Nov., 1746; d. there, 7 June, 1799. His ancestor, William, emigrated from England to Dorchester, Mass., about 1635, and his father, Increase, was a prosperous farmer and a select-man of Roxbury in 1733 and 1756. The son, after graduation at Harvard in 1767, studied law under Samuel Adams while teaching at Roxbury, was admitted to the bar in 1770, and began practice in his native town. He was a member of the lower house of the legislature in 1776-78, and senator till 1782. In the mean time he was a member of the convention of 1777 for agreeing on a form of government, and of the State constitutional convention in 1779. He was elected to congress in 1782, but preferred to accept an appointment as associate justice of the "supreme judicial court, remaining on the bench till 1797. He was one of the committees on the revision of the laws of the state in 1785, a delegate to the convention that adopted the constitution of the United States in 1789, and at the close of his judicial office was elected governor for three successive terms. Judge Sumner's ability and intimate relations with his kinsman, John Adams, and other statesmen, gave him great influence in public affairs. His son, William Hyslop, soldier, b. in Roxbury, 4 July, 1780; d. in Jamaica Plain, Mass., 24 Oct., 1861, was graduated at Harvard in 1799, admitted to the bar in 1802, and in 1808-'9 was a member of the legislature. In 1814 he was sent to put the coast of Maine in a state of defence against a threatened invasion, and in 1818-'55 he served as adjutant-general of the state, with the rank of brigadier-general. He organized in 1820 the East Boston company. He was one of the original members of the Massachusetts horticultural society. His works include "An Inquiry into the Importance of the Militia" (Boston, 1823); "Observations on National Defence" (1824); "Reminiscences" (1854); "Memoir of Increase Sumner, Governor of Massachusetts" (1854); "Reminiscences of General Warren and Bunker Hill" (1858); "History of East Boston" (1858); and "Reminiscences of Lafayette's Visit to Boston" (1859).

SUMNER, Jethro, soldier, b. in Virginia about 1730; d. in Warren county, N. C., about 1790. His father, William, came from England and settled near Suffolk, Va., about 1690. Jethro was active in the measures that preceded the Revolution, and in 1759 was paymaster of the provincial troops of North Carolina and commander at Fort Cumberland. In 1776 he was appointed by the Provincial congress colonel of the 3d North Carolina regiment, and served under Washington in the north. He was commissioned brigadier-general by the Continental congress in 1778, was ordered to join Gen. Horatio Gates in the south, and was at the battle of Camden in 1780. He then served under Gen. Nathanael Greene, and at the battle of Eutaw, 8 Sept., 1781, made a bayonet charge, after which he was active in keeping the Tories in check in N. C. He was at some of the engagements between the British and Gen. Washington.

SUMNER, John, soldier, b. in Middletown, Conn., in May, 1735; d. in February, 1787. He was commissioned, 24 March, 1760, captain in the regiment of foot of which Phineas Lyman was colonel, and in this service he was in the battles of Lake George and Ticonderoga, and at the capture of Crown Point and the surrender of Montreal. At the opening of the Revolution he was a zealous patriot, and he entered the Colonial army in June, 1776, being commissioned major in a battalion of which John Durkee was colonel, and continued in the service until 1 Jan., 1781. He was in the battles of Long Island, Harlem, White Plains, German town, Trenton, and Monmouth, where he was in the thickest of the fight and one of many that were overcome by their innovations in the great heat of that day, from the effects of which he never recovered. He was one of the founders of the Society of the Cincinnati.—His son, Joshua, b. in Middletown, Conn., 11 Oct., 1761; d. March, 1832, was a surgeon in the army of Gen. St. Clair during his unfortunate expedition against the Miami Indians in 1791, and subsequently in his native state and in Massachusetts.—Another son, William, b. in Middletown, Conn., 22 Jan., 1789; d. 28 Sept., 1838, was colonel of an Ohio regiment in the war of 1812, and commanded his camp in the forest on the site of Columbus, the capital of the state.

SUMNER, William Graham, political economist, b. in Paterson, N. J., 30 Oct., 1840. He was graduated at Yale in 1863, and studied at Göttingen, Germany, and at the University of Paris. He was an assistant at Yale in 1866-'9, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1867, and was for some time assistant at Calvary church, New York city. In 1872 he was appointed professor of political and social science at Yale. Prof. Sumner is an earnest advocate of the so-called laissez faire principle in political economy. He favors the gold standard in currency and free-trade. He has done much to promote liberal methods of instruction in his department, and, among other innovations, has established a loan library of political economy for the use of his classes. He is a member of the American social science association, to whose "Transactions" he has contributed papers, including one on "American Finance" (1874). Besides articles in periodicals, he has three large works: his "Lectures on the History of Protection in the United States" (1875); "Life of Andrew Jackson," in the "American Statesmen" series (Boston, 1882); "What Social Classes Owe to Each Other" (New York, 1883); "Economic Principles" (1884); "Essays in Political and Social Science" (1885); and "Protectionism" (1885).

SUMTER, Thomas, soldier, b. in Virginia 14 July, 1736; d. at South Mount, near Camden, S. C., 1 June, 1832. Little is known of his parent-age and early life. He was present at Braddock's defeat in 1755, and seems afterward to have been engaged in military service on the frontier. In March, 1776, he was appointed by the Provincial congress lieutenant-colonel of the 3rd regiment of South Carolina riflemen, and was sent to overawe the Tories and Indians, who were threatening the upper counties of that state. But he does not seem to have distinguished himself until after the fall of Charleston, in May, 1780. About three weeks after that event Sir Henry Clinton wrote home to the ministry: "I may venture to assert that there are few men in South Carolina, or even in America, who, under the command of a corporal, could have held the place thus long. Among Sumter's comrades on this occasion was Col. William Neale, whose regiment Lord Cornwallis was attempting to impress into the British service. On hearing of the approach of Sumter, these men made haste to join him and place themselves under their former commander. Small parties of Whigs, coming in from the Waxhaw settlements, still further swelled the numbers of the little partisan force, and Sumter was promoted by Gov. Rutledge to the rank of brigadier-general in the state militia. Having now more than 600 men under his command, on 30 July he crossed Broad river and made a desperate assault upon the log-fortress at Rocky Mount, which was held by a strong body of New York and South Carolina loyalists under Col. George Turnbull. Finding the place too strong to be reduced without artillery, of which he had none, Sumter withdrew, and marched suddenly against the fortified post of Hanging Rock. This place was defended by 300 men, of whom at least 100 were British regulars from Tarleton's legion; the rest were Tories from the two Carolinas and Georgia. They were surprised by Sumter, and, after a severe struggle, the Tories were put to flight, but the British held their ground until sixty-two of their number had been killed or wounded. By that time Sumter's ill-disciplined men, thinking victory assured, had begun to disperse in quest of plunder and liquor, until he found himself unable to bring up forces enough for his final assault, and he accordingly ordered a retreat. On this occasion Andrew Jackson made his first appearance as a fighter.

Gen. Sumter now crossed the Catawba river and undertook to act in co-operation with Gen. Gates, who re-enforced him with 400 good troops and two field-pieces, and on 15 Aug. Sumter succeeded in cutting Cornwallis's line of communications and capturing his supply-train with its convoy. This brilliant exploit was more than neutralized by the overwhelming defeat of Gates at Camden, 16 Aug., which made it necessary for Sumter to retreat with all possible haste, encumbered as he was with prisoners and fifty wagons laden with supplies. At noon of the 18th he encamped on the north bank of Fishing creek, a small stream that flows into the Catawba forty miles above Camden. Here he was surprised by the indefatigable Tarleton. As the jaded men were resting under the trees, they were assaulted by the British dragoons, who, by a forced march, had passed the stream in their rear. The Americans were routed, with a loss of nearly 500 in killed, wounded, and prisoners; the remnant of their force was dispersed, and the stores were recovered by the British. After this staggering blow, Sumter fled to the mountains, where his men gradually came together, and within a few weeks he was able to take the field again and scout the country between the Enoree and Broad river. In October Cornwallis sent Maj. James Wemyss against him, with the 63rd regiment and a few of Tarleton's dragoons. In a night attack upon Sumter's camp on Broad river, 8 Nov., Wemyss was badly defeated and taken prisoner. Tarleton himself was now sent up with re-enforcements, and advanced upon Sumter, who retreated to Blackstock hill, where he planted himself in an exceedingly strong position. Here Tarleton, assaulting him, 20 Nov., was repulsed with a loss of about 200 killed and wounded, while Sumter lost three killed and four wounded; and the disaster of Fishing creek was thus avenged. In this action Gen. Sumter received a wound in the right shoulder which kept him inactive for three months. In February, 1781, he was again in the field, and played an important part in harassing Lord Rawdon, whom Cornwallis left in command in South Carolina, while he followed Gen. Greene's army northward to the Dan. During the subsequent campaign, April to July, 1781, in which Greene dislodged Rawdon from Camden and reconquered the interior of the state, Sumter's operations, in threatening the enemy's communications and dispersing parties of Tory militia, were very valuable, although he usually chose an independent course of action, and was sometimes regarded by Greene and his officers as insubordinate. Before the end of the campaign he was obliged by failing health to quit active service, and by the time he was again fit for duty the enemy had cooped up in Camden. After the war, Gen. Sumter was interested in politics, and at the time of the adoption of the constitution he was a zealous Federalist. He was a member of congress in 1789-93 and 1797-1801, and U.S. senator in 1801-9. He was the last surviving officer of the Revolutionary war. The best-known poem by Charles W. Peale is represented in the accompanying vignette. His son Thomas was in the diplomatic service.
